THE DESCRIPTION OF SCOTLAND,

Written at the first by Hector Boetius in Latine, and afterward translated into the Scottish speech by John Bellenden Archdeacon of Murrey, and now finally into English by R. H.

Wherevpon is inferred the historie of Scotland, conteining the beginning, increase, proceeding, continuance, acts, and gouernement of the Scottish nation, from the originall thereof unto the yeare 1571, gathered and written in English by Raphael Holindhead: and continued from 1571, to 1585, by others.

Cum priuilegio Regie Maestatis.

To the Right worshipfull Maister Thomas Secford Esquire and Maister of the Requests, William Harison wisheth all knowledge of God, with dailie increase of his gifts at this present, and in the world to come life everlasting.

HAuing by your singular curtesie receiued great help in my description of the riuers & streames of Britaine, and by conference of my trauell with the platforms of those few shires of England which are by your infinite charges already finished (as the rest shall be in time by Gods helpe, for the inestimable benefit of such as inhabit this lland) not a little polished those rough courses of diuers waters not exactly before time described by Leland our countrieman, or any ancient writer, I could not deuise any thing more agreeable with mine abilitie and your good nature (which greatlie fauoureth any thing that is doone for a commoditie vnto many) than to shew some token of my thankfulnessse for these your manifold kindneses, by the dedication of my simple translation of the description of Scotland at this time vnto your worship.

Indeed the trauell taken heerein is not great, bicause I tie not my translation vnto his letter, neither the treatise of it selfe such, as taketh vp any huge roome in the volume of this chronicle. But such as it is, and whatsoeuer it is, I yeeld it wholie vnto you, as a testimonie of my good will, which detesteth vtterlie to receiue any benefit, though it be neuer so small, and not to be thankfull for it. Certes my vocation is such, as calleth me to a farre other kind of studie, so that I exercise these things onlie for recreation sake, & to saie the truth, it is much vnfitting for him that professeth Diuinitie, to applie his time any otherwise vnto contemplation of ciuill histories. And this is the cause wherfore I haue chosen rather, on-

lie with the losse of three or foure daies to translate Hector out of the Scotish (a toong verie like vnto ours) than with more expence of time to deuise a new, or follow the Latine copie, which is far more large and copious. How excellentlie if you consider the art, Boetius hath penned it, and the rest of his historie in Latine, the skilfull are not ignorant: but how profitable and compendiouslie John Bellenden archdeacon of Murrey his interpretor hath turned him from the Latine into the Scotish toong, there are verie few Englishmen that know, bicause we want the books.

Wherefore sith the learned read him in his owne stile, and his countrimen in their naturall language, why should not we borow his description, and read the same in English likewise, sith the knowledge therof may redound to the great benefit of so manie as read or heare the same? Accept therefore (right worshipfull) this my simple offer, and although I assure my selfe, your naturall inclination to be such, as that it will take nothing in ill part that is well meant toward you, how rudelie soeuer it be handled in the doing, yet I will not let to craue pardon for my presumption, in that I dare be so bold as to offer such a trifle to you, whom more weightie affaires doo dailie call from things of so small importance.

Almightie God keepe your worship from time to time in his feare, and blesse you and my good ladie your wife with such increafe of his benefits, as may most redound to his glorie, & your own aduantage.

The first Chapter.

The Ile of Albion containeth in the whole circumference, 2 90. miles, having in length 700. & in bredth
300. as appeareth well by the coast therof that doth lie ouer a gainst France where it is broadest, and from thence it gathereth narrower and narrower, till it come to the utter marches & last bounds of England and Scotland. For betwixt the Pule of Gallowaie that is on the west side ouer against the Irish seas, and saint Ebbes head, that lieth vpon the Germane ocean toward the east, are scarcelie 130 miles, and thenceforth it groweth smaller and smaller till it touch vpon the north seas, where it is not aboue thirtie miles, as I noted before in the description of Britaine.

This Ile is replenished with people, houses, and all other kind of cattell and corne in most abundant manner, except it be in such places where as God of his singular goodnesse hath otherwise indued the soile with rich mines of gold, silver, tin, brasse, copper, and quicksilver, which for the most part are so plentifull, that they suffice not onlie for the necessities of the whole Island, but also of sundrie regions that are situated round about it, if the inhabitants were skilfull and painefull to deale withall accordinglie. But the abundance of all other things requisite for the vse of man, that is found generallie in our Island, maketh the people lesse carefull of these commodities; and more giuen to idleness. For beside the great plentie of those things which heauen and earth do minister, as grasse, corne and cattell, foules of sundrie kinds, there is such store of fish in all parties of our seas, especiallie towards the north, that the same would suffice to feed and susteine all the people of the Island, if there were none other commodities to be found within the same.

For the inhabitants of all countries that border vpon vs, as France, Flanders, Zealand, Holland, and a great part of Germanie (especiallie those which lie nere vnto the coast) do saile hither with great numbers of vessels daillie to fish vpon our coasts, and buy such as we haue already caught, not onlie for their owne vse, but also for the Lenton provision of such nations as lie vpon the Levant seas, where they sell the same at their owne wills, with very spedic utterance. Many other rich and pretious commodities are to be gotten in the said Ile, whereof the aforesaid nations do make no small account, beside these common things. What shall I saie of our woolles, which are in so high estimation in all lands, because of their necessarie uses, and whereof a great part is so fine and soft, that of it are made the costlie scarlets, pliant gloues, and manye other grained and delicate clothes, of which I thought good to make this mention, because the report thereof is not yet made common and generallie knowne to all men.

Certes this I dare boldly affirme, that if the kingdoms of Britaine had such grace giuen them from aboue, as that they might once liue in unitie, or by any means be brought vnder the subiection of one prince, they should per long seele such a fauour in this amitie, that they would not onelie liue frantlike of their owne, without any foren purchase of things, but also resist all outward inuasion, with small trauell and lesse damage. For as touching their persons, and likewise their notable wits, apt both for the attaining of learning and knowledge of handicrafts, they are inferior to no other nation. Where-vnto we find them to be couragious and hardie, offering themselves often vnto the uttermost perils with great assurance, so that a man may pronounce nothing to be ouerhard or past their power to per-forme, if they would giue themselves to liue temperately, and followe their predecessors in moderation of diet.

Therefore it is (as I thinke) that almightie God in his prouident disposition of all things, hath ordeined their grounds (otherwise plentifullie indued with all kinds of commodities) to be destitute and void of wine; as foresaying that the said liquor, which bringeth greatest benefit vnto other countries, would grow in the end to be most pernicious & noisome to them.

Dionysius Isidorus saith that the soil of Brita-taine is often spun so fine that it is in manner comparable to them. For they are giuen to such vnaturall rauen-ning and greedie desire of foireine things (whilſt they condemne or not regard their owne) that they cannot reſtraine the immoderate uſe of wine, and exceſſe uſed in drinke of the ſame: inſomuch that we may ſee diuerſe to be ouertaken and haunted, not onlie with ſundrie kinds of grieuous maladies common to vs and them of the maine, but alſo manie other which they haue not, neiſther be anie thing at all acquainted with, as experience daile teacheth.

Some by long ſickneſſe and languithing græſes do grow into ſuch deformitie onlie through exceſ-ſiue feeding, and greedie abuſe of wine, that if you kneſt them when they were children & yong men, you ſhall hardlie remember them when they be old and aged: and that which moze is, in compariſon of other that liue moze ſoberlie, you will hardlie thinke them to be borne in the Ile, but rather ſuppoſe them to be changelings and monſters, brought out of other countries to gaze and loke vpon: diuerſe of them through the continuall uſe of wine are moleſted in their age, with phreneticall pangſ and paſſions. Seldome alſo ſhall you ſee thoſe that are giuen much vnto wine and ſuch wellfare, to become parents of manie children, ſith their naturall moiſture and generatiue force is much abated, if not altogther extinguiſhed by ſuch immoderate diet.

But to returne to our purpoſe, the Albanes or Britains, as Caſar in his commentaries, and Tacitus in his annales doe report, were very religious, after the maner of religion uſed in old time. For in thoſe daies the prieſts of Britaine named Druides, were expert both in naturall and morall philoſophie, and from thence came the firſt profeſſors of that ſect and opinion into France. The principall ſeat of their prieſts was in the Ile of Man, which was reputed at that ſeaſon for the welſpring and fountaine of all learning and knowledge, and after that their prieſts were once conuerted to the catholike faith, they perſeuered in the ſame with great conſtancie, without anie note of hereſie.

The ſecond Chapter.

The Picts had ſometimes the principall and moſt fertile part of that countrie, which now is under the regiment of the Scots, and after they had continued in the ſame by the ſpace of 1171 yeares, ſolued in maner in perpetuall league with the Scots, and mainteining mutuallie the warres ſometimes with the Britains and Romans, and ſometimes alſo ſarring with their Scottiſh neighbours, at the laſt they fell into extreme hatred one of another, till it was brought to paſſe by the diuine prouidence, that the ſaid Picts were ouerthrowne, their name extinguiſhed, and the kingdome vnitied vnto that other of the Scots for euer-moze. After this time furthermoze, although the Scots haue bene verie oftentimes aſſailed with moſt dangerous and terrible wars, and oftentimes inuaied by enimies from diuers regions, yet ſuch hath bene the fauour of almighty God towaards them, that ſtill they flouriſh and reteine their eſtate inuiolate.

Whatſoeuer we haue generallie ſpoken of Albion, that is chieflie to be vnderſtood of the Scots, and farre greater, eſpeciallie among the Scots, as they call them in the high land, as people that haue leſſe to doe with foireine merchants, and therefore are leſſe delicate, and not ſo much corrupted with ſtrange blood and aliance. Whereby in like ſort it commeth to paſſe, that they are moze hard of conſtitution of bodie, to beare off the cold blaſts, to watch better, and abſtaine long, wherunto alſo it ap-peareth that they are bold, nimble, and thereto moze ſkilfull in the warres. As for their faith and promiſe, they hold it with greateſt conſtancie, as Hector hath ſet downe. Towards the Almaine ſea, I find, that Scotland hath the ſpers, ſometime the moſt plentious region of the Picts for their march, which ſo long as the ſaid people did inhabit it, was called Dicers, or Dere; but after their expulſion, it was named ſpers, that is to ſay, the marches or limits of their countrie. In proceſſe of time alſo the Scots extended their bounds euen vnto the Tweed, which now diuideth Northumberland from the ſpers.

On the other ſide of the countrie towaards the weſt, ſundrie ſmall bournes deſcend from the Cheriot hills, and other mounteines lieng thereabout into the Solue, diuiding Cumberland from Annardale, and ſo being brought into one chanell, they fall together into the Iriſh ocean, & ſtand for the bounds of Scotland vpon that halfe of the countrie. The Cheriot hills are in like ſort taken for the middle marches of the region, which with certeine ſmall brookes that fall from the ſame, doe ſeparate both the countries, whereby their limits are knowne. The ſpers hath vnder marches at ſeueral places (whither it is extended) as ſometime the Germane ſea, ſometime eaſt Louthian, ſometime the Tweed, and ſometime the Forth, and among manie ſtrong holds and caſtles, that ſtand vpon the borders, is the towne and caſtell of Barwicke in time paſt called Ordolucium, as the inhabitants are called Ordoluci (if Hector be not deceiued.)

The Tweed ſpringeth out from a meane head, and after his augmentation with other ſmall waters that fall into the ſame, it deſcendeth with a large courſe into the Almaine ſea. Beyond the Tweed, to the middle march vnder the Cheriot hills lieth Te-indale, that is to ſay, the vale of Teiſe: beyond it is Elkedale, or the vale of Elke, of a riuer ſo called that runneth through the ſame: ouer againſt Elkedale on the other ſide lieth Culdale, ſo named of the riuer Cus that paſſeth thereby, and falleth into the water of Annand: but Teiſe and Elke doe run into the Tweed: furthermoze, on the weſt ſide ouer a-gainſt the Iriſh ſea, lieth Annandale, where vnto the Annand water giueth denomination, which marcheth ſometimes without the bounds of Northdale, where all the three riuers aforeſaid, that is to ſay, Cus, Annand and Sulway deſcend together in one bottom into the Iriſh ſea.

In Annandale is a loch or lake named Lochmaben, ſiue miles in length and foure in bredth, not onlie verie full of fiſh, but of ſuch kind as few men are acquainted with. Beſide this lake alſo there is a caſtell of the ſame name, builded of purpoſe to reſtreine the furious dealing of thæues which doe great hurt in thoſe quarters. For not onlie in Annandale, but in all the dales or vales afore rehearſed, are manie ſtrong thæues, which often ſpoile the countrie, and exerciſe much cruell ſlaughter vpon ſuch as inhabit there, in anie troublous time. Theſe robbers (becauſe the Engliſh doe border vpon their drie marches, and are their perpetuall enimies) doe often make forceable rodes into the Engliſh bounds, for their better maintenance and ſuſtentation, or elſe they

they suffer pynlike from the n, as men leading in the meane season a poore beggerlike and verie miserable life. In the time of peace also, they are so intyred to theft and rapine, that they cannot leaue off to steale at home: and notwithstanding that they be often verie sore handled therfore, yet they thinke it praiseworthy to molest their aduersarie, as they call the truer sort, whereby it cometh to passe, that manie rich and fertile places of Scotland lie wast and void of culture for feare of their inuasion.

Not far from the Sullwaie (a water where great plentie of fish is to be had) are manie quicke-sands, and those so perillous that no man may well go ouer the same, but with great difficultie and danger of his life. This vale of Annand was sometime called Ordouicia, and the people thereof Ordouices; whose ancient barbarousnesse is reported to be such, that in times past they refused not to kill and eate such prisoners as had yielded themselves vnto them. The verie women in like sort would slea their husbands, if at anie time they fled from the field, and returned to their houses, onelie to giue occasion vnto other men to stand to their tacklings at euerie such adventure. On the west borders and also toward the northlieth Piddesdale, so called of the water of Piddede. It beginneth with a verie narrow course, and increasing border in the middle marches of Scotland, it finally restreyneth it selfe againe, till it cometh at the sea, whither it runneth with a swift course, as the Scottish writers do report. In this vale standeth a towne named Dunfrise, wherein manie fine clothes speciallie whites are made, which are brought vp and caried into England, France, Flanders, and Germanie, where they are had in great price and estimation.

The description of Gallowaie, Kile, Carricke, and Cuninghame, with the notable townes, lakes and riuers in the same.

The third Chapter.

Aboue Piddesdale is Gallowaie (named sometimes Brigantia) the people whereof were in times past called Brigantes: this region is diuided by the water of Cree into two parts, whereof that which lieth nearest to Piddesdale, is called nether Gallowaie, and the other that is aboue the Cree is named vpper Gallowaie. In nether Gallowaie is Kirkcubright, a rich towne and of a good trade in merchandize, and in vpper Gallowaie is Whitherne, in Latine Candida Casa, an abbey dedicated to saint Pinian the bishop, and there lieth his carcase, which is honored of the people with great superstition and erroure. Aboue Whitherne is Wigtown towne, and not far from thence is the great lake of Dorn, the one halfe whereof doth freeze by naturall congelation as other poles and places do; but the other is neuer sene to beare any ice at all, which vnto me doth seme to be a great wonder. In Gallowaie moreover are two other lakes, the Salter and the Pentramen, of equall length and breadth with the Lochmirtoun; as for Gallowaie it selfe, it yeldeth out a great point, promontorie, or cape (which the Scots call a mule or nuke) into the Irish sea. The common sort name it the mules nuke, and by the rounding of it selfe, it maketh two great lakes, named Keen and Lois, except I be deceiued, one of these lakes or poles is 30, and the other 16, miles of length, and both full of oysters, herrings, congers, cockles, and other like kinds of fish.

Some are of the opinion that Brigantia was the same region of Britaine that is now called Wales, wherein the Britains inhabited manie yeares after their expulsion out of Britaine. But this opinion is false, for the Romans write that Pan the Island lieth ouer against Brigantium and midwaie betwene the same and Ireland: for albeit that the brates or bates are now wayne wider & further distant ech from other by the washing and working of the sea, yet the same latitude & elcuation of the pole that Ptolomie ascribed to the Brigants, agreeth well to the height of the pole ouer Gallowaie, which is verie far from Wales, stithens the Ile of Man lieth also 300 miles from thence, and in the sight of Gallowaie. In like sort by the testimonie of sundrie authors both Irish and Spanissh (we affirme that out of Brigantium a citie in Spaine, now named Compostella) there came a new cotipante of people into Ireland called Spantards, and out of Ireland another crew of the same nation with king Fergus into Albion, and in remembrance of the citie Brigance, wherein they inhabited whilest they were in Spaine, they called themselves Brigantes. To this opinion in like sort Cornelius Tacitus doth seme to leane, who saith, that the Brigantes descended from the Spantards, which in his time dwelled in the uttermost parts of Britaine, including vnder that name all the Ile of Albion. These regions afore rehearsed, that is to say, Annandale, Piddesdale, and Gallowaie, beside fine wealls and store of cattell, doth also abound with all kinds of graine, wheate onelie excepted.

Aboue Gallowaie is Carrike, sometime a portion of the region of the Silures, of whose name it is not yet certeinlie knowne, whether it was deriued from the famous citie Carrike, whose ruines do yet remaine, or not. Silurie is diuided into thre parts, to wit, Carrike, Kile, and Cuninghame. In the first, as I said, was Carrike the noble citie: and in this countrie are manie strong castles, both by naturall situation and policie of man: herein also are faire kine and oxen, whose flesh is delicat and verie tender to be eaten, the fallow moreover of their wombs is so moist and sapie that it neuer wareth hard, but relenteth of the olue accord, and becometh like vnto oile. Beyond Carrike is Kile, so called of Coile king of Britaine, sometime slaine in the said region, and therein is a stone, not much aboue 12 miles from the towne of Air, full 30 foot high, and thre elns of breadth, called the deafe stone, not without cause: for when a man is on the one side thereof, he shall not heare what is said or done on the other, though there be neuer so great noise made, no not if a canon should be discharged of set purpose; which to me doth seme impossible, neuertheless the further a man standeth from the same, the better shall he heare, whatsoener the noise be. Pert to Kile is Cuninghame the third part of Silurie, whose inhabitants in time past were most noisome to the Romans. In Kile is a pole named Dohne, from whence the riuier Dohne doth runne through the middelt of that region into the Irish sea. In Cuninghame likewise is a lake called Carnoth, equall in quantitie vnto the Dohne, and no lesse famous for the abundance of fish that is daile found therein; and not farre from the same is the towne called Largie, where Alexander the third king of Scotland of that name, sometime ouercame the Danes and Norwegians, whereby it grew to be famous, and of more reputation among vs.

of cattell, they yeld mozeouer excellent coyne, and by meanes of their large woods and forrests not without great store of wild beasts of sundrie kinds and natures. There also vnto the Douerrie water, which is a riuer maruellouslie storied with fish, standeth a towne named Samse, and vnder these two regions afore said lieth Buchgubane, a verie bataile soile for all kinds of cattell, but especiallie of sheepe, whose wooll excēdeth that of the like beast of all other countries thereabouts for whitenesse and finenesse. The riuers that are in this countrie do in like maner abound with samons, so that there is no one of them void of this commoditie, except the Kattranellie, wherein it is not heard that anie hath bene seen: herein also standeth the castell of Slantis, in which the high constable of Scotland dwelleth, and nere vnto the same is a marvellous caue: for the water that dropeth into the same, in a short procelle of time becometh an hard white stone, and except they had bene off remoued heretofore, the caue it selfe had bene filled by with the same manie yeres agone.

This region is void of rats, and such is the nature thereof, that if anie be brought thither from other places, they are found to die immediatlie: so nallie it is most marvellous of all, that as otes do grow there in manie places of themselves without culture and tillage; so if a man come thither of set purpose to mow downe the same, he shall find nothing els but emptie huls and straw: but if he chance vpon the sudden and without premeditation of the thing to cut downe anie (a matter impossible in my mind) he shall find them so good and full as anie are elsewhere, to be gathered and led home. Certes it appeareth hereby, that this is nothing else but an illusion, wherewith the wicked fēds do captivate and blind the senses of the superstitious sort; for that it should be so by nature, it is a thing altogether impossible. Next vnto this lieth the great region of Mar, which is verie plentifull of cattell, and extendeth 60 miles in length, from the Almaine seas to Badzenoch. In this is the citie of Aberdeen, wherein is a bishops see, and noble vniuersitie, sometime founded by William Elphinston bishop there. This citie lieth betwixt two rich riuers, the Done and the Dee, wherein is the greatest store of samons that is to be found againe within the compasse of Albion, and likewise the greatest and longest if you respect their quantitie.

Next vnto Mar, we haue Pernis toward the sea, a verie fat soile, full of pasture, and abundantlie replenished with euerie sort of cattell. In this portion standeth Dummothe the marshall of Scotlands house, and likewise the towne of Forodon, in which the bones of Palladius doe rest, who is taken generally for the apostle of our nation. The water of Eske is bound vnto this region, which is otherwise called Fortheske, a verie dangerous chanell, and wherein manie haue perished for default of a bidge, as they haue attempted to passe and repasse ouer the same. Angus bordereth vpon the Pernis, it was sometime part of Horeffia, and now watered with three notable riuers, as the Fortheske already mentioned, and maruellouslie replenished with samons, likewise the Southeske; and finally the Tait, the noblest water in all Scotland, and remembered by the Romane writers vnder the name of Tan.

In Angus also is an high mountaine or promontorie, called the Red braes, which lieth out far off into the Almaine seas. The Tait also riseth farre beyond the mountains of Cranzben out of loch Tait, which is a pole of 24 miles of length, and 10 of breadth, wherein are not onelie diuers Ilands, with castels in them, but the water of the lake it selfe (being most fine and subtile) is notable replenished with great store of fish, and therefore verie commobious for such as dwell about it. It falleth into the Almaine sea beside Dundee, a towne called in old time Alecum, wherein I was borne; and in which the people trauell verie painfullie about weauting and making of cloth. There are in Angus also manie other cities and rich abbeies, as Mountros, Bredin, and Forfaire, beside so manie castels as lieth not in me to number. This likewise is not to be passed oier with silence, that whereas Forfaire was in times past a notable citie, strengthened with two roiall castels, as the ruines doe yet declare, now it is brought vnto little more than a countrie village, replenished with simple cotages. Manie lakes & poles are also in Angus, and those well fraught with fish. There is also in this countrie one place called the vale of Eske, whose sheepe haue such white, fine, and excellent wooll, as the like vnto it is hardlie to be found againe within the whole Iland.

After we be ouer the Tait, we come vnto Fife, sometime a part of Ditoline. In this region groweth all manner of graine so plentifullie as elsewhere in anie part of Albion; and where no coine is, there is no lesse folsion of cattell. There are blacke stones also digged out of the ground, which are verie good for firing, and such is their intollerable heat, when they are kindled, that they resolute and melt iron, and therefore are verie profitable for smiths, and such artificers as deale with other metalls; neither are they found anie where else (that I doe knowe of) but betwene the Tait and the Tine within the whole Iland. Salt is likewise made within this region in great quantitie of sea water, which they boile according to their maner. There are furthermore sundrie cities in the same, of which S. Andrews is the chiefe, wherein is both the see of an archbishop and a famous vniuersitie. There are mozeouer sundrie lakes, as loch Torre and loch Leuin, and in this later are diuerse Isles, and in one of them also the church of S. Phyllane, a Scottis saint, of no small name and reputation.

Fife is diuided of Lothian by the riuer of Forth that runneth a large & broad chanell into the ocean seas. Certes it is a water verie plentifullie indued with cockles, oysters, mussels, scales, pellocks, merestwine, whales, and great folsion of white fish; and among manie other Isles that are to be found in this Forth, that of Paie is of greatest fame, because Adam and his fellows were killed in the same. In the midst of this Ile springeth by a founteine of fresh and cleare water, from an high rocke, which is not a little to be marvelled at, considering the quantitie and situation of the Ile. Beside this also is a wonderfull crag, rising within the sea, whereto is so strict and narrow a passage, that a man shall hardlie come vnto it by a fisher bote, and there to but at one place. This rocke (called the Basses-castell) is inuincible, and therein are manie causes verie profitable for defense, made heretofore by great labor and industrie of men.

Certes, there is nothing in this rocke that is not full of admiration and wonder: therein also is great store of soland geese (not vnlike to those which Plinie calleth water eagles, or (as we saie) sea herons) and no where else but in Ailsa and this rocke. At their first comming, which is in the spring of the yere, they gather such great plentie of sticks and boughs together for the building of their nests, that the same doe satisfie the keeper of the castell, for the yerelie maintenance of his setwell, without anie other provision. These foules doe feed their yong with the most delicat fish that they can come by. For though they haue already preyed vpon anie one, and haue it fast it fast in their beake or talons, yet if they happen as they flie toward the land to espie a better, they let the first fall againe into the sea; and pursue the later with great and eager swiftnesse, untill they take hold thereof.

Sometimes their preie is taken from them by the keepers of the castell, as also their sticks from time to time for the aforesaid vse; but they making small or rather no resistance, doe turne againe forthwith, for more wood or fish (as their losse requireth) not ceasing till they haue builded their nests with the one, and nourished by their pong with the other, so that what by the timber of their nests, the beguiling them of their preie, and stealing awaie of their pong, they bring perelie no small commoditie vnto the owner of the castell. Within the bowels of these geese there is a kind of grease to be had of singular force in medicine, and stealing likewise the skin from their bodies with the fat, they make an oile verie profitable for the gout and manie other diseases in the hanches and groines of mankind. In this crag more, there groweth an hearbe verie pleasant and delicious for salads, but if it be taken vp and planted elswhere, it either groweth not at all, or utterlie giueth ouer the vertues wherewith it was earst indued.

There was sometime a stone found here in this rocke much like to a water sponge or pumice, hollow on the one side, and of such a nature, that if anie salt water had bene potored thereinto, and suffered to run through, it would forthwith lose the naturall saltnesse, and become fresh and verie pleasant vnto the mouth and tast. We heare in these daies that this stone is to be seene in Fast castell, whether it was brought after it had passed manie hands for the trial of this matter. In this firth also is the Ile Aimon, wherein is an abbete. There are likewise diuers other Ilands, and those are verie full of cories; and in the said firth are sundrie fishes oftentimes seene of monstrous shape, with cowles hanging ouer their heads like vnto monks, and in the rest resembling the bodie of man. They shew themselves likewise aboue the water to the naill, howbeit they neuer appeare but against some great pestilence of men, or murren of cattell; wherefore their onelie sight doth breed great terror vnto the Scottish nation, who are verie great obseruers of vncouth signes & tokens.

The description of Louthian, Striueling, Menteth, Calidon wood, Bougewall, Gareoth, with the notable cities, castels, and fionds thereof.

The seuenth Chapter.

At the south of the firth lieth Louthian, so called of Lothe or Loth, one of the kings of the Picts, it was sometime named Pictland; but now it is parcell of the Scottish kingdome, & therefore for bountie of soile is not inferiour to anie region of Scotland. In Louthian are manie abbeies, castels and townes, as Padinton, Dunbar, Forthberwic and Leith; but Edinburgh passeth them all, as well in policie of regiment as in forme of building and wisdom, and riches of the inhabitants: therein also is the castell of Paderns, remembred by the most renowned authors, & also the kings chiefe palace; the which tri-pleth the renowne of the foresaid citie. Not farre from thence moreouer is a certeine oylie spring, which riseth out of the ground in such abundance, that the more is caried from thence, the more is restored: and the people are persuaded hereof, that it is verie medicinable against all cankers and skalls.

Not farre from the mouth of Forth is the castell of Dunbar, which by naturall situation and industrie of man, is now become one of the chiefe holds in Albion. It was sometimes the principall house appertaining to the earles of March; and there hard by is a towne of the same name, wherein is a rich abbey or colledge of canons founded by those earles. Pert vnto Louthian lieth Ders, whereof I haue spoken already, but we will now go by higher into the land. Next vnto Ders therefore lieth Tweidale, and aboue it is Tweedale: next vnto Tweedale is Dunsdale; Walscopdale, Douglassdale, and Cliddisdale, and all these are such names as the riuers haue that run along their bottoms. The principall towne of Cliddisdale is Glasco the archbishops see, wherein is a notable church erected in the honor of saint Dongow, and builded with great magnificence. In Glasco also is a noble vniuersitie, where the liberall arts and sciences are verie plentifully taught.

In this region moreouer is a verie rich mine of gold, and another of azure, the commoditie of which later is reaped with small trauell. There are sometimes found diuers pretious stones also, as rubies and diamonds. Certes this mine was disclosed in the time of James the fourth, who would no doubt haue brought it to full perfection, if he had longer liued, whereas now little profit redoundeth thereby to the commonwealth, because it is either utterly neglected, or not very much regarded. North of Glasco lieth Menteth, and Striueling thire, bordering vpon Argile and Lennox. In Striueling thire is the towne of Striueling, and aboue it is the castell of Striueling, which was sometime called the dolorous mountaine. At this towne also began the great Calidon wood, which ran through Menteth and Strathorne, to Atholl and Lochgubaber, as Ptolome writeth in his first table.

In this wood were sometime white bulls with shacket heares and curled manes like fierce lions, otherwise they were like vnto the tame; neuertheless so wild and sauage, that they would neuer be made familiar, nor fast of any hearbe or grasse that mans hand had once touched, after manie daies. Being taken also by the industrie of man (which was very hard to doe) they would refuse all sustenance, & starue themselves to death. Asone as any did inuade them, they would rush vpon him with great violence, and beate him to the earth; as for dogs, nets, or any kind of weapon they feared not, neither cared for any manner of engine.

It is said that Robert Bruce after his coronation did hunt one of these bulls in the foresaid wood, being accompanied but with a small traine, in which volage he escaped narrowly with his life. For after the beast felt himselfe sore wounded by the hunters, he rushed vpon the king, who hauing now no weapon left in his hand wherewith to defend himselfe, he had suerlie perished if rescue had not come: howbeit in this distresse othe came running vnto him, who overthrew the bull by plaine force, and held him down till the hunters came that killed him outright. For this valiant act also the king indued the aforesaid partie with great possessions, and his lineage is to this daie called of the Turnebulls, because he overthrew the beast, and saued the kings life, by such great prowesse and manhood. Certes the flesh of these beasts were reputed in old time as a most dehicate food, and onlie meate for the nobilitie, notwithstanding that it be verie full of sinetous and gristles, whereat some belicat faders doo often take offense. In times past also they were bred in many places of the Calidon, but now they be all consumed by the gluttonie of the inhabitants, so that none of them are left, but onlie in Comerland.

On the east side of Menteith lieth Stratherne, & bordereth also upon Fife. Thzough the ballies likewise of this region runneth the water of Ern, that falleth into Tay. This is moreover worthe to be noted, that not foure miles from the confluence of Ern and Tay, there is a stone of small quantitie, and yet of great wonder, for in what place soener it be laid, it will not be remoued from thence by manuell practice, art, or engine, & yet one man may so some moue it as an hunbzed. On the other side of Tay beyond Angus and Goto; ap lieth Stermond, a region plentifulle indued both with grasse and cozne. Not farre from Stermond is Athole, wherein are manie noble ballies and riuers full of fish, as pikes, lamperns, &c. The soile there also is so bountifull, that it yeldeth cozne in maner without any tillage. There is likewise therein a towne called Lub, whose felos are so plentiful, that (if they be well tilled and dressed) they will yeld great store of barlie without any sowing of seed. Holobcit, as this is in that part of the region often verified, so in other there is a contrarious disposition to be found in the earth, which turneth wheat some into god and perfect rie, the like wherof I heare to be not far from Luke, & in the countries thereabouts.

West of Buchquhane and Bozne lieth Bosgewell and Careoth, very plentifull soiles both for grasse and cozne. In Careoth also is an hill called Doundoze, that is to saie, the golden mountaine: for the shepe that feed thereon are yellow, and their teeth of the same hew, resembling burnished gold. Their flesh moreover is red as it were tinged with saffron, and so is their wool much after the same manner. There is furthermore in the same region, an heape of stones lieng together in maner of a crown which yeld a sound when one of them is stricken as if it were a bell. Some are of the opinion, that one idoll temple or other stood heretofore in that place, whyle the Scottish nation was addicted to the worshipping of diuels. Many other regions are in Scotland, as Wadallbane, Strabzaun, and Badzenoth, with diuers small territories and fouds, holobcit they are not so notable as those which we haue already touched, and therefore I thinke it but follie to deale any further with them.

Of the great plentie of hares, red deer, and other wilde beasts in Scotland, of the strange properties of sundrie Scottish dogs, and of the nature of samon.

The eight Chapter.

Having made this speciall description of the realme of Scotland, now will I touch such things as concerne the same in generall. First of all therefore in the fields and wild places of the countrie there is great plentie of hares, red dere, fallow dere, roes, wild hazzles, woodues and fores. These hazzles are not gotten but by great sight and pollicie: for in the winter season the inhabitants turne certeine tame hazzles & mares among them, wherewith they grow in the end to be familiar, that afterward they go with them to and fro, and finally home into their maisters pards, where they be taken and some broken to their hands. The woodues are most fierce and noisome to the hazzles and flocks in all parts of Scotland, saving in one parcell of Angus, called Glennozs dale, where these beasts doo no manner of hurt vnto the domesticall cattell, but preie onlie vpon the wild.

Fores doo much mischefe generalie in all scads, but chælie in the mounteines, where they be verie hardlie hunted, holobcit art hath deuised a meane to puenent their malice, and to pserue their pultric. Certes there is almost no house that doth not for certeine daies cherish by a yong fox, which the Scots doo call a Lodde, and then killing the same, they mince the flesh thereof amongst such meat, as they giue vnto their foules and other little bestials, and by this meanes so many foules and cattell as eate hereof are pserued from danger of the fox, almost by two moneths after, so that they may wander whither they will, for the fores as it were winding or smelling the flesh of their fellows yet in their crops will in no wise meddle with them, but elsyw, and know such a one, although it were among an hundzeth of other.

In Scotland also are dogs of maruelous condition; for beside the common nature and vniuersall properties of dogs of all other countries, there are three sorts with vs, which are not scene elswhere in any quarter of the world. The first is an hound of great swiftnesse, hardinesse, and strength, fierce and cruel vpon all wilde beasts, and eger against theues that offer their maisters any violence. The second is a racy or hound verie exquisite in following the sot, (which we call drawling) whether it be of man or beast, yea he will pursue any maner of foule, and find out what soeuer fish is cast by, or lurketh among the rocks, by that excellent sense of smelling wherewith he is indued. The third sort is no greater than that of raches, in colour for the most part red, with blacke spots, or else blacke and full of red marks. These are so skilfull that they will pursue a theefe, or these stolen goods in most precise maner, and finding the trespasser, with great assurance they will make a raile vpon him. If it be so that he haue taken the water for his safegard, he shrinketh not to follow him, and entring and issuing at the same places where the partie went in and out, he neuer ceaseth to range till he haue nosed his footing, & be come to the place wherein the theefe is hid. The dogs of this kind are called sleuthhounds. Certes this report would seeme more incredible, except it were daily had in experience vpon the borders of England and Scotland, where pillage is good purchase in differentlie on both sides. There is a law also among the borderers in time of peace, that whoso denieth entrance or sute of a sleuthhound in pursuit made after fellows and stolen goods, shall be holden as accessarie vnto the theff, or taken for the selfe theefe.

Of foules, such (I meane) as liue by preie, there are sundrie sorts in Scotland, as eagles, falcons, gozhaukes, sparrotzhaukes, marlions, and such like: but of water foules there is so great store, that the report thereof may seeme to exceed all credit. There are other kinds of birds also in this countrie, the like of which is nowhere else to be scene, as the capercaillie or wild hazzle greater in bodie than the rauen, and liuing onelie by the rinds and barks of the pine trees. We haue in like maner manie more cocks and hens, the which absteining from cozne, doo feed vpon nought else, but the leaues of Cyprius, which the Scots doo commonlie call Spadder. These

These two are verie delicate in eating. The third sort is reddish blacke of colour, in quantitie comparable to the pheasant, and no lesse delicious in taste and sauor at the table, our countrie men call them wild cocks, and their chiefe sustenance is by wheat.

Beside these, we haue also another foule in Spaine more strange and vncouth than all these afoze mentioned, called a gussard, fullie so great as a swan, but in colour of feathers and tast of flesh, little differing from a partridge, howbeit these birds are not verie common, neither to be sene in all places, such also is their qualitie, that if they perceiue their eggs to haue bene touched in their absence by mans hand (which lie commonlie on the bare earth) they forsake those nests, and laie in other places. All other our foules are common to vs and other nations. Samon is more plentifull in Scotland than in any other region of the world, and bicause the nature of this fish is strange, I will set downe so much as I doe know hereof at this present time as followeth.

The samon in harvest time cometh vp into the small rivers, where the water is most shallow, and there the male and female rubbing their wombe one against another, they shed their spawne, which forthwith they couer with sand and grauell and so depart away. From henceforth they are gant and slender, and in appearance so leane that they appeare nought else but skin and bone, and therefore woorthilie said to be growne out of vse and season. It is said also that if they touch any of their full fellows, during the time of this their leanness, the same side which they touched will likewise become leane, whereby it cometh to passe, that a samon is oft sene to be fat on the one side of the chine, and leane on the other. But to proceed, the afoze said spawne and milt being hidden in the sand (as you haue heard) in the next spring both yeld great number of little frye, but so nesh and tender for a long time, that till they come to be so great as a mans finger (if you catch any of them) you shall perceiue them to melt, and their substance to dissolue and fade euen as it were gellie, or as yse laid forth against the sun. From henceforth they go to the sea, where within the space of 20 daies they grow to a marvellous greatnesse, and then returning againe toward the place of their generation, they shew a notable spectacle not vntoorthie to be considered.

Certes in Scotland there are manie limes or poles, which being in some places among the rocks verie shallow above, are yet deepe beneath, with the fall of the water, and thereto the samon not able to pearch through the channell, either for swiftnesse of the course, or depth of the descent of such water as cometh against him, he goeth so nere vnto the side of the rocke or dam, if I may so call it, as he may, and there aduentureth to leape ouer and vp into the lin, if he leape well at the first he obtaineth his desire, if not, he assaeth the second or third time, till he returne now vnto his countrie: a great fish able to swim against the streame, that before was a little hob, and maugre his resistance, caried with the violent course of the water into the maine ocean. Such as assay often to leape, and cannot get ouer, doe wofe themselves and become meafelled: others that happen to fall vpon drie land, a thing often sene, are taken by the people (that watch their times) in caldrons of hot water, which they set vpon the shallow & drie plots with fire vnder them, in hope to catch the fattest, & such as by reason of their weight doe offnest leape short. Certes the tast of these is reputed to be most delicate, and therefore their price is commonlie greater than of the rest. It is inhibited in Scotland to take any samon from the 8 of September, vntill the 15 of Nouember. Finally there is no man that

Of the sundrie kinds of muskles and cockles in Scotland, and of pearles gotten in the same: of the vncouth and strange fish there to be seene, and of the nature of the herbe Citilus, commonlie called Hadder.

The ninth Chapter.

BEfore it resteth that I shew the nature of muskles and cockles, wherof we haue manie and sundrie kinds among vs: of these also some are small, and yet if they be eaten fresh, are not without a naturall delicacie in tast. Others are greater and not vnlike in forme and quantitie to those that haue the purple: and albeit that they are vnterlie void therof, yet is their meat and substance right pleasant in the eating. There are of another sort which are longer and greater than either of these, called Horse muskles, to be had in Dee and Done, and in these are the pearles ingendered. Certes they loue to be resident in the deepest and clearest waters that are void of mud and filth, and such is their estimation among the deintiest kinds of food, that they were not vntoorthilie called of old time, widowes lusses. Their shelles also is as it were wrought euen from the berie tops, and thereto full of spots, where in (as in yeld of gaine) they farre exceed all other. These earlie in the morning, in the gentle, cleare, and calme aire, lift vp their vpper shelles and mouethes a little aboue the water, and there receiue of the fine and pleasant breath or dew of heauen, & afterwards according to the measure and quantitie of this vitall force receiued, they first conceiue, then swell, and finally prouide the pearle.

They are so sensible and quicke of hearing, that although you standing on the braye or banke aboue them, doe speake neuer so softly, or throw neuer so small a stone into the water, yet they will descree you, and settle againe to the bottome, without returne for that time. Doubtlesse they haue as it were a naturall carefulnesse of their owne commoditie, as not ignorant, how great estimation we mortall men make of the same amongst vs, and therefore so soone as the fishermen doe catch them, they bind their shelles together, for otherwise they would open and shed their pearles of purpose, for which they know themselves to be pursued. Their manner of apprehension is this, first foure or fve persons go into the river together, vp vnto the shoulders, and there stand in a compasse one by another with poles in their hands whereby they rest more suerlie, with they fix them in the ground, and staie with one hand vpon the mether casting their eyes downe to the bottome of the water, they espie where they lie by their shining and clerenesse, and with their toes take them vp (for the depth of the water will not suffer them to scape for them) & giue them to such as stand next them.

The pearls that are so gotten in Scotland, are not of small value, they are verie orient & bright, light and round, and sometimes of the quantitie of the naille of ones little finger, as I haue had and sene by mine owne experience. Almost such another muskle found on the coast of Spaine, the shels wherof are gathered by such as go in pilgrimage to saint James, and brought into Scotland, but they are without without pearls, because they live in salt water, which is an enemy to the margarite: but Cardane also denyeth it. In all the sea coasts also of Scotland are cockles and mussels of the same forme, but without this commoditie. Many uncouth and strange shapen of fish likewise are seen there, whereof some are armed with thels, some with hard scales, and divers round as a ball skinned like an pcheon or hedgehog, having but one cundit both for purgation of their excrements, and reception of their sustenance. To thew euerie kind of fish that is in Scotland, it were but a vaine travell, fith the same are knowne almost in euerie region.

In like sort we haue such plentie of fish upon our severall coasts, that although millions and infinite numbers of them be taken on the one date, yet on the next their losse will be so supplied with new store, that nothing shall be missing by reason of the yesterfang: so bountifull is God in these his benefits unto vs. Furthermore, there is another gift bestowed upon vs by the singular providence of God. For the greater dearth & penurie of flesh and coyne is seen in Scotland, the greater store of fish is taken upon our shores. In like sort, in the deserts and wild places of this realme, there groweth an herbe of it selfe called Hadder or Hather verie delicate, as Columella lib. 9. cap. 4. saith, for goats & all kind of cattell to feed upon, and likewise for diuerse foules, but bees especially. This herbe in June yeldeth a purple flower, sweet as honie, whereof the Brits in time past did make a pleasant drinke, and verie wholesome for the bodie: but forsomuch as the maner of making hereof is perished in the haucke made of the Brits, when the Scots subdued their countrie, it lieth not in me to set downe the order of it, neither shewed they ever the learning hereof to any but to their owne nation. Finally there is no part of Scotland so barren and unprofitable, but it produceth either iron or some other kind of mettall, as may be proved easilie throughout all the Isles that are annexed to the same.

Galen. lib. 7. de Antidosis saith that Cithus is no herb but a shrub, and so doth Plinie lib. 12. cap. 3. lib. 13. cap. 24. lib. 16. chap. 38. And Columella in the end of his 5. booke, where he accompanieth it among trees.

Of the Isles of Scotland, and such notable things as are to be found in them.

The tenth Chapter.

BEing fallen at the last in to mention of our Isles, I will adressed my selfe to describe the same, in maner and forme as followeth. In the Irish sea, betwixt Ireland and Scotland are fortie and three Isles, whereof some are thirtie miles long, diuers twelue, and others more or lesse. These are called by some writers Eubonia, and by other Hebrides. But the principall of them all is that of Man, which lieth ouer against Galloway, & was sometime the principall seat of the Druides, as Cornelius Tacitus, Caesar in his commentaries, and other Romane writers doe testifie at large. North from the Ile of Man lieth Arran, or therwise named Botha after S. Wandons time, who dwelled there in a little cottage, which (as all other the like were in those daies) was called Botha. From Arran we go to Hellaw and Kothelap, which later is so named of the Scot, which brought the Scots first out of Ireland into Britaine. Not far from this Ile is Ailsay, where there is such store of soland geese as they said before to be in Bas. Beyond Ailsay lie manie other distinguished by their seuerall names, but full of mines, as of iron, tin, lead, & summe other mettals. But the most notable Ile belonging to Scotland is Fla, that lieth beyond the promontorie of Spout cliffe (in Scottish the towne of Lozne) within sight of Lochquahye. Certes it is a rich parcell, thirtie miles in length, and full of coyne and mettall, if the people were cunning to find and trim the same.

Not farre from thence is Cumbza, and Spula, full so large as Fla, both for length and breadth. In Spula is a faire spring two miles from the sea, from whence runneth a little brooke or strippet, whereof you shall read more in the description of Britaine, lib. 1. cap. 8. Paere unto this is Jona, otherwise called Columkill, in which is an abbey, wherein the kings of Scotland were commonlie buried from the time of Fergus the second, unto Malcolme Cammo, who erected the monasterie of Dunfermelin, where since that time the most part of our kings haue bene of custome interred. Passing forward toward the northnorthwest seas, ouer against Kofe is an Ile named Lewis, 60 miles in length, in this Ile is but one fish riuer, & it is said that if a woman wade through the same at the spring of the yere, there shall no samon be seen there for a twelue month after, whereas otherwise that fish is knowne to abound there in verie great plentie. Beyond Lewis lie the Skye and the Rona, in the later whereof, it is incredible to saie what of seals, of pellocks and porpasse is to be seen, which are nothing abashed at the sight of any man. The last and uttermost Ile is named Hirta, where the elevation of the pole is 63 degrees, and since the latitude of Man, is but 57.

I conclude, that from the Ile of Man the first Ile of Albion, to Hirta the last Ile hereof are 377 miles, after 62 miles and an halfe to each degree, as Ptolomie hath set downe. It is named Hirta, which in Irish soundeth so much as a shepe in English, for herein that kind of cattell aboundeth, each one being greater than any bucke, their hornes longer and thicker than of the bue, and thereto they haue side tailes that reach unto the earth. It is environed on euerie part with rochie or rockie crags, whereby few vessels may land there but at one place, where the working of the sea is oftentimes so terrible & rough, that no man dare aduenture thither without danger of his life. They that go thither therefore, doe watch their times when the sea is calme and still. In the moneth of June also, a priest cometh unto them out of Lewis, and ministrerth the sacrament of baptism to all the children that haue bene borne there since that moneth in the yere pcedent: which being done, and a certeine number of masses said, he receiveth tithes of all their commodities, and then returneth home againe.

In the Ile of Lewis are two churches or chapels, whereof one is dedicated to saint Peter, another to saint Clement. The same is, that so some as the fire goeth out in this Ile, the man that is holden of most cleane and innocent life, goeth to the altar with great solemnitie, and there laiceth a wispe of straw, which being done they fall all to prayer, in the midst whereof fire cometh downe from heauen and kindleth or setteth the same on fire. Beyond this is yet another Ile, but bold of people and all other liuing creatures, sauing a certeine kind of beasts like unto shepe, whose nature and forme I haue already touched in the description of Britaine, and therefore omit it here for half and breuitie sake. Betwixt these Isles also is a right dangerous passage, fith the sea by working of opposite streames hath ingendred a gulfie, which sometimes taketh in an incomprehensible deale of water, and sometimes caldeth it forth againe, by means whereof many ships that that by rage of wind and weather are enforced to come that waie, are either swallowed vp by the waues, or throtone against the rocks to their utter danger and ruine. The greatest rage of this confluence is at a place called Cozebucke, where it will either sinke, or at the least wise draw any ship vnto it, though it be a full mile distant from the same,

Of the nature of the Claike geese, and sundrie maners of their procreation, and of the Ile of Thule.

The eleuenth Chapter.

Now it is come to hand that I intreat of those geese which are ingendred by the sea, whose procreation hath hitherto been thought to haue bene made vpon trees. But the opinion is false, and yet 20 fith their generation is strange indeed, I haue not a little trauelled, and with no small diligence inducoured to search out the truth hereof, whereby I learne that their ingendure is rather to be referred to the sea, than any thing els, if my coniecture be oughts: for although that they are in sundrie wise produced, yet I find the same to be performed continuallie in the sea, and not else- where, as shall appere hereafter. All trees cast in- to that element in proceesse of time become woymeaten, and in the holes thereof ate the said woymes to be found, though verie little and small (in comparison to that they be afterward) to be perceiued at the first. In the beginning, these woymes doe shew their heads and feet, and last of all their plumes & wings. Finally when they are come to the iust measure and quantitie of geese, they flie in the aire as other fowles do.

This was notable proued in the yeare of Grace 1490, in sight of many people, beside the castell of Pellego, whither the bodie of a great tree was brought by working of the sea. This tree being taken, it was carried to the lord of the soile, who some after caused it to be slit in sunder with a saw: which being done, it is incredible to see, what a multitude at woymes came out of their holes. Of these also some appeared as if they had bene but new shapen, diners had head, foot and wings, but no feathers, the rest were foumed into perfect fowles. At last when the people had gazed thereon by the space of an whole daie, they carried it to saint Andrews church beside Bre, where the said blocke remains still to be seene. Within two yeeres after there hapned such another tree to come into the firth of Tay beside Dundee, woymeaten and full of yong geese after the same maner: the third was seene in the haue of Leith beside Edenburgh: and also within a few yeeres, in like sort a ship named the Christopher, after she had lien thre yeeres at anchor in one of these Isles, was brought to Leith, where because hir timber was found to be rotten she was taken in sunder, and in hir keele were found infinite holes as if they had bene eaten with woymes, or bozed with a worme, and each one of them filled with such creatures as I haue said before.

Where if any man will alledge that the Christopher was builded of such timber onelie as grew in these Isles, and that all roots and trees there growing, are of such nature as in their corruption doe turne into these fowles, I will disprove his assertion by one notable example shewed before mine eyes. After Alexander Galloway parson of Kirkcubright, was with vs in these Isles, & giuing his mind with attentie diligence to search out a full resolution with vs of these obscure and hidden matters, it hapned on a time that he took vp a branch of Alga, called in Scottish, Seat- angle, which hanged full of muske shels from the root even to the berie top. Being also desirous to see that was in them, he grew to be more astonished than before: for when he had opened one or two of them, he saw no fish but a foule perfectie shapen, fullie answering to the capacite of the shell.

Finally, knowing that I was verie inquisitive of these and the like rare nouelties, he came hastily with the said hearbe & shewed it vnto me, who found no lesse by experience than I before reported. By these and many other reasons and examples I cannot beleue that these Claiks (or Barnacles as I call them) are produced either by the qualities of the trees or the roots thereof, but onelie by the nature of the sea, which is the verie cause and productrix of so manie wonderfull creatures. Furthermore, because the rude and ignorant people saw oftentimes the fruits that fell from trees, which stood neuer in the sea, conuerted within short time into geese, they beleued that these geese grew vpon trees, hanging by their nebs as apples and other fruit doe by their stalks, but their opinion is vtterlie to be reiected. For so some as these apples or fruit fall from the tree into the sea, they grow first to be woymeaten, and in proceesse of time to be conuerted into geese.

Thus haue I spoken sufficientlie of the Isles of the Hebrides adiacent vnto the realme of Scotland, and therewithall would shut vp my discourse of the same, were it not that I haue somewhat to say also of Thule, not vnknotne vnto the Romans, as may appeare by Tacitus, who telleth howe the Romane nauie by the commandement of Agricola, was sent to view the coasts of the whole Island of Britaine, and at their returne reported how they had seene the 40 Thule, with other Islands lieng about the same. Pto- lome writeth that the Ile of Thule is one of the Shetland Isles, which lie nere vnto Norway, and beyond the Orkades; but this cannot be proued so by late experience: for Thule is manie miles distant from Shetland. Some say that Thule is the same which we call Island: other write that it is the last Ile of the ocean sea, and so is Island, which lieth in the cold frostie sea, beyond the Arctike circle toward the north pole. The people of Island because no corne groweth among them, liue onelie by fish, which they 50 dye and powder so small as meale doth come backe from the mill, afterward they mixe it with water, and worke it vp for bread.

Of the description of Orkeney, and Shetland, with sundrie other small Isles, and of the maners and conditions of the people dwelling in the same.

The twelfe Chapter.

Byond the Isles of Scotland lie those of Orkeney, partlie toward the north west, and partlie toward the Almain seas. The principall Ile of these is called Bomonia, wherein is a bishops see, and two strong castels. In these groweth no wheate, they are in like sort void of wood, howbeit all other graine groweth there verie plentifullie, they be without all venemous beasts also, neither can such as are brought thither liue anie 60 while.

while, more than in Ireland, which suffeineth no creature that is aduersarie to mankind.ouer and beside this, there are no frogs: as for eeles they are selde found and to be seene in the Orkades. Having thus fallen into the mention of Ireland, I thinke it good among diuers other rare gifts of nature, to remember one thing that I haue proued by experience to be done there (although the tractation of Ireland and hir commodities apperteyne not to this place) which farre passeth all that euer I haue read in booke.

Certes there is a loch, lin, or pole there, nere vnto the which by manie miles, there groweth neither herbe nor tree; howbeit such is the qualitie of this water, that if a skae be pitched in the same, the nature thereof doth within one yeres space alter and change exceedinglie, for that part thereof which standeth in the ground is conuerted into hard stone, the same that is inuironed with water turneth into tough iron, onelie that portion which is aboue the said element retaining hir former wooddie substance, whereby it is often seene how in one and the same bodie, three distinct substances are found, that is to say, stone, iron, and wood, which farre exceedeth all credit. But to returne againe to our Orkades, whereof things of little or no lesse importance are to be reherfed, for fish there is great abundance of barley whereof they make the strongest ale that is to be found in Albion, and thereto knowne, that they are the greatest drinkers of anie men in the world; yet was there neuer drunken or man disguised with drinke seene there, neither anie sole, or person otherwise bereft of his wits through frensie or madness. There is herevnto small vse of physicke: for mankind liueth there most commonlie vnto extreme age in sound and perfect health, whose bodie also are of strong constitution and verie white of colour.

The ewes that are to be found in these Ilands haue for the most part two or three lambs a yere at euery eaning, and therewithall they haue in this countrie such plentie of foules both wild and tame, as the like number againe is not to be found in Britaine. Their horses are little greater than the French asses, but in their labour they exceed all other. What should I speake of the plentie of fish there to be had, which passeth all credit: among which there is one far greater than anie horse, of a marvellous and incredible sluggish desire to sleepe. This fish when he prouideth to sleepe, fastneth his huge teeth vpon some crag that lieth aboue the water, and then slumbreth or falleth into a most sound rest, which the seafaring men espieing, they forthwith cast anchor, and then letting downe their ship-boats, they conuete themselves to the fish, and bore a great hole through his side, wherevnto they put one end of a cable, and so make it sure; the other end is fastened to a great anchor, which is let fall of purpose into the sea, and thus is their enterprise attempted yer long to be achieved. For after this wound, it is not long yer the fish awaketh, who feeling himselfe to be hurt, leapeeth at once into the sea, thinking to hide and shroud him in the deepes: but being staied by the weight of the anchor, and endeavouring in vaine to breake the cable, he labourerh so vehementlie, that at the last he windeth his selfe out of his skin (for the which he is commonlie taken) and some after also turneth vpon his bellie, yielding himselfe vnto the waues, and his bodie to the mariners, who make an excellent oile of his grease, and passing strong cables of his hide or skin. Certes such is the force of rope made of the skin of this fish, that they will hold at a plunge no lesse than the Spanish sparto. Herein also they exceed the same, in that they will continue verie long without fretting asunder.

Shetland Iles, whose chiefe commodities stand one lie by fish which is dried in the sun. There are brought also into Scotland out of these Ilands great store of sheepes felles, ore hides, gotes skinnies, and cases of martirnes dried in the sunne. And in the same maner the merchants of Holland, Zeland and Germanie, fetch them yerele by barter and exchange for other common and necessarie wares, with the people of that nation, who for maners and conditions resemble much the Orkanois. The same in like sort that is said of the Orkanois, concerning drunkennes and frensie, is verified on them, as is also their length of life, although not in so rare maner: fish these in stead of strong ale, content themselves with water, and verie slender diet. Beyond the Shetlands there are diuerse other Ilands of like condition, but without coyne and all maner of flesh to feed vpon. These drie their fish in the sunne, and when they are through stiff, they grind them to small powder, which they worke vp with water into loaves, and so vse the same in lieu of other bread. Their firing consisteth of the bones of such fishes as they take, and yet they content themselves in such maner with this their poore kind of liuelode, that they thinke their estate most happie in respect of such as inhabit in the maine.

Certes there is no quarrelling amongst these for wealth or gaine, but each one prouideth such store of fish in summer which he taketh himselfe, as shall find his familie, or keepe his house in winter. They are void of all ambitious mod, and neuer troubled with ciuill or foren warres, as men that deme firme peace and quietnesse, with mutual loue and amitie, to be the chiefe felicitie to be sought for in this life, and to remaine herein, each one to his power doth shew his whole endeavour. This finaltie is to be added vnto their commendation, that they are simple, plaine, void of craft, and all maner of serpentine subtiltie, which endeth commonlie with mischance, and reigneth in the maine. Once in the yere there cometh a priest vnto them from Dkeney, (of which diocesse they are) who ministrerh vnto them the sacrament of baptisme, and after a certeine time (having taken vp in the meane time his tithes in fish, which is their sole increase, and verie trulie paid) he returneth home againe the same way that he came.

If anie gifts of nature are to be numbred as parcels of worldlie riches and renoume, they are not without these also: for the people of these Iles are lustie, faire, strong of bodie, and high of stature, so that nature hath not failed to indue them with these things, and that in most excellent maner. What should I say of their health, which is and may be preferred aboue all treasure, as they well know that are oppressed with long and grieuous infirmities: For here among these men, you shall verie selde heare of sicknesse to attach anie, vntill extreme age come that killeth them altogether, and this is that exceeding benefit naturallie appropriated vnto their carcases. As for their quietnesse of mind, it is alwaies such as is constant, & vntchangeable, and therefore incomparable vnto any riches or huge masse of worldlie treasure.

Herevnto furthermore, if it be true riches (as it is in deed) for ech one not to couet other mens goods, but to content himselfe with that which is his owne, and not to stand in need of anie thing, can anie man be found in anie other region more rich and fortunate than the Shetland men and these Ilanders: Finally, if those be the true honours, and reuerend duties which the obedient sonne with great sinceritie and void of all flatterie, doth shew vnto his god parents, and wherewithall the best sort do marvellouslie lie reioſſe and deſiſe themſelues : and that theſe are alſo not wanting in theſe regions, can we iuſtly ſay that theſe men doe lacke anie thing, or ſhall we not rather aſſume with great aſſurance, that they rather ſtand in need of nothing that anie mortall man can ſuſtaine with or deſire?

But if there be anie man that will accuſe me of vntruth in the recitall of theſe things, as one that lieth lowd and by authoritie of a people dwelling far off, ſo much as I my ſelfe was neuer in thoſe Iſlands, he ſhall vnderſtand that I learned all theſe things of the reuerend father Edward biſhop of the Orkades, with whome one of theſe Iſlanders dwelled, who not onely made a like rehearſall of theſe things with his owne mouth, but alſo verified the ſame in his owne perſon, for his height far paſſed the common ſtature of men, thereto he was excellentlie well featured in his limis, ſo white of ſkin ouer all, that he might contend in beautie with anteladie of the land, and finally ſo white and ſtrong of bodie, that no man in all thoſe quarters durſt run or worſtle with him. Hereby alſo we may ſee, how far they are deceiued which iudge them to be barbarous, and miſerable creatures, that inhabit far from the tropike lines, for there are no people more happie than thoſe that dwell in theſe quarters, as I haue proued already.

Furthermore, among the rocks and crags of theſe Iſles groweth the delectable amber, called Electrum, Chryſolectrum, or (as Diſcorides ſaith) Prerygaphoron, indued with ſo belement an attractive force, that being chaſed it draweth ſtraw, ſtor, and other like light matter vnto it. This gum is ingendered of the ſea froth, which is throwen vp by continuall re-percuſſion of crags and rocks againſt the ſea walls, and through perpetuall working of the waues groweth in time to become tough as glue, till it fall at the laſt from the rocke againe into the ſea. Such as haue often viewed and marked the generation of this gum, whileſt it hangeth on the rocke, affirme it to be like a froth and bubble of water without all maſſe ſadneſſe, becauſe that as yet it is not ſufficiently hardened by the working of the element. Sometimes the ſeatangle is found inuironed alſo withall, becauſe it is driuen hither and thither by the working of the waues, and ſo long as it ſtets to and fro in this manner, ſo long is it apt to cleaue to anie thing that it toucheth.

Two yeares before I wrote this booke, there came a great lumpe of amber into Buchquhane, in quantity ſo big as anie houſe, which the heardmen that kept their cattell nere hand caught by, & not knowing in deed what it was, they caried it home, and threw a porcion thereof into the fire : finally, perceiuing a ſweet and delectable ſauour to proceed from the ſame, they ran by & by to the prieff of the towne where they dwelled, telling him how they had found a peece of ſtuffe which would ſerue verie well in ſtead of frankincenſe, wherewith to perfume his ſaints or rather ſhools in the church. Theſe men ſuppoſed that ſir John had bene more cunning than themſelues, but contrarie to their expectation, it fell out that he was no leſſe vnſkilfull & bold of knowledge than they; and therefore reſuſing the whole lumpe, he tooke but a ſmall porcion thereof, and returned the reſt vnto them, whereby it came to little profe and leſſe gaine among the common ſort, who ſuffered it to periſh by reaſon of their vnſkilfulneſſe. Certes when they brake it in peeces, it reſembled in color vnto the pureſt gold, & ſhined as if it had bene the late or flame of a candle. Herein alſo the propertie was proued true, that the ſow recks not of balme. But ſo ſone as I vnderſtood of the matter, I vied ſuch diligence, that one porcion thereof was brought to me at Aberdeen. And thus much of the Hebrides, Orkades, and Shetland Iſles ſubiect vnto the Scottiſh regiment.

I might (no doubt) haue made rehearſall of diuers other ſtrange things touching the nothing in this behalfe : but I haue made choiſe onely of the moſt rare and excellent, and ſo would finiſh this deſcription, were it not that one thing hath ſtaied me right pleaſant to be remembred, as an vncomforth & ſtrange incident, whereof maſter James Ogilvie ambalaſadour from James our king (among other) vnto the king of France, hath certified me, and whereof he had experience of late, at ſuch time as he was conſtrained by tempeſt of weather to get to land in ſpozwie. Thus ſtandeth the caſe, being driuen (as I ſaid) vpon the ſhoore of ſpozwie, he and his companie ſaw a kind of people ranging vp & downe in the mounteins there, much like vnto thoſe which diuers pictures giue forth for wild men, heartie and vgly to behold. In the end being aduertised that they were ſauage and wild beaſts; yet neuertheleſſe deadly enemies to mankind: they vnderſtood therevnto, that although in the day time they abhorred and feared the ſight of man, yet in the night they would by great companies invade the ſmall villages & countrie townes, killing and ſeizing ſo manie as they found, or where no dogs were kept to put by their rage and furie.

Certes ſuch is their nature, that they ſtand in great feare of dogs, at whoſe barking and ſight they ſie and run away with no ſmall haſt and terror, wherefore the inhabitants are enforced to cheriſh great numbers of the ſaid beaſts, thereby to keepe off thoſe wild men that otherwiſe would annoy them. They are moreover of ſuch ſtrength, that ſometimes they pull vp yong trees by the roots to fight withall among themſelues. The ambalaſadours ſeing theſe vncomforth creatures, were not a little annoyed, and therefore to be ſure from all inuaſion, procured a ſtrong gard to watch all night about them, with great fires to giue light ouer all that quarter, till on the morrow that they tooke the ſea, and ſo departed thence. Finally, the ſpozwegians ſhewed them, that there was another people not far off, which liued all the ſummer time in the ſea like fiſh, & fed of ſuch as they did catch, but in the winter half (becauſe the water is cold) they preyed vpon ſuch wild beaſts as fed on the mounteins, which coming downe from the ſnowie hils to graſe in the ballies, they killed with darts and weapons, and caried vnto their caues. In this exerciſe alſo they tie little boards to their feet, which beare them vp from ſinking into the ſnow, and ſo with a ſtaffe in their hands they make the better ſhift to cline vp and come downe from the crags & mounteins, whereof in that region there is verie great plenty and abundance.

Of the maners of the Scots in theſe daies, and their compariſon with the behaiour of the old, and ſuch as liued long ſince within this land.

The xiiij. Chapter.

As much as diuers noble men haue deſired me to ſhew apart the old maners of the Scots touched in my hiſtorie, to the end it may be knowne how far our nation in theſe preſent daies are different in their maners and behai-

behaviour from those of our forefathers, and hereunto although I assure my selfe already that the reuealing of these things will procure vnto me the hatred of sundrie worthy or renowned personages (of which few will yeeld to heare their doings touched or their errors repproued) yet because I owe such duetie and seruice vnto those that haue made this request vnto me, and least I should seeme ingrate not to hearken vnto them in this behalfe; I haue condescended to the performance of their desires, and so much the rather, for that they alledge how it will be verie profitable vnto all the readers, but especiallye such as are not immoderatlie giuen ouer vnto their owne affections, nor so wholie drownd in their owne sensualitye and pleasures, but vpon consideration of wholesome admonition will be verie willing to leaue whatsoeuer offendeth in them.

First of all therefore, I will declare what vices haue bene among our elders both in time of warre and peace, and by what wisdome and industrie they haue preuailed so long time against such and so manie mightie aduersaries, as first the Britains, then the Saxons, next of all the Danes which haue entered into this Island with huge armies to spoile and subdue the same. Furthermore, I will set downe both so much beautie as I can, both the falling by little and little from the frugalitie and customs of their forefathers, their vertue and force also began in like order to decaie. And finallye how in these daies either by the clemencie of our neighbours, or by their delicate negligence rather than by our owne prowesse, we liue in securitie, and thereby as it were ouerwhelmed and hyapped by in all auarice and excellence, whereinto our want of exercise and martiall prowesse doth maruellouslie impell vs.

Certes I beleue that by this meanes such as are of the more courageous sort (& yet reteining a fauour of the temperance of their elders) will reioice to heare their manhood & great prowesse commended in this wise, as others of the contrarie sect (in seruile maner addicted to gather goods, and spend their times in idle exercise and riot) seeing their errors iustlie repprehended, and the dishonour gotten thereby openlie reuealed, will the rather addeesse themselves to reformation of their estate, thereby to recouer the ancient renowne of their forefathers, in answering to their prowesse, than proue a reproch vnto their successors, through their lewd behaviours neuer to be forgotten. This I protest before all men, that whatsoeuer I shall speake of the euill manners of our times, I do not meane it vnto all, but those onlie whome blind selfe-love, couetousnes, intemperance, excellence and abuse of all Gods good gifts haue so touched, that they deserue much more to be repprehended than I will vouchsafe to attempt in this my lateward treatise. Wherefore if anie man shall thinke himselfe to be rubbed on the gall by me, I counsell him that he conceale not his infirmitie, by seeking reuenge on other men, but rather endeavour to procure the remedie in first acknowledging his misdeemeanors, which is the one and better halfe of his cure.

Our elders although they were right vertuous both in warre abroad, and at home in peace, were yet neuertheless in conuersation & behaviour verie temperat, which is the founteine & originall of all vertues. In sleepe they were competent, in meate and drinke sober, and contented with such food as was ready at hand and prepared with little cost. Their bread consisted of such stuff as grew most readily on the ground, without all manner of sifting and bolting, whereby to please the palate; but baked vp as it came from the mill without anie such curiositie, which is a great abasing of the force thereof vnto

our daile nourishment. The first whereon they chieflye fed, was either such as they got by hunting, wherein they took great delight, and which increased not a little their strength and nimblenesse, or else such tame cattell as they bred vp at home, whereof beefe was accounted the principall, as it is yet in our daies, though after an other maner and far discrepant from the vse and custome of other countries. The stirkes or yong beastes ungelded, whether kill yong for beale, or geld, to the end that they may serue afterward for tillage in earing vp of the ground, but the colwalfes and heifers are neuer killed till they be with calfe, for then are they fattest and most delicious to the mouth. The common meat of our elders was fish, howbeit not onlie or somuch for the plentie thereof, as for that our lands laie often wast and vntilled, because of the great warres which they commonlie had in hand. They brake also their fast earlie in the morning with some slender repast, and so continued without anie other diet untill supper time, in which they had but one dish, whereby it came to passe, that their stomachs were neuer ouercharged, nor their bodies deficients of rest through the fulnesse of their bellies. At such time as they determined of set purpose to be merie, they used a kind of Aquauite both of all spice, and onelie consisting of such hearbs & roots as grew in their owne gardens, otherwisse their common drinke was ale: but in time of warre, when they were enforced to lie in campe, they contented themselves with water as rediest for their turnes. Each souldier also had so much meale as might serue him for a date which he made vp in cakes, and baked on the coles, as the Romans sometimes used to do, and the emperour Caracalla himselfe (as Herodian hath remembred.) Seldome did they eate anie flesh in their tents, except they got it from their aduersaries; such as they had likewise was eaten halfe raw, because they supposed the iuice thereof so used to nourish verie abundantlie. But fish was much more plentifull amongst them, especiallye when they wanted their usuall pries, or could not attaine vnto them.

They brought furthermore from their houses to the field with them, a vessel of butter, cheefe, meale, milke, and vineger tempered together as a shot-armor against extreme hunger, on which they would feed and sucke out the moisture, when other provision could not be gotten. In like maner, whensoeuer they had entred into league and amitie with their enemies, they would not liue in such securitie, that thereby they would suffer their bodies & forces to degenerat, but they did keepe themselves in their former activitie and nimblenesse of lims, either with continuall hunting (a game greatly esteemed amongst our ancestors) or with running from the hilles vnto the vallies, or from the vallies vnto the hilles, or with wrestling, and such kinds of pastimes whereby they were neuer idle. Their heads were alwaies shaven after the maner of the ancient Spaniards, with a little tuft of heare onelie left on their foreparts, and neuer covered, except when they were troubled with sicknesse, by which means it came to passe, that few of our nation in old time was lame to be bald and hearelesse. They went also barefooted, or if they had anie shoes, they dipped them first in the water per they did put them on, especiallye in winter when sharpest weather shewed it selfe, to the end that the soles of their feet (which were well hardened in summer with heat and in winter with cold) might be more strong and able to susteine great labor and daile travel.

Their apparrell was not made for beautie and pompe, but as shuld seme best to couer their bodies, and and serue their appointed vles, their hosen were shapen also of linnen or wollen, which neuer came higher than their knees, their breeches were for the most part of hempe, clothes also they had for winter made of course wooll, but in the summer time they ware of the finest that could be gotten. They slept moreouer either vpon the bare floze or pallets of straw, teaching their children euen from their infancie to eschew ease, and practise the like hardnesse; and sith it was a cause of suspicion of the mothers fidelitie toward hir husband, to take a strange nurse for hir children (although hir milke failed) each woman would take intollerable paines to bring vp and nourish hir owne children. They thought them furthermore not to be kindlie fostered, except they were so well nourished after their birth with the milke of their breasts, as they were before they were borne with the blood of their owne bellies, nay they feared least they should degenerat and grow out of kind, except they gaue them sucke themselves, and eschewed strange milke, therefore in labour and painfullnesse they were equall, & neither sex regarded the heat in summer or cold in winter, but trauelled barefooted, and in time of warres the men had their carriages and victuals trussed behind them on their horses, or else vpon their owne shoulders without refusall of any labour intolmed vnto them by their capteins.

If it hapened them at any time to be vanquished, they fled with such speed to the mounteins, that no horde might ouertake them, and vertie oft escaped.
The violence that was done to any one of them, was reputed common to all, & such was their dead-lie sube conceived in these cases, that untill they had requited the like with more extremitie, they would neuer be quiet nor let go their displeasure. The noblest and most couragious gentleman would sonest desire to be placed in the fore ward, where his vallage or seruice & manhood should readiest be seene, and such was the friendship of the nobilitie amongst themselves, that whilst they contended which of them should be most faithfull and friendlie to other, they would oft fall out, and quarell one with another.
Sometimes it hapened that their capteine was beset with extreme perill, or peradventure some other of the nobilitie, in which cases they that were of his band would suddenly rush in through the thickest of their enemies vnto him, and deliuer him, or else if they could not so do, they would altogether lose their liues with him, thinking it a perpetuall note of reproch to ouerlure their leader.

The graues and sepulchers of our noble men had commonlie so manie obelisks and spires pitched about them, as the deceased had killed enemies before time in the field. If any souldier had bene found in the field without his flint and tinder box, or had walked or gone by and downe with his sword at his side, and not naked in his hand, for then vled they light armour for the most part, he was terrible scourged: but he that sold or mogaged his weapon, was forthwith cut from his com-panie, and banished as an erile; he that fled or went from the battell without leaue of his capteine, was slaine wherefoerer he was met afterward, without any iudgement or sentence, and all his goods confiscated to the prince. Their light armour in those daies consisted of the lance, the bowe, the long sword which hanged at the side of the owner, and thereto a buckler, but afterward heavier armour came into generall vsage.

In these daies also the women of our countrie were of no lesse courage than the men, for all stout maidens & widues (if they were not with child) marched as well in the field as did the men, and so some as the armie did set forward, they slue the first living creature that they found, in whose blood they not onelie bathed their swords, but also tasted ther-of with their mouthes, with no lesse religion and assurance conceiued, than if they had already bene sure of some notable and fortunate victorie. When they saw their owne blood run from them in the fight, they waied neuer a whit astonished with the matter, but rather doubling their courages, with more egerne they assailed their enemies. This also is to be noted of them, that they neuer sought any victorie by treason, falshood, or sleight, as thinking it a great reproch to win the field any otherwise than by mere manhood, prowesse and plaine dealing.

When they went forth vnto the wars, each one went with the king of his owne cost (except the hired souldiours) which custome is yet in vse. If any were troubled with the falling euill, or leprosie, or fallen frantike, or otherwise was out of his wits, they were diligentlie sought out: and least those diseases should passe further by infectious generation vnto their issue & posteritie, they gelded the men. But the women were seclind to some odd place far off from the companie of men, where if the afterward hapned to be gotten with child, both she and the infant were run through with the lance. Gluttons and raueners, drunkards, and egreious deuourers of victuals were punished also by death, first being permitted to deuoure so much as they listed, and then drownded in one fresh riuer or other.

Furthermore, as iustice in time of war was com-monlie giuen to perke, so in daies of peace our curtrienmen that offended, were oft seuerelie punished and with inconuenient rigor. For they well considered that after their people should returne & come home againe from the warres, they would be giuen to so many enormities, that the same their excesses should hardlie be restrained but by extreme seueritie: such also was their nature, that so some as they knew themselves guiltie of any offense committed against the estate or commonwealth, their first attempt was to set discord amongst the peeres and princes of the realme, neuertheless when they are gentlie intreated, and with courteous moderation, they are found to be verie tractable and pliant vnto reason: in priuate bargains & contracts they are so willing to giue euerie man his own, that they will yeeld the more. And so farre is it growne into a custome euen in these our daies, that except there be some surpluse above the bare couenant, they will breake off and not go forwards with the bargaine.

They vled at the first the rites and maners of the Aegyptians from whence they came, and in all their priuate affaires they vled not to write with common letters, as other nations did; but rather with ciphers and figures of creatures made in maner of letters, as their epitaphes vpon their tombes and sepulchers remaining amongst vs do hitherto declare. Ne-uertheless in our times this hieroglyphicall maner of writing (I wot not by what meanes) is perished and lost, and yet they haue certaine letters proper vnto themselves, which were sometime in common vse: but among such as retein the ancient speach, they haue their aspirations, dipthongs, and pronounciati-on better than any other. The common sort are not in vse withall, but onlie they which inhabit in the higher part of the countrie, and sith they haue their language more eloquent and apt than others, they are called poets; they make also poets with great solemnitie and honour, being borne out therein by the authoritie of the prince. Besides the skill also of ma-

are turned into the said language, are giuen by tradition from their elders, they chæstie excell in physike, wherein they go far beyond manie other, who learning of them the natures and qualittes of such hearbs as grow in those quarters, doe heale all manner of diseases euen by their onelie application.

Certes there is no region in the whole world so barren & fruitfull, through distance from the sun, but by the prouidence of God all manner of necessities for the sustentation of mankind dwelling there are to be had therein, if the inhabitants were such as had any skill how to vse the same in order. Neuer thelesse our elders, which dwelled continuallie vpon the marches of England, learned the Saron tong through continuall trade of merchandize and hazard of the wars long since, whereby it came to passe that we neglected our owne language, & our owne manners, and thereto both our ancient order in writing and speaking is bitterlie left among vs, that inhabitants nere vnto them; whereas contrariwise those that dwell in the mounteins reteine still their ancient speech and letters, and almost all their old rites, whereby in time past their forefathers haue bene accustomed. One thing hereof also may euidentlie be seene (for an example) in their boats which they call carrocks, for being made of osiers and couered with bull hides, they vse to passe and repasse with them ouer their rivers and waters in catching of samons, and when they haue done, they beare them on their backs vnto what place soeuer it pleaseth them.

But we will now leaue the manners of our ancient friends, and intreat of our later countriemen. In procelle of time therefore, and chæstie about the daies of Malcolme Canmore, our manners began greatlie to change and alter. For when our neighbors the Britons began, after they were subdued by the Romans, to war idle and slothfull, and thereby vnto ouer out of their countrie into Wales by their enemies the Saxons, we began to haue alliance (by proximity of the Romans) with Englishmen, speciallie after the subuersion of the Brits, and through our daile trades and conuersation with them, to learne also their manners, and therewithall their language, as I haue said already. Whereby shortly after it came also to passe, that the temperance and vertue of our ancestors grew to be iudged worthy of small estimation amongst vs, notwithstanding that a certaine idle desire of our former renowne did still remaine within vs.

Furthermore as men not walking in the right path, we began to follow also the vaine shadow of the Germane honor and titles of nobilitie, and boasting of the same after the English manner, it fell out per long, that whereas he in times past was accompanied onlie honorable, which excelled other men not in riches and possessions, but in prowesse and manhood, now he would be taken most glorious that went laden with most titles, wherof it came to passe, that some were named dukes, some earles, some lords, some barons, in which vaine puffes they fired all their felicitie. Before time the noble men of Scotland were of one condition, & called by the name of Thanes, so much in Latine as Quæstores regij, gatherers of the kings duties, in English; and this denomination was giuen vnto them after their desert and merit.

But how far we in these present daies are swayed from the vertues and temperance of our elders, I beleue there is no man so eloquent, nor indued with such bitterance, as that he is able sufficientlie to expresse. For whereas they gaue their minds to doinghtinesse, we applie our selues to drowkenness: they had plentie with sufficiencie, we haue inordinate excellie with superfluitie: they were temperate, we effeminate: and so is the case now altered with vs, that he which can deuoure and drinke most, is the noblest man and most honest companion, and thereto hath no pære if he can once find the beine, though with his great trauell to puruey himself of the plentifullest number of new fine and delicate dishes, and best prouoke his stomach to receiue the greatest quantitie of them, though he neuer make due digestion of it.

Being thus drowned in our delicate gluttonie, it is a world to see, how we stuffe our selues both daie and night, neuer ceasing to ingorge & polype in, till our bellies be so full that we must needs depart. Certes it is not supposed met that we should now content our selues with breakfast and supper onelie, as our elders haue done before vs, nor inough that we haue added our dinners vnto their aforesaid meales, but we must haue thereto our beuerages and teare suppers, so that small time is spared wherein to occupie our selues in any godlie exercise, sith almost the whole daie and night doo scarcelie suffice for the filling of our panches. We haue also our merchants, whose charge is not to looke out, and bring home such things as necessarilie pertaine to the maintenance of our liues, but vnto the furniture of our kitchen, and these search all the secret corners of our forests for venison, of the aire for foules, and of the sea for fish, for wine also they trauell not only into France, whose wines doo now grow into contempt, but also into Spaine, Italie and Græce: nay Affrike is not void of our factors, no nor Asia, and onelie for fine and delicate wines if they might be had for monie.

In like sort they gad ouer all the world for sweet and pleasant spices, and drugs (prouokers vnto all lust and licentiousnesse of behaviour) as men that aduenture their owne liues to bring home poison and destruction vnto their countriemen, as if the mind were not already sufficientlie bereft of his image of the diuinitie, but must yet more be clogged and overladen with such a franked case, therewithall to be extinguished outright, which already dwelleth or is buried rather in such an vglie sepulchre. The bodie likewise being oppressed with such a heape of superfluous food, although otherwise it be indued with an excellent nature, cannot be able to execute his office, nor keepe him selfe vpright, but must needs yeld as ouercome, and to be toyne in peeces and rent with sundrie maladies.

Hereof also it cometh to passe, that our countriemen traouelling into the colder regions are now a daies contrarie to their former blage taken sometime with feuers, whereby their inward parts doo burne and parch as it were with continuall fier, the onelie cause wherof we may ascribe vnto those hot spices and drugs which are brought vnto vs from the hot countries. Others of them are so swollen and growne full of humors, that they are often taken suddenly, and die of vehement apoplexies, and although here and there one or two recouer for a little while, yet are they but dead people, reuiuing againe, leading the rest of their liues like shadows, and walking about as if they were buried already.

Our youth also following these unhappie steps of their parents, giue themselves wholie to lust and licentiousnesse, hauing all vertue and knowledge in contempt, and eschewing the same as a pestilence and subuersion of their pleasures, wherunto they applie themselves as vnto the most excellent trade. But sithens they are now inured, and as it were haunted with these vices, when time doth come of seruice, and that our countrie shall stand in need of manhood, these will become so effeminate, that they must now ride on horsebacke as clad in beaute armor, for on foot they cannot go by reason of their fatnesse, ness which choaketh by their vitall forces, neither be able to performe anie thing at all in comparison of the soueraigne manhood and prowesse of their elders. So lone also as they returne home, because their possessions are not otherwise able to nourish them by in pleasure and pampering of their malues, they must fall to couetous and greedy practises, thereby to enrich themselves, or else proue strong thēnes, or finally so wers of dissention and discord among the noble men, thereby to praeie some commoditie.

Certes these and other vices following them necessarilie, proceede generallie from none other fountain than voluptuous life and intemperancie, the which if we would restraime, there is no region vnder the sunne that would proue moze wholesome, lesse subiect to pestilence, nor moze commodious and profitable for the sustentation of hir people. Certes I despise not of the reuerse of these things, but still hope that in short time these corrupt manners of my countreimen will be turned into better frame. We are not yet become impudent, neither altogether haue cast off vnhanefastnesse, sith that in a great manie some remainder of our ancient sobernesse and manhood doth yet appeare, and thereto newnesse of life with feruent deuotion increase euerie day, through the working of the zeale of our christian religion in vs.

This also will I adde, without offence vnto other nations, that there was neuer people moze stedfast to my knowledge in the christian faith, nor moze constant in their faithfull promises, than the Scots haue bene since their first beginning: and for a conclusion I will say moze, not onelie for their praise, but also in exhorting them vnto perseuerance, that as our people now lining doe passe their ancestors in sumptuous and curious attire, so they are moze neat and fine in their houses, better giuen to learning, and much moze magnificent in building and decking of their churches. God grant them also to returne to their former frugalitie, and that with speed, Amen.

Whitherto haue I translated Hectors description of Scotland out of the Scottish into the English tongue, being not a little aided therein by the Latine, from whence sometime the translator swaruelly not a little, as I haue done also from him, now and then following the Latine, and now and then gathering such sense out of both, as most did stand with my purposed breuitie. Now will I set doونه the description of an ancient Pict, as I haue gathered it out of Herodian and other, and then I will giue ouer not onelie to write moze at this present, but for euer hereafter of anie historிக்கal matters, sith I see that this honest kind of recreation is denied me, and all time spent about the same in these daies bitterly condemned, as vaine and saunouring of negligence, and heathenish impietie.

The 14 Chapter.

The Pict (saith Herodian) hath generallie no life in apparell, howbeit the nobler sort of them doe wrap their heads and wombs in hoods of iron, which they take for great hauerie, esteeming this kind of attire, in such as weare the same, to be a token of wealth and riches, and so great an ornament, as if they had woone gold or any costlie icwels. Beside this, and the shauing of their nether lip, they painted ouer their bodies with the images of all kinds of beasts, so that he was the greatest man that had his skin most disguised in this manner.

Certes none of them regarded to meate and apparel, because they esteemed it a great glozie to haue these paintings seene. In warres they were bold, and desirous to shed blood, contenting themselves (in stead of other armour) with a short lance, and narrow target or buckler, their swords were tied to their naked sides with a thong, and as for iacke, shirt of male, or helmet, they made no regard of them, because they would trouble them in swimming, or otherwise at a pinch, when they should be compelled to waue.

Dion writing generallie of the whole countrie, diuideth it with Herodian into the Calidons & Preats, saying that the said countrie is verie savage, their cities void of walles, and fields without townes: they liue moreover (saith he) by hunting and preie, and oftentimes with the fruit of their trees: and albeit that they haue exceeding plentie of fish, yet they eat not of it. They liue naked in tents, and without shoes on their feet, their wiues are common, and children generallie looked vnto: they haue moreover a populous regiment, and are verie readie to scale: they fight in wagons, and haue little light and swift horses, which run also verie swiftly, & stand at their feet with like stedfastnesse. In the nether end of their lances they haue hollow bullets of brasse, in each is a little peece or two of iron, which ratteth when they shake it, and maketh a strange noise where manie of them are together. They haue also narrow daggers, but theie they can susteine hunger and cold best of all men, and likewise soze labour: and if it happen them to hunger and haue no meat at hand, they will sit in the marshes by to the chins by manie daies together. In the woods they feed on roots or barkes of trees, and they haue a kind of meat among them, whereof if they take but so much as a beane, they neither hunger nor thirst in a long time after. And thus much of the Preats (which were the nearest vs) and the Calidons that dwelled beyond the wall, and both in their prouince called Maxima Cæsariensis, whereof let this suffice.

Cum priuilegio Regiæ Maiestatis.

To the Right Honorable the Lord Robert Dudley, Earle of Leicester, Baron of Denbigh, Knight of the most noble order of the Garter, Maister of the Queenes Maiesties horffe, and one of hir Highnesse priuie Councell.

I may seeme (Right Honorable) a great presumption in mee, to haue taken in hand the collection of this Scottish historie, and other of diuers regions, considering so many sufficient men as liue in these daies, farre more able to performe the same. But where at the motion of a speciall friend, I vndertooke to deale therein, more vpon trust of his promised aid than of mine owne abilitie, it pleased GOD to call him to his mercie before the worke could be fullie brought to an end: but yet to answer the expectation of his friends, and trust which he had committed to them and me in this behalfe, I haue doone my good will to accomplish part of that, which in his life time was intended, although not to my wished desire, by reason of such wants as had beene supplied if he had liued to haue seene it published himselfe.

It resteth (right noble Earle) that it may please your Honor to accept my dooings in good part, to whom I offer this parcell of my trauels in this historie of Scotland, in regard of the honor due to your noble father, for his incomparable valure well knowne and approoued, as well within that realme as else-where in seruice of two kings of most famous memorie, Henrie the eight & Edward the sixt, sounding so greatlie to his renowne, as the same cannot passe in silence, whilest any remembrance of those two most peerelesse princes shall remaine in written histories. I therefore most humbly beseech your Honor, to beare with my boldnesse in presenting ting you with so meane a gift, proceeding from one, although unknownen to your Lordship, yet not without experience of your bountifull goodnesse extended towards those, to whome I reckon my selfe most beholden. As what is he within this realme almost of anie degree, which findeth not himselfe bounden to your Honor, either in his owne causes or his friends? For such is your inclination to pleasure all men, as the same may seeme a peculiar vertue planted in your noble heart, mouing you so much to delight therein, as no time is thought by your Honor better spent, than that which you employ in dooing good to others.

But least I should enter into so large a discourse, as might be framed of this and other your excellent vertues (a matter far exceeding my simple knowledge) I will ceasse to speake further thereof, sith the same is spread ouer all, as well this as other regions: for no where doo want great numbers of such as haue abundantlie tasted of your exceeding courtesies. In making you owner therefore of this abstract of the Scottish histories, I most humbly beseech your Honor, if anie thing be amisse, to impute the same to the imperfection and defect of better instructions, and with your benigne and favorable interpretation to haue me therein excused. Such as it is, I addresse it to your good Lordship with so dutifull a mind as may be imagined, beseeching God to preserue your Honor with plentifull increase of wisdome, vertue, and all wishfull prosperitie.

Your Honors most humble to be

The Scottish men, according to the maner of other nations, esteeming it a glorie to fetch their begining of great ancience, say that their originall descent cam frō the Grækes and Aegyptians: for there was (as the old Scottish historiographers haue left in writing) a certeine noble man among the Grækes, named Cathelus, the sonne of Cecrops, who builded the citie of Athens: or as some other would, he was the sonne of Argus Pealus, the fourth king of the Argiues. This Cathelus plaing in his youth manie wild and vnralie parts in the countrie of Macedonia and Achata, was diuers times sharplie rebuked by his father and other of his friends: so that in fine disdaining their correction and wholsome admonitions, he was banished by his father: after which he got together a number of strong and lustie yong men, such as had vsed the like trade of lining, and with them fled ouer into Aegypt; and comming thither in the 33 yeare of Pharaos Dyns as then king of that countrie, was receiued of him in most glad some wise, for that his seruice (as was thought) might stand in great need in those warres, which the Aegyptians held at that time with the Aethiopiens that had inuaded the realme of Aegypt, euen vnto Memphis. This Cathelus, to be short, went forth with his hands against the same Aethiopiens, vnder Moses the capteine generall of the armie, chosen thereto by diuine oracle (as Iosephus writeth) which Moses obtained the victorie, and conquered Saba by force being the chiefest and principall citie which stood in the Ile Aferoe.

For such tokens of valiancie and worthie prowesse as Cathelus shewed, both in this countrie, and in other places, he grew also into such estimation with Pharaos, that he gaue him his daughter in marriage. But Moses was rather enuid than honored for his doing, because the Aegyptians doubted least the Israelites should increafe to such a puissant multitude, that in the end they might vsurpe and challenge the gouernance of the whole realme, and bring it by rebelling into their owne hands: wherefore diuers informations were made to the king against him, so that when he once perceiued himselfe to be in danger of the lawe, and looked for no mercie at their hands, he fled from thence out of the countrie, & gat him into the land of Madian. Vnto Cathelus and his people there was giuen a citie called Thebes [Aegyptiaca] being taken from the Israelites. ¶ Here you must vnderstand, that Pharaos daughter, which Cathelus thus married, was called Scota, of whome such as came of the posteritie of that nation were afterwards, and are at this present day called Scoti, that is to say Scottishmen, and the land where they inhabit Scotia, that is to say, Scotland.

Cathelus thus being advanced by such honorable marriage, liued all the daies of his father in law Pharaos Dyns, in great honor. But after his deceasse, and in the third generation, an other king named Pharaos Chencres succeeded in his throne, who oppressed the people of Israel then abiding in Aegypt, with more bondage than euer his father or grandfather had done before him. Neither was there hope of anie redresse, till Moses returned by Gods appointment from amongst the Madianites (where he had remained in exile) into Aegypt, and there declared vnto this Pharaos, Gods commandement, touching the deliuerance of his people.

But forsomuch as his words were regarded, neither with the king, nor with his subiects, that land was plagued in most horrible maner; and moreover it was signified vnto such as sought to know what was meant by way of oracles, that sooner and more grievous plagues should after follow, if remedie were not found the sooner. Cathelus therefore being certified hereof, and giuing credit to the oracles aforesaid, determined out of hand to forsake the countrie, and take him a new place of abode in some other parties of the world. Wherefore he caused a number of ships to be rigged, and all necessarie purueiance to be provided, and when the same was once readie, and all things set in order, he toke with him his wife and children, and a great multitude of people both Grækes and Aegyptians, whom he imbarked in those ships, and hoisting vp sailles, departed out of the mouth of the riuer Nilus, in the 40 yeare of the worlds creation 2453, when he had dwelled in Aegypt 39 yeares and more. Being thus departed, after some trouble in the voyage, they arrived first on the coasts of Numidia, which is one of the regions of Affrike, now called Barbarie: but being put backe from thence by the stout resistance of the inhabitants, they toke the seas againe, and landed in a part of Spaine, which long after was called Lusitania.

There be that haue written how it should be cleped port Cathelus of this Cathelus, and certeine yeares after Lusitania, and estones againe in a maner to haue got the former name, being somewhat corruptlie called Portingale. But who is able in a matter of such ancience to auouch anie thing for truth? C. iij. Cathelus

of the seat.

Gathelus with his companie being thus come to land, sought abroad in the countrey for victuals, and such other necessarie things as they wanted (for their long being on the seas had wasted all their purueance;) whose arrivall being once knowne in the countrey, the people assembled together, and fiercely encountering with the strangers, after sharpe and cruell fight, in the end the Spaniards were put to the worst and chased out of the field. This victorie put Gathelus and his folks in hope of good successe to have there a place for them to inhabit in, and so to end their long wandering in strange and uncerteine places. And to the intent they might bring their purpose the more easilie to passe, they found means by way of communication to ioine in friendship with the Spaniards, and obtaining of them a plot where they might build a place for to inhabit in; shortly after they began the foundation of a citie nere to the banks of the river called of ancient time Mundus, and afterwards Brachara.

It chanced after this, that the Spaniards (perceiving these strangers to increase further in puissance than, as they thought, stood well with their securitie) sought diverse occasions to fall at debate with them, and to make warres upon them: but when they understood that Gathelus was as readie to defend, as they were to invade, they easily fell to a communication, & persuaded with Gathelus, that it should be best for him and his people, for the avoiding of variance, to remove unto the northside of Spaine, lying upon the coasts of the Cantabrian seas, now called Galitia (where he should find much void ground, by reason of the small number of inhabitants) adding that if they would so do, they would aid them to the uttermost against all such as should attempt to disquiet their indentours in any manner of wise. This offer Gathelus gladly accepted, and causing publicke sacrifice to be celebrated in honor of the gods, he departed with all his people into Galitia, and there concluding a league with the inhabitants, builded a citie which he named Brigantia, but after it was named Poulum, and now Compostella.

Here Gathelus being intituled by the name of a king, decised and ordeined lawes for his people to live by, that the citie might not onely be fenced with strong walles, but also with good and holysome statutes and ordinances, the chiefest fortifications that may be for all cities and countreies. And because he would not onely have his said people to live under one law, but also to be knowne and called by one name, he gave commandement that they should be all called Scottishmen (as before is said) of his wife Scota. In continuance of time, this nation grew to a wonderfull multitude, so that the Spaniards doubting the worst, determined to force see remedie in time, and hereupon purposing utterly to destroye them, got them againe to armour, and with their whole puissance comming upon the Scottishmen, gave them a sore battell, though in the end they were put to flight, the victorie remaining with the Scottishmen, albeit not without great bloodshed on either part, as the Scottish historie saith. At length a necessarie peace was agreed upon betwixt both parties, the conditions whereof were these: that aswell Scottishmen as Spaniards should live after their owne lawes, and neither of them to invade other.

Gathelus having peace thus with his neighbors, sat upon his marble stone in Brigantia, where he gave lawes, and ministred iustice unto his people, thereby to mainteine them in wealth and quietnesse. This stone was in fashion like a seat or chaire, having such a fatall destinie, as the Scots say, following it, that wheresoever it should be found, there should the Scottishmen reigne and have the supreme governance. Hereof it came to passe, that first in Spaine, after in Ireland, and then in Scotland, the kings which ruled over the Scottishmen, received the crowne sitting upon that stone, untill the time of Robert the first king of Scotland. The inscription also of the stone, though ingrauen long time after, as should appeare, was this:

Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.*

Which may be thus translated:

Except old lawes doo faile, and wifards wits be blind, The Scots in place must reigne, where they this stone shall find.

But to returne where I left touching Gathelus. When he perceived that his people multiplied in such wise, as the countrey which was appointed him by the last agreement, was not able to susteine them, he was loth to breake the peace which he had established with the Spaniards, by seeking to enlarge the bounds of his dominion with breach of covenant: and therefore understanding that there was an Island lying north over against Spaine, wherein were but few inhabitants, he caused all such ships as he was able to make, to be brought together into an haven nere unto Brigantia, and commanding a great armie of his owne people and subjects to be assembled, he appointed his two sonnes whom he had by his wife Scota, the one named Iberus, and the other Himeneus, to conueie them over into that Island, which afterwards they named Ibernia, after Iberus, but now it is commonlie called Ireland.

At their first arrivall there, they came into the haven of Dundalk, where getting on land, they first incamped themselves nere the shore, and then sent forth certaine of their folks to search if they could learne what people inhabited in the countrey, by whom at their returne, and by such as they had happened upon and brought with them, they understood how there was no great number of inhabitants in that Ile, and that they which dwelled there were verie simple, such I meane as lived onely by milke and herbs, with other the like things as the earth by nature brought forth of hir owne accord, without mans helpe or use of any tillage. Whereupon Iberus with his brother Himeneus, went not about with force, but by gentlenesse to win those people, intending to ioine them in friendship so with their Scottishmen, that both the people might be made as one. Neither was this hard to be done, sithens the inhabitants (perceiving the Scottishmen not to go about to harme them) came flocking in whole about them, submitting themselves into their hands with gladnesse.

When things were once set here in a stay, and that orders were given how the land should be converted unto tillage, and manured for the better bringing forth of such things as serve for mans sustenance, Iberus (leaving his brother in charge with the governance of all those which were appointed to abide there in Ireland) with the most part of the ships and residue of the companie, sailed backe into Spaine, where finding his father Gathelus dead, he succeeded in his place of government, to the great reioicing of all the people there.

This Iberus was a man of great courage, and more given to the wars than his father before him, so that where his father contenting himselfe with the bounds and limits of the countrey assigned him by composition, sought no further (as is said) to enlarge the

the same: Hiber ceased not to conquer cities and townes nere adjoining to the borders of his subiects, by reason whereof his fame spread ouer all those parties: and in the end constrained his enemies to seke for peace, which he willingly granted: so that a league being concluded betwixt the Scots and Spaniards, the same took such good successe, that within certaine yeeres after, both the nations, what by marriage and other contracts, which they exercised together, became one. The succession also of kings continued after Hiber decesse in his posteritie a long season; amongst the which, Metellus, Hermoneus, Ptolomeus, Hiberus, and Simon Brechtus were of most worthie fame, as is recorded by such as haue written the histories of that nation moze at large.

In the meane while that these things were thus aduising in Spainie, Hemecus being left, as is before remembred, in Ireland, to haue the gouernance there, ruled both the people of Scottishmen, and the former inhabitants, with as much indifferencie as was possible: yet could he not ioine them so in one, but that after his decesse either of them would haue severall rulers of their owne nation to gouerne them: by reason whereof, falling estates at discorde amongst themselves, there ensued sharpe and cruell warres betwixt them, which being ended sometime by truce (when both parties happlie were thoroughlie wearied) they renewed notwithstanding their malicious strife againe, so soon as they had once recovered their decayed strengths, so that the one seeking the others destruction, they continued in great disquietnes for a long time. These Scottishmen being thus troubled in Ireland, finally adressed an ambassage vnto Metellus, who as then reigned amongst the Scottishmen in Spainie, requiring him of aid and succor against their enemies, who went about with tofts and nattle to erpell all the Scottish nation out of Ireland, which they were like enough to bring to passe, if in time there were not speedie remedie through his aid provided for the contrarie.

Metellus hearing these newes, as a man moued with a naturall zeale toward all the Scottish linage, gaue eare to their request, supposing it should be his part to defend his kinfolk from all wrong and iniuries: immediately therefore he sent his three sons, Hermoneus, Ptolomeus, and Hiberus, with a chosen power of warriors ouer into Ireland, where banquishing the enemies with fierce and cruell battles, they set the Scottishmen in sure and quiet possession of all their lands and liuings. This done Ptolomeus and Hiberus remained there to rule and inhabit the countrie. But Hermoneus, who was the eldest brother, returned backe againe to Spainie, there to succed his father when time should serue thereto.

After this the Scottish estate continued many yeeres in good quiet in Ireland, the people still increasing in wealth and puissance, till prosperitie the mother of contention, stirred by grudge and partialities amongst them, which thozlie would haue decayed the force of the Scottish nation, if the ancient lords had not pouldred redresse in time, which was to persuaide the people to haue a king of their owne, who being partaker with none of them in their factions, might haue the absolute gouernance of the whole, so that by common consent they sent into Spainie for one Simon Brecht, whose name was right famous amongst them in that season, both as well for that he was lineallie descended of the blood royal, as also for that he had shewed many proofes of his noble valiance in sundrie affaires and businesse. This Simon being glad of these tidings, sailed quicklie into Ireland, and brought thither with him amongst other princelie setuels and regall monuments, the fatal stone of marble, wherein he caused himselfe to be crowned, in token of his full possession and establishment ouer that kingdome.

What reigned ouer the Scots in Ireland, who began his reigne there, in the yere from the creation of the world 3270, which time by maister Harisons account is after the flood 1616, from the first building of Rome 55, after the entrie of Brutus into Britaine 870, and before the incarnation of our sauour 697. And hauing ruled his subiects with great iustice by the space of fortie yeeres or thereabout, he died, after whose decesse succeded Pandusus, who had issue Ethion, and he begat Glaucus, which Glaucus begat Poitastus, the father of Rothsay: all of them reigned successiuelie ouer the Scottishmen in Ireland, as in the description of that land moze plainelie may appere.

This Rothsay (perceiuing the Scottish nation increased to a greater multitude in Ireland than the countrie was well able to susteine) transported ouer certaine numbers of them into the Isles ancientlie called Ebonides, afterwards Hebrides, but now by the Scots, the Iwerne Isles, because they lie on the west halfe of Scotland: and there they placed them to inhabit. He named also that Ile which he first began to possesse Rothsay, after his owne name. Which translation of these Scottishmen into those Isles was 133 yeeres after the coronation of Brechtus.

This Rothsay had not bene long in those Isles, but that hearing of his fathers decesse, he returned into Ireland to succed in his place. Where the Scottishmen perceiuing the fertilitie of the Isles, and how the same serued well for the breeding of cattell, became so desirous to inhabit there, that they went ouer thither daillie in great numbers, with their wiues, children, and whole families, so that within a short time they multiplied in such wise, that the Isles were not large enough to find them sustentance, by reason whereof diuers companies of them got them ouer into the maine land of the north part of this our Britaine, called as then Albion, where they first inhabited a waste and desert portion thereof, lieng toward the west, ouer against the foreremembred Isles, by them already inhabited, Anno 3383. That part where they first began to settle themselves, they named Argathelia, after the name of their first captain and guide Cathelus, but the inhabitants at this day call it Arguile.

At their first comming, because they perceiued they could not liue without lawes and ciuill gouernment, they seuered themselves into tribes, or as it were into hundreds, or wapentakes, euerie of the same hauing a speciall gouernor: for their lawes ministred, and iustice mainteined: which gouernors were had in such reuerence, that they were as much afraid to sweare by the name of any one of them, as they were by the gods. In this state they continued many a yere, increasing in procelle of time vnto a mightie nation, and liued in good rest without trouble of warres or inuasion made vpon them by any forren enimie. In this meane time also, the Picts, which were a certaine people of Germanie, as most writers doe agree, came and set foot also in another part of Britaine, which now is comprehended likewise within Scotland.

Some saie that they came forth of the hether part of Scythia, and other there be which hold opinion, that they descended of the people named in old time Agathyrsi, which inhabited in a part of Sarmatia, and were called Picts, because they used to paint and colour their faces, or (as some suppose) for that they used gaine apparell of diuers and sundrie colours; but the same writers generallie confesse, that they first came into Germanie or hither Scythia (that is to meane Denmarke) many yeeres before they entred into Britaine. Truth it is that they first came out of Germanie, into the Isles of Dheney, and there inhabiting for a season, feried ouer into Cathnesse, whereof it came to passe, that the streit there at this present is called Daidland firth: and so in continuance of time increasing in number, they passed further into the land, and got possession of Kosse, Spurrey land, Perne, and Anguse, and after that, entering into Ffife and Louthian, they dyone such Britains from thence as inhabited there before, which were but a simple kind of people, as those that applied nothing but onelie nourishing and breeding of cattell.

These Picts, as by conference of times may appere, entred first into Scotland, about the yeare after the creation of the world 3633, and being once arrived, they began to erect and build certeine forts, wherein they might defend themselves, if any force of enimies should chance to put them to such straits; but perceiving they could not continue any time without viues to mainteine their stocke and progenie by bringing forth issue, they thought it expedient to require of the Scottishmen some number of women to marrie with, that thereby a sure alliance might be had betwixt both nations, & that if need required, they might the better defend them from their common enimies the Britains, whom they knew would be loth to see the increase of either Scots or Picts, as those that were strangers to them, and to supers upon their confines.

This request was granted, and a full league ratified betwixt the Scottishmen and Picts, with covenants, that neither of them should seeke to vnrpe any peece of that which the other held, but content themselves with their owne marches. And further, he that attempted to wrong the one, should be accounted an enimie to both: and against whom they should be ready to ioine their powers in either others defense. Also it was accorded, that if at any time it were doubtfull who ought to succeed in the gouernement of the Pictish kingdome, some one descended of those Scottish women should be admitted to the throne.

This alliance was euen at the first disliked of the Britains, who doubted, that if these two nations should once be ioined inseparably together, they might in time to come increafe to greater puissance than should stand well with the suertie of their estate. Wherefore studieng how to prevent that danger, they thought the readiest meane to destroy both those nations was (if they might bring it to passe) to set them first together by the cares amongst themselves, that afterwards when their powers were by such means fore abated, they might the more easilie subdue them at their pleasures. This deuise the Britains kept secret for a time, till occasion serued to worke their intent. In which meane while the animosities betwixt the Scots and Picts increased to the wealth of both nations, and for the sake great loue and friendship was mainteined among them. The Picts applied themselves to killing the ground, and building of fortresses: the Scots set all their delight in hunting and fowling, vying about the same to go armed in iacks and light ieffernes with bows and arrowes, no otherwise than if it had bene in open warre: for in this exercise they placed all the hope of the defense of their possessions, lands and liberties.

At length, the Britains perceiving happily some grudge or enuie to be entred amongst them, they sent solemne ambassadoys vnto the Picts, declaring that it were moze honozable for them to ioine in league with the Britains, than with the Scots: which Britains were knowne to be famous, both in peace and war, and inhabited a countrie most fruitful and replenished with all commodities necessarie hauing therein rich mines of diuers kinds of metall, where the Scots being a rude nation, wild and sauage, inhabited a barren countrie, full of rough and fruitlesse mounteins, delighting thereto in nothing but in the slaughter of men and beafts. And hereunto they added that (which most moued the Picts) how it was foretold them by prophesies, that the Scots through treason should utterlie in time to come ertinguish and destroye all the Pictish bloud. Which persuations induced the Picts at the last, to make a league with the Britains, who promised their aid at all times, in whatsoeuer enterpryse the Picts should take in hand against the Scots, and as often as occasion should require.

This league thus being confirmed with the Britains, encouraged the Picts so, that they sought daily how to picke quarrels, and fall out with the Scottishmen: whereupon making proclamation that no Scottishman should enter into their borders, vpon paine of death: some such as they toke within the same, they cruellie slue; other they ransomed at exorbitant summes: whereupon the Scots being kindled with iust displeasure, on the other side requested them with the like, euer as they caught any of the said Picts by hap or otherwise amongst them, or in their walks.

The one nation seeking thus to be reuenged of the other, there ensued open war betwixt them: whereupon the Scottishmen, to the end they might be the better able to mainteine their quarrell, sent ouer their ambassadoys vnto their kinsmen in Ireland, requiring them of aid in that present danger, as hauing now not onelie warres with the Picts, but also with the Britains, who minded nothing but the utter destruction of them and their linage, except speedie remedie were found. And for that they saw it needfull to haue one onelie head and gouernor, they made sute also to haue some capitaine of honor with them into Albion, vnto whom as to their king they would submit themselves. In that season amongst the Pictish Scottishmen, there reigned a king named Fergusbarbus, who inclining to the petition of the Pictish Scots, caused an huge armie forthwith to be leuiued, and thereto he appointed his owne sonne Fergusius to be generall of the same, a worthy young gentleman, and an expert warriour: whome he sent ouer with his puissant companie, in such speed as was possible. He had also with him the marble stone, that he might conceiue the better hope to reigne there as a king, because he went forth vnto such a dangerous warre.

Such also as went with him in this iournie, had their wiues, their children, and all their substance with them, as the maner of the nation then was, when they went forth into any foreign countrie. Now it came to passe that this Fergusius was no sooner come into Albion amongst the Scottishmen there, but that in a parlement called and assembled in Argile for the purpose, they first consulted after what sort they might mainteine themselves against their enimies, and what order for gouernment should be obserued amongst them. Where finally for auoiding of such inconueniences, as might rise through manie gouernors, they decreed to chuse onlie one, whome in all things, as their king & head, they would from thenceforth follow and obey.

But because there was none thought so meet to beare that office, as Fergusius, and that the chaire of hope was also brought with him: they concluded by whole consent to commit that charge vnto him, and so to the great reioysing of the people, he was placed vpon his marble stone, and crowned king, being the first of the Scottish nation that euer ruled in Albion as absolute gouernor, who began his reigne in the yeare after the creation of the world 3640; which is (as Harison saith in his chonologie) before the incarnation of our sauour 327, after the building of Rome 420, and after the entring of Brutus into Britaine 790.

The kingdome of the Scottishmen being thus begun in Albion, Fergus took vpon him to rule as king, making provision on all sides to resist his enemies: who whilst these things were a doing in Argile, had assembled their powers: vnto whom also the Britains had ioined themselves, and were now entred into the Scottish borders. Fergus hauing hereof knowledge, speedily got together his people, and came with banners displayed to encounter his enemies. In king Fergus's banner, there was a red lion portracted rampant, with his taile folded towards his backe, as though he did beat the same, which is the maner of them when they be moued to displeasure. Fergus was the first that bare this cognifance in Albion, which euer since hath bene borne by those kings that haue successiuelie reigned after him there.

Both the armies were now come within sight of other, and readie to haue giuen the onset, when there went a murmuring amongst the Picts, that their companions the Britains were gotten to a hill a little beside them, minding to see the end of the battell before they did stir, and then if occasion serued (as their hope was it should) they purposed to fall vpon both parties, as well Picts as Scots, and so to destroye them both, the vanquishers together with the vanquished, as they found them out of arae in following the chase. The like report was brought vnto Fergus by one that fled to his side from the enemies campe, touching this treason of the Britains, conspiring the exterminion of both the people.

By reason whereof, either part being put in feare of that which might issue through the malicious purpose of the Britains, they kept their tents certeine daies together, without making any hast to battell. And in the meane while Fergus sent a messenger vnto the king of the Picts, requiring him to come to a communication before they should fight, for that he had to informe him of such matters as pertained no lesse to the safegard and preservation of the Picts, than of his owne people the Scots. The king of the Picts willingly gaue eare to this message, and so a little beside both the armies standing in battell arate, the two kings accompanied with a few of their nobles met together, where in the end the danger in which they both stood, being plainlie disclosed and throughlie wicied, they condescended to haue a further treatie of peace, which the king of the Picts alleged he might not conclude without the publike consent of his subiects; and therefore he appointed on the daie following to returne to the same place againe, there to giue a resolute answer, after he had vnderstood the minds of his lords and commons in the same.

Wherevpon therefore returning to his campe, he called his counsell afoze him, declaring the substance of the communication which had bene betwixt king Fergus and him, which was in effect tending to this end. First considering the present necessities of the Britains, there was nothing more expedient than a peace to be agreed vpon, as well for the commoditie of the Picts as Scots, if they would yield with all to auoid the imminent perill of their

Wherevpon also he required their aduise what they thought good to be done; declaring that according as they counselled him, he would worke therein. This matter being thus proposed, as there were diuerse heads, so were there sundrie opinions. Some iudged that in no case they could enter friendship againe with the Scots, who had so cruellie slaine and murdered a great number of the Pictish nation; and had shewed such tokens of a beaustie furious nature, that there was no hope to continue long in amitie with such a raging kind of people: and hereto they held that it was not vnknewen how the prophesie went, that the Scots should in the end destroye all the Pictish progenie. So that it were wisdom to keepe their power vnder, so long as was possible, and not to increase the same by ioining with them in friendship.

Other were of a contrarie mind, esteeming that in no wise the Scottish mens friendship ought to be refused, vntill they would determine to take new dwellings in some other foraine parties; sith the Britains would not faile, but vpon occasion take what vantage they could to expell them both, as well Scots as Picts, out of the countries now by them possessed. And as for that, which was alledged touching the prophesie, if the gods had so determined, then might no policie of man preuent it: and if there were no such thing appointed by the same gods, what follied then were it to cast such dreadfull doubts where no cause was? Duer and besides this, they had taken them twiues of the Scottish nation, and thereby ingrafted their seed (the hope of their posteritie) in that stocke, which is the nearest meane and foreseeable occasion to nourish friendship amongst people, that is or may be deuised; therefore it should not be onelie profitable but necessarie also to haue peace with the Scots, to renew againe with them the former league, to the perpetuall strengthening and aduancement of both the nations.

Whilst the Picts were thus in debating the matter, their twiues also being present there in the armie, came in amongst them with their children, and in most lamentable wise besought their husbands to haue pitie vpon them, in their so sorrowfull case, and not to suffer their hands to be defiled with vnnatural murder, sith it were lesse discomfort to them with their little ones to die anie kind of death whatsoeuer it were, rather than to behold their husbands with their fathers, their brethren, and their kinfolke ioine together in battell, and there to kill one another without all mercie and compassion. The nobles and gentlemen of the Picts hearing the cries of these women, and being now somewhat moued to pitie, consented at last to haue peace with the Scottish men, and to renew againe the old league that was heretofore betwene them: and for mutuall iniuries heretofore committed, that there should be a mutuall recompense, according as might stand with equitie and reason. So that where the Britains had bene the chiefe procurers of all that mischief and discord betwixt them, in hope thereby to destroy both the parties, they should now be reputed from henceforth as common enemies to them both. As for all other articles & conditions of agreement, it was ordeined that their king should do therein as vnto him might seeme good.

In the morning therefore, as was appointed, the king of Picts meeting with king Fergus, declared what his subiects were agreed vpon: and further opening his mind touching the establishment of the peace, thought it conuenient to haue a day of meeting betwixt them to ratifie the same. The Scots and Brits invade the Britains.

Coillus entred into Scotland with an armie.

Fergusse assembled a great power of Scottish-men.

Fergusse being well contented & glad that through his motion a peace should thus ensue, a day was appointed betwixt them and kept accordingly, so that comming together, the ancient league was in all points renewed, with some conditions added thereto, available (as was thought) for the stronger confirmation thereof. Before this, and after the first meeting betwixt the Scots and Brits, I meane so sone as the Britains had understanding of this agreement, they had no lust to tarie longer in the field, but raising their power, they departed their waies homewards, doubting least the said agreement might turne smallie to their gaine. The Brits and Scottishmen also after they had thus fullie ratified the peace and league betwixt them, brake vp their camps, euerie man repairing to the place of his abode.

The king also of the Britains named Coill (so iourning in that season nere about Dork) being informed of this sudden renouation of the league betwixt the Scottishmen and Brits, was nothing to full of the newes: for he doubted least in time to come their confederacie might be occasion of their further increasing in puissance, and after that some new occasion of his trouble. Wherefore studieng by what waies and meanes he might best prouide remedie for such inconueniences as might insue, he attempted nothing openlie for the space of two years, but onelie watched his time, to the end that if he might in that season chance (thorough the insolent courage of either nation) to espie anie occasion seruiceable for his time, he might set vpon and be a plague vnto them both.

At length also he caused his subiects (such I meane as bordered nere to the marches of both the people) to fetch peies and booties out of the Britishe confines. So that when the Brits sent thither with request to haue restitution made, it was by and by answered, that the Scots had done such trespasses (being a people inured vnto such feats by nature, and not the Britains, who were nothing guiltie in that kind of matter; and thus would the Britains do in like sort when they had robbed the Scots, so that with such inuisious dissimulation, aswell Scots as Brits being not a little offended, they entred sone after into the Britishe confines, robbing & spoiling the same, as their custome is, with all manner of crueltie. When Coill of Britaine had notice of these doings, he took grieuous indignation thereat, and therevpon determined to proue whether he might with open warres atchieue his purpose, which he could not bring to passe by his former cloaked practise. And herewith assembling an armie, he entred into the Scottish borders lieng towards the Irish seas, wasting & spoiling with fire and sword whatsoever he found in his waies, till he came euen to the riuer of Dune, where incamping himselfe vpon the banks thereof, he sent forth companies of his souldiers to despoile the countrie, and to bring in all such prisoners as they should lay hands vpon.

But in the meane time, and so sone as Fergusse heard of the approach of the Britains, he caused all the people in the countrie to get them with their goods & cattels vnto the mounteins, except such as were able to beare armour: whome he appointed to attend vpon him, to defend the countrie as occasion serued. Whereof Coill hauing knowledge brought by an espiall, he sent forth about fife thousand nimble men, and such as had bene bled to cline craggie hilles, to go before and win the passages, purposing the next day to follow himselfe with the whole armie. But the Scottishmen and Brits being now assembled together, and certified hereof also by their spies, they first fell in consultation what they were best to do; and in the end agreed that the same night they should set vpon the Britishe campe: Fergusse with his Scottishmen on the one side, and the king of the Brits on the other; so that in the dead of the night the Scottishmen killing the watch, were entered into the Britishe campe, yet Coill had knowledge of anie such thing.

Whereby it came to passe that whilest the Britains (awaked with the noise) drew vnto that part where the alarme rose, to beat backe the Scots; the Brits comming ouer the riuer of Dune, by a certeine blind fowd, assailed them on the backs, to the great confusion of the whole armie, by reason whereof the Britains (seeing none other remedie but to saue themselves by flight) turned their backs and fled, in which turmoile they were trodden downe and fell by heaps one vpon an other, and were not able to helpe themselves, nor yet to make shift to auoid the hands of their aduersaries. In this businesse also Coill himselfe chanced to be oppressed amongst the rest, so that he was found dead in the search of such as were slaine, and after solemnilie buried according to his estate in Troinouant, leaving the kingdome vnto his sonne Eusebius, who with his mother Peretia gouerned the same together by the space of manie yeares.

Such Britains also as escaped out of their enemies hands, got them together in the next morning, & perceiving what losse they had sustained not onlie by the death of their prince, but also in the slaughter of a great part of their whole armie, sent an herault vnto the Scots and Brits to require a peace: which though the most part of the people were not in will to haue consented vnto, yet persuaded in the end by their princes, they were contented to yield thereto: so that a generall peace was concluded, and speedilie published betwixt them.

Immediatlie herevpon, the Brits with their part of the spoile gotten at this iourne, departed to their homes, and Fergusse returned into Argile; where studieng dailie for the quiet aduancement of the Scottish commonwealth, he called a parliament of his nobles, and first declaring to the assemble how much bound they were to the gods for giuing them this victorie ouer so puissant enemies as the Britains were, he exhorted them to liue in friendlie concord amongst themselves, and to abstaine from violating the leagues now concluded, aswell with the Britains as before hand with the Brits.

Also for the auoiding of enuious contention, and for the better assurance of euerie mans estate, he iudged it necessarie to haue a partition made of all the lands belonging vnto the Scottish dominion. For before they occupied the whole as in commune, without knowing to whome this peace or that did belong. Which politike aduise of Fergusse, the Scottishmen praised most highlie, promising not onelie to follow his counsell herein in all that he should wish, but also in all that he should otherwise command.

Wherevpon shortly after there were chosen by his aduise seuen ancient personages, men of good conscience and great experience, which were appointed to be surueyors of the whole countrie, and to diuide the same as nere as they could into a set number of equall portions (but with this consideration, that according as the fruitfulness or barrenness of the soile required, so they should enlarge or diminish the circuit of their bounds.) When they had viewed the countrie, and according to their commission serued forth the same into parts, they returned into Argile, where Fergusse then sojourned, and there in his presence, the names of all his noble men that were repented as gouernors were put in lots, euerie of them to haue such part of the realme for his owne,

By this meanes each of them being placed as his chance fell, they inhabited their quarters with such people as they had the leading of, so that afterwards the countreies took their names of those the first governors: which names for the more part (being a little changed) remaine amongst them even unto this day. Fergus having thus without occasion of enuie diuided his countrie amongst his nobles and subjects, studied furthermore to deuise lawes for the maintenance of common quiet amongst them. He builded also the castell of Beregonium in Loughquahay on the west side of Albion, ouer against the westerne Fles, where he appointed a court to be kept for the administration of iustice: that both the Albion Scots, and also those of the same Fles might haue their access & resort thither for redresse of wrongs, and ending of all controuersies. The residue of his life he past in rest and peace with his neighbors the Picts and Britains, endeavouring by all meanes to knit and couple the hearts of his subjects in one friendlie bond of inward loue and amitie. Finally, falling afterward into Ireland to be arbitrator in a matter of variance betwixt the nobles of that land, as he returned homewards by force of tempest, the ship wherein he was imbarked, was driven vpon a rocke, where he perished, after he had reigned as king amongst the Scottishmen in Albion about 25 yerres. The rocke where he was thus cast away, hath bene euer since called rocke Fergus, after his name.

In the same season there reigned amongst the Britains one Enanius, named by Hector Boetius Cladus, and amongst the Picts one Cruthenus Camelonius that builded a famous citie vpon the banke of the riuer called Caron, as the Scottish writers affirme, appointing it to be the chiefe citie of all the Pictish kingdome, where in times past there was a faire commodious haven apt to harbour ships in at all seasons, but now it is dammed vp in such sort, that vneath there appeareth anie token where that haven was: and the citie it selfe was finally subuerted by Kenneth king of Scotland, as after shall appeare. The fozenamed Cruthenus builded also the towne of Agueda, afterwards called Odenbrough, of Othus king of the Picts, the castell was named the castell of Odenus, for that the daughters of the Pictish kings were there kept vnder strait custodie, appointed to learne to sow & weaue, till they came to yerres of marriage.

But now to returne to the Scottishmen. After the death of Fergus, the nobles of the realme assembled together, to take counsell whome they might chuse to succeed in his place. Manie of them, in respect of the high benefitts which their nation had receiued by the politike gouernement of king Fergus, would not in anie wise that his sonnes, though young of yerres, should be forgotten; but that according to reason and equitie, the eldest of them should be elected, with they might not otherwise deliuer them selues of the note of ingratitude towards his father, vnto whome they were more bound than with long can be well expressed.

Other hauing a speciall regard to the quiet of their commonwealth, doubted least if they crowned a child to their king, during his minority, it could not be but that there should follow strife, enuie, and contention for the gouernance of his person and realme amongst the nobles; and that in such wise, as the people being diuided into sundrie factions, the due administration of iustice should be neglected,

And though it might so happen that they agreed vpon one speciall gouernor, as reason was they should; yet should he seeke to aduance his kindred more than reason haplie required, and peradventure do things otherwaies much displeasing to no small number of them by that his priuate authoritie. And againe, the king should no longer come to yerres of anie discretion, but one or other would put him in mind to take vpon him to rule the whole him selfe, before he understood what charge he had in hand: and by reason of his fraile youth he lightlie would not follow the counsell of anie, but such as consented vnto him in his sensuall lusts and inordinate fantasies, which commonlie reigne in such princes as take vpon them gouernance of realmes, before they know (through want of sufficient yerres) how to gouerne themselves.

For these and the like considerations, alledged by some of no small authoritie amongst them, it was agreed in the end, that one Feritharis the brother of the late deceased Fergus should be crowned king, and haue the gouernance of the realme during his life: and herewith in the meane time to see his nephewes king Fergus his sons brought vp in princelie nurture and discipline, as appertained to the sons of a king: that after his deceasse, if he liued till anie of them were come to ripe yerres, they might succeed him in the estate and kingdome.

This ordinance also they decreed to be obserued as a law from thenceforth euer after, that if the king died leauing no issue, but such as were vnder age to succeed him, then should one of his nearest cousins, such as was thought meetest to occupie the throne, be chosen to reigne as king during his life, and after his deceasse the crowne to reuert vnto his predecessor's issue without controuersie, if the same were once growne vp to lawfull age.

By this meanes then were children excluded from obtaining the crowne, least the publike libertie of the realme might chance to be put in danger. But yet was it afterwards perceiued that this deuise for choosing of kings, ministred occasion sometimes to the vncle to seeke the destruction of the nephew, and likewise to the nephew to procure the dispatch of the vncle and vncles sonnes, with the committing of manie heinous murders of right worthie princes, to the no small danger of ouerthrowing the whole state of the commonwealth, so that finally that ordinance was clearelye abrogated, as you shall heare hereafter.

The choosing of kings was not allowed.

At now to my purpose. After Feritharis with the full consent of all the people was thus elected king, he was inthronized with all solemnitie in receiuing his kingly ornaments, as his two edged sword, his scepter roiall, and his crowne of gold fashioned in forme of a rampe made for defense of a towne or fortreffe, signifying that he took vpon him to preserve the libertie of his countrie, to see offenders duly punished, and the execution of lawes with equall punishment trulie ministred.

A two edged sword.

These ornaments of inuesture remained vnto the Scottish kings, without being in anie point changed, till the daies of Adaius king of Scotland, who establishing a perpetuall league with Charles the great, emperor and king of France, to induce for euer betwene the Scots and Frenchmen, added vnto the crowne foure flower de lices, together with foure crozets, diuided in sunder with equall spaces, rising somewhat higher than the flower de lices: that thereby the obseruing of the christian religion and sincere faith, maintained by the Scottish nation, might might be the more euident to all men that beheld it. But now as touching Fferitharis, shortly after he was thus inuested king, he came to an interuiew with the king of the Picts, where manie things being communed of touching the wealth of both nations, the league was in solemne wise confirmed, and such punished as had done anie thing sounding to the breach of the same.

After this, being returned home, he ordered himselfe in the administration of his charge verie by rightlie, without giuing iust occasion vnto anie to find himselfe greued: and thus continued he certeine yeres in such loue of all the estates of the realme, that afterwards when his nephue Fferlegus the eldest sonne of king Fergus, being now come to full age, through instigation of some insolent persons, and such as by alteration hoped for aduancement, required (contrarie to the ordinance before established) to haue of him the crowne: the matter was taken in such ill part, that where before the same Fferlegus was highlie beloued and honored of all the people, they were now readie (if Fferitharis had not with authoritie and gentle perswasions staied them) to haue tozme him all in peeces: but although their rage was somewhat appeased by Fferitharis, as is said, yet would they not be pacified throughly, till that all such as had bene of counsell with him in that praactise, had suffered death, and new gouernors appointed to haue the ouersight of him.

Fferitharis liued not passing thre moneths after this businesse, but died suddenlie in the night, the truth not being knowne whether by naturall death, or through treason of Fferlegus and certeine of his complices (whereof there was no small suspicion) for that he together with them found meanes to flie first to the Picts, and after to the Britains, where he passed the residue of his life in great shame and ignominie. Fferitharis being thus dead in the 15 yere of his reigne, the nobles assembled together for the election of a new king, and in the end they agreed vpon Mainus the yonger sonne of king Fergus, as then being about 24 yeres of age.

This Mainus being of contrarie conditions to his brother Fferlegus, was thus aduanced to the crowne by the whole consent of the nobles and commons, who yet kept in fresh memorie the noble gouernement of his father Fergus. He therefore studieng to answer the peoples expectation in following his said fathers worthy acts, maintained iustice in all points, without suffering anie bearing or bolstering of wrong. If there were anie controuersie risen betwixt neighbour and neighbour within one hundred or cantred, he willed that the same might be taken vp and ended amongst them at home by order of some authorized court there. But if the matter were of such importance, as that it could not well be decided without authoritie of some higher court, he would then haue the hearing thereof, at such time as he vsed euerie yere once to haue a publicke out of all parts of his realme, to conferre together for such purposes; at what time also such as were notorious offenders were arreigned and punished by death or otherwise, according to the fault which they earli had committed.

Mainus confirmed the league with the Picts.

Also for the more quiet of his subiects, he confirmed the ancient league with the Picts, their king named Chyrinus requiring the same by his ambassadores sent vnto him. Moreover this Mainus vpon a religious deuotion toward the gods, hauing an assured belife, that without their fauours all worldly policies were but vaine, deuised sundrie new ceremonies to be added vnto the old: and also caused certeine places in sundrie parts of his dominion to be appointed out, and compassed about with great huge stones round like a ring, but towards the south was one mightie stone farre greater than all the rest, pitched vp in maner of an altar, whereon their pteffs might make their sacrifices in honor of their gods.

In witnes of the thing, there remaineth vnto this day certeine of those great stones standing round ringwise, which places are called by the common people, The old chapels of the gods. A man would maruell by what thrift, policie, or strength such mightie stones were raised in that maner. Amongst other the gods also, which the Scottishmen had in most reuerence, Diana was chiefe, whome they accounted as their peculiar patronesse, for that she was taken to be the goddess of hunting, wherein consisted their chiefest exercise, pastime and delite. Vnto hir therefore he instituted monethlie sacrifice, by reason whereof this vse was taken vp, that so lone as anie of them got sight of the new mone next after hir change, he saluted hir with certeine praiers or salutations most reuerentlie. Which custome induced amongst them manie hundred yeres after. Mainus did also appoint forth linings for the pteffs to be taken of such sacrifice as was offered vp to the gods. Finally, when he had thus instructed his people in lawes and ordinances, aswell touching the religious seruice of the gods, as also for politike gouernment of his countrie, he ended his life, after he had reigned about 29 yeres, leauing the estate to his sonne Doquadille, Clidurus reigning at the same time in Britaine, and Thaata amongst the Picts.

Doquadille being crowned king of the Scots, established a new league with the Britains, by sending his ambassadores vnto them: and with the Picts he renewed & confirmed the ancient alliance. He set all his pleasure on hunting and keeping of hounds & greihounds, ordeining that euerie hound should find him two hounds and one greihound. If a hunter chanced in following the game to lose an eye or a lim, so that he were not able to helpe himselfe after that time, he made a statute that he should be found of the common treasure. He that killed a wolfe should haue an ore for his paines. This beast in deed the Scottishmen, euen from the beginning, used to pursue in all they might deuise, because the same is such an enimie to cattell, wherein consisted the chiefest portion of all their wealth and substance.

Thus the Scottishmen in this season, setting all their delite on hunting, began also to vse lawes and statutes in proces of time concerning the same. And first it was ordeined, that he whose dog did teile and go thorough to the end of the course with the deare, so that he were seene to be at the fall, should haue the skin, the head & hoznes to remaine to him whose dog did best next. The body being dyest & broken vp, should be distributed at the pleasure & discretion of the master of the game. The bowels and panch were cast to the dogs as the case required. And if there rose anie doubt in anie of these points, they should chofe by common consent, a iudge to determine of the matter. But whether these deuises were lawes made by the king as then for the further aduancement of his pleasure, or rather customes growne and ratified by long continuall vse, I cannot tell, but certeine it is, they were obserued through all the Scottish regions, as hauing the force of lawes, and so are used euen vnto these daies.

Beside these ordinances for hunting, Doquadille commanded also, that all such statutes as Fergus had made, should be kept and obserued: wherevnto he added certeine new, namelie diuerse sorts of punishments for sundrie kinds of transgressions, according to the qualities of the same: which he caused to be ingrossed in booke of record, and committed to the

This custome grew into such force, that it neuer might yet be abrogated amongst them of the wessterne Isles, but that euen vnto this day they haue their lawiers amongst them, without whose denuntiation or decrees taken out of the register, no iudgement is reputed lawfull.

A conspiracie of Ferquhard against Donalus. Ferquhard fled into Isla.

Ferquhard returned into Scotland for to reuenge his iniurie.

These were the acts and doings of king Donauille, who in the 28 yere of his reigne departed this world at Berregonium, now called Dunstaffage, leauing behind him a sonne called Reuther as yet not of sufficient age to succede in the estate. By reason whereof Nothatus the brother of Donauille, a man of comelie personage and wit, apt (as was thought) to haue a realme in gouernance, was crowned king by force of law aboute remembred, debarring children vnder age to inherit the succession of the crowne.

This Nothatus had breath reigned two yeres, when all the people began to crie out vpon him, for such tyrannicall parts as he practised as well against the meane estates as the high. And for so much as he being admonished of his duetie, and required to reforme certeine dishonorable blages by him exercised, he would giue no eare thereto: therefore one Doualus gouernor of Bigantia, conspiring with other nobles of the realme to depose him, intised Reuther king Donauilles sonne, to take part with them, and to claime the crowne as due to him by descent from his father. And so assembling a companie of their faction sufficient for their enterpryse, they entered the palace where Nothatus lay, and after reasoning with him of certeine points touching his misgouernment in the estate, diuers of their companie not satisfieng till they were commanded, rashly fell vpon him, and murdered him together with diuers of such nobles and gentlemen, as they knew to be enemies to Doualus and his friends.

After this they proclaimed Reuther king, and crowned him with all due solemnities, diuers of the nobles of the realme being highly displeased therewith, for that they iudged it not onelie a great offense to haue the king thus traitorously murdered, but also saw hereby the ancient ordinance of choosing their king through consent of the people, to be broken by the wicked attempt of a priuat person, & an vnskillfull yong man aduanced to the crowne, contrarie to the decree of an autentike law. Among other one Ferquhard the sonne in law of Nothatus gouernor of Lozne and Cantire, called an assemblie of the people, and began to declare what enormities were like to issue through this tyrannicall attempt of Doualus. Doualus hearing whereabout Ferquhard went, hastily came to the place where this assemblie was made, and there sleaing diuers of the chiefe, he did put Ferquhard also in great hazard of his life, who by sleing yet escaped his hands, and got him ouer into the Ile of Isla, whither resorted vnto him diuers of the nobles (that fauored not Douale) with a great number of the commons.

In the end, Ferquhard perswaded his companions to set all feare apart, and to returne with him into Scotland to take reuenge of Douale and his complices, being traitors and enemies to the realme and common-wealth, so that first joining hands, which they did wet in mans blood (according to the custome then vsed) they promised one to another to liue and die in the quarell, and after imbarcking themselves in certeine vessels, they entered the sea, and passed ouer into Scotland, where gathering together no small number of such as willingly resorted vnto them to their aid, they encountered with Douale in battell, whose host stoue in one daie was put to flight nere to the citie Berregonium with the losse of eight thousand men.

The night parted the fraie, but in the next morning, Douale and his partakers through great indignation conceived, for that they were so beaten backe by Ferquhard (hauing in all his host not past 10000 persons) fiercelie came forth of their tents to giue battell afresh, and finding their enemies ready to receiue them, there was fought so cruell a battell betwixt them, that in the end either part being sore trauelled with slaughter and long fight, was glad to giue place to the other, not passing an eight hundred of all those that were present that daie in the field as then being left aliue. Upon Douales part there was slaine Gethus king of Picts, whose daughter king Reuther had married, with a great number of his people: also Douale himselfe with diuers of the nobles of Scotland, beside gentlemen & commons that took part with him. On the contrarie side there died also Ferquhard himselfe with diuers gouernors of tribes, beside the residue of the nobles, gentlemen & commons of Kosse, Cathenesse, Parne, Argile, Cantire, and Lozne, with them of the wessterne Isles which were there with him.

Reuther escaping with life from this bloudie encounter, in the night following departed his waies with such of his people as were left aliue. Whereof his enemies being aduertised in the next morning, pursued after him with such diligence, that in the end they took him within a castell in Cathenesse whither he was fled for succor: he was pardoned of his life, partly in respect of his fathers merits, and partly againe for that it was knotone how his tender youth was such as had not deserved death by any fact, otherwise than in that he had followed the counsell of malicious persons. By this cruell martir and huge slaughter thus committed betwixt these two nations of Scottishmen and Picts, both their forces were so greatlie infiebled, that they became an easie prey to their ancient and common enemies the Britains, who in such oportunitie of occasion thought not to sit still till the same night hapilie be past and gone.

First therefore with a mightie armie the Britains invaded the Picts: the nobles of which nation perceiving themselves not able to make resistance, fled with their wiues, their children, and the most part of their goods, ouer into the Isles of Orkenie, and there assembling together, they created them a new king to haue the gouernance ouer them, who was also named Gethus, and brother to the other Gethus a little before mentioned. Here also they remained certeine yeares after, liuing in peaceable manner with the former inhabitants, whom they found there, wronging them by no iniurious dealing at all (if the Scottish historie be true.) Hereof moreover as some suppose it came to passe, that these Islands of Orkenie are named by diuers writers the ancient kingdome of the Picts.

In the meane while the Britains seizing vpon such countries as these Picts had forsaken, that is to saie, the Mers, Lothian, and others, they left in diuers places where they thought expedient, garrisons of men of war, to kepe the same in due subjection: and after entred into the confines of the Scottish kingdome, burning & waisting all aforesaid, where with such Scots as yet remained aliue, being high-lie moved to indignation, came thoutie into the field to defend their countrie, and incounting with their enemies nere to Balender wood, they lost two thousand of their companie: the residue also being soe chased, fled into sundrie parties for safegard of their liues.

This discomfort put the Scottish nation into such feare and terror, that they utterlie despaired of all recoverie, where contrariwise the Britains were so aduanced (in hope utterlie to expell all aliens out of their Ile) that pursuing the victorie in most earnest wise, they forced Keuther and all the nobilitie of the Scottish nation that was yet left aliue, to flee for safegard of their liues into the castell of Berigonium, where they held themselves as in the surest hold. The Britains being certified of the repaire of their enemies to Berigonium, enuironed the castell with a strong and behement siege, untill that the Scots within were constrained through want of vittells to eate each other, according as the losse fell by a common agreement made amongst them.

and fight.

But when it came to passe, that even those that were reputed as heads and gouernors, and in whom consisted the hope of their whole defense, did now and then come to the shambles as well as other of lesse reputation, they thought it best to trie by issuing forth, if any of their haps might be so good as to escape the danger present, whereas by tarrying still within the fortress, they should but deuoure one another without any reuenge for losse of their liues had vpon their fierce and cruell enemies. Wherevpon by common consent there issued forth, first one Colane lord of Cantire with an hundred of his owne souldiours, and fiercelie skirmishing with the Britains, defended himselfe a good space right manfully, though in the end both he and his whole band were bozne downe and slaine with pzeale and multitude of his enemies that assailed him on each side. In the meane season, whilst he thus occupied the Britains in fight on one side, Keuther with the residue of his people brake forth by another waie, and escaping to the sea side, got ships and fled ouer into the westerne Isles, where he found a great number of other Scottishmen that were gotten thither, being compelled by Denuus king of the Britains to avoid forth of the countries, which they before inhabited.

Keuther remained not long in the Isles, but passed ouer into Ireland. The Britains not a little moued for his escape with the other of the Scottish lords, reuenged their displeasure on such commons and other meane people as fell into their hands, so that such as might escape, got them into the mounteins, and liued there by roots, berries, & other wild fruits in summer, and in winter by such benefon and flesh of wild beaasts as they killed in the wilderness: and sometimes they came downe and made raikes vpon the Britains that occupied their houses and lands, fetching great booties verie often from amongst them.

sent for out of Ireland.

This cruell warre lasted twelue yeeres, untill in manner all such Scots and Picts as remained in Albion were brought vnder seruitude to the Britains. In which meane while, Cethus king of the Picts kept his siege roiall in Domonia the cheefest Ile of the Orkenies. Keuther also begot of his wife a sonne named Cherens, and shortly after being procured by letters and messengers sent vnto him from the foresaid Cethus and such Scots as were yet remaining in Albion, he assembled a number of ships together, and first with a chosen power of warriors sailed to the westerne Isles, where increasing his numbers, he passed ouer into Albion, landing on the west halfe of Koffe at Lough Bann, and there comming on land, the first person that they met with (according to a custome vsed amongst them in those daies) they slue, and wetting the points of their weapons in his blood, they first tasted thereof after their manner, then holding by their weapons into the aire, they desired of the gods that they might reuenge the blood of their elders with happie battell against the Britains their enemies. After this, hearing that Cethus king of the Picts was also entred the land with a mightie powe of Germans, which were come to his aid, and was not past thirtie miles off, he staid there abiding for his comming, to the intent that joining their powers together, they might be the better able to furnish their enterpryse.

The thirde daie after they met together with great joy and congratulations, vnto whom with all speed a great number also of those Scottishmen and Picts that had still continued in the countrie (during the time of the persecution by the Britains) daile resorted and came flocking in from each side vnto them. Sifillius king of the Britains, who succeeded after Denuus, as then lately deceased, hauing knowledge hereof, assembled a great armie of his subiects, and hearing that the Scots and Picts were entred into the borders of his realme, he halted forth to encounter with their powers, and so joining with them in battell, after long and cruell fight, in the end the victorie remained with the Scottishmen and Picts, by the great valiance and manfull prowesse of Keuther: wherevpon the place where that battell was fought hath bene euer since called Keuthirdale, as ye would say Keuthers ballie.

This victorie was not verie pleasant to any of the parties, by reason of the great numbers of men slaine on both sides, insomuch that they were glad to fall to agreement immediatlie after, and concluded a peace, with conditions that the Scottishmen and Picts should be restored againe vnto their ancient possessions and lands in Albion. This peace continued a long time after inuolate betwixt these nations. The yeare that Keuther returned thus into Albion, was before the birth of Christ 216, after the building of Rome 529, and from the creation of the world 3750. Keuther by Beda in his ecclesiasticall historie of England is named Keuda, who also supposeth him to be the first of all the Scottish princes, that set any foot in Britaine there to inhabit: his comming thither was (as seemeth to some) long after the supposed time here before alleged. And verelie there is great cause to moue a doubt of the truth of that which Hector Boetius hath written, in following (as he saith) other authors, touching the first comming into Britaine, as well of the Scots and Picts. For if it were true, that so long before the comming of the Romans into this Ile, they were here planted and growne to such puissance; it is strange that no mention is made of them in any of their writings, till about the yeare 360 after Christ; as in place conuenient it shall more plainelie appere. Keuther passed the residue of his daies without any further warres, forren and ciuill, and so departed this world at Berigonium, in the 26 yeare of his reigne.

After Keuther his deceasse, his vnles son called Keutha succeeded in the kingdome, chosen thereto by the common agreement of all the states, because that Thereus sonne to Keuther vnderneath come to the age of ten yeeres, was thought unable to take the charge vpon him. Keutha therfore being thus elected to reigne as king over the Scottishmen, ordeined that such noblemen as had atchieued anie notable exploit in defense of their countrie, should be had in perpetuall memorie, and buried in solemne wise in sepulchres aloft vpon hills or mounteins, vpon Craftsmen brought into Scotland to instruct the people.

Linings appointed forth unto those craftsmen.

A law for physicians and surgeons.

This Menth also understanding of the lacke of all maner of craftsmen in his realme, and of such as were expert in the liberall sciences, caused a great number of most perfect artificers to be sent for, to inhabit amongst his people, the better to instruct them in their occupations. Unto these also as unto other professing anie liberall art, were appointed honest linings, by way of fees, assigned to be receiued of such open and baseles as were killed, to euerie man of science and artifice his part. And further, each of them had certeine measures of otes and barlie in stead of yearelie annuities. For as yet the vse of coine was not known amongst the Scottishmen. The which custome of distributing their beafts, which they killed in this wise, is still vsed in the westerne Isles even to these our daies.

Menth perceiving furthermore that through unskillfull surgeons and physicians manie wounded and diseased persons were oftentimes cast awaie, ordeined by the aduise and consent of his counsell, that none should take upon them as a surgion or physician, vntlesse they were by long experience well practised aforehand in those sciences. For before that time they vsed to carie forth such persons as were sicke or otherwise hurt, and to lay them in some open place in the streets or market sted, that all such as came by, might according to their knowledge declare their aduise, and shew (if they had bene vered with the like disease) by what means they had escaped the danger, and recovered againe their health. For no man might without the note of high reproch passe by, keeping silence in this behalfe. And this was according to the custome of the old Egyptians.

Menth thus studieng for the advancement of the commonwealth of his subjects, continued in the estate with great prosperitie, till finally perceiving himselfe farre growen in age, and not so able to traue in the affaires of the realme as he was before, he caused a parlement to be assembled, and there in presence of all the estates, required to be discharged of the gouernement: and that the same might be committed vnto his cousin Thereus, who as then was not onelie of sufficient age to take it vpon him, but also of such towardnesse, as that in each mans opinion he was thought likelie to attaine vnto the prouesse of anie of his noble progenitors. Thus Menth, after he had reigned 17 yeares, returned to a priuat life, resigning the whole rule of his realme vnto the aforesaid Thereus, being through his persuasion receiued as king of all estates by common consent there in that present assemble.

Menth resigned the estate vnto his cousin Thereus.

Justice neglected and vice embraced.

The nobles conspire against Thereus.

This Thereus for the first six yeares was equall in all points of princelie gouernement to anie of his predecessors, but afterward he changed his copie in such manner, that iustice and all other kinds of vertue being set apart, he neither regarded the lawes of the gods, nor yet of men; but gaue himselfe to all sorts of filthinesse and most detestable vices, so farre forth, that his subjects (as their custome is in following the maners and vices of their princes) became so outrageous in their licentious linings, and namelie the nobles and gentlemen, that thereof ensued theft, murder, rape, spoiling, and all kinds of oppression of those fillic soules that had no meanes to resist, so as in fine, diuers gouernours of the tribes perceiving no hope of amendment while Thereus should reigne, conspired together, deuising meanes how to depose him of all kinglie authoritie. But he hauing notice of their purposed intentions, and doubting the sequels thereof, conueied himselfe out of the way in most secret wise, fleeing for succour vnto the Britains, vnto whom though he made earnest sute for aid to be restored home againe, yet could he purchase no such fauour amongst them: so that leuing a miserable life a long time after within the citie of Poche, he finally there ended his daies. He reigned in Scotland about 12 yeares or more.

Thereus fled to the Britains.

Josina.

Immediatlie after this his auoiding the realme, the Nobles and pères chose one Conanus lord of Caloway to rule the estate as gouernour, whose authoritie had bene euer great amongst the people. His studie was chieflie imploted how to reduce the lords and nobles of the realme into concord and friendlie amitie, where before through the negligence of Thereus each sought others destructions. Also he caused due punishment to be executed vpon all such as liued by robbing and reuing, of whom in the beginning of his gouernement there was no small number: but he wedded them forth, in such wise that yet he left off, there was not one of them to be found. At length, after it was understood that Thereus was dead, this Conanus renounced the administration in presence of all the estates assembled in parlement at Beregonium, where by common consent Josina brother of Thereus was chosen to reigne as king, for that Thereus had left no issue behind him to succeed.

This Josina being proclaimed king, renewed the ancient leagues with the Britains and Britains. He had physicians in great estimation; for that during his abode in Ireland, he was nourished of a child amongst them, and by reason thereof had some knowledge in the facultie, speciallie he understood the vertues and properties of herbes, where with in those daies the Scots vsed to heale and remedie all maner of sores and diseases, which as then were few in number, in respect of the sundrie kinds which are now known amongst vs; and all by reason of the superfluous feeding and excesse of meates and drinks vsed in our time, whereas our elders sufficed with a little, liued without surfeiting, the chiefest breeder of such strange and manifold sicknesses. In this Josina his daies it chanced that a Boetian gale ship was driuen and drowned by force of a streinable tempest nere vnto the shore of one of the Scottish Isles, where diuerse of those that were within the same ship, mariners and other escaped to land, amongst whom were two ancient and fatherlie old men of right reuerend aspect and countenance.

Surfeiting the cause of strange diseases, which so commonlie now reigne.

Two ancient philosophers through shipwracke arrive in Scotland, and are to fullie received of the king.

These two in companie with some of the inhabitants of that Ile came ouer into Beregonium, where the king as then sojourned. They were Spanishe priests of the pagane religion, whose purpose was to haue gone vnto Athens in Grecia (as some write) but whence soeuer they were, and what purpose soeuer they had, certeine it is they were philosophers; and therefore the king receiued them most to fullie, doing them all the honoz he could deuise, and commanding that they should be lodged within his owne palace, where they had all things needfull, and accordingly ministered vnto them.

These philosophers, after they had refreshed themselves at their ease for the space of 14 daies, the king caused them to come before him, requiring them to shew their opinion what they thought by the nature of the soile, the maners and customs of his people, so far forth as they had seene and heard. They without pausing for answer declared, that as yet they had not had time to learne those things, but onelie thus far by conjecture they supposed, that the ground was more like to be fruitfull of mettall mines, than of coine and graine, as containing far more riches vnderneath the earth than aboue; this they said that they gathered by the influence of the heavens vnder the which it late. And as for the rites and blages of the people, in one point they could in no wise commend them, for that in religion they followed the superstitious rites of the Egyptians, worshipping the immortall gods in the shape of beasts and fowls, whereas God was euen the same that did comprehend both heauen and earth, with the waters and all things in them contained, whome they named nature, and as it were the primordially cause or beginning of all things, vnto whome it was not possible to deuise anie similitude of liuing thing that might in anie wise represent him. Therefore (said they) men ought to worship the liuing God with fire and deuout prayer, building him a temple for that purpose, and onelie vnto him to burne incense, and to performe bowes: at whose hands such as liued chastly, byrightlie, and according to the rules of iustice, ought euer to looke for some high benefit, where other that liued contrarie might euer stand in doubt of contrarie reward.

With these their sensible instructions they persuaded manie of the Scottish nation vnto their opinion, though the greatest part would by no means follow anie other kind of religion, than that which they had receiued from their elders: neither could anie of them be brought to thinke otherwise of the sun, the mone, and stars, but that there was a certaine diuine power or godhead in euerie one of them. And thus much of these strangers biezle and by the way, who came into Scotland at this present: but now to proceed with our purpose. When Josina had reigned 24 yeares, he departed out of this world at Berregonium, being a man of verie great age. He left behind him a sonne named Finnanus, who a little before his fathers deceasse was by consent of the people proclaimed king of Scotland.

This Finnanus had the nobles of his realme in such estimation, that he ordeined that nothing should be decreed or practised touching the publike affaires of the realme, except they were first made priuie and of counsell in the same. He sought also to win the fauour of his people by meeknesse and gentle intreating of them, in somuch that though he went about to reforme the old religion somewhat defaced by his father through information (as is said) of the two aboue mentioned sage philosophers, yet did he not constrain anie man to worship the gods, otherwise than his fantasie serued him. He was the first that instituted those prelats, which gouerned after the manner of bishops, in all matters pertaining to religion, and were called in the Scottish tong Durceglis in Latine Druides. These Druides were appointed to be resident within the Ile of Han, as the Scottishmen hold opinion: but other thinke rather that they were resident in Anglesie, in the British tong called Mon. Vnto these also hauing great linings assigned them, were the inferiour priests subiect, as receiuing at their hands all intunctions and orders for the vse of their sacrifices and other ceremonies.

These Druides afterwards applied themselves so earnestlie to the studie of philosophie, as well naturall as morall, that they were had in no small reuerence of the people, as they that were both accounted and knowne to be men of most perfect life and innocencie: by means whereof their authoritie daile so far forth increased, that finally iudgements in most doubtfull matters were committed vnto their determinations, offenders by their discretion punished, and such as had well deserued accordinglie by their appointments rewarded. Whoeuer such as refused to obeye their decrees and ordinances, were by them excommunicated, so that no creature durst once keepe companie with such, till they were reconciled againe, and cleretic by the same Druides absolved.

Plinie, Cornelius Tacitus, Strabo, and Julius Caesar, with diuers other approued authors, make mention of these Druides, signifieng how the first beginning of their religion was in Britaine (which some comprehend all whole vnder the name of Albion) and from thence was the same religion brought ouer into France. Finnanus was not onelie praised for his setting forth of that heathen religion, but also for his politike gouernement of the estate in so full rest and quietnesse. Better was his same a little advanced for the marriage concluded and made betwixt his sonne Durcius and Agasia daughter to the king of Britains, for by that alliance he won diuers of the British nation vnto his friendship. Finally, this Finnanus died at Camelon, being come thither to visit the king of Picts as then soe diseased, after he had reigned about the space of thirtie yeares. His bodie was conueied vnto Berregonium, and there buried amongst his predecessors.

After him succeeded his sonne the forenamed Durcius. Durcius, farre differing from his noble father in all vertuous demeanour, as he that was altogether giuen to banketting and excessive drunkennesse. Such of the nobles as his father had in high reuerence he made light account of; accepting onelie those that of their wicked deuises could find out new kinds of voluptuous pleasures, through whose persuasions some of his peeres he confined, some he spoiled of all their substance & inheritance, other he put to death without iust cause or anie kind of lawfull means. Furthermore he forsooke the companie of his lawfull wife Agasia, causing hir to be forced and abused by diuers vile persons in most villanous manner.

With these and the semblable inordinat practises he procured the indignation of his people so far forth against him, that those of the westerne Isles with them of Cantire, Lozne, Argile, and Koffe, conspired together in the reformation of such disorders as were daile vied in the administration of iustice, by the wicked suggestion of euill disposed counsellors, against whome they pretended to make their war, and not against their king. There were also so manie that fauoured them in this quarell, and so few that leaned to the king to aid him against them, that he was constrained to dissemble with them for a time, in promising not onelie to remove from him such as they would appoint, but also to be ordered in all things according as they should thinke good. And to put them in beleefe that he ment as he spake, he committed some such counsellors as he had about him vnto ward, and other some (of whome he little passed) he sent vnto them as prisoners, to receiue such punishment by death or otherwise, as they should thinke conuenient.

He further also in presence of Dozo the gouernour of Cantire, sent to him for that purpose, swore in solemne wise afore the image of Diana, to performe all such promises and couenants as he was agreed vpon, and had made vnto the conspirators. With which cloaked dissimulation they being deceived, came without suspect of further guile vnto Berregonium, where at their first comming he was ready to receiue them (as seemed by his feined countenance) with gladsome hart and most friendlie meaning; but they were no sooner entred the castell, but that a number of armed men appointed for the purpose fell vpon them, and slue them all without mercie.

caused a new commotion, so that within a few daies after, manie thousands of men in furious rage came before the castell, and besieged the king most straightlie therein. Who perceiuing himselfe in such danger as he knew not well how to escape, came forth with such companie as he had about him, and incounting with his enimies, was straightwaies beaten downe among them, and so at once lost there both kingdome and life in the ninth yeare of his reigne. Durkasus being thus dispatched, his children doubting the indignation of the people conceived a gainst them for their fathers fault, to auoid the perill fled ouer into Ireland, and immediatlie the nobles of the realme assembled themselves together for the choosing of a new king, in no wise minding to haue anie of Durkasus his race to reigne ouer them, least they would seeke by some means to revenge his death: howbeit at length when they were at point to haue fallen at variance in sustaining of contrarie opinions about the election of their prince, through a wittie oration made by Cozanus gouer-nour of Argile, who allegeded manie weightie reasons for the auoiding of sedition, they all agreed to commit the free election vnto the same Cozanus, promising firmitie to accept whome soeuer he should name. Whereupon Cozanus consulting a little with the pères of the realme, named one Ewin the uncles sonne of Durkasus, who as then remained in Ireland, whither he had withdrawen himselfe in Durkasus his daies, being banished the realme by him, for that he could not awaie with his corrupt manners. This election was acceptable to all estates, for that thereby the administration of the kingdome

And Ewin shortly after was brought forth of Ireland with all regall solemnitie, and at Beregonium placed vpon the ston of marble, to the great reioysing of the people there assembled. Herewith also the nobles of the realme, putting their hands in his, bound themselves by oth to be loiall and faithfull subiects vnto him in all points, which custome of swearing fealties then first by Ewins commandement, begun and continued manie hundred yeares after amongst his and their posteritie; in somuch that the capitans of the tribes also required the same kind of oth of them that inhabited within their liberties, which in part remaineth yet vnto this day amongst those of the westerne Isles, and such as inhabit in the mounteins. For at the creation of a new gouernour, whome they name their capitaine, they vse the like ceremonies; which being ended, at the next faire kept within that countrie, proclamation is made, that no man inhabiting within his iurisdiction, shall name this new gouernour by anie other name from thenceforth, than by the ancient & accustomed name as such rulers aforesaid haue bene called by. And that so oft as they heare him named, they shall put off their caps or hats, and make a certeine courtesie in signe of honour due to him, in such maner as we vse in hearing diuine seruice, when anie holie myserie is in doing, or anie sacred name of the almightie creator recited.

But now touching king Ewin, his chiefest stu-die was to mainteine iustice throughout his dominion, and to weed out such transgressours as went about to trouble the quiet estate of his subiects. Furthermore, considering what inconueniencies proceded through the vse of voluptuous pleasures & wanton delites, he ordeined that the youth of his realme should be trained to endure hardnesse, paine, and trauell, as to lie vpon hard boards without anie fea-therbeds or pillows vnder them. Also to exercise themselves to throw the dart, to shot, to wrestle, and to beare armour aswell in time of peace as of warre; that when need required, trauell and such kind of exercises should be no paine but pleasure vnto them; where otherwaies lacke of vse might make the same intollerable. Whilist Ewin is thus occupied about the setting forth of necessarie ordinances for the wealth of his realme, the king of the Picts did send vnto him ambassadours to require his aid against the Britains, who were entred his countrie in robbing and spoiling the same.

Ewin consenting quicklie to that request, lent an armie forthwith, and with all speed passed forward to ioine with the Picts, in purpose to reuenge the old iniuries done to his nation by the Britains, who likewise were as ready to receive battell, as the Scots and Picts were desirous to giue it, so that both the armies incounting together (the Scots and Picts on the one side, and the Britains on the other) there ensued a sore conflict betwixt them, continued with vnumerifull slaughter till night parted them in sunder; no man as then able to iudge who had the better, but either part being priue to their owne losses, withdrew themselves further off from the place of the battell, so that the Scots and Picts the same night got them into the mounteins of Pic-land, and the Britains so lone as it was day made homewards with all speed towards their countrie, leaving no small prete and battie behind them, which the Scottishmen and the Picts recovered, comming downe with all speed from the mounteins, when they once heard that their enimies were departed.

King Ewin being returned from this iourne, determined to passe the residue of his life in rest and quietnesse, appointing iudges in euerie part of his realme, for the ministring of iustice and executing of lawes, according to the due forme and ordinance of the same. He appointed also such as should watch for the apprehension of theues and robbers by the high waies, assigning them linings of the common trea-surie to liue by. And there be enen vnto this day that hold still such linings, though the office be woyn out of vse and forgotten.

After this, he bullded a castell not farre distant from Berregonium, which he named after his owne name Ewinum: but afterwards it was called Dunstaffage, which is as much to say, as Steuens castell, which name it beareth at this present. Final-lie, this Ewin, after he had reigned to the great weale of the realme, about 19 yeares, he departed this life, leaving behind him a son bafe begotten, named Gillus, who causing his fathers funerals to be erected with all solempne pompe and ceremonies, raised vp some after sundry obelisks about his graue nere vnto Dunstaffage, where he was buried.

There were present also at the buriall, two of Durkasus his sonnes, whome Ewin in his life time had reuoked home out of Ireland, where they were in exile. Both these, as well the one as the other, because they were twins, and not knowne whether of them came first into the world, looked to be king after Ewin: their names were Doshan and Dorgall.
And such malicious emulation and enuious spite rose betwixt the two brethren, for the attaining of their purpose, that greater could not be deuised; which Gillus, like a craftie & subtil for, by covert means sought still to augment; and in the end causing them to come together for some conclusion of agreement, at length when he had set them further at ods than they were before, he procured a number of souldiers appointed for the purpose to raise a tumult (as though it had bene in taking of contrarie parts) and there to slea them both.

Thus Gillus hauing brought to purpose that he came for, shewed in countenance as though he had bene much offended therewith, and done what he could

could to haue appeased the matter, and herewith he cometh running forth with a high voice, declaring to his companie, that if he had not made good thist for himselfe, he had bene slaine by the hands of Dothan and Dogall, who fell into such mischance themselves, as they had prepared for other. Whereupon also he required his friends and seruants most earnestlie to conueie him into some sure place, where he might be out of danger, and in better securitie: in somuch that manie of those that heard him, giuing credit to his words, went with him with all speed vnto Dunstaffage, where being receiued into the castle with diuers of the nobles that followed him, he got him into a gallerie, and there making an inuective oration against the sonnes of Durtus, and touching by the way what perill might insue to the commonwealth by ciuill diuision, he perswaded them to commit the rule into his hands, vntill it might be certeinlie knowne, vnto whome the same of right appertained.

The nobles through feare consented to create Gyllus king.

Those that were present, perceiuing to what issue his painted processe tended, and doubting lest if they should seme to stand against him at that instant in this his demand, they might haplie be the first that should repent the bargaine, consented to proclaim him king: whereupon he required all such as were present, to sweare vnto him fealtie, and to do him homage according to the custome. And herewith agreeable as he had before promised, and according to his fathers will (as he alledged) he distributed among them all such cattell as belonged to his said father. Whereby he won the greater fauour of manie, but yet not iudging himselfe altogether in libertie, by reason that Dothan had left behind him three sonnes, as then remaining in the Ile of Man, in the bringing vp of the Duides, he purposed therefore to dispatch them also for the better assurance of his estate, and thereupon he made a iourne thither himselfe, feigning as though he meant nothing but all loue and frendlie affection towards the children, by which meane he gat two of them into his hands, the one named Lismorus, being about twelue yeres of age, and the other Cornacus that was two yeres younger. The yongest of the three named Cderus, being about seuen yeres old, as his better hap was, chanced to be sicke at that time, by reason whereof he escaped his hands: Gyllus feigning as though he wished to haue the other two brought vp like the children of a pince, he led them away with him into Scotland, leaving certein of his seruants behind him, to rid Cderus the yongest out of the way at leasure; and as for the other twaine, the night following after his comming home to Dunstaffage, he caused them to be murdered, euen in their tutors armes, whose aid most pitifullie they besought and required. But the woman that had the keeping of Cderus now in his sicknesse, prouided more warlike for his safeguard, for the smelling out what was the kings purpose, in the dead of the night got hir selfe together with Cderus into a ship, and passed ouer into Argile, where being set on land, she carried him on hir shoulders vp into the mounteins, and there with in a secret den sustained his languishing life for certein moneths in great care and miserie.

Gyllus counterfeith a scale to iustice.

Gyllus notwithstanding these his cruell acts, shewed yet in outward apperance that no man was more desirous of the quiet state and prosperous successe of the commonwealth than he: ever reasoning among his nobles, and that in the presence of his commons touching the maintenance of iustice, & punishment of misdoers, whereas he himselfe thirsted continuallie, and most of all after the blood of those whom he doubted anie thing likelie to attempt the reuenge of his wicked misgouernance: in somuch that he cansed in one place and other; all such to be murdered and slaine as bare anie good will toward the lawfull line of Durtus.

Now the people seeing the baillie slaughter of the nobilitie, and at the last groweing to be verie sore moued against him, namelie those of Galloway, Bisle, Carrick, and Coningham, with them of Cantire, Lozne, and Argile, they assembled their powers together, and with all speed marched forth towards the place where they thought to find the tyrant: who hearing of this their conspiracie, assembled such assistance as he could make, & hauing no other refuge but to trie the matter by battell, made towards his enemies with more speed than god succelle: for yer the two armies came to joining, a great number of Gyllus his friends fled to the contrarie part, so that hereupon doubting the issue if he were constrained to fight, he stole pitifullie from amongst the residue of his folks, and getting into a fishers boate, conueied himselfe ouer into Ireland: whose departure being once knowne, his souldiours yelded themselves vnto Cadall gouernor of Galloway, who was capitaine generall of all the conspirators, and now by the consent of all the estates created gouernor of the realme till they had chosen a king.

The Scots rise against Gyllus.

Gyllus departeth secretly and getteth ouer into Ireland. Cadall of Galloway is chosen gouernor of the realme.

This Cadall, immediatlie vpon the great authoritie giuen him, gat first all the best fortresses into his hands, as Beragonium, Dunstaffage, and other: then he passed ouer into the Ile of Fla, to provide the better for the resisting of Gyllus, if he shuld attempt anie thing by purchasing aid amongst them of the westerne Isles. Whither was brought vnhim also, the yong Cderus (by such of Durtus his friends as had escaped the cruell hands of Gyllus) whome Cadall caused to be honorable conueied vnto Epiake the chiefe citie of Galloway, there to be brought vp in princelie nurture, that comming to full age, he might the better be able to take vpon him the gouernance.

Leland and other take Cderus not to be so ferre north.

In which meane while Gyllus made all the friends in Ireland that he could, in somuch that vpon such golden promises as he made vnto the chiefe gouernors there, they consented to aid him with all their forces. Whereof Cadall being aduertised, he thought it best that a king should be chosen, and thereby an vnitie to be framed amongst all the estates of the realme, whereupon causing a counsell to be assembled for the same intent, by common agreement, one Ewin, a man of worthie fame, nephew to king Finnan by his brother Douall, was in the end proclaimed king: who was latelie come from the Ile of Gouwere into Albion, in companie with Cadall, and kept himselfe close hitherto within the said Ile, for doubt of Gyllus that sought amongst other to haue destroyed him also.

Gyllus parchalet and in Ireland.

Ewin the second of that name chosen king.

This Ewin, being the second of that name, made great prouision in the beginning of his reigne to resist the said Gyllus his enimie. And hearing that he had bene in the Ile of Fla, and put the same to fire and sword, he prepared an armie and ships also, to transport therewith ouer into Ireland, there to reuenge that iniurie vpon such as had aided Gyllus therein to the hinderance of his countrie. The forenamed Cadall gouernor of Galloway, was appointed also to haue the leading of this armie: who taking the sea at Dunstaffage, directed his course straight ouer vnto the coasts of Ireland, where taking land and encountering with his enemies, he put them to the worse, in somuch that Gyllus fearing to fall into his aduersaries hands, fled out of the field into the next wood, where he thought to haue saved himselfe. His souldiours also perceiuing him to be fled, gaue ouer the field, and yelded themselves vnto Cadall, who took them to grace, and forthwith sent sent out certeine companions to seek Gillus; who found him in a den closed about with thicke woods and bushes, where he had lient his certeine daies, and was almost starued for hunger. Those that found him immediatlie stroke off his head, and presented the same vnto Caball, to the great reioysing of all the companie.

Thus after that Caball had atchiued his enterprize with good successe, he toke the sea againe to returne into Scotland, but by meanes of a greuous tempest, he lost the greatest part of his armie, with all the spoile and riches that they had gotten in that voyage. Which mischance fore blemished the glorie of so famous a victorie, so that the reioysing of manie was turned into dolefull moynning for the losse of their friends and kinsfolke, but namelie Cadall toke it so grieuoullie, that nothing could be moze of fendue vnto him. Howbeit, after he was come on land, the king and other of the nobles recomforted him in all that they might, and the king gaue him also much faire lands, with diuers castles in Galloway, in recompense of his good faithful service at sundrie times thewed in defense of his countrie, and made him gouerno: of Galloway also, which he berie thankfullie accepted.

After this king Ewin came to an interuiew with the king of Wicks in the borders of Galloway, and there renewed th ancient leage betwixt the Scottish men and the Wicks. For moze corroboration wherof Wyora the daughter of Gethus the third king of the Wicks, was ioined in marriage with Ederus, the solemnization being kept at Epiake. These things thus accomplished, Ewin returned to Duffasage, where being certified by letters from the lieutenant of Kofle, that the Islanders of Dykeney had passed Scotland first, and were entered into Cathnesse, robbing and spoiling that countrie with a great part of Kofle, he leued an armie with all speed, and hastened towards the enimies, constraining them by his sudden coming to fight whether they would or not, hauing no leisure to get awaie, so that with small resistance they were vanquished and chased, some into the mounteins, and other to the sea side: of whom part escaped by botes ouer into their countries, the residue of them in this their sudden overthrow being either slaine, drowned, or taken. But Bladus the king of Dykeney, for that he would not come into his enimies hands, slue himself. And thus ended this enterprize against the enimies of Dykeney: greatlie to the increase of Ewins fame amongst the Scottish nation.

After this he visited the west parts of his realme, and at the mouth of the riuer of Lochtey he builded a citie which he named Enuerlochtey, infranchising the same with a sanctuarie for the refuge of offenders. This citie afterwards was much frequented with merchants of France and Spaine, by reason of the great abundance of samons, herrings, and other fish which was taken there. The old ruines of this citie in part remaine to be seene in that place where it stood, euen to this day. He likewise built an other citie in the east part of the realme nere to the water called Lochnesse, which he named Enuernesse, after the name of the water. Whither in times past there resoyted manie merchants of Germanie, with such merchandize as the inhabitants of the countrie there stood in need of, exchanging the same with them for marterne skins, and other such furs, wherewith they made their returne. This citie is as yet remaining, and beareth the old name, rich and well stored with diuers kinds of merchandize, so that this Ewin proued a most famous prince for his worthie exploits right fortunatellie atchiued both in peace and warre. And finally understar-ding the death of his berie dere and intrelle beloued friend Caball, he repaired vnto Epiake, as well to giue order for the pacifying of his sonnes being at variance for their fathers inheritance, as also to do the moze hono: to his friend now deceased, by erecting some monument nere vnto his sepulchre. Comming therefore to Epiake, and setting an altar betwixt the yong men, he caused an image to be made in all points resembling the personage of Caball, as nere as might be: which he placed in the midst of the market stee, commanding the same to be honored with burning of incense and other diuine ceremonies. Within a few daies also, through inward sorrow, as was thought, for the losse of so dere a friend, he began to wear sick himselfe, and at length perceluing he should not escape present death, he caused Ederus (of whom before mention is made) to be brought vnto him, into whose hands with manie wholsome aduertisements how to vse himselfe in gouernement of his subiects, he wholie resigned the estate, the which after his decess he knew to be due vnto him without all question and controuersie: and afterward departed this world, when he had reigned seuentene yeares continuallie for the most part in high wealth and felicitie.

After the decess of Ewin, Ederus was, in a manner before expessed, receiued for king by the whole assent of all the Scottishmen. Whose chiefe delight was altogether in hunting and keeping of hounds and greihounds, to chase and pursue wild beasts, and namelie the wolfe the heardmans fo, by meanes wherof his aduancement was much moze acceptable amongst the nobles, who in those daies were wholy giuen to that kind of pleasure and pastime. In the beginning of his reigne there was no trouble towards the publike state of the realme being maintained by vpright iustice, and all transgressions through terror of due punishment politike lie repressed.

The first that went about to put him to any notable trouble, was one Wredus of the Fles, nere of kin to Gillus that usurper and murtherer, who with a powder of Irishmen, and other of the westerne Fles landed in Argile, waisting & spoiling the countrie with fire & sword, wherof Ederus being aduertised (who was at the same time in those parts hunting amongst the mounteins) gathered an armie with all speed, and hastening to the place where his enimies ships late at anchor, he first burned the same, to take awaie all meanes from them to escape by flight. The morning next following he did set vpon them also at vnwares: of whom some he slue, and the residue being taken, either in the fight or chase by his commandement were hanged, and cruelly executed to the example of all others.

After this, he passed ouer into the westerne Fles, where he did execution vpon such as had aided Wredus, putting some to death, and causing other to fine at his pleasure, and deppining some utterlie of all that euer they had. At his returne againe into Scotland, there met him ambassadoys sent from Castillane kings of the Britains, requirring him of aid against Julius Cesar, who (as the same king had perfect vnderstanding) was appointed berie hostile to passe the seas from France, ouer into this Ile, with a mightie power of Romans, to subdue the inhabitants vnto the seignorie and iurisdiction of Rome.

Ederus receiued these ambassadoys berie courteously: and forsomuch as their maisters request required counsell, he caused his lords which were then present, to assemble together the next daie, afore whome he willed that Androgens, chiefe of the British ambassadoys, should declare the effect of his message, sage, which he did so eloquentlie, and uttering such sensible matter, help it stood the Scottishmen upon to aid the Britains against such common enemies to all nations as the Romans were, that in the end it was concluded by the king, with the advice of his nobles, that he should not onlie send a power to aid the Britains against the Roman, but also send some of his lords with Androgeus and his associates unto Cethus king of the Picts, to move him to do the like: who hearing how reasonable their demands were, promised further to accomplish the same.

Thus the British ambassadors having speed according to their desires, repaired homewards: immediately upon whose departure, both the kings Cederus & Cethus lenied their armies, & sent them forth towards London, whereas then Calpurnius sojourne. And that the Scots were ten thousand men under the leading of Cadallane governor of Galloway, the sonne of Cadall before remembred, and one Donald governor of Argile. But what successe followed of this first journey which Cesar made into Britaine, ye shall find the same in the historie of England more at length expressed. The year that Julius Cesar came to invade Britaine, was the fourth of Cederus his reigne, from the creation of the world 3912 complet, which is after Spalster Harisons account 54 before the coming of our Saviour, and 692 after the building of Rome.

The Scottishmen and Picts having their part of the spoile which the Romans at their departure left behind them, were sent home to their countries with great thanks and rewards for their pains, but the Britains were so exalted in pride by the departure of the Romans, that they believed verelie they should have no more to do with those enemies, or if they had they thought themselves strong enough to repell them without aid of other. By means whereof when king Cederus was informed how the Romans prepared to invade them afresh, and had sent them word thereof, offering to them his aid: they made no account of that offer, but answered that it was not necessarie, for euerie light invasion of foreign enemies, to seeke helpe at other mens hands, being of puissance sufficient of themselves to resist the same well enough.

But of this refusal of so friendlie an offer, it was not long per the Britains fore repented them. For shortly after Julius Cesar with a farre greater power than that which he brought with him at the first time, landed here in this Ile amongst them againe: and being at three sundrie times fiercelie incountred by king Calpurnius, at length he put the same Calpurnius with his Britains to flight, slaying and taking a great number of them. Amongst other of the prisoners were three of their chiefe captiues, Androgeus, Cilentoriges, and Tenantius. By reason of which overthrow Calpurnius was discouraged, that doubting further mischance, he yielded himselfe unto Cesar, accepting such conditions of peace as were appointed him, and for performance of covenants, delivered sufficient pledges.

Cesar having thus conquered the Britains, sent his ambassadors unto the kings of the Scottishmen and Picts, requiring them to submit themselves as Calpurnius had done, or else he had them looke for open warres at the Romans hands, which they might assure themselves they should in no wise be able to susteine, considering their mightie and huge puissance, having the most part of the whole world at their commandement already. Whereunto as well the one king as the other made this or much what the like answer, that they were bent sooner to lose their liues than their libertie. Which their resolution, if they were put to the trial, should be euidentlie proued by the deed it selfe.

Cesar having receiued this answer from these two nations, he sendeth new messengers unto them with a more rough message, who not onlie by threats but also by great reasons went about to persuade them unto submission. But they persisting in their former opinion for defense of their liberties, and detestlie refusing all manner of bondage, would incline by no means to come in any bond of friendship with the Romans. After the returne of these last messengers, Cesar was fullie resolved to enter into their countries, to force them unto that by dint of sword, whereunto by treatie he might not induce them: and had set forward on that iournie shortly after indeed, if he had not bene called backe into France, to pacifie sundrie commotions there raised by the revolting of the people inhabiting in those countries, where the Picts and Romans, with other the inhabitants nere about Chartres do now dwell.

The common Scottish chronicles record, how Julius Cesar came as far as Balenbar wood, and there wan by force the citie of Camelon, where the British kings used most to sojourne. Hereunto the same chronicles adde, that Cesar builded a great stone house of 24 cubits in heighth, & of 12 cubits in breadth, of square hewen stones, right workmanlike framed, which house they saie Cesar caused to be used in stead of a iudgement hall, and here placed it nere the river of Caron, ouer against the forenamed citie of Camelon, as a witnesse that the Romans armie had bene so far forward within that countrie. Such an house there remaineth to be seene even unto this daie, and is called Julius hoff, that is Julius hall, or Julius court. Wherewith, other more agreeable to the likelihood of a truth, write that this house was sometimes a temple builded to the honor of Claudius Cesar, and of the goddess Victoria, by the Romane capteine Vespasian, at such time as he made wars in that countrie, before his advancement to the empire.

But to returne unto Cederus. About the same time, in which he looked to be invaded by Julius Cesar and the Romans, and for that purpose had sent for them of the westerne Isles to reinforce his host, he was now enforced to conuert it another waie, for there was one Murketus, nephue unto the aboue remembred Gilius, that came with a nauie out of Ireland to rob and spoile those Isles, being destitute as then of men to resist him. But Cederus hearing thereof, dispatched Cadallanus with an armie into those parties for defense of his subiects: which Cadallanus behaved himselfe so politikelie in this exploit, that setting upon the enemies as they lay at anchor, he took them in the night season, without making any great defense, and after hanged them by along the shore side within the Ile of Galloway: Murket himself being honored with an higher place to hang in than all the rest, as due to him that was their chiefe head and leader in that volage. The remnant of Cederus his reigne passed without anie other notable trouble: and so after he had reigned 38 yeeres, he deceased a verie old man, about the 23 yeare of the empire of Augustus Cesar. He was buried also at Dunstaffage with all due pompe & solemnitie, having diuers obelisks (as the custome then was) erected and set by about the place where he was so intomulate.

After him reigned his sonne Ewin, the third of that name, nothing like in any princelie qualitie unto his noble progenitors, but contrariwise infamed by all kind of vices. In the first yeeres of his reigne he was wholly drowned in lascivious lecherie, abandoning himselfe altogether to lie weltering amongst amongst a sort of vile strumpets, his lust being neuer throughlie satisfied, though neuer so often wearied. The nobles of the realme he had in no regard at all, of whom some he confined, and some he caused to be murdered, onlie because he might the more freely without gainesaying hant his vile trade of liuing with their wiues and cosins. Such delight he had also in his filthy and abhominable ribaldrie, that he made lawes for maintenance of the like amongst his subiects, as thus: That it might be lawfull for euerie man to marie diuers & sundrie wiues, some six, some ten, according to their substance and qualities. And as for poore mens wiues, they were appointed to be common vnto the lords of the soile: and further, that the same lords should first despoile the hyde after hir marriage: which last ordinance toke such effect, that of manie hundred yeeres after it could by no means be abrogated, though the two former liberties were by authoritie of the kings succeeding, shortly after this Ewins decess, taken awate and reuoked.

But now to conclude touching the doings of this Ewin, ye shall vnderstand, that at length such lords as greatly abhorred his vile conditions & vices, conspired against him, and raising an armie of their friends and partakers, incountred with him in the field, and there toke him prisoner, being destitute of all aid and succours: for such as he brought with him, not once offered to strike one stroke in his quarrell. Ewin being thus taken, was by and by condemned to perpetuall prison; and Cadallan, of whom ye haue heard before, immediatlie proclaimed gouernor of the realme. Howbeit the night following, after that Ewin (according to the iudgement pronounced against him) was committed vnto ward, a presumptuous young man, in hope to haue thanks of Cadallan, entred into the chamber where he was inclosed, and there strangled him. But in stead of thanks he was recompensed with death: for Cadallan detesting such a wicked deed, caused him to be hanged in open sight of all men. Such was the end of Ewin, being thus dispatched in prison, in the seuenth yeere after he began his reigne ouer the Scottisshmen, being the 9 yeere of Augustus Cesar his gouernment of the Romane empire.

After Ewin succeeded Metellanus, son to one Carren, the brother of Cederus a prince of most gentle behaviour. This Metellanus maintained his subiects in great quietnesse and rest, without anie manner of wars, either forein or ciuill. Such wicked lawes as his predecessor had established, he did what he could to abolish. But such young gentlemen as delighted in sensuall lust, and licentious libertie, stood so stiffelie therein against him, that in the end he was glad to leaue off his purpose. About the same time also there came vnto Kimbaline king of the Britains an ambassadoe from Augustus the emperor, with thanks, for that entring into the gouernment of the Britissh state, he had kept his allegiance toward the Romane empire: exhorting him to keepe his subiects in peace with all their neighbors, with the whole world, through means of the same Augustus, was now in quiet, without all warres or troublesome tumults.

These ambassadoes went also vnto Metellanus the K. of the Scottisshmen, exhorting him to acknowledge a superiouritie in the Romane emperor, vnto whome the people inhabiting in the furthest parts of the east, had sent their ambassadoes with rich iewels to present his person withall. Wherewith Metellanus being partly moued to haue a frendlie amitie with the Romans, he sent vnto Rome certeine rich presents to the emperor, and to the gods in the capitol, in signe of honour, by which means he obtained an amitie with the Romans, which continued betwixt them and his kingdome for a long time after.

Thus a generall peace as then reigning thoroughout the whole world, it pleased the giuer and author of all peace to be borne at the same time, of that blessed virgin Marie, in the citie of Bethlem in the tribe of Iuda. Which most blessed and salutiferous birth did come to passe in the 12 yeere of Metellanus reigne, and in the 42 of Augustus his empire: from the first establishing of the Scottissh kingdome by Fergusius 324 yeeres, and after the creation of the world 3966, as Harison in his chronologie doth manifestlie conclude. After this, Metellanus reigned certeine yeeres in continuall peace and quietnes, euermore readie to do the thing that might be to the contentation and the weale of his people. Finallic, he passed out of this life in the 39 yeere of his reigne, which was the 28 after the birth of our Sauour, and 13 of Tiberius the emperor. Howbeit he left no issue alieue behind him to succeed in the gouernment of the kingdome: for those children which he had begotten, he buried in his life time, by means thereof, one Caratake, sonne to Cadallan, and nephew to king Metellanus by his sister Europeta, was proclaimed king; as he that excelled in riches and puissant authoritie aboue all other the peeres and high estates of the realme, and had not a little to do in the administration of publicke affaires in the latter daies of his uncle Metellanus.

The first thing he did after he was established in the estate, he sailed into the westerne Isles, to appease a rebellion moued by the gouernour there. Which done, and the authors punished, he returned into Albion, and came into Cariaouum, which was sometimes a famous citie, and metropolitane of Scotland, situate within the countrie cleped Carrike, as it appeareth by the ruines there remaining euen vnto this day. In this citie was Caratake borne, & therefore fauouring it the more, he lay there most commonlie, and did what he could to aduance the wealtie and state thereof. Whilest these things were a doing in Scotland, Kimbaline king of the Britains died, who for that he had bene brought vp in Rome, obserued his promised obedience towards the empire; but Guderius succeeding, disdained to see the libertie of his countrie oppressed by the Romans, and therefore procuring the Britains to assist him, assembled a power, and inuaded the Romans with such violence, that none escaped with life, but such as saved themselves within castles & fortresses.

The emperor Claudius that then gouerned the Romane empire, aduertised hereof, sent two capteins, Aulus Plautius, and Cneus Suetonius to appease that rebellion. They landing in Britaine with their armie, vanquished Guderius in battell, so that he was constrained to send to Caratake king of Scots for aid against the common enemies of both nations. Caratake hauing considered the effect of this message, gaue counsell to the Britains to send into France then called Gallia, to practise with the people there to moue some rebellion against the Romans, in hope of helpe, which they were assured to haue by the Britains. This counsell was followed, for immediatlie vpon the ambassadoes returne, there were sent ouer into France certeine intelligenciaries to moue some conspiracie which had taken effect (by reason of the generall hate of seruitude, wherein the Romans kept the people subiect to them in those daies) if Guderius had not bene constrained to giue battell, and chanced to be slaine in the same, yet the Galls could be resolved vpon anie determinat purpose.

This ouerthrow being reported in France, caused the Galls to staie their intended rebellion. Shortly lie after Claudius himselfe came ouer into Britaine, and receiuing the Britains vnder his obedifance, ordered things among them at his pleasure.

And after preparing his nauie and armie with all purueiance conuenient, he set forward towards the Isles of Orkenie, purposing to conquere the same, for that they had aided the Britains in these last warres against the Romans. But approaching nere to those Isles, he was in danger to haue bene cast awate by a tempest rising by chance, even as he was entred the streit betwixt the Orkenies and Dungibie head in Cathnessle called Wicland frith; yet at length getting to land, he found in that Ile where he first arrived, no bodie at home, all the people through feare vpon the first sight of the great multitude of ships being fled to hide themselves in caues and dens amongst the rocks & mounteins.

Claudius therefore leauing this Ile, passed into Doronia the chiefe of all the Orkenies, where discomfiting such as appeared abroad to make resistance, he besieged the king of those Isles named Car-nus, within a castell where he was withdrawen, and finallie causing him to yeld himselfe prisoner, led him with other nobles of Britaine (whome he had for pledges) vnto Rome, the more to set forth the glorie of his triumph at his returne vnto the citie.
¶ But whatsoeuer Hector Boetius and others write of this passage of Claudius into the Orkenies, it is not like that he came there at all, for if he failed not past 16 daies in Britaine, as by Dion Cassius it appeareth that he did not in deed; how should we imagine that he could both pacifie the south parts of Britaine, and after go into Orkenie and conquere the same within so small a time, being readie to returne towards Rome at the end of those 16 daies, as the said Dion affirmeth. But this discourse haue I made according to their owne histories, least I should seeme to defraud them of whatsoeuer glorie is to be gotten by errors, as the manner is of them as well as of other nations, which to aduance their antiquities and glorie of their ancestors, take the aduantage oftentimes of writers scant worthy of credit.

But now againe to our purpose. Arutragus being established in the kingdome of Britaine, vpon some priuat displeasure forsooke his wife named Mo-ada, the sister of Caratake king of the Scottismen, and married Genissa a Romane ladie, which ad mannie of the Britans disallowed; the more in deed, because he had faire issue already by Moada, as a son and two daughters. But this was done, as all men iudged, by the counsell of Aulus Plandinus, thereby to breake all friendship and alliance betwixt the Britains and the Scots, to the end that in no case of rebellion they should ioint their powers together.
Nevertheless he onelie refused Moada, whome all men knew to be his lawfull wife, but also caused hir to be kept in prison, till that the Britains (hauing indignation thereat) got hir out of the place where she was kept, and conueied hir into Wales together with hir children.

With which dealing Arutragus being highlie moued, determined with force of armes to punish them that had thus misused him: but perceiuing that not onelie those people which inhabited the countrie, now called Wales, and other that adioined on the north marches thereof were readie to defend the queene against his malice, he was faine to require aid of the Romans, who with their capitaine Aulus Plandinus assembling together with such of the Britains as toke part with Arutragus, set forward toward the enemies, and iointing with them in battell, did give them the ouerthrow. The next day after this victorie thus gotten, word was brought that the people inhabiting in the countries which we now call Lancashire, Dorsetshire, and Warburie; were vp in armour against the king and the Romans, by reason whereof Arutragus and Aulus Plandinus withdrew towards London, that defending the sea coasts towards France, they might yet haue the sea open at all times whatsoeuer chanced. And to re enforce their power, Aulus Plandinus sent ouer for two legions of souldiers into France, to come with all speed to his aid.

The Britains, who had gone so farre in the matter that they could not well withdraw themselves, now being certified of all their enemies doings, thought best to make themselves so strong as was possible.
And to the end that they might proceed in some orderlie meane, all the greatest lords and estates assembled together at Shrewsburie, in those daies called Cozimum, where they concluded vpon a league to aid one another with all their might and maine against the Romans & Arutragus, who went about to bring them whole vnder seruile subiection and thraldome of the same Romans. They being thus agreed to make warres in this quarrell, and for the same purpose to ioint their whole puissance together, there rose a doubt whome they might chuse for their generall capitaine, for that it was feared least there might grow some secret enuie amongst the nobles being of equall power, if one should be in this case preferred before an other. For the auoiding of which mischief, by the graue admonition of one Comus a noble man of the parties of Wales, they accorded to send messengers vnto Caratake the king of Scotland, requiring him to aid them in their right and iust quarrell against Arutragus and the Romans, whereby he might reuenge the iniu-rie done to his sister queene Moada and hir issue, whome the father through counsell of the Romans purposed to disherit to the end, such children as he had by Genissa (for that they were of the Romane blood) might inioy the kingdome. They further declared, that all the British lords which were con-federat in this enterprise, had chosen him by common assent to be their generall and chiefe leader, if it might so please him to take it vpon him, as their trust was he would: considering the iust causes of their warre, and the suretie which by victorie gotten might insue vnto all the inhabitants of the whole Ile of Albion.

Caratake hauing heard the summe of their request, and throughlie weighing the same, promised them to be readie with his whole puissance in the beginning of the next spring, to come to their aid, vnto what place soeuer they should thinke expedient; and thereof he told them they might be most assured, willing them in the meane time so to provide for themselves, as their enemies might haue no aduantage at their hands. With this agreeable an-swere the British messengers returned to Shrews-burie to the confederats, who reioicing at the news, made provision against the next spring to go against the Romans, in hope of good successe, speciallie through aid of the Scots and Picts, who also with their king called Conkist were willing to helpe towards the deliuering of the land from bondage of the Romans, whose nestling so nere their noses they were loth to see or heare of. So some therefore as the spring approached, all those three people, Britains, Scots, and Picts, gathered their powers together, and met in Dorsetshire, in purpose to encounter with their enemies in battell, where soeuer they found

for a while forbare to iointe in battell, though counsell of Plandius, who perceiuing the most part of the Britains and Scots to be but new souldiers, taken bp of late to fill the numbers, knew that by protracting time they would be some out of heart, through watching and euill harbozough, in such sort that in the end they should be easie enough to deale with; and even so it came to passe. For the Romans refusing to fight a generall battell, yet scoured to the fields on ecy side abroad, that neither the Britains nor Scots could go forth anie wales for forage or vittels, but they were still snatched bp, so that what through hunger, lacke of sleepe, and other diseases, manie of the Britains began to conueie themselves from the campe home to their houses, of whome some being taken by the enemies, declared that the whole armie of the confederats was in great distresse, and soe infabled by such vnaccustomed trauell and diseases as they were enforced vnto in the campe. Aruiragus resolteih.

Caratake, who (as ye haue heard) was generall of all the confederates, vnderstanding the enemies intent, was as readie to receiue battell as they were to offer it; whereupon there ensued right great and vnumercifull slaughter betwixt them on both parts, without sparing any at all, till such time as the night parted the fraie, with such losse on either side, that after they were once got in sunder, neither part had anie haile afterwards to iointe againe: so that in the morning there appeared none in the field but onelie the dead bodies, those that were left aliue as well on the one part as the other being fled and scattered into the woods and mounteins. Aruiragus and Plandius got them vnto London: and Caratake commanding his people home each man into his countrie, he himselfe with few first towards Dorke, and after vnto the citie of Carrike; whither shortly after there came vnto him ambassadors from Aulus Plandius, sent to know vpon what occasion he did aide the British rebels against the Romane empire, declaring that if he would not be conformable to make a worthe amends for so presumptuous an enterprisse, he should be sure to haue the Romans his enemies; and that in such wise, as he should perceiue it were much better for him to seke their friendship, than to abide their enmitie.

Herevnto Caratake answered, that he had inst cause to do that which he did, considering the injuries which his sister Moada with hir sonne Guiderius had and were like to receiue by their counsell and meanes: and therefore he was so little minded to make anie amends for that was done, that hee thought it moze reason that the Romans should clearelie auoid out of the whole possession of Britaine, either else they might assure themselves to haue aswell the Britains, as also the Scots & Picts to be their perpetuall enemies, and that onelie for the chalenge of their ancient liberties and freedome. The Romane ambassadors being returned with this answer, Plandius toke no small indignation thereat, soe menacing to be reuenged of so high and cruel words pronounced against the maiestie of the Romane empire.

About the same time Aruiragus, vpon trust conceived by iointing his power with the other confederate Britains, to expell the Romans quite out of the realme, and so to reconer the intire estate, resolting from them, fled into Shyewsburie, where, at the same time such British lords as were enemies to the Romans, were assembled againe in counsell, by whom Aruiragus was receiued with great gladnesse (ye maie be sure) of those lords, trusting by his meanes to haue their force in maner doubled. His wife Gennissa being at the same season great with child, toke such thought for this resolting of hir husband, that traouelling before hir time, she immediatly died therewith. But Aulus Plandius, perceiuing now thoroughly how little trust there was to be put in the Britains, dispatched a messenger in all hast with letters vnto Claudius the emperor, who as then sojourned at Rome, signifieng vnto him in what danger the state of Britaine stood, if timely prouision were not the sooner made.

Gennissa the wife of Aruiragus dieth.

A messenger sent vnto Claudius the emperor from Plandius.

Claudius weighing the matter by good aduise of counsell, ordeined by decree of the senate, that Vespasian (of whome ye haue heard before) should be sent hither with an armie, to tame the proud and loffie stomachs of the Britains, with their confederats the Scots & Picts. Vespasian herevpon departing from Rome, came into France, & increasing his legions, with a supplie of such souldiers as he found there, passed ouer into this our Britaine, where contrarie to the report which he had heard afore his coming, he found euerie fortresse so well furnished after the warlike order of the Romane vsage, and mozeouer all such companies of men of warre as kept the field so well appointed and ordered, that he could not but much praise the great diligence and politike gouernement of Plandius.

Now when Vespasian had a little refreshed his men, and taken order how to proceed in the reducing of the Britains to their former obedience, he set forward toward Aruiragus & other the enemies, whom he vnderstood as then to be at Dorke, making their assemble, not generallie of all that were able to beare a club, as they did the yere before; but out of all parties a chosen number of piked men were sent for, as out of Denonshire & Cornewall there came 6000, forth of Wales and the marches 12000, and the like number out of Kendall, Westmerland, and Cumberland. Out of Dorsetshire and other the parties of Britaine subiect vnto Aruiragus, there came 35000. All which numbers assembled nere vnto Dorke, euerie man bringing his prouision with him to serue him for two moneths space. Vnto the same place came also Caratake with 30000 Scotish men; and Alithara otherwise called Charan, king of the Picts, with almost as manie of his subiects.

Vespasian being certified still from time to time of all the doings of his enemies, hastied with all speed towards them; and by the leading of trustie guides comming to the place where they were incamped within a marshy ground not passing 12 miles from Dorke, he fiercelie vpon a sudden setteth vpon them within their campe, yer they thought he had bene nere them. But yet notwithstanding they manfully stood to their defense: inso much that those in the right wing of the Romans armie were like to haue bene iddistressed, if Vespasian perceiuing the danger, had not sent a legion to their aid in time, whereby the battell was newlie in that part restored. The captains on either side did what they could to encourage their folkes to stick to their tackle, without giuing ouer by anie meanes, considering what gaine came by victorie, and what losse ensued by receiuing the ouerthrow.

The Britains, Scots, and Picts, like enraged lions, ran vpon the Romans, with such cruell desire of reuenge, that euen when they were thrust through vpon the point of any weapon, they would run still vpon the same, to come vnto him that held it, that they might requite him with the like againe. But yet would not all that their fierce and desperate hardinesse preuaile, for fortune by fatal appointment being bent to aduance the Romans vnto the dominion nion of the whole world, shewed hir selfe so fauoura-ble vnto them in this battell, that in the end, though the Britains with the confederats did what lay in men to do for attaining of victorie, yet were they beaten downe and slaine euerie mothers sonne, a few onelie excepted, which escaped by flight.

Arui-
ragus seeing the slaughter of his people, would haue slaine himselfe, but that some of his ser-uants caried him by force out of the field, that he might be rescued yet vnto some better fortune. Caratake escaping by flight, fled into his countrie, but Charan king of the Picts, not ouer-looking such losse of his people, threw away his armor with all his kinglie ornaments, and sitting downe vpon a stone, as a man past himselfe, was there slaine by such as followed in the chase. Arui-ragus being conueied out of danger, and gotten into Forke, considered how by reason of this great discomfiture, it was impossible to resist the Romane puissance, and therefore with consent of the residue of his nobles that were escaped from the battell, he sent an herald vnto Clespasian, offering to submit himselfe in most humble wise vnto anie reasonable conditions of peace and agreement. Whereupon Clespasian commanded that Arui-ragus should in priuate apparell come in vnto him, for he would not talke of anie peace, except he had Arui-ragus present, and therefore he sent vnto him his safe conduct to assure him safetie both to come and go.

ragus seeing no other remedie, came in vnto Clespasian, according to his appointment, and by on his submission was pardoned of all his trespasses, and placed againe in the kingdome. The cities and good townes also that were partakers in the rebellion, were in semblable wise forgiven without firming or other indenmitie, and so likewise were all the nobles of the countrie. Howbeit, for the better assurance of their libertie in time to come, they deli-uered new hostages. Their ancient lawes also were abrogated, and the Romane lawes in their place established. For the administration of the which, in euerie prouince was appointed a Romane iudge to see good orders obserued according to the forme thereof. Whiche meanes the British nation estioines returned vnto hir former obedience of the Romane empire. All the winter following, Clespasian laie at Forke, making his apperils against the next spring to go against the Scots and Picts. So sone therefore as the summer was come, Clespasian setteth forth with his armie, and entering into the bosnes of his enemies, he did put them in such feare that the Picts were glad to yeld themselves vnto him, a few of the nobles & some other excepted, which were withdrawne into Camelon, in hope through strength of that towin to defend themselves from all assaults. Clespasian being certified therof, came & besieged them within the same citie, not minding to depart till he had them at his pleasure. This siege continued till they within, being in danger to famish through want of vittels, surrendered themselves with the towin into Clespasiens hands. In this towin were found all the regall ornaments, as the crowne & sword, with other iewels belonging to the kings of the Picts. The sword hauing the hilt of gold, & a purple scabbard very finely wrought & trimmed, Clespasian used to weare in all the warres wherin he afterwards chanced to be, in hope (I wot not) of what good successe and lucke to follow therof. The Pictish lords which were within Camelon, were commanded to deliuer pledges: and after licenced to depart without anie other damage. Clespasian himselfe remaining at Camelon, take order for the peopling of the towne with Romans, granting them the vse of the liberties and priuileges which the Romans inhabiting in Rome inioied. Also ouer against the towne vpon the banke of the river of Caron, he builded a temple in honoz of the emperor Claudius, wher in he set vp two images, the one representing Claudius, and the other the goddesse Victoria.

Whilist he was thus occupied, things came to him, that Caratake king of the Scottishmen had assembled in Galloway a great army of Scots, Picts and Britains, in purpose against the Romans, to revenge the last overthrow. Whereupon Clespasian with all speed sent forth a strong power vnder the leading of Aulus Plautius to encounter the enemies. Plautius being approached within foure miles of them, incamped himselfe in a strong place, as though he minded not to passe further, till Clespasian with the rest of his whole puissance were come to his aid. Neuertheless, night was no soner come on, but that he gaue generall commandement through his host, that euerie man should make him readie to depart at a certaine houre vnder the standards of their capteins in order of battell.

Then in the second watch of the night he set forth, following certeine guides (which knew all the straits and passages of the countrie) till he came to the place where Caratake with his armie was lodged: and first killing the watch which stood to defend his entrance, till the armie was raised, he set vpon the whole campe, and though he found such resistance that the battell continued right fierce & cruell from the dawning of the day, till it was hie none, yet in the end the victorie remained with the Romans; and the Scots with the Picts, & such Britains as were on their part, put to flight and chased. Caratake escaping out of the battell, fled into Argile, and got him to the castell of Dunstaffage. Diuerse of the Brit-taines & Picts, which as yet had not submitted themselves, were put in such dread through brute of this ouerthrow, that immediatlie thereupon they came in and yelded themselves vnto Clespasian. And in semblable wise the people of Galloway utterlie despairing any longer to defend their countrie against Plautius (who was now entred into their confines, and had taken the citie of Carrike) offered to become subjects vnto the Romans, which they might neuer be brought vnto before that time.

These newes being certified vnto Clespasian by a pursuant, he rode streightwaies vnto Carrike, & there receiued the oths of the nobles, and other the inhabitants of the countrie. That done, he sent ambassadors vnto Caratake, to trie if he might by anie meanes to become friend vnto the Romane empire, in acknowledging some manner of subiection thereto: but this deuise was to small purpose, for Caratake was determined rather to end his life as a free Scottishman in defense of libertie, than to become thrall vnto anie forreine nation, in hope to liue long time in seruitude, doubting least if he came anie waies forth into danger of the Romans, they would blurpe the whole dominion vnto themselves.
Whose mind when Clespasian vnderstood by his answer made to the ambassadors which were sent vnto him, he was minded to haue gone with an armie vnto Dunstaffage where Caratake lay, but that he was informed that dangerous passages he must march through, all full of desert mounteins, bogs, and quauemires, without anie prouision of vittels or forage to bee found by all the way as the armie should passe.

Leauing therefore this enterprize, he caused so manie vessels to be assembled, as could be prouided on all parts, purposing to haue passed ouer into the Ile of Man, into the which there were gotten together a great sort of Britains and Picts, that had escaped the Romans hands. But this iourne also was broken by another incident, for even at the same time, newes were brought that the Britains of the Ile of Wight, with the Kentishmen, and diuerse others the inhabitants vpon the south coast, were revolted, and had slaine diuerse Romans, which lay in garisons in those parts. Vespasian therefore minding to cure this wound per it should throughlie fester, hastened thither with all speed, and with little ado pacifying the rebels, caused the chiefe offenders to be punished according to their deserts.

Shortly after being sent for by the emperor Claudius, he returned vnto Rome with great glorie for his noble and high atchieued victories. Aulus Plautius was left in charge with the gouernment of Britaine after Vespasians departure: who hearing that Caratake had assembled a great armie of Scots, and other such Britains and Picts as had not yet submitted themselves vnto the Romans, in purpose to recouer againe those countries which Vespasian had latelie conquered, he likewise prepared to meet them, so that both the armies encountering together, there was fought a right terrible battell with great slaughter on both parties, till finally the victorie inclining to the Romans, more through skillfull policie than puissant force, the Scots, Picts, and Britains were discomfited and chased into the bogs and marshes, the common refuge in those daies for the Scots, when by any aduenture they chanced to be put to flight.

After this overthrow the warre was continued for two yeeres space, by rodes and incursions made one vpon another in the confines of Aile and Galloway. In which meane while Plautius fell sicke of the sicke, which still continuing with him, brought him at length in such case, that he was not able to trauell at all in the publike affaires of his office. So that he wrote his letters vnto the emperor Claudius, signifying vnto him in what case he stood, and thereupon required that some sufficient personage might be sent to occupie his roome. Claudius hauing received his letters, and understanding the effect of the same, sent one Drusus Scapula, a man of high linage, and of good experience both in peace and war, to haue the gouernance in Britaine.

About the time of whose arriual into Britaine, Aulus Plautius departed out of this world at Camelon, where he then sojourned. His bodie was burned, and according to the vse of the Romans in those daies, the ashes were closed in a chest, and buried within the church of Claudius and Victoria, which (as is said) Vespasian builded nere vnto Camelon, vpon the riuers side there. Hereof was a custome taken by amongst both Scots and Picts (as some thinke) to burne the bodies of the dead, and to burie the ashes: whereof there haue bene found diuerse tokens and monuments in this our age. As in the yere 1521 at Findor, a village in Perth, five miles distant from Aberdine, there were found in an old graue two chests of a strange making full of ashes, either of them being ingrauen with Romane letters, which so soone as they were brought into the aire, fell to dust. Likewise in the fields of another towne called Kenbadden in Perth, ten miles distant from Aberdine, about the same time were found by certaine plotomen two sepulchres made of cut and squared stones, wherein were four chests, of worke, manship, bignesse and inscription like to the other two. Wantie the semblable monuments haue bene found in diuerse places in Scotland in times past: but it is to be thought, that in these sepulchres there were Romans buried, and neither Scots nor Picts.

But now to our purpose. Immediatlie vpon the coming of Drusus into Britaine, the people of the west countries rebelled, procuring the northern men with the Scots of Galloway, and all the Picts to do the like. They sent also vnto Caratake, requiring him in this common quarrell against the Romans to put to his helping hand for recouerie of the ancient libertie of the whole land of Albion, considering it was like they should match well enough with this new Romane captaine Drusus Scapula, that understood little of the maners and vsages of the Britains. But this notwithstanding, Drusus being informed of all these practices, and remembering what furtherance it were for a captaine in the beginning to win a name by some praise-worthy enterprise, he made first towards the western Britains, whom he thought to surpise per they should assemble with the other rebels, and so meeting with them, he chased and toke a great number of them, as they fled here and there out of all order.

After this he went against the people called Iceni, which (as some thinke) inhabited the countrie now called Dorsetshire, but other take them to be Southfolke men, who being gathered together, were gotten into a strong place, inclosed about with a great ditch as they vse to fence pasture grounds, that no horsemen should breake in vpon them: yet this notwithstanding, Drusus assailed them within their strength, and in the end breaking downe the rampire, with such aid as he had, burst in at length amongst them, slaying and taking the most part of them: for few or none escaped, they were so kept in on each side. But of this battell, and likewise of other enterprises, which Drusus and other of the Romane lieutenants atchieued here in Britaine, ye shall find more thereof in the historie of England according to the true report of the Romane writers, the which verelie make no mention either of Scots or Picts till the yere of our Lord 320, at the soonest. And as for the Silures and Brigants remoued by Hector Boetius so farre northward, it is euidentlie proved by Humfrey Llhoed, and others, that they inhabited countries contained now within the limits of England. The like ye haue to understand of the Debonices where Caratake gouerned as king, and not in Carrike, as to the well aduised reader I doubt not but it may sufficientlie appeare, as well in the description as in the historie of England aforesaid.

But now to returne where we left: the brute of this late victorie quieted the buisie minds of such of the Britains, as were readie to haue revolted. But they of Galloway would not at the first giue ouer, but in trust of aid at the hands of Caratake continued in their rebellion, till Drusus came thither, and beate downe such as made resistance, whereby the other were some pacified. After this he entred into the confines of Aile and Cantire, spoiling and wasting those countries, and brought from thence a great number of captiues. With which inturie Caratake being not a little kindled, he assembled a mightie armie, wherein he had at the least 40 thousand men, what of his owne subiects and other such as came to his aid. For after he was entred into Pictland, there came vnto him out of all parties no small number, of such as desired either to be reuenged on the Romans, either else to lose life and libertie both at once, for the talt of bondage was so bitter vnto all the inhabitants of Albion in this season, that they in maner were wholie conspired together to remoue that yoke of thraldome from their shoulders which so painefullie pinched them.

Caratake thus furnished with an armie, chose forth a strong place to lodge in, fenced on the one side with the course of a deepe fordlesse riuer, and on the other sides it might not be approached vnto for the steepnesse flapnetts of the crags and such fencing as they had made with great stones, in places where there was any waie to enter. All such women as were some what steept in age, and came thither with them, in great numbers, were by Caratake placed on either side his battels, both as well to incourage the men to do valiantlie with shouting and hallowing unto them, as also to assaile the Romans with stones as they should approach. Other such as were young and lustie, were appointed to keepe araie amongst the men to fight in the battell.

Caratake having thus ordered his field, and hearing that Moxius was come to give battell, exhorted his people to sticke to it like men, and so in semblable wise did all his captains and sergeants of the bands, going from ranke to ranke to incourage their souldiours, declaring how that this was the armie that must either bring libertie or thalidome to them and their posteritie for ever. On the other part Moxius minding to trie the matter by battell, set his people in araie after the ancient maner of the Romans, willing them to consider that they were descended of those parents and ancestors which had subdued the whole world: and againe, that those with whom they should now match, were but naked people, fighting moze with a certeine maner of a furious rage and disordered violence, than with any politike discretion or constancie.

Here with upon commandement given on both parts, the battell began right hot, & for a good space verie doubtfull, till the practised knowledge of the Romans banquished the furious violence of the Scots, Picts, and Britains: who being put to flight fled into the mounteins to escape the enemies hands who pursued them most egerlie. Amongst other of the prisoners there was taken Caratakes wife, with his daughter & brethren. He himselve fled for succor unto his stepmother Cartimarbus: but as aduertitie kindestly few friends, she caused him to be taken and delivered unto Moxius. This was in the ninth years after the beginning of the warres. Moxius used him verie honorablie, according to the degree of a king: finally he sent him unto Rome, together with his wife, his daughter, and brethren. His fame was such through all places, that where he passed by, the people came flocking in on each side to see him, of whom they had heard so much report for his stout resistance made so long a time against the Romane puissance.

At his coming to Rome he was shewed in triumph, all the people being called to the sight: for the victorie and apprehension of him was iudged equall with anie other atchieved enterpryse against whatsoever the most puissant enemies of former time. The Emperour Claudius upon respect as was thought of his princelie behavior and notified valiancie, restored him to libertie, and reteining his daughter and eldest brother at Rome as pledges, upon his oth received to be a true subject unto the empire, he sent him home into his countrie againe, assigning unto him the gouernance of Galloway, with Aile, Carrike, and Coningham. He liued not passing two yeeres after his returne into Scotland, studieng most cheeflie (during that time) how to preferue his people in peace and quietnesse. He departed this world one and twentie yeeres after the deceasse of his vncle Metellan, in the yeere of our Lord 54.

A little before his falling into the hands of the Romans, there were sundrie strange sights seene in Albion, as fighting of hoymen abroad in the fields, with great slaughter, as seemed on both parts: and forthwith the same so banished abroad, that no appearance of them could any where be perceiued. Also a sort of wolues in the night season set upon such as were keeping of cattell abroad in the fields, and caried aboie one of them to the woods, and in the morning suffered him to escape from amongst them againe. Moreover, at Carrike there was a child borne, perfect in all his lims sauing the head, which was like unto a rauens. These vnkethly signes and monstres put the people in no small feare: but after that Caratake was restored to his libertie & countrie, all was interpreted to the best.

After Caratakes decease, his yongest brother Corbreid was chosen to succede in his place, in the fiftie and eighth yeere after Christ, for his elder brother was departed at Rome through change of aire not agreeable to his nature. This Corbreid was a stout man of stomack, much resembling his brother Caratake. In the first beginning of his reigne, he did his induror to purge his dominion of such as troubled the quiet state thereof, by robbing and spoiling the husbandmen and other the meaner people of the countrie, of the which robbers there was no small number in those daies, speciallie in the westerne Isles, also in Kosses & Cathnes. In the meane time the Picts having created there a new king called Conkist, gouernour of Mers and Louthian, they set upon the Romans being about to make fortresses in those parties. And but that succours came in time from the next townes and castles adjoining, they had slaine all the whole number of them, & yet aided as they were, the maister of the campe, and eight other of the captains, with diuers officers of bands, besides common souldiours, lost their liues there.

Shortly after also, the same Picts overthrow a number of foragers, with such companies of hoymen as came to defend them. Here with Moxius being not a little moued, made readie his bands, and fiercelie incountred with the Picts, who defended themselves so vigozoulie, that the foze ward of the Romans was nere hand discomfited. Which danger Moxius perceiuing, speedilie came to relieue the same, but preasing too farre amongst his enemies, he was sore wounded, and in great danger to haue bene slaine. The night coming upon parted the fraie, not without huge slaughter on both parts. After this, the warre continued still betwixt them with often incursions and skirmishes. At the length the Picts with such other Britains as were come unto them out of the Isle of Man and other parties, incountred with the Romans in battell, and upon the first ioining, of purpose gaue backe, training some of the Romans to pursue them unto such places, where they had laid their ambushes, and so compassing them about, slue a great number of them, and chased the residue into the streits of the mounteins, where they were also surprised by such of the Picts as returned from the battell.

Moxius vnderstanding how the matter went, withdrew with the rest of his people to his campe, and shortly after sent a pursuant unto Rome, to informe the emperour in what state things stood in Britaine, by reason of this rebellion of the Picts, who neither by force nor gentle persuasions could be pacified. The emperour determining to prouide remedie therfore, sent word againe that he would not that the Picts should be estions received upon their submission, if they were giuen to make sute for pardon, but utterlie to be destroyed and exterminated. For the accomplishment whereof he appointed two legions of such men of warre, as sojourned in France to passe over into Britaine. But in the meane while Moxius departed this world, together of his hurts (as the Scottish chronicles make mention) or through sicknesse (as should rather seeme by Cornelius Tacitus) it fozeeth not. whole decaile Marcius Valens had the chiefest charge, who bying his armie forth to encounter the Picts that came to seeke battell, was fiercelie fought withall, notwithstanding the victorie had abidden on his side, if at the verie point there had not come succours to the Picts (that is to wit) 400 hostmen out of the countrie of Kendall, by whose fresh onset the Romans were discomfited and chased vnto their campe, there being slaine about 3000 of them at that overthrowe, and on the Picts side there wanted 2000 of their number at the least.

About the same time there arrived in Britaine another Romane captaine to be generall in place of Moxus now deceased, his name was Aulus Didius, with him came the two legions afore remembred. At his first comming ouer he mustered the old crewes of the Romane souldiers first, much blaming them for their negligence, in suffering the enimies so to increase vpon them, to the great danger of losing all that (through sloth and faintnesse of courage) which latelie before in Britaine had been wonne and conquered by high prowes and valiant conduct of his predecesours. In the end he exhorted them to put away all feare, and fullie to determine with themselves to recouer againe the hono^r which they had latelie lost, which he said would easilie be brought to passe, if they would take vnto them manfull stomaches, and obeie him and such other as had the gouernance and leading of them. The Picts being informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men, & prepared to come against them, they thought good to send vnto Corbzeid king of Scotland, to require his aid against the Romans, reputed as common enimies to all such as loued libertie, and hated to lue in seruile bondage. For which respect Corbzeid was the sooner moued to condescend vnto the request of the Picts; and therevnto assembling an armie entred into Galloway. Where of Aulus Didius being certified, sent an herald vnto him with all speed, commanding that he should depart out of those quarters, sith he had no right there, considering that Galloway was assigned vnto Caratake but for tearme of his owne life, by force of the emperours grant, and now by the death of the same Caratake was reuerfed againe vnto the empire.

The herald had vnto done his message, when word came vnto Corbzeid how an armie of the Romans vnder the guiding of Caesius Flavianus was entred into the marches of Galloway, to the great terro^r of all the inhabitants, doubting to be spoiled and robbed on eche hand. These newes put the herald in danger of his life, had not Corbzeid vpon regard to the law of armes licenced him to depart. The host which Corbzeid brought with him into Galloway, he bestowed in castels and fortresses abroad in the countrie for more safegard, but he himselfe rode in all hast vnto Eptake, to haue the aduise and aid of one Venerius that had married the forenamed Cartimandua that unkind stepmother of Caratake, as ye haue heard before. This Venerius was of consell with his wife Cartimandua in the betraying of king Caratake, and therefore was growne into much hatred of the people for that fact, but through support of the Romans he was for a time defended from all their malices. Notwithstanding in the end being wearied of the proud gouernment of the Romans, he reuolted from them vnto Corbzeid. Where with his wife being offended, found means to apprehend both him and his brethren with certeine of his kindred, and laied them fast in prison.

But now Corbzeid at his comming thither, did not onlie set them at libertie, but also toke & caused Cartimandua to be buried quicke. In the meane while a certeine number of Scots distressed a few foragers of the Romans, but following the chase somewhat rashlie, they were inclosed by the enimies and slaine. This mischance put the Scots in great feare, and the Romans in good successe, so that Flavianus was in purpose to haue assailed a certeine strong place, wherein a number of the Scottishmen were gotten, and had fortified the entrics, had not other newes altered his purpose, for hearing how another armie of the Scots was ioined with the Picts, and were approached within three miles of him, he brought his host forth into a plaine where he ordered his battels readie to receiue them. Whereof the Scottishmen hauing knowledge, hastied forth towards him, and were no longer come in sight of the Romans, but that with great violence they gaue the onset, most fiercelie beginning the battell, which continued till sun-setting with great slaughter on both sides; at what time the Romans were at the point to haue discomfited their enimies, had not those Scottishmen which were left in fortresses (as is said) abroad in the countrie, come at that selfe instant to the aid of their fellowes, by whose means the battell was renewed againe, which lasted till the mirke night parted them in sunder. The Romans withdrew to their campe, and the Scots and Picts got vp into the mountains.

Shortlie after a peace was concluded betwixt the parties, with these conditions; that the Romans should content themselves with that which they had in possession before the beginning of these last wars, and suffer Corbzeid to inioy all such countries as his brother Caratake held. And likewise the Picts paying their former tribut for the finding of such garisons of Romans as late at Camelon, they should be no further charged with anie other exactions. Moreover it was agreed, that neither the Scots nor Picts from thenceforth should receiue or succour anie rebels of Frenchmen or Britains, nor should aid by anie maner of means the inhabitants of the Ile of Man, who had done manie notable displeasures to the Romans during the last warres. This peace continued a six yeares during the life of Aulus Didius, who at the end of those six yeares, departed this life at London, leaving behind him all things in good quiet.

After his decaile the emperor Nero, who succeeded Claudius, appointed one Venerius to be lieutenant of Britaine, a man verie ambitious and much desirous of hono^r, by means whereof, in hope to aduance his name, he sought occasions to haue warres with the Scottishmen; and at length hearing that certeine of them being borderers had fetched booties out of Pictland, he did send a great power of Romans to make a rode into the next marches of the Scots, from whence they brought a great spoile, both of men and of goods. With which iniuries the Scots being moued, sought daile in semblable sort to be reuenged, so that by such means the warre was renewed. But before anie notable encounter chanced betwixt them, Venerius died. His last words were full of ambitious boasts, wishing to haue liued but two yeares longer, that he might haue subdued the whole Ile of Albion vnto the Romane empire, as if he might haue had so much time he doubted not to haue done.

Paulinus Suetonius succeeded in his place, a man of an excellent wit, and verie desirous of peace. He first confirmed the ancient league with Corbzeid king of Scotland: a recompense being made in euerie behalfe for all wrongs & iniuries done on euerie part. After this (as Hector Boetius hath gathered) he conquered the Ile of Man; but for so much as by probable reasons it is apparant inough, that it it was not Spain, but the Ile of Angleseic which the Britains name Môn, and at this time was subdued by Suetonius, we have here omitted to make report thereof, referring you to the place in the English chronicle, where we have spoken sufficientlie after what sort Suetonius both attempted & achieved this enterprise, which being brought to end, he was sent for into Gallia, to represse certeine tumults raised among the people there. In whose absence the Britains thinking to have a meet time for their purpose, moved a new rebellion. But by the relation of Cornelius Tacitus, this chanced whilst Suetonius was busie in requiring the Ile of Angleseic, as in the English chronicle it likewise appeareth, with the strange sights and wonders which happened about the same time, whereupon the Southsaiers (as Hector Boetius saith) declared that the Romans should receive a great overthrow. Upon trust of whose words the Picts and other Britains inhabiting Camelon and in the marches thereof, set upon such Romans as inhabited there, and slew a great manie of them per they were in doubt of a new rebellion. The residue which escaped, got them into an old church, where they were slaine ech others sonne.

Dutchmen arrive in Scotland.

Also Petilius Cerealis coming with a legion of footmen and a troope of horsemen to their succours, was incountried by the Picts, & being put to flight, lost all his footmen, hardlie escaping himselfe with his tents and returned towards Kent, where Catus the procurator, or receiver (as I may call him) of Britaine as then sojournd, who understanding how the whole Ile was on each side in an uprore, fled over into France then called Gallia. This meane while quene Moada sent unto hir brother Corbheid king of Scotland, requiring his aid against the Romans, who had so villie used hir and hir daughters, to the great dishonour of hir and all hir linage, and now was the time to be reuenged of such iniuries, the whole nation of the Britains through the covetous dealing of the procurator Catus, being risen in armes to recover their ancient liberties.

Corbheid being highlie displeased towards the Romans for the cuill intreating of his sister, determined either to see hir satisfied by worthie recompense, or else to be reuenged on them that had misused hir: and hereof gave signification unto Catus the procurator: that was as then returned into Britaine with a power of men of warre. Corbheid receiving but a scornfull answer from him, found means to ioin in league with Charanach king of the Picts, and gathering together a mightie armie of one & other, pursued the Romans and their associates, slaying downe a wonderfull number of them. He also burned and destroyed diuers townes, such as in keeping their allegiance to the Romans stood earnestlie to their defense, as Werwike and Carleill with others. About the same season there arrived in the frith a number of Dutch ships, fraught with people of Perherne or Posaunia, a region in Germanie situate betwixt Boheme and Hungarie. They were driven out of their owne countrie by the Romans, and assembling together under a famous capteine named Roderike, came down to the mouth of the Atherne, where making thiff for vessels, they took the seas to seek them some new habitations; and thus arriving in Scotland, were soonlie received of the Picts and Scots, so that they were reputed right valiant men, and glad to reuenge their owne iniuries against the Romans. Namelie with the Picts they were much esteemed, for that they came forth of the same countrie from whence their ancestors were descended.

Their huge bodies and mightie limbs did greatlie commend them in the sight of all men before whom they mustered, so that coming to the place where the kings of Scots and Picts were incamped with their people readie to march forth towards the enemies, they were highlie welcomed, and upon their offer received into companie, and appointed to go forth in that iourne, in aid of quene Moada against the Romans. With this Moada was assembled a mightie host of the Britains, amongst whom were five thousand women, wholie bent to reuenge the villainies done to their persons by the Romans, or to die in the paine. And for this purpose were they come well appointed with armour and weapons, to be the first that should give the onset. Moada hearing of hir brothers approach with the king of Picts and their armies, met them on the waie accompanied with a great number of the nobles of Britaine, and brought them to hir campe with great joy and triumph.

After taking advise how to behaue themselves in their enterprise, they thought it good to make hast to fight with the procurator Catus, per anie new power of men of warre might come to his aid forth of Gallia now called France. Whereupon marching towards him, they met together in the field, where betwixt them was striken a right fierce and cruell battell; but in the end the horsemen of the Romans part being put to flight, the footmen were beaten downe on each side; Catus himselfe being wounded, escaped verie hardlie by flight, and shortly after got him over into France. The Scots and Picts with other the Britains, having achieved this victorie, pursued their enemies from place to place, so that there died by the sword, what in the battell and elsewhere in the chase, tenentie thousand Romans and other strangers, which served amongst them; and of Scots, Picts, and other Britains, were slaine thirtie thousand.

The gouernour Suetonius being then in Gallia, hearing of this overthrow, & in what danger things stood in Britaine, by reason of the same, came over with two legions of souldiers, and ten thousand of other Brigants as aiders to those legions. Moada the quene understanding of his arrivall, assembled againe hir people, and sent vnto the Scots and Picts to come to hir aid: who together with the Posauians came with all speed vnto hir. When they were thus assembled, Britains, Scots, Picts, & Posauians on one part, and Romans with their aids on the other, they marched forth to incounter together with deliberat minds to trie the matter by dint of sword, being earnestlie exhorted thereto by their gouernours on either side. So that ioining puillance against puillance, they fought a right cruell battell, manie in the beginning being slaine and bozne downe on both sides. But in the end the victorie abode with the Romans, the Britains with other the Albans were chased out of the field. There were slaine of them at the point of foure score thousand persons, as Tacitus writeth. The more part of the Posauians, together with their capteine Roderike, were in that number. Moada the quene, doubting to come into the hands of hir enemies, slew hir selfe. Two of hir daughters were taken prisoners, and brought arm'd, even as they were found fighting in the battell, vnto Suetonius.

The eldest of them within a few moneths after was married vnto a noble Romane named Marius, who had desoured hir before time. He was also created king of Britaine by the emperours authoritie, that thereby the state of the countrie might be reduced vnto a better quiet. He vied to lie most an end in the parties of Kendale, and named a part thereof

Corb. Gald Galdur Wolfe ca Galdur a Scot Britani ther th

(where he passed the most part of his time altogether in hunting) Westmerland, after his owne name, though afterwards, when the Romans were expelled, a portion of the same adjoining next unto the Scots was called Cumberland. The Romans which escaped from the discomfiture, had that portion of Scotland assigned forth unto them to inhabit in, that lieth betwixt the rivers of Tyne and Speie, called even unto this day Harrey land.

Corbzeid being thus overthrown, and having his power greatly enfeebled thereby, passed the residue of his life in quietnesse. For the Romans being troubled with civill warres, medled neither with the Scots nor Brits, but onlie studied to keepe the south parts of Britaine in due obedience. Finally Corbzeid departed this world, after he had reigned 34 yeares, and was buried amongst his elders nere unto Dunstaffage, with manie obelisks set by about him.

Dardan. After Corbzeid succeeded one Dardan, which for his huge stature was afterward surnamed the great. He was lineally descended from Metellane, who was his great grandfather. The nobles and commons of the realme chose him to be their king, onlie for the good opinion they had conceived of him in his predecessors daies, by whome he was had in great estimation, and had achieved under him manie towtie enterprises, so that he was thought most meetest for the same, considering the sonnes of Corbzeid were not as yet come unto ripe yeares to intop the same. For the said Corbzeid had three sons in all, Corbzeid, Tulcane, and Breke. The eldest had bene brought up with Glada, quene of the Britains, whereby he had learned the maners and vices of the British nation, and thereupon was surnamed Gald; for so do the Scottishmen vse even unto this day to name anie of their owne countrymen that hath learned the courtesie and maners of strange countries.

But to returne to Dardan, in the beginning of his reigne he governed the estate by god indifferent iustice, but after he had continued therein by the space of two yeares, he began to fall into all kinds of vices, removing from offices such as were upright bearers of themselves in the same, and advancing to their places hybers and extortioners. The nobles he had in suspect, favouring onlie such as thorough flatterie were by him preferred. And where he was bounden beyond all the terms of honesty in fleshlie and sinfull lust, yet was his covetousnesse so great, that all was too little which he might lay hands upon. He also put to death divers honorable personages, such as he perceived to grudge at his doings. He likewise purposed to have made away the sonnes of his predecessor Corbzeid, but his traitorous practise being disclosed, the most part of the nobles and commons of the realme rebelled against him, and sending for Corbzeid Gald the eldest sonne of the former Corbzeid, remaining as then in the Ile of Man (where he should have bene murdered) they chose him to their king. And at length beating downe all such as made resistance, they got that cruell tyrant Dardan into their hands, & bringing him forth before the multitude, they caused his head to be openlie stricken off. This was the 81 yeare after the birth of our Saviour, being the first of the emperor Domitian, & the fourth compleat of his owne reigne over the Scottishmen.

Corbreid Gald. Corbzeid Gald being thus chosen (as I have said) to succeed in the government of Scotland after Dardan, is called by Cornelius Tacitus Gulgacus, a prince of comelie personage, and of right noble port. In the first beginning of his reigne he punished such as had bene furtherers of his predecessors misgouvernement, and afterwards he passed over into the Iwerne Isles, where he appeased certeine rebels, which went about to disquiet the state of the common-wealth there. From thence he sailed unto the Isles of Aetwis and Skite, and put to death certeine offenders that would not be obedient unto their governors and iudges. After this he returned by Holfce, and set a stay also in that countrey, touching certeine misdemeanors of the people there. To be short, he purged the whole realme of all such robbers, thieves, and other the like offenders against the quiet peace of his subiects, as were hugelie increased by the contentious rule of his predecessor Dardan, and hereunto he was mightilie aided by the Romans, who pursued such offenders most earnestlie, and brought in unto him no small number of them, euer as they caught them.

By this means was the state of the common-wealth brought into better quiet, and the peere next ensuing, being the third of Gald his reigne, he called a counsell at Dunstaffage, wherein he laboured much for the abrogating of the wicked lawes instituted by king Cluin, as before is partly specified: but he could not obtaine more, than that yore men from thenceforth should haue their iudges first unto themselves, without being abused from time to time indifferently by their landlords, as heretofore they had bene. Whilest he was thus busied about the establishing of holisome orders & statutes for the welth of his subiects, word was brought him that Petilius Cerealis a Romane capitaine, being sent from Cespasian the emperor to haue the government of Britaine, was landed with a puissant armie in the countrey, and minded hostile to invade the borders of his realme, as Annandale and Galloway.

With these newes Gald being somewhat astonished, thought good to understand the certentie of the enemies doings, before he made anie stirre for the leuening of his people, and therefore appointed certeine light horsemen to ride forth, and to bring certeine newes of that which they might heare or see: who at their returne declared that the enemies armie was abroad in the fields, upon the borders of Pictland, and had giuen the Picts already a great overthrow; and further, how they were turned westward on the left hand, in purpose to enter into Galloway. Gald being thus certified of the Romans approach towards his countrey, determined to giue them battle, before they entered into the inner parts of his realme, and therefore with all speed he assembled his people, to the number of fiftie thousand men, all such as were able to beare armor, being ready to repaire unto him in such present necessitie for defense of their countrey.

It hath bene reported, that as he marched forth towards his enemies, sundrie strange sights appeared by the way. An eagle was seene almost all a whole day, flying by and downe ouer the Scottish armie, euen as though she had laboured hir selfe wearie. Also an armed man was seene flying round about the armie, and suddenlie vanished away. There fell in like maner out of a darke cloud in the fields, through the which the armie should passe, diuerse kinds of birds that were spotted with blood. These monstrous sights troubled mens minds diuerslie, some construing the same to signifie gods successe, and some otherwise. Also the chiefest capitaines amongst the Scots were not all of one opinion, for some of them weeing the great force of the Romane armie, being the greatest that euer had bene brought into their countrey before that day, counsellled that they shuld in no wise be fought withall, but rather to suffer them to wearie themselves, till vittels and other prouision should faile them, and then

The Scots agree to fight with the Romans.

Other were of a contrarie mind, iudging it best (with the puillance of the whole realme was assembled) to giue battell, least by deferring time, the courage and great desire, which the people had to fight, should waie faint and decaye: so that all things considered, it was generallie in the end agreed vpon to giue battell, and so comming within sight of the enemies host, they made readie to encounter them. At the first the Scots were somewhat amazed with the great multitude of their aduersaries, but through the cherefull exhortations of their king, and other their captains, their stomachs began to reuiue, so that they boldlie set vpon the Romans, whereof ensued betwixt them a right fierce and cruell battell, hotober it in the end the victorie inclined to the Romans, and the Scots were chased out of the field. Gald himselfe was wounded in the face, yet escaped he out of the battell, but not without great danger in deed, by reason the Romans pursued most egerlie in the chase.

The Scots are discomfited.

The citie called Epiake is taken by the Romans.

There were slaine of the Scottishmen (as their chronicles report) about twelue thousand, and of the Romans about six thousand. This victorie being thus atchieued, the Romans got possession of Epiake with the greatest part of all Galloway, and passed the residue of that yeare without anie other notable exploit: but in the summer following, Petilius the Roman gouernor went about to subdue the rest of the countrie, the Scots oftentimes making diuerse skirmishes with him, but in no wise durst ioine with them, puillance against puillance, least they should haue put their countrie into further danger, if they had chanced estones to haue received the ouerthrow.

The Scots durst not fight any field with the Romans.

Touching all the doings of the Romans in Britaine ye shall find sufficientlie in the historie of England.

¶ Here haue we thought good to aduertise the reader, that although the Scottish writers impute all the trauels, which Petilius spent in subduing the Brigantes, and Frontinus in conquering the Silures, to be imploied chieflie against Scots & Picts: the opinion of the best learned is wholie contrarie thereto, affirming the same Brigantes & Silures not to be so far north by the distance of manie miles, as Hector Boetius and other his countrymen doe place them, which thing in the historie of England we haue also noted, where ye may read more of all the doings of the Romans here in Britaine, as in their writers we find the same recorded. But neuertheless we haue here followed the course of the Scottish historie, in manner as it is written by the Scots themselves, not binding anie man more in this place than in other to credit them further than by conference of authoꝝ it shall seeme to them expedient.

Modicia renewed wars with the Romans.

In the meane time then, whilst Petilius was occupied (as before ye haue hard) in the conquest of Galloway, Modicia the daughter of Aruiragus (whom in this treatise is partly touched) gathered together a ceto of souldiours within the Ile of Man, partie of the inhabitants, and partie of such Scottishmen of Galloway as were fled thither for succor: with these shee toke the seas, and landing in Galloway, vpon purpose to reuenge hir iniuries in times past received at the Romans hands, shee set vpon their tents in the night season, when they looked for nothing lesse than to be disquieted, by reason whereof they were brought into such disorder, that if Petilius had not caused such firebrands to be kindled as he had prepared and dressed with pitch, rosen and tallow, for the like purpose, the whole campe had bene in great danger: but these torches or firebrands gaue not onlie light to see where to make resistance, but also being cast in the faces of the enemies, flared their hardie forwardnesse, whereby the Romans hauing leasure to place themselves in arrate, defended the entries of their campe, till the day was sprung, and then giuing a full onset vpon their enemies, they put them quite to flight.

But Modicia not herewith discouraged, hasted with all speed vnto Epiake, and taking that citie shee set fire on it, and slue such Romans as shee found there, whereof Petilius being certified, sent forth a legion against hir to withstand hir attempts. Whose that had the charge of them that were thus sent, used such diligence, that laeing an ambush for hir in a place fit for that purpose, they so inclosed hir, that slaieng the most part of hir company, shee was taken prisoner hir selfe, and being brought alieue vnto Petilius, vpon hir stout answer made vnto him, as he questioned with hir about hir bold enterprises, shee was presentlie slaine by the souldiours.

Modicia is slaine.

Anon after Petilius was certified, that the inhabitants of the Ile of Wight, with other southerne Britains, had raised a commotion against king Aparius, so that without speedie succors they were like to driue him out of his kingdome: wherevpon he hasted thither with all conuenient speed, and subduing the rebels, set all things there in good order and fraie: and so remaining there till the next yeare after, he fell sicke of the flux and died. Immediatlie wherevpon the emperor sent one Julius Frontinus to succeed in his place. This Frontinus brought with him two legions of souldiours, and after he had taken order with king Aparius for the keeping of the Britains in due subiection of the empire, he purposed to bring such vnto obedience, as inhabited within and beyond the woods of Calidon, and as yet not vanquished by anie man.

Therefore entring first into Galloway, and visiting such garrisons of the Romans, as Petilius had left there for the keeping of that quarter, he commended their loialtie and diligence, in that they had looked so well to their charge, that the enemye had gained no aduantage at their hands, whilst the armie was occupied in the south parts about other affaires there. He also sent an herald vnto the king of the Picts with letters, requiring him to renew by confirmation the former league betwixt his people & the Romans, & not by any means to aid the Scots as before they had done to their great losse & hindrance. Herunto the king of Picts much suspecting the matter, made a direct answer, that he saw no cause why he should in fauor of the Romans suffer his confederats the Scots to be subdued, and brought to destruction without all reason or equitie: and therefore he was determined by the aduise of his peeres & counsellors, to aid the Scots against such as sought nothing but the meanes how to bring the whole Ile of Albion into thraldome and seruite bondage.

Frontinus purposeth to pursue the conquest of the Silures who the Scots mistake for Galloway men.

Frontinus requirith to come in amitie with the Picts. The Pictish king refuseth to be in league with the Romans.

Frontinus little regarding this vntowardlie answer, set forward to subdue such Scots as were yet disobedient. And so entring into the borders of Kile, Carrike, and Coningham, had diuers skirmishes with such as king Gald had assembled to defend his countrie, but so much as he was diseased with sickness, he was at length constrained to withdraue himselfe into Argile, leauing his power behind him to resist the enemies attempts: but shortly after his departure from amongst them, they were sought withall by the Romans, and discomfited, thre thousand of them being slaine in the field. By reason of which ouerthrowe those countries submitted themselves to the Romans, perceiuing no hope otherwise how to escape that present danger.

ter season, during the which, Frontinus fell sicke of superfluous abundance of flegme, which vexed him in such sort, that the emperor Domitian, who as then governed the Romane empire, sent for him home to Rome, and appointed a right valiant personage, one Julius Agricola to succeed as lieutenant of Britaine in his roome. About the time of whose arrivall there, the Scots of Annandale slue a great number of the Romans, with which successe they procured also to the Picts with the inhabitants of Galloway, Kile, Carrike, and Coningham to rebell.

These newes being reported unto Agricola, he made his provision with all speed to go against them, and first entring into the borders of Pictland, he reduced such as inhabited about the confines of Berwick to their former subiection, and after marching towards the citie of Camelon, Karanach king of the Picts encountered him by the waite, but being fiercely beaten off by the Romans, he fled backe into the citie, and within three daies after having reinforced his power, he estimes gave battell againe to his enimies; but then also being vanquished, he lost the most part of all his men, and so immediatlie thereupon was Camelon twine by force, & a great number of the citizens slaine.

Agricola caused it to be newlie fortified, and further through fame of this victorious beginning, he recovered the most part of all the castles and fortresses of Pictland. The forenamed Karanach escaping out of that present danger, got him beyond the waite of Forth, for the more suertie of his owne person. Agricola having sped thus in Pictland, marched forth against them of Annandale, who at the first making resistance for a time, at length were constrained to give backe, and so fled to their houses, where in the night following by their owne wives they were murdered each mothers sonne: for so the women of that nation used to put abroad the shame of their husbands, when they at any time had fled out of the field from their enimies.

Agricola understanding that by winning him fame in the beginning, it should be no small furtherance unto him for the atchieving of other enterprises in time to come, determined to pursue his good fortune, and thereupon prepared to subdue the Ile of Agan; but wanting vessels to convey his armie over, he found meanes that such as could swim, and knew the shallow places of that coast, made shift to passe the gulfes, and so got on land, to the great wonder and amazing of the inhabitants, who watched the sea coasts, to resist such ships as they looked for to have arrived upon their shore: but now despairing to resist such kind of warriors as endangered themselves to passe the seas in that manner of wise, they submitted themselves unto Agricola.

Who taking pledges of them, and appointing certeine garisons to keepe divers holds and places of defense within that Ile, passed over with the residue of his people into Galloway, where he sojourned all the winter following: which being passed, and summer once come, he assembled his men of warre againe, and visited a great part of that countrie with Kile, Carrike, and Coningham, the inhabitants whereof he put in such feare with the onelie show of his warlike armie, disposed in such politike order and wise conduct, that there was none to be found that durst advance themselves to encounter him, so that he spent that summers season in keeping such of the Scots as had bene aforesetime subdued, from attempting any commotion. And when winter was come, he assembled the nobles of the countrie, exhorting them by gentle persuasions, to frame themselves to a civill trade of living, as well in building of temples, houses, and other edifices after the Roman maner, as also in wearing of comelie and decent apparell; and about all things to set their children to schoole, to be brought up in eloquence and good nurture. By this meanes he thought to traine them from their accustomed fiercenesse, and to win them the sooner to be content with bondage, though he coloured it with neuer so faire a glofe of humanity.

The third winter being thus spent, and the next summer commen upon, Agricola invaded such countries as were yet undiscovered by the Romans, entering by the nether side of Calidon wood, even unto the dolorous mounteine, which afterwards by the Scots was cleped Sterling. It was called the dolorous mounteine, for that in the night season there was heard right lamentable noise & cries, as though the same had bene of some creatures that had bewailed their miserable cases: which undoubtedly was the craftie illusions of wicked spirits, to keep mens minds still oppressed in blind errors and superstitious fantasies.

Agricola considering the naturall strength of this mounteine, with the site of an old ruinous castell that stood thereon, he caused the same with all diligence to be repaired, and a bridge to be made over the Forth there, by the which he passed with his whole armie over into Fife: and the daie after, hearing that the king of the Picts was withdrawn into a castell thereby, standing upon an high mounteine cleped Benart, he environed the same with a strong siege, hoping his hoped prey was not as then within it, for Karanach king of the Picts, informed of the Romans approach, got him forth abroad into the fields, and assembling his power, purposed by night to have broken the bridge, which Agricola had made over the Forth at Sterling, but being repelled by such as were set there to defend the same, in his returne from thence he was encountered by Agricola himselfe, who being certified of this attempt of his enimies, had leaved his siege, and was coming towards them, so that both the hosts meeting together in the fields, there was fought a fore battell betwixt them, though in the end the Picts were discomfited, and their king the foresaid Karanach chased unto the river of Tay, where he got a bote, and escaped to the further side of that waite. By reason of this overthrow, Agricola brought in subiection those countries, which lie betwixt the waters of Forth and Tay, as Fife, Forthlike, and Ormedall, and sojourning there all the winter following, he built sundrie fortresses in places most convenient for the keeping of the inhabitants in their covenanted obedience, after his departure from amongst them.

In the meane while, the king of the Picts kept him at Dundee, whither resorted unto him a great number of the Pictish nobilitie, such as had escaped the Romans hands. These comforted their king in all that they might, willing him to be of good chere, and to hope well of the recouerie of his losses againe by some good fortune and meanes that might happen to come yee ought long, promising to the furtherance thereof all that in them laie, as well for counsell as aid of hand: and hereupon they took advise which waite to worke, inso much that at length it was by great deliberation thought good to seeke for succor at the hands of their ancient confederats the Scots, and so incontinentlie there were certeine messengers dispatched with all speed unto Gald the Scotish king, requiring him in that common jeopardie to joine in league with his ancient friends the Picts, against the ambitious and most cruell Romans, who sought nothing else but the utter subversion of the whole land of Albion, as manifestlie appeared by their proceedings, having already occupied and wrongfully fullie surprisid a great part not onlie of the Pictish kingdome, but also of the Scottish dominions, minding still to go foreward in such vnrighteous conquests, if by tuncle resistance they were not staied. Cald vpon this request and motion of the Picts gladiie consented to ioin his power with theirs, in common defense of both the realmes (against such common enimies as the Romans were esteemed) hauing herewith the assent of all his pères and chiefeest counsellors.

Thus whilst the kings of the Scots and Picts were concluding a league together for defense of themselves and their countries, certeine Scots entered into the confines of Isle, Carrilke, and Coningham, and wan diuers fortresses, wherein certeine garisons of Romane souldiers solourned, whome they slue downe right without all mercie, spoiling the whole countrie. Agricola hauing knowledge hereof, went streightwaies thither with a power, and pursuing them that had done those iniuries, some he took amongst the hilles and mounteines, whither they fled; and the residue he chased beyond the riuer of Clide, but the castell of Dunbretton he could not by any means obtaine, though he assaied to win it euen to the uttermost of his power. It was called in those daies Alcluth, that is to meane: All stone. The Scottishmen being thus driuen backe, Agricola repaired such castels and fortresses as they had ouerthrowne and beaten downe.

In the yeare following, being the first after the first comming of Agricola into Britaine, he caused his ships to be brought about frō the Ile of Wight into the water of Lochline in Argile, thereby to put his enimies in vtter despair of escaping his hands either by water or land: and therevpon passing ouer the riuer of Clide with his armie, and finding his naue there, he set vpon the countrie of Lennox, in purpose to subdue the same. But after he had made sundrie skirmishes with the inhabitants, he was certified by letters from the gouernor of Camelon, that the Picts were readie to rebell, by reason wherof he left off this enterpryse against the Scots, and drew backe into Pictland, leauing a part of his armie to keepe possession of the water of Clide, till his returne againe into those parties. At his comming into Pictland, he appeled the rebels with small adu, punishing the chiefe authors according to their demerits. This done, he returned vnto the water of Clide, lieng all that winter beyond the same, taking order for the gouernment of those parties, in due obedience of the Romane empire.

The summer following he appointed his naue to search alongst by the coast all the hauens and crēks of Argile, and of the Ilands nere to the same. Whilst he by land passing ouer the water of Lenine, went about to conquer towne and castels, though halfe discouraged at the first, by reason of the rough waies, streit passages, high mounteines, craggie rocks, thicke woods, deepe marishes, fens and moyses, with the great riuers which with his armie he must needs passe, if he minded to attaine his purpose: but the old souldiers being inured with paines and trauell, ouercame all these difficulties by the wise conduct of their worthie generall and other the capitains, and so inuading the countrie took towne and castels, of the which some they beat downe and rased, and some they fortified and stuffed with garisons of men of warre.

About the same time by commandement of king Cald, and other the gouernors of Scotland, all the able men of Cantire, Lozne, Murrep land, Lugenarth, also those of the westerne Isles, & of all other parties belonging to the Scottish dominions, were appointed to assemble and come together in Atholl, at a place not passing fīue miles distant from the castell of Calidon now cleped Dunkeld, there to abide the comming of Haranach king of the Picts, to the end that joining together in one armie, they might work some high exploit. But he hauing assembled fiftēne thousand of his men of war, as he marched alongst by the mountaine of Granzbene, in times past cleped Mons Crampius, there chanced a mutinie amongst his people, so that falling together by the eares, Haranach himselfe comming amongst them vnarmed as he was to part the frate, was slaine presently at vnwares, by one that knew not what he was. By reason of which mischance that iourne was broken, for the Picts being vtterlie amazed and discomforted herewith, staied and departed alunder.

Cald with his Scots now being thus disappointed of the Picts his chiefeest aid, durst not ieopard to trie the chance of battell with the enimies, but determined with light skirmishes, and by withdrawing of vittels out of their walke, to keep them from further proceeding in conquest of the countrie, & in the mean time to prouide against the next summer new aid and succors to keepe the field, and so to incounter with them, puissance against puissance, if they remained so long in the countrie. The Scots resting vpon this resolution, thought good to send some honorable ambassage vnto the Picts to moue them vnto mutuall agrēment & concord amongst themselves, whereby they might be able to resist the common ruine of their countrie as then in present danger to be oppressed by the Romans.

Those that were sent on this message, did so diligently behaue themselves, in bringing their purpose to passe, that the Picts in the end agreed to ioin in friendlie amitie one with another, and to chuse one Carnard to their king to succed in the throne of Haranach. They also confirmed the former league with the Scots, and by their procurement sent messengers vnto the Norwegians and Danes, requiring them of aid against the Romans the common enimies of all such nations as loued to liue in libertie, wherefoeuer the same were inhabiting in arie part on the whole face of the earth. There were also sent ambassadors vnto the Irishmen from the Scots for the same intent, and from both those places there was great aid promised, as frō them that esteemed themselves halfe bound by a naturall respect, to succor such as were descended of the same ancestors and countries that they were of, and now like to be expelled out of the seats which their forefathers had got possession in by iust title of conquest, and left the same vnto their posteritie to enioy for euer.

Whilst these things were thus in doing, Calus diuiding his armie into sundrie parts, did what was possible to resist all the attempts of the Romans. Who standing in doubt of his puissance, rather through fame thereof, than for anie apparant sight or other knowledge had, durst not put themselves in danger to enter into Calidon wood, of all that summer, and the winter following was so extream, by reason of frost, snow, and coldnesse of aire, that they were not able to enterpryse anie exploit on neither part: howbeit the summer was no sōner come (being the seauenth after the comming of Agricola into Britaine) but that they prepared to inuade one another againe with all their forces.

From the Iles of Ireland there came (according as was promised) a great power of men of warre, and ioined with an armie of Scottishmen in Atholl, being there already assembled in great numbers out of all the quarters of the Scottish dominions. Whither came also Carnard king of the Picts with his power. All which forces being thus assembled together by common agrēment amongst them, Cald king of the the Scots was chosen to be their generall, who hearing that Agricola with his host was entred into Balendar wood, diuided the whole armie into three battels, and so marched forth towards the enemies in purpose to incounter them. Agricola being of this aduertised by spies, parted his people also into three wards, doubting to be inclosed within some comberfome place by reason of the great multitude of his enemies, that were esteemed to be in number aboue 50000 of one and other.

Gald on the other side vnderstanding by spies this order of the Romans, in the dead of the night setteth upon one of those legions, which was lodged next vnto him, and finding means to sea the watch, was entred into the enemies lodgings, before they had any knowledge of his coming, so that the fight was right fierce & cruell even among the Romans tents and lodgings. But Agricola being certified of this enterprise of the Scots, sent forth with all speed a certeine number of light horsemen and footmen to assaile them on the backs, & so to keepe them occupied, till he might come with all the residue of his people to the rescue. They that were thus sent, accomplishing their enterprise according to the deuise in that behalfe appointed, gaue a right fierce & stout charge vpon the Scots and Picts, greatlie to the reliefe of those that were by them assailed, and withall soze amazed and disordered by reason of the enemies sudden inuasion.

By this means the fight continued right fierce and cruell on all sides, till at length the daie beginning to appeere, shewed to the Scots and Picts the plaine view of the whole Romane armie, appoaching vnder the conduct of Agricola, to the succour of his people, being thus in danger to be distressed. Wherevnto were the Scots and Picts put in such feare, that immediatlie they fell to running awaie towards the woods and bogs, the accustomed places of their refuge. This ouerthrow did so abash both the Scots and Picts, that they durst attempt no more the fortune of battell, till they had some aid out of Denmarke, but onelie did what they could to defend their towne and countrie, by making sundrie railes vpon their enemies, as occasion and oportunitie serued. But the Romans, supposing nothing to be hard for their vndaunted valiance, but that they were able to overcome whatsoeuer should stand at defiance against them, determined at length to find an end of the Ile of Albion, and so passing thorough Balendar wood, and ouer the riuer of Almond, they pitched their field nere to the riuer of Tait, not far from the castell named Calidon or Balendar.

The Picts, by reason that their enemies were lodged so nere to the confines of their countrie, doubting what might follow thereof, burned the citie of Tuline, least the same enemies chancing to take it, should furnish it with some garrison of men, to the great danger of the whole Pictish kingdome. This citie stood vpon the banke of Tait, right beautifullie built, with many faire castles and towres, as may appeere even vnto this daie by the old ruines thereof, strong rather by the workemans hands, than by nature. The Scottishmen in our time call the place Inchutahill. All their wiues and children they removed vnto the mounteins of Cranzbene for their more suertie and safegard.

About the same time the Romans were not a little disquieted, by reason of a mutinie which chanced amongst such Germans as were appointed to come ouer to Agricola, as a new supplie to furnish by such numbers as were decayed in his armie. These slaueng their captaine, and such other Romans as were appointed to haue the order of them for their training in warlike feats at the beginning, as the maner was, got certeine pinnelles which they happened vpon in the riuer of Thames, and sailing about the east and north coasts of this Ile, arrived in Tait water, offering themselves to the Scots and Picts to serue against the Romans, whose malice they dread for their offense committed if they should returne into their owne countries, which laie about the mouth of the Rhene, and was as then subiect to the Romane empire, the inhabitants in those daies being cleped Vespites, the which (as some suppose) inhabited Cleueland and Gullike.

Their offer was accepted most thankesfullie, and places appointed for them to inhabit amongst the Purraies, because they were descended as it were of one nation. Whilst these things were thus a doing, there came also the long wished aid from the Danes and Fozwegians, to the number of ten thousand men, vnder the leading of one Gildo. His Gildo with his nauie first arrived in the frith betwixt Fife and Louthian, but for that the Romans kept him off from landing there, he cast about and came into the riuer of Tait, where he landed all his people, for provision whereof he had good store both of vittels and armour. Garnard king of the Picts hearing of their arriual there, forthwith vpon the newes departed from Dundee, accompanied with a great number of his nobles, and coming to the place where Gildo with his armie was lodged, receiued him in most ioyfull wise, feasted and banqueted him and his people, and shewed them all the tokens of most hartie loue and friendship that could be deuised. Gildo himselfe was led by the king vnto Dundee, and lodged with him there in the castell, his people were provided for abroad in the countrie in places most for their ease, to refresh themselves the better after their painefull iourne by the seas.

Shortlie after there came vnto Dundee the Scottish king Gald, who for his part did all the honour that in him lay vnto Gildo, shewing himselfe most ioyfull and glad of his coming, yielding vnto him and his people such thanks and congratulations as serued best to the purpose, and receiued no lesse at his and their hands againe. After they had remained thus certeine daies together at Dundee, both the kings Gald & Garnard, together with this Gildo, went vnto the castell of Fozfare, there to consult with their capteins and gouernours of their men of warre, how to mainteine themselves in their enterprise against the enimie. At length they resolved not to go forth into the field till the winter season were past, for doubt of the inconuenience that might insue, by reason of the extreme cold intemperance of the aire, whereunto that countrie is greatlie subiect.

In the meane time they toke order for the furniture of all things necessarie for the wars, to haue the same in a perfect readines against the next spring, and till then they did appoint onelie to keepe frontier warre, that the Romans should not strae abroad to fetch in vittels and other prouisions to their owne gains, and to the vndoing of the poore inhabitants. Vpon this determination when the counsell was broken by, Gald withdrew into Atholl, to defend those parties; and Garnard with the Danish general Gildo, furnished all the castles and holds in Angus ouer against the riuer of Tait, to stop the passages of the same, that the enemies should enter no further on that side. Thus passed the winter for that peace, without any great exploit on either part achieved.

In the beginning of the next summer, Agricola appointed his nauie of ships to saile about the coasts of the furthest parts of Albion, making diligent search of euerie crake & haueu alongst by the same. The mariners, executing his commandement, sailed failed round about the north coast, discovering manie of the westerne Isles, and likewise those of Orkney, till at length they found out Orkney firth, being a streit of the sea of thientie miles in breadth, which separateth the Isles of Orkney from the point of Cathness, passing with so swift a course, that without an expert pilot the ships that shall passe the same are oftentimes in great danger, by reason of the contrarie course of the tides. The Romane mariners therefore, finding certeine husbandmen in the next Isles, constrained them to go a shipboard, & to guide them through that streit, promising them high rewards for their labour; but they upon a malicious intent not passing for their owne lues, so they might be reuenged of their enemies in casting away such a notable number of them together with their vessels, entred the streit at such an inconuenient time, that the ships were bozne with violence of the streame against the rocks and shelues, in such wise that a number of the same were drowned and lost without recouerie.

The Romane ships through want of pilots are lost in Orkney firth.

Agricola making a bridge ouer Tay water, passeth by the same with his host, and incampeth nere to the foot of the mountaine of Grangbene.

Some of them that were not over-hastie to follow the first, seeing the present losse of their fellows, returned by the same way they came vnto Agricola, who in this meane time had caused a bridge to be made ouer the riuer of Tay, by the which he passed with his whole armie, and incamped on the further side thereof nere to the roots of the mountaine of Grangbene, leauing the bridge garnished with a competent number of souldiers to defend it against the enemies. The Picts being not a little troubled herewith, dispatched forth a messenger with all hast vnto Gald the Scottish king, signifieng vnto him the whole matter, and therupon required of him aid.

Gald hauing mustered his people aswell Scottish as Irish, assembled them together to the number of forty thousand persons, what of one and other, and incontinentlie with all speed marcheth forth to come vnto the aid of the Picts, and so within a few daies passing ouer the mountaine of Grangbene, he arriveth in a ballie beyond the same mountaine, where he findeth the Picts, Danes, and Norwegians incamped together not far off from the host of the Romans. Here taking aduise together, & in the end determining to giue battell, king Gald (vnto whom as before is exprest, the gouernance of the whole was committed) assembling together all the number of the confederats, made vnto them a long and pithie oration, exhorting them in defense of libertie (the most precious icwell that man might inioy) to shew their manlie stomachs against them that sought onelie to depriue them of that so great a benefit. And sith they were giuen to the bittermost bounds of their countrie, he perswaded them to make vertue of necessitie, and rather chuse to die with honoz, than to liue in perpetuall shame & ignominy, which most needs insue to their whole nation, if they suffered themselves to be vanquished in that instant. With these words, or other much what of the semblable effect, Gald so moued the hearts of his people, that they desired nothing but to ioine with their enemies, & to trie it by dint of sword, which they vniuersallie signified according to their accustomed vse with a great noise, shout, and clamor.

On the other part Agricola, though he perceiued a great desire amongst his souldiers to fight, yet he was not negligent on his owne behalfe to incourage them with most cherefull words and countenance; so that both the armies being thus bent to haue battell, the generals on both parties began to set them in arate. Agricola to the end his armie being the lesser number should not be assailed both a front and on the sides, prouided (by disposing them in a certeine order) a remedie against that disaduan-tage. On the other side, king Gald by reason of the aduantage which he had in his great multitude and number, ordered his battels thereafter with a long and large front, placing the same vpon the higher ground, of purpose to compasse in the enemies on eich side. At the first approach of the one armie towards the other, the battell was begun right fiercelie with shot of arrows and hurling of darts, which being once past, they ioined together to trie the matter by hand-strokes, wherein the Scots & Picts had one disaduantage, for those that were archers, or (as I may call them) kerns, comming once to fight at hand-blows, had nothing but broad swords and certeine sozie light bucklers to defend themselves with, such as serue to better purpose for men to ride with abroad at home, than to be carried forth into the warres, though the same haue bene so vied among the Scottishmen, euen till these our daies.

Gald by reason of his multitude, thinketh to inclose his enemies.

The armies approach together to fight, they ioine.

The Scottish mens disaduantage, by reason of their vnfit weapons.

The Romans therefore being well appointed with armor and broad targets, shue downe right a great number of these Scots and Picts thus slenderlie furnished, without receiuing anie great damage againe at their hands, till king Gald appointed his spearmen to step forth before those archers & kerns, to succor them, and therewith also the bilmen came forward, and stroke on so freshlie, that the Romans were beaten downe on heaps, in such wise that they were nere at point to haue bene discomfited, had not a band of Germans (which serued amongst the Romans) rushed forth with great violence vpon the Scottishmen, where most danger appeared, and so restored againe the fainting stomachs of the Romans, whereby the battell renewed on both sides againe right fierce and cruell, that great ruth it was to behold that bloodie fight, and most vnnmercifull murder betwixt them, which continued with more violence on the Scottish side than anie warlike skill, till finally the night comming on, toke the daies light from them both, and so parted the fraie. The Romans withdrew to their campe: and the Scots and Picts with their confederats the Danes, Norwegians, and Irishmen, such as were left alieue, got them into the next mounteins, hauing lost in this cruell conflict the most part of their whole numbers.

A cohort of Germans restored the Romans where most danger appeared, nere at point to haue had the worse.

The night serueth the armies in further & parteth the fray.

The Romans withdrew to their campe, & the Scots to the mounteins.

Cornelius Tacitus agreeth not in all points with the Scottish chronicles, in a booke which he wrote of the life of Julius Agricola, where he treateth of this battell. For he speaketh but of thirtie thousand men (which he comprehendeth vnder the generall name of Britains) to be assembled at that time against the Romans, making no mention of anie Scots, Picts, Irishmen, Norwegians, or Danes, that should be there in their aid. The number of them that were slaine on the Britains side (as the same Tacitus recounteth) amounted to about thousand men, and of the Romans not passing three hundred and forty. Amongst whom was one Aulus Atticus, a capteine of one of the cohorts. But as the Scottish writers affirme, there died that day of Scots, Picts, and other their confederats at the point of twentie thousand, and of the Romans and such as serued on their side, as good as twelue thousand. Moreover, the night following, when Galdus with the residue of his people which were left alieue was withdrawne to the mounteins, and that the huge losse was vnderstood by the wnes and kinsmen of the dead, there began a pitifull noise among them, lamenting and bewailing their miserable case and losses.

See more hereof in the historie of England.

The number of them that were slaine at this battell.

But Gald, doubting least the same should come to the eares of some espials, that might lurke nere to the place where he was withdrawne, caused an huge shout and noise to be raised by his people, as though it had bene in token of some reioysing, till the women bewaile their friends.

the women bewailing thus the deoth of their friends, might be remoued out of the way. This done, they fell to take counsell what was best to do in this case: and in the end all things considered, it was determined that somewhat before the dawning of the next morrow, euerie man should dislodge and withdraue himselfe into such a place as he thought most meet for his safegard, saue onelie such as were appointed to attend Cald and Garnard into Atholl, whither they minded with all speed to go.

Thus leauing a great number of siers to dissimble their departure, they dislodged and made awaie with all speed possible. In the morning when their departure was once discovered, a great number of the Romans followed as it had bene in the chase, but some of them vnadvisedly aduentering to farre forward, were inclosed by their enemies and slaine. Those that wrougth this feat got them to the next hills and so escaped. At length, when all the fields and countries adioining were discouered, and the same appearing to be quite deliuered of all the ambushments of the enemies, Agricola caused the spoile to be gathered, and after marched forth vnto Angus, where (so lonmuch as summer was past) he appointed to winter, and so comming thither and subduing the countrie, he took pledges of the best amongst the inhabitants, and lodged his people about him in places most conuenient.

The Romans in pursuing vnadvisedly are distressed.

Agricola subdueth Angus and wintereth there.

About the same time Agricola heard netues from his nauie (as then riding at anchor in Argile) what mishap had chanced to the same in Bialand frith. But herewith being not greatlie discouraged, he gave order that the ships that had escaped, should be new rigged and furnished with all necessarie provision, and manned thoroughlie, both with able mariners and men of war. This done, he appointed them effronies to attempt fortune, and to take their course againe to come round about by the Orkenies, and so by alongst by the east coast: which enterprise they luckilie accomplished, and in the water of Traie they burnt the Danish fleet lieng there in harbrough.

Agricola is certified at the mischance of his nauie.

¶ Here is to be noted, that before the fore-reinembred ouerthrow of the Scots and their confederats at the foot of Grangbene, there happened manie sundrie britheth and strange sights in this Ile. Amongst other there appeared sheng in the aire certeine fire bissions, much to be wondered at. Also a great peere of Balenbar wood seemed in the night time as it had bene on a flaming fire, but in the morning there appeared no such token. There was in like maner sene in the aire the similitude of certeine ships. And in Angus it rained frogs. At Tuline there was a child borne hauing both shapen, so fittie a sight to behold, that forthwith they rid it out of the way for offending others eies. These prodigious things were diuorlie interpreted, according to the variable fantasie of man.

After that the prosperous successe of Agricola was once notified to the emperor Domitian, he took such enuie thereat, that shortly after, vnder a colour to send him into Syria to be lieutenant there, he countermanded him home vnto Rome, appointing one Cneus Trebellianus to succeed him in the gouernment of Britaine, but the armie bearing more fauour vnto one Trebellianus being couline to Agricola, caused no small trouble amongst the souldiours, so that in the end after certeine bickerings betwixt them, Trebellianus took a sort of the best souldiours away with him, and went ouer with them into France.

Domitian the emperor enuie the prosperous success of Agricola. Agricola is sent for to Rome, one Cneus Trebellianus appointed in his place which caused the souldiours to make a mutinie.

The Scots upon occasion of discord amongst the Romans, come forth against them.

The Scots taking occasion hereof, joined with the Picts, and entred into Angus. Whereof Cneus Trebellianus being informed, assembled his people, who perceiuing no great forwardnesse in their leader, created Caius Sisinnius (brother to the forenamed Trebellianus) their capteine, but he would in no wise meddle with that charge, though they were verie earnest in him with him to take it vpon him.

In the meane time came the enemies vnder the leading of Cald ready to giue the onset, wherewith the Romans being sore troubled, by reason of this discord amongst themselves, set forward yet right valiantlie, to giue battell to their enemies: howbeit in the end, because that Sisinnius receiued a mortall wound, and so departed out of the field, they fell at length to running awaie, the Scots and Picts following in the chase right fiercelie.

The Scots set vpon the Romans.

The Romans are distressed.

This atchued victorie, after so manie vnluckie enterprises, highlie reioiced the appalled parts of the Albions, hauing bene continuallie in maner now for the space of fiftie yeeres through aduersie fortune grieuoudie oppressed by the Romans, who being not a little discouraged by this ouerthrow, withdrew themselves wholie vnto Tuline, and shortly after for their more safegard, they got them ouer the riuer of Tay, breaking the bridge which they had made there, to the end that by the same the Scots & Picts should haue no passage in that place. But Cald hauing got this notable victorie with the spoile of the Romans campe, thought it best with the aduise of his nobles, to pursue the Romans without delate, not suffering them to haue time to provide for resistance. And hereupon comming to the castell of Calidon other- wise Balenbar, they got ouer the riuer of Tay, by a bridge of wood laid ouer the same riuer, which in that place is but narrow, by reason of the rocks & cliffes forcing the banks on either side to a streitnesse.

The Romans withdrew vnto Tuline. They retire becke ouer the water of Tay and breake the bridge after them.

The Scots get ouer the water of Tay nere to Calidon castell. The Scots effronies giue battell to the Romans.

The Romans are againe discomfited.

The Romanes captiues also not ignorant of the passage of the enemies, brought forth their armie, and made themselves ready to encounter them, but for that the forenamed Caius Sisinnius was not able to stirre by reason of his wounds receiued in the last battell, they chose one Titus Celsus, a valiant gentleman of Rome to be their leader, and so vnder his conduct setting vpon their enemies they fought right fiercelie for a time, but yet in the end they were put to flight, & chased into Calidon. There were slaine of the Romanes part in this encounter to the number of foue thousand, and of the Scots and other the confederats two thousand. After this victorie thus obtained by the Scots, a great number of the Britains renolted from the Romanes obedience, as those that inhabit the countrie which we now call Wales, with the marches, slaug & chaling awaie such Romans as lay abroad in those parties.

The Britains hearing of the euill aduentures fallen to the Romans, renolt to their obedience.

This done, they sent vnto Cald king of the Scots, certeine messengers with rich iewels and gifts, in token of their reioicing and gladnes for his victories, promising him furthermore such aid as they were able to make against the Romans the common enemies of all the whole Albion nation. Moreover, in this meane while did the Romans within Calidon castell direct their messengers with letters vnto Marius king of the Britains, signifying vnto him the present danger wherein things stood in those parties by the cruell rage of the Scottishmen and Picts, whom fortune had advanced with the gaine of two foughten fields, inso much that if timely succours were not the soner sent, the losse would be irrecoverable. Wherevnto Marius answered, that as then a common conspiracie appeared to be in hand amongst his subiects, so far forth that he doubted greatlie the suertie of his owne estate; and as for hope of aid to be sent from Rome, he saw small likelihood; considering the slender provision there through the misgouernement of cruell Domitian, who by reason of the hatred which the people bare him, regarded nothing but how to keepe them from rising rising vp in armour against him, and therefore he thought it necessarie that leauing the north parts to the enemies, they should all withdraw towards him into the south parts, to keepe yet the more fruitfull position of the Ile in due obedience, with their puissance might not suffice to retaine & rule the whole.

These newes greatlie abashed the Romane armie, & so much the more, for that about the same time it was shewed them how king Gald with an huge armie of Scottishmen and Picts, was come within ten miles of them. Whereupon the Romans not knowing at that instant what was best for them to do, in the end they concluded to withdraw into Cantire, where being arrived, and perceiuing themselves as yet to be in no great surtie there, they went awaie from thence with speed into Galloway. In the meane time king Gald, supposing it best expedientes to fight with them yet they might haue anie space to reinforce their power, followed them with all diligence, not forcing though he left behind him diuerse castles and fortresses furnished with sundrie garrisons of his enemies, so that he might discomfit and chase away their maine power, which he thought might as then easilie be done, considering the great multitudes of people which came flocking in on each side, presenting themselves with offering their seruice vnto him, and shewing furthermore great tokens of ioy and gladnesse, for that it had pleased the gods at length yet to declare themselves fauourable in this their relieving of the oppressed Britains. Herevnto Galdus on the other side, giuing them heartie thanks for their tranell, receiued them verie gentlie, mixing his talke with most comfortable words, therewith to put them in hope of such good and prosperous successe, as that hostile they should thereby be restored interlie vnto their former liberties, and perpetuallie deliuered from all forren seruitude and bondage.

But to proceed, at length he did so much by his tourneys, that he came into Galloway, where the Romans with all speed (seeing none other remedie) resolved themselves to giue him battell, and thereupon exhorting one another to plaie the men, with their onclie refuge rested in their weapons points, they fiercelie gaue the onset, and at the first put the left wing of the Scots and Picts whole vnto the world. In which wing, according to their maner in those daies used, there were a great number of women mingled amongst the men. Gald therefore perceiuing the danger, succoured them with such as were appointed to giue the looking on till need required, and then to go where they should be commanded. By which means the battell on that side was renewed afresh, the women shewing no lesse valiance than the men, and therewith much more cruel- tie, for they spared none at all, though they offered neuer so much to haue their liues preserved.

In fine, the Romans being chased in the left wing, their overthrow gaue occasion to all the residue to flee backe to their campe, being pursued so eagerly by the Scots and Picts, that they had much adoe to defend the entries of their trenches, where both parties fought right eagerly, till at length the night parted them both in sunder. Being parted, the Scots gaue not themselves to rest, but provided them of all things necessarie against the next morning to assaile their enemies afresh, and namely from the next wood they fetched great plentie of fagots and brush to fill the trenches withall. But this their deuice and purpose being vnderstood of the Romans, they required a communication, the which (though some perswaded Galdus to the contrarie) vpon depe considerations of fortunes fraile fauor, was at length granted vnto them, and foure an- cient Romans clad in right honorable and verie rich apparell came forth and were admitted to the presence of the kings [Gald of the Scots, and Gernard of the Picts] vnto whom with humble submission they acknowledged themselves as vanquished, and that by the iust wrath and reuenge of the equall gods, which against them they had conceived for the wrongfull inuasion of that which in no wise of right appertained vnto them. Therefore if it might please those kings to hyde and restraine their displeasure against them, in licencing them vnder some reasonable conditions of appointment to depart, it should be a thing resounding so much to their fame and glorie, as nothing could be more; considering so humble sute made to them by the oratores of those people, who were reputed as vanquishers of the whole world.

Herewith falling prostrate at the feet of those kings, they besought them of pardon, in such pittifull wise, that the hearts of the hearers began somewhat to mollifie, and at length Gald took vpon him to answer in name of all the residue of the Scottish and Pictish nations, and in the end concluded, that they were contented to grant a peace on these conditions: That the Romans should cease from that day forthward in anie wise to molest or disquiet by way of anie inuasion the Scottish and Pictish borders, and also to depart wholelie out of those countries, restoring all such holds and fortresses as they held within the same: and further, to deliuer all prisoners, pledges, and fugitiues whatsoeuer as then remaining in their hands, together with such goods & spoiles as they had latelie taken.

These conditions being certified to the Romans by their oratores, were gladlie accepted, with they saw no better meane how to deliuer themselves out of that present danger. And so deliuering sufficient hostages for performance of all the articles of agreement, they departed without protracting time, marching southwards to come into Kent, where Agricola king of the south Britains sojourned as then. Agricola, as the Scottish chronicles report, left at his departure towards Rome, to the number of threescore thousand men in the Romane armie, what of one and other, but now at their departure out of Galloway, there remained bineth twentie thousand, the residue being dispatched by one meane or other. By this conclusion of peace then, the Scots and Picts got againe the whole possession of all such countries as the Romans had before wonne and taken away from them, as the Pers, Louthian, the marches about Berwick, Fife, and Angus, with Aile, Cantire, Coningham, and Galloway: all the Romane garrisons departing out of the fortresses and holds, and leauing the same vnto the former owners.

Galdus having thus ended the warres with the Romans, took order to set good directions amongst his people for the quiet and peaceable gouernement of the commonwealth, visiting daile the countries abroad, the better to vnderstand the state of them, and to reforme the same where it was needfull. Further considering that as warre breedeth god senders, so peace by iustice riddeeth them out of the way, if they be not the better provided for. Such as had serued long time in the last wars, and had not anie trade now in time of peace thereby to get their liuing, he placed in garrisons nere to the borders of the Britains for defense of the countrie. After this, he came to an interieue with Gernard king of the Picts at Calidon, or Balendar, to repress certain troubles raised betwixt their subjects being borderers, concerning the limits of their countrie: where perceiuing a sort of euill disposed persons to be he whollie in the fault, vpon a naughtie intent to steale, and trouble the peace, which they had with such trauell and labour fought to restore, they punished the offenders, and set all things in god quiet, and so departed in funder with great loue and friendship.

Thus Calbus applying all his studie and diligence to aduance the common-wealth and quiet state of his countrie, liued manie yeeres so highlie in the fauour of all his subiects, that the like hath bene but selbome heard of: finallye, to their great griefe and displeasure he ended his life, more deere to them than their owne at Epistake, in the 35 yere of his reigne, which was about the 15 yere of the empire of Adrian, the 4098 yere after the woorlds creation, and from the birth of our Saviour 131, and was buried with great lamentation in most pompous maner, and laid in a goodlie tome which was raised with mightie huge stones, hauing a great number of obelisks set vp round about it according to the maner. Furthermore, to the end his memorie should euer endure, the countrie where he fought last with the Romans was called Caldia, after his name, which by addition of a few letters is now called Calloway, and before that time Brigantia, as the Scots do hold: but how that seemeth to agree with a truth, ye may read in the historie of England.

After this famous prince was thus departed hence, his sonne Lughthake succeeded in rule of the Scottish kingdome, no lesse abhorred of all men for his detestable and filthy vices, ioined with all kind of crueltie and couetousnesse, than his father was beloued for his noble and excellent vertues. This Lughthake went so farre past the bounds of all continencie in following his sensuall lusts, that he forced and rauished not onlie aunt, nece, and sister, but euen his owne daughters also. Such as were honozable personages, and met to gouerne in the common-wealth he nothing regarded, but committed the administration of things vnto vile persons, and such as could best deuise how to inuent quarels against the rich, whereby they might be sliced of all that fouer they had: and oftentimes vpon some forged cause cruellie put to death. So little did he pouldre to see offenders in anie wise corrected, that contrarie he maintained them in such sort therein, that iustice was quite banished, and nothing but spoile and rauine exercised.

Thus he continued about two yeres, to the great ruine of the common-wealth. Finallye, when he went about to put vnto death such as in an assemble called at Dunstaffage spake against his misordered gouernement of the realme, he was there murdered amongst the people, with a number of those also whome he used to haue attendant on his person for safegard of the same. His owne bodie was solemnlie buried by appointment of the nobles, hauing respect to his fathers benefits, but the carcases of his gard were cast out into the fields, there to be deuoured of beastes and birds of rauen.

After Lughthake was thus dispatched, one Pogall the nephew of Calbus by his daughter was admitted king in his place. His cheffest studie was to reforme the decayed state of his countrie, and first he caused such wicked counsellors of his predecessors and vncle Lughthake, as had escaped with life (when their maister was made a slave) to be put to death, according to their iust desertings. He restored also the due worshipping of the gods, in part as then neglected, by the wicked counsell of their former rulers. The Scottishmen in like maner conceiuing an assured hope of a good redresse in all their griefes and oppressions, by the means of such a well disposed prince, began to beare him incredible loue and fauor; euen the like as they had done his grandfather Calbus. In the meane time came certeine ambassadozs from the Picts, vnto this Pogall, requirring him of aid against the Romans and Britains, who by a sudden inuasion had done much hurt in Pictland, to the great distresse of the inhabitants.

At the same time they of Calloway certified him also by letters, that the same Romans had made a rode into their countrie, and led a waie a great botie of gods and prisoners. Pogall hauing a mind no lesse giuen to deeds of chualrie, than to the studie of ciuill gouernment and religious deuotion, reioiced that he had iust occasion giuen him to shew some pfoofe of his valiant inclination, and so herevpon sent an herald at armes vnto the Romans, requirring to haue restitution and amends for the iniuries thus by them committed. The herald doing his message, received nothing but scornfull wordes, and disdainfull menaces, whereby Pogall being thoroughlie kindled with despise, assembled his power togither south of all the parties of his dominions, and coming with the same into Calloway, visited his grandfathers sepulchre, honoring it with great reuerence and solemne supplications, requiring as it were his aid against those enemies, which had violated the league made betwixt him and them, by solemne oths and other accustomed meanes of ratification. This done, he drew into Annandale, where Unipannus as then king of the Picts abode his coming. There ioining their powers togither, they marched south into Cumberland, and so forward into Westmerland, with fire and sword wasting and spoiling those countries, as then belonging to the Romans.

Lucius Antenus the Romane lieutenant, lieng at the same time at Poake, being certified hereof by such as fled for feare out of those parties thus inuaded by the Scots, gathered a mightie armie out of all the countries of Britaine, and halled south with the same towards his enemies; of whose approach Pogall hauing notice, he made a long oration vnto his people to incourage them to fight manfullye against the Romans, perswading them effectuallye thereto by manie familiar examples brought in of the valiant enterprises atchieued by their elders, in the defense of their countrie and libertie of the same. In like maner Lucius Antenus for his part exhorted the Romans, and other his souldiers, to call to remembrance the victorious exploits of their predecessors, and how that as then they should fight but with a rude and barbarous people, running to battell more vpon a furious rage and violent madnes, than with any discretion or aduised order, saleng furthermore, that it laie now in their hands with no great adoe to recouer that which through the negligent sloth of Cneus Trebellius was before lost, whereby they should attaine great honoz and famous renoume for euermore.

By this meanes the armies on both sides being kindled with desire of battell, in hope of victorie, they drew nere togither, and began the fight right fiercely at the first, with throwing and shooting of bars and arrowes so thicke that one might vnneth see another. The place was more for the aduantage of the Scots than of the Romans, because they were compelled to fight as it were by companies and parties, by reason of bogs and marishes, with such sloeing banks on the sides that they could keepe none arate: yet all these impediments notwithstanding, this battell was fought so far forth to the bitterance, that in the end, after a wonderfull slaughter on both sides made, when their swords and other weapons were spent, they buckled togither with short daggers.

Finallie the violent charge of the Scots & Picts was such, that the Romans were constrained to retire, which their generall Antennus perceiuing, did what he could to staie them, and to bring them forward againe, but as he was most busie in the forefront to exhort them herunto, he was wounded with an arrow, and thereupon departed out of the battell, which gaue occasion to diuers other of his com-panie to follow him, by meanes whereof all the re-stidue fell to running awaie, and made toward the next wood, there to saue themselves as well as they might, though some companies perceiuing that they could not reach thither without manifest danger, closed themselves together and departed by another waie, which they toke at aduenture, not knowing towards what parts they drewe, so that they laie all the night following within two miles of the Scots and Picts, who for that the daie was in manner spent (before the Romans were put to flight) incamped themselves in the selfe-same place where the battell was fought, and in the morning, hearing that part of their enemies were lodged so nere them, & knew not which waie to drave, they sent a number forth of their campe to fight with them, & to kill them if they resisted, or to bring them captiue to the king if they should seeme willing to yeld. Those that were thus sent, found the Romans in verie good order of battell for so small a band, not minding to yeld themselves as prisoners. By reason of which their obstinate wilfulness, they were slaine in the end euerie mothersonne.

Lucius Antennus hauing thus receiued the overthrow, dispatched a post into Rome with all hast, signifying vnto the emperor Adrian the whole maner of the discomfiture, and how that by reason ther-of things stood in great danger here in Brittain, if speedie succours were not the sooner sent, for the enimies were neuer more cruell and fierce, than at this present, not onelie the men, but also the women (as in the last battell he saw plaine proofe) who cared not for the losse of their owne liues, so that they might die reneged.

When Adrian vnderstood these newes, he purposed forthwith to go himselfe into Brittain. Causing therefore an armie to be leuied, he passed forth with the same into France, then called Gallia, and com-ming to Calice, he transported ouer into Brittain, where he learned how the Scots and Picts were neuer more busie than at this present, hauing of late wasted and spoiled the countrie euen to the river of Tyne. Wherewith Adrian being sore offended, joined the power which he had brought with him fro Rome, with the other which he had caused to be raised in France and Brittain. This done, he remoued to York, where solonging certeine daies to refresh his people, he afterwards drewe toward the borders, and coming to the river of Tyne, he passed ouer the same.

The fourth daie after, he came into a countrie wherein was left no kind of earthlie thing seruuing to mans vse, and so passing forward a daie or two, he found neither corne, nor other prouision of vittell, nor any kind of liuing creature, all the people being fled into the mounteins and marish grounds, where no man might come vnto them, as commonlie in case of extreme danger they were accustomed to lie abroad in the same without house or any couerture ouer their heads. Whobest, for all that he gaue not ouer to pursue them, but finding them out where they lurked in the hilles and woods, he graueouslie assailed them, and that in sundrie manner. In the end espiesing the barrennes of the soile, the rudenes of the people, and that there was no hope left to come by sufficient prouision for the maintenance of his armie, he determined not to spend anie longer time in such a vaine and fruitlesse trauell, and therefore returned vnto Tyne, there to restrain the Scots and Picts from invading such of the Britains as were subiect to the Roman empire, he caused a great trench to be cast ouerthwart the land from the mouth of Tyne to the river of Ouse, and a wall to be made on the inner side of the same, of turfe and sods. The Scottish chronicles make mention that it was begun by Adrian, but not finished till the daies of the emperor Suetonius, who made an end of it, and therfore the same chronicles name it the wall of Septi-mius Suetonius.

Adrianus hauing thus dispatched in the north parts of Brittain, in his returne visited Wales with the marches of the same, setting an order amongst such as had moued a commotion against the magistrats in those parties, the authors whereof he punished according to their offenses, & so then he came to London, whither at the same time a great number of the Brittain nobilitie resorted to doe him honor, according to their duties. And he for his part shewed them such friendlie intertainment, that they could not wish any better. After this he sailed into France, taking Lucius Antennus with him, because he could not auaie with the aire of Brittain, in whose place he left one Aulus Alatorius lieutenant there, who disposed diuers garisons of souldiers in places nere vnto the fore-remembered wall, for defense of the inhabitants against the violence of the Scots & Picts.

Who seeing this demeanour of the Romans, diuided those lands and countries (which they had latelie wasted on the further side of Tyne) in such sort betwixt them, that all whatsoeuer laie towards the Irish sea, remained to the Scots, and the rest coasting vpon the Almane seas, fell vnto the Picts for their portion.

After this Mogall liued manie yeares in good quiet without anie trouble of enemies. But being persued by in pride, by such notable victories as he had thus got of the Romans the conquerours of the world, he could not in time of peace master his owne vnrulie appetites; but that doted in the fil-thie lustes of the bodie, he spared neither maid, nor dowe, nor wife. Again, he was giuen to such vn-quenchable conetousnesse, that nothing might suffice him, finding manie forged matters against the rich, whereby to bereue them both of life and substance.
He was the first which ordeined that such as were banished or condemned for anie crime, should forfeit all their lands & goods without any consideration had either of losse or child, which is obserued at the full euen vnto these our daies, where before it was otherwise in that countrie. But these so notable vices in the prince could not long continue unpunished, for at last a conspiracie was practised against him, whereof he hauing knowledge (whether by witchcraft or otherwise by relation of friends, the certeintie is not knownen) in the dead of the night he armed himselfe, and with two of his seruants onelie fled to the next wood, not giuing notice of his departure to anie other of his household.

The morning being come, and knowledge had how he was thus departed, the conspiratours pursued after him, who perceiuing them to approach, sought waies how to haue escaped their hands; but such was his hap, that he fell amongst other that were as readie as the first to awake their malice vpon him, and so by them he was immediatlie murdered in the 36 yeare of his reigne, being the 4136 of the world, and after the birth of our sauour 169, Antoninus Pius then governing the Roman empire, and Philatus surnamed Albus reigning amongst the Picts. His head being smitten off, was CONARUS.

Conarus the sonne of Argall succedeth his father.

Argall being thus dispatched, as ye haue heard, his sonne Conarus was admitted king, who (as is reported) was pryncie to the conspiracie deuised against his father, and as he came to the government by wicked means, so in the end he vied himselfe much what accordingly in the same; for after he had for a time dissembled his naughtie nature, he began at the last openly to shew himselfe in his right colours, committing first of all the administration of publike affaires vnto men of base condition and vile nature. His chiefe delight was altogether in banketting and costlie fare, not regarding the ancient temperancie in feeding, vied amongst his worthie ancestors.

Conarus giue to excessive banquetting.

In waisting therefore his kinglie reuenues vpon such riotous exerce, he was nothing abashed to requite in an open assemblie of his nobles, a subsidie to be granted, towards the maintenance of such riot all there, as he iudged to stand with his honoz to haue dailie in his house. And therefore whereas the rents that belonged to the crowne were not sufficient to furnish the charges, he requested a generall contribution to be leuied through the realme, of euerie person according to their abilities, for the maintenance of such superfluous expences as he dailie vied in excessive banquetting. The lords maruelling to heare him moue anie such demand, and considering withall the occasion thereof, they asked respit to make their answer till the next day: which being granted, in the night following they communed secretlie together, and in the end concluded, not onelie to denie his request, but also to depose him of all kinglie gouernement, sith his naughtie life requiied no lesse.

The next day therefore when they were againe set downe in the councill-chamber, one of them in name of the residue took vpon him to speake, declaring that the lords and commons of the realme maruelled not a little how it should come to passe, that the king hauing no warres therewith to consume his treasure, should yet be enforced to demand a tallage for maintenance of his estate and charges of his household; but the fault was knowen well enough to rest in such as he most unworthilie had preferred to rule things vnder him, who being come of naught did nothing but deuide means how to cause the king to spoile his naturall subiects of their goods and possessions, therewith to enrich themselves, but (saith he) as they shalbe prouided for well enough per long, and so advanced as they shall not need to thirst for other mens linings, that is to wit, even to a faire paire of gallowes, there to end their liues with shame, as a number of such other losengers had often done before them: so it is convenient that the king sith his skill is so small in the administration of his office, should be shut vp in some one chamber or other, and such a one to haue the gouernance of the realme, as may be thought by common assent of the lords most meet to take it vpon him.

Conarus is taken and committed to close keeping.

The king hearing this tale, started vp, & with a loud voice began to call them traitors; adding, that if they went about anie hurt to his person, they should derelie abide the bargain. But notwithstanding these words, such as were appointed thereto, caught him betwixt them, and had him forth to a place assigned, where they laid him vp, mangre all his resistance. In like manner, all such as had borne offices vnder him, were attached and had to prison, where the most part of them, vpon examination taken of their offences, suffered death according to their iust demerits.

Then was the rule of the realme committed vnto one Argabus, a man of noble birth, and ruler of Argile, who vnder the name of a gouernour took vpon him the publike regiment, vntill other aduise might be taken. This mans studie in the beginning was onelie to cleanse the countie of all misdoers, and to see the peace kept to the quiet of the people; & finally in all his doings shewed himselfe a perfect patterne of an vpright iusticer. But with in a few yeares after (as it often happeneth) prosperous successe changed his former mind to an euill disposition, whereby he ordered things after his owne selfewill more than by reason, without the aduise of his peeres. And further, to the manifest ruine of the common-wealth, he nourished ciuill discord and sedition amongst the nobles, supposing it to make for his welfare, so long as they were at odds. He also married a Pictish ladie, the better to strengthen himselfe by this his forren alliance.

Argabus is chosen to gouerne the realme.

Argabus an vpright iusticer.

Prosperitie changeth condicions.

Wherevpon the peeres of the realme, vnderstanding what mischief might insue by these manifold and sundrie abuses of the gouernour, caused a parliament to be called, where, in presence of the whole assemblie, they laid vnto his charge, both that (though his misgouernement and presumption, not onelie in coupling himselfe in marriage with a wife of a strange nation, but also for attempting manie other things preiudiciall to the estate of the realme, without consent of the nobles or commons of the same) he had deserued grieuous punishment; his trespasses being so much the greater, in that considering the meane how he came to that dignitie, he answered not their expectation, nor performed the trust and credit which was generallie committed vnto him.

Argabus is rebuked.

Argabus cometh to fault.

Argabus hearing himselfe thus charged, and not able to laie anie likelie excuse, fell vpon his knees, & partlie confessing his fault with teares gushing from his eyes, besought them of pardon, whole submitting himselfe to be ordered at their discretion. The lords being moued with this humble submission of Argabus, vpon promise he should represse all his former misdemeanours, were contented that he should continue still in the administration. But such as had bene his chiefeest counsellors were committed to ward. After this sharpe admonition and warning thus giuen, Argabus did nothing touching the gouernement of the common-wealth, without aduise of his peeres; and some after, amongst other things, he took order for the limiting how far the authoritie of inferiour officers, as bailiffes, boroughmaisters, constables, and such other should extens. But especiallie he trauelled most diligentlie for the punishing of theues and robbers, of whome none escaped with life that fell into his hands. Moreover, he ordeined by statute, that no man exercising anie publike office, should taste of anie drinke that might make him drunken. He also banished all such persons as vied with dressing of delicate meates, and (as I may call them) deintie dishes, or banketting there, to allure mens appetites from the old rude fare accustomed amongst their elders, who sought not to followe their delicious appetites, but onlie prouided to susteine nature, which is satisfied with a little, & that both of costlie furniture. Argabus thus being occupied in reforming the state of the common-wealth, brought manie euill doers into good frame and order, and such as were vpright liuers of themselves, indued still to proceed forward to better and better. At length, in the eight yeare of his gouernement, Conarus being consumed with long imprisonment, departed out of this life, in the fourteenth yeare after the beginning of his reigne.

Argabus is permitted to continue in his office.

Argabus amendeth his former misgouernance, and ruleth himselfe by better aduise.

against the Romans.

After whole decesse, the nobles and other states of the realme assembling themselves together, chose one Ethodius, nephew to king Argadus by his sister, to reigne over them. But Argadus being highlie rewarded with lands and livinges for his faithfull & diligent paines taken in the advancement of the publike weale, during the time of his government, was thereto some after created as it were lord president of the councill, thereby to be chiefest in authoritie next to the king, in ordering and ruling of all publike affaires & causes. Shortly after Ethodius (as the custome of new kings in those daies was) went over into the westerne Isles, there to take order for the administration of iustice, where immediatlie upon his arrivall, it was shewed him, that not passing two or three daies before, there had bene a great conflict fought betwixt the nobles of clannes of the countrie, by reason of a strife that was stirred amongst their servants, being a compaignie of naughtie and unrulie fellows, to the great disquiet of the inhabitants. Hereupon was Argadus sent forth incontinentlie with a power to appease that businesse, and to bring in the offenders, that they might receive reward according to their demerits. Argadus forthwith hastened towards the place where he understood the rebels to be remaining, and apprehending the whole number of them, some by force, and some upon their humble submission, he returned backe with them to the king, who causing the matter to be thoughtlie heard, such as were the chiefest beginners and most in fault, were punished by death, and the other fined at the kings pleasure.
The Island people being thus appeased, the king returned into Albion, where as then lieng at Cirt-uerlochthe, a towne (as is said) in Loughababer, word came unto him that the Romans had broken downe the wall builded by the emperor Adrian, and made a great robe into the Scottish and Pictish borders, where meeting with the inhabitants assembled together in defense of their countrie (after a foxe conflict) the victorie remained with the Romans; by reason whereof they led a great bottie of cattell and other goods away with them to the places where they sojourned.

Ethodius being moved herewith, sent forthwith an herald unto Victorine the Romane lieutenant, requiring that his subjects might have restitution of their goods wrongfullie taken from them, or else to make for warres within fiftene daies after. Victo-rine answered herewith, that the Scots and Picts had first begun to breake downe the foresaid wall, and to build a towne upon the same, fortifying it with a number of men of warre, who running da-lie into the British confines, fetched prizes thence from amongst the Romane subjects, and though he had sent divers times to the Scottish and Pictish wardens for restitution, yet could he neuer have anie towardlie answer, so that he was constrained to begin the warre in maner and fourme as he had done already.

Ethodius not a little kindled with this answer, wrote straightwaies to the k. of the Picts, exhorting him in reuenge of such iniuries as his subjects had latelie received at the hands of the Romans, to invaide the wall on that side where it divided his countrie from the Britains, and to breake in upon the enemies by the same, and for his part he promised thortlie after to come, and to soine with him in such a necessarie enterprize against the common enimies of both their countries. The Pictish king gi-uing thanks to the messenger for his pains, promised with all speed to set forthward according to the ad-uise of Ethodius. The Romans in like maner having knowledge of the whole intention of the two kings, with all speed made preparation also for the warre, but the Scots and Picts first breaking in upon them, did much hurt abroad in the countries next adjoining, which when the Romans perceived, they passed by the enemies campe in the night season, and entered into the Pictish borders, waisting and spoiling all afore them.

When the two kings understood this, they hastened forth towards them, and were no sooner come within sight of them, but that they made ech towards other, and so encountering together, there was fought a foxe battell with doubtfull victorie, for the right wings on either side vanquished the left, the heads of both the battels keeping their ground, the one not once thinking backe from the other till night seuered them in sunder, but not without such slaughter made on both sides, that being once parted, they made no great hast to soine againe together; for as well the one part as the other being thus discomfited, betwixt incontinentlie homelwards without abiding for the morning. Neither did they attempt anie further exploit of all that yeare following.

In which meane time Victorine sent letters to Rome unto the emperor Marcus Antonius Aure-lius, who as then governed the empire, signifying unto him in what state things stood in Britaine; further declaring, that if convenient succors were not sent in time, it would be hard to resist the furious rage of the enemies, by reason of the small trust he percelued was to be had in the Britains, being no lesse readie upon occasion to make warres in recouerie of their libertie, than the Scots & Picts were to inroch upon them. The emperor upon receipt of these letters, thought in his mind that Victo-rine was not so valiant a captaine as the case required, and that thereupon the Scots and Picts became the more emboldened to resist, therefore he sent for him home, appointing one Agricola Calphurnius to succeed in his roome, who was (as some haue left in writing) the nephew of Julius Agricola, the most famous captaine of the Romans that euer came into Britaine.

This Calphurnius comming into Britaine with an armie, ioined to the same the power which he found there, as well of the Britains, as of other ser-uing under the Romane ensignes. Which done, he repaired toward the river of Tyne, where being arrived, he marched forth into the borders of his enimies, finding all the countrie round about him so clearelie wasted and burned; that there was not a house left standing, nor a graine of corne, nor one bed of cattell to be found therein. Yet notwithstanding all this, forth he passed thorough Northumberland, and entring into Pictland, wasted all that was before him with fire and sword. And for so much as winter came upon him, when he had done his will in that behalfe, he returned unto York, where he sojourned untill the spring.

When summer was once come, hauing made his provision to warre on the Scots and Picts, word came unto him that the Welshmen were revolted, and began to raise warre against the Romans, so that taking order for the repairing of the wall made by Adrian, which the enemies in diuers places had broken downe, and leauing a sufficient number of men of warre for defense of the same against all inuasions that might be attempted, he turned the residue of his power against those Welsh rebels, whom in the end, though not without much adoe, he reduced to obedience. Immediatlie after this, he heard also how the Britains of the Ile of Wight were by in armour against such Romans as ruled there, sundry noble men of the maine Ile taking their part, but they also were at length brought againe to their former subjection, and the authors of that rebellion punished by death.

In the meane time the Scots and Picts determined not to attempt any further exploit against the Romans, doubting the verie name and lineage of Agricola in the lieutenant Calpurnius, by calling to remembrance the noble atchieved conquests of his grandfather Julius Agricola, of whose victorious exploits, besides that which ye haue before heard, the English historie also doth make a long rehearfall. Calpurnius being thus at quiet on that side, intended wholie to reforme all misorders amongst the Britains, which being brought to indifferent good passe, he was sent for home againe into Rome by the emperor Antonius Commodus, the sonne and successor of the fore-remembered Marcus Aurelius sending one Publius Trebellius into Britaine, there to supplie his charge.

This Trebellius comming into Britaine, at the first used himselfe verie byzighlie in his office, shewing all honoz and loue towards the Britains, subjects to the Romane empire, and namelie to Lucius, who reigned as king of the land, vnder the name and authoritie of the Romane empire. But after that he had once wone him a peece of credit amongst them, he changed his manners, or rather discovered his naturall inclination, so wholie giuen to conetousnesse, that his onelie studie was set which way to fill his bags, not caring how vnrulie he forged accusations against the rich, so that either by death or banishment their goods might be confiscat, and so come to his hands. By this wicked gouernement, the Britains began so sore to hate him, that had it not bene for the loue of their king the foresaid Lucius (who helpe to appease them) there had bene some rebellion practised against him in the south part. Now the Scots and Picts hauing knowledge of this mistaking in the Britains towards the Romane lieutenant, thought it a time conuenient for them also to be doing, to the end they might reuenge their former iniuries; and hereupon leueng an armie, they came to the oft remembred wall, and ouerthrowing the same in diuers places, they entred into the British confines with great spoile and crueltie. Trebellius being hereof informed, hastened forth with all the power he could make, to resist their inuasions; but finding the enemies readie in the field, and encountering them sooner than he looked for, he was euen vpon the first ioining abandoned of the most part of his whole armie, which consisted of Britains and Frenchmen, then called Galles, so that the residue being beaten downe, he was glad to save himselfe as well as he might, by setting the spurs to his horse and galloping away.

After this, gathering together his people againe as they fled from the discomfiture, he retired backe with them vnto Forke, hauing lost in this bickering a great number of his best souldiours, and men of warre: for the Scots and Picts, missing no small number of their friends in that battell, were not satisfied with those whome they had likewise slaine in the fight, but also fell vpon their prisoners which they had taken, and slue them also in reuenge of their fellows whome they had lost. Afterwards they harried the countries of Westmerland and Kendall in most cruell wise, Trebellius not being so hardie to fight with them againe for doubt of some traine that might be practised by the Britains. Neither was his suspicion grounded vpon the credit of any light information, as may appeare by that which folowed: for immediatlie after, the commons of the countrie rose against the Romans, in purpose to haue driuen them all out of the land.

where were also diuerse of the British nobilitie amongst them not knowne; for they were disguised in strange apparell, counterfeting themselves to be of the vulgar sort. The furie of these people was great, but yet in the end the politike order of the Romans vanquished them, howbeit not without great slaughter on both sides. Caldozus escaping the hands of his enemies, fled into his native countrie of Pictland, not a little reioicing that he had procured such slaughter amongst the Romans and Britains, both being enemies to him and his countrie. Such prisoners also of the Britains as fell into the hands of the Romans, were hanged vpon sundrie trees and gibets: whereat other of the Britains being offended, in the night season took down those dead bodies, and hanged vp as manie of the Romans in their places, the truth being neuer knowne who were the doers of that act.

The lieutenant Trebellius perceiving thus what danger he stood in on euerie part, wrote vnto the emperor Commodus, that without some reformation were had, the Romans were not like to keepe so long season in Britaine, and therefore required to haue some aid sent ouer vnto him in time. But the emperor doubting least the fault rested most in the lieutenant himselfe, appointed that one Pertinax an ancient gentleman, and one for his high and notable vertues greatlie esteemed both amongst the men of warre, and also in the senat, should go into Britaine, to be legat there in place of Trebellius. This Pertinax comming into Britaine, according to the emperors appointment, tooke vpon him the office: and first setting a state among the Britains, by right prudent and well aduised gouernement, he afterwards made a iourneie against the Scots and Picts, drining them by great slaughter beyond Adrians wall, and so constrained them to remaine within their owne confines, pursuing them no further, for that he was sent for home to Rome, where the emperor Commodus being murdered amongst his owne men, he was against his will preferred to his place.

About the same time the state of the Scottish commonwealth was brought into great danger through an other incident, as by reason of a rebellion stirred by them of the western Isles, who not quieted in their stomachs for the death of their friends executed by Argadus (as before ye haue heard) assembled themselves together, and comming ouer into Argile, spoiled and harried the countrie in pitious wise. For redresse whereof, Argadus was sent thither againe with an armie, and in the meane time Ethobius the king with a great host of Scottishmen and Picts lay in campe nere vnto Adrians wall, to resist the inuasion of the enemies on that side, if happilie they should attempt any new exploit against him in those parts. The Island-men hearing of Argadus his approach, drew themselves together to rescue him by battell, if he minded to offer it.

In which meane time two thousand Irishmen were landed in that countrie, in hope of spoile, and hearing that Argadus was comming that waies forth to fight with his enemies, they laid themselves secretlie in ambush by the waie where he should passe, and when he was passed by them, they brake forth vpon his reuerward suddenlie, putting his people in such disorder by their violent impulsion at the first bzunt, that though he did what in him laie to bring them againe into arate of battell, yet in the end he was there slaine with two thousand of his armie, the residue escaping by flight out of the hands of their wild and cruell enemies. Ethobius hauing knowledge hereof, with an armie of twentie thousand men hastened forth towards Argile, to reuenge

Who hearing of his comming, made towards the sea, and would gladlie haue bene gone, but by reason of a contrarie wind they were forced to stay against their wills, so that he finding them still in the countrie, wrought so warlike by closing them by among the hills and mounteins, that finally constrained through famine, they submitted themselves vpon these conditions, that their head capteine with two hundred others of the chiefest, should yeld themselves simple to the kings mercie, and the residue to be licenced to depart againe into their countries.

Execution.

Those that were appointed to be deliuered to the king with their capteine, suffered death by sentence of the nobles and pæres of the realme. Whereat the other taking indignation, though they had already yelded up their weapons, yet began they to fall by on the Scots with hurling of stones, and other such things as came to hand, till finally they were beaten downe by the armed soldiers, and a great number of them slaine: the residue escaping as well as they might, fled into the mounteins. The Island-men being thus vanquished, and the Romans attempting nothing against the Scottishmen or Picts, Ethodius visited all the parts of his realme, taking order for the due execution of iustice amongst his subjects.

Ethodius visiteth his countries, to see iustice maintained.

He giueth him selfe to hunting, & causeth the lawes for the maintenance of game to be well kept & looked vnto.

And for that he would not spend his time in idleness, being now at rest from warres, he began to exercise himselfe in hunting, and for the better nourishing of game, he took order that all such ordinances as had bene deuised by his elders, should strictly be obserued and kept: as that no man should be so hardie to go about to destitute anie hares with nets, grens or hare-pipes: neither to kill them in their formes by anie meanes: nor after that they had bene once coursed and escaped, to follow the sute, to the intent to start them againe. Also that none should go about to kill anie hart or hind, during all the winter season, at what time they were accustomed for hunger to leaue the mounteins, forests and woods, and to come downe into the fields and courts neere vnto the townes & houses.

He ordeined moreover therevnto, that no man should presume to kill anie hind-calues, detesting nothing more than to haue such game destroyed, as serued for the exercise and solace of him and his nobles. The other vacant time, whilst he rested from hunting, he spent for the most part in hearing of musike, hauing diuerse cunning plaiers of sundrie kinds of instruments attending in his court. At length setting all his pleasure in hearing of a musician being borne in one of the west Isles, he was murdered by him in the night time within his owne chamber. The murtherer being apprehended, and examined vpon what occasion he did that heinous fact, for the which he had deserued the most extreme kind of punishment that might be deuised, he answered: that in reuenge of the death of such his kinsmen and friends as the king had caused to be executed in Argile, he purposed long before to do that deed, and now that he had accomplished his purpose, he was ready to receiue what kind of death they would adudge him vnto. For sure I am of this, saith he, that how terrible soeuer my execution shall be, yet can it not be so painfull, but that I shall reioyce even in the very instant of my death, for that I haue in such notable sort reuenged the deaths of all my kinsmen & friends. Finally by commandement of the magistrates he was drawne in pæces with wild horses in most violent tosse.

Septimus Severus H.B.

Ethodius reigned 3 yeres, untill the latter daies of Caracalla the emperour. He was buried at Dunstaffage, with all such pompous ceremonies as was accustomed about the interment of kings in that age. In his daies Lucius the king of Britaine received the faith with a great part of his people, being the yeres after the birth of our Saviour, as the Scots chronicles haue 187, but after the British 177.

Britaine received the christian faith in the yere 187.

After the death of Ethodius, his brother Sathrahell or Serrahell (as some write him) was chosen to succeed by the common consent and voices of all the estates of the realme. For although Ethodius left a sonne behind him; yet because he was verie young in yeres, he was thought insufficient to haue so great a charge as the rule of a kingdome committed vnto his hands. This Sathrahell was subtille of nature, and a great dissembler, whose purpose was to defraud the issue of his brother Ethodius from attaining at anie time vnto the rule of the kingdome, and therefore to bring his purpose the better to passe, he found forged matter against all such as were familiar friends vnto Ethodius; thereby to put them vnto death. Neither dealt he anie thing more sincerelie with a great number of other of his wealthie subjects, whose lands and goods he ornelie fought to intop at his owne will. By means whereof such mischeefe ensued through the realme, and such ciuill sedition daily rose amongst the people, that pittie it was to behold it: the king being not so bold all the while, as once to shew his face abroad for redresse thereof; by reason he understood well enough what hatred the people bare towards him, neither did his keeping within doores saue his life anie long time, for in the end his owne seruants found means to strangle him, and that before he had reigned full foure yeres.

Donala.

In his place succeeded his brother Donald, a sprince of a farre contrarie nature and conditions, for he was free, courteous, and without all deceit; more righteous than rigorous, and afore all things desirous that peace and concord might prosper among his subjects. Neither bare he with respect to doers, but such as were disobedient against the lawes and wholesome ordinances of the realme he caused to be duly punished: finally he took such order for reformation of things, that he reduced his subjects as it had bene from a wild and savage rudenesse, vnto a perfect ciuill trade of humanitie. About the same time Lucius king of the Britains being dead, the Romans perceiuing that a kings authoritie among the Britains, did nothing else but diminish the maiestie of the imperiall iurisdiction amongst them, determined not to suffer any more of the British nation to intop that title.

Donald sought to reduce his subjects vnto all ciuilitie.
Lucius king of Britaine dieth.

This thing moued the Britains to such indignation, that by procurement of one Fulgentius, diuers of them rebelled, and choosing the same Fulgentius to their general, they directed a messenger with letters vnto Donald king of the Scots, requiring him to ioine with them in league against their ancient enemies the Romans, whose enderor (as he knew) had ener bene from time to time, how to bring the whole Island vnder their subiection, and to extinguish all the nobilitie and ancient inhabitants of the same: adding furthermore, that if he would now put to his helping hand, the time neuer serued better for the dispatching of them whole out of the Ile, considering the sundrie rebellions attempted as well by the people of Germanie and France, as also of the easterlie nations and countries.

The Britains rebelled and chose one Fulgentius to their captain Felix dieth for aid vnto the Scots.

Donald receiued the messenger most friendly, and being glad to vnderstand of these netes, he promised to aid Fulgentius with all the power he was able to make, and to meet him at such daie and place as he should afterward appoint. The like answer was made also by the king of Picts, vnto whom in semblable semblable wise Fulgentius had directed his letters. Thus the Britains (being confirmed with hope of great aid from the Scots and Picts) assembling their host together, rejoyced vnto the wall of Adrian, which they ouerthrowe in diuers places, that their friends might haue the more free access and entrie vnto them by the same. Neither were the Scots and Picts slow for their part to make forward: so that they likewise comming thither, holpe to throw down that wall, and to fill vp the trench or ditch that went alongst the same.

Donald promised to aid Fulgentius.

This done, joining their powers together, they passed forth towards Yorke, in hope to haue found the Romane lieutenant Trebellius within that citie and to haue besieged him therein: but hauing knowledge how he was withdrawne into Kent, there to gather a power, they left their purpose of besieging that citie, and fell to spoiling & harrieng of the countrie abroad on euerie side, confreining the most part of the people to come in and yeld themselves vnder their obedience. Thus they continued in passing from one quarter of the countrie to another, till winter enforced them to breake by their campe, and to licence the souldiers to depart home into their countries, till they had new summons to assemble and meet againe.

In this meane time Trebellius certified the emperor: Seuerus of all this trouble and rebellion in Britaine: whereupon he with all speed leuied an armie, & set forward with the same himselfe in person toward Britaine, as in the English historie more plainlie may appere. At his comming into Britaine, he lacked no time, but assembling his power, prepared to go against the enemies. Fulgentius doubting the force of his enemy, sent ambassadoes vnto him to treat for peace, but Seuerus would not grant to a nie, whereupon Fulgentius confirmed the minds of the Britains with all comfortable words, in the best wise he could, exhorting them to sicke to their necessities begun enterprise, for recouerie of their long withed libertie, which he doubted not, but by vanquishing the emperor at that present they should assuredlie attaine: and as for victorie, he was in no doubt, so that they would plucke their harts vnto them, and trie it forth manfully by dint of sword, like fellows and brethren knit in one faithfull band of trustie concord, considering the enemies armie being gathered of so manie sundrie nations & languages that consent in one opinion, the cheefest meane for the obtaining of victorie must needs be wanting among them.

The Britains moued herewith, promised him to liue and die in the quarrell. Whereupon he toke aduise with them, which waie to mainteine themselves against Seuerus, of whose comming they were already certified. For Seuerus hauing dispatched the British ambassadoes from him, set incontinentlie forward towards Yorke, leaving his yongest sonne Geta in the south parts to haue the gouernance of the same in his absence. His eldest sonne Antoninus he toke with him in his iourne against his enemies. At his comming to Yorke, he did sacrifice to the gods, according to the Ethnical custome, & also toke aduise with his capitaine how to proceed in his enterprise against his enemies.

This done he marcheth forth with his armie towards them, who being already joined with the Scots and Picts, were determined to abide him, in so much that those of the one side came no sooner in sight of the other, but that they hasted forth to ioinie together in battell, whereof ensued great slaughter betwixt them, though the British part (notwithstanding their aid of Scots and Picts) were not able long to endure against the great multitude and practiced skill of the Romane souldiers, so that in the end

Fulgentius himselfe, seeing the discomfiture and huge slaughter made of his people, had runne in amongst the thickest prease of his enemies, had not those that were about him led him awaie by force, and so at length he got him amongst the troops of the Scottishmen and Picts, and together with them passed ouer Tine, and so into the borders of his friends where he got together such souldiers as he could, that had escaped from the battell, and retained them with wages so well as he might, in hope vpon occasion to imploye them euenly against his enemies. The Scots also sent into Ireland for aid, and the Picts into Denmarke and Norwaye. Such of the British nobilitie as fell into the hands of the Romans, Seuerus punished most grieuouly, but the commons he used more gentlie, as it were making excuse for them being procured thereto by their capitaine. After this, when winter was come, he appointed his men of warre to draw vnto places conuenient for them to lodge in, till the next spring. He himselfe wintered at Yorke.

In the next summer there was little done worthe to be spoken of, but that there were certeine skirmishes betwixt the Romans lieng on the borders, and the Scots and Picts, euer as occasion serued, either of the parties to worke any exploit for their aduantage. But so much as the Scots had no aid sent them forth of Ireland, they were not minded to separt againe in a foughten field, supposing it sufficient if they might defend their owne, though they gained nothing as then, considering the puissance that was ready bent against them. At length Seuerus fell sicke at Yorke, and his son Antoninus lieng on the borders beyond Tine, caused the wall afore mentioned, diuiding the Britains from the Scots and Picts, to be repaired. This wall was built (as is before recited) first by Adrian the emperor, to staie the Scottishmen from inuading the lands appertaining to the subjects of the Romane empire, & after ouerthrowne in diuers places as well by Scots and Picts, as by the Britains, in so far as before is partly mentioned. Antoninus caused it to be fortified with bastilions, one placed so nere to another, as trumpets being appointed in each of them, the sound might be heard betwixt to warne one another vpon the first descrying of the enemies approach.

Finallie Seuerus dieth, though not so soone as his son Antoninus wished, in hope after him to attaine the imperiall dignitie. Concluding therefore a league with the Scottishmen and Picts, and granting peace to Fulgentius, and other such British rebels as were fled with him into Ireland, he received sufficient pledges, and then returned towards London, where his mother with his brother Geta as then late, shortly after both the brethren departed forth of the Ile, & went to Rome, as in the historie of England it appereth. But now to returne vnto Donald the Scottish king, yeshall vnderstand, that being deliuered of foyren trouble, he studied cheeflie how to preserue his people in god peace and perfect tranquillitie. Which mind our Sauour Christ the author of all peace and concord had giuen vnto him, being lately afore conuerted vnto the true faith from his wicked paganisme and heathenish idolatrie.

For as we find in Hector Boetius, in the daies of the aboue said emperor Seuerus, he sent a messenger with letters vnto pope Victor (Zeperinus saith Harison) being the 15 in number, as they saie, after saint Peter, declaring vnto him that he was fully minded to receiue the christian religion, and utterly to forsake the superstitious seruice of the heathenish gods, gods, and therefore infantile required him to send over into Scotland some godlie learned men, to instruct him in the right beleife. The pope hearing this, and being glad to increase the faith of Christ through all parts of the world, sent with all speed into Scotland such well disposed persons as he thought most meet for that purpose, who at their arrivall there, did their endeuour in such diligent sort, that not onelie the king, but also through his example a great number of the nobilitie were baptised, and clerelie forsoke their former errors and idolatrie. This was in the yeare after the birth of our sauour 203, from the creation of the world 4170, & after the first creation of the Scottish kingdome 230, as W. Harison in his chronologie both manifestlie confirme.

Whereouer this Donald was the first as the Scottish chronicles alledge, that caused silver and gold to be coined in his realme. The stampe which he deuised for the same, was a crosse on the one side, and his face on the other. Before that time the Scots vsed no coine, but either exchanged and bartered wares for wares, either else occupied with Britissh and Romane monie, as diuers marble chests full of the same which haue bene found of late yeeres in sundrie parts of Scotland doe verie well witness. Finally this Donald in the 21 yeare of his reigne departed out of this life, and was buried according to the manner of our christian religion, without any heathenish ceremonies.

Donald departed out of this world. 216 H.B. Ethodius.

The gouernance of the realme committed to sundrie noble men.

After him succeeded Ethodius the second, and some of the former Ethodius, which prince proued so verie a foole, that the regiment of the realme was quite taken from him, and committed vnto certaine noble men, who being diuided into sundrie quarters of the realme, toke verie good order for the due gouernment of the parties so to them limited, and vsed themselves verie vprightly in all their doings. As for cause of wars they had none, for heuerus before his death had giuen such order for the gouernment of the Britains, that they durst not once stir by reason of such pledges as were deliuered and conueied to Rome, which were the chiefe of all the Britissh nobilitie. At length Ethodius being apt for nothing but to fill his castles, as one though dolittle, yet naturallie giuen to vnuenchable couetousnesse, was slaine by those that were appointed to the gard of his person, in the 16 yeare of his reigne.

Ethodius being giuen to couetousnesse is slaine by his owne seruants. Athirco.

Then was his sonne Athirco elected by the generall voices of all the estates, who in the beginning of his reigne shewed himselfe verie sober, gentle, courteous, and friendlie of behauiour, exercising himselfe in all laudable pastimes conuenient for his estate, and herewith he was so free and liberrall towards all men, that he wan him wonderfull much praise and loue amongst his people. But these his noble vertues increased not in him togither with his age, but contrarie decayed, in such sort, that after he had reigned eight yeeres, he was quite altered: in place of liberalitie, imbracing auarice: for courtlesse and amiable countenance, he vsed sterne and loslie looks: for commendable exercises, he gaue himselfe wholly to filthie pleasures and sensuall lusts of the bodie: and such as could further his purpose most in these his beastlie affections, he cherished and had them most in estimation, not regarding at all the nobilitie of his realme, but was as ready to wrong them by villanous insurie, as he was anie other of the lowest and meanest degre.

Athirco changed in conditions from good to bad.

Athirco regarded not his nobles.

The villanous act of Athirco in abusing a noble mans daughters.

It chanced that a noble man in Argile (being one of no small authoritie amongst the people of that countrie) named Patholocus, had two faire yong gentlewomen to his daughters: now the king being verie desirous to satiffie his lust vpon them, forced them both the one after the other, and not so content, deliuered them afterwards to be abused in semblable sort by his pages and seruants. The father vnderstanding this villanie done to his daughters, by their owne lamentable complaint, sent for his friends, and opening vnto them the whole matter, he required their assistance. They being in a wonderfull furie to heare of such an iniurie done to their blood, promised in reuenge thereof to spend life, lands & goods, and forthwith departing in sunder, they prepared themselves to assemble their powers, procuring a great number of other noble men to ioine with them in so necessarie an enterprize, as to rid the countrie of such a catife wretch, respecting nothing but the satiffing of his filthie carnall lusts, and the accomplishment of his most beastlie appetites.

When they were once got togither in a companie, they marched forth towards Dunkasage, where they vnderstood that the king as then did sojourne, a great multitude of people still resorting vnto them by the waie, after it was once knowne thereabout they went. Athirco hearing of their approach, called togither his power, supposing at the first to haue beaten downe his enemies; but when he had throughly weighed the matter, and considered of what force and power they were, & how feeble his part was through want of good wills in his people, he praued to flee from them, and would haue passed ouer into Zla, one of the westerne Isles, to haue procured some succor there, but being imbarcked and set from the shoar, he was by contrarie winds driven backe againe to land, where doubting to come into his enemies hands, he chose rather to slea himselfe, and so ended his wretched life in such miserable extremitie after he had reigned the space of 12 yeeres. His reigne continued till the daies of the emperor Gordian the third, or (as others saie) till the time of the emperor Valerian. But as William Harison hath gathered, he reigned in the daies of the emperor Aurelius Claudius. Doorus the brother of Athirco vnderstanding of the death of his brother, disguised himselfe in beggars weed for doubt of death, and went into Idland with three of his nephues, sonnes to the same Athirco, whose names were Sindocke, Carance, and Donald.

Athirco doubting to be taken of his owne men if he came to the triall of battell, committed himselfe from among them. Athirco slayeth himselfe.

242 H.B. Doorus the brother of Athirco conceyted himself out of the way.

Howbeit, Patholocus hauing knowledge whither he was fled, sent forth certaine of his seruants, with commandement to search him out, commanding furthermore verie secretly, that if they found him, they should dispatch him out of life, for feare of further mischance. But they that were sent, finding one in all features and proportion of bodie resembling Doorus, slue the one in stead of the other, and so returning home to their maister, they made him verie full of the newes, although indeed they came not nere to Doorus. Then Patholocus causing the estates of the realme to assemble, he handled the matter in such wise, by dissuading them to chose any of Athircos blood to reigne ouer them (for doubt least they should seeke any meanes how to reuenge his death) that in the end this Patholocus was elected himselfe, more by force than by anie common consent of the nobles: for diuers of them doubting the craftie nature, which they knew to be in him, wished rather that the issue of Athirco (hauing deserved nothing why to be defrauded of the kingdom, saue onlie in respect of the fathers offenses) might haue intioied that which of right they ought to haue had, that is, either one of them to be king, or else some nere kindman of theirs to reigne as king, till the eldest of them might come to sufficient yeares to beare the rule himselfe.

treason, and so published, according to the custome he took the othes of those that were present, and then repaired vnto Dunstaffage, there to be inuicted according to the maner. This done, he called such as he suspected, and talking with them alone, he exhorted them to be faithfull, promising to be their assured god lord and maister, and for an earnest thereof, he gaue vnto diuerse of them verie great rewards. Generallie vnto all men he shewed himselfe verie gentle and tractable, thereby to win their loues, for the better establishment of his newe atchived estate: and hereto he imployed such riches as the former kings had heaped together amongst the nobles, studying by all meanes to auoid all seditiuous quarels and secret discords amongst them.

Thus ruling the realme at his will for certeine yeeres, at length fortune began to shew a change of countenance after hir old accustomed guise. For Doozus the brother of Athirco (whome, as ye haue heard, Patholocus supposed to haue bene dead) wrote certeine letters, signifying his owne estate with the welfare of his nephues the children of Athirco vnto certeine Scottish lordes, whom he knew to fauour his cause. Which letters he deliuered vnto a pitifull woman, appointing hir howe and to whome she should deliuer the same, but the woman apprehended by the waie, and brought vnto Patholocus, he caused hir secretlie to be sacked and throwne into a riuer. Afterwards sending for such of the nobles as the direction of the forsaide letters had giuen him occasion to haue in some suspicion, he committed them first to prison, and at length caused them to be secretlie strangled.

Which wicked deed being once notified abroad, so moued the hearts of their friends and allies, that they procured the people to rebell: and so gathering them together, they raised open and cruell warres against him. Patholocus informed of their determinations, withdrew himselfe priuie into Spurrey land, there to get together an armie to resist his enemies, and for that he was desirous also to understand somewhat of the issue of this trouble, he sent one of his trustie seruants, being a gentleman of that countrie, vnto a woman that dwelt in the Ile of Colmekill (otherwise called Zona) esteemed verie skilfull in foretelling of things to come, to learne of hir what fortune should hap of this warre, which was already begun.

The witch consulting with hir spirits, declared in the end how it should come thortlie to passe, that the king should be murdered, not by his open enemies, but by the hands of one of his most familiar friends, in whome he had reposed an especiall trust. The messenger demanding by whose hands that should be: Euen by thine saith she, as it shall be well knownen within these few daies. The gentleman hearing these wordes, railed against hir verie bitterly, bidding hir go like an old witch; for he trusted to see hir burnt before he should commit so villanous a deed. And departing from hir, he went by and by to signifie what answere he had received; but before he came where the king lay, his mind was altered, so that what for doubt on the one side, that if he should declare the trueth as it was told him, the king might haplie conceiue some great suspicion, that it should follow by his means as he had declared, and thereupon put him to death first; and for feare on the other side, that if he keepe it secret, it might happen to be reuealed by some other, and then he to run in as much danger of life as before; he determined with himselfe to worke the surest way, and so comming to the king, he was led aside by him into his priuie chamber, where all other being commanded to auoid, he declared how he had sped; and then falling forth with vpon Patholocus, with his dagger he slue him outright, and threw his bodie into a priuie; and afterwards getting out by a backe doore, and taking his horse which he had there readie; he fled with all speed vnto the campe of the conspirators, and was the first that brought newes vnto them of this act thus by him atchived. This chanced in the yeare of our Lord 280, & in the eleuenth yeare after the first entring of Patholocus into the estate.

After Patholocus was thus dispatched, the peeres assembled together to ordeine one for gouernement of the realme, where in the end it was amongst them concluded, that the sonnes of Athirco should be sent for into Scotland, and Findocke receiued for king. The Hibernian that slue Patholocus was appointed to fetch them, who (according to his commission) comming into Scotland, conuicted them right honorable into Argile, where Findocke being already chosen king, was placed on the stone of marble, with all the ceremonies in that case appertaining.

This Findocke was in the flower of his age, of person most beautifull, cleane made, & of a godly lie stature; wherewith were ioined most excellent gifts of the mind, not so much desirous to seeme as to be vertuous in deed. He was courteous, meke, & full of affabilitie, studying alwaies to win friend-ship and loue, rather by gentlenesse, than by feare and menacing wordes. He leagued with the Britains, Scots and Romans he firmelie obserued. But as peace with foraine enemies breedeth oftentimes ciuill discord at home, so came it then to passe with him at this present: for one Donald of the Isles, a noble man borne, came ouer with an armie into Rosse and Spurrey land, fetching from thence a great spoile and bootie, not without great slaughter of such as inforced themselves for to resist him. The occasion as he pretended was to reuenge the death of Patholocus. But Findocke vnderstanding his doings, prepared an armie with ships, and sailed ouer with the same into the Ile of Ila, where in conuincing with Donald and other his enemies, he vanquished and chased them egerlie, without returning once backe, till either the sword or the sea had made an end of them all.

Donald himselfe taking a boate, in hope to haue escaped, the prease was such at his entring into the same, that before they could get it off from the shore, it sunke by means of the overlading, and so he and all they that were on board were drowned there, withall. The king hauing atchived this victorie, returned into Albanie; but the Island-men not fullie quieted with this slaughter of their fellows, sent ouer into Ireland, and got from thence certeine Ierns, who vnder the leading of an other Donald, the sonne of the former Donald, made starts now and then into Argile and Cantire, doing manie shrewd turnes in the same, yet they could be suppressed. But Findocke being some informed of these tidings, went ouer againe into the Isles, and such of his enemies as he found, he caused to be hanged, to giue other example what to looke for when they should rebell, but Donald escaped, and got ouer into Ireland, where he remained, till he heard that the king was returned backe into Albanie, and then he came againe. But perceiving himselfe not able to worke such feats as he hoped to haue done, he sent a messenger vnto the king, offering to yeld himselfe, and to become his true subiect if he might get his pardon, and be at his owne libertie. But being answered that he should not be receiued, vnlesse he would come vnto Dunstaffage with othe of his chiefest complices, and to stand fallie at the kings mercie; he refused thus to do, deuising an other meane how to be reuenged.

Therefore to begin withall, he procured two naughtie persons to go ouer into Albaine, and to seine themselves to haue fled from him, where also he willed them to offer their seruice vnto the king, and to disclose vnto him certeine light secrets of the said Donalds, thereby to win credit if it might be, and in the end to espie a time to rid him out of the way. These craftie mates working according to Donalds wicked instructions, at length with much adoe they got credit, and after credit they got place so nere the king by the furtherance of Carantius the kings brother (whome they made priuie also vnto their intent) that finding all things correspondent vnto their purpose (one day as the king hunted) the one began to feed him with a tale of the hatred which the Flanders bare towards him, whereto he gaue verie good eare, whilest the other smote him to the heart with a ianeline, & so leauing the iron sticking in his bodie, he fled away in hast with his traitorous companion and fellows. Those that were nere, seeing what had happened, some of them ran to him, to see if they might relieue him as then struggling with the pangs of death; others followed the murderers, and ouertaking them, brought them backe to receiue their meed according to that which they had iustlie de-serued; being also examined, they confessed how they were procured vnto it, not onelie by Donald of the Fles, but also by Carantius the kings owne brother, who of set purpose being out of the way at that present, and hauing knowledge that he was accused of the kings death, fled out of the countrie as a banished man, first into Britaine, from whence (after he had remained there for a time) he went vnto Rome, and seruing in the wars vnder the emperours, Aurelius Probus, Carus, and Dioclesianus, he became a right famous and a verie skillfull captaine.

But if this report be true that Carausius (of whom Eutropius maketh mention) were descended of so high parentage, maruell it is, that neither the same Eutropius, nor anie other of the Romane writers, could at no time come to the knowledge thereof, which if they had done, no doubt they would haue spoken somewhat of the same; for although he might happilie vpon the consideration aforesaid counterfeit himselfe to be boine of some base kindred, and so for a time to dissemble what he was, yet afterwards that he attained vnto so high degree of honour, as to blurpe the imperiall robes of purpure, and to pos-sesse the dominion of Britaine, it is not like but that to aduance his credit and authoritie roiall, he would haue set forth to the vttermost the nobilitie of his birth, if he had bene come of anie, and that so apparantie to the world, that aswell his enemies as friends should both haue knowen and spoken of it.

Findocke being thus slaine in the tenth yeare of his reigne, and buried with great lamentation of the people at Dunstaffe, his brother Donald, the third son to Athiro, was admitted to the kingdome, who immediatlie vpon his entring into the estate, prepared to go into the Fles against Donald that common enemy of Scotland. But this Donald himselfe deliuered the king of a great peece of that trouble: for so soone as he heard that the murder by him contriued was executed, he assembled a mightie power of the Fland-men, and transporting with them ouer into Rolle, proclaimed himselfe king, persecuting with fire and sword all such as denied him obedience. King Donald being aduertised of that attempt of his aduersarie, speedilie marcheth forth with such power as he had already assembled, sending proclamations abroad, that all other appointed to serue, should follow him with speed.

Thus comming into Spurre land, he pitched downe his tents, purposing there to abide the com-ming of the rescue of his armie. But Donald of the Fles vnderstanding all his demeanour and whole intention, thought it best to assaile him within his campe, before all his power should come vnto him, and being thus resolved, he set forward in the night time, and was vpon his enemies, before that his comming towards them was once signified in their campe. The king then vnderstanding his aduersaries to be at hand, bringeth forth his men, setteth them in arraie, and exhorteth them with many pithie wordes to receiue their enemies with manlie stomachs. But the Fland-men encouraged also by their capitaine, gaue the onset so roundlie, that the Scotishmen had not leasure to occupie their shot, but were enforced euen at the first to loine at handblowes, which were bestowed in such furious sort, that in the end the Scots being oppressed with multitude, were constrained to giue backe, some sauing themselves by flight, and some standing at defense till they were beaten downe and killed in the place.
There were slaine on the kings part three thousand men, and two thousand taken prisoners; amongst whome were thirtie personages of honorable estate, together with the king himselfe being wounded so loze, that he died within three daies after the battell, rather through angulsh of mind than of his hurts (as some haue written) in the same yeare that he began his reigne. Donald of the Fles hauing thus got the victorie, took vpon him as king, accordingly as he had caused himselfe at the first to be proclaimed.

But because he came to the estate thus by blood, he continued still in doubt and feare of new conspiracies, being gulltie in conscience of his wrong-full usurpation. Those prisoners also, which he had taken in the battell, he kept in perpetuall captiuitie, menacing them present death, if anie of their friends and allies attempted anie stirre against him. More-ouer he nourished priuie factions amongst the nobilitie, supposing thereby that their powers would be the more feeble in anie publike exploit that was to be moued against him; finally, if anie mischief happened amongst them, he caused the matter thoroughlie to be looked vpon, but with such regard that he alwaies enriched his owne cofers with the forfeitures and penalties which he took vpon amongst them. He seldome times went abroad, and when he stirred forth anie whither, he had his garb about him, appointed with weapons in warlike sort for dout of treason. He aduanced diuers of base condition to great wealth and honor, and behaued himselfe so in sundrie sorts with his mistrustfull crueltie, that manie there were which deead him, and but a few that loued him, so that in the end being in a manner run into the deablie hatred of all men, he was murthered one night at Ennerlochthe (whither he was come to haue passed ouer into the Fles) by certeine that had conspired his death in the twelfth yeare of his reigne.

The chiefe of the conspirators was one Crathlint the sonne of king Findocke, who immediatlie after the deed done, conueied himselfe secretlie out of the chamber, and repairing vnto certeine nobles and gentlemen inhabiting nere hand in the countrie, he declared vnto them the whole matter, exhorting them to aid him, in reuenging the iniuries done not onelie to them priuatlie, as he knewe verie well; but also to the whole state of the Scottish common welth, by the naughtie suggestion of diuerse of the kings complices, who as yet vnderstood nothing of their maisters death, but were all quiet in their beds, as men suspecting nothing lesse than that which was now happened.

The gentlemen hearing the noises, and reioysing greatly thereat, got them to their weapons, and early in the morn'g dawning of the day, coming upon the kings household maner, they slew about two hundred of them in the place where they lodged, the residue escaping forth of the house, and thinking to save themselves, were beaten downe in the countrey as they passed by the people, who bare so deadly and mortall hatred vnto the late king, that they not onely reioysed much at his death, but thought themselves sufficientlie reuenged, when they could kill any that did belong vnto him.

Crathlint

Crathlint is makinging.

After this, Crathlint being certeinly knowne to be the sonne of king Findocke, by such evident tokens as were shewed by him that brought him vp, was (partly in respect of his iust title, and partly for consideration of his good seruice in deliuering his countrey of so detestable a tyrant) aduanced to the gouernment of the kingdome, by consent of all the estates, and so being confirmed king, he perswaded the people that all the linage of the late tyrant Donald might be plucked vp, even as it were a tree by the roots, least any of them haply remaining aliv, should find meanes afterwards to disturbe the common wealth. The people consented lightlie hereunto, as they that beside the mortall hate which they bare towards Donald, were now suddenly in loue with Crathlint, not onely for his wit and other qualitties of the mind, but also by reason of his comely personage and passing beautie, setting forth all his doings greatly to his high praise and commendation.

The kindmen and friends of Donald of the Isles are persecuted.

The politike gouernment of Crathlint.

The issue therefore with other the kindmen and allies of Donald were sought for, and those that were found, without any difference or respect of age or sex, were cruelly put to death. Which done, Crathlint appointed forth iudges and other administrators of iustice to see the lawes executed, and the countreys gouerned in good and quiet order, euery man being assigned to his owne proper circuit. These he chose out of the most ancient peeres and barons of his realme. The younger sort he referred to attend vpon his person.

Crathlint goeth to hunt in the mounteyns of Strazebene, accidently calling Grampeus mount. An ambassage from the Picts. The Picts require the league to be renewed.

When he had taken direction in this wise for the rule of his kingdome, he went vp into the mounteyns of Strazebene, there to passe the time for a while in hunting the hart, and other wild beastes, whither came vnto him ambassadoes from Thelargus king of the Picts, declaring the toy which their master had conceived for the slaughter of Donald, and the restoring of the right blood againe vnto the estate, requiring that the ancient league betwixt the Picts and Scottishmen might be once againe renewed. Crathlint receiued these ambassadoes most foillie, giuing them heartie thanks on the behalfe of their master for this signification of his good will shewed by their coming, and herewith promised, that during his life he would gladly obserue the old ancient amitie established betwixt the two nations: according to the tenor of the old league. Moreover, when the said ambassadoes should depart, he took vnto them to deliuer from him as a present vnto their master certeine hounds, with bounds and greihounds, such as he thought that king Thelargus wanted.

Crathlint promiser to obserue the ancient amitie betwixt the Scottishmen and Picts. The present sent by Crathlint vnto the king of the Picts. Diuers Pictish lordes come to Crathlint to hunt and make merie with him. A praise of the Scottish dogs.

And shortly after the returne of these ambassadoes into their countrey, diuers young gentlemen of the Pictish nobilitie repaired vnto king Crathlint, to hunt and make merie with him: but when they should depart homeward, perceiuing that the Scottish dogs did farre excell theirs, both in swiftnesse, hardnesse, and also in long standing vp and holding out, they got diuerse both dogs and bit-ches of the best kinds for breed to be giuen them by the Scottish lordes, and yet not so contented, they stole one belonging to the king from his keeper, being more esteemed of him than all the other which he had about him. The master of the leath being informed hereof, pursued after them which had stolen that dog, thinking in deed to haue taken him from them, but they not willing to depart with him, fell at altercation, and in the end chanced to strike the master of the leath through with their bozespheares that he died presentlie, whereupon a noise and crie being raised in the countrey by his seruants, diuerse of the Scots as they were going home from hunting, returned; and falling vpon the Picts to reuenge the death of their fellow, there ensued a shrewd bickering betwixt them, so that of the Scots there died threescore gentlemen, besides a great number of the commons, not one of them understanding (till all was done) what the matter ment. Of the Picts there were about an hundred slaine.

The Picts steal one of the kings best greihounds.

The Scots & Picts fight for a greihound.

What mischief ensued vpon so shabdan occasion as the stealing of a dog. This chanced about the yeere of Christ 188, as lo. Ma. noteth.

The Scots rob the Pictish borders. The Scots & Picts incur a battle.

The kindmen and friends of the Scots that were thus slaine, were wonderfullie moued with the inurie committed, insomuch that without commandement of king or capitaine, they assembled in great numbers together, and entering into the Pictish confines, they began to rob, spoile and kill after the manner of warre, wherewith the Picts being set in a rage, came forth together into the field, and encountering with the Scots, there was fought a sore battle betwixt them, without capitaine, order, or standard, till at length the victorie remained with the Picts, of whom were slaine notwithstanding the day went on their sides, about two thousand men, but of the Scots there died about thre thousand, or more, as was supposed. Thus vpon a light occasion was the league broken betwixt these two nations, who had continued as friends, the one still readie to aid the other, euery sith the daies of king Kentha, being the 7 in number that reigned after Fergus.

The Scots discomfited by the Picts. Of what continuance the league was betwixt the Scots and Picts, & how broken about a small matter as begun about a dog.

Cruell wars

These two nations being thus fallen at debate, it was wonder to vnderstand with what cruellie the one sought to destroye the other. No pittie might moue their cruell hearts to spare either man, woman or child that fell into their hands: such was their inordinate and like desire which they had to shed each others blood. At last Thelargus B. of the Picts being a verie aged man, and perceiuing what mischiefe was happened through the follie of a few wilfull persons, appointed certein of his counsell to go as ambassadoes vnto king Crathlint, to find some means to haue the matter taken vp, for the auoiding of the imminent danger that was like to insue to both nations. They according to their instructions coming to the place where Crathlint as then sojourned, had much ado to get licence to come vnto his presence: but at length being admitted, they used such humble perswasions grounded vpon reasonable considerations, that although no peace could be fullie concluded, yet a truce was granted them for thre moneths space, which was but shortly obserued, for deadly hatred and inward desire of reuenge was entered so farre into the hearts of the commons on both sides, that neither commandement nor punishment might staie them from the innading of one anothers confines, mauer their princes and all their sore restraints.

Thelargus king of the Picts being an aged man, desirous to haue peace, and thereupon sendeth his ambassadoes vnto Crathlint.

A truce granted.

In this meane time was the estate of the Roman empire in Britaine brought into trouble by Carantius, of whom a little before mention hath bene made. great honoz, and was appointed by Dioclesian to haue the souereigne regard ouer the coasts of the French ocean, to defend the same from pirats of the Sarons and other Germans, that sore molested the same in those daies. But for that he used to suffer those rousers to take spoiles and prizes, to the end he might in their returne take the same from them againe, and conuert the gaine wholie to his owne vse, without restoring that which was due to the owners, or sending anie portion thereof to the Romaine emperoz, he was complained vpon, and sent for; but for that he doubted to come to his answer, as one which knew himselfe guiltie, he furnished his nauie with men, vittels and ordinance, and with the same took his course about the west parts of Britaine, and landed in Westmerland, where he easilie procured the people there to submit themselves to be vnder his rule and obeisance, and promised to be liuer them from the greuous yoke and bondage of the Romans.

Thus hauing begun the foundation of that which he purposed to atchiue, for his further advancement therein, he sent ambassadoz vnto his nephew king Crathlint, both declaring what he was, and also excusing the trespass committed against him, for being of counsell touching the murder of his brother Findoche, father to the same Crathlint: and therefore if in putting away all mistrust of his innocencie in that behalfe, he would aid him against the Romans, he doubted not but that he should in short time vntertie expell them out of all Britaine, and enioy all those prouinces within the same (which as then they possessed) vnto his owne vse, and this he said should be moze honoz and gaine both to the Scottisshmen & Picts, if they could be contented to renew friendship, and ioine with them in aid against their common enemies, than to seeke to destroe one another, as he lately understood they had done for a dog.

Crathlint hearing the words of these ambassadoz, reioiseth not a little, that his vnckle Carantius was not onelie aliue, but also had through his valiance atchiued so high renoume as to be accounted one of the worthiest warriors amongst all the Romaine captains. And hereupon with good aduise he determined to aid him in that his enterprise for the conquest of Britaine to the uttermost of his power. Adding further, that if it were not for the warres which he doubted to haue with the Picts, he would not onelie send him aid of men, but also come with them himselfe: and hereof he assured the ambassadoz both by word of mouth and letters. Who returning with such answer vnto their master Carantius, he reioiseth not a little, to vnderstand how well they had sped, and so much the moze, for that he receiued about the same time the like answer from the king of Picts.

Shortlie after he came to an interuiew with the king of Scots at the water of Olke, where after he had purged himselfe with manie words of excuse, touching the murder of his brother Findoche, there was an assured friendship concluded betwixt them. And at the motion of Carantius, Crathlint was contented to come to a communication with the king of Picts, for the conclusion of a peace, to the intent that both of them might ioine their powers together, in aid of Carantius against the Romans. At this communication both the kings met, and Carantius likewise was there, as a man indifferent betwixt them both, to do what he could to linke them both in amitie. And verelie his presence thereunto stood so much in freed, that chieflie through his perswasion grounded vpon great reasons and weightie considerations, they agreed to conclude a peace, and to renew the old league in such maner and forme, and with such conditions, as should be thought requisite by the aduise and discret order of eight ancient persons: foure to be chosen on the one part, and foure on the other. Which eight persons taking the matter in hand, did so aduisedlie giue order for the auoiding of all causes of grudge and hatred, that both parts held them satisfied with their arbitrement and direction, so that a sofull peace was confirmed, and all variance utterly quenched.

In this meane time Quintus Bassianus the Romaine lieutenant in Britaine, vnderstanding how Carantius was thus reuolted, and had not onelie caused them of Westmerland to rebell, but also laine and chased the Romans out of that countrie, he was not a little disquieted, and determined with all speed to go against him, and to reuenge these injuries. Within a few daies after, hauing his armie readie, he entered into Westmerland: but hearing that his enemies were already come to Pothe, and had wonne the citie by surrender, he turned his force thitherward, in purpose to fight with them, though he vnderstood they were in three great battels, as the Scots in one, the Picts in another, and those of Carantius retinue in the third. He lodged that night within a verie strong place, fenced about with marishes.

But Carantius vnderstanding all the maner of his enemies by his espials, and being in campe within ten miles of them or thereabout, in the same night he raised his field without anie great bute, and by the leading of certaine guides he marched straight toward the place where Bassianus was incamped, so that anon after the spring of the day he came thither: whereof Bassianus being aduertised, and perceiuing he should haue battell, maketh readie for the same, giuing the best disposition he could vnto his people to plaie the men: but so much as the most part of his armie were Britains, all his words nothing auailed: for they desirous to see the vnter ruine of all the Romaine power, euen at the verie point when the battels should haue ioined, withdrew themselves apart without anie stroke stricken, and got them by into the next mounteins, to see what would ensue. The residue of the Romaine armie, seeing themselves thus forsaken of their fellows, and their sides left bare and open for the enemy to enter vpon them, fell to plaine running away, but by reason of the marshy ground compassing them in on each side, seruing well to purpose for the Scots, and other the confederates, a great number of the Romans, and other of their part were overtaken and laine. Amongst whom Bassianus himselfe was one, and Viricius the emperors procurator an other.

The Britains (who as is said refused to fight in the beginning of the battell) yielded themselves vnto Carantius, and swore to be his true liegemen and subiects. In like maner Carantius appointed all such of the nobilitie as were betwixt twentie yeeres and threescore, to remaine with him in hostage: but the spoile of the field he diuided amongst his people equallie, so that as well the Scottisshmen and Picts, as also his owne soldiers held them well contented and satisfied therewith. After this victorie Carantius caused himselfe to be proclaimed king of Britaine, blurring the gouernment therof wholie to himselfe, and retaining two thousand of the Scots and Picts to attend vpon the safeguard of his person, sent the residue home laden with riches of the enemies spoile. He sent also with them his ambassadoz, to render thanks vnto both the kings for their aid in this so prosperous a victorie, assigning vnto them as a portion of the conquest, the countie of Westmerland and Cumberland, with all that region which lay betwixt Adrians wall, and the citie of Pothe, to inioy as their owne proper patrimonie for

The persecution of the christians by Dioclesian.

After this, Crathlint king of Scots deliuered from troubles against the Romans, deuised sundrie good ordinances for the quiet state of the Scottish common-wealth, causing the peace to be diligentlie obserued betwixt him and the Brits. Also in his daies the persecution of the christians chanced, which the emperor Dioclesian commanded to be executed in most furious wise, so that there were few partes of the world (where anie christians were knowne to inhabit) that tasted not of that his cruell ordinance and scourge in that behalfe. In Britaine also, as well as in other places, there was no small quantitie of innocent blood shed, with most vnnmercifull murder committed, to the great triumph of Christs crosse, that glorious ensigne of our religion.

In which time Constantius Chlorus father to Constantine the great, was resident in Britaine, who adiudging the Scots to be a people whole giuen to pillage and slaughter, as they were in deed, determined with himselfe to haue brought them to subiection. But yer he could atchieue any notable enterprise, he died, leauing behind him the same of a right gentle and worthy prince, saying that in one point he sore stained his honoz, for that he was one of the chiefe that persecuted the christian flocke vnder Dioclesian, forcing no small number of the faithfull amongst the Britains, to flee vnto the Scots and Brits to auoid his persecution. Whome Crathlint receiued for his part most louinglie, and assigned vnto them (as the Scots say) the Ile of Span for a place of habitation, destroying all such temples of the heathens religion belonging to the Druides, which had continued there since the beginning; and vnterlie abolished all the superstitious rites and customs of the same Druides, with their whole order and brotherhood. He erected a temple there, which he dedicated vnto Iesus Christ our sauour, wherein the christians might celebrate their diuine service, according to their profession. This church being richlie indowed, was the first bishops see amongst the Scots, and thereupon was taken for the mother church of the realme. It is now called the church of saint Sauour. Finally Crathlint departed out of this life, after he had reigned 24 yeeres, being much praised as well for his politike gouernment, as for his great and earnest zeale which he bare toward the aduancement of the true christian religion.

Fincomarke that was his vnckles sonne, succeeded him in the kingdome, & was placed on the stone of marle, to the great reioicing of all the estates, who wished him a prosperous reigne, and long to continue therein. There liued in king Crathlints daies a noble christian called Amphibalus, a Britaine borne, who fleeing from the persecution then raised in his countrie, came vnto the same Crathlint, and by him was created the first bishop of saint Sauours church in Span: this Amphibalus did beare much good amongst the Scots and Britains in setting forth the word of life, and rooting out of their hearts all superstitious errors of blind gentilitie. There were other also of right famous memorie about the same time, that ceased not in preaching, and instructing the people in the right beliefe, as Podocus, Pileus, Calanus, Ferranus, Ambianus, and Carnocus, called by an old ancient name in the Scottish tong Culdei, that is to vnderstand, Cultores Dei, or as you would say in English, the worshippers of God.

But now to the purpose touching Fincomarke, ye shall vnderstand, that he began his reigne in the yeere (as W. Harison saith) after the birth of our Sauour 325, after the creation of the world 4292, and from the first establishing of the Scottish kingdome 652, and in the 20 yeere of Constantine the emperor. It chanced that Ottauius king of the Britains was banquished by Traherus a Romane capteine, and forced for his refuge to flee vnto this Fincomarke then king of Scots, who receiued him as a friend. And furthermore though he were required by Traherus to deliuer him into his hands, as a traitor and a rebell vnto the Romane empire, yet Fincomarke refused so to do, choosing rather to susteine all Traherus his malice, and to haue warrs with the Romane emperor, than to betray his friend who had put his life into his hands vpon an especiall trust of safegard.

Here with Traherus being not a little moued, assembled his polver, and entred into Westmerland, the which countrie had remained in the Scottish mens hands euer since Carantius deliuered it ouer vnto them. Fincomarke hearing that the Romans would thus make him wars, had likewise raised a puissant armie to resist them, so that he had at the least 60 thousand persons together in one armie, as 30 thousand of his owne countriemen, 20 thousand Brits, & ten thousand of such Britains as followed after Ottauius. Fincomarke being thus furnished, hastened forth to encounter with his enemies, before they should haue time to do any notable damage vnto his subiects, & so comming within sight of them, sent an herald vnto Traherus, to vnderstand the cause why he thus invaded his countrie, but receiuing fro him an vntoward answer, he brought forth his people into the field in order readie to giue battell, and so joining with the ennemie, there was fought a right sore and cruell conflict, which continued for a time with vnnmercifull murder and slaughter on both parts.

Finally, when the Romans were at a point to haue got the vpper hand, they were suddenlie put in such feare with the sight of a number of husbandmen, who had got together their cattell and were buying the same abwaie, that supposing they had bene some new succors comming to aid their enemies, they immediatlie fled vpon the same, leauing the victorie to their aduersaries: howbeit of the Scots side were slaine (as their chronicles report) sixtene thousand men, and on the Romane part about sixteen thousand. Traherus himselfe escaped vnto York, but hearing that Fincomarke and Ottauius pursued after him, he forsooke that citie, and got him into places of more suertie, so that when the enemies came thither, the citizens yielded themselves, and receiued Ottauius as their prince, offering from thenceforth to be vnder his rule and gouernement. The newes of these atchieued victories being buied throughout the realme, caused a great number of the nobles to come in vnto Ottauius, who receiued them most thankfullie; & to conclude, wrought so by their support, that he was chozzen after restored to the gouernance of the whole realme, and established therein according to his owne wish.

This done Fincomarke returned into his countrie, as well himselfe as other of his nobles and men of warre, being highlie rewarded for their paines and trauell sustained in that iournie. There was also promise made and confirmed by solemne oth, that the countrie of Westmerland, with such other parts as were assigned to his predecessour king Crathlint, by order of Carantius at the time of their joining together in league against the Romans, should for euer remaine vnto Fincomarke, & to his successors the Scottish kings, without anie claime or title to be made to the same by any of the Britains;

Britains: but this promise was not long kept, for shortly after that Octavius had once chased all the Romans forth of the Britishe confines, and that Trahernus was fled ouer into France, there was a counsell called at York, where it was not onely ordered, that from thenceforth there should neuer anie stranger be suffered to reigne ouer the Britains, but also that the bounds of the realme should be extended forth beyond the wall made (as before is recited) by the emperour Adrian, euen vnto the old ancient bounds and limits, expelling forth the inhabitants of foreyn nations.

Such an immoderate lust of inlarging his dominion inflamed the hart of Octavius, that neither regard of his oth, nor remembrance of benefitts received, might keepe him from seeking to toynge them, whose aid had restored him vnto his former estate and dignitie, as before we haue rehearsed. For hereupon there were ten thousand men of war sent into Westmerland, to the intent to conquer the same out of the Scottisshmens hands: but being incoun-tered with a power of Scottisshmen & Picts, they were thar pelie repelled & quicklie put to flight. About the same time also, Craberus returned out of France with two legions of Romans and twentie thousand of other aids: and giuing battell vnto Octavius, he banquished his armie, and constrained him for his refuge to flee vnto the mouth of Humber, where he got certeine vessels, and sailed into Ffowaisie, there to saue his life, because that Scotland was now no sure refuge for him. Thus was Craberus againe in possession of Brittain as lieutenant to Constantine the emperour: but shortly after he was by certeine conspirators in fauour of Octavius murdered, and then Octavius returned againe: as in the English chronicle is mentioned more at large.

Immediatlie vpon his returne, he reconciled himselfe with Ffincomarke the Scottishe king, and was contented that he should quietlie inioy the countreies of Westmerland and Cumberland, with such other territories as Carantius had granted in former time vnto Crathlin. He likewise sent ship with him, to the intent he might haue aid from him also, if it chanced the Romans eschewes to invade his countreie, as shortly after they did, not ceasing till they had so wearied him with continuall wars, that in the end to be at rest (as his age and other necessities then required) he deliuered into their hands certeine castles and fortresses, and also became tributarie to the emperour, on condition that he might vse the office and name of a king all the residue of his daies. These things being thus quieted in Albion, the Romans, Britains, Scottisshmen and Picts, continued in friendlie peace without any notable trouble, till the ninth yeare of the reigne of Valentinian emperour of Rome: & first of Damasus the pope. In the which yeare Ffincomarke king of Scots departed this life, after he had gouerned the estate aboue 47 yeeres. This was in the yeare of our redemption 172. His Ffincomarke left behind him two sonnes, the one named Eugenius, being as then about 18 yeeres of age; the other hight Ethobius, and was yonger than his brother by one yeere, so that neither of them might succede their father, by reason they were not of yeeres sufficient to rule, according to the ancient ordinance.

Whereupon a counsell was called in Argile, where there was hard hold betwixt the three nephues to king Crathlin, that were begotten by three of his brethren, which of them should gouerne the land: their names were Romacius, Fethelmacus, and Angulfianus. Romacius had a Pictishe ladie of the blood rofall of that nation to his mother, and for that his father was eldest brother next vnto Crathlin, he looked to be preferred, though he himselfe was yonger in yeeres than either Fethelmacus or Angulfianus. Fethelmacus gaue his consent with such votes as he had vnto Angulfianus, where with Romacius being not a little offended, sought meanes to haue destroyed them both: but his practise being discovered, caused manie to withdrau their good will from him, whereby his aduersaries were the more encouraged: and thereupon the counsell brake vp, either part deuising how to strengthen themselves against the others practises. But forsomuch as Angulfianus vsed plaine meanes without any fraudulent dealing, he got the more friends, so that Romacius was constrained in the end to require aid of the king of Picts, who being nere of kin to him, might not denie his request. Angulfianus therefore vnderstanding what danger he was in, if he fell into his aduersaries hands, got together an armie of such as fauoured his cause, and incountring with him in battell was put flight, and forced to flee into the Westerne Isles with his cousin Fethelmacus, where remaining for a while, at length he was aduertised that the inhabitants had conspired against him, for doubt whereof he got him ouer into Ireland.

Angulfianus being thus chased out of the realme, Romacius was receiued by the most part of the nobles and commons for their king. But as the accustomed manner of tyrants, comming thus to the gouernement of a realme through euill meanes, is to rule with crueltie, so did he behaue himselfe, according to that semblable rate, so some as he thought himselfe to be sure of the estate. Wherefore such as had borne any euill will to Ffincomarke, and were out of fauor in his daies, those did Romacius call vnto him, and afterward vsed their counsell aboue all other mens, aduancing them also to most high rule and rich offices. Againe, those which had bene in fauor with Ffincomarke, or bare any affection toward his issue, he sought couertlie to bereaue them both of life, lands and goods, so that by such his doings, there was gathered no light suspition, that he would likewise ver long find meanes to dispatch Ethobius and Eugenius the sons of the same Ffincomarke, thereby to be the more assured of the crowne & kingdome it selfe. The two children also fearing as much on their owne behalfe, by the aduise and helpe of their trustie friends, conueied themselves into Westmerland, and after ouer into the Ile of Man, where they remained looking for a date.

Then began banishments, confiscations of goods, and slaughter of such as were thought to be fauourers of Angulfianus cause, without respect either of sex or age, till the nobles of the realme being not a little moued with such his cruell doings, and tyrannicall gouernment, conspired together by secret meanes how to deliuer their countreie of so pernicious a tyrant. And to bring this their purpose the more speedilie to passe, they wrought so closelie, that they had assembled a great armie, and were come with the same within ten miles of the place where he then late, yet he had any vnderstanding of their enterprise, so that whereas he (being vnprovided of resistance) assaied by flight towards Pictland to haue escaped their hands, it preuailed him nothing, for he was taken by the waie, and receiued such end as his former passed life had verie well deserved, in the fourth yeere of his reigne: his head was set vpon the end of a pole, and carried about to be shewed vnto the people to their great reioicing. There were slain at the same time beside him, diuers Scots & Picts, of counsell with him in all his cruell practises.

After which execution done, they sent for Angulfianus, who returned into Scotland, & was proclaimed king, king, as well by consent of the lords, as fauour of the commons. About the same time, because the Britains had slaine the Romaine lieutenant, the emperor Constantine sent one Maximus thither to chastise the rebels, with whom the same Maximus in countering in battell, gaue them a great overthrow. And within three daies after Maximus king of the Britains, through græse, age, and long sickness, being consumed to the last point, departed this life. He left a sonne behind him named also Maximus, who doubting to fall into the hands of the Romans, fled into the Isle of Man, and remained there certaine yeeres unknowne with Eugenius and Ethodius, the sonnes of Fincomarke. The Britains also persisting in their rebellion, were oftentimes discomfited in battell by Maximus, and soe by him persecuted, till he had brought them againe to their full subjection.

While these troubles continued in Britaine, Augustinus R. of Scots was soe disquieted by Pectanus king of the Picts, who enforced himselfe to reuenge the death of his cousine Romacus, making sundrie rodes & forraies into the Scottish confines, and greatly indamaged the countrie, by spoiling of goods, murdering of the inhabitants, and burning of townes with villages; and in the end hauing his power increased by the aid of certaine Scottish men, which had borne good will vnto Romacus, he pleased soe vpon Augustinus, that he had no remedie but to trie the hazard of battell in a pitched field; for no friendly persuasions to haue peace or anie agreement could be heard, though Augustinus made humble sute to haue purchased the same. Wherefore perceiuing no hope of attonement, he prepared an armie, and met his enimie in the field, where (after some fight and much laughter) the victorie remained with Augustinus and Pectanus with his Picts were chased and forced to saue themselves by flight.

Pectanus himselfe neuer rested till he came vnto Camelon, where he called a councell of his nobles to haue their aduise by what meanes he might be reuenged of the injuries received by the Scots, whereof he was most desirous, not regarding into what danger he brought his owne realme, so he might somewhat ease his rancour and displeasure, which he had thus conceived against his enimies the Scots. Pectanus wanted there diuers great personages in that assemblie, which (to content his mind and to win fauour of him) set forward the matter in such earnest wise that (notwithstanding what other could say to the contrarie) it was ordeined that with all speed an armie should be leuied, and led forth into the Scottish borders. Pectanus hauing thus the consent of his nobles to invade the Scots anew, caused men of warre to be taken by through all the parties of his dominion, and that of the choicest men that might be got; the which being once assembled, he staid not long but set forward with them, and entred into Balendar wood, spoiling and destruction all afoze him at his owne will and pleasure.

Augustinus vnderstanding his furie, and doubting least the Britains through setting on of the Romans should seeke to ioine with the Picts, to the destruction of the Scots, thought good to assaie if by anie friendly meanes he might bring Pectanus to fall vnto some reasonable point, rather than by the warres to indanger both the Pictish and Scottish estates, in putting the same in aduenture to fall into the hands of their ancient enimies the Romans and the Britains. Wherevpon therefore he wrote vnto Pectanus a gentle letter, declaring therein all such dangers and inconueniences as might issue by this warre thus by him attempted. And againe, how necessarie it were for both the nations to haue peace together as then, considering how it was not to be thought that Maximus the Romaine legat (hauing now all the Britains at his commandement) would rest (if occasion were offered) till that he had fullie subdued both the Scots and Picts: for the auoiding of which perill he offered for his part, to accept anie reasonable conditions of peace, that should by him be prescribed.

But Pectanus in no wise would giue eare to anie treatie of peace, so that Augustinus being forced to giue battell for defense of his subiects, brought his people into the field, and exhorting them to plaie the men with sundrie comfortable words, he placed them in order of battell. On the other part Pectanus likewise encouraged his folkes to doe valiantlie, so that the archers on both sides stepped forward, letting their arrowes flie frae one at an other, vntill at length comming to handblowes they stroke on freshlie, beating downe and killing without sparing on either side, so that a good space the victorie was doubtfull. At length Augustinus perceiuing his people to be put to the worst, rushed forth into the thickest of the preale amongst his enimies, where he was quicklie espied, oppressed with preale, and slaine out of hand. The most part of his people mistaking him, & not vnderstanding what was become of him, supposed that he had bene fled, and therefore fell also to running away; but the residue that stood still at their defense were slaine downe right. Thus the victorie remained with the Picts, but neither part had anie cause to reioice, for the capitains on both sides were slaine, besides manie thousands of other; so that aswell the one nation as the other departed from the place right penfise and sorrowfull, giuing manie a soze curtle vnto such as had bene the procurers and nourishers of such detestable hatred betwixt those two nations, which had so long a time bene contained in the faithfull band of amitie, to the great quiet and wealth of both the countries. After this bloodie battell, aswell the Scots as Picts sat still for a season, not attempting anie enterprize of importance the one against the other.

Augustinus reigned not past two yeares before he was slaine thus in the field, as before ye haue heard, in whose place succeeded his cousine Fethelmacus with little better successe: for in the second yeare of his reigne, desirous to be reuenged of the Picts, he assembled an armie, and entering into Angus, began to spoile & slaue downe right all that was before him, without regard to impotent, aged, tender infants, or other. The Picts also being kindled herewith, gathered their power together, and encountering with the Scots, there was a soze battell fought betwixt them: but the Scots first putting the wings of their enimies host to flight, at length discomfited their maine battell also, being left naked on both sides of all aid or succour, great slaughter was made in the chase of the Picts as they fled hither and thither to saue themselves. So that among other, their king named Pectanus, brother to the aboue remembred Pectanus, being wounded with an arrow, died within three daies after this cruell conflict was ended. The courage of the Scots now being advanced with this their prosperous successe, they passed forthwith ouer the riuer of Laie, to rob, harrie, and spoile the countrie of Fife.

The Picts, perceiuing themselves not to be strong enough to match with their enimies in plaine field at hand-strokes, determined yet with skirmishes and light encounterings (if it were possible) to keepe them off from the winning of anie of their fenced townes, castles or strong holds. And to the more able to maintaine themselves in this their purposed intention, they did chose on Heirgust to their king, a man of subtil nature and craftie imagination. This Heirgust deuiling how to deliuer his countrie of such an intollerable enimie as Fethelmacus was, procured two lie fellows Picts by nation, to counterfeit themselves for Scots, and for that they were cunning throwers of the dart, in which kind of exercise the same Fethelmacus took great pleasure, they were appointed to make sute to be in seruice with him, to the intent that when they might espie their time, they should slea him, by one kind of meane or other.

They (according as they were instructed, comming into Scotland) found meanes not onelie to haue place in the kings house, but also to corrupt one of his musicians an harper, and to bring him to be of counsell with them in this their wicked purpose. By reason whereof, in one night as he late at Carrike, where he was busie to make his piousson there for the warres against the Picts, the same musician (having plaied in the kings bed-chamber till he had brought him asleepe) did let in those two Pictish traitors, who forthwith slue him euen as he late so sleeping: but the king growing greivouslie at the deablie stroke, some of them that watched before the chamber dore perceiuing what was happened, followed after the murderers, who fled with all speed vnto the next mounteins, where they sought to defend themselves with hurling downe stones, vpon them that came by towards them: but in the end, being taken, and confessing the deed, with the whole manner of the same, they were drazwen in peeces with wild horses: the musician also being apprehended and conuict of the treason, suffered semblable like kind of death. Fethelmacus came to his end in the third yeare of his reigne, being the second yeare after the death of the emperour Valentinian.

In this season (as in times past hath bene beleued) certaine bones of the apostle saint Andrew were brought forth of Achala, a prouince in Grecia, into Scotland by a Greckish monke named Regulus Albatius, commonlie called S. Keule, a man in those daies highly esteemed, for the opinion which the world had conceiued of him for his holie and vertuous life, to whome king Heirgust gaue his palace that stood in that part of Fife, where the same Regulus first landed; at whose contemplation also, he erected a church in old time called Kirraruill, that is, the church of S. Keule, afterwards named the old church of S. Andrews, standing in the abbie churchyard, where the chanoins were wont to be buried. But to leaue this matter to the further report and credit of the Scottish chronicles, we will proceed with our purpose. After the death of Fethelmacus, the nobles and commons of the Scottish nation sent into the Ile of Man for Eugenius the sonne of king Fincomarke, where he with his brother Ethobius had remained, during the daies of the thre last remembered kings, Romacus, Angulianus, and Fethelmacus.

This Eugenius at his comming into Albanie was inuested king of the Scots by common consent of all the nation. About the same season, Sparimus the Romane lieutenant in Britaine, vnderstanding of the late dissention betwixt the Scottishmen and Picts, deuised which waies he might best subdue both those nations, thereby not onelie to enlarge the bounds of the Romane empire, and to deliuer the Britains from inuasions of those so cruell enimies, but also to haue the south part of the Ile more obedient and loiall vnto the same empire than heretofore it had bene. He thought good therefore in the beginning to assaie if he might ioine in friendship with the one of the nations, till he had destroyed the other: for he considered it would be an hard peece of worke to haue to doe with them both at one instant. Wherevpon directing his letters vnto Heirgust king of the Picts, he required to renew the old league with him and his people, promising to aid him against the Scots, common enimies not onelie to the Pictish nation, but also to all such people as loved rest and quietnesse, as might easilie be perceiued by their continuall practise and vage, neuer seeking to disturbe their neighbors with rodes & forraies, so that it stood with a generall commonwealth to haue them bitterlie destroyed and extirped.

Heirgust right iollull of these newes, gaue hartie thanks vnto almighty God, that had moued the Romane lieutenant to make such offer vnto him, whereby the furious rage of the Scots might be once repressed, and put away from his people; & therefore willing to confirme a friendship with the same lieutenant, he promised to renew the league betwixt the Romans and Picts, vpon any reasonable conditions which he should deuise, not onelie requiring an aid at this time against the said Scots, but also at all other, as occasion should demand. Sparimus hauing receiued this answer, he found means also to come to a communication with Heirgust nere to Forke, where the league was confirmed betwixt them, and therein the Scots not onelie adidged for common enimies, both to the Romans and Britains, but also to the Picts. And further therewith were certaine orders appointed how the war should be pursued with all expedition against them. These things thus finished, and both the princes returned to their homes, Sparimus sent an herald vnto Eugenius the Scottish king, commanding him on the behalfe of the Romane empire, to make restitution for all wrongs and iniuries done vnto the Pictish nation. And further, to deliuer into the hands of Heirgust the R. of the Picts, the authours of the same wrongs and iniuries to be punished at his discretion, or if he would refuse thus to doe, that then he should looke to haue the emperour and the Romane people enimies vnto him and all his nation.

Eugenius for answer herevnto, declared that since he entred into the gouernment of the Scottish estate, he had done nothing that might be thought prejudiciall either to the Romans or to the Britains their subiects; and as for the Picts, he would be glad to haue peace with them, if there might be amends made for all displeasures done on either part, according as should be thought to stand with equitie and reason. Neither did he see what cause the Romans should haue to make warres for the Picts against those that had done them no displeasure: but if it were so that he must needs haue wars, he would do what in him lay to defend the libertie of the Scottish nation, trusting chiefly in the succours of almighty God, who vsed to fauour the cause of the iust and innocent, against such as sought to wrong them vpon feined quarrels, without occasion giuen. Sparimus receiuing this answer from Eugenius, assembled with all speed a strong & mightie armie of Romans, Britains, and Frenchmen, with the which entring into Westmerland, he spoiled that countrie most miserable, taking diuers castles and strong holds by force, the which he furnished with garrisons of his people, and then passing into Anandale, burned and harried the same; from thence he entred into Galloway, omitting no kind of tyrannie that might be thined against the inhabitants, so that the feare was great throughout all the countrie: for of manie yeares before, so great an armie had not bene seene in those parties.

Eugenius notwithstanding, gathering his power together, determined to trie the fortune of battell, and so joining with his enemies nere unto the water of Cree, his people were quicklie put to flight, and chased, by reason that they were much inferior in number. But the Romans pursuing the chase, happened to light amongst them of Argile, which had not bene at the battell, but were coming towards it, and now fiercelie encountering with such as pursued their friends, they caused them to retire backe with some losse, whereupon the other Scots also (which were chased) returned, & gaue a fresh onset, so that if night had not come on the soner, there had bene a far greater multitude of the Romans slaine in that bickering than they themselves did thinke of. Whereupon the Romans, doubting what their enimies intended to doe, they fortified their campe that night verie strongly; but Eugenius understanding what a multitude of his folks were slaine in the battell, so that the verie streame of the water of Cree was stopp'd by with dead carcasses, he thought best (with the aduise of the pæres) to licence his people to depart to their homes, and not to fight with his enemies anie more for that time.

Which being done, he himselfe repaired the same night unto Carrike, where he remained for a season, making prouision for defense of his realme the best he could devise. Marinus hauing knowledge in the morning how the Scots were quite gone their waies, he determined to haue followed them; but being certified of a rebellion amongst the Britains in Kent, he changed his purpose, and returned thitherwards, to appease that tumult, leauing in Galloway a good part of his armie to keepe such holds as he had got in that voiage. The yeare following, Marinus was so buisied in the south parts of Britaine, that he could not attend vnto the warres against the Scots, otherwise than in mainteining such garrisons as he had placed in their countries, by reason whereof sundrie bickerings happened betwixt them of the same garrisons and the Scots, who laboured not onelie to deliuer their owne countrie out of the hands of all forrainers, but also to inuade and deströie Pictland, so that they harried the countrie of Fife, with part of Spenteth and Sterling thire, burning & waiking towne, castles, and houses most cruellie.

Whereof Marinus being certified, made semblance as though he were sore grieued therewith, but inwardlie he could haue reioiced at nothing more than to heare of the injuries don by the Scots vnto the Picts, supposing it to make chiefe for his purpose; and hereupon preparing an armie against the next summer, when he had disposed all things in a quiet order amongst the Britains, he set forward with the same towards Galloway, where being arriued, there was no kind of crueltie spared against the poore inhabitants. Eugenius in the meane time understanding the coming of his enemies, mustered his people, and appointed the assemblie to be made in the countrie of Aile, which way he heard that his enemies would trauell. Thither came also not onlie all the able men of the Scottish dominions, but likewise a great number of lustie & strong women apt to beare armour according to the old accustomed guise of their nation, so that there were numbered in this armie fiftie thousand persons right fierce and hardie, desirous either to vanquish the enemie with dint of sword, or else to die presentlie in the place.

Marinus hearing that the Scots were thus in-camped in Aile, marched towards them, and lodged the same night not far off from the riuer of Spunda, where knowledge was giuen vnto Eugenius, that Marinus was come within fife miles of him, with a greater armie than he had at his last in-countring with him in Galloway. These aduertise-ments caused no small stir to be raised in the campe, some being stricken with present feare: where other contrariwise moued with high indignation, desired nothing so much as to ioine in battell with the Romans, whose cruell tyrannie they much detested.

Eugenius himselfe shewed no countenance of feare at all, but encouraging his people with comfortable words, he brought them streight in order of battell, divided into three wards, committing one of them to the leading of his brother Ethobius, the second to Doalus the gouernour of Argile, & reseruing the third to himselfe. This done, he made vnto them a pithie oration, declaring how necessarie it was for them to plaie the men, considering that in victorie consisted the onelie hope of libertie; and in being vanquished, their countrie was endangered to be brought into perpetuall bondage for ever, for the onelie marke which the Romans shot at, was to op-presse the libertie of the whole Iland, and to reduce the same into the forme of a prouince, to be gou-erned at the will of the victors, to the breach of all their old ancient lawes & long continued customs.

With these and manie other like reasons he went about to incourage the minds of his subiects, in such wise, that in manner the most part of them determined rather to die with honor, than to liue in such miserie as they feared would insue, if the victorie shuld rest vpon the Romans side. And as they were in such talke together, suddenly cometh in one of their scouts with newes, that Marinus with his armie was euen at hand. This was in the morning, anon after the sunne was vp, where he was not loked for till the evening following, insomuch that the same his sudden arrivall, chancing so farre contra-rie to their former expectations, troubled all their heads, and brought them into a great maze, for that hereby they were constrained to change the order of their battels to haue the sunne on their backs, as they had prouided at the first it should haue bene, if the enemies had not come untill the after none. Yet notwithstanding, they had no soner changed their place, and gotten themselves into arraie of battell again, but that with great violence they pressed forward to giue the onset vpon the Romans. Which Marinus perceiuing, made all the speed he could to set his men in order of battell, that he might receiue his enemies coming thus to encounter him. So both sides being fullie bent to battell, and approached within danger of shot, they let flie the same most e-gerlie, albeit that through hasting forth to ioine at hand-strokes, there was little hurt done with bowes or darts.

The Scots crying vpon the name of their wo-thy and famous ancesto king Cald, did laie about them, most fiercelie, after they came once to the joining: and likewise the Romans, being incouraged with the cherefull words of the lieutenant Mar-inus, boldlie encountered them, so that it was doub-full at the first whether part shuld haue the worse end of the strife. But shortly there followed variable successe, for on the one part, they of Rolfe and Mar, being appointed vnder Ethobius to encounter that wing of the enemies where the Picts were, fought so egerlie and with such fierce wills, that they easlie long and cruell fight were there slaine in the place, greatlie to their fame and glorie for euer, so that by this meanes the maine battell of the Scottishmen, wherein Eugenius himselfe stood amongst his people, was left bare & naked on both the sides. Which Marinus perceiuing, he caused the same to be assailed on each part with such violence, that in the end longer resistance preuailed not, but that their maine battell must needs be opened perforce, by meanes whereof Eugenius choosing rather to die in the place, than either to saue his life by flight, or by rendering himself into his enimies hands to liue in miserie, as was there slaine, together with a great number of his nobles and gentlemen, hauing determined by the example of their maister to die rather speedilie with honoꝛ, than longer to liue with shame and reproch. Thus Eugenius lost his life with his kingdome, in the third yere after his first entering to the rule, hauing inioied few good daies in rest during the said time.

Such of the Scots also as were appointed to keepe the carriage and trusse of the field, seeing their lordes and maisters thus slaine, rushed forth with such weapons as they had at hand, in purpose to slea some number of their enimies, not passing though it should cost them also their owne liues, so that they might die reuenged. The slaughter was great which at the first was made, more through an obstinate desire of reuenge, than by anie valiant activitie: but this companie being anon broken in sunder, and driven backe, they were finally slaine & beaten downe. Moreover, the Romans that pursued in chase after their enimies, when the battell was done, encountered with great numbers of such women and aged persons as followed a farre off, to vnderstand the successe of the field, doubting what hap might fall to their children and kinsfolks; whose slaughter when they perceiued, like people enraged they slue vpon such Romans as they met with; but being easilie vanquished, and refusing to flie, they were also slaine and cut in peeces in a most miserable maner.

The Romans hauing thus rid the fields of all kind of enimies, lodged that night abroad here and there at their pleasure, where they might heare the dolefull growlings, and lamentable complaints of them that lay wounded, and as yet not dead, cursing most bitterlie the cruell tyrannie and couetous ambition of the Romans, with that most detestable disloyaltie of the Brits, procuring this murder and destruction of those people that had deserved farre otherwise at their hands. When the morning was come, & the light appeared, Marinus the lieutenant caused the spoile of the dead bodie to be gathered, & equallie diuided amongst his men of warre. And such as were found fore wounded and not dead, to shew some token of clemencie, according to the old accustomed maner of the ancient Romans, he commanded surgeons to see to the cure of them. The other being dead, he suffered to be buried, causing the corps of Eugenius himselfe to be interred in most solemne and pompous sort, after the vsage of the Roman princes.

His brother Ethodius being found mangled in most pittifull wise, and in maner halfe dead, was also taken by by commandement of the same Marinus, and surgeons charged to haue the ordering of him, and to shew their diligence for the cure of his hurts in most speedie and gentle wise. The victorie thus atchieued, Marinus surueteth the countries of Bile, Carrike, and Coningham, with that also of Calidone, and seizeth the same into his hands, suffering the inhabitants to inioy both gods and lands in peace and quietnesse vpon their othes of allegiance, without anie further molestation. Petruss king of the Brits with other the nobles of that nation, were nothing contented therewith, desirous to see the bitter destruction of all the Scottish race. Wherevnto Marinus at the first would not agree, alleging the ancient custome of the Romans, who sought rather to vanquish by benefits, than by the sword, euer vsing to spare such as submitted themselves, and in no wise to spot the honour or maiestie of their empire with crueltie.

But the Brits not satisfied herewith, went about earnestlie to perswade him in no condition to suffer the Scots to haue anie abiding within the confines of Britaine, if he wished anie quietnes in the estate thereof, for their delight (said the Brits) was onelie set to seeke occasion how to disturbe the peace, to liue by the pillage and spoile of their neighbours, and namelie of the Brits, vnto whose confusion (as the prophetes spake) they were begotten and borne. Finally when all their earnest sute missed the wished effect, they fell to and assaied if they might bring that to passe by wicked meed and thorough corrupting bribes, the which they could not do by other meanes. And euen as it oftentimes chanceth in such cases, where words are but spent in wast, gifts yet preuaile: so also came it to passe euen here, for at length a proclamation came forth by procurement of the Brits, that all such as were naturall Scottishmen, should by a certeine date auoid out of those countries that they possessed in Britain, vpon paine of losing life and goods, & to deliuer by their houses and lands vnto such Britains and Brits as were appointed by the Romans for to inioy the same.

The Scots perceiuing themselves not able to make anie resistance, obeyed this commandement, some of them passing ouer into Ireland, some into the westerne Isles, and some of them got ouer also into Portugal, and Denmarke, and manie there were that got intertainment amongst the Roman souldiers, and went ouer with them into France, as yet Gallia, to serue in the warres there, and in other places vnder the emperors ensignes. The Brits were so cruell and diligent to see all the Scottish linage confined, that they would not consent that a certeine number of gentlewomen should remaine behind, who had their husbands slaine in the last warres, and made intercession in most lamentable wise vnto Marinus, that they might be permitted to abide in their native countrie all the residue of their liues, though in seruile estate, to the end that they might be buried after the same were once ended in graues with their slaine husbands.

Moreover, where Cartandis queene of the Scots, late wife vnto Eugenius, was brought vnto Marinus, with two gentlewomen and a grome from the towne of hir husband, where she had remained euersith his buriall in continuall mourning, forsomuch as she was a Britain, and descended by linage from the princes of Wales; Marinus lamenting hir miserable case, assigned the citie of Carrike vnto hir, with certeine other revenues for the maintenance of hir estate. But after she had taken leaue of such as had the conduction of hir, and was come into a village not farre from Carrike aforesaid, it chanced that a sort of British ridders, or (as I may call them) robbers, met with hir, small to hir profit, and lesse to their owne ease, for they did not onelie slea hir grome, but also beat hir gentlewomen, and stripped both them and hir of all that they had, whereof Marinus being informed, caused them that had done so vile a deed to be apprehended & executed by death, according as they had deserved. The queene herselfe being brought backe vnto Marinus, and honorable intreated, had all hir substance restored vnto hir againe, so nere as it was possible.

But the Scots being offended herewith, and spe-ciallie for putting to death of their men, fundrie of their nobilitie came unto Marinus, and began to make a foze complaint in that behalf, declaring that the deserts of their nation had not bene such toward the Romane empire, as to haue their people put to execution for a womans sake, being both an enemie and a prisoner, therefore they required that he might be confined into Britaine, and according to the tenor of the proscription, spoiled of all his goods. Here Cartandis being present his selfe, began to make pittifull lamentation, bewailing his most unhappie state, in that contrarie to the order of his wretched case and present miserable fortune, he should now be forced to turne againe into his coun-trie: wishing rather than he should be enforced so to do, that he might offer up his life as a sacrifice in the place of his husbands buriall: and therefore holding up his hands unto Marinus in most pittifull wise, he besought him instantlie, that it might please him, either to suffer him to passe the residue of his life after such sort as he thought best agreed with his widowlike estate, or else to take the same from him presentlie by some violent meanes of execution.

There was not a man other than the Scots, that saw and heard him at that instant, but lamented his woofull distresse, so that in the end the request of the Scots was disallowed, & Cartandis hauing liuing assigned him for the maintenance of his degree, was licenced to depart into what place he thought expedient, there to liue as he thought best without let or disturbance. The same time the Scottish bishops and priests, being banished as well as the other sort of the Scottish people, a number of their monks got them into the Ile of Iona, now called Cohnickill, where they erected a monasterie for their owne habitation, the two thinesses whereof hath bene right famous, euen vnto these our daies, as that which was afterward indowed with manie faire reuenues by diuers of the Scottish kings, who had their burials there after the returne of the Scots into Albanie as shall be hereafter exprest.

The yeare in the which the Scottishmen were thus vanquished by the Romans and Scots, and finally confined out of their seats, was from the creation of the world 4319, after the birth of our saviour 352, from the beginning of the Scottish kingdome 679, and the third yeare of Marcinus. The same yeare before Eugenius came battell vnto Marinus, manie strange sights were seene in the furthest part of Albion, striking a wonderfull dread in manie mens hearts. In the night season in the aire were seene fierie swords and other weapons mouing in a long ranke, after comming together on a heape, and being changed into an huge flame as it had been a firebrand, it then vanished awaie. The waters of the riuier of Dune ran with blood, the banks of the same riuier flashed oftentimes as they had bene all on a fire.
There were seene also a number of small birds fall out of the aire so thicke, that it seemed it had rained birds, and incontinentlie came a great number of ravens that denoured by the same.

Certeine witnes and soothsayers, declaring that these things betokened the destruction of the Sco-tish kingdome, were commanded by the priests to hold their peace on paine of death, as they that told nothing but lies & fables, though afterwards their tales proved most true. But to returne to our historie, Ethodius the brother of Eugenius being cured (as is said) by commandement of Marinus, was yet banished amongst the residue, and constrained to take an oth, that he should immediatlie repaire into Denmarke, and hereafter not to approch nearer vnto the coasts of Albion, for doubt of some new attempt that might be made by the Scots through his meanes, thereby to returne into their countrie againe, & to recouer their former state. But this staied not them of the westerne Isles, but that assembling themselves together, and choosing one Gillo to their capitaine, they passed ouer into Argile, where in the end they were incountried by such Scots as were set there to defend that countrie, and slaine each mothers sonne. Their vessels were also taken and brought into fundrie hauens of the countrie, to serue for defense of the coasts vpon any new enterprise which the Scots should chance to make: but the other Scots, perceiuing they were not able to sur-uive forth a new armie in the Isles by any aid they might purchase there, sailed ouer into Ireland, where presenting themselves vnto the king of that region, they declared vnto him from point to point all their infortunate chances and lamentable calamities, which were happened vnto them of late through the tyrannicall puillance of the Romans, and malicious enuite of the Scots, in such sort as nothing could be more miserable than their present estate, considering the ruine of so mightie a kingdome, and the small banishment of the inhabitants from their houses and lands, which had bene in possession of them and their elders, by the space almost of seuen hundred yeares.

The Irish king with his nobles moued with pitie to heare and vnderstand so dolefull calamities, to haue chanced vnto that nation, whose good or bad hap could not but touch them verie nere, considering they were descended both of one progenie, comforted these Scottishmen to the best of their power, and in the end concluded to aid them with ten thousand men, and to furnish them forth with ships, vittels, and munitions to passe into Albanie for recouerie of their countrie. This aid being put in a readines, and the ships rigged and decked as was requisite for such an enterprise, they took the sea, and landing in Cantire, chanced to meet with Heirdorlane brother to Heirgull king of the Scots, accompanied with a great number of Scots and Britains assembled to defend the countrie, but being charpely affected of the Scots and Irishmen, they were quicklie put to flight, & such as were overtaken died on the sword, to the great terror of all the new inhabitants that were planted on their parts.

This victorie thus atchieued, there were that gaue counsell not to attempt fortune ouer farre, but to take such booties of goods and prisoners as they had got in the countrie, and to returne therewith into Ireland. Other were of a contrarie opinion, supposing it best to follow the victorie, and either to recouer againe their ancient seats, or else to die in the valiant attempt thereof. Which aduise was followed as the best, though it proued otherwise: for before they could come to any conclusion of that enterprise, the Romans, Scots, and Britains gathered themselves together, and gaue battell againe to the Scottish and Irish companie, wherein they ouer-threw them, to their vtter ruine and destruction.

The newes of this infortunate encounter being brought into Ireland, put the king and his nobles there in such feare of the Romans, that they thought it best with all speed to send ambassadors vnto Marinus to sue vnto him for peace. They that were sent at the first were soze blamed and checked by Marinus, for that they had aided the Scottishmen in the last inuasion made into Albion: but at length accepting their excuse, he granted a peace vpon certaine conditions, whereof the most principall article was, that in no wise they should receiue aid, or succor any enemie to the Romane empire. This Marinus hauing got a quiet peace on each side, used all meanes possible how to procure the love of his souldiours and men of war, shewing himselfe not onelic gentle, courteous and meke towards them, but also so liberal and free, that his bounteous gifts passed all wonderstanding: insomuch that (as is reported by writers) he bestowed in one daie nere hand as much in rewards, as the revenues of Britaine yielded to the empire in a whole yere.

This franke liberalitie and courteous behauior he used not onelic towards the Romans, and his other men of warre, but also towards the Britains and Picts, conforming himselfe so nere unto their maners & fashions, that at his coming into Piceland, he laid awaie his Romane apparell, and araied himselfe in garments after the Pictish guise. By this manner of meanes therefore he wan him such love and fauor, as well amongst his souldiours, as also amongst the Picts and Britains, that in the end by common consent they chose him for emperor, in the 38. yere after Christ, professing generalitie, that they would owe onelic their obseuance vnto him as to their supreme gouernor. Where the Scottis chronicles somwhat varie from other writers, who affirme that Sparinus was thus aduanced to the imperiall dignitie, rather by constraint of his men of warre, than by anie meanes which he of himselfe used to attaine vnto the same. Where the said chronicles neuertheless shew, that it came chieflie to passe by his owne seeking, procuring certeine persons to worke for him as instruments to frame other to this his purposed intent. He held the dominion of the empire being thus preferred to the imperiall state, the space of fise yeres, all the countries and people of Albion being at his commandement without contradiction: which had not chanced vnto anie one man before his time, since the Ile was first inhabited. At length desirous of more empire, he passed ouer into France with a great armie, in purpose to subdue all France and Italie, with such other countries as were obedient vnto Gratian as then emperor of Rome. But how prosperously he sped in the beginning, and how at length he was slaine at Aquila in Italie, ye shall find in the historie of England a great deale more at large.

By reason of such trouble in the estate of the Romane empire, Marcian the sonne of Marcian late king of the Britains, the which (as before is said) fled into the Ile of Man, & after departing from thence, got ouer into France, returned now into Britaine, and did so much there, that the Britains receiued him to their king: but shortly after he was constrained to agree with the Romane emperor Theodosius, so that the Britains should paie their wonted tribute, and liue vnder such lawes as by the emperor should be to them prescribed. In all other respects, Marcian should be reputed during his life for king. Immediately hereupon two lieutenants were sent from Theodosius, of whome the one named Martinus sojourned at London, and the other called Maximine at Poyke. And with all expedition they began to put the Romane lawes in practice, abolishing the old Britissh lawes, to the great offense of manie that could not well brooke strange ordinances; & namely the Picts repined sore therat, and used most an end their owne lawes and constitutions, greatlie to the contempt of the Romane estate. Whereof Maximine, the one of the Romane lieutenants hauing knowledge, gaue streight commandement vnto Heirgust the Pictish king, that in no wise he should suffer the old lawes and rude ordinances of his countrie, to be used anie longer amongst his subjects, vpon paine that might insue for disobedience shewed towards the maiestie of the Romane empire.

and miserie his countrie was brought, by meanes of the warres which he had procured against his neighbours the Scottisshmen, as a man sore repenting his passed follie, and seeing no readie meane present how to reforme the same, being aged and sore broken with continuall sicknesse, he got himselfe secretlie into his priue chamber, where immediatlie he slue himselfe, to be rid of the sight of that present seruile estate, into the which he saw both him and his whole countrie reduced. Whose death being once knowne, Maximine commanded that the Picts should not chose anie other from thenceforth to reigne as king ouer them, nor to obeye anie other magistrates but onlie such as should be appointed to haue the gouernment of them, by commandement and commission of the Romane emperor. For it was agreed, as he allowed, by the tenor of the league, concluded betwixt Heirgust and Sparinus, that after the deceasse of the same Heirgust, all his dominions should be gouerned by Romane officers in forme of a prouince. Notobest the Picts nothing regarded the wordes of Maximine, but by common agreement did chose one Durstus the second sonne of Heirgust to be their king.

Whereupon Maximine being informed of their doings, raised a power, and made such speed towards them, that he was gotten so nere vnto the citie of Camelon, per they had anie knowledge of his approach, that Durstus with other of the nobles, being as then within the same, could not haue space to escape their waies, but being forthwith besieged within it, at length they were taken by force of assalt, and the citie sacked, to the great enriching of the Romane armie, and utter vndoing of the poore inhabitants. Durstus with other the chiefe prisoners were first had vnto London, & from thence conueied to Rome, there to haue iudgement by decree of the senat. The residue of the nobles that were taken there, suffered in the market place at Camelon. Thus was that tumult appeased, and the Picts commanded to paie yeavlie vnto the emperors procurator the fourth part of all their revenues growing of their corne and cattell. Beside this tribute he charged them also with diuerse base seruices, as to labor in mettall mines, to dig stoness south of the quarries, and to make bycicke to be sent into Britaine, or into other places whither it pleased him to command it.

The cause why he burdened them in such sort, was (as he said) to teach them to know themselves. For they were become so loslie, since the departure of the Scottisshmen out of the Ile, that if they were not restrained in time by authoritie of the Romane puissance, the whole Britissh nation were like to be shortly disquieted by their wilfull meanes and insolent presumptions. Neither was it thought sufficient vnto Maximine, to charge the Picts in maner as is before specified; but to their further graevance he deuised an other waie, whereby to byzing them in the end vnto utter destruction, which was this: he constrained them together with their wiues, children, & whole families, to remoue beyond the water of Forth, and to leaue all the countries on this side the same water, as well those which they ancientlie had inhabited, as the other which of late appertained to the Scots, and were assigned to them by Sparinus to possesse, after that the Scots were expelled.

All which countries thus by the Picts now left void, were appointed by Maximine to the Britains, as subjects to the empire, to be inhabited. And for a perfect diuision betwixt the Picts and the same Britains, he commanded a wall to be made, & a trench to be cast along by the same, from Abircoyne, through the territorie of Glascoyne vnto Alcluth, or Alcluth, now called Dunbretton, so running from the

the east sea to the west. Here to proclamation was made, that if any of the British nation did enter-prise to passe this wall, and to enter into the British confines without licence of the magistrats, he should die for it. Whylest the Scots through their owne fault are thus brought into most miserable subiection of the Romans, the Scottishmen (as is said) being banished the land, liued in other countries by shifting out the time so well as they might, some continuing with their wiues and children, got a poyse liuing with their hands, exercising some science or occupation. Other there were that followed the warres, and serued vnder sundrie worthie capitaine here and there, as occasion serued.

But Ethodius the brother of Eugenius comman-dered (as is said) to go into Denmarke, was iustly receiued of the king there; who also gaue him an office, therewith to mainteine his degree, so that he liued there certeine yeeres in right honorable estate, and begot of his wife whome he brought thither with him forth of Albanie, a sonne named Erthus, who after his fathers deceasse had issue by his wife called Kocha a ladie of high parentage amongst the nobles of Denmarke, as daughter to one Konichus, second person of the realme) a sonne named Fergus, whose chance was afterwards to restore the Scottish nation againe to their former estate and kingdom. In his young yeeres he was appointed to serue vnder Alarike the Gothic king in that famous voyage which he took in hand against the Romane empire. For such was the hate as then of all the northerne regions & kingdoms towards the Romane name, that by generall agrément they conspired together to the vtter ruine and finall destruction thereof. And so ech of them sent forth a power in aid of the said Alarike, chosen by common consent as generall of the whole enterpryse.

Fergus being set forth by the king of Denmarke with a power of Danes, and with a chosen number of such Scottishmen as were withdrawne into those parties, went with the better will, for that beside the common quarrell, he bare a private grudge towards the Romans for the vsing of his ancessors so cruellie in expelling them out of their owne homes and native countrie. This Fergus was present with the Gothes at the winning of Rome, in the sacking thereof, amongst other spoiles, he got (as is reported) a certeine chest full of booke, the which some hold opinion he brought afterwards into the westerne Isles, and caused them to be kept in Iona, now Col-mechill, within a librarie there builded for the same intent. Which booke (as is to be supposed) were certeine histories or monuments of old antiquities. But the same were so defaced in the daies of Hector Boetius (who, as he himselfe writeth, caused them to be brought ouer to him to Aberdene) that it could not be understood of what matter they intreated.

It is written moreover of Fergus, that he continued with Alarike in all his enterprises, so long as he liued, and afterwards serued vnder his successor Athaulfus, to his great fame, and in such honorable estimation; as few were found comparable vnto him in those daies. At length requiring a safe conduct to returne into Denmarke, he was licenced to depart with high and right bountifull rewards, as in part of recompense of his good and faithfull seruice shewed during the time of the warres, as well in the life time of the said Athaulfus, as also in the daies of his predecessor the foresaid Alarike. About the same season, the bishops &c of Candida casa, or other wise called Duffsterne, was first instituted by one Pinstan a preacher, that toke great paines (as the report hath gone) to instruct the Scots and Britains in the christian faith. He was afterwards reputed a saint, and the place of his buriall had in such veneration, that manie used to resort thither for deuotion sake, as the manner in times past was when pilgrimage-goings were bled.

But now to returne where we left touching the Scots, and to shew the maner how the Scots returned againe into Albanie; ye shall vnderstand, that the Scots being brought into feruile bondage (as before we haue partly declared) and doubting daile of worse to ensue, they sent secret messengers vnto such Scots as remained in exile in the westerne Isles, in Forwaie, and in other parts of the world, promising them, if they would giue the attempt for recouerie of their ancient dwelling places in Albanie, they should be sure of all the aid that in them laie, being readie to spend their liues to reuenge the iniuries which they daile sustained at the Romans hands, whose continuall practise euer was, how to oppresse the ancient liberties of all such nations as came vnder their subiection. The experience whereof they now felt to their insufferable graunce, looking for nothing else but hostile to be expelled out of their countrie, and diuen to go seeke them other places to inhabit in strange countries after the manner of outlawes, as it had chanced already to the Scots by commandement of Aparianus, as before is expessed.

Fergus, vnto whom amongst other this message was chieslie directed, reioiced greatly of the newes; and first conferring with the king of Denmarke, of whose aid he knew himselfe assured, by his aduise he sent letters abroad forthwith into Forwaie, Albanie, the westerne Isles, and into Ireland, vnto such of the Scottishmen as dwelt in those places, to vnderstand their minds herein. And being certified that they were vniuersallie agreed, not onelie to trie their chance for recouerie of their former state and kingdom; but also had chosen him to be gouernour and generall capitaine in that enterpryse; he prepared partly at his owne costs, and partly at the charges of the king of Denmarke and other of his friends and allies there, a great multitude both of men of warre and ships, in purpose to passe ouer into Albanie to recouer his grandfathers estate, which as it was thought might now be the more easilie brought to passe, sith the Scots would aid him thereto, vpon an earnest desire which they had to reuenge their owne iniuries receiued at the Romans hands, and to deliuer themselves from such thralldome as they daile felt themselves oppressed with, doubting withall hostile to be quite expelled out of their whole countrie, as they had bene forced to forgo a great and the better part thereof already.

In this meane time, one Gratian descended of the British blood, by consent of the Romane legat Aparianus (both of them going against their allegi-ance) usurped the gouernance of Brittain by his owne private authoritie; but hostile after, they two falling at variance together, the one of them slue the other. And then the souldiers not staling till they vnderstood the pleasure of Honorius the emperor, chose one Constantine to succeed in the place of Aparianus, who passing ouer into France, was slaine there by Constantius one of the capitaine of the said Honorius. Unto the other of the Romane legats hearing of the death both of Aparianus and Constantine, removed from Forke into London, the better to prouide for the safe keeping of the land to the emperor Honorius his use; for that he doubted sundrie dangers which might chance, by reason the countrie was as then vnprouided of men of warre, the most part of them being transported ouer into France with the fornamed Constantine, and not againe returned.

The Picts informed of these things, sent word with all speed unto Fergule, requiring him to make haste, sith if he should have wished for a convenient time, a better could not be deuised; considering the present state of things as well in Britaine, as in other parts of the Roman empire, the people euerie where being ready to moue rebellion. Fergule vnderstanding the whole, by such messengers as still came one after another vnto him from the Picts, he hastened to depart with all diligence; and when all things were ready, he took the sea with his armie, and within eight daies after, he arrived in safety within the firth of Spurrey land with all his vessels and people; where taking land, & word thereof being brought into Ireland, into Dykenie, and into the westerne Isles, all such of the Scottish linage as liued in those parties in exile, came with their wives, children, and whole families in most speedie wise vnto him, as though the countrie had bene already recovered out of the enimies hands, without all doubts of further perill or businesse.

The Picts also reioicing greatly at the newes of his coming, repaired vnto him, and shewed him all the honors that might be deuised, beseeching him to pardon and forget all injuries and displeasures by them wrought and continued in times past against the Scottish nation, sith now they were ready for the advancement thereof to spend their liues against such as were enimies to the same. Neither was the fault theirs, in that Helgus had consented with the Romans to banish the Scottish people, but in their ancestors, who being blinded through the false words and sweet promises of the Romans, saw not the mischief which they brought vpon their owne heads and their posterities. Therefore they desired him to renew againe the league betwixt the Pictish and Scottish nations, with such conditions of appointment as it should please him to prescribe.

Fergule by consent of his nobles answered, that he was content to establish the league with them, euen according to the tenor of the ancient agreement, and to ioin his power with theirs to helpe to restore them vnto their former estate and liberties, so that they would be contented to surrender by into the Scottishmens hands, all such townes and countries, from the which they had bene expelled by great fraud and iniurie. And as for the displeasures done to the Scottishmen in times past by aiding the Romans against them (as he thought) the Picts had felt punishment enough for the same already, being reduced into most feruile & miserable bondage, as iustlie rewarded by almightie God for their great vnttruthes, used and shewed towards their neighbors, faithfull friends and allies. The Picts were thoughtlie pleased and satisfied with Fergule his words, so that within few daies after, the king (whome they had lately chosen since the time that the Scottishmen were thus returned) came vnto Fergule, and ratified the league with him, according to the articles of that other which in time past had bene obserued on the behalfe of the Scottish and Pictish nations, with such solempne othes and assurance, betwixt princes in semblable cases of custome is requisite and necessarie. Then were those countries restored to the Scottishmen againe, out of the which they had bene expelled by the Roman power.

Ad Fergule then being conueiled with a right honorable companie of lords, gentlemen, and commons into Argile, was there placed on the chaire of marble, and proclaimed king with all such accustomed pompe and ceremonies as to him appertained. This was in the 45 yeare after the Scots had bene driven forth of Albanie, and after the birth of our saviour 424, in the yeare after the death of Honoxius the emperor, and from the first erection of the Scottish kingdome 750 yeares complet. All such castles also and fortresses as the Picts held within any of those countries, which belonged vnto the Scots, were surrendered into their hands in peaceable wise; but the residue which the Romans kept were earnestlie defended for a while, though at length through want of victuals and other necessities, they likewise were deliuered. ¶ If I should here say what I thinke, and that mine opinion might passe for current coine, I would not sticke to affirme that either now first (or not long before their late supposed expulsion from hence) the Scots settled themselves to inhabit here within this Ile, and that they had no certaine seats in the same till then: but that coming either forth of Ireland, or from the westerne Isles, where they before inhabited, they used to make often inuasions into this land, greatly molesting as well the Britains, the ancient inhabitants thereof, as the Romans that then held the Ile vnder their subiection. For I can neither persuade my selfe, nor with others to beleue, that there was any such continuance in succession of kings, as their histories do make mention; as we haue here before set downe in following the same histories, because we will not willingly seeme to offer iniurie to their nation, which peradventure are otherwise persuaded, and thinke the same succession to be most true, where other perchance may coniecture (and not moued thereto without good reason) that such kings as in their histories are auidged to reigne one after another here in this Ile, either reigned in Ireland, or in the out Isles, and that verelie not successiuelie, but diuerse of them at one season, and in diuerse places. Which mistaking of the course of histories hath bred errors, not onelie amongst the Scottish writers, but euen amongst some of the British and English writers also, as to the learned and well aduised readers may plainelie appeare. And as for Gald, and some other happlie which they take to be kings of Scots, although they reigned in that part of this Ile which afterwards was possessed by Scots, and after them named Scotland, yet were they mere Britains, and had little to doe with Scots; except perchance we may thinke that they held the out Isles in subiection, where the Scots were then inhabiting, far longer time perhaps (before their settling in Britaine) than their histories make mention.

But now to returne where we left. After that Victorie the Roman legat was aduertised of all the fore-remembered doings of the Scottishmen and Picts, he caused an armie to be leued with all speed, and hastened forth with the same vnto Forke, where being arrived, he attempted by an herald at armes to persuade the Picts to forsake their confederacie lately concluded with the Scots: but perceiuing he could not bring it to passe, he determined to pursue both those nations with open warre: and so there, vpon setting forward, he passed forth till he came nere Camelon, where he encamped with his whole armie, hauing therewith (as the report went) about fiftie thousand persons at the least. Fergule being aduertised hereof, & hauing in like maner already assembled a mightie huge host both of Scottishmen and Picts, came therewith ouer the Forth, & marched forth with all speed in the night season, in purpose to haue set on his enimies verie earlie in the dawning of the next morning. But Victorie hauing knowledge thereof, commanded his men to be arranged and set in order of battell by the third watch of the same night, so that being ready to receiue the Scots vpon their first approach, there was fought a right sore and cruell battell, with such slaughter on both parts, that the riuer of Carron (nere vnto the which which their battels (joined) was well nere filled with dead bodies, and the water thereof so changed into a ruddie hue, that it seemed as though it had run altogether with blood.

In the end (whilest as yet it was doubtfull to whether ſide the victorie would incline) there came ſuch a ſudden ſhower of raine, mixed with ſuch great abundance of haileſtones, that neither part was able to haue ſight of other, ſo that by reaſon of the violent rage of that huge ſtorme and tempeſt, either ſide was ſaine to withſtand from the other. There were ſaine in this battell ſuch great numbers of men, as well on the one ſide as the other, that they had ſmall luſt to ſoine in battell againe for certaine yeeres after. For the Roman lieutenant vnderſtanding that loſſe of people he had ſuſtained, without attempting anie further exploit, appointed certaine of his companies to lie in gariſon within ſundrie fortrefſes in Brittain, & with the reſidue he returned into Kent. In like ſort the Scots with their confederates the Picts, perceiving themſelues not able as then to make anie further attempt againſt their enemies, brake by their armie, and deuiled onelie how they might defend that which they had already in poſſeſſion.

And ſoſomuch as the Britiſh nation was increaſed vnto a greater multitude of people, than thoſe countries which they then held were able to find with ſufficient ſuſtenance (conſidering what a great portion of their ancient ſeates the Britains and Romans kept from them) it was agreed by the Scots that they ſhould inſoſe the countrie of Athole, with other lands bordering nere vnto the ſame, lieng without the compaſſe of the mountaine of Grangeben. The Picts then being placed in Athole, increaſed there wonderfullie, and builded manie faire caſtles and towres in thoſe parties, to the great beautifying of that countrie. In which meane while, Vitorine the Romane lieutenant commanded the Britains to make haſt with the wall (whereof ye haue heard) made of turfe, and ſuſtained with certaine poſſes of timber paſſing ouerthwart the borders betwixt them and their enemies, beginning (as ye haue heard) at Abercorne, and ſo ſtretching ſouth by Glaſco, and Kirkpatrick, euen vnto Aldcluch, now Dunbryton, 80 miles more northward than the other wall, which the emperour Adrian cauſed (as is ſaid) to be made.

Whereof the Scots and Picts being informed, they aſſembled themſelues together, & vnder the leading of a noble man called Graine, they ſet vpon the Britains, as they were buſie in working about the ſame, and ſlew not onelie a great number of labourers and ſouldiers, which were ſet to labour and defend the worke, but alſo entering into the Britiſh borders, fetched from thence a great botie of cattell and other riches, which they found diſperſed abroad in the countrie. This Graine (who as I ſaid was chiefe in this enterpriſe) was brother vnto the Scottiſh queene, the wiſe of king Fergus. He was borne in Denmarke (as ſome hold opinion) in the time of the Scottiſh mens baniſhment, and had a Scottiſhman to his father deſcended of a noble houſe, and a Daniſh ladie to his mother. He himſelfe alſo married a noble woman of that nation, and had by hir a daughter, whom Fergus by the perſuaſion of the king of Denmarke tooke to wiſe, and had iſſue by hir (aſore his coming into Scotland) three ſonnes, Eugenius, Dongarus, and Conſtantius, of whom hereafter in their place mention ſhall be made, as occaſion ſerueth. Other there be, that affirme how this Graine was a Britaine borne, & that through hate which he bare towards the Romans for their cruell gouernement, he fled ſouth of his native countrie, and continued euer after amongſt the Scots, as firſt in Denmarke, and afterwards in Albion, euer ready to do what diſpleaſures he could deuile againſt the Romans & other their friends or ſubiects. Of this Graine thoſe Scots, which vnto this day beare that ſurname, are ſaid to be deſcended.

But now to the purpoſe. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that after that it was knowne in foreign countries, how the Scots had got ſet againe within thoſe regions in Albion, which their elders in ancient time had poſſeſſed, there came baſilie diuerſe companies of that nation out of Spaine, France, Germanie, and Italie (where during the time of their baniſhment they had ſerued vnder ſundrie captains) vnto Fergus to aid him, in recourſe of their countrie and ancient ſeats, out of the which they had bene moſt cruellie expelled. So that Fergus now ſeing his power thus not a little augmented by their coming, entereth into the borders of Bile, Carike, and Coningham, ſpoiling and harrieng thoſe countries on euery ſide; but thoſe thereupon cometh the armie of the Romans, with whom the Scots incountering in battell, received no leſſe damage than they minded to haue done vnto their aduerſaries. After, vpon being forced to leaue that countrie, they returned backe into Argile, where Fergus wintered for that part of the yeere which yet remained.

When ſummer was come, he was counſelled to haue ciſſances offered battell vnto Vitorine, who as then was entered Gallowate: and rather to trie the vttermoſt point of fortunes chance againſt him, than to ſuſtaine ſuch diſpleaſures and iniuries at the Romans hands, as by them were baſilie done vnto him and his people. But there were other that gaue other aduiſe, alledging how the danger was great to ieopard againe in battell with the Romans, being men of ſuch ſkill & practice in the ſeats of wars, conſidering what loſſe had chanced in the two former battels. Againe, there was great likelihood, that if he could be contented to forbear for a time, and ſeeke to defend the borders of his countrie, ſo well as he might without giuing battell, it muſt needs come to paſſe that thoſe the Romane empire ſhould be brought vnto ſuch ruinous decate, by reaſon of the multitude of enemies, which as then inuaded the ſame on each ſide, that in the end Vitorine doubting his owne ſuertie, would conuete himſelfe with his men of warre out of the countrie, and then ſhould it be an eaſie matter for the Scots and Picts to recouer againe all ſuch countries as ancientlie belonged to their elders, and whole to reſtoze the eſtates of their common wealths vnto their former dignities.

This aduiſe was followed as the beſt and moſt likeliſe, ſo that making ſundrie roads into the borders of their enemies countries ſo to keepe them ſtill occupied, Fergus and the Scots reſuſed utterly to come to anie foughten field with them. Shortly after alſo it chanced, that Vitorine was accuſed vnto the emperour Honorius of ſome ſecret practice againſt his maieſtie, as to be about to ſturpe the crowne of Britaine, wherevnto he was compelled in deed by the ſouldiers (whoſe hearts he had wonne through his bountious liberalitie ſundrie waies declared towards them) and vnderſtanding at this preſent, that he was minded to haue fled his waies for doubt of the ſaid information made againſt him, they did moue him with ſuch earneſt perſuaſions to take vpon him the imperiſall dignitie, promiſing euen to liue and die with him in deſenſe thereof, as well againſt Honorius, as all other, that in the end he conſented vnto their deſires, and ſo was proclaimed emperour, and clothed in purpure, vſing thereto all the other imperiſall ornaments, as if he had bene emperour indeed. was sent with an armie by Honorius into Britaine against this Mitorine, the most part of the souldiers, with those Britains which had acknowledged him for their supreme gouernour, began to feare the sequel of the matter, and afterward requiring pardon for their offenses, they took Mitorine, and delivered him prisoner vnto the same Heracianus, with diuers other of his confederats, and so by this means was the estate of Britaine recovered vnto the behoofe of Honorius, who shortly after sent for Heracianus, minding to send him into Africke against one Athalus, who usurped there against the Romane empire.

At his departure forth of Britaine, he left one Placidus as lieutenant and generall of the Romane armie in those parties: a man of no great courage, and lesse skill, which being perceiued of the Scots, gaue occasion to Fergus their king to renew the warre. And first he procured Dursus king of the Picts, being the third of that name, to ioin with him in that enterprise, according to the articles of the league. Who consenting thereto, when their powers were once assembled, they entered into the marches of their enemies, ouerrunning the most part of Aile, Carrike, and Conningham, and after they had taken their pleasure there, they entered into Calloway, despoiling all before them, which way sooner they passed. Then turning into Pictland, they subdued the whole region, and expelled all such Romans and Britains as inhabit the same.

Placidus being aduertised hereof, gathered a great power, and commeth forward towards them, with whom encountering in battell, after long fight, his horsemen chanced to be put to flight, so that the legions of his footmen being left naked on the sides, were so fore beaten with the shot of arrowes, and hurling of darts, that in the end they were forced to breake their arraie, & so being chased left to the Scots and Picts a great and full victorie. Placidus himselfe escaped vnto York, whether the Scots were minded to haue pursued him, had not the want of such numbers as they had lost at the battell, somewhat abated their courageous intents. In the meane time Placidus not onelie moued with this overthrow, but also weeling with himselfe after what sort the Romane empire was afflicted, with the inuasion of the barbarous nations in Germanie, France, Spaine, Italie, and Africke, thought it good to conclude some peace with the Scots and Picts, for doubt of further mishaps that might ensue. And so by such means as he made, shortly after a league was concluded betwixt the Scots, Picts, and Romans, with these conditions: that the Scots and Picts should inioy and keepe their ancient seates and regions, which they had now recovered, & hereafter not to make anie rodes or foires into the prouince belonging to the Romans, and that the same Romans contenting themselves with the British confines, should not moue anie warre or hostilitie towards the Scots or Picts.

This league being thus concluded and ratified, the Scottishmen and Picts deuoured themselves to reduce the state of their common-wealth into the ancient forme and order. Fergus made partition of lands and grounds throughout all his kingdome, and assigned the same forth vnto his subiects the Scottishmen, and to such other strangers as were come into Albion, to serue him in the wars against his enemies, and were minded now to remaine there. The other that were desirous to depart againe into their countries, he gaue them honorable rewards, with safe conducts to passe their waies at their owne pleasures. At this time also were the names of diuerse countries & people changed in the parties of Scotland, vpon sundrie considerations: as Comana a part of Scotland, lieng in the furthest end of all the countrie, took a new name of one Cassius a valiant capteine, and of the promontorie there shooting forth into the sea called Fesse: so that being compound together, that countrie was cleped Cathnesse. Also of certeine Irishmen called Rossians, the countrie of Rosse took that name, being afore named Lugia.

That part of the countrie ancientlie called Thezalia, which lieth on the sea coast, began to be called Buthgubane, of the tribute used to be paid there for sheepe, of the which kind of cattell there is great store in that prouince. For Buthane in the old Scottish tongue signified tribute: and Buth, a flocke of sheepe. The other part of Thezalia, lieng into the landward, was called Bogdale, of the riuer named Bog, which runneth through the middelt of it. Louchgubane took the name of a great meare or water, into the which the riuer of Dubaber falleth, and passeth through the same, notable by reason of the great plenty of samons taken therein. Some other countries there be, which keepe their ancient names even vnto this day, as Athole, and Murray land. And some names remaine a little changed by length of time, as Argile, for Argathile; Par, for Parthea; and such like.

Fergus also repaired such temples and churches as the warres had defaced, and restored againe churchmen vnto their former liuings: and further increased the same where he saw cause, and builded certeine celles and chappels for religious persons to inhabit in, assigning vnto them large reuenues for their finding. He also laid the foundation of that famous abbeie within the Ile of Iona, now Colmeckill, appointing the same for the buriall of kings, with certeine ordinances and customes to be used about the same. Moreover, in the time of peace he was not negligent in providing for the defense of his realme. Such castles as were decayed and overthrowne by the enemies in the warre time, he repaired; and in those which stood towards the borders of the British countries, he placed sundrie garrisons of such souldiers as wanted trades to get their liuing now in the time of peace, assigning them sufficient stipends to liue vpon.

In this meane time, Honorius the emperor being dead, and the estate of the Romane empire daily falling into decaye, it chanced also that Placidus the lieutenant of Britaine departed out of this life, by reason whereof the Scottishmen and Picts took occasion to renew the warres, making as it were a claime vnto the countries of Westmerland & Cumberland, which their elders in times past had held and possessed. Entering therefore into those countries, they take, spoile, and destroye all such of the British nation as went about to destroye them; neither spared they impotent, aged, or others, but shewed great crueltie against all such as came in their waies. Paule an honest woman they rauished and misused after a most villanous manner. The Romane souldiers, after the deceasse of Placidus, ordained one Cassius to succeed in his roome, who being aduertised of this enterprise of the Scottishmen and Picts, doubted least (as the truth was) that Dionethus the sonne of Otaulus sometime king of the Britains, in hope to attaine the crowne of Britaine, as due to him by inheritance, would now seeke to aid the Scottish king Fergus, whose sister he had in marriage. Cassius therefore more desirous of peace than of warres, sent forth a messenger at armes vnto king Fergus, requiring him to remember the league made betwixt him and the Romans, and to withdraue his power forth of the prouinces, which were were subiect vnto the same Romans, without proceeding any further in that vnlawfull attempt, either else he should be fure to feele the puiſſant force of thoſe people readie bent againſt him, by whom his elders had bene driven out of their countries; and baniſhed quite forth of all their dwellings and places of habitation in Albion.

The answer of king Fergus.
But here vnto was answer made with great indignation; that as for the league thus alledged, ceased by the death of Blacudus; and as for peace, there was no cause why he should looke for any, until the whole prouinces, both of Westmerland and Camberland, were restored againe into the hands of the Scottishmen and Brits, according as of reason they ought to be. The like answer also was made by Durnus king of the Brits, vnto whom Cassius had sent a like message. Whereupon all the said Cassius being not a little moued, assembled an armie, and with all speed marcheth forth toward his enemies: but before his entering into Westmerland, where they were as then lodged in campe, he had perfect knowledge how Dionethus with his Welchmen (for his lands laie in Wales) was alreadye joined with the Scots.

Cassius raiseth an armie.
Which newes fore appalled the hearts of the Brits, but yet being incouraged with comfortable words of their captains to proceed, forward they go together with the Romans, and within three daies after, they came within sight of their enemies, being ranged in battell readie to receiue them, so that straightwaies buckeling together, there was a right fierce and cruell battell fought betwixt them, till finallye the multitude of the Scottish archers and berites so compassed in the battels of the Romans on each side, and speciallie on the backs, that in the end, and by reason of the losse of their generall Cassius (who was slaine there amongst them) those of the middle ward being discomfited, brake their array and fled.

Dionethus joineth with the Scots against the Romans.
Whereupon the rest of the like sorte followed: the Scots, Brits, and Welchmen pursuing so egerlie without all order, that there was no small number of them distressed by the Romans, the which in their giuing backe, kept themselves close together, readie to defend themselves, and to beat downe such of their enemies as followed more rashlye than warlike in the chase, not once regarding to keepe any order of battell, but yet by other companies that pursued more orderlie together for their most aduantage, there was great slaughter made both of Romans and Brits.

After this victorie thus achieved, Dionethus was proclaimed king of Britaine, and soe warres continued in the land by the pursuit of the Welchmen, Scots, & Brits, to the great hazard of the prouince, and likelie expelling of all the Romans quite out of the same. About this time also there remained in France, one Cetus lieutenant to the emperor Valentianus, who vnderstanding all these things by letters and messengers sent from the captains which yet remained aliue in Britaine, appointed one

The Romans giue backe.
Marinianus sent over into Britaine.

The Scots follow in the chase too rashlye.
This Marinianus at his arrivall in the Island was most foolishlye receiued by the soldiers and subjects of the foresaid empire. All the lords and nobles of the countrie restored also vnto him, shewing themselves most glad of his coming, & promising with what aid soeuer they were able to make, to go with him against their enemies. Whereupon, procuring them to assemble their powers, and to ioine the same with his, which he had brought over with him, he passed through the countrie vnto Powke, and so from thence marched forth towards the Scots, being alreadye assembled in campe to defend the countrie of Westmerland against him. Here were both the kings of Scots and Brits, Fergus and Durnus, with Dionethus, naming himselfe king of the Brits, who had brought with him, beside the Welchmen, a great number of those Brits that inhabited in the countrie now accounted the marches of Wales, the which onelie amongst all other the Brits acknowledged him for king.

When both the armies were come nere together, they camped for that night the one in sight of the other, and in the morning following they prepared themselves to battell. Fergus first making an earnest oration vnto his people, to incourage them the more boldlie to giue the onset, declared amongst other things how the right was on their sides, which alwaies ought to minister hope of god successe in them that enterpryse any thing in defense thereof; where contrarie all such as attempted to disquiet other by infortie and wrong doing, could not but looke for an euill conclusion of their malicious intents and purposes. Neither were other of his captains negligent in their duties, but that both in exhorting their bands, they vsed most comfortable words, and in disposing them in good order of battell, they shewed most readie and earnest diligence.

On the other side, Marinianus with his captains and officers of bands were as buſie on their side to array their battels most for their aduantage, as they saw cause and occasion, so that both the armies being readie to fight, the onset was giuen, and that in most furious sorte, the Romans being at the first soe annoyed with arrows and darts, which flue so thicke from each side, that their sight was in manner taken from them, the like seeming as it had been couered ouer with a penſile. So that Marinianus perceiving this disadvantage, he caused a fresh legion of his soldiers to aduance forward to the succour of their fellows; by reason whereof the battell was forthwith most cruellie renewed, the hindermost wings of the Romans soe preasing vpon their enemies: so that in the end passing quite through their battels, they caused a great disorder and feare amongst those Scots and other their confederats, which were placed in the hindermost ranks. But yet casting themselves in a ring, they made great & stout resistance for a space, and at length a great number euen of the most valiant personages of the whole host, closed themselves together, and with maine force assailed to haue broken through the thickest prease of their enemies, but being intironed about on each part, they were there slaine each mothers sonne. Whilst the Romans drew together to resist on that side, other of the Scottishmen, Brits, Brits, & Welchmen, found a waie to get forth through their enemies on the other side, and so being gotten past them, made a waie as fast as their feet might beare them: but a great number being notwithstanding overtaken, were slaine and beaten downe right pitifullie.

Marinianus perceiving the disadvantage, provided to remedie the same.

The Scots disordered.
Fergus the Scottish king, and Durnus king of the Brits were slaine in this mostall battell together, with the most part of all their nobilitie. Dionethus being soe wounded escaped to the sea side, and there Dionethus getting a ship, passed over into Wales. This overthrow soe dismayed both the Scottish and Brits nations, who looked for nothing more than present expulsion out of their countrie, for Marinianus pursuing the victorie, burst into Galloway, most cruellye waſting and spoiling the same. And when he had made an end there, he entred into Anandale, and into the Brits confines, destroing all before him with fire and sword. Camelon was besieged, taken by force, and miserablye put to sacke and spoile, with diuerſe other notable towneſ and places, as well belonging to the Picts as Scots. Neither was there anie end of theſe cruell doings, till both the Scots & Picts for their refuge were generallie conſtrained to withdraw themſelves beyond the wall of Abircoyne, which (as before is ſaid) a few yerres paſſed was begun by the Britains, and ſtretched from Abircoyne aforeſaid, overthwart the land vnto Alclath now Dunbarton.

ſparinianus hauing thus diſturb'd his enemies beyond this wall, cauſed them to make aſſurance by their oath of covenant, neuer to paſſe the ſame againe by waie of hoſtilitie, either againſt the Britains or Romans. There were that counſelled ſparinianus either bitterlie to haue deſtroied both the Scots and Picts, either els to haue diſturb'd them out of the whole Ile. But he being ſatiſfied with that which was already done, thought good to returne vnto Rome, and there to winter, that in the beginning of the next ſpring he might go into Wales, to chaſiſe Dionethus and other of that countrie for their rebellion, in aiding the enemies of the empire. But when the time came that he ſhould haue ſet forward on that iour-nie, he heard ſuch newes from the parties of beyond the ſeaſ, into what ruinous decaye the empire was fallen, without anie likelihood of recoverie, that changing his purpoſe, he minded to ſurpe the crowne of Britaine as absolute king thereof himſelfe. And to haue the more fauor of the Britiſh nation without anie impeachment in the beginning of his reigne, he tooke to wife one of the daughters of Dionethus, being the elder of thoſe two, which he onelie had without iſſue male, by the ſiſter of king Fergus. She that was thus copled in marriage with ſparinianus was called Dithilia, & the other daughter named Uir-ſula was profeſſed a nun in an houſe of religion, to the intent that the whole right which Dionethus pretended to the realme, might remaine to the wife of ſparinianus. When was Dionethus made ſecond peace to the Scottiſhmen.

And whileſt theſe things were thus a doing in Britaine, the Scottiſh lordſ had created Eugenius the ſonne of Fergus, king of their realme, as due to him by rightfull ſucceſſion from his father, who had gouerned the ſame by the ſpace of 16 yerres per he was ſlaine (as before is ſpecified) in the laſt mentioned battell. This Eugenius began his reigne (as we find) in the yere of our Lord 440, after the firſt beginning of the Scottiſh kingdome 767. His fathers corpes, which at the firſt was ſecretlie buried, as occaſion ſuffered, whileſt the Romans were yet in the countrie, he cauſed to be taken vp, and conueied ouer into the Ile of Jona, otherwiſe called Col-mekill, where, with all ſolemne pompe and ceremonies it was intumulat, according to the ordinance which he himſelfe had deuifed in his life time, with in the abbie there.

In like manner ſparinianus, to the intent to establiſh himſelfe the more quietlie in the eſtate of Britaine, and to deliuer his ſubiectſ the Britains, which bordered vpon the Scottiſh dominions, from all trouble of warres, was contented to make peace with the Scots vpon light ſate made vnto him for the ſame. After this alſo, he being once fullie eſtabliſh-ed in the eſtate of Britaine, conueiſed alſo to attaine to the tyte in gouernment of the whole empire, and therefore aſſembling all the forces of the Britiſh youth, ſailed into Gallia, cauſing himſelfe to be proclaimed emperor, and ſo ſurped that title, as in the Engliſh and Italian hiſtozie you maie find more largelie expreſſed. He left behind him in Britaine his father in law Dionethus as chiefe gouernor there, with one legion of Romane ſoldiours. After this did ſtius the emperorſ lieutenant in France, ſend for ſuch Romans as ſparinianus had left in Britaine, who reuolting from their othes of allegiance giuen vnto the ſame ſparinianus, obeyed ſtius, as one that ſupplied the roome of their rightfull lord and maſter the emperor Valentinian. So that in this wiſe was Britaine diſturbed of all maner of able men for deſenſe, whereof the Scots and Picts toke good occaſion to inuade the Britiſh borders, not ſparing to purſue with fire and ſword all ſuch of the Britains as did yet continue in obeſſance to ſparinianus.

They firſt browe thoſe Britains out of all the countries, which had bene taken from them by the ſame ſparinianus, and by other of the Romans and Britains, as Midland, Wiſſe, Carrike, and Corningham, Galloway, the ſparches, and Northumberland. This done, they entered into Cumberland, Weſtmerland, and Kentland, not ceaſing till they had ſpoiled and deſaced all thoſe countries, with the moſt part of all Northumberland, in ſuch cruell wiſe, that they made all thoſe quarters barren both of corne and catteſſ, which waie ſooner they paſſed. The Britains perceiving into what danger they were brought, if ſome good remedie were not found in time, ſent ouer with all ſped vnto Rome for ſuccor to be had at the emperor Valentinianſ handſ, for ſparinianus was otherwiſe occupied. Valentinian deſirous to deliuer the Britains from ſuch cruell enemies as the Scots & Picts held themſelves to be, leaſt through their meanes all the whole Ile ſhould reuolt from the obedience of the Romans, appointed one Gallio boyne in Rauenn-na, and as then ſitoning about Paris in France, with a legion of ſoldiours to paſſe ouer into Britaine, to diue backe the Scots and Picts from further moleſting the ſubiectſ of the empire.

The Scots and Picts, vpon knowledg had of this Gallioſ arrivall, drew backe into their countries, not minding to fight with the Romans, theſe force they doubted, and not without cauſe, hauing had in times paſt ſo manie ouerthrowes and ſlaugh-ters at their handſ. But Gallio purſued them euen vnto the water of Forth, where in ſundrie ſkirmiſhes he ſlue no ſmall number of them: and ſo that he knew he ſhould be ſent for ſhortlie to returne againe into France, to helpe to reſiſt ſuch barbarous nationſ as warred in the ſame, for the better deſenſe of the Britains againſt their enemies the Scots and Picts (whome he knew would not be anie while in quiet after he was once gone) he cauſed the wall to be newlie made by betwiſt Abircoyne & the mouth of Clude water, thereby to defend the Romane prouince from all ſudden inuaſionſ of the enemies. This wall was earſt made of turffe, but now repaired with ſtone, and ſtrengthened with great poſſes of pileſ of wood, diſtint in betwiſt in places moſt nee-dfull. It was alſo 8 ſot broad, and 12 ſot high. And in certeine turrets caſt forth vpon this wall. Gallio appointed watch & ward to be kept, that vpon the eni-mieſ approach towards the ſame, warning might be giuen by fire in the night, and by ſmoke in the day, vnto ſuch of the Britains as dwelled nere vpon thoſe borders (commandement being giuen vpon paine of death for being found in the contrarie) that eu-erie man vpon ſuch knowledg had, ſhould reſort im-mediatlie to the place appointed, with ſuch armour and weapon as for him was requiſit.

When Gallio had thus giuen order for the ſuertie of the Britains, and deliuered them at that preſent from the cruell handſ of their enemies, he returned into France with the armie that he brought with him, according to the commandement which he had from ſtius the emperorſ lieutenant there. His departure out of Britaine was no ſoner knowne of the Scots and Picts, but that with all their maine force they determined to set upon the Britains again. So that assembling their powers together, the kings of both those nations exhorted their men to do valiantlie. Eugenius the king of the Scottish men encourageth them through hope of high rewards and spoile. The Pictish king likewise for his part promisseth the lieutenantship of Camelon (an office of most honor amongst them) unto him that first should passe the wall of Abircoyne. Whereupon the Britains being advertised of their enemies intentions according to the ordinance before appointed, drew in defensible wise unto that part of the wall, where they understood the Scots and Picts were minded to assault.

At length when the Scottish and Pictish kings were come to the wall, and had their people ready to give the approach, they themselves stood apart somewhat out of danger of shot: and such bands as were appointed to assault, advanced forth of the maine bat-tels under the leading of that Graime, the which (as ye have heard) was chiefe in expelling the Britains when they had first made the same wall by commandment of Alastore the Romane lieutenant. After ther shewed he lesse proofe of his valiancie at this time than he had don before. For though the Britains made earnest resistance, so far as their power would extend, yet at the length by great force the wall was undermined, and hrowen downe in sundrie places, so that the whole number of the Scots and Picts entered by the same into Pictland, beating downe the Britains on each side that went about to make resistance, for none escaped their hands, but such as saved themselves by flight.

There came also an other power of Scots and Picts by water out of Fife, and landing in Pictland, pursued the Britains with more crueltie than the kings did themselves. Both houses and people passed by fire and sword, insomuch that all such of the Britains as could get away, withdrew forth of the countrie, not staying till they came beyond the river of Tine; by reason whereof, all the countrie which lieth betwixt Tward and Tine was delievered by appointment of the kings unto the souldiers, to spoil and use at their pleasure, whereupon followed manie notorious examples of crueltie, enuie, coue-tousnesse, wrath & malice. In the meane time, whilste the Scottish and Pictish men of warre applied their market, the Britains with all diligence repaired and newlie fortified the other wall begun (as is said) by the emperorur Adrian, shooting overthwart the countrie from the river of Tine, unto the river of Eike.

Whobett the Scots and Picts, because winter ap-proched, made no further attempt against the Britains at that time, but dividing those countries which lie by north from the foresaid wall of Adrian, among themselves, according to the order in that behalf appointed by their kings, they fortified certaine castles and holds for defense of the same countries, as it were to countergarison such Britains as continually kept watch and ward upon the fore-said wall. The Britains therefore mistrusting least so soone as the spring were come, the Scots would invaide their countries which lay on the south part of the same wall, breaking in by force through it, as they had done the yere before through the other wall of Abircoyne, they sent ambassadoors unto Etius the Romane lieutenant, governing Gallia now called France, under the emperorur Valentinian, requiring to haue some aid and succour at his hands, whereby to resist such fierce and cruell enemies, as sought to destroy and expell out of their lands and houses, all such of the Britains as acknowledged themselves in anie manner of wise subiects unto the empire.

But Etius, whether he would not, or rather because he conveniently could not (for that he was otherwise occupied in defense of Gallia against the French men) made a direct answer that he had no men of warre in store to send ouer into Britaine, and therefore tolled them to do what they could for their owne defense, for aid of him they might none haue. The messengers returned home with this an-swere, and made report thereof in a publike assembly of all the British nobilitie, being as then gathered together at London to consult there for the estate and order of their countrie. Where after long deliberation (notwithstanding that they perceiued they should haue no more aid from the Romans) it was yet determined, that to resist the enemies, the whole puissance of the British nation should be mustered, as well men as women, being able to do anie feat of seruice available in defense of their countrie, & rather to trie the uttermost point of fortunes chance, than to suffer themselves to be ouerrun without resistance. But Conanus Camber, a prince of great authoritie amongst them, as one that was descended of the blood of Octavius sometime king of Bri-taine, went about with earnest persuasions to remove the residue of the nobilitie from this determination, abusing them to seeke for peace at the Sco-tishmens hands, rather than to trie the doubtfull chance of Mars his iudgement, considering the febleness of their whole force now, ever since that the tyrant Maximianus had in manner emptied and dispeopled the land of all such able men as were apt for seruice in the warres. But this aduise of Conanus was verie euill taken, & moued the multitude that heard him, to be greatly offended with his words, not sparing to say that he spake like no true man nor louer of his countrie; so that the former ordinance (that is to say, to seeke an end of the wars by dint of sword) was allowed for the best.

Whereupon there were musters taken, armour and weapon provided, and both day and place appointed, where they should assemble together to march forth towards the enimie. Conanus sore lamenting their doings, called almightie God to record, that that which he had said, was spoken onelie for the loue & zeale which he bare to his countrie, & sithence his aduise might not be followed, he doubted great-lie least the ruine of the British state by some fatal appointment drew fall upon them. The people hearing him speake thus, some wilfull wicked persons fell upon him, and slue him there presentlie amongst them: wherewith other being sore moued to indignation, set upon the murderers, there to haue reuenged his death immediatlie. Whereupon began taking of parts, and together they went by the eares in such a furious wise, that sundrie amongst them being slaine, the magistrats had much ado to appeale the frate.

In this meane time, whilste the Britains were thus busied in sending of their ambassadoors to the Romans, & consulting together for defense of their countrie, the Scots first raced downe the wall of Abircoyne, not leauing one piece thereof whole, so that a few tokens excepted, nothing remaineth to be sene at this day of all that huge and wonderfull worke, it is called now in these daies Graintdike, because that Graime was not onelie (as ye haue heard) chiefe in expelling the Britains from the same, but also at this time in the racing of it to the ground he was the greatest doer. Which being accomplished, the Scottish and Pictish kings assembled their powers, and overthrow all such fortresses as had not bene destroyed the yere before, standing on the fains had newlie fortified, but yet were not able to defend the same from the power of the enimie, who now set upon the Britains with maine force, in so much that undermining the foundations of that wall in divers places; at length sundrie parts thereof were reuered into the ditch, so that the souldiers breaking in by the same, cruellie beate downe the Britains which stood at defense.

The entrie being thus twine, both the kings with their powers marched forth into the south countries, commandement being giuen that no man upon paine of death should kill anie woman or child, aged person, or otherwise impotent and not able to beare armour. But this commandement in some places was but slenderlie obetied; such desire of reuenge was planted in the Scottishmens hearts, by reason of the remembrance of old iniuries, that beneath made they anie difference either of age or sex. To be short, all those countries which lie betwixt the riuers of Tyne and Humber, were wasted & spoiled, the whole number of the inhabitants (such as could make thist to escape the enimies hands) got them ouer the foresaid riuer of Humber, there to remaine as further out of danger. The report of which mischiefe being brought to London, the lords there (who as ye haue heard were not all of one accord together) they took new aduise, to redresse the present mischiefe in this maner. First they thought it best to send forth two ambassadours, one to the Scots & Picts to require a peace; & an other with letters to Ctesius the Romaine lieutenant in France, for fresh aid and succour. The tenour of which letters as then sent vnto Ctesius here insueth.

The lamentable complaints of the Britains vnto Ctesius thise consull. At what time our elders became subiects vnto the Romans, they vnderstood by manye pious and notable examples, that the senate was a most safe refuge and haue, to be wished of all such as fled to the same for support. But we their posteritie by the pernicious working of the legat Partimianus, tending wholie to our destruction, being spoiled both of force and substance, and therefore remaining in great danger of losing both kingdome and liues, through the force and terrible inuasion of our most cruell enimies the Scots and Picts, making humble sute for succours vnto the Romaine empire, according to the loiall trust and most assured confidence, the which euer like true and faithfull subiects we haue reposed in the same, are yet neglected, & nothing regarded, but deliuered as a prey vnto the barbarous nations to be spoiled, destroyed, and slaine in most pitious wise, which can not but be an euident signe, that either the Romans haue changed their most commendable maners into the worst that may be deuised, either els their most large empire, thorough the wrath and high displeasure of almighty God, is now giuen for a prey vnto other foren nations. But if it be so, that the fatall force of the time present doth require, that without all remedie the land of the Britains being taken awate from the Romans, must needs be brought vnder the subiection of some barbarous nation, we neither abhorre nor refuse the gouernement of anie people or nation, the Scots and Picts (the most cruell of all other) onelie excepted, whose crueltie we hauing long since too much tasted, are at this present brought vnto that point by their late increased puissance, that we know not now after the losse of our goods and cattell, which way to safe gard our liues, for the turke walls being pulled downe, and the ditches filled vp with earth, which as yettime did somewhat staye them, now breaking in upon vs without letting passe anie one kind of crueltie, they haue destroyed our fields, burned by our houses, towne & villages, beaten downe & rased even to the ground our castles and towers, with such other places of defense, not sparing to put to the sword as well the poore innocent children, women, and impotent aged, as such other innumerable numbers of men, which they haue slaine standing at defense with weapon in hand. And as for vs, which are the residue of our decayed nation, they haue giuen euen to the sea side, and from thence (because we cannot passe ouer) we are put backe vpon our enimies againe. And hereof proceed two kinds of our destruction, for either we are drowned in the raging floods, either else slaine most vnnmercifullie by our cruell enimies. Therefore if the honor of the Romaine people, if our assured loialtie and loue, which we beare to the empire of Rome, now continued for the space of these 500 yeares or thereabout, may moue you to rue on our miseries, we humbly pray and beseech you, not to suffer vs longer to be trodden vnder foot of these our most beaftlie and cruell enimies, but send vnto vs some conuenable succours and that with all speed, least we seeme to be more cruellie betrayed of the Romans, than brought to destruction by these barbarous people, and that we be not set forth as a notable example for all other to beware, how they put confidence hereafter either in the rule or friendship of the Romans.

Paulus Diaconus, Beda, Geffray of Monmouth, Veremound, and others make mention of these foresaid letters. Whereupon Ctesius answering, declared that those calamities, misfortunes and losses sustained by the Britains were right displeasing vnto him, and so much the more, for that through the sundrie inuasions made, aswell into France as also into Italie it selfe, and into other parties of the Romaine empire by people of sundrie nations, he could not as then spare anie men of warre to send ouer vnto them, & therefore he willed the Britains to make the best thist they could to defend themselves for a time, till things were better quieted in other parties, and then should they see such redresse of their iniuries provided, as they should thinke themselves to be better well reuenged. About the same time that the ambassadours returned with this answer vnto London from Ctesius, the other also came backe forth of the north without hope to speed of that about the which they had bin sent, for the Scots & Picts would incline to no reasonable conditions of peace, unless the Britains would wholie submit themselves as subiects vnto them. The Britains hereat took such indignation, that by generall consent they agreed to trie it out with the enimies by maine force; & hereupon made their prouision with all diligence. The Scots and Picts hearing of the Britains intents, gathered their people together with more speed than was thought possible for them to haue done, & forthwith rushed into the borders of their enimies countries in right puissant wise and most warlike order.

In the foreward went such as came forth of Calloway and Annandale, with those Picts which inhabited about the coasts of Barwicke. Then followed there a mightie battell of those which came forth of Argile, Athole, and other Picts inhabiting nere vnto the parties of Kalendar and Camelon with them of Fife, and Angus. In the midst of this battell both the kings kept their place with their choicest souldiers, and standards borne afore them. Then went the carriage and trusse of the armie, next whereunto a great number of noble men of both the nations followed in faire order of battell, with their seruants and men of warre the best they could chose forth. And last of all (as the maner of those nations hath bene euen from the beginning) there came a great multitude of the commons closing by the back of the whole whole aforesaid armie.

The Britains also comming forth into the field with their whole puissance to encounter their enemies, when they understood by espials the order and maine force of the Scots and Picts, they were halfe discouraged in their minds, and thought god there fore once againe to assaie if anie peace might be purchased. But sending forth their ambassadours vnto the confederat kings, to that end their answer was, that except the Britains would yeld themselves, their wiues and children, with all their goods and substance into the hands of their enemies, simple without all conditions, there would be no peace granted. When this was knowne abroad in the host of the Britains, what thorough kindeled ire on the one part, and soule despaire on the other, prouoking their minds to displeasure, they generallie vpon change of purpose required battell, euen all the whole number of them.

Whereof ensued a most cruell and mortall fight: for the Britains (as it were) resolved to die in defence of their countrie, and to reuenge their owne deaths vpon their enemies, with more fiercenesse than is credible to be thought, gaue the onset, and overthrew a great number of their enemies, insomuch that those of Galloway and the Picts fighting in the fore ward with them of Argile, Athole, and such other as were in the battell with the kings, were in great danger to be put to the worse: which Graime perceiuing (by whome the most part of the armie was ruled, and that by commandement of the kings) called forth a number of the Island-men, who were appointed to attend the cariage, and sent them with all diligence to the fore ward to the succors of them of Galloway, being then at the point to haue sought refuge by flight. But by the conuning of these Island-men to their succors, they took courage afresh, so that the battell was againe most fiercelie renewed, and so continued a space with great slaughter on both parts, till finally the Britains being oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, and not able longer to indure, fell to running a waie, thinking to saue themselves in certaine bogs, moasses, and marish grounds nere vnto the place of the battell: but such cofferels, and other as remained with the Scottish cariage, seeing the discomfiture of their aduersaries, ran forth and pursued them into those marishes, killing and taking no small number of them. There were slaine in this battell of the Britains, about 15 thousand, and of the Scots and Picts nere hand foure thousand.

The Britains hauing receiued this ouerthrow, saw no helpe which waie to recouer their losses, but onelie to sue for peace at the victors hands. They sent therefore an orator vnto the Scottish & Pictish kings, beseeching them humble to grant them a peace, euen with what conditions it should please them to prescribe. The kings not moued onelie with the present fortune of the Britains, but also partlie with their owne, hauing lost no small number of right worthie personages in the battell, were contented to grant a peace vpon these conditions: That the Britains should in no wise receiue anie lieutenant or armie hereafter from Rome, nor suffer anie entinie of the Scottish and Pictish estates, of what nation soeuer he were, to passe through their countrie. They should enter into no league with anie citie or nation, nor be about to make anie warres with out consent of the Scottish and Pictish kings, and further should be readie to serue them against all manner of enemies whensoever they should be sent for. Moreover, they should remoue with their wiues, children, and whole families out of all those countries, lieng betwixt Tine and Vumber, resigning the possession of the same vnto the Scottishmen and Picts.

Also they should giue threescore thousand peces of gold then currant to the Scottish & Pictish kings, towards the dispatch of their soldiers wages, and further should yeld as a tribute twentie thousand peces of gold, to be paid yereleie vnto the seuerall bies of the victors. They should likewise deliuer one hundred hostages of such as the two kings shuld appoint, betwixt the age of eightene and thirtie yers. These conditions of peace though they seemed verie strict & greuous to the British nobilitie, yet for that they understood not how to make a better bargaine, they perswaded the multitude to accept them, and so a league therevpon was concluded amongst those people, and the publike state of the land brought to a more quiet rule than it had bene before. Thus were the Britains made tributarie to the Scottishmen and Picts, about 500 yeres after Julius Cesar had brought them in subiection to the Romans, being in the yere after the birth of our Saviour 446, and of Eugenius his reigne ouer the Scottishmen the seventh.

In this season was the Ile of Albion soe infected with the heresie of the Pelagians, and therefore pope Celestine sent one Paladius a learned man vnto the Scots, to preserue them from that infection, and ordeined him bishop, the first in Scotland that had his inuerture from Rome: for all the other before him were ordeined by the voices or suffrages of the people, choosing them forth among the monks and priests called Culdeis, as the Scottish chronicles do report. Paladius with right god and wholesome exhortations purged the Scots and Picts of sundrie superstitious rites of their old gentillie idolatrie, till those daies used amongst them, wherevpon he is named and reputed for the Scottishmens apostle. He lieth at Fordune, a towne in Aernes, where his reliques remained, and were long after had in great estimation.

Moreover he instituted one Sernan bishop of the Orkeries, that he might instruct the inhabitants there in the faith of Christ, which as yet they had not receiued: and one Ternan, whome he himselfe had baptised, he made archbishop of Pictland. In these daies also manie strange sights were seene in sundrie parts of Britaine before the last mentioned ouerthrow: the mone being in plaine opposition to the sunne, when it should be most round, appeared in a quadzant figure. At Pocke it rained blood: and trees in sundrie places being blasted, withered and died. The market place, or rather (if ye will so tearme it) Cheape side in London opened, so that a great hole appeared, and manie houses were swallowed vp. About the same season also (as is supposed) liued that huge personage Finmacorell, a Scottishman borne of seuen cubites in height. He was a great hunter, and soe feared of all men by reason of his mightie stature, and large lims: manie fables go abroad of him, not so agreeable to the likelihood of truth, as ought to be registred in an historie, and therefore here passed ouer with silence.

The Romane empire being brought into irreuerable ruine by the Vandals, Gothes, Hunnes, Frenchmen, and other barbarous nations, occupying sundrie parts and portions thereof, put the Britains out of all hope to haue anie assistance from the emperors, which caused them to remaine in quiet certein yers without attempting any exploit against the Scots or Picts, and so duelle paid their couenanted tribute, though soe against their wills, if they might otherwise haue remedied it. At the last about ten yers after the conclusion of this last peace, it chanced that one Conanus the sonne of the aboue mentioned Conanus, descended of the blood of the Octauij, sometimes kings of the Britains, soe maligne to see his countrie thus brought into thraldome of the Scottish nation, and deuising how to find some redres, called together the most part of the British nobilitie, by secret message home to a manour place which he had within a thicke wood in the countrie of Kent, and there opening vnto them a great peece of his mind, perswaded them with the weightiest reasons he could imagine, to leuie warre against the Scots and Picts, hauing at that present, meanes now since the last warres to mainteine it, as well by reason of their increase both of able men, as also of substance to furnish them withall.

One estate of men cannot live without helpe of another.

Here the nobles were of sundrie opinions: for some aweiared with the note of bondage, would gladly haue had warres: other hauing regard to their sons lieng in hostage with the enimies, would in no wise consent thereto: by reason whereof this counsell brake vp without conclusion of anie effect. When eche man was returned to his home, there had bene some amongst them, that gaue knowledge to the confederate kings what motion had bene made, and what was intended against them. Whereupon they immediatlie determined, not onelie to cause the hostages to be executed, but also to pursue the rebels with fierce and cruell warres. Yet before they practised anie violence, they sent their ambassadors vnto the Britains, to vnderstand their full meaning, and to declare vnto them further certeine articles which the said kings required to haue performed without all delays, or else to loke for open warre out of hand.

The chiefest points of which articles were these. First that the Britains should not assemble together in counsell without licence of the Scottish and Pictish kings, notwithstanding that their ancient laws they might vse at their pleasure, but they should receiue no stranger into their countrie being a Roman or a Frenchman, neither merchant nor other. Their old hostages they should receiue home againe, and deliuer in exchange of them twisse so manie in number of the like age and degree, as was covenanted by the former league. The commons of the land vnderstanding that was demanded by these ambassadors, were in a wonderfull rage, and would haue made a great stirre if they had not bene quieted by the lords, who for their paines taken herein, got them an euill report amongst the inferior sort of people, as though through their want of stomach onlie, the common-wealth was brought into such a miserable estate, that looke what it pleased the enimie to charge the British nation with, no man durst once speake against it.

This grudge of the commons increased so farre forth against their superiours, that after the Scottish and Pictish ambassadors were returned home, with answer agreeable to their demandes, their arose incontinentlie a great commotion of the people, conspiring together the vtter destruction of the whole nobilitie. But their furie was repressed, so that they were ouerthrowne in battell at two severall times with great slaughter and bloudshed, whereupon they withdrew into the mounteins, and there kept themselves, making raises vpon the nobilitie, and fetching booties awaie from the heards and flocks of cattell belonging to the lords and gentlemen: but finally through famine which began to oppresse both parties, they perceiued what need the one had of the others helpe, and so they agreed. This ciuill warre soe decayed the force of the Britains, for beside the great slaughter that was made betwixt them, by the auoiding of the commons out of their houses, the ground laie vntilled, thereof insued a marvellous great scarritie and dearth of all things, by reason thereof an innumerable sort of people died. Yet shortly after followed such plentie, that those that were left aliuie forgetting the passed miseries, gaue themselves to all kind of vice, which took such root in the hearts of the more part of them, that for anie man to vse anie manner of vertue amongst them, was a readie meane to procure great enuie and hatred.

The Britains send into Britaine Armo: the some honorable ambassage vnto Androenus the king of that countrie for aid.

In the meane time liued the Scottish and Pictish kings in gods quiet and rest, applieng their studies onelie how to instruct their people now after the warres were once ended, in laudable exercises and necessarie occupations, conuenient for the time of peace, whereby their realmes might flourish in welth and prosperitie without dread of anie foren power. For they saw such tokens of ruine in the British estate, as small likelihood appeared, that the same should at anie time be able to recouer againe the former force and dignitie. Finally the Scottish king Eugenius hauing aduanced the estate of his countrie vnto moze felicitie and wealth than anie of his predecessors had ever done before him, after he had reigned thirtie yeeres, he ended his life about the fourth yeere of Leo, that usurped the empire of Constantinople.

But forsomuch as Eugenius left no issue behind him, his brother named Dongard succeeded in the estate. He began his reigne in the yeere 470, and his chiefest studie was, according to his brothers example, to prouide for the maintenance of gods orders and iustice, appointing in euerie quarter men of gods fame and report to haue the administration vnder him, with commandement that they should diligently foresee, that euerie man might inioy his owne. He himselfe took vpon him also to see to the repairing of such castles as were decayed, and to the building vp of new in places where he thought most expedient, specially nere to the British borders, for he well considered that peace increased riches, riches pride and presumption, with other sinnes, which could not long indure without the plague of wars. Therefore he doubting the changes of fortune, thought god in time of peace to prouide for the dangers of warre, when the same should happen vnto him.

These ciuill policies and princelie prouisions for defense of his countrie and subjects increased the fame of Dongard mightilie, but that which he did towards the aduancement of religion did most excellently set forth his commendation. First, all such religious men as followed the trade of life taught by Paladius and others, which came with him from Rome, he caused them to be highly reuerenced: and for the maintenance of their liuing, he assigned forth lands, houses, and other kinds of revenues in diuers places of his realme, and granted not onelie vnto them, but also vnto all other, being within anie orders of clergie, sundrie priuileges, appointing that the churches & abbeies with other holie places should be inuincible and taken for sanctuaries, that all such as fled to the same for safegard of their liues, should be suffered to rest in peace, so long as they kept them within the same.

About the same time also, and whilst these things were thus a doing in Scotland, the Britains being aweiared of their seruile estate, through the setting on of Conanus, conspired together, and took aduise by what meanes they might best seeke to deliuer themselves from the thraldome of Scots and Picts, and vpon aduise taken they concluded to send ouer into Britaine Armo: the some honorable ambassage vnto Androenus the king of that countrie for aid. ted as chiefe ambassadoz to go on that message, which archbishop used such diligence in the matter, that Constantine the sonne of the said Androenus was appointed by his father with a competent power of men to go over into great Britaine to the aid of the British inhabitants there. Whereupon, when the men & ships with all necessarie provision were once ready, he embarked at Saint Malo, where the assemble was made, and taking the sea, sailed forth with prosperous wind and weather, which brought him safely into great Britaine, where he landed at Eotnes in Devonshire, as you shall find in the chronicles of England. He was received with no small joy, and forthwith proclaimed king of Britaine, whereupon he promised to assaie to the uttermost of his power to recover againe their whole lands and liberties, and to mainteine them in the same according to their wish and desires.

For the more speedie accomplishment hereof, commandment was first given, that all able men should be in a readinesse, and come together at a place appointed nere to the river of Humber within fortie daies after. Which order being taken by the aduise of the lords and nobles of the realme, the same was put in execution with such diligence, that few or none being apt to beare armes, withdrew themselves, euerie man in manner comming to the appointed place of the assemble, and offering to go against the enemies, so that it was a wonder to consider the content of the people now ioined in one mind and will to recover their former libertie. When Constantine beheld such notable numbers of men, he supposed the same would haue sufficed not onelie to vanquish the Scots and Picts, but also utterly to deströie & race them out of all the confines of Albion.

When the newes of all this preparation for warres which the Britains made, was once signified to the Scots and Picts, they likewise made their appoyntment to meet with them in the field, and thereupon raising their powers, came forth with the same into Northshire, and pitched their camps within foure miles where Constantine with his people was lodged, and the next day after, understanding how nere vnto the enimie they were, they raised and marched forwards till they came within sight of him, as then incamped with his people aloft vpon certeine hills, nere to the aforesaid river side. Here both the kings of Scots and Picts lodging with their armies for that night, made readie for battell against the next day, and in the morning Dongard the Scottish king getting him to a little hill, called his men together, & there exhorted them by sundrie comfortable means of perswasion to put auaie all feare, and to fight valiantly, assuring them of victorie if they would keepe the order of battell by him appointed, and not rashly breake forth of the same in following vpon the enemies when they fell to retiring backe.

He had scarce made an end of his words, but that diuers of the standing watch came in, and declared how the Britains began to auale the hills where they had lodged, and that the Picts were got forth already in order of battell, and were marching forwards to encounter them. Dongard shewing himselfe to be right iustall of these newes, commanded incontinentlie, that the standards should aduance forth, and euerie man to attend the same according to his appointed order. Also that no man should presume to take any prisoner before the end of the battell, nor to yield himselfe so long as life lasted. So that joining with his enemies, there followed a verie fierce and cruell battell. At length both the wings of the Britains gaue backe from the Scottishmen & Picts, the middle ward abiding the bynt verie stoutlie. Where Constantine himselfe stood like a valiant chieftaine, doing his endeour to the uttermost of his power, vpon whome Dongard earnestlie preasing, and entering into the thickest throng of his enemies, was there beaten downe amongst the Armorelike Britains, and being about to get vp againe by helpe of his weapon, was againe felled to the earth, and slaine with manie a foze wound.

Diuers of the Scots discomfited with this great mishap, fell to running awaie: other kindled with more wrath laid about them more egerlie. The Picts also, for their part sought most constantlie, so that the battell continuing untill none daie with doubtfull successe, at length the Britains were constrained something to giue backe, & after taking themselves to fearefull flight, declared that the victorie remained with their enemies. There died in this mortall battell nere to the point of 16 thousand of the Britains, and of the Scots & Picts about 14 thousand, with Dongard and the Scottish king. Constantine the day next after the battell, withdrew southwards. The Scots carried away with them the corpes of their dead king, and conueying it into the Ile of Iona, now called Colmeckill, there buried it in kinglie wise. Dongard was thus slaine, in the fift yeere of his reigne, after the birth of our Sautoz 475 yeeres, and about the second yeere of Zeno the emperour.

After him succeeded in gouernment of the Scottish kingdome Constantine the brother of the aboue rehearsed Eugenius, a prince unlike in noble vertues vnto his brother the said Eugenius. For though in him there appeared some good tokens of commendable forwardnesse, as he seemed outwardlie to shew, yet was he giuen more vnto wanton pleasure and lust, than to the regard of the god rule and gouernment of his subiects, a deflowerer of virgins, a rauisher of honest matrones, and about all, a fauourer of backbiters and flatterers; neuer shewing anye iust countenance amongst his nobles, but amongst scoffing iesters and other vile persons he was as pleasant and merie as the iocundest man alike. Thus though he represented the British king Constantine in name, yet in manners he far differed from him: for the British Constantine studieng to aduance the commonwealthe of his subiects, trained them in laudable exercises, & reduced them from their former euill vices vnto ciuill order and good customs: Contrariwise, the Scottish Constantine did nothing worthy praise at all, after he was once instituted king, but followed still his owne inordinate lust and sensual appetite.

He granted peace vnto the Britains they scarce requiring the same, releasing not onelie the tribute, but also deliuering vp into their hands by secret meanes diuers castles standing vpon the river of Humber. Whate other things he was about to haue done to the great preiudice and hinderance of the Scottish estate, had not the nobles of the realme the sooner withstood his rash and vnadvised attempts. Such matice also was ingendred in the hearts of the most part of the nobilitie towards him, that had it not bene through the wholesome admonition & perswasion of Dongall of Galloway, a noble man of right reuerend authoritie amongst them, they had leued ciuill wars against him, but the foresaid Dongall declaring to them the great danger and inconvenience that might thereof insue, restrained their wrathfull minds from enterprising anye thing against him by force, so that for certeine yeeres they suffered and bare with this his misordered gouernment.

In the meane while the Picts noting the want of all vertuous qualities thus in the king of Scots, and againe that tokens of valiant courage appeared in the king of the Britains, doubted least if he should seeke take to reuenge old injuries against them, they should be little able to match him without aid of the Scots (whereof they had small trust now, by reason of the insufficiency of the Scottish king) they deuised a meane how to rid the British king out of the waie, and so appointing certaine of their felowes to go into Britaine for the accomplishment of their deuised purpose, at length the same was brought to passe, as in the English chronicles ye shall find more at large, though in the same chronicles there is mention made but of one Iud that should worke this feat, where the Scottish writers record of diuers, which neuertheless were apprehended, and after bound both hand and foot, were cast into a nightie great fire, and therein burnt to ashes in most miserable wise, as by the said Scottish writers it appeareth. The death of this Constantine king of Britains happened in the 15 yere of Constantine king of Scots, neither liued he long after: for hauing rauished a noble mans daughter, borne in the westerne Isles, he was slaine by his father in the night season, after he had reigned in great infamie for his reprochfull life, the space of 17 yeres.

Dongall. Dongall the sonne of Dongard is made king of Scotland.

The politike rule of Dongall.

Constantinus a monke elected king of Britaine.

Mortigerns treason. Constantinus murdered.

Guithellus generall of the British army

Then was Dongall his nephew, as sonne to his brother Dongard, proclaimed king, a prince of disposition indifferent either to peace or warre, though in the beginning of his reigne he shewed himselfe more desirous of peace than of warres, by reason the state of the common-wealth so required, considering how things stood not all in the best order, though his predecessors negligence. Dongall therefore desirous of a reformation, appointed men of great wisdom and good fame to be iudges and officers vnder him, who in redressing misorders, in punishing transgressions, & in deciding of all strifes and contentions betwixt partie & partie, did so well their endeavour, that peace and concord thereupon ensuing, the people recovered peaceable rest and quietnesse, to their no small comfort and contentation.

In this meane while that things passed thus among the Scots, by the procurement of one Mortigern, Constantinus the eldest sonne of the late deceased Constantine king of Britains, was taken out of an abbey, where he was thorne a monke, and advanced to the kingdome: but being not meet of himselfe to gouerne, Mortigern had the whole rule committed to his hands, whereupon he first caused the league to be renewed betwixt the Britains, the Scots, and Picts, and appointed a gard of the same Scots and Picts to be attendant on the kings person: in the end also he procured some of them to murder the king, and after put all the said Scots and Picts to death, as well the gillie as the brigillie, and finally made himselfe king, as in the historie of England you shall find more at large exprest.

The Scots and Picts (for displeasure that their countie men which had bene appointed to gard the person of Constantinus king of the Britains, were maliciously circumvented, & the more part of them wrongfully executed) made sundrie roades and forraides into the British borders, neither sparing fire nor sword where they came. So that the said Mortigern by a greivous report informed hereof, caused an armie with all speed to be leued, and appointed Guithellus the prince of Wales to haue the leading thereof against the enimies: whilst he (doubting least the people would not be ruled by him, for that it was known how he would haue made a waie Constantines children) kept him about London, & durst not commit himselfe so much to the sight of a multitude, as to go forth in that iourne in his owne person.

Guithellus, in respect of the loue which he bare to his countie, purposing to serue truelie in defence thereof, chanced vpon his approach to the borders to take the number of five hundred of the enimies, being advanced from the residue to fetch a bottie. These Guithellus caused to be hanged, as condemned for robbers and pillers of the countie afore aie ouerture of warre was denounced. Whereupon such other as escaped by flight, and had seene their felowes thus executed, declared vnto their gouernors what had happened vnto their felowes. The confederate kings, being in a great chafe herewith, gather together their people, and halfe forward with all speed toward the enimies, who at the first shewed manifest tokens that they were sore afraid of the Scottish and British power: whereupon Guithellus their generall with comfortable wordes willed them to be of good courage, and not to doubt of victorie, hauing so iust a cause to fight with truce-breakers, and such as were giuen more vnto pillage and spoile, than to aie or other commendable exercise or practise of warre.

With such and sundrie other the like wordes the Britains being emboldened, as might well appeare by their change of countenances, Guithellus thereupon remoued his campe more nere vnto his enimies, so that at the first and for certaine daies together, there chanced onelic diuers skirmishes betwixt the parties, as occasion serued. But at length the one being sore moued against the other, they ioine in a pight field. The beginning of which battell was verie fierce and doubtfull. For on that side where Dongall the Scottish king fought, the Britains hostile began to preuaile, through the faint fighting of his people: which danger Calanus the British king quicklie perceiuing, forthwith provided remedie: for taking with him certaine bands out of his owne battell, willing the residue to stand to it manfully, and in no wise to giue ground to the enimie, he himselfe with the said bands fetched a compasse about, and set vpon the backs of them that so had ouermatched the Scots.

This sudden chance sore disordered the Britains, and immediatlie the Scots encouraged afresh, assailed their enimies with more eger minds than they had done at the first, so that maintanentlie both the wings of the British armie were bitterlie discomfited. And herewith a certaine number of the Picts were commanded by their king to make haste to win the campe of the Britains, that such as sought to escape by flight, should find no refuge in the same. Thus the Britains being chased and slaine on euerie side, they knew not whither to flee: so that in the end a great number of them throwing auaie their weapons, yelded themselves, most humble craving mercie at their enimies hands. There were slaine in this battell about twentie thousand of the Britains, together with their generall Guithellus, and a great number of other of the nobilitie. There died also of the Scots and Picts nere hand foure thousand. The prisoners with the spoile of the field were diuided by appointment of the kings amongst the souldiers. Which done, they marched forth into the countie to conquire castles and towres, such as stood in their waie.

In the meane time, the Britains being sore discomfited with the ouerthrow, assembled a councell at London, there to deuise by what meanes they might best defend their countie from the imminent danger in the which it now stood. Mortigern as one gillie in conscience, doubted least through want of god wills in his commons, he should not be able to withstand the mightie inuasion of his enimies, whereupon he was minded to haue auaied the realme, but there were of his councell that aduised him to trie the bittermost point of fortunes hap, than with causeth fine hundred of the enimies to be hanged.

The Scottish and British kings gather their people to resist the Britains. Guithellus encourages the appalled hart of his men of warre with comfortable wordes.

dishonor so to yield at the first blow of his forward hand, considering the abundance of treasure which he had in those, wherewith he might wage souldiers and men of warre out of Germanie & other places, in number sufficient to match with his enemies. This counsell as the best was followed, and messen- gers with commission & sufficient instructions sent with all speed into Germanie, to retaine a number of Sarons, and to bring them over into Britaine, to serve against the Scots and Picts in wages with Woztgerne.

At the same time there were amongst those Sa- rons two brethren, descended by rightfull lineage of the princes of that nation, who being reputed for ba- liant captaine, appointed with the British commis- saries for a certaine summe of monie to take up their prescribed number of men, & to receive charge of them as caponels, aswell for their conuay over into Britaine, as also for their service there, after their arrival. The one of these two brethren was cal- led Hengist or Engist, and the other Hofius, who ha- ving their appointed numbers once filled, confer- ring about ten thousand souldiers in the whole, they bestowed them aboard in thirtie hulks, hoies, and plaits, and in the same transported them over into Britaine, in the 449 yere after Christ, as our histo- ries do affirme: where they were receiued with great joy and gladnesse of Woztgerne, who trusted by their aid to overcome his fierce and dreadfull en- mies.

Wherefore when they had refreshed themselves somewhat after their trauell by sea, they were sent forth with an other armie which Woztgerne had as- sembled of his owne subjects the Britains, to the frontiers of the enemies countrie, where at their first comming they passed ouer the riuer of Hamber, be- fore the Scots or Picts had knowledge that anie such people were come in support of the Britains to bid them battell. They being therefore amazed with the strangenesse of the thing, some of them fled into the inner parts of their countrie, & other that made but forie shift, fell into the hands of the Sarons, who to begin their enterprize with blood, slaie all such as they could laie hands vpon, without anie respect of person. Great was the slaughter by them commit- ted in all those parties where they passed, namelie a- bout the riuer of Tyne. And when they had made an end there, they entred into Northumberland, and so into the dales about Berwike, next adioining vnto Scotland, destroying all before them with fire and sword.

The British king in the meane time had sent vn- to Dongall the king of Scots to come with all speed to support him against the dreadfull invasion of the enemies, whose force being now increased with a power of Sarons, would worke much mischief, if the same were not the more speedilie in the begin- ning repressed: but hearing that the Sarons and Britains daily approached, he thought not good to tar- rie for the comming of the Scots, but halled forth with his owne power to encounter his aduersaries, and rashlie giuing battell, he was overcome, and thereby lost no small number of his people. In this consist the Sarons won them a great name for their high baliance, where contrarie the Britains got them no small note of gilty cowardise, fighting so faintlie, that their captaine had much adoe to cause them to keepe their ground, being readie still to haue run awaie: which their faintnesse of stomack being noted of Hengist, euen then put him in no small confidence that it should be an easie matter for him to conquere them at his pleasure, when time and oc- casion might serue thereto.

ouerthrow at the hands of their cruell enemies, sent againe an other ambassage vnto the Scottish king Congall, to signifie to him by way of lamentation, that losse had happened to them by that most cruell people the Sarons void of all religion and mercie, and that mischief by the same people was inten- ded, aswell against Scots as Picts, vnto the great danger of the utter ruine of both nations, if the en- mies in time were not resisted. They that were sent, declared all this matter vnto king Congall, and as they had in commission, brought him of spee- die succors. Congall not onlie moued for the harms and losses of the Picts his friends and allies, but also much more for the likelihood of the imminent dan- ger and perill towards himselfe and his owne peo- ple, determined speedilie to go with all his power, and to ioine with the Picts, as fullie resolved to pre- uent that mischief which was like to follow, if the violent rage of the enemies were not the sooner re- sisted.

He sent word therefore to the British king, that if he might keepe off the enemies by light skirmishes and incursions for a small time, he would come to his aid shortly, with all the whole puissance of his realme. And herewithall he commanded by open proclamation, that all those within his dominions, which were able to beare armour should by the twen- tith day after assemble together at the south side of Calidon wood, all and euerie of them bringing then and there with them vittels sufficient to serue them for two moneths. According to the which proclama- tion, there came together at the day and place assig- ned, about the number of 40000 able men, fit and meete for the warres. On the morrow after, when Congall had taken the musters & betw of his whole numbers, he set forward towards the place where he understood that the king of the Picts as then lod- ged, who had likewise assembled his people, and in campe taried for the comming of the Scottish armie.

On the fift day after, both the kings met together, and shewed great tokens of intire loue and friend- ship the one towards the other. After this they go to heare diuine seruice, where they make their deuout praiers vnto almighty God for their good speed and luckie successe in that iourne: which being done, they march forth toward the enemies, as then lieng in campe not past ten miles from them. Here at the first sight of the enemies, diuers of the Scots and Picts being stricken with feare to behold so great a multitude, as the like had not bene seene in those parties manie a day before, they scale away and se- cretlie hid themselves in the next woods. But the kings, to giue example to other, caused them that were thus skole away, to be sought out, & brought againe into the campe, where they were hanged in open sight of all the armie.

The Sarons & Britains also vpon the approach of their enemies gathered their companies together, & maintenanclie herewith the Sarons encouraged with such comfortable speech as Hengist vttered a- mongest them, required to haue battell without de- lay: whose example the Britains following, shewed themselves also right willing thereto. Congall the Scottish king perceiuing the enemies to make readie for battell, went likewise amongst his folks, and exhorted them in best wise he could, to play the men. The like also did Calanus the British king a- mongest his people, omitting nothing that might encourage them to fight manfullie. After this, the battell on both sides comming forward to ioine, the arrowes and darts flue freshlie betwixt them, but neither part minding to giue place for all the shot, at length they ioined at handblowes, first the Bri- tains in the right wing with the Scots in the left wing; being; but the Britains not able long to indure against the force of the Scots, gave backe and fled.

In the meane while came a great shower of rainne, mirt with such a tempest of haile, that the hardiest there withed himselve thence, the storme beating so fast upon them, that one might vnderneath see an other, so that the Scottishmen and Picts wist not whether were better to pursue the Britains that fled, or to keepe their places.

On the other part, the Saxons according to their maner in time of anie present danger, closed themselves together and drew nere unto their chieftains standard. Finally the tempest no longer began to ceasse, but the Scots and Picts leaving their order of battell, fell to follow the chafe of the Britains, supposing the victorie had bene whole theirs. Which the Saxons (now after that the element began to cleare up) plainlie perceiuing, by commandement of Hengist their generall, assailed the Scots and Picts here and there disperfed about the spoile and slaughter of the Britains, and made such murther of them on euery side where they found them, that pittie it was to behold. Those that escaped by flight, neuer staid till they were gotten into places safe enough out of danger. This was a blacke day with the Scots and Picts. Neither was it verie toifull to the Britains, of whome no small number died in the place by the enemies sword lamentable to see.
Hengist hauing thus gotten the victorie, withdrew to Forke, leaving those countries betwixt Tine and Twed in the enemies handes, of purpose ceassing from further indamaging them, that the Britains might haue neighbours whome to feare: for that (as he thought) should make much for his purpose, already hauing determined to make a conquest of this Ile.

When summer then was well nere passed, he placed his souldiers in harbrough to lodge for the winter season, and went himselve to London, where he counsell'd Hortigerne to send of his owne people to the borders of his enemies, to keepe the same from their inuasions till the next spring, against which time he promised to cause such notable numbers of his countreimen to come to his aid, as should suffice not onely to vanquish the Scottishmen and Picts, but also utterly to destroy both the nations, or at least wise to drive them forth of the whole countrie. This offer unto some of the nobilitie was not greatlie liked, as ever suspecting that which followed, least in time to come Hengist should seeke the dominion of the realme in placing his owne people, and expelling the former inhabitants. But Hortigerne did not onely giue him most hartie thanks for those his offers, but also shewed by the maner of his intertainment, which he vsed towards him, that he thought he could not do unto him too much honor for such notable seruice as he had done already, and trasted he should do hereafter. According to Hengists aduise also, there was a cruoe of men of warre of Britains sent unto the borders to the number of fue thousand, who shortly after their comming th-ther, were quicklie dispatched and made auaie in sundry skirmishes and incounters with the Scots and Picts, that assailed those places which they were appointed to defend.

Shortly after was sent thither also an other compante, double in number to the first, to reuenge the deaths of their fellowes; but they finding fortune as froward unto them as the former had done before, sped much what a like, for in sundry conflidancers of them being slaine, and diuers other by treason of the borderers themselves deliuered captiue into the aduersaries hands, the residue that was left, per-ceiuing in what danger they stood, thence they might not trust their owne countreimen, returned backe into the inner parts of the land, and so left the borders altogether vnturnished. In this meane while a new supplie of fue thousand Saxons, with their wives and children, came ouer into this land, in eightene hoies, and amongst other came Hengists wife and his daughter the ladie Korena. Short-lie after king Hortigerne gaue vnto Hengist & his Saxons a great part of the countrie called Lindseie, with a castell of great strength called Thongcastre. Some haue written that Hengist required of Hortigerne so much ground as he might compas with an ore hide, and hauing that granted, he toke a mightie ore hide, and cut it into small thongs, and so compassing about a right strong plot of ground with those thongs line wise, began there the foundation of a castell, which toke name of those thongs, wherewith the plot of ground was first measured, and so was it called Thong-castell. But upon what consideration so euer it toke that name, certeine it is by record of all the Scottish histories, that there the Saxons first inhabited after their entring into Brit-taine.

When Hengist had set things in order for the placing of his people there in dwellings (appointed them by Hortigerne) according as seemed best vnto his politike head and craftie forecast, he toke forth the souldiers and men of warre, ordered vnder cer-teine capteins and officers of bands, and led them forward by slow iournies as it were staling for the comming of the Britains. Hortigerne had gathered as then an huge host of his subiects, and appointed his generall lieutenant ouer them his sonne Hortigerne, a yong man of great force and valiancie, but so that he should be ordered in all things by the aduise and discretion of Hengist, whose au-thoritie for the warres he commanded chieftie to be followed.

When both the armies of Saxons and Britains were met together, Hengist led them ouer the riuers of Humber and Tine, marching directlie towards the place where he thought the enemies late. The Scottish and Pictish kings, hauing knowledg of such preparation made by the Britains, they gathered their powers together, to the number of 60000 men, furnished with prouision of vittels for a long time. But before their comming to the riuer of Tine, vpon knowledg had that the Saxons and Britains were passed the same, they made streight towards them, in purpose to haue giuen battell without longer protracting of time: howbeit comming to the place where they were lodged, they found them so strongly incamped, that no aduantage could be perceiued which waie they might be constrained to raile and come forth of their strength to receiue battell vpon some euery ground, which Hengist of purpose for a time seemed to deferre.

Between them also and the armies of the two kings there was a ballie, in the botome full of mires and marish grounds, which the Scottishmen & Picts must needs passe, yet they could find meanes to do anie notable displeasure to the enemies. Wherefore at length they determined with tarfe and sagots to make passage ouer those mires. Which being accomplished in the night following, the next morning they passed ouer and got them vnto certeine hilles lieng right ouer against the Saxon and Pictish campes, some of them taking their lodgings vpon the brow or front of an hill so nere to the lodgings of their enemies, that they might throwe a dart into their campe: and hereof they toke no small occasion to worke a feat against their aduersaries, to their great annoiance and vexation.

There was growning in that place, where they were thus incamped, &erie much of that kind of heath or ling, which the Scottismen call hadder. At which heath or hadder, they gathered a great quantitie together, and binding it in bundles like voto fagots, in the night season, they set the same on fire, tumbling it downe the hill, on that side where the Sarons late. The wind in that instant being somewhat aloft, caused these bundles of ling to blase and burne vehementlie, and hereto standing that waies forth, drove the flame so streinable amongst the tents and cabins of the Sarons, that the fire catching in the straw and twigs which they had couched together vnder them in stead of beds, increased the feare amongst the souldiours wonderfullie, by reason that the blasing bundles of the ling or hadder, still conning downe the hill vpon them, seemed as though the same had fallen from above; and euen south of the heauen it selfe.

Great was the tumult and noise throughout the whole campe, with such roring of beastes, and running by and downe both of them and of the horses which were there in the campe, that if heauen and earth had gone together, there could not haue bene a more terrible noise nor clamor. At length, when the souldiours had done what they could to quench the fire, and to appease the trouble, not without some by-rows and disorder raised on each side, they got them with their armes and weapons forth into the next field, which Hengist himselfe perceiuing (having first done what he could to stay them) inuironed with a companie of his choicest men of warre, he got him by vnto a little hill next adioining, and there gaue knowledge by the sound of a trumpet that all his people should byat to thither vnto him. After this, when they were come together, he disposed them in order of battell with all diligence, abiding for the spring of the daie, to vnderstand more certeinlie the meaning of his enemies.

The Scots and Picts supposing the enemies to be farre disordered, by reason of the fire descended downe from the hilles, fullie determined to assaile them in their camps: but vpon their approach to the same, perceiuing how the Sarons were gotten forth, and stood readie in good order of battell, minding to defend their ground, both the kings thought it best to tarie till the morning, yer they made anie exploit, for doubt of perills that might befall thereof. In the breake of the daie Congall came amongst his people, exhorting them to remember their twoylders elders, and by their example to chose rather to die in defense of their countrie & ancient liberties, than by cowardize to saue a dishonest life, which (if their chance was to be vanquished) they should passe in great thaladome and miserie. The Pictish king also with like words encouraged his men to do valiantlie. Neither was Hengist slow in perswading his Sarons to plate the men, that obtaining the victorie they might deliuer themselves from terroz of all enemies from thenceforth in Britaine.

Whilist he was thus exhorting his people, the Scots and Picts with great force and violence began to giue the charge vpon him, which whilist the Sarons and Britains went about to defend, they were beaten downe by heaps so fiercelie on each side, that the discomfiture had light vpon them forthwith, had not Hengist by sound of trumpet called forth about three thousand fresh men to their succors, which he had placed in an ambush a little before the spring of the daie within a thicke groue of wood, fast by his campe, appointing them to remaine there in a readinesse, to come at his call, vpon what danger soener happened. These most fiercelie setting vpon the backs of the Scots, brought them streight out of all order: for they being occupied with the other Sar-

ons before, and now assailed of these behind, they had vnderneath come for anie aduantage to turne their weapons. In the meane time the Picts being matched with the Britains: did put them to flight, and chased them out of the field, not ceassing to pursue them in the chase, till they came to a riuer in the which a great number of them were drowned, as they leaped to passe ouer the same, and to saue themselves by swimming. On the other side, the Scots being sore handled by the Sarons, both before and behind, were at the length constrained to giue ground and breake forth by flight, & so to escape the cruell hands of the enemies. Manie were slaine in the chase, and some taken prisoners. The residue getting away, fled streight to the Picts: but Congall himselfe, through helpe of his household seruants escaped to the top of an high hill, and saued himselfe all wounded as he was.

The Picts returning from the chase, and vnderstanding how the Sarons had giuen the Scots the overthrow, and that they were now marching forward to encounter also with them, determined not to abide their conning at that time. And so night approaching yer the Sarons had got sight of them, order was giuen by commandement of their king, that all their carriage, and a great quantitie of logs and fagots, should be placed and piled together before them, and in the darke of the night to be set on fire, which being executed according to the appointment, when the fire was once kindled, the Picts with the Scots which were got vnto them, departed as secretly as they might, and staid not to make atwaile, till they were farre enough out of the danger of the Sarons. Hengist having thus got the victorie, and perceiuing no enemy abroad to bid him battell, mustered his men, and found that he had lost in this tourne as good as foure thousand of one and other. After this, he withdreweth to Forke, and leaving his armie there, went himselfe vnto London, where he was receiued with ioy enough by king Wostigerne.

Shortlie after, vpon knowledge that Aurelius Ambrose, and Alter, the sonnes of king Constantine prepared to come ouer with a mightie armie of Armorike Britains, and other Frenchmen, to claime the crowne of Britaine, as lawfullie descended to them from their father: the Sarons were sent for out of the north parts, and had dwellings appointed vnto them in Kent, to be at hand if need were to resist anie such attempted inuasion. But shortlie after, for a policie, Hengist caused it to be bruited abroad, that the Scots and Picts meant effronies to invade the British confines, & therefore was there an other power of Sarons called into the land, and placed in the north parts, to defend the same against the Scots and Picts. Occa the sonne of Hengist had the leading of these Sarons, who brought them ouer, being ten thousand men of warre, in fittie platts, and fittie hoies. They brought with them also their wiues and children, and settled themselves in the north parts betwixt the riuer of Humber and the borders of the Pictish dominions. And euen then it began to take the name of Northumberland, which is as you wold say, the land by north the riuer of Humber, and so it doth continue.

Shortlie after, Wostigerne forsaking his lawfull wife, married the ladie Korena or Kowen, Hengists daughter, to the high offense of God, and great displeasure of his subjects. And in the meane time, Occa not attempting anie exploit against the Scots and Picts, rather sought to get into his hands all the fortresses betwixt Ene and Humber, euen from the east sea to the west: which his purposed intent he greatlye advanced, winning castles and fortresses there there in those parties, some by force, and some by surrender: and amongst other places of importance, he first got possession of Yorke, and feigning accusations against manie of the nobles and gentlemen, surmising that they would betraie the countrey vnto the Scots & Picts, he put diuerse of them to death, some secretly, and others openly, as comit of such offenses as were forged and laid against them.

Whereupon the Britains for the Ray of such mischief as they saw at hand, depoyed Wortimerne from his kinglie seat, and placed his sonne Wortimer in his roome, which being done, ambassadoes were sent both vnto the Scots and Picts, to require their aid and support against the cruell oppression of the Saxons, who fought not onelie by craftie meanes and fraudulent waies to attaine the dominion of the whole Ile, but also to extinguishe and utterlie subuert the faith of Christ, and the vse of his religion through out the same. Therefore they earnestlie desired the Scottish and Pictish kings, to assist them against such common enemies as had bene called into the realme, not by publike consent of the nobles, but onlie by the priuate commandement and ordinance of Wortimerne, to helpe as well toward the subduing of the Scots and Picts, as also to repress all commotions of the Britains, which they might happilie raise against him for his wicked tyrannie vsed amongst them, as his guiltie conscience might put him still in feare of.

The Scottish king Congall (vnto whome first the ambassadoes were sent) for answer declared, that he was forie to vnderstand into what danger the miserable christians of Britaine were thus fallen, and therefore if nothing else might moue him to ioyne with the Britains against the Saxons, yet that were sufficient cause to inforce him to do the best he could, to helpe to deliuer the whole Ile from such an ethnike generation, as not onelie vied the rites and ceremonies of their false religion, and that openly among the christians, with doing sacrifice in the honor and worship of their hellish gods, to the great horror and terrible offense of the beholders consciences; but also fought by all meanes they could devise, how to destruye and quench utterlie the faith of our Saviour Christ in all places where they might get the upper hand.

He promised therefore to imploy his whole puissance to recouer out of the enemies hands all such countreies as laie betwixt the frontiers of his dominion and the river of Humber, and further to aid the Britains to drive them quite out of the Ile, if the Britains would assure him, from thenceforth neuer to make claime, title nor interest, to any of the countreies aforesaid, lieng betwixt the said river of Humber and the confines of his realme; but to leaue the same in the hands of the Scottishmen and Picts, to haue hold and inioy for euermore in quiet: which to performe, the ambassadoes had (amongest other things) already promised in name of all the Brittain nation, as a recompense or meed to haue the support and succors of the Scots. The like answer the same ambassadoes recetued of the Pictish king, and returning therewith vnto Wortimer, declared afoze him and his counsell how they had sped.

Shortlie after, for the more and better assurance of all promises, covenants and articles passed betwixt the Scottishmen, Picts, and Britains, there was an amitie and bond of peace now renewed, ratified and established, according to the tenor of the ancient league, which had bene concluded in times past betwixt them, with some new conditions of agreement included in the same: all old iniuries being ended and quieted clearelie betwixt them, so that no cause of grudge or displeasure might bee thought to remaine in remembrance. The first enterprise put in execution after the concluding of this league, was made by the Scots against Decca and his Saxons, which (as parit is heard) had nestled themselves betwixt the rivers of Tyne and Humber.

Against those Scots, as they were verie earnestlie occupied in ouerthrowing castles and towres, with slaughter of such Saxons as stood at defense, Decca cometh into the field with an armie readie to encounter with them, but perceluing the multitude of his enemies to be such, as he doubted least he should not be well able to match with them, he staied a while from giuing the onser: but in the end perceluing he could not retire backe but to his great disadvantage, he boldlie gaue signe to his people to set vpon their enemies: which they fiercelie executing, it was hard to tell for a while to whether part the victorie would incline. But at length the Saxons not able to sasse the force of the Scots, ouerprelling them with multitude, began to giue backe: which Decca perceluing, did what he could to hem them in from running awaie, but yet notwithstanding all that he could do, feare at length ouercoming regard to their captains commandement, shame of rebuke was quite set apart, and so they toke them to their feet, and fled awaie so fast as they might, the Scots pursuing after them amaine.

Decca yet escaped with diuerse of his nobles, and comming to the mouth of Humber, got a ship, and sailed forth in the same with great danger, till at length he arriued within the Hamcs. The slaughter of the Saxons vpon the discomfiture was great, speciallie in the chafe, for the Scottishmen calling to remembrance that they had to do with infidels, and with the enemies of the christian faith, were so eger vpon them, that they saued few or none that fell into their hands. About the same time was Wortimer entered into Kent against Hengist and his Saxons there, and encountering with them in battell, slue ten thousand of them, and chased the residue forth of that countrie. Thus Kent returned vnto the Britains, and the countreies beyond Humber northwards vnto the Scots and Picts, according to the tenour of the league before mentioned.

Hengist and his sonne Decca (who a little before this battell in Kent was come vnto his father) with the residue of them that escaped, hastied with all speed toward Northumberland, in purpose to remaine in that countrie till they had recouered their strength by some power to be sent ouer vnto them out of their owne countrie: but being repelled with no small slaughter from thence by the Scots and Picts, they withdrew vnto the mouth of Humber, where getting certeine vessels, they passed ouer into Saronie, leauing a great sort of their nation behind them, dispersed abroad here and there in this Ile, as fortune then best serued. Wortimer hauing got the victorie, as before is mentioned, vied not the same verie cruellie, for taking onelie from the Saxons which were taken prisoners their armes and weapons, he suffered them to depart into their countrie: other of the same nation being but husbandmen, and as it were poore laborers of the ground, he permitted to tarte in the countrie with their wiues & children, as seruants vnto the Britains.

After this, Wortimer gaue order for the repairing of churches, and restoring of the christian religion into the state of the former puritie thereof, as then sore decayed, partlie through the euill example taken by daillie conuersation amongst the Saxons, and partlie also by the infectiue heresie of the Pelagians, as then mightilie spread ouer the most part of Britaine. At length the said Wortimer, through treason of his stepmother

Stepmother Koreita was poisoned, and died. Then was Moztigerne againe restored to the rule of the kingdome, first forced by oth to promise neuer to aid the Saxons, nor to receiue by way of aid anie forreine people into the realme. Moztigerne then restored thus vnto the crowne, shewed such diligence in causing due administration of iustice without rigour to be executed, and promise made for the resisting of all inuasions that might be attempted by anie forreine power, that his praise was great amongst all his subiects, who to shew their good willes likewise towards him as to their naturall prince, were not slacke in honoring him aswell by gifts and presents, as by all other manner of waies. He found meanes also to renew the league with the Scots and Picts, with like conditions and articles, as it was concluded lastlie betwixt them and his sonne Moztimer. But notwithstanding his politike proceeding, thus to auoid all inconuenience that might happen; Moztimer after Hengist returned, and that by force and subtilties, at length got possession of the moze part of Britaine, so that the Britains were constrained to flee into Wales, whither also Moztigerne fled, and remained there a certaine time, till at length Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uter, the sonnes of king Constantine came ouer out of little Britaine, and besieging Moztigerne in a castell, burnt him with the house and all, when they could not otherwise come by him, according to that which Merlin the British soothsaier had prophesied before. It is folishlie supposed that this Merlin was got by a spirit of that kind which are called Incubi, that is to vnderstand, such as conuelling mans seed from him (and there with by illusion taking vpon them the shape and figure of man) doe lie with women, and vse them after the manner of carnall copulation.

In this place Hector Boetius by the way rectifieth a like tale of two, of such illusions of spirits, wrought not long before his time in Scotland, which somewhat abridging the same we haue here inscribed. In the yere 1480, saith he, it chanced as a Scottish ship departed out of the fozth towards Flanders, there rose a wonderfull great tempest of wind and weather, so outrageous, that the maister of the ship with other the mariners wondered not a little what the matter ment, to see such weather at that time of the yere, for it was about the middell of summer. At length when the furious pirrie & rage of winds still increased, in such wise that all those within the ship looked for present death, there was a woman vnderneath the batthes, called vnto them aboue, and tolled them to throw hir into the sea, that all the residue by Gods grace might yet be saued: and thereupon told them, how she had bene haunted a long time with a spirit, daile comming vnto hir in mans likeness, and that euen as then he was with hir, vsing his filthie pleasure after the manner of carnall copulation. In the ship there chanced also to be a priest, who by the maisters appointment going downe to this woman, and finding hir like a most wretched and desperate person, lamenting hir great misfortune and miserable estate, vsed such wholesome admonitions and comfortable aduertisements, willing hir to repent and hope for mercie at the hands of God, that at length the seeming right penitent for hir greuous offences committed, and fetching sundrie sighes euen from the bottome of hir heart, being witness (as should appeare) of the same, there issued forth of the pumpe of the ship a foule and euill fauored blacke cloud, with a mightie terrible noise, flame, smoke and stinke, which presently fell into the sea. And suddenly ther vpon the tempest ceased, and the ship passing in great quiet the residue of hir iourne, arrived in safetie at the place whither she was bound.

Not long before the hap hereof, there was in like manner a yong man dwelling in Carroth, within a village there, not passing 14 miles from Aberdine, verie faire & comelie of shape, who declared by waie of complaint vnto the bishop of that diocesse, how there was a spirit which haunted him in shape of a woman, so faire and beautifull a thing, that he neuer saw the like, the which would come into his chamber at nights, and with pleasant intisements allure him to haue to doe with hir, & that by no manner of means he could be rid of hir. The bishop like a wise man aduised him to remoue into some other countrie, and to giue himselfe to fasting and prayer, so to auoid his hands of that wicked spirit. The yong man following the bishops counsell, within a few daies was deliuered from further temptation.

About the same time also, there was in the countrie of Spar, a yong gentlewoman of excellent beautie, and daughter vnto a noble man there, refusing sundrie wealthie marriages offered to hir by hir father, and other friends. At length she promised with child, and being rigorously compelled by hir parents to tell who was the father, she confessed that a certaine yong man used nightlie to come vnto hir, and kept hir companie, and sometimes in the day also, but how or from whence he came, or by what meanes he went awaie, she was not able to declare. Her parents not greatly crediting hir words, laid diligent watch, to vnderstand what he was that had defiled their house: and within three daies after, vpon signification giuen by one of the maidens, that the fornicator was at that verie instant with their daughter, incontinentlie there vpon, making fast the doores, they enter the chamber with a great manie of torches and lights, where they find in their daughters armes a foule monstrous thing, verie horrible to behold. Here a number comming hastilie in, to behold this euill fauored sight, amongst other there was a priest of verie honest life, not ignorant (as was thought) in knowledge of holie scripture.

This priest (all other being afraid) and some of them running their waies, began to recite the beginning of Saint Johns gospel, and comming to these words, Verbum caro factum est, suddenly the wicked spirit making a verie sore and terrible roaring noise, due his waies, taking the rose of the chamber awaie with him, the hangings and coverings of the bed being also burnt therewith. The gentlewoman was yet preserved, and within three or foure daies after was deliuered of such a mishapen thing, as the like before had not bene seene, which the midwives and women, such as were present at hir labor, to auoid the dishonor of hir house, immediatlie burnt in a great fire, made in the chamber for the same intent. Thus much out of Hector Boetius, which, with moze, he hath written to proue that all is not feined which is written of the illusions of diuels and euill spirits, the credit whereof I leave with the author.

Now to returne where I left touching Aurelius Ambrose. He shall vnderstand, that he hauing once subdued and dispatched his aduersarie Moztigerne, determined to make warres against Hengist and his Saxons, to proue if his chance might be to recover the realme out of their hands, and so to restore againe the christian religion. But first yer he attempted anie exploit against the enemies, he sent ambassadors both vnto Congall the Scottish king, and also vnto one Roth a towardlie yong gentleman, and of verie comelie personage, as then reigning among the Picts, requiring them both to aid him in so necessitie an enterprise as he had in hand against the enemies of Christ and his religion. Wherevpon both these kings, weighing with themselves the dutie of all christian princes, in respect of the aduancement of the cause of faith, and suppressing of chynike idolatrie, promised their helpe to the vitermost of their powers against the Saxons, who had in such tyrannike foyt subverted and abolished the christian profession within the Britissh confines. And therefore the old league, according to the articles and covenants afore time concluded betwixt the thre nations, was once againe renewed, and an armie prepared by uerie of them, to meet at a place and day appointed, for the better expedition of this their attempted vol-age.

Aurelius
Ambrose ma-keth an oration.

First Aurelius Ambrose, with such power as he brought with him forth of France, & joining there-unto a great multitude of those Britains which had escaped the Saxons hands, either by withdrawing themselves into Wales, or else by conuening themselves into the countries of the Scots and Picts, setteth forward toward the Scottish armie. But first calling together those Britains that he had about him, and going vp to a little hill, where he might be heard of them all, he made a long oration by waie of complaint, of the great iniuries and cruell practises vsed by Hengist, against the linage of king Constantine, and the whole estate of the Britissh common-wealth; also of the horrible persecution made by him and his people the Saxons, against the professors of the christian religion. All which matter he handled in wordes so pithie, his talke yet fauouring of the Romane eloquence, that the minds of the soldiers being kindled therewith, required nothing but battell, as men not doubting but by his wise and politike conduct to at-chine some glorious victorie. And to the end all thing might be done in better order, according to his appointment, immediatlie they proclaimed him king.
Which was by account of the Scottish chronicles, in the yeere 498, after that Vortigern with his sonne Vortimer had reigned 17 yeeres in the isle.

Aurelius
Ambrose proclaimed king of Britaine.

Aurelius in this wise being established king of Britaine passeth forth with his people, and within six daies after met with the armies of the Scots and Picts. Generall of the Scots at that time was one Conranus brother to king Congall, who was troubled with the gout, so that he could not come himselfe in person. Loth the Britissh king was there himselfe amongst his people, verie desirous to shew some prooff of his manlie prowesse and manhood. Aurelius Ambrose shewed all the honor that might be deuised, as well to the one as to the other of those two nations, promising to requite them with as much friendship when time and occasion should craue the like assistance. These thre mightie armies therefore being thus assembled, marched forth towards a place called Waheswell, where they understood that Hengist with his power as then did sojorne. Where when both the camps were pitched, and one lieng not farre from the other: at the first certeine light skirmishes were procured by both parts betwixt the light horsemen, where with at length being the more prouoked to displeasure, they come into the field with their whole maine battels, verie fiercelie incountering ech other, so that (as it appeared) their force was not so great, but their morall hate was even as much, or rather more, if the histories saie right.

The Armorike Britains with a new kind of order in their fight, sore troubled the Saxons, in persing their battels, with their men arraid in certeine wards, broad behind and narrow before, wedgethwise.
The Scots also & Picts bare downe both the wings of the Saxons, in such manner, that the standards of all the three nations, Scots, Picts, and Britains, were at point almost to meet, hauing made waie thereunto through the middell of their enemies.
Wherewith the Saxons (being sore discouraged) began to giue backe; and finalie, notwithstanding all that Hengist could saie or doo to haue staied them, they fell to running awaie, and fled amaine, which when he thought he saw, & perceived that there was no recoverie, he himselfe (in manner the last man that abode) fled likewise his waies out of the field, with an ambushment of horsemen about him, but being pursued by Aurelius verie fiercelie, he was run through the bodie by him with a speare, and so was there slaine out of hand, in the 488 yeere of Christ, and 40 after his comming into this Ile. Howbeit the other of the Saxons conueied his sonne Deca (being also sore wounded) awaie with them by into the next mountains, whither they fled for their refuge, leauing the dead bodie of his father Hengist in the field, to their high reproch, there to be spoiled and abused of his enemies.

Aurelius haueth victorie at London.

Aurelius Ambrose hauing thus got the vpper hand of his enemies, hasted forth with all speed vnto London, where hauing both the citie and towne deliuered into his hands, he recovered the whole Island from the possession of the Saxons: and such of them as were apt men, able to beare armor, and to serue in the warres, he commanded to depart forth of the land. The other that were minded to tarrie behind their fellows that were thus forced to depart, became subiects to the Britains, and covenanted to become christians. Thus much haue I written touching Aurelius Ambrose, according to the report of the Scottish writers, but more hereof ye may read in the historie of England, where ye shall find this matter set forth more at large. For that which we write here, is but to shew in what sort the Scottish writers make relation of the warres which their nation had with the Saxons, when they began first to set foot here in this land.

To our purpose then. In the meane time Aurelius hauing thus recovered the land out of the Saxons hands, and now remaining at London, did all the honor he could imagine, both vnto Loth the Bri-tissh king, and also vnto Conranus generall of the Scottisshmen, acknowledging how that by their aid chieflie he had got the vpper hand of his enemies, and so he willed to haue it notified amongst his subiecs.
Hereto he caused the league to be renewed betwixt the Scots, Picts, & Britains, the ancient ordinance for the countries beyond Huniber, being appointed to remaine vnto the Scottisshmen and Picts: also that the Saxons should be reputed common enimies to all the thre nations, and that upon invasion made by anie forein power, the Scots, Picts, and Britains, should aid one another as occasion serued.

This league being concluded with these articles of covenants, was the more strongly confirmed, by reason of such affinitie and alliance as then also inued. For whereas Aurelius had two sisters, the one named Anne, and the other Ada, virgins both; Anne being the elder, was given in marriage vnto king Loth, by whome certeine yeares after he had issue two sonnes, Spordred, and Walthan or Cal-uwan, with a daughter called Themetes: Ada being the younger sister was married vnto Conranus, generall (as is said) of the Scottissh armie. Howbeit she liued not past two yeares after, but died in trauell of child, which also died with the mother: and so ended the alliance of Aurelius and Conranus. The Britains being deliuered through the victorie and means afore rehearsed from the cruell hands of the Saxons, inioied full peace certeine yeares after, but in the meane time diuers of those Saxons which were licenced to remaine in Britaine, counterfeiting to become christians, vsed nevertheless to make sacrifice vnto idols, according to the maner of the gentiles, wherof their priests being accused and condemned, suffered death by fire for that offence.

sense, accordinglie as the law did then appoint them. Whilist these things were thus in hand, Congall king of the Scots being twome with long sicknesse, departed this life, and was buried in the Ile of Jona, otherwise called Colmekill, with all kinglie pompe and accustomed ceremonies. He reigned ouer the Scottismen about 20 yeares in great fame and glorie.

After his deceasse, his brother Conranus with a great reioysing of all the Scottish nation was admitted k. in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour 512, and the 22 of the reigne of the emperor Anastasius. This Conranus otherwise called Conranus, being established king, first toke order that the sonnes of his brother Congall being within age, should be brought vp in the Ile of Span, vnder the gouernance of certeine wise instructors & scholemasters, to be trained in learning and vertuous discipline, according to an ancient ordinance thereof made and enacted. Also doubting least peace and quietnesse, now after long warres, should minister matter to his people of raising some commotion, to the disturbance of all ciuill order & politike gouernment within his realme, he rode as it had bene in circuit round about the same, making inquirie of all manner offendours, on whome he caused due punishment to be executed, without respect either of kith or kin.

And amongst other enormities which he vnderstood to be vsed in maner through all his countries, this (as he thought) was most grieuous, that the husbandmen and other commons of the countrie, being euill intreated and misused at the gentlemen's hands, durst not complaine, nor procure anie redress, by reason whereof, when they were oppressed, or suffered anie manner of wrong or iniurie, they were without remedie to haue the same reformed; he ordeined therefore, that the names of all such offendours, with the maner of their offenses, should be secretlie registered in a booke euerie yeare, by certeine inquisitors thereto chosen and appointed. And if it chanced that those which were thus accused, might afterwards be found guiltie before the kings iustices by matter plainelie proued against them; they should then be sure to be punished according to the measure of their offenses.

This custome of accusations, commonlie called indictments, continueth euen vnto these our daies. Conranus himselfe (as is reported) vsed much to be present at assises and sessions to see the lawes duellie ministred, either else to passe the time in hunting within some forrest or chase, nere to the place where the iustices sat. Now whilist Conranus king of Scots thus studied for the god gouernement of his people, Aurelius Ambrose the king of Britaine fell sicke of a consumption, which brought him to such weakenesse, that all recouerie of health in him was despaired; whereof Deca and Pascentius sonnes to Hengist being aduertised, returned with a mightie powder of Sarons into Britaine, which (as Hector Boetius saith) they named at that present Hengists land.

After the brother of Aurelius late also at the same time fore sicke of a sir in the parties of Wales, so that to auoid dissention that was raised among the Britains, about the appointing of a generall to go against the enemies, Aurelius euen sicke as he was, caused himselfe to be caried forth in a litter; with whose presence his people were so encouraged, that incounting with the Sarons they won the victorie, although with such losse on their side, that Aurelius was glad to take truce for the space of foure moneths, and therewith breaking vp his campe, went into Winchester, and sent ambassadours vnto the Scottish and British kings for aid against the time when the truce should expire, which was granted, and so he prouided for all things readie for the warres against the appointed time of their assemble. Deca also sent his brother Pascentius into Germanie for more aid, but as some write, he was driuen by contrarie winds into Ireland, & getting a great power of men together there, he came backe to his brother with the same. But whether he had those men out of Ireland or Germanie, sure it is that the power of the Sarons was greatlie increased therewith. In the meane time died Aurelius Ambrose, who was poisoned by a mischievous monke, a Saron borne, named Copa or Copa (as some booke haue) that toke vpon him to be skilfull in physicke, and a monke by profession. His death was sore lamented of the Britains: but contrariwise, the Sarons reioysed greatlie thereof, so that immediatlie after, Deca with his powder inuadeth the Britains, vsing great crueltie in all places where soeuer he came.

In the meane time the Scottish and British armies were come forward towards Aurelius, according to promise made vnto his ambassadours; but when his death was certeinlie known amongst them, the capteins and leaders of both those armies, resolved to returne home againe, and so they did, for that they doubted in what state and order things should stand amongst the Britains now after the deceasse of their late king. After the death of Aurelius Ambrose, his brother Uter was made king of Britaine, and falling in loue with the wife of Gothlois duke of Cornewall, he did not onelie force hir to lie with him; but also to the end he might inioy hir the more frelie, he ceased not to pursue hir husband to rid him out of the wate, whome at length he toke within a castell into the which he was fled, & forthwith caused him to be executed, furnishing mater against him, for that he had forsaken one of the capteins called Paschaliod, in battell against the Sarons. By the wife of this Gothlois, Uter had issue the great Arthur, and because he had no legitimat sonne, he appointed that Arthur should succeed him in gouernement of the realme. Herewith Loth the British king was not a little moued, disdainning that Arthur being a ballard, and begot of another mans wife in adulterie, should be preferred before his sons the rightfull heires of the British kingdome: and therefore by ambassadours he did what he could to dissuade Uter from making anie such ordinance. But when he saw that he could not remoue him from his opinion, he thought best to content himselfe with silence, till the time serued better for his purpose. At length when the wars were againe renewed betwixt Uter and Deca the Saron king, Loth in reuenge of the iniurie done to him and his children, ioined himselfe to the Sarons, and was with them at the battell, in which the Britains got the victorie by the presence of saint Germane that holie bishop of Auer, as the Scottish writers make mention. Which battell as the same is set forth by Hector Boetius, because it touched the state of the Bids, we haue thought good here to expresse.

It was therefore about the feast of Easter, when the armies came into the field, the Sarons with the Bids on the one side, & the Britains on the other, of whom no small number (being either growen to be idolaters through conuersation with the Sarons, either els infected with the heresie of the Pelagians) euen there in campe, by hearing such god sermons as saint Germane preached amongst them, were conuerted to the true beliefe, receiuing at the same time the sacrament of the Lords bodie, together in companie with other of the faithfull christians. Finally when both parties were readie to giue battell, saint Germane took upon him to haue the leading of the foze ward, wherein he had all the priests and ecclesiasticall ministers, giuing commandement, that when he should drie Alleluia, they should all an-swere him with one intire voice.

Thus proceed they forth to the battell, saint Germane beareth the kings stane bard in the foze front, e vpon the approach to the enemies, he with the rest of the priests crying with a lowd voice thrice together Alleluia, was answered by all the whole host, utter-ring and crying the same drie so whole together, that the verie sound thereof caused such an echo on each side by reason of the hollow mounteines and cliffes hard by them, that the Saxons amazed at this doubled noise, and doubting not onlie another power of their enemies to be hidden priuile among the hills which they saw on each side of them, but also least the verie rocks & mounteines would haue fallen downe vpon their heads together with the frame of the element, readie (as it seemed to them) to breake in sunder, they took them to their feet in such dreadfull hast, that their breath was not able to suffice halfe the desire they had to continue their course. Panie of them made such hast, that running to the next river in hope to passe the same, were drowned therein.
To conclude, all of them generallie threw away both weapon and armour, the more lightlie to make away. Thus through the policie of that blessed man saint Germane, the victorie remained with king Aler and his Britains, without anie bloodshed.

Saint Beda making mention of this battell, assign-eth the time to be at the first coming of S. Germane into this land, where as Hector Boetius following Veremond, supposeth it to be at the second time of his coming hither, which was in the daies of king Aler. But at what time soener this victorie thus chanced, certeine it is, the Britains waring proud thereof, nothing regarded the power of the Saxons, nor took anie heed for provision of further defense; but after that those holie bishops Germane and Severus were returned into their coun-trie, they fell to all kinds of gluttonie and excess, in following onlie their sensuall lusts and fleshlie concupiscence: which abuses, the bishops and other godlie men lamenting, ceased not most earnestlie to reprove, menacing destruction to the whole coun-trie, if the people leauing their wicked living and most heinous offenses towards God, did not amend and repent in due time and space.

Neither were they deceived herein: for within few yeares after, Decca effsones began to make warres vpon the Britains againe, and gane them a notable overthrow, sleaing of them to the number of sixtine thousand, with their generall phaliod.
But yet this victorie was not greatlie pleasant to the Saxons, for in the chase they lost their king the foresaid Decca, being advanced a good way off from the residue of his armie, with five hundred horsemen and a few footmen, in pursute of his enemies, which was the onlie cause that as then the Saxons attempted no further exploit against the Britains. and yet for that they would not be without a gou-ernour, they created an other Decca to be their k. the nephew of the former Decca by his brother Discus: and then turned all their force to make warres against the Brits, for that Loth king of the Brits, contrarie to his oth of credence, had aided the Britains in the last battell, as by certeine prisoners taken in the same they had perfect vnderstanding.

Decca therefore being fierce of nature, to the end to indamage his enemies the more, sent into Germanie for one Colgerme or Colgerne, a man of great estimation and birth amongst the Saxons, to come ouer with a power vnto him into England, promising for recompense of his trauell and aid against the Brits, to deliuer vnto him all such lands as lay beyond the water of Humber, which might be reco-uered out of the hands of the Brits, to insip vnto him and his for ever. Colgerne accepting the offer, landed shortly after in Northumberland, putting the whole countie vnto fire and sword. Which cruell dealing caused a great number of Scots & Brits, which held diuerse castles in that quarter, to come forth into the field to defend the countie, and joining battell with their enemies were discomfited, their slaughter being much increased by the com-ming of Decca at vnwares vpon them. For he first taking truce with Aler king of the Britains, basted with all speed to ioine his power with Colgerne, after he heard once that he was come on land.

These newes being brought by such as fled away into Galloway and Pictland, caused both the kings, Loth and Conranus in most speedie wise to assemble their forces, and with the same to march forthwith towards the Saxons: but being come within sight of them readie to giue battell, great was the feare and terror of both their hosts, to ioine in fight with such a number of fierce people, as they saw there before their faces. Which feare arose first through the Britains, of whome no small number was there, in aid of the Scots and Brits against the Saxons, declaring manie things of the great valure, strength of bodie, and huge forme of lims of the same Saxons, being so fierce and cruell in fight, as they alleged, that they were able to put their enemies to flight euen with their grim looks and terrible countenances. Whereof such feare and terror was spread through both the whole armies, that if thame had not partlie brought amongst the men of warre, manie of them would haue fled their waies before anie battell had bene attempted at all.

The kings perceiuing such discomfite amongst their men, caused them to assemble together, and appointed one such as was thought meet for the purpose, to declare vnto them on their behalves, how they could not but maruell to vnderstand such feare & lacke of courage, as appeared generallie through both the armies, considering there was no cause thereof, they being such a number of able warri-ours throughlie appointed, and therewithall led by such gouernours and capitains, as there was no reason why to be doubtful of victorie, before they had sene some trial and iust occasion of disadvantage.
For as touching the Saxons, they were no such men but that they might be overcome well enough, as it might sufficientlie appeare, both by proofe of such victories as Alostimer the British king had obtained against them; and also Aurelius Ambrose, who had vanquished them in such sort, that when they durst not effsones incounter with him in battell, they found means by poison to make him awaie.

Then sith the Britains (whome the Scots & Brits so often had subdued) had at sundrie times vanquished the Saxons, why should they feare in such wise to fight with them in common defense of their coun-trie, and reuenge of such iniuries as they had latelie receiued at their hands, sith the righteous God (as all good men ought to trust) is ever readie to aduance a righteous quarrell. And where it was hyed a-mongest them, that the Saxons were so huge of stature, and mightie of lims, that no force was able to withstand them, it was certeinlie knownen, that the Scots & Brits were indured with no lesse migh-tinesse and strength of bodie than the Saxons; so that if they were not of like stomachs, that rested in their owne slothfull cowardise, & not in natures weakhe, hauing done hir part in bestowing hir gifts vpon them touching bodilie force, in such plentiful manner,

ner, as no other nation did lightlie anie waies surmount them.

Spanie other arguments were alledged and last forth to remoue feare out of their hearts, and to incourage them to fight, in so much that in the end it appeared the same wrought the wished effect, in such wise, that they generallie required battell, offering to liue and die at their capteins feet, and to follow them whither soeuer it should please their kings and liege lords to appoint them. Wherewith the kings being satisfied, forth they march towards their enemies, whome they found readie to receiue them, and that with such rigozous violence, that in the end, after great slaughter made on both parts, the Scots and Brits were put to flight, the Saxons pursuing in the chase till the darke night caused them to withdrawe & returne into their campe. The next day following, the Scottish king with the residue of his armie hastied away with all speed towards Gallo way, and the British king withdrawe into Wicland. both bozne and bpozead in a forren countrie. Those ambassadours then hauing their answere, and be- ing sent home with rejoych, the Britains contrarie to the lawes of all nations, proclaimed Arthur, being a bastard bozne, king of their realme, and forthwith assembling their powers vnder his leading, march- ed on against the Saxons, in purpose to abate some part of their strength, before the Brits (which was doubted would shortly come to passe) should Arthur pro- claimed king of Brittain.

Arthur goeth forth against the Saxons.

The Saxons vanquished, are constrain- ed to pay tri- bute to the Britains. London is won by the Britains.

Arthur rais- eth a power against the Brits. A league con- cluded be- twixt Loth & Colgerme.

10 Therefore hauing procured aid of the Armoike Bri- tains forth of France, they fought with their enemies within ten miles of London at the first, where the Saxons being at two seuerall times vanquished, were constrained not only to paie tribute, but also to receiue magistrats to gouerne them by the said Ar- thurs appointment, with other grieuous articles of agreement, to the great reioysing of the Britains, for these so luckie beginnings in the first exploits of the late elected king. Afterwards was London easilie won by the Britains, wherein Arthur remaining for a season, toke aduise with his nobles how to proceed in his warres against the rest of the Saxons. Finalie hauing prepared a mightie armie, he determined to go against those which inhabited beyond Humber northwards, with whome (as he had certaine know- ledge) the Brits were joined: for Loth comming to agreement with Colgerme, concluded a league with him, whereby they were bound to aid one another against the Britains, as common enemies and ad- uersaries to them both.

20 The Britains at their comming into Wokeshire pitched their campe not farre off from their enemies, who were alreadye joined together and incamped a- broad in the field. The next day after, knowledge be- ing had that they should haue battell, Arthur appoin- ted Howell leader of the Armoike Britains to in- counter with the battell of the Brits, and he himselfe to march with the Saxons. Thus they met together on both parts verie fiercelie, and a sore battell was fought there betwixt them, so that for a good space it was doubtfull whether part should haue the aduan- tage of the day, but at length the Brits were put to flight, which aduanced the Britains to the gaine of the whole field. For the Saxons, after they perceived how the Brits were discomfited, deading to abide the whole hunt by themselves, betooke them also to their heeles, and made their race towards Wokhe, as fast as their feet might beare them.

30 Arthur pursuing them thither, besieged the citie almost three moneths together, but the Saxons de- fended the walles so stoutlie, making often issues forth vpon the Britains, that till hunger began to constrain them, they cared little for the siege. In the end, when they were determined to haue yielded vp the citie, they had knowledge, how there was an huge armie of Brits and Saxons newlie assembled, and readie to come forthward to their succors; also that king Decca (escaping from the battell wherein he had received the ouerthrow at Arthurs hands, and flee- ing afterward into Germanie) was now returned with a new power, and arrived within the month of Humber. Which newes caused them to deferre all communication, in hope that if they might abide the siege but for a small time, the Britains should short- lie be compassed in on each side, and oppressed on the sudden.

40 Arthur heard of the comming of their succours in like maner, and iudging it no wisdome to tarie the comming of his so puissant enemies, considering that a number of diseased and sicke persons he had alreadye in his host, by reason of their lying abroad in the field, raised his siege, and withdrawe himselfe to speedie as was possible with his whole armie into Wales, Arthur rais- eth his siege.

Arthur returneth to London.

Arthur besteth the victorie with gentleness.

The Britains sorrowing for the winter time within York, give themselves into banketting & voluptuousnesse.

Christmasse banquets resembling the feasts Bacchanalia.

The Britains through rest and ease became vnapt to susteine the paines of warres. A league concluded betwixt Arthur king of Britains, & Loth king of Scots.

Wales, where he appointed the Armozike Britains to sojorne for that winter, with other of the meaner sort of his stone souldiers: whilst he toke the residue of his chosen bands, and went to London, there to prouide that no rebellion should be raised among the Sarons of Kent, or other of the countries nere about. In the beginning of the next spring, he gathered his host together againe, and with the same went forth against Colgerme and Decca, who being issued forth of Northumberland, were entered into the British confines, spoiling and wasting the countrey with their accustomed crueltie.

Whereupon encountering them twice in battell, he obtained the victorie, and then besieging York, at length he entered into that citie, by meanes of a Britaine, who dwelling amongst the Sarons there, in the night season conueied a host of Britains into the citie, the which breaking open the gates in the dead of the night, did let in all the whole host. Where Arthur would not suffer his men to make any great murder of the enemies, which were content to yield themselves, but used them very gently, therby to win more praise amongst all those that heard of his worthy victories. The Britains hauing thus conquered the citie of York, manie seats of armes were daily practised betwixt them and the Sarons, which held possession still of the countrey thereabouts. But the Britains lying in that citie all the summer and winter following, at length began to take their ease, namelie in the depth of winter, and therewith gaue themselves to banketting, drincking, plaie, and other kinds of voluptuous pleasures, so that it seemed they trusted more to their passed victories, than to their present force, not fearing such dangers as was like to follow.

It is thought of some, that about the same time, Arthur first instituted, that the feast of Christmasse should be kept with such excesse of meats and drinks, in all kinds of inordinate banketting and reuell for the space of thirteene daies together, according to the custome used still through both the realmes of England and Scotland euē vnto this day, resembling the feasts which the gentiles used to keepe in the honor of their drunken god Bacchus, called in Latin Bacchanalia: wherein all kinds of beaustie lust and sensuall voluptuousnes was put in vze. But whence soeuer, or by whome soeuer this insatiable gourmandise came vp amongst vs, suerlie a great abuse it is, to see the people at such a solemne feast, where they ought to be occupied in thanks giuing to almighty God, for the sending downe of his onelie begotten sonne amongst vs, to giue themselves in manner wholie to gluttonie, and excessive filling of their bellies, with such maner of lewd and wanton pastimes, as though they should rather celebrate the same feasts of Bacchanalia, and those other which the gentiles also kept, called Floralia, and Priapalia, than the remembrance of Christs natiuitie, who abhorreth all maner of such excesse.

But now to my purpose. When the next summer was once come, Arthur led forth his Britains against their enemies, but by reason of such ease and pleasure as they had taken whilst they sojourned in York, being now come into the field, they were able to abide no paines, so that no good was done of certaine yeeres after, till finally Arthur ioined in league with Loth king of the Scots. The conditions of which league were these. That Arthur during his naturall life should reigne as king of the Britains, and after his decease, the kingdome to remaine vnto Morozed, and his issue, if he chanced to haue any. That the Scots should aid the Britains against the Sarons, and haue all such land as might be recovered of them beyond Humber. Also the league which was betwixt them and the Scots, they should duly obserue. Morozed should marrie the daughter of Catwolan a noble man amongst the Britains, and of highest authority next vnto Arthur himselfe: the children of this marriage to be brought vp with their grandfather in Britaine, till they came to yeeres of discretion. Catwolan the brother of the foresaid Morozed, should serue king Arthur, and receiue at his hands large intertainment, and great possessions to mainteine therewith his estate.

Other articles there were comprised in this league, according as was thought requisite for the maintenance of stable friendship betwixt these kings and their nations. So that Arthur hauing concluded this league, and still being desirous to purge the whole Ile of all miscreants and enemies of the Christian faith, he sent vnto the Scottish and British kings, requiring them on the behalfe of that dutie which they ought vnto the advancement of Christs religion, to assemble their powers, & to meet him at Tinnmouth, whether he would repaire to soine with them, at such day as they would appoint, from thence to march forth against the Sarons.

Loth king of the Scots, and Contranus king of the Scottishmen, failed not in this so necessarie an enterprise, but agreeable to Arthurs request, within few daies after they came forward, and ioining with the Britains, forth they went against the Sarons, whom they vnderstood to be already in campe, vnder the conduct of their king Decca, in purpose to stop their passage. When both the armies were approached nere together, they prepared to the battell, and first Colgerme duke of Northumberland mounting vpon a light gelding, rode almost euē hard to the face of the Scots, where they stood in their order of battell right stoutlie, and there uttering manie reprochfull words vnto Loth, and other of his nobles, for breach of their promised friendship to him and his Sarons, declared that he trusted hostlie to see full punishment light vpon them for this falshood and vntuths sake, in thus ioining with their former enemies against their most trustie friends and steadfast allies.

The British king not greatly moued herewith, commanded his forwards to aduance forward, and the Sarons likewise halsted apace towards them, so that the one being come within danger of shot of the other, the Scots let flic their arrowes verie firelie. Arthur in the meane time hauing set his people in a rate, exhorted them to fight manfullie: and so some as he perceived that the fraie was begun by the Scots, he in semblable wise comandeth the Britains to giue the onset, so that immediatlie there ensued a sore conflict, the Scots being in the right wing, & leading Chelozike one of the chiefeest captains amongst the Sarons, quicklie discomfited that wing with the which they were first matched. Colgerme with his Sarons encountering (as is said) with the Scots, placed in the left wing, rushed in amongst his enemies (vpon an earnest desire to be reuenged of his aduersarie king Loth) with such violence, that at their first encounter he overthrow the same Loth: but immediatlie thereupon two British horsemen running at Colgerme adelingwise, bare him quite through.

In the meane time, Loth by meane of his strong habergion escaping without hurt, was relieved by such as stood about him, and restored againe to his companie: but Colgerme being dead before he could be recovered from amongst the throng of his enemies, his men were so discomfited therewith, that straightwaies thereupon they fell to running away. The maine battell of the Sarons being thus left bare on both sides, began to giue backe, which Arthur perceiving, the more earnestlie pressed forth vpon them, so that in the end Decca being constrained to flic, flie, and receiuing a sore wound, had much ado to be conueied awaie by some of his horsemen, the Britains pursued so fiercelie vpon him. At length being brought vnto the sea side, he got vessels, and escaped ouer into Germanie. This victorie being thus achieved, constrained the Sarons to yeld vnto king Arthur, simple submitting themselves vnto his mercie, who of his clemencie was contented to pardon them of life and goods, vpon condition they would become christians, and from thenceforth neuer after to make anie warres vpon their neighbors the Britains, Scots, or Picts. But if they would not agree herevnto, then leauing their gods, armoz, and weapon behind them, they should auoid the land, & that within 13 daies next ensuing.

Panic of the Sarons that could get passage, sailed ouer into Germanie. Other feinting themselves to become christians, remained in the land, looking one day for better hap & fortune. Diuerse that were not able by meanes of pueritie to get awaie within the time appointed, and yet refusing to be christened, were put to death, according to the proclamation set forth for the same purpose, so that in comparisson berie few amongst them receiued the christian faith sincerelie, and with a true meaning mind. Things being thus quieted in Northumberland, Arthur toke order for the repairing of churches abroad in the countrie, which the Sarons had ouerthrowne or defaced; & namelie in the citie of Poike he bestowed great cost, where the cruell infidels had done much hurt vpon churches, and other religious houses.

In the yere following, Arthur had newes how the Sarons which held the Ile of Wight, joining with the Kentish Sarons, had done great displeasures vnto the Britains, on that side of the Thames, killing & sleaing an huge number of them with great crueltie, wherewith being sore moued, he drew towards London with his armie, purposing vtterlie to destroye all the east & south Sarons, since otherwise he could not prouide for the suertie of his subiects, being still in danger to be murdered and robbed, so long as anie of that wicked generation of the Sarons remained here amongst them.

By meanes also of the league, he had with him in this iourne ten thousand Picts, & as manie Scots: Eugenius nephue to king Conran by his brother Congall being generall ouer the Scots, and Mordred the sonne of king Loth by his wife Anne, gouerning the Picts, a lustie yong gentleman, berie wittie and towardlie in all his doings. Further more, Arthur vnderstanding that hurt rest and ease had done amongst his men of warre, caused them to keepe the field in all this iourne, and passing by London, lodged them a little beside the riuer of Thames. But he himselfe with some of his nobles, entred into the citie, causing supplications to be made vnto almightie God three daies together, for good successe to follow against the Sarons. On the fourth day hearing diuine seruice celebrated by the bishop of London, and causing a sermon to be made in the market place, he committed himselfe and his whole armie vnto the tuition of Christ, and his mother the virgine, whose image in stead of a badge he bare in his shield continuallie from that day forward, as diuerse heretofore haue written. After this, issuing forth of the citie, he willed all his men to be of god comfort, as they that fought in a iust quarell against Pagans, and enemies of the faith. Mordred and his father in law Gaiwolane passed on before the battels with five thousand horsemen, and being come within five miles of the Sarons, who likewise were assembled in campe, there came from them vnto Arthur ambassadozs, requiring him to staie his iourne, for they were readie (if they might haue libertie so to doe) to depart out of the land with their gods and substance, without further molesting the Britains, either by one meanes or other.

Arthur would neither consent herevnto, nor yet grant a truce for three daies, for the which they made earnest sute, but had them depart for that time, one lie assuring them that he would not come passing two miles forwards for that day, so that if they thought good, they might returne to him in the morning, and haue answer what the chiefeest gonernozs of his host thought touching their request, by whome he would haue the matter more throughe debated. In the meane time, whilst the Britains were busied with hearing of these ambassadozs, and taking aduise what was best to doe touching their demand, the Sarons marched forth with all speed, and comming vpon Mordred and Gaiwolane at vntowares, they gaue the onlet freshlie vpon them, and that berie much to the disaduantage of the Britains and Picts, who notwithstanding, through the earnest exhortation of their capteins, receiued their enemies berie fiercelie, in doing that which was possible for so small a number to doe, holobest in the end oppressed with multitude, they were forced to flee, and so did, not resting till they came in sight of the whole armie. In which sight, Mordred and Gaiwolane by helpe of their souldiers, being mounted vpon their horses, escaped without hurt, though they lost no small number of their companie, as well in the fight as in the chase.

The Sarons ambassadozs being not yet departed out of the British campe, were heretvpon staied till the next morning, and then had answer giuen them, that from thenceforth the Britains were not minded to heare anie messengers of the Sarons comming to intreat of peace, since it was manifest enough, they ment nothing but falshood, as well appeared in that they had against the law of armes, whilst their ambassadozs were in communication, distressed part of the British armie, and therefore they should assure themselves, to haue at Arthurs hands nothing but cruell war to the vttermost of his power, in reuenge of such their great vntruths and cloked dealings. They had scarce receiued their answer, but that there came from the Sarons fortie other ambassadozs, being men of great authoritie amongst them, to excuse that which had happened ouer night, in laying the fault vpon a sort of vndiscreet persons, nothing praiue vnto that which the gouernozs of the armie had done, touching the sending of their ambassadozs, and therevpon had without their aduise made that skirmish.

But Arthur iudging that there was some new subtiltie in hand, vnder pretense of this new ambassage, commanded as well these that came last, as the other which came first, to be kept in the marshals tent, that in no wise they should escape, whilst he himselfe in the second watch of the night departed out of his campe, with all his puissance, which he diuided into three battels, and hauing marched three miles forward, he was vpon his enemies per they vnderstood anie thing of his comming, inso much that the Britains had staie and chased the watch of the Sarons campe, before it was certeinlie knowne what the matter ment. Hereof also ensued such a tumult and noise amongst the Sarons, running by and doونه, calling and crying one to another, as it happeneth in such cases of extreme feare, that the best aduised amongst them wist not well what to doe. Wherevpon Mordred desirous to reuenge his last ouerthrowne, brake in also vpon his enemies berie fiercelie.

But some of them hauing gotten them into their armoz, stood at their defense awhile amongst their carts and carriages, and so resisted the Britains on that that side for a season: other of the Saxons having no leisure to arme themselves, nor to draw into any order of battell, by reason of the sudden impression of the Britains, brake forth of the campe on the contra-rie side, & fled so fast as their feet might beare them.

But being pursued by the British horsemen, and beaten downe, a great number of them ran into the next river, and there were drowned, choosing rather that kind of death, than so cruellie to be murdered by the aduersaries hands: verelie the Britains shewed no mercie that day, for so manie as came within their danger, died without redemption. And this bloodie battell made an end of such an huge number of Saxons, that it was thought they should neuer haue recovered againe any puissance able to haue indamaged the Britains in any manner of wise.

Arthur having thus vanquished his enemies, gave licence unto those nobles which he had detained (as is said) in his campe, being sent unto him as ambassadors, to depart over into Germanie, appointing the residue of such Saxons as were men of no defence, to remaine still in the land, yielding a yerelie tribute unto the Britains, and also with condition that they should become christians. The Scottishmen and Picts which had aided the Britains in this tour-nie, sojourned a while after at London, where Arthur feasted & banketted them in most roiall wise, shew-ing them all the honoz that might be desired, and afterwards sent them home verie princelie rewarded with manie great gifts and rich presents. Whilste such businesse as ye haue heard was thus in hand betwixt the Saxons & Britains, the estate of the Sco-tish common-wealth was gouerned by great wisde, dome and policie, without any notable trouble or disorder. But finally, when king Conrane began to waage, and that such as had the chiefe doings br-der him, sought not the execution of iustice, but their owne commodities, to the hinderance of a multitude, the people began to repine thereat, and to practise a conspiracie with diuerse of the nobles against Conrane, and those which ruled by his appointment.

It chanced that there was one Concet, a man of base birth, assigned by the kings commission to be chiefe iustice, or as it were chancelor for the administration of the lawes in Murray land, a person passing full of rigorous crueltie, especiallie in iudge-ments of life and death, and in gathering up of all manner of forfeitures of penall lawes, which he did onelie to purchase fauor of the king, by the enriching of his coffers, in respect whereof he had small regard either of right or wrong, so that there were hope of somewhat to be gotten. Amongest other the violent doings of this Concet, he caused diuerse merchantmen of the towne of Forres in Murray land (as then the chiefe towne of all that countrie) to be accused of treason by a light information, and in the end executed without any apparant matter, onelie upon a couetous desire to haue their goods and riches, because they were men of great wealth and substance. Di-uerse noble men of the countrie there abouts, and namelie of the towne of Forres, being partie of him unto those merchants, were soze offended with this act, and hereupon they first came unto Concet, and reulied him with manie high reprochfull words, and afterwards fell upon him in the place of open iudge-ment where he sat as then in his iudgement seate, & there murdered him, getting them forthwith by into the mounteins, to auoid the danger which they knew impossible for them to escape, if they should happen to be taken while Conrane should be liuing.

After this, they deuised how they might increase their heinous deed and bold enterprise with an other farre more horrible and notable, which was to slea the king himselfe, as the originall cause of all such mischiefe that then reigned in the realme through the vntowardly government of his vniuersall ministers and couetous magistrats, hoping withall to obtaine the fauor of some of the noble men, whom they knew to maligne the king and his counsell most extremelie, and thereby in short time to be assured of their pardon. Shortly after it chanced that one Donald also gouernor of Atholl, a man in great fauor and trust with the king, had vnderstanding that these out-lawes intended, and thereupon practised with them by priue messengers, that they should come in secret manner vnto Emmerlochke, where the king sojourned, promising them by most assured meanes of oaths and vowes, that they should haue all the furtherance he could deuise towards the atchuing of their enterprise.

Hereupon these outlawes, according to their instructions, came in secret wise vnto Emmerlochke, and were closelie conueied into Conrans bedchamber by Donalds meanes, who as though he had knowne nothing of the matter, got himselfe quick-lie out of the waie when he saw them once entered within the doze of the chamber. Conrane the king perceiving how he was betrayed, and that his enimies were got into his chamber ready to murder him, slept forth of his bed, and falling downe upon his knees besought them to take pittie of his age, and not to defile their hands in the blood of their naturall lord and king, considering the fault was not his, if they had bene any waies wronged. Whobest they doubting nothing but least he should escape their hands, straightwaies dispatched him out of life, and withall made haste awaie. This was the end of king Conranus, in the 20 yere of his reigne, being the 16 of Arthurs dominion over the Britains, the fifth of the emperoz Justinianus, and in the yere after the birth of our Sautoz 531. But his corps was buried in the abbey of Jona, otherwise called Colmekill, with such funerall pompe and exequies, as in those daies were used.

After him succeeded his nephew Eugenius, the sonne of his brother Congall, the which Eugenius (as aboue is said) was with Arthur in the last mentioned tourne against the Saxons. There were that counselled him in the beginning of his reigne (which he began in Argile, being placed there upon the chaire of marble) that he should see in any wise the authors of his uncles death duly punished, to the example of others, that they should not attempt the like hereafter against their liege lord and crowned king: but he contrariwise did not onelie forgive the offense, but also receiued the forenamed Donald with other the murderers into his seruice, and made them of his priue counsell, which caused manie men to suspect, least he himselfe had bene of counsell with them in committing that murder. The talke thereof was so common in all mens mouths, name-lie amongst the common people, that the queene Dowager late wife to king Conrane, doubting not onelie the hurtie of hir owne life, but also of hir two sons (which she had by the said Conrane, the one named Reginan, and the other Aldan) fled with them ouer into Ireland, where within few yerres after, she died with the one of hir sonnes, that is to say, Regi-nan: the other Aldan was honorable brought up by the king of that countrie, according to his birth and degre.

Eugenius in the beginning of his reigne, to win thereby the peoples fauor, demeaned himselfe most gentle in all his proceedings, doing nothing that tasted in any part of crueltie. He would oftentimes sit amongst the iudges himselfe, and if he suspected plead their case anew. And such as he perceived were not of abilitie to follow their sute in any cause of right, he would helpe them with monie of the common treasurie. He ordeined also, that no orphan should be compelled to answer any action, or otherwise be vexed by sute of law. Moreover, that no widow should be constrained to come past a mile forth of her owne doores for any matter in controuersie betwixt her and any other person, to be heard afore any iudges or publike officers. Robbers, theues, and their receiueurs he caused to be duly punished, to refrain other from attempting the like offenses. And also he had a speciall regard for the obseruing of the league betwixt his subiects and the Picts, with the Britains, according to the tenor of the same.

About this season should it be also that Arthur did achieve all those worthy victories, which are ascribed unto him against the Scots, Irishmen, Danes, Norwegians, and other northerne people. Moreover it is written by some authors, that he should subdue the most part of Germany with the low countries, Brittain, Normandie, France, and the Romans, with the people of the east: but the credit hereof resteth with the same authors. Whelie it is certaine (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) that Arthur lived in the daies of Iulianus the emperor, about which time the Gothes, Vandals, Burgundians, & Frenchmen did invade sundrie parts of the Romane empire, pitifullie wasting and spoiling the same, where yet such writers as haue set forth those warres, make no mention of Arthur at all. Therefore letting all doubtfull things passe, I will proceed with mine author, and declare what he hath found written in such Scottish chronicles as he followeth touching the Brittain, which for that it partlie varieth from the other our common chronicles, namely Geffrey of Monmouth, I thinke it worthy to be noted here, to the end that every man maie iudge thereof as to him seemeth best.

To the purpose then. After that the Britains were deliuered from the terror of the Saxons, and that with quietnesse they began to wax wealthe, they repented them of the league, which they had concluded afore with Loth king of the Picts, speciallie for that they could not in any wise be contented to haue any stranger to reigne amongst them, and hereupon comming unto Arthur, required of him, that he himselfe had no issue to succeed him, that it might please him yet, to name one of his owne nation to gouerne them after his decesse. Arthur not gainsaing their request, willed them (with their pleasure was such, in no wise to haue a stranger to reigne over them) to name one themselves, being descended of the blood roiall, and such a one as in whome they had perceived some towardlie proofe of wisdom and valiance: and he for his part promised to ratifie their election. The nobles with great reioicing of the people drawing together to consult for the choise of such a one, as might be acceptable to all the Brittain nation, at length agreed upon Constantine, the sonne of Cadogan duke of Cornwall, a goodlie young gentleman, both for his person and other his worthy qualities much to be commended. Who being brought by the peeres of the realme into the counsell chamber, and there presented unto King Arthur, as one most meet to succeed him; Arthur accepted their election verie glablie, and caused the same Constantine forthwith to be proclaimed heir apparrant to the crowne, by the name of prince of Brittain, which notified him to be successor to the king in gouernement of the realme. Constantine being in such wise preferred, behaued himselfe so honorable, and with such a shew of gentle demeanour, that he won him much praise, with an opinion of high worthinesse amongst all the

In this meane time was Loth the King of the Picts deceased, leauing his name as a perpetuall memorie unto his countrie of Pictland, the which euer since as a remembrance of his worthinesse, hath bene called Lothian, or Louthian; but his sonne Godfrey, succeeding him in gouernement of the Pictish kingdome, and hearing that Constantine was proclaimed heir apparrant of Brittain, was sore moued therewith, and immediatlie sending his ambassadours unto King Arthur, complained, for that contrarie to the hono of his kinglie estate, he had broken the league concluded betwixt him and his father late of famous memorie King Loth, wherein it was agreed amongst other things, that there should none succeed in the kingdome of Brittain, after Arthurs decesse, but the children begot betwixt him and his wife quene Anne, or such as descended of them; where contrariwise it was notified into the Pictish people, that Constantine the sonne of Cadogan was elected prince, and thereby inabled as heir apparrant to the crowne.

They required him therefore to call himselfe to remembrance, and not so lightlie to agree unto the flattering persuasions of the Britains, abusing him unto that thing which was merelie repugnant to reason, and against both gods lawes and mans, admonishing him withall to obserue the league, according to the oath, which he had sollemnlie taken upon him, and to moue his subiects to do the like, least for the contrarie, they should prouoke the wrath of almightie God against them, who is the full reuenger of all such as go about to breake leagues and covenanted pactions. Hereunto answer was made by consent of the nobles of Brittain, that the league which was concluded betwixt Arthur and Loth, indured but for the life times of them two onelie, and to cease by either of their deaths: therefore Arthur had done nothing contrarie to any pact or promise made, but according to the dutie of a prince that tendered the weale of his subiects, had prouided them one to succeed him of their owne nation, for doubt least the realme after his decesse should fall into the hands of strangers, which in no wise ought of right to be suffered. Therefore if the Picts loued the suretie of their owne estate, it should be good for them to hold themselves contented with their owne bounds, least if they sought for other mens liuings, they might happilie within short time perceiue, what doth inue offentimes vpon such rash and vnadvised attempts.

The Pictish ambassadours returning home with this answer, caused the whole nation to take such ordinance therewith, that immediatlie they resolved to reuenge their wrongs by open warres; but first they thought good to trie if they might procure the Scottishmen to take part with them, in reuenge of such injuries as they had in like maner lately receiued at the Britains hands. Moreover, repenting themselves, that they had in times past aided the Britains against the Saxons, they purpose to trie if they might now moue the same Saxons likewise to make warres vpon the Britains, thereby to be the better able to maintaine their owne quarrell against them. First, such ambassadours as were sent from Godfrey unto Eugenius king of the Scots, found him verie agreeable unto their requests, and the sooner, for that such Scottish rebels as fled vnto Arthur, were not onelie receiued by him, but also main- tained to make rodes and incursions into the Scottish borders.

Arthur hauing knowledge of the deuises of his enemies (the warres being first proclaimed) he furnished all the sea-coasts with notable numbers of men, men, to withstand the landing of the Saxons, if they should fortune to attempt any invasion. What done, he passed forth with the residue of his people towards the Scots & Picts, who were already assembled in campe, and were come as farre as the river of Humber, nere to the bankes whereof they had pitched their tents, as in a place fatal for the Britains to be vanquished in. Both the armies being brought here into order of battell, the one in sight of the other, there were certene bishops of those three nations that toke great pains to ride to and fro betwixt them, to exhort the kings unto peace and concord, considering what mischief and great bloodshed should ensue, if upon willfullnesse they would seek to trie that by dint of sword, which they might make an end of by means of amiable treatie and friendly agreement. Again, they could not do the thing that might more content the Saxons, common enemies to christian religion, than if by their encountering together in battell, they should so infect their whole powers, whereby the Saxons might have ready means and occasion offered to execute their greedy desires to conquer the whole Ile. Porped and Eugenius were persuaded by this earnest trauell of the bishops, to put their matter in compromise, and to lay away their armour and weapon, if they might have assurance that the league made with king Eost should in everie point be observed. Arthur likewise at the sute of the same bishops, would have bene contented for his part to have agreed hereunto; but other of the Britains, namely those that were of kin and alliance unto Constantine their prince, could in no wise be persuaded thereunto; but rather with manie reprochfull words rebuked the bishops for their untimely sute, seeing the enemies ready ranged in battell at point to give the onset, so that (as they alleged) it might be doubted what they meant by their motion, unless they went about to betray the armie, under pretence of a coked treatie for an unprofitable agreement. These of such like words were vnneth ended, when suddenly the noise being raised on both sides, the battels rushed together right fiercelie. The Britains had the disadvantage of the place, being so incumbered with mires, bogs, and mosses, that they could not well aid themselves, nor handle their weapons to any purpose. Yet did the battell continue a long time, to the destruction of such numbers of men; that the river Humber (nere unto the which this field was fought) was so mingled with blood, that the water thereof being all coloured red, carried no small number of dead bodies downe into the sea. In the middell of the fight, there was one with loud voice in the British tongue cried out to the Britains (of purpose prompted thereunto) that Arthur with other of the nobles on his side were slain, and therefore it were but follie to trust any longer upon victory, but rather were it wisdom for everie man by flight to provide for his owne safetie.

This voice wonderfullie encouraged the Scottish men and Picts, but the Britains were put in such feare therewith, that the most part of them timorously fledde away. Others of them judging this to be but some cruell and subtil practise of the enemies devised of purpose, as it was in deed, to discomfort them with, abode by it still: manfully continuing in fight, till they were beaten downe and slain in maner everie mothers sonne. This victorie being thus hardlie got, cost more mens lives than any other had done of manie yeares before; for of the Scots and Picts being vanquished, there died in that most tall battell above 20000 men, together with Porped, and a great number of the nobilitie of both the nations. Of the Britains and such other as were with them in aid, there were slain, what in battell and what in chase, at the point of 30000, among whom was Arthur himselfe, with Gawain or Caluan (as some booke have) brother unto Porped, who bare such good will and intire love unto his lord and master the said Arthur, that he fought that day most earnestlie on his side against his owne naturall brother the said Porped. Also there were killed Caline and Catwolan, with the most part of all the residue of the British nobilitie, and manie prisoners taken, by reason that Humber kept them in from fleeing any way forth on the one side, which prisoners also were afterwards slain, the gentlemen onelie excepted.

The day next after the battell, the campe of the Britains was rifled, and amongst other rich spoiles there was found quene Guainore Arthurs wife, with a great number of other ladies and gentlewomen. The whole spoile of the campe and field being equally divided by lots betwixt them, the Scots had for their parts certene faire charets laden with rich stuffe and jewels, also horses and armours, beside sundrie noble men, whom they had to their prisoners. Unto the Picts fell for their portion quene Guainore, with the ladies and gentlewomen, and divers other of the noble men, besides a great quantitie of other rich preie and booties. These prisoners, which the Picts had, were conveyed into a castell in Angus, called Dunbarre, a place of great strength in those daies, though at this present there remaineth nothing but the name with the ruines thereof. In which castell they were detained under sure ward, during the residue of their naturall lives. In which time thereof there be remaining unto this day, the graue, and monuments where manie of these captive Britains were buried, in the fields of a towne in that countrie called Megill, not past 10 miles from Dunbarre: but amongst the residue, that of Guainore is most famous.

There goeth a plaine tale over all that countrie, told for an assured trueth, that if any woman chance to tread upon that graue, they shall remaine barren without bringing forth any issue more than the said Guainore did. But whether this be true or not, certene it is (as Boetius writeth) that there dare no woman come nere that graue, nor onelie eschuing it themselves, but also commanding their daughters to beware thereof. This bloodie battell weakened so much the forces both of the Scots, Picts, and Britains, that manie a day after they were not able to recover againe their former states and dignities. The yeare also that these three nations encountered thus cruellie together, was after the birth of our Saviour 542, the 26 of Arthurs reigne over the Britains, and the 11 of Eugenius his government over the Scottishmen.

In the same yere before the battell, were sene manie strange sights in Albion. Grassie and heards in Pockeshire appeared to be all stained with blood. Aere unto Camelon, a cow brought forth a calfe with two heads. Also an ewe brought forth a lambe that was both male and female. The sunne appeared about none daies all wholie of a bloodie colour. The element appeared full of bright starres to everie mans sight continuallie for the space of two daies together. In Wales there was a battell between crows and pies on the one side, and ravens on the other, with such a slaughter of them, as before that time had not bene heard of.

But to proceed. Eugenius king of the Scots at his returne from the battell, came to those that had escaped with life, and abid by him in the chiefe danger of the fight, manie bounteous & large rewards. The sonnes and next kinfolke of such as were slain same, he also advanced to sundrie preferments of lands & livings, that they inioyng the same, might be a witness in time to come of the good service of their ancestors, shewed in defense of their king and countrie, and also of his princelie liberalitie, in rewarding the same upon their issue and progenie. By which noble beneuolence, he won him such loue amongst his people, that afterwards it seemed how he gouerned the state of his kingdome more by clemencie, than by any rigour of lawes. The Britains immediatlie upon knowledge had that Arthur was slaine, crowning Constantine his successor in the British kingdome, and for that there should remaine none amongst them aloue to make any claime to the same kingdome, other than he with his issue, or such as he should appoint to succeed him, they cruelly murdered spozed children, in most pittifull wise running vnto their mothers lap, beseeching him to saue their liues, according to his motherlie dutie. They were brought vp in Galloway their fathers grand fathers house, and being thus made auaie, the familie and lineage of their father the foresaid spozed was bitterlie thereby extinguished.

The Saxons at the same time hauing aduertisement what losse the Britains had sustained, not onlie by the death of their most valiant king and chiefe Arthur, but also for the slaughter of such a multitude of their nation as died in the battell, they prepared a mightie nauie of ships, and passe ouer the same into England, where being landed, they easilie beat downe the Britains, and drue them with their King Constantine into Wales, so recouering all that part of the land which Hengist sometimes held, & after his name was afterwards called England. & Some haue written, how that after king Constantine had reigned certaine yeeres in Wales, his wife and children died, wherupon wearing wearie of this world, he forsooke his earthly kingdome, in hope of that other aboue, and secretlie departed into Ireland, where applying himselfe for a time in ministering to the poore, at length being knowne, by the perswasion of a monk he became one of his cote and profession.

Afterwards being sent by the bishop of the diocese ouer into Scotland, to instruct the people of that countrie in the true faith and articles of the christian religion, he there suffered martyrdom by the hands of most wicked and godlesse persons, and was at length (but manie yeeres after his death) canonized a saint, and sundrie churches (as are to be seene even vnto this day) built and dedicated vnto him in Scotland by authoritie of the bishops there. At the same time that the said Constantine was druen into Wales, there reigned among the Englishmen one Iurmirike the first (as Beda saith) from Hengist. The same Iurmirike though he were not christened himselfe, yet he permitted the christian faith to be preached amongst his people, and concluding a league with the Scottishmen and Picts, kept the same inviolate during his life time most sincerlie. The Scottish king Eugenius also lived in peace the residue of his life, without any trouble either by forren enemies, or intestine sedition, & at length died in the 38 yeere of his reigne, after the birth of our Saviour 569.

After his funerall obsequies finished in Colmekeill, where he lieth buried amongst his ancestors, his brother Connall was chosen to succeed him in administration of the kingdome, a prince of such inclination to vertue and godlines, as all men may iudlie wonder thereat. He bare such zealous deuotion towards the worshipping of the crosse (a thing to put men in remembrance of Christs passion as he took it) that which way soeuer he rode (as it is reported) hee had the same borne before him, and at his getting vp and lighting downe from his horse, he with all the multitude of people standing about him, would worship it, kneeling downe, & reuerentlie kissing it. This crosse was of silver with a crucifix thereon, and letters grauen in a plate fastened to the stasse, containing these two words: Christianum gloria. He commanded also that the signe of the crosse should be set upon the tops of stables, and on the highest towers of the gates of castles & towne. Moreover he forbad the crosse to be grauen or painted vpon any pavement, least any man should vnreuerentlie tread vpon it. Furthermore he had priests and other religious men in such honor, as nothing could be more, appointing them to haue the tenths of all those fruits which the earth yielded. Sundrie ordinances he made also, for the grieuous punishment of all such as in any wise misused a priest, or other religious person: as he that gaue any of them a blow, should lose his hand for it: and he that slue any of them, should forfeit his goods, and be burned quick. Again, he bestowed manie rich felwels, and gaue diuers great gifts vnto churches, pawning the ministers of sufficient livings, and appointed that they should haue their houses nere vnto their churches, to be readie to execute that which appertained vnto their offices, when any need requiered.

The king being thus vertuouly disposed, caused the whole number of his subjects by his example to be the better affectioned towards the aduancement of religion. The report and fame thereof moued that holie man saint Colme or Colombe, to come ouer forth of Ireland (where he had the gouernance of sundrie houses of monks) with twelue other vertuous persons into Albion, and there gathering together a great number of monks, being here and there dispersed abroad in the countrie, he placed them orderly in such houses, as king Connall had builded and founded for that purpose, appointing amongst them rulers & ministers, such as he thought most convenient. But saint Colme himselfe, and the other twelue, which he brought ouer with him from Ireland, placing themselves to inhabit in the Ile of Iona, now called Colmekill, took great paines to instruct the Scots and Picts in the true articles of the faith.

Amongst the Picts at the same time the heresie of Pelagius had infected the minds of many, by means that diuerse of that nation hauing dwelled a long time in Britaine, returning into their countrie, brought that pestilent doctrine home with them, and taught it vnto other. Saint Colme therefore informed hereof, passed into Louthlan vnto Budeus as then king of the Picts, earnestlie travelling to instruct both him and his people in the right beliefe, and to extirpe out of their hearts all erroneous opinions of that damnable sect of the Pelagians. At the same time, that blessed man Kentigern, otherwile called Mungo, gouerned the church of Glasgowe, as bishop of the same, who resorting into the companie of this saint Colme, had much conference with him, to both their comforts, concerning the true articles of our faith.

This Kentigern was descended of the blond roiall of the Pictish kings, as son vnto that vertuous woman Shametes or Chamew, daughter vnto Loth king of the Picts, whome a young lustie gentleman, or (as some haue written) the last mentioned Eugenius the Scottish king rauished by force, and begot of hir the said Kentigern. He was greatlie in fauour with the foresaid Budeus the Pictish king, as one that was nere of his blood. For the same Budeus was nephew vnto the foresaid Loth by his brother called Apelethor, and therefore succeeded in the kingdome of the Picts, after that spozed was slaine, laine, as before is expressed. Kentigorne went with saint Colme vnto the castell of Calidon, otherwise called Dounkeld, where they remained six moneths in a monastier there, builded by king Conuall, teaching and preaching vnto the people of Athole, Cal-don, and Angus, that in great numbers came vnto them, to heare their godlie instructions. There is in the same place, where the said castell sometimes stood, a church dedicated vnto saint Colme, built of faire square stone, being at this day a bishops see, com-monlie called Dounkeld, indowd with manie faire reuenues and great possessions, for the maintenance of the bishop and his canons.

At the six moneths end, those two vertuous persons taking their leaue each of other, not without shedding of teares, departed in sunder, Kentigorne returning into Glascow, and saint Colme into Ireland, where reporting manie things, touching the great vertue and holines of king Conuall, and with that deuotion he had bene receiued both of him and his people, he moued manie to wonder greatlie thereat, to heare that a king in the midst of all his allurements to pleasure, should yet be so mindfull of diuine meditations and godlie exercises. In the yere following, saint Colme prepared to returne into Scotland, taking Aidan oner with him thither, by commandement of king Conuall, which Aidan (as ye haue heard) to auoid the traines of Eugentius, fled ouer into Ireland with his mother, for doubt to be made away by the same Eugentius. Saint Colme taking the sea with this Aidan, and comming on land on the coasts of Scotland, was no longer there arriued, but that presentlie he had knowledge how the king was dead, being the yere of his reigne the 10, and after the birth of our Saviour 579.

Saint Colme then being thoughtlie certified of his death, and that the corps was forwarde on the way towards Colmekill, there to be buried, he thought it a peece of his dutie to go thither to be at the funerall, and so doing, was as one of the chiefest there in executing of the obsequies. Which being ended, and hearing that Kinnatill the brother of Conuall was indozinted king in Argile, by the free election of all the estates, he neuerthelesse kept on his former purposed iourne, and came vnto Kinnatill, bringing Aidan with him (appointed by Conuall to haue receiued the gouernement of the kingdome if he had liued) they were both receiued with all beneuolence of the said Kinnatill contrary to most mens expectation: insomuch that embracing Aidan, he bad him be of good cheere, for it should shortly come to passe, that he should attaine to the possession of his grandfathers dominions, and haue issue that should succeed him, to the great reliefe of the Scottish common-wealth.

By what spirit of prophesie he vitted these words, it is vncertaine, but sure it is that his purpose was to haue giuen ouer the gouernement of the kingdome (as he confessed himselfe lieng vpon his death bed) and to haue restored it vnto Aidan who had a right thereto. Whobest being prevented by death, he could not haue time to accomplish his desire, for within twentie daies after his coronation, being surpised with a grievous discaise of a catarrhike rheume, and the squinancie, he was constrained to keepe his chamber, committing the publike administration of the realme vnto Aidan. Herevpon followed a feuer through increasing of a flegmatike humor bred by long rest, that after 14 moneths space vnbodied his ghost, which by instruction of saint Colme, being present with him at the houre of his death, he rendred in most deuout wise into the hands of his redeemer; appointing his kingdome as it were by deliuerie of seisin, euen there vpon his death bed vnto the foresaid Aidan.

After that the bodie of this Kinnatill was interred, according to the maner, in Colmekill, Aidan receiued the crowne, sitting vpon the marble stone, after the custome in those daies used, by the hands of that holie father saint Colme. Who willing that silence might be kept, laid his right hand vpon the kings head, and in his left hand holding his crozier staffe, made a brieue exhortation, as well to the king as to his people, admonishing them of their duties each towards other, but especiallie he exhorted them vnto peace and concord, and before all things to remember to walke in the waies of the Lord, for in so doing they might hope for wealth and prosperitie in the state of their commonwealth, with all other good graces, whereas otherwise, if either the people forgot their duties towards God, or that the king regarded not dutie to execute or fulfill his office, in giuing God thanks for his bountious liberalitie and high benefits bestowed vpon him, it should come to passe, that intestine seditions, conspiracies, and other mischietes should rise among them, to the irrecoverable losse of the realme, by bringing the same into danger to be ouerrun with some forrein power, if they did not repent in time, and call to God for his fauour, that it might please him to reduce them againe into the right path of his lawes & ordinances, whensoever they should so fall from the same. When saint Colme had made an end of these or the like his wholsome aduertisements, all the people reioicing thereat, promised with one voice, and therewith bound to follow the same, and to be euer readie to obeie the commandement of their prince, and the holie instructions of their bishops and other the ecclesiasticall ministers. The assemble being once dissolued, the king departed into Galloway, and there deliuered the countrie of certeine Britissh robbers that had inuaded it. After this, studing to mainteine good orders and quiet rule through his dominions, he appointed an assemble of the chiefest peeres of his realme, to be holden pærelie in three seuerall parties thereof, as in Galloway, Loughababer, and Cathness, there to heare and determine all sutes and quarels of his subjects, & to giue order for the administration of the lawes and all publike affaires, as they should see cause and occasion. He required also S. Colme to be present euer with them, that matters touching religion might be the better prouided for, and that the people might take all things done in those publike sessions in right god part, because such an holie and vertuous father of the church was amongst them, and hauing the chiefest authoritie.

Thus continued the realme in quiet state for cer-teine yeres together, till it chanced that diuers of the nobles being together on hunting, fell at variance, and therevpon making a fraie, sundrie of them were slaine. The beginners and such as were most culpable were sought for by the kings officers, to haue bene had to ward, but they in disobeying the arrest, stroke and beat the officers verie sore, and im-mediatlie therewith fled vnto Bzdacus king of the Picts, so by willfull exile to safe gard their liues. King Aidan according to the maner in such cases accusmed, required to haue those outlawes deliuered vnto him, that he might do iustice vpon them according lie as they had deserued. Bzdacus taking pittie of the yong gentlemen, alledged manie things in their excuse, still deferring to deliuer them, till at length he procured warre to himselfe and his countrie, for Aidan the Scottish king, offended in that he might not haue those rebels and publike offenders restored vnto him, caused a number of his people, first to fetch a great bodie of cattell and prisoners Wherevnto the Brits being kindled, made a like rode into Galloway. Finally the matter grew vnto a field, which was foughten in Pentrich, not farre from Calidon castell otherwise called Dounkelde, with great slaughter on both sides, though in the end the victorie yet remained with the Scots; but losing Arthurus the sonne of Aidan their king, they reioi-sed not greatly at the gaine. That holie man saint Colme troubled with such newes, came vnto Aidan, and declaring vnto him how grievouslie he had offended almighty God, in procuring such mischief as had ensued of this warre, and reciting in particular the branches thereof, he moued the king vnto such repentance for his trespasse, that he wholie submitted himselfe vnto saint Colmes chastisement, who being about to depart in semblance soe offended, the king got him by the sleue, and would in no wise suffer him to go from him, till he had declared vnto him some comfortable meanes how to redresse the matter, for the quieting of his conscience. At length saint Colme lamenting the kings case, suffered himselfe to be intreated, and thereupon repaired vnto Budeus the British king, mouing him by way of diuerse goodlie advertisements to incline his affection vnto peace. At length he did so much by tra-uelling sundrie times to and fro betwixt the two kings, that he brought them vnto agreement, for all matters depending in controuersie betwixt them and their subiects.

Thus saint Colme hauing accomplished that which he came for, returned againe into the westerne Isles vnto his wonted home, where he did by wholesome documents and vertuous examples instruct the seruants of God in the way of his lawes and com-mandements. In this meane time the Sarons hauing bytten and put backe the Britains into Wales, and occupieng all the residue of their lands and countries, they diuided the same into seuen parts, orde-ning seuen feuerall kings to gouerne the same as kingdomes.ouer that of Northumberland, adioining next vnto the Brits, one Edelfred reigned, a man of exceeding desire to enlarge his domination. He went by all means he could deuise, to perswade Budeus the British king to renew the warres with the Scots, promising him all the aid he could make against them, not onelie for that he knewe the Scots to haue bene euer enemies vnto the Sarons, but also for that he himselfe was descended of the nation called Agathyses, of the which the Brits (as was thought) were also come. But the cause why he wished that there might be warres raised betwixt the Scots and Brits, was not for any god will he bare to the Brits, but onelie to the end that their power being weakened through the same, he might haue a more easie preie of their countrie, the which he purposed vpon occasion to inuade, and soine vnto his owne kingdome of Northumberland.

Budeus at the first gaue no care vnto his earnest motions and large offers, but at length through the counsell and procurement of some of his nobles, corrupted by bribes receiued at Edelfreds hands, and fill putting into the kings head sundrie forged informations of the Scottishmens daile attempts against the British nation; he determined to soine with the Sarons against them, and caused therupon warre to be proclaimed against the Scots, as those that had spoiled and robbed his subiects, contrarie to the league and all bonds of old friendship and former amitie betwixt them. The Scottish king Aidan per-ceiuing the practise of the Sarons, and together ther-with the vntruth of the Brits, the better to be able to resist their malice, soine in league with the Britains; this article being the chiefest in the whole couenant: that if the enemies first inuaded the Britains, then an armie of Scots should be sent with all speed into Britaine, to helpe to defend the coun-trie against such inuasions: but if the Scots were first inuaded, then should the Britains in semblable manner come ouer to their aid.

The Sarons hauing knowledge of this appointment betwixt Scots & Britains; to draw the Scots south of their countrie, and so to haue them at more advantage, procured the Brits to soine with them: and so both their powers being united together, entered into the British confines. Aidan according to the conenant came straight vnto the aid of the Britains. Edelfred and Budeus refused to fight for certeine daies, as it were of purpose, thereby to wea-rie the Scots with watch and trauell, being as then far from home. Also they looked daile to haue Cenline king of the Westsaxons to come vnto their aid: but the Scots and Britains hauing knowledge ther-of, first thought it best to encounter with him, before he should soine with the other, and thus understanding that their onelie refuge remained in their armor and weapons, gaue the onset so fiercelie vpon those Sarons, that at the first, sleaing Cutha Cenlines sonne, with a great number of other, they easilie distressed and put the residue to flight.

Aidan would not suffer his men to pursue too far in the chase, but called them backe by the sound of a trumpet, who being assembled herewith about their standards, made such loy and triumph, as greater could not be deuised, what with danling, singing, and plaieng on pipes and other instruments, according to the manner in those daies. But as they were thus in the midst of their chiefest mirth, suddenly appeared the Sarons and Brits, which were with Edelfred and Budeus, appoehing towards them in god order of battell, with whome were also the residue of the Westsaxons, that had escaped from the late bickering. Whereupon the Scots and Britains amazed with the sight hereof, were suddenly stri-ken out of countenance, inso much that Aidan went amongst them, and with a bold countenance exhorted them to remember how valiantlie they had alreadie put to flight the other of their enemies, so that there was great hope for assured victorie of these likewise, if they would now shew the like manlie courage against them, as they had shewed before in assailing the other. Many other words he vied in ad-monishing them to fight manfullie, till the onset gi-uen by the enemies caused him to make an end.

The Sarons laid about them so stoutlie in the beginning, that they forced their aduersaries, with whome they were matched, to giue backe. Neither did Edelfred faile in that occasion to encourage them to follow the aduantage now thus gotten. Budeus with his Brits likewise made great slaughter in that wing of the Scots, with the which he encountered; so that finally the same Scots perceiuing the Britains beaten downe and soe distressed on their side, fell through discomfort thereof to running awaie. There were slaine in this battell on the Sco-tishmens side, Breninus lieutenant or (as they termed him) thane of the Ile of Man, with Dungan the kings third sonne, and no small number of other gentlemen beside. The king himselfe escaped by helpe of his soine, who staid to get his father out of the preasse, was slaine (as is said) amongst the residue.
On the Sarons side, there was slaine Theobald Edelfreds brother, and Cutha the king of Westsaxons his sonne, as before ye haue heard, with a great nu-ber of other. Edelfred himselfe lost one of his eyes.
Budeus the British king was hurt in the thigh, and besides this, he lost a great multitude of his people.
Thus Edelfred hauing got such a notable victorie at Meglaskone in Britaine, he could not be so contented, but eslonnes assembling his people, and is-ning againe with Wudeus and his Picts, the next summer after inuaded Galloway, and began to rob and spoile that countrie, to the end he might either inforce the inhabitants, with other the countries next thereunto adjoining, to yeild vnto him; either els to bring them into extreme pouertie in waisting all afore him. But Aidan being aduertised hereof, sent to the Britains for their couenanted aid, and comming forward with his owne people which he had assembled together, ouerthrew certeine companies of his enemies, as he found them dispersed abroad in seeking for preies: then passing by their maine armie, he commeth into Anandale, where he ioineth with the Britains, being come so farre forward on their wale to meet him. The Saxons and Picts hauing knowledge of their enemies doings, waan such a place of advantage, as they thought it an easie matter for them in keeping the same, to distresse both the Scots and Britains through stopping by the passages, by the which they must of force passe, if they minded to come forth on that day. These passages laie through certeine quicksands, and by a ri-uer which had but few fords passable.

The Scots and Britains, perceiuing how they were thus inclosed, with all speed trenching their campe about, raising certeine bulwarks and turrets in places where they thought expedient, as though they had ment still there to haue continued. Aidan himselfe took such pains in seeing euerie thing done in due order, that his people moued more through his example than by any exhortation, were most diligent in their duties, desirous of nothing so much as to haue occasion ministred, to shew some proofe of their worthie valiances. At length, when the enimies were most at quiet, and (as was supposed) nothing in doubt of any attempt to be made by the Scots and Britains in the night season, leaving a great number of fires in their campe, they suddenly dislodge, and passing the water by secret fords, they entered into Cumberland, and so after passing into Northumberland, they wasted and destroyed with fire and sword all that came within their reach: the report of which their doings brought Edelred and Wudeus backe into that countrie to resist their inuaision, neither resting day nor night, till they had got sight of their enemies.

The next day, the souldiers on both sides requiring battell, together they go with great noise and din-both of men and instruments. So much hardnesse in the Saxons caused no small number of them to be slaine, rather choosing to die with reputation of manhood, than to giue backe neuer so little ground to the enimie. Thus the battell continued for a space, verie doubtfull which waie the victorie would incline.
On the Britains and Scottismens side, there were four chief rulers amongst them, beside Aidan himselfe, as Constantinus and Alencrinus Britains, Callan and Morbach Scottismen. Each of these taking a severall charge vpon him, did earnestlie applie their bittermost indenos therin, incouraging their hands to put awaie all cowardlie feare, and manfullie to sticke to their tackle, since by victorie there was hope of eternall fame, beside suertie of life, and advancement to the common-wealth of their countrie; where otherwise they might looke for nothing, but the contrarie mischaps, as shame, rebuke, and importable seruitude. So that the Scottismen and Britains in-courageed herewith, pressed vpon the enemies so fiercelie, that at length as well the Saxons as Picts were compelled to breake their arraie, & fall to plaine running awaie: the Scots following so rgerlie in the chase, that more of their enemies were thought to die in the fight, than before there had done in the battell.

S. Colme as yet being alive, and within his mo-nasterie in the Ile of Iona, had knowledge by di-uine inspiration (as the Scottish chronicles make mention) of all these matters how they went: and at the verie time that the battels were in fight together, he had assembled a companie of verie vertuous and godlie disposed persons, making intercession for the prosperous speed of their king the foresaid Aidan: and at the verie instant (as it was knowne after) that the Saxons began to flee (as they which had the ouerthrow) that holie old father shewed great token of ioy and gladnesse, declaring vnto his brethren by the spirit of secret knowledge or prophesie, how Aidan had the better, and that his enemies were discomfited, willing them therevpon to giue vnto God thanks for the same. There was an huge multitude slaine in this conflict, but namelie the death of Ceuline king of the West Saxons, with other two worthie capitains of that nation, made the slaughter more sorrowfull on that side, the one of them was called Calaine, and the other Whitelline.

The day next after the battell, the spoile of the field being gathered together, all that which was knowne to haue bene taken out of Galloway, and other countries of the Scots, was restored by the kings authoritie vnto the owners againe. The rest, due which remained was diuided amongst the soul-diers, the tenth part onelie excepted, which was distributed vnto priests & curats, to bestow the same vpon ornaments for their churches. The banners and standards of the Saxons and Picts, with manie other rich offerings, king Aidan sent vnto the abbeie of Colmekill, there to remaine as perpetuall monuments and tokens of so notable a victorie. The yeere next ensuing, that holie father S. Colme now almost wasted through age, and hereto also sore troubled with a rheumatike humour, fell sicke and died. Some saie he ended his life in his house amongst his brethren, within the Ile of Iona, otherwise called Col-mekill, but S. Beda writeth, how he died in an Island called Ihen; where againe the Irish writers affirme, that he decessed in a towne in Ireland called Dune, & that his tombe is there in verie great veneration of the people: vpon the which are these Latine verses ingrauen for the lookers on to read, if they list:

Neither did Aidan the Scottish king liue long time after, for hearing (as is said) that saint Colme was dead, thortlie therevpon, more through griefe than by force of sicknesse, he departed this world, after he had reigned 37 yeares in gouernement ouer the Scottismen, he died about the yeare of our Lord 606. In the daies of this Aidan there was sent into Albion from Gregorie the pope of Rome, diuers learned men (amongest whome were Augustinus and Mellitus) to instruct the English people in the faith of Christ, which as yet they had not recei-ued. By the earnest trauell and exhortation of these instructors, Ethelbert king of the Kentish Saxons was baptised with all his people. The British priests nor their doctrine the Saxons could in no wise abide, because (as is supposed) the one nation through a natural hatred, still sought the destruction of the other.
The South and East Saxons moued with the example of the Kentish Saxons, thortlie after also renounced their old superstitious idolatrie, and likewise receiued the christian faith. Edelred king of Northumberland moued vnto displeasure herewith, sent word vnto these Saxons of the south parts (as Then all of them generallie known by the name of Englishmen) that sith they had forsaken the old institutions & ancient religion of their forefathers, he would suerlie from thenceforth be no lesse enemie vnto them than vnto the Scots and Britains. There liued in these daies that holie man Waldred a Scottis man borne, but dwelling amongst the Picts, whome he instructed in the right faith, and therefore was named the doctor of the Picts. He departed out of this life within the Island called the Wasse, lieng about two miles off from the maine land within the sea, where the Forth hath entrie betwixt the same Ile, and an other called the Spaie. There were thre parishes fell at contention for his bodie, as Abdam, Liningham, and Pecton, so far forth, that they were at point to haue fought about it, but that by counsell of some discret persons amongst them, it was ordeined that they should continue in praiser for that night, and in the next morning stand to the order of the bishop of the dioces, who was come thither the same time to be present at the buriall. The next day in the morning there was found thre beires with thre bodies decentlie covered with clothes, so like in all resemblance, that no man might perceiue anie difference. Then by commandement of the bishop, and with great ioy of all the people, the said seuerall bodies were caried severallie vnto the said thre seuerall churches, and in the same buried in most solemne wise, where they remaine vnto this day, in much honor with the common people of the countries nere adioining.

After that the corps of king Aidan was buried in Colmekill, the nobles of the realme assembled together in Argile, about the election of a new king. Where, by the generall voices of them all, Kenethus Keir the sonne of Contwall (sometime king of the Scottis men, as before is mentioned) was now proclaimed king, and crowned according to the manner; but he liued not past foure moneths after, but died of a catarrhe rheume falling down into the windpipe, and so stopping by his lights and lungs. He deliuered as it were the possession of his kingdom, by way of surrendering the same, into the hands of Eugenius sonne to king Aidan, by consent of all the nobles, a little before he died, for that it was knowne he had a right thereunto after the deceasse of Kenethus.

This Eugenius was the fourth of that name, which had ruled over the Scottis men. As it is said, saint Colme prophesied that he should be king long before his fathers death, for when all the sonnes of king Aidan were brought before him, and that Aidan demanded of him which of them should reigne after him, he ouerpasing the residue (which he vnderstood by secret knowledge should die in the wars) appointed fourth this Eugenius, called by some also Buidus, declaring that it should be onelie he. This Eugenius then being placed in the kinglie seat, for got not such holisome lessons and vertuous precepts, as the foresaid saint Colme had taught him in his youth, so that studeng how to defend rather than to take anie waies or means how to enlarge it, by wrongfull inroching vpon other mens possessions, he grew into such fauour with all good men, as greater could not be deuised. Vnto all offenders he was a sharpe iusticer, not sparing anie transgressor of his lawes, neither in respect of nobilitie or otherwise, but rather those gentlemen which misused themselves in breach of god orders, he chiefelie gaue order to see them punished; where if they behaved themselves worthilie, and according to their calling, there was no prince moze glad than he to aduance them vnto honor.

By these and the like his princelie doings, he was both beloued of his people and also feared. He neither fauoured the Picts nor Saxons of Forthumberland, for that the one nation being ethnics, persisted in their infidelitie, and the other called not by all maner of means to support them; but yet taking a truce with them both, he firmelie caused the same to be obserued. In the tenth yeare of his reigne Edmigel king of Westsaxons & Edfred king of Forthumberland, with aid of the Picts, vanquished Cadwallo king of Britains, and chased him into Scotland, where he remained not long, sailing from thence into Britaine in France, and purchasing aid of the king there named Cadwall, returned into Wales, where vanquishing his enemies the Saxons, and sleaing manie thousands of them, he was restored againe vnto his kingdom. About the same time was Edfred king of Forthumberland slaine in battell, at a place called Mtringham, not far from the riuer of Humber, by Redwald and Ethelbret, the one being king of the east Angles, and the other of the middle Angles; in reuenge of such injuries as the same Edfred had done vnto the Saxons of the countrie called Mercia, containing (as in the English historie moze plainelie may appeare) all those shires from the riuer of Thames vnto the riuer of Merse in Lancashire. Then was one Edwine a right christian prince appointed to reigne in his place, by the assignement of the two foresaid kings Redwald and Ethelbret.

Whilist these things were a doing, there were seuen sonnes of the aforesaid Edfred, that detesting the vntreue dealing of the Picts, which refused to aid their father in his necessitie, and doubting to fall into the hands of Edwine, got them to Eugenius the Scottis king for moze suertie of their liues. Their names were Eufred, Oswald, Oswald, Edwin, Othas, Omond, and Olike. Ebba the onelie daughter of Edfred being taken amongst other prisoners, and escaping from hir taker, miraculously got a bote in the riuer of Humber, and with the same taking the sea alone, without all humane helpe (as hath bene reported) she sailed forth, & at length safely arrived at the point of land which stretched forth into the sea, in the mouth of the Forth, called euen vnto this day after hir name, saint Ebbes head, where being receiued by the bishop of that diocesse, she was professed a nun, and after continuing in great perfectnesse of obseruing that profession, she was instituted abbess of hir house, shewing still in trade of life an orderlie example for hir flocke to follow.

Eugenius the Scottis king did longlie receiue the sonnes of Edfred, though their father had euer bene a cruell enemie against the Scottis nation; and within a while after their comming into Scotland, hearing oftentimes the godlie sermons and preachings of the bishops and monks (who in those daies continuallie gaue themselves vnto that exercise) they finallie abhorred their superstitious idolatrie, and receiued baptisme, that salutiferous signe and sacrament of our christian religion. Those churches also, which the Saxons in time of the warres had ouerthrowen and destroyed in Galloway and other countries thereabouts, Eugenius caused to be repaired; mozeouer also he reedified sundrie castles in those marches, and placed in them garisons of soldiers, to defend them against all inuasions that might happen. Thus continuing his reigne the space of fiftene yeares or thereabouts in honorable peace, to the great aduancement of the commonwealth of his subjects, he lastlie died in the yeare 620, and was buried amongst his elders in the Ile of Iona, with in the monasterie of Colmekill.

godlie pre-cher.*

About this time, that reuerend father and bishop Wonsifacius Austrinus came south of Italie into Scotland, to instruct the people in the faith of Christ there. Whether he were pope, and resigning by the papalitie came thus into Scotland (as some haue supposed) or whether he was sent from the pope called Wonsifacius that succeeded Sabinianus, it is not certeinlie knowne; but certeinlie it is, as the Scottish writers affirme, that vpon his first comming into Scotland he arrived in the water of Tait, comming on land at the mouth of a little riuer, which diuideth the countrie of Gowrie from Angus. His name is yet famous amongst the Scots euen vnto this day, for that he travelled through the most part of the land, in preaching and instructing the people to their confirmation in the faith, and erecting diuers churches in the honor of almightie God, which he dedicated to the name of saint Peter. And amongst other he built one at the place where he came on land, another at a village called Tulline, not passing three miles from Dundee, and the third at Kessenoth, where afterwards an house of canons of saint Augustines order was builded. At length he came into Kasse, continuing there the residue of his life, and is buried at Kassemarken.

There was also at the same time amongst the Scots an ancient godlie man named Polocke, who following such rules & doctrine as in his youth he had learned of Brandon that reuerend abbat, he ceased not to exhort the people of Spar and Argile (in which countries he was most resident) to flee and forsake their vicious living, and to inducure themselves to embrace vertue, to the comfort and health of their soules. This Polocke kept continuall companie with the forenamed Wonsifacius after his comming into Scotland: and finally died also in Kasse, being about 94 yeares of age, and was buried in the church where Wonsifacius lieth, though they of Argile say that his reliques rest among them in the church of Lismore, which is dedicated to his name.

Ferquhard king of Scotland.

After the deceasse of Eugenius, his son Ferquhard succeeded in his place, for Eugenius had three sonnes, Ferquhard, Fiacre, and Donald, these being appointed by their father to be brought up with Connane bishop of Sodor (that is, the bishop of Man) in vertuous discipline, did not altogether follow his godlie precepts and lessons. Ferquhard and Donald gladly gaue eare to him, but they thought his instructions did not much appertine vnto their birth and degree: but Fiacre printing his diuine documents deepe in his heart, determined to forsake all worldly pompe and dignitie, and to get him some whither farre from home, where he might serue God more frelie without let or interruption of his friends or kinsfolke. Thus being disposed, he got vpon him simple apparell, and went ouer into France, where seeking a solitarie place, Pharas the bishop of Meaux gaue vnto him a p[ar]ce of ground, in the which at this day he is worshipped with great deuotion.

*Fiacre gaeth

There hath gone a tale in that countrie, that no woman might enter into the chappell where he lieth buried; for if anie doe, she hath some mishap that falleth vnto hir, as either the losse of sight, priuation of wits, or some such like. As touching the state of the Scottish commonwealth, vnder the gouernement of Ferquhard, the same was quiet enough, & without trouble of outward enemies; but his subtleties among themselves fell at such diuision, that euerie part of the realme was full of murder, burning, and other destructions of men and houses, with such spoiling, robbing, reuing, and all kinds of other mischiefs, that no where was any sweetie either of life or goods: all the which misorders sprang, were now risht and mainteined through the kings otone diligence: for he mistaking his office and dutie, was of this opinion, that so long as the nobles and states of his realme were thus readie one to kill an other, there was no likelihood they should haue time to practise anie rebellion against him; and herevpon he rather helpe to further such discords amongst them, than take order for to appeale it. But it came to passe by this means, that he was nothing regarded within a while amongst them, so that by means of other arbitrators which they chose by common agreement, all matters in controuersie were taken by & ended betwixt them, the king not once made priuite therevnto.

At the same time it was notified abroad in the realme, that Ferquhard, besides other his wicked behauiours, was also infected with the erronious opinions of the Pelagian heresie. Which suspicion was the more increased, for that he used to haue sundrie British priests in his companie: the which nation had bene euer noted with the spot of that damnable infection. The nobilitie of the realme moued herewith, summoned him by an herald to come to a counsell, which they had appointed to hold of all the states, that they might there vnderstand, if it were true or not which was commonlie reported of him. But he refusing to come at such summons, they assembled together, and besieged him in the castell wherein he had inclosed himselfe, and winning the place, got him into their hands, and immediatly therevpon committed him to safe keeping. This done, they consult together for the administration of the realme, whether they should quite depose Ferquhard, or restore him to his place. In fine they rest vpon this agreement, to send an honorable ambassage into France vnto Fiacre, to require him to returne home into his countrie, and there to receiue the gouernement of the realme.

Fiacre (as the report goeth) hearing that there were diuers of the Scottish nobilitie comming towards him vpon this message, in his prayers desired feruentlie of almightie God, that it might please him so to worke for him, that he might continue in his contemplatiue life still, and not be occasioned to resort vnto the troubles of the world, which all contemplatiue godlie men ought to abhorre. And euen as he had wished, it came to passe. For when those that were sent vnto him, came to the hermitage wherein he had his lodging, they found him (as appeared vnto them) so disfigured with the leprosie, that vpon his earnest refusal to forsake his solitarie life (which he professed to lead as an heremite) for anie worldly preferment of kinglie gouernement, they were content to returne with that answer, with his infirmities (as they supposed) was such, as was not conuenient for him that should haue anie publike gouernement. This Fiacre had a sister named Sira, which hearing of hir brothers vertuous trade of life, came vnto him with a companie of godlie virgins, and being of him confirmed in hir purposed intent of chastitie, she repaired into Champagne in France, where she with hir fellows remained in great holinesse of life, leaving in those parties a worthie memorie not forgotten amongst them there till this day.

The foresaid ambassadors returning south of France, declared in what plight of deformitie they had seene Fiacre, and how earnestlie he had refused the offer which they had made vnto him in name of all the states of Scotland. The Scottish nobilitie herevpon assembling together, chose south foure of the ancientest peeres amongst them, to haue the rule and gouernement of the kingdome, till it were otherwise provided. These were named by that age, age, wardens, and had full authoritie to order things as seemed them good in all points. In the meane time Fergushard remaining still in prison, and vexed with sundrie diseases, to rid himselfe out of such miseries, due himselfe in the 13 yeare of his reigne, and so nothing spared his owne life in the end, which had bene the occasion of the losse of so manie other mens lives in time of the ciuill discord, that he had euer nourished. After this wretched end of Fergushard, which happened in the yeare of our Lord 632, the lords of the land assembled themselves together in Argile, about the choosing of a new king, where by common consent, Donwald the third sonne of Eugenius, being called thither with bishop Conan out of the Ile of Span, was inuested king with great joy and triumph.

This Donwald hauing taken on him the roiall administration, transforming himselfe into his fathers maners, resorted againe into the former estate such things as appertained vnto the common wealth, and had bene anie wise decaied and misgouerned by the slothfull negligence of his predecessor Fergushard, by means whereof he quicklie grew into great fauor of his subjects. In the meane time Cadwalla king of the Britains, and Penda king of those Englishmen which inhabited that part of England ancientlie called Mercia, joining their powers together against Edwin king of Northumberland, depriued him both of life and kingdom. After this, passing through the whole countrie, and entring into the confines of Wales, they took a great part of the same by force of arms from Brydens king of the Wicks, who in baine had sued for aid vnto Donwald king of Scotland, for that his vntrush had bene notified more than enough in times past. But Donwald being certified of Edwin's death, made means vnto Cadwalla king of the Britains by his ambassadours, that Custred the son of Edelred might be resorted vnto his fathers kingdom, which Edwin had wrongfullie vsurped.

This being granted, Custred leauing his brethren still in Scotland, came into Northumberland, where by authoritie of Cadwalla and Penda he was inuested king of Mercia, that is, of the countrie which is now called the marches. For at the same time they had diuided the kingdom of Northumberland into two kingdomes, appointing Custred (as is said) to reigne ouer the one called Mercia, and one Drake ouer the other called Deira, a man of great wickednesse, as by his works most plainelie appeared. For certaine yeares after his advancement to that dignitie, he found means to marie one of his daughters vnto the foresaid Custred, persuading the same Custred to consent with him in restoring againe the heathenish religion throughout their whole dominion, & bitterlie to renounce the christian faith, which they had latelie before receiued by the instructions of the two bishops Conan & Pauline. But they inioied not long felicitie after so wicked and most diuillish a purpose, for the princes of Albion vnder the leading of Cadwalla & of the Britains, and Penda king of Mercia, with a great armie assembled of Saxons, Britains, and Wicks, entring into Northumberland, and incountring in battell with Drake and Custred, discomfited their power, and took them prisoners, who being put into a common prison, due each other to auoid sharper tortures, which by due execution they daile looked for.

Then was the kingdom of Northumberland giuen vnto Oswald brother to Custred, both in respect of the right which he had thereto, and also of the zeale which he bare to the advancement of Christs religion, shewing himselfe in consideration thereof, an earnest enemy to his brother Custred, and all his partakers, in so much that in the day of the battell, he was one of the forwardest captiues against them. Vnto this Oswald was sent a Scottishman called Cozman, to instruct the Northumberland men in faith, and after him Aidan, as in the English historie ye may read more at large: finally he was slaine by Penda king of Mercia, as in the same historie appeareth. His death chanced in the third yeare of Donwald the Scottish king, who sore lamented the same, as of that prince whome he loued right intirelie. Neither liued the said king Donwald anie long time after the death of his deere friend; for that in the fiftieth yeare of his reigne, being got into a bote to fish in the water called Lochtate for his recreation, his chance was to be drowned, by reason the bote ranke vnder him. Certaine daies after, his bodie being found and taken vp, was buried amongst his ancessors in Colmekill, in the yeare of our Lord 647.

About the same time there liued in France thre brethren of great holinesse of life, being sonnes vnto Hylltan king of Ireland, the which he begot of his wife Balghetes, descended of the linage of the kings in Scotland. The names of which thre brethren were as followeth, Fursus, Follan, and Altan. Fursus professing himselfe a monke of saint Benets order, passed ouer into France, there to set forth and enlarge that profession, and being receiued of king Clovis, began the foundation of a monasterie there called Latine, in the which he placed monks of that order, and began to sow in those parties the seeds of the gospell, but not without the darrell of mens traditions, as Iohn Bale saith in the 14 centurie of the British writers. His two brethren Follan and Altan followed him ouer into France, and both by word and example instructed the Frenchmen to embrace the faith of Christ, and to renounce the religion of the gentiles.

So that it seemeth as yet, such as professed themselves to be monks, and men of religion (as they were called) had not left off to labour in the Lords vineyard, spending their time in reading the scriptures, to instruct and teach others, and to exercise prayer and thanksgiving: so as no small number by their wholesome doctrine and good example were conuerted to the christian faith. Follan at length was martyred in a monasterie which he had founded in France called Fosse. About the same time there was also a contention amongst them in Albion for keeping of the Easter day, the Scottish bishops and some of the Britains varieng in their account from all other prelates of the west: but at length through persuasion of the pope they confessed their error (if it ought so to be taken) and consented to celebrate that feast according to the account of other nations. These things chanced in the daies of king Donwald.

After the decesse of Donwald, his nephew Fergushard the sonne of his brother, the other Fergushard, succeeded in gouernement of the realme, a man of quicke and liuelie spirit, but inclined neuer thelesse rather vnto euill than vnto good, speciallie after he had attained the crowne, inasmuch as it was commonlie spoken of him, that from a liberall and most gentle humane person, he was suddenlie changed into an insatiable and most cruell monster. Before he came to the crowne he was liberall beyond measure. There was no gentleman that wanted monie, either to redeeme his lands ingaged, or to bestow in dowry for the marriage of his daughter, but if he had therewith to helpe him, he might account himselfe sure thereof. Priests and other devout persons, speciallie such as were poore and in any necessitie, he oftentimes most bountifullie relieved to their great ease and comfort. To be briefe, such a readinesse was in him to helpe all men, that (as was thought) he could better be contented to want himselfe, than to see other men haue need of anie thing that was in his possession, so that all men iudged him most worthy of all princelie authoritie. But after he was once placed in the kingle seat, he so altered his conditions, that men could not but wonder much therat. Where before he was knowne to be liberall, well disposed, righteous, sober, and a reformer of offences, he was now forthwith become covetous, wicked towards God, a tormentor of the iust and righteous people, and insatiable in all vnlawfull affections. That which before time he had giuen vnto anie of the nobilitie, he now without all shame most vn-courteously demanded to be to him restored, alled-ging that he did but lend it for the time. And such as went about to delay restitution, pretending anie excuse, he caused their goods to be confiscate, and also their bodies to be committed to prison. Now then he found means without cause or matter to put some of them to cruel death. Such of the prelates as hee vnderstood to be wealthie, he rested not till he had pi-ked one matter or other vnto them, whereby they were sure to forfeit all their treasure vnto his coffers, that neuer might be filled.

The bishops of the realme, namelie those two re-uerend fathers, Colman and Finnan, perceiving such wickednesse in the prince, blamed him tharpele sundrie times for the same: and at length because they saw he regarded not their admonishments, he was by them excommunicated: whereof he so little passed, that when other went vnto the church to heare diuine seruice, he would get him to the woods and forests to hunt the hart, or some other game. Neither were such wanting as were willing to keepe him companie: so readie is the nature of man at all times to follow licentious libertie. He vsed also, comtrarie to the custome of his countrie, to eat thre meales a day, hauing such number of dishes and a bundance of delicate fare, as the like had not bene vsed at anie time before those daies in that realme: and all to serue his greedie appetite, togither with theirs that followed his companie.

Of wines & other strong drinks he would participate abundantly at all times and places, without regard of health or hono^r, being exceedingly giuen vnto most beastlie drunkennesse. He customarie vsed to sit at supper till it were verie late in the night, hauing his banquetting dishes and cuppes to come in one after another, till he were so mistempered, that being laid to sleepe, he would straight vomit out such beauie gozges, as he had in such most gluttonous wise receiued. Wherevnto he was so drownded in the filthie lust of the flesh, that he defiled his owne daughters: and for that his wife was about to dissuade him from such villanie, he slue hir with his owne hands. Thus continuing in his wickednesse certeine yeeres, at length the nobles began to conspire against him, so that they would haue deuised a meane how to haue rid him out of the way, if bishop Colman had not forbidden them that practise, prophesing as it were by diuine inspiration, that Fer-quhard soe detestling his owne wicked doings, should shortly be punished by the hands of almighty God, according to his desertings.

And sure his words proued true: for within a mo-neth after, as the same Ferquhard followed in chase of a wolfe, the beast being all enraged by the pur-sute of the hounds, slue backe vpon the king, and snatching at him, did wound and bite him right soe in one of his sides, immediatlie wherevpon, whether through anguish of his hurt, or by some other occasion, he fell into a most filthie dis ease: for a venemous humor with a soft consuming heat, did so eat and wast his members and lims, that a lothsome sight it was to behold the same: for out of his legs, feet, and priue parts, there issued filthie corruption and matter, with to vile a sauer, that binnetly might any creature abide it. His bellie was swollen, as though he had bene infected with the dyspse, and thereto was it verie hard withall. Finallie lice bred so abundanlie in his secret parts, that he might in no wise be rid of cleansed of them.

At length, when he had bene vexed in this sort for the space of two yeeres togither, or thereabouts, he began to call himselfe to remembrance, and to consider how this punishment was worthy fallen vpon him for his sinnes, and therevpon anning bishop Colman to be fetched vnto him, being as then about 20 miles off, he confessed vnto him the whole summe of his offenses, declaring himselfe right penitent for the same. Colman reioicing hereat, did not onelie release him of the sentence of excommunication, pronounced against him: but also willed him to be of comfort, and to put his confidence in the mercie of almightie God, who was readie to receiue all such sinners as turned vnto him with repentant hearts: so that being put in hope by these & the like words of Colman to haue forgiveness of his sinnes, with bitter teares he besought God to haue mercie vpon him: and humbly receiuing the sacrament, got him into simple clothing of beare and sackecloth. Then causing himselfe to be borne into the next fields, he there yelded vp the ghost in the presence of Colman, who (according to the dutie of a good ghostlie father) was still about him, in exhorting him to commit himselfe wholly to the mercie of God, & not to doubt but he should be sure to attaine the same. Thus Fer-quhard ended his life, in the 18 yeere after he began his reigne ouer the Scottishmen, and in the yeere of Grace 664.

In this Ferquhards daies bishop Aidan departed this world, and then was Finnan sent for forth of Scotland, to take vpon him the gouernement of the church of Lindesferne, where the bishops of For-thumberland as then had their see. This Finnan was well learned, and no lesse renowned for his vertuous life than his predecessor Aidan. He died a non after the decesse of Ferquhard, and then was Colman removed vnto that see of Lindesferne, who with his vertuous instructions and examples of ho-lie life conuerted a great multitude of Saxons vnto the true worshipping of the liuing God. And amongst other was Wenda sonne to the former Wen-da, king of Mercia. Where be that wrote how Wenda the father also was baptised by this Colman: and that the same Colman travelled through the most part of all the English prouinces, setting forth the word of life amongst the people, purchasing him great fame for his worthy merits. He came to the church of Lindesferne in the daies of Aladwin that succeeded the last mentioned Ferquhard.

This Aladwin was the sonne of king Done, Maldwin wald: and after that Ferquhard was dead and buried in Colmekill, he was inuested king: which functon he right sufficientlie discharged, studieng to mainteine peace with his neighbors the Picts, Saxons and Britains: giuing thereby a good example to be followed of his subjects. Hereto he had a speciall care for the administration of the lawes in due forme and order, causing offenders to be punished, that other harmlesse persons might liue in quiet, so that by this meane all things in the beginning of his reigne had prosperous successe. Afterwards there fell no small discorde betwixt them of Lennox and Argile: for first through bralling among the heard-men, their maisters made a fraie, whereof rose such deadlie enimitie betwixt the parties, by reason that the inhabitants of the westerne Iles sided them of Argile, and the people of Galloway the other of Lennox: that if the king had not come into those parties to appease the businesse, and to haue punished the offenders, there had ensued much manslaughter, vnto the great danger of the vtter ruine of those countries.

The king at his arrivall amongst them minded not to pursue the people that followed their captiues, but rather the captiues and authors of this tumult themselves. Whereof they hauing knowledge, made an attonement together, being inforced thereto of necessitie, so to auoid the prepared punishment deuised by the king against them. And forthwith they fled ouer into the Iles, but the inhabitants doubting the kings displeasure, would not consent to succour them, but contrariwise took them and deliuered them to the kings officers, whereupon they were safely conueied to the places where they were borne, and there suffered their deserved execution. Thus that commotion vnadvisedlie begun, was speedilie appeased, and the name of Malcolme by reason hereof so feared amongst his subiects, that during his reigne no such trouble chanced in anie part of all his dominions.

After this he went ouer into Mona Colmekill, where perceiuing the abbey church, wherein his ancestors had their sepulchres, to be in decaye, he caused it to be pulled quite downe, and workemen forthwith set in hand to build it vp againe, at his owne proper costes and charges. Such speed also was vsed about this worke, that before he departed out of this life, the same was finished, and dedicated vnto our Saviour Christ, and saint Colme. About the same time there reigned throughout the most part of the world a sore and greivous pestilence, consuming a greater number of men (before it ceased) than there were left alive: for it continued the whole space of three yeeres together. At length, through common prayer, fastings, giuing of almes, & other vertuous workes, the wrath of almightie God was pacified, so that such great mortalitie by his mercifull appointment did cease and giue ouer.

The Scottishmen were free from that infection as well at that time, as also for manie yeeres after. Yetther were they in manner troubled with anie sharpe fevers, or agues, till time that omitting the ancient and wholesome sparseness of diet, which their fathers in times past had vsed, they fell vnto riotous banquetting and excessive feeding, whereby they became subiect vnto all kinds of diseases, through malicious humors growing therupon. Colman bishop of Lindesferne seeing wonderfull numbers of Englishmen perishe daile of that contagious sickness, by licence of the king, to auoid the present danger of death, which by tarrying there he saw no meanes how to escape, returned into Scotland with his disciples, and after getting him ouer into one of the westerne Iles, he erected a monastery there, wherein he remained during the residue of his life.

After the departure of Colman forth of Northumberland, the people of that countrey joining with the Brits, made sundrie roads into the Scottish borders: which iniurie when Malcolme reuenged with more displeasure done to them of Northumberland, than the Scottishmen had receiued, it caused the Brits and Northumbers to prepare themselves with all speed to haue made sharpe warres against the Scots: but in the meane time Malcolme died, being strangled in his bed one night by his owne wife, vpon suspicion of gelousie, for his vnlawfull companie keeping with an other woman. The next day after she was apprehended with those that were private to the deed, and burnt openlie vpon an hill, according as she had most iustlie deserved. Malcolme was thus murdered in the yere after the birth of our Saviour 684, and in the 20 yere of his owne reigne.

After him succeeded Eugenius the fifth of that name, nephew to Malcolme, as sonne to his brother Dongard. About the same time Eugenius king of Scots sent with all diligence his ambassadores vnto Egfred king of Northumberland, to moue him vnto peace. Egfred hauing heard the ambassadores which were thus sent, feined as though he had bene willing to haue had peace, where he minded nothing more than to haue warres with the Scots, so soone as his promise should be once readie, and hereupon granted to them a truce for the space of 11 moneths, in which meane time he might make his preparation. Eugenius hauing some secret knowledge of Egfreds purpose, provided likewise for the warres on his part: but for that he would not seeme to giue the occasion, he secretly commanded that none of his subiects should be so hardie, as to attempt anie thing sounding to the breach of the truce.

In the tenth moneth Egfred hauing all his preparation readie, sent a companie of his men of war into the Scottish borders, to fetch some bootie, where by the peace might be broken. Those that were thus sent, fetched not onelie from thence a great number of cattell, but also slue diuers of the borderers that went about to rescue their beasts and cattell. Immediately hereupon were sent ambassadores from Eugenius to demand restitution: but they not withstanding much adoe, after certaine daies attendance, got audience, and boldly declaring vnto Egfred their message, receiued for answer a plaine publication of warre. For he alledging how the Scots, since the truce was granted, had sundrie times fetched booties out of the confines of his dominions, and therefore had well deserved farre more damage than as yet they had receiued, whereupon he minded not to continue friendship with them that knew not how to keepe their hands from robbing and stealing from their neighbours: so that he commanded them to declare vnto their king, that within eight daies after, he should looke for open warre at the hands of him and other his allies.

Eugenius receiuing this answer from Egfred, besought God, with the other onelie sought to violate the peace, that the vengeance might light vpon his owne head, that had thus giuen the occasion. Wherewith gathering his power together, he repaired into Galloway, into the which he had knowledge that his enemies would first enter. But before he could get thither, a great armie of Englishmen were come already into that countrey, and had besieged a strong castell called Downscie, the chiefe fortresse in those daies of all Galloway. And per Egfred might winne the same, he was constrained to raise his siege, and to march forth to encounter with Eugenius, who hastened fast towards him. They met nere to the banks of the water of Aelwis, as then being verie deepe, by reason it was raised with abundance of raine which latelie before had fallen, where they fought a verie sore and bloudie battell: for the Scots had vowed neuer to giue ground to the enimies, so long as anie life remained in their breasts.

At the first there was no great advantage perceived on either side, the kings, according to the duties of valiant captiues, exhorting their people to stick to it manfully: but in the meane time, certaine bands of Egfreds part getting themselves to the side of an hill, gaue the looking on, without coming downe at all to aid their friends: which manner the residue of his people perceiuing, doubted of some

Some treason denised against them, and thereupon began to shrinke backe. Egfred aduised therof, came amongst the foremost ranks of his battell, desiring the Englishmen in no wise to giue place to their enemies: and for that daies seruice he promised them high rewards, and all the pleasure that afterward he might be anie waies able to shew or do them. But whilste he was thus busilie occupied in comforting & exhorting his men to fight stoutlie, he himselfe chanced to be wounded in the face with an arrow so soze, that immediatlie he fell downe and died in the place. The Englishmen discouraged with this mischance, were quicklie thereupon put to flight and chased, a great number of them toke the riuer so to escape the enemies hands, of whome the more part being pressed downe by weight of their armor, were drowned in the raging waues of the flood, the residue by casting from them their armor and clothes, escaped by swimming ouer to the other side, but those that made their course by land, being cumbered in mirres and mosses, also amongst streets, rocks, mounteins and cliffes, were overtaken by the Scots and slaine. Few of that number escaped awaie in safetie, so that there died in the fight and chase at the point of twentie thousand Saxons with their king the foresaid Egfred: of the Scots were slaine, besides those that were hurt and wounded, not manie above six thousand. By this overthrow the force of those Saxons or Englishmen of Northumberland was not onelie soze diminished, but also of such other Saxons, the which in no small number were come vnto Egfred, to aid him against the Scots in that iournie.

Willems the Dixish king hauing knowledge of this slaughter, which had chanced betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, was nothing soze, as one that was friend to neither part, and now perceiuing that the Northumberland men were so weakened, that they were not able to resist an inuasion, he entred with his whole power which he had raised, into Northumberland, soze afflicting the inhabitants, inasmuch that he had no doubtles either subdued that countrie wholie vnto his dominion, either els vtterlie destroyed it, had not the deuout prayers of S. Cuthbert (who then held the see of Lindesferne) preferred the people from that present desolation. For at length after the Dixs had raged a while through the countrie, they chanced to fall at variance amongst themselves for parting of the spoile, and buckling together by the eares, there was an huge slaughter made amongst them. And this was the cause, that contenting themselves with those countries about Berwicke, ancientlie called Deira, out of the which they expelled the Saxons, they abstained from all the residue, as not willing to deale withall. Neither were the Saxons of Northumberland, being thus scourged, able to recover their former forces againe, of manie yeeres after insuing.

Here is to be noted, that whereas the Scottish writers ascribe the victorie of that battell, wherein Egfred was slaine, vnto their king Eugenius, Beda which then liued, declareth that the Dixs were those that fought with him and slue him. Finallie, Eugenius departed this life in the 4 yeeres of his reigne, and after the incarnation 688. After Eugenius the first, succedeth Eugenius the first, who was the sonne of Ferquhard, and by perswasion of bishop Adannan (with whome he was brought vp) & of S. Cuthbert, he entered into league with the Northumberland men: but he would at no hand ioine in amitie with the Dixs, notwithstanding he was contented to take truce with them. But when he saw the same oftentimes by them violated & broken, to the great perill, damage, and hinderance of his subjects, he caused the warre to be proclaimed, and sent them his defiance by an herald. Hotobett, through the earnest prayers (as is supposed) of the two bishops, Cuthbert and Adannan (who had laboured earnestlie to haue brought those people to a quietnesse) this warre continued without anie notable encounter, saue onelie by light incursions (wherein no great bloodshed chanced) even vnto the death of Eugenius, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 697, and in the tenth yeere of his owne reigne. He was buried together with the other Eugenius, that lastlie reigned afore him, in the Ile of Colmehill, amongst their predecessors.

Manie wonderfull visions were seene that yeere in Albion, as the Scottish chronicles make mention. In the riuer of Humber there appeared in the sight of a great multitude of men, a number of ships vnder saile, as though they had bene furnished forth for the warres. In the church at Camelon there was heard a noyse, as it had bene the clattering of armor, whilke was turned into blood in diuers places in Scotland, and cheefe conuerted into a bloudie masse or cake. Cozne, as it was gathered in the harvest time appeared bloudie. In the furthestmost parts of Scotland, it rained blood. These sights being seene of some, & declared to other, caused a wonderfull feare in the peoples hearts, imagining some great alteration to insue.

Ambriskeleth the nephew, or (as some say) the son of Eugenius the first, succedeth Eugenius the first in the gouernment of the realme; who after his attaining to the crowne, shortly changed therewith his manners and god disposition: for where before he shewed himselfe to be an earnest defender of the poore and simple, that all men iudged that he would haue proued a patron of all vertue, he contrarie to that expectation, became suddenlie a paterne of all vices and couetousnesse, delighting in nothing but in following his sensuall lusts, as in taking excellencie of meats and drinks, and wallowing in fleshlie concupiscence of lecherous lust. To be brieefe, when he toke nothing in hand worthie of his estate and degree, it was thought that of necessitie the forme of the publike gouernement must needs thorough his negligent slouthfulnesse fall into decay and ruine: whereupon Warrard king of the Dixs, supposing he had conuenient time to reuenge all former injuries receiued at the Scottishmens hands, gathered a great host of men, and with the same entring into the Scottish confines, made verie pittifull slaughter of the inhabitants.

At length Ambriskeleth (being soze blamed of his nobles for his negligence, in suffering his subjects thus to be destroyed) gathered an armie together, & with no small feare to shew his head amongst his people (as those princes which through their owne default haue their people in mistrust, doe ever stand in doubt of their owne safeties, and namelie when anie present danger beginneth to appeere) forth he goeth without anie great god order (God wot) for what might be looked for at his hands, which was so overwhelmed with all kind of excessive gluttonie, immoderate surfeting, insatiable lecherie, and belittling altogether in slouthfull ease, and sluggish idleness, the root from whence all such filthie vices taking their beginnings, are nourished & maintained.

To conclude, he liued as one that toke no manner of regard to that which chiefly appertained to his calling: whereby now when he should come into the field, he was neither able through lacke of practise to take paines to see things done as was behoouefull, of himselfe, neither yet to giue order to others how the same ought to be done. Wherefore the marching forward with his armie, he came to the water of Tapp, and nere to the banks thereof, he pitched downe his tents, where after he had supped, he was occasioned to menting the death of such a monstrous person, because the armie for want of a gouernor should not fall into anie danger, they elected Eugenius the seventh, being the brother of the late foresaid Ambirkeleth, to succeed as king in the government of the realme; a prince of verie comelie port & personage, neither destitute of honozable qualities and good disposition of mind. Being once proclaimed king, he caused generall musters to be taken of the whole armie, and perceiuing by surueie thereof, that he was not able to match with his enemies, he found means to conclude a peace with the British king, pledges being deliuered on either side, for redress to be had of all wrongs and injuries that had bene committed betwixt them. The Brits returning home, and the Scottish armie dissolued, Eugenius with the most part of the nobilitie went into Argile, where he received his inuicture of the kingdome, sitting upon the stone of marble, according to the custome and manner.

The bond of peace begun betwixt the kings, was the more stronglie confirmed by meanes of alliance, Spontana the daughter of king Barnard being coupled in marriage with Eugenius: she in the yere following being great with child, was murdered one night within the kings bed-chamber, in stead of the king himselfe, by two brethren of the countrie of Athole, who moued to displeasure for their fathers death, had conspired to murder the king, and had slaine him in deed, had he not through his good hap laien forth of his owne chamber the same night. Eugenius being suspected of the murder, and euill spoken of for the same amongst his subjects, was at length with great danger of life and honoz forced to make answer by waie of arraignment for clearing of himselfe, before the nobles of his realme, appointed as competent iudges in that case: so greatlie beloved was Spontana amongst all the degrees of the Scottish nation. But in the end being found guilty of the crime (for at the time that iudgement should haue passed, the offenders were apprehended and brought in) he was acquit, to the great reioicing of all honest men. Those that had done the deed, were condemned and hanged by naked on gibbets by the hailes, together with certeine cruell mastiue dogs, the which might so deuoure them.

But Eugenius being thus cleared of all former suspicion, minded to haue bene reuenged on those that had falslie accused him. Howbeit through the goodlie admonishments of that reuerend father Adamnan, he qualified his displeasure. After this, giuing his mind to the advancement of religion and politike gouernement of his subjects, he ordeined that the histories of his ancestors should be written in bookes and volumes, that posteritie might haue to read the same for example sake. These monuments he also appointed to be kept and reserued in the abbey of Iona, now called Colme-kill, for a perpetuall memorie: and such as should write the same, to remaine and haue livings there in the abbey. Moreover, such spirituall promotions as he perceiued to be too meane and slender for the maintenance of the minister that should serue the cure, he caused to be augmented in such wise as was thought sufficient. He concluded a league with the Saxons and Brits, and obserued the same during his life, which he ended at Abernethie, when he had reigned about 17 yeres, whereof the last fell in the yere after the incarnation of our Saviour 717, the 15 indiction. His death was greatlie lamented, both of his lords and commons; as they that interlie loued him for his noble and most princelie qualities.

A little before his death, he betooke the possession of his kingdome vnto Mor-dack that succeeded him. This Mor-dack was the nephew of Eugenius the seventh, by his brother Ambirkeleth: who as he was knowne to be of a gentle, meke, and liberal nature, before his aduancement to the crowne; so he shewed himselfe to be the verie same man during the whole course of all his naturall life, after he had attained to the same. Aboue all things he wisht a generall peace to continue amongst all the princes of Albion, and thereupon for his part establishing a peace with the Brits, Britains, and all the English kings, he firmelie kept euere article therein contained. In those daies (as S. Beda doth testifie) foure severall people liued in peace and quietnesse within the bounds of Albion, though differing in manners, language, lawes, and ordinances: Saxons whom he called Englishmen, Britains, Scots, and Brits. His words are these that follow.

The nation of the Brits at this time is in league with the Englishmen, and gladlie is partaker of the vniuersall peace and veritie with the catholike church. Those Scots which inhabit Britaine, contenting themselves with their owne bounds, go about to practise no deceitfull traines, nor fraudulent deuises against the Englishmen. The Britains, though for the most part through a familiar hatred doe impugn the English nation, and the state of the whole catholike church, obseruing not rightlie the feast of Easter, besides other naughtie vices, yet both the diuine power and humane force viterlie resisting them, they are not able in neither behalfe to attaine vnto their purposed intentions; as they which though partlie free, yet in some behalfe are thrall and mancipat to the subiection of the Englishmen: which Englishmen now in acceptable peace and quietnesse of time, manie amongst them of Northumberland, as well of the nobilitie as other, laing away armour and weapon, applie themselves to the reading of holie scripture, more desirous to be in houses of vertuous conuersation, than to exercise feats of warre. What will come thereof, the age that followeth shall perceiue and behold. With these words doth Beda end his historie, continued till the yere 734, in the which yere Mor-dack the Scottish king ended his life.

He repaired sundrie churches and religious houses, which being defaced with violence of the enemies inuasions in time of warre, had not bene re-edified by his ancestors. But amongst other, he bestowed much cost vpon the church where the bodie of S. Minian lieth, in the towne ancientlie called Candida Casa, & now Whitterne or Whitterne. Saint Beda calleth that place Bictinnia, and the bishop which at the same time held the church there, he nameth Aca, auouching how he was the first that was bishop thereof after the daies of saint Minian. Which if it be true, it must needs be that afterwards some vacation happened in that see for a time, sith it is notified in the Scottish histories, that the westernne Isles, Galloway, and other regions nere adjoining, were subiect vnto the bishop of Sodor (whose see is in the Ile of Man) vnto the daies of Malcolme the third, who restored rather than ordeined the bishops see in Candida Casa againe, after such vacation as before is specified.

But now to retorne touching the governement of the Scottish kingdome, I find that after the deceasse of Mor-dake last remembred, his nephew named Ethfne, the sonne of the seventh Eugenius, succeeded in the state; a man naturallie inclined vnto peace and maintenance of iustice. The league which his predecessors Eugenius and Mor-dake had kept with their neighbors the Britains, Englishmen and Picts, he duellie likewise obserued. His chiefe studie was to purge his realme of all such as were knowen to be open barrettors and offenders in anie wise, against the peace and common quiet of his subiects; so that causing sundrie notable examples of iustice to be executed vpon such euill doers, he was had in such reuerend dread amongst his subiects, that none of them durst once whisper anie euill of him. Neither had they verelie anie cause so to do, while he looked to the administration himselfe.

But after he was once fallen into age, he appointed foure pères in his realme to haue the chiefe gouernance vnder him; as Donald the tresuro; of Argile, Collane of Athole, and Mor-dake of Galloway his lieutenants, and Contrath the thane of Murrey land. These hauing the procuracion of all things touching the governement of the realme, be-sed not themselves so vprightlie in manie points as they ought to haue done; but winked now and then at faults & trespasses committed by their kinsfolks and allies, permitting the nobilitie to liue according to their old accustomed maner of licentious liber-tie, to the small ease or commoditie of the other inferiour states. Donald of the wessterne Fles, a man of goodlie personage, but of disposition inclined to all naughtinesse, maintained a great number of robbers and spoilers of the countrie, liuing onelie vpon raine. For loke what they wanted, they would not faile to catch it, if it were in anie place abroad where they might laie hands on it: so that all the husbandmen and commons of Galloway, in which countrie they most haunted, were brought in to wonderfull thraldome and miserie.

Neither did Mor-dake the kings lieutenant there, go about to chastise such insolent misdemeanors, either for that he was of Donalds alliance, either else priuie to his doings, and partaker of the spoile.
The people hereby bered with continuall iniuries, brought manie pitifull complaints before Mor-dake, who nothing regarded their lamentable lutes and supplications, but the more they complained, the worse they were handled. Neither was there anie hope of redresse or amendment, till Eugenius the eight was admitted to the kinglie administration after the death of king Ethfne, who in the latter end of his dates continuallie being sicke and diseased, could not attend to take order for the publike gouernement, by reason whereof such wilfull misdoers insued. He died in the yeare of our Lord 764, after he had continued his reigne ouer the Scottish men the space of thirtie yeares, his bodie being buried in Colmekill with all fanerall obsequies.

As successor, the foresaid Eugenius the eight that was the sonne of king Mor-dake, was invested king in Argile with such pompe and ceremonies as in that case appertained, and immediatlie thereupon he hasted forth to catch Donald of the Fles, not resting till at length he had caught him, though that came not to passe without some losse of his people. After he had taken both him and his chiefest complices, he put them openlie to death; neither so satisfied, he caused Mor-dake to be arraigned, who confessing himselfe partlie guiltie of such things as were laie to his charge for mainteining of the fore-said Donald, he likewise suffered death, and his goods being valued and diuided into parts, were bestowed amongst the commons of Galloway, in recompense of such losses, as through his contriued fallshood they had sustained. Also he did put Donald, Collan, and Contrath to their fines, for that they did suffer Donald to rob & spoile without chastisement.

Through which causing of iustice thus to be executed, in reliefe of his commons, he wan him won-derfull loue, not onlie in Galloway, but also throughout all his realme; and therewith were offenders put in such feare, that they durst in no place commit anie such misdoers against the simple and meaner people. And for the more increase of his subiects wealth, he also continued the league with the Picts, Britains, and Englishmen, accordinglie as his late predecessour had done. But yet, as the nature of man through licentious libertie is euer readie to offend in one point or other, so it came to passe by this worthy prince Eugenius, who in such wise as is before exprest, reigning in peace and quietnesse a-mongest his louing subiects, yet fell into most vile lust to accomplish his insatiable fleshlie concupis-cence, seeking all means he could deuise to deflowre young virgins and honest matrons, and that as well those of the nobilitie as other. And such companions as could best further his purpose in that behalfe, and deuise new means and waies of fleshlie companie, those he set by, and greatlie made of, delisting altogither to haue them in his companie.

Thus being downed in lecherous lust, and filthie concupiscence, he fell dailie in more greuous vices, as into exccellue couetousnesse and beastlie crueltie, consenting to make awaie his wealthie subiects, to the end he might inioy their goods. This wickednesse remained not long unpunished, for the lords and pères of his realme, perceiving how he proceeded dailie in his abhominable and tyrannicall doings, not once giuing eare to the wholesome aduertise-ments either of God or man, they slew him one day amongest them as he sat in iudgement about to haue condemned a great rich man, though not guiltie in the crime whereof he was accused. They caused also a great companie of those mates to be apprehended, which had bene of his counsell, and prouokers vnto all his wicked and vile doings. Which to the great contentation of the people were hanged, as they had well deserued. And such was the end of Eugenius, after he had gouerned the kingdome about thre yeares: his bodie was buried in Colmekill amongst his ancessors, though the people thought it little worthy of that honor, which had misused it selfe so inordinatlie in this present life.

After him came the administration of the realme vnto Fergus the third, the sonne of king Ethfne, in the yere 767, who being established in the same, began frellie to practise all kinds of vices, which most abundantly reigned in him, howbeit till that day wonderfullie dissembled and kept couert.
He seemed to strue how to passe his predecessour in all points of wickednesse. He toke no regard at all to the governement of his realme, but gaue himselfe to exccellue gluttonie, in deuouring of delicate meats and drinks, and therewith kept such a number of vile strumpets in house with him, whome he used as concubines, that his wife was no better esteemed than as an handmaid, or rather a kitchen-maid. Who being a woman of great modestie, and sober aduisednesse, could not yet but take some grafe and indignation hereat: and therefore sundrie times assailed by way of wholesome persuasions, to turne his mind from such sinfull vices and filthie trade of liuing.

Finallie, when she saw there was no hope to conuert his depraued mind, nor by anie means to reforme him, but that the more she laboured to do good upon him, the wofe he was, through verie displeasure of such injuries as the bailie sustained at the hands of his concubines, the found meanes to strangle him secretly one night as he lay in bed, choosing rather to be without a husband, than to have one that should devalue hir of the right and dutie of marriage; and that in such sort, as she must be faine to suffer the reproch daile before hir face, being misused of them whom he kept as paramours in most despitefull manner. The day after the wofe brought this feat, the bodie being found dead, was apparelled in funerall wofe, and brought forth into the place of iudgement, where inquisition was freidlie made what that they were that had done so heinous a deed. For though there were but few that lamented his death, yet some of his friends were verie earnest to have the matter tried forth, that such as had committed the murder might suffer due punishment.

Suspicious persons are racked.

Manie were apprehended and had to the racke, but yet could none be found that would confesse it. The quene was void of all suspition, as she that had bene taken for a woman at all times of great temperancie. But yet, when she heard that a number of innocent persons were tormented without desert, for lamenting (as should appeare) their miserable case, she came basilie into the iudgement hall, and getting hir aloft upon the bench, there, in the presence of all the companie, she had these or the like words unto the whole assemblie. I know not (god people) I know not what god moueth me, or what diuine reuengement bereth me with sundrie thoughts and cogitations; that of all this day and morning preceding, I haue had neither rest in bodie nor mind. And verelie when I heard that certaine guiltlesse persons were cruellie tormented here in your presence; had not wrath giuen place, partlie unto modestie, whereof I must confesse there is left but a small portion in me, I had forthwith rid my selfe out of the way. The kings death was mine act. Conscience constraineth me (setting apart mine owne safegard) to confesse the truth, least the guiltlesse should wrongfullie perish: therefore understand ye for truth, that none of them whom ye haue examined are pinnie to the offense. I verelie am she, that with these wicked hands haue strangled this night last past Fergus, about whose death I see you in trouble, moued so to doo with two as sharpe prickes as may rest in a woman, to wit, impatient for bearing of carnall lust, & iresall wrath. Fergus by his continuall using of concubines, kept from me the due debt that the husband oweth to the wife: whereupon when there was no hope to reconcile him with often aduertisements, vehement force of anger rising in my hart, droue me to doo so wicked a deed. I thought rather therefore to dispatch the adulterer, than (being destitute of my husband, & defrauded of all quene-like honoz) to live still subiect to the perpetuall injuries of such lewd women as he kept & used in my stead. Those ye therefore those that be accused of the kings death, & as for me ye shall not need to proceed against me as guiltie of the crime by order of law: for I that was so bold to commit so heinous an act, will accordingly do execution upon my selfe even here incontinente in presence of you all: what honoz is due to the dead, woe you to that. ¶ Having thus made an end of hir tale, she plucked forth a knife which she had hid vnder hir gowne, and stroke hir selfe to the heart with the same, falling dead vpon it downe to the ground. All such as were present wondered greatlie at hir stout and hardie stomach, speaking diuerlie thereof, as some in praise, and some in dispraise of these hir monstrous doings. The bodie of Fergus was caried forth to the Ile of Colmekill, and there buried in the third yere after his entring into

Spot contented herewith, he gathered a number of ships together, wherein transporting himselfe with a great armie ouer into Lozne and Cantire, made great waiffe and spoile of those countreies, till Duthguball gouernoz of Athole, and Culane of Argyle, being sent with a chosen power from the king to defend the countrie, chanced to encounter with him, and putting him with his people into flight, chased them to such a streit, as there there was no way to get forth, save onlie that by which they entered. This place is in Lozne, with a streit passage to enter into it: but when ye are within it, the same is verie large and broad, inatrolled about with craggie mountains, chained together with a continuall ridge, a deepe river compassing them in beneath in the bottom, with such steepe & doelong banks, that there is no way to passe forth of the same, but by that through which ye must enter into it. The said Duthguball with his folks being entred at vntwares into such a streit, and perceiving there was no way to issue forth, but by the same where he entred, he returned backe thither, and finding the passage closed from him by his enemies, he was in a wonderfull maze, not knowing what shift to make to escape. Finallie, falling to counsell with the chieffest of his armie vpon the danger present, and so continuing for the space of two daies without anie conclusion available, on the third day diuine of necessitie through hunger, they required of their enemies to be recetued as yelded men vpon what conditions they would prescribe, onelie hauing their liues assured. But when this would not be granted, in the euening tide they rushed forth vpon their enemies, to trie if by force they might haue passed through them. But such was their hap, that there they died euerie mothers son: so for had Duthguball & Culane commanded, to the end that other rebels might take example by such their wilfull and rebellious outrage.

The kings captains after this passing ouer into the Iles, brought all things there into the former state of quietnesse. Yet after the appealing of this tumult, there chanced a new businesse in Galloway: for Gillequhalme, sonne to that Donald, which (as ye haue heard) was executed by commandement of Eugenius the eight, gathered together a great number of vnglourious scape-graces, & did much hurt and mischief in the countrie. But shortly after, being banquished by the same captains that had suppressed the other rebels of the Iles, the countrie was rid of that trouble, and the ring-leaders punished by death for their offences. In this meane while, the Englishmen & Welsh Britains through multitude of kings and rulers warring each against other, had no leisure to attempt anie enterpryse against strangers. Neither were the Brits free of some secret displeasures, which one part of them had conceived against another, so that the Scottishmen were not troubled at all by anie foreine enemies. And so Solothius having continued his reigne the space of 20 yeeres, about the end of that tearme departed this life, in the yeere of our saluation 788.

Then after Solothius was once buried in Colmekill amongst his ancessors, Achatus the son of king Ethline (a man highlie renowned for his earnest zeale to iustice and by right dealing) was advanced to the governance of the realme: who for that by his former conuersation amongst the nobilitie, he perfectly understood what grudge and secret hatred remained in their hearts, one wishing anothers destruction; he foresaw what danger the commonwealth stood in, if the same were not by some good means qualified: and therupon calling them together, he handled the matter with such wisdom and dexterity, that before their departure from him, all the roots of former displeasures being utterly extirped and avoided, they were made friends on each side, and promised in his presence so to continue. Thus having laid the foundation of a quiet state amongst his subiects, now in the beginning of his reigne, he was at point to haue had no small warres with the Irishmen: for a number of them being arrived in Cantire, were there slaine by them of the westerne Isles, which upon request of the inhabitants of that countrie were come to aid them against those Irishmen.

This losse the rulers of the Irish nation purposed in all hast to reuenge upon them of the Isles. But Achatus hearing thereof, sent ouer an ambassage vnto them, to haue the matter taken by before anie further force were used: alledging how there was no cause therfore warres should be moued for such a matter, where the occasion had bene giuen but by a sort of rousers on either side, without commandement or warrant obtained from anie of their superiours. Howbeit the nobles of Ireland (for there was no king amongst them at that time as it chanced) moued altogether with indignation for the slaughter of their countrimen, made a direct answer, that they would suerlie be reuenged of the reproch which they had receiued, before they would common of anie peace. And therefore whilst the Scottish ambassadors returned out of Ireland with this answer, a great number of them in ships and craters passed ouer into Fla, where getting together a great preie, and franghting their vessels therewith, as they were returning home wards, they were sonke by force of tempest, so that neither ship nor man returned to bring tidings home how they had sped in Scotland.

The stout stomachs of the Irish lords and rulers being well qualified with this mischance, they were glad to seeke for peace shortly after vnto Achatus. Those also that were sent ouer to treat of the same, found him at Cnuerlochthee; where hauing declared their message, & confessed how iustlie they had bene punished by the righteous iudgement of almighty God, for the wrongfull attempting of the warres against them that had not deserued it: Achatus answered, how the Irish nation was so stubborn, that they knew not how to vse reason, except they were throughlie scourged; and therefore had the righteous God taken iust reuenge upon them, to the example of other, for their contumacie, in mouing warres against them that had so earnestlie sought for peace. Fewer thelesse, setting apart all iniuries past, as well new as old, to shew himselfe to be the follower of Christ, who in so manie passages had passed, commended, and set forth vnto vs peace and tranquillitie, he was contented to grant them peace, which now they sued for. Thus was the peace renewed betwixt the Scottish and Irish nations, to the no lesse comfort of the Scots themselves, than of the Irishmen, as those that had learned now by experience and triall (hauing inioied peace a good season) how much the same was to be preferred before cruell warres.

In this meane time, Charles surnamed the great, as then reigning in France, and understanding how the Englishmen did not onlie by dalleie routing disquiet the seas, to the great danger of all such merchants and other as trauelled alongst the coasts of France and Germanie; but also now and then coming on land upon the French dominions, did manie notable displeasures to his subiects: he thought good by the aduise of his peeres, to conclude a league (if it were possible) with the Scots and Brits, with this article amongst the residue: That so oft as the Englishmen should attempt any enterpryse or invasion into France, the Scots and Brits should be ready freightwaies to invade them here at home; and when they should make anie warres against the Scots or Brits, then the Frenchmen should take vpon them to invade the west parts of England.

There were sent therefore from Charles vnto Achatus certeine ambassadors to bring this matter to passe, who arriving in Scotland, and coming to the kings presence, declared effectualitie the summe of their message, shewing that the conclusion of such a league should be no lesse to the wealth of the Frenchmen, than of the Scots (considering Englishmen to be a people most desirous of all other to get into their hands other mens goods and possessions) for thereby they might be somewhat restrained from such bold and inturious enterprises, as they dalleie toke in hand against their christian neighbors: but it should make most of all (say they) for the advancement of the whole christian commonwealth, whereas otherwise through their insolent doings, such force as was already prepared against the Saracens (the common enemies of the christians) should be called backe, therewith to keepe off the said Englishmen, to the great danger of those parts of christendome, upon which the Saracens then bordered as neighbors.

This message being heard with good deliberation by such as were present, the ambassadors themselves being honorable personages, and graue of countenance, were receiued most louingly of the king, and lodged in his owne palace, hauing all the chere and honorable intertainment that might be deuised: but touching their message, there were sundrie disputations amongst the nobles, whether the concluding of such a league as they required, were expedient for the Scottish commonwealth or not. And for that the matter seemed to be doubtful, the king thought it necessarie to haue the aduise of his counsell: and thereupon calling them together, and appointing diuers of them to go with the ambassadors on hunting, to shew them some sport, whilst he consulted with the residue (because he would not haue them present) he commanded one Colman, gouernor of Spar (a man of great authority amongst the Scottishmen for his approved wisdom) to say first his mind touching the request of those French ambassadors, who thereupon standing forth, began as followeth.

No man ought to maruell, I perceiue, king Achatus, if manie of this our nation be desirous to haue this league concluded with the Frenchmen, as they that are persuaded how nothing can be better, nothing more profitable, more honorable, or more pleasant pleasant to almightie God; than to ioine in league and friendship with a nation of greatest power and wealth in these daies, of all other within the bounds of Europe: for by that meanes should the Scottish name be highlie renowned and spoken of through the whole world. But trulie these considerations contenting so well at the first, are not so much to be regarded as the evils which hereafter may grow thereupon: for suerlie a naughtie and pernicious end of this determination shall euidentlie teach vs (though to late) how farre we haue gone beside the way of reason in establisshing this league, if we once consent to conclude the same. Is it anie other thing (I beseech you) to make a league, and to ioine in socie-tie with the Frenchmen against our neighbors the Englishmen (whose friendship might be most expedient for vs) than euen to haue from henceforth a nere and in manner a domesticall enemie at hand, whereas our supposed friends shall be farre off from vs, and separated from our countrie by a great and large sea, at whose pleasure also we must make wars against our neighbors, and fight for other mens safeguards, putting our bodies in hazard of death and wounding for their cause, which diuelli nothing nere vs; yea & in their quarell to commit our kingdome, goods and liues vnto extreme perill of vtter destruction: I would thinke it good therefore to take better adulment and deliberation herein, least whilst we seek for baine glorie and counterfeite honor, we do not, through prouoking the Englishmen our next neighbors, lose our owne liberties got with much trauell by our elders, for the which they so often fought with the Britains, Romans, Picts, and final-lie with the Saxons. Can there be anie thing more pernicious vnto a free nation, and people bozne in libertie, than to measure labors of peace, chances of warre, and in fine libertie it selfe, by the lust and pleasure of another nation, and so to enter (as it were) into bondage: for the auoiding whereof, not onelie men, but also all other liuing things are ready to fight, euen to the vttermost. If the Frenchmen in the chiefest heat and most earnest hount of the warre (which we shall take in hand for their sake, according to the articles of the league) shall chance to forsake vs, and conclude some manner of peace or league with our enemies, leauing vs in all the whole danger; shall we haue anie iudge afoze whome we maie bzing them to answer for their default, and by whose authoritie they may be constrained to see vs satisfied for such losse and iniuries as we shall happlie susteine at the Englishmens hands: Are we of that force and power to reuenge our wrongs vpon them, after we are vanquished and in manner brought to vtter confusion by those warres which we shall enter into for their cause: If euer we be brought vnto that point (as God forbid we should) that through want of substance, and decaye of force, the Frenchmen shall also vtterlie forsake vs, & that thereby we shall not bee able to resist the English puissance: afoze whome (I beseech you) shall we accuse them for breaking of this league: We shall daillie haue to do with our enemies after the conclusion of the league (if it be concluded at all) and but seldome times with our friends. In the midst of our enemies we shall be still occasioned to practise for our defense, where we haue a long way both by sea and land to passe ouer to our friends, in case anie need shall inforce vs therevnto: commodities are brought vs out of Spaine, France, and Germanie, not such as we desire, but onlie such as the Englishmen do permit. Againe, when our merchants shall passe into France, what hauens shall we leaue them to resort vnto in time of dangerous tempests, which often chance to all such as use sailing: Either must they perill and be cast a way through rage of seas, either else fall into the hands of our enemies together, with all their goods and freight. What discommodities hereof shall rise, your grace (most prudent prince) and you right circumspet counsellors, do well inough perceiue. I therefore would thinke it expedient, that we should continue in the former peace concluded with the Britains, Saxons, and Picts, according to the custome of our late predecessors, who saw well inough that was most beneficiall for the wealth of the Sco-tish nation, and not to couet a new amitie with an vnknowne people, hauing deserued little or nothing as yet at our hands (whose intent I cannot but haue in suspicion, with they seek for amitie so farre off) except we shall manifestlie resolue with our selues to imploie and leopord both life and libertie for the safe-gard of the French, without regard of our owne.

& Spanie in that assemblie shewed themselves sore offended with Colmans words, supposing the league with the Frenchmen to be both honozable and necessarie.

Then one Alban, a man of great nobilitie (whome the king had latelie before instituted his lieutenant in the Isles) spake in this manner. If it were possible that there might be one sure and inuolable consent amongst those foure people, which at this daie haue their habitations within the bounds of Albion, or that the Englishmen knew what it were to stand and abide by faith and promises made and giuen, we would not denie but that those considerations and aduiſes which Colman hath here vttered, ought to be followed; bicause that then there should be no occasion at all, why we should conclude anie league with a nie foreign nation. But forsomuch as there was neuer man that found more vntruth and breach of promise in anie nation, than hath bene found in these Saxons (the which hauing got the rule in Albion, are now called Englishmen) as the Scots, Picts, and Britains haue by triall sufficientlie proued; I suppose it is euidentlie knowne vnto you, that either we must of necessitie fight and stand at defense against the Englishmen, ready to assaile vs both with open force and secret craft, either els linke our selues with such allies and confederats, as by their support we maie be the better able to withstand the malice of such vnfaithfull people. Call ye this faith, or treason, I prate you: The Saxons in times past being requie-sted of the Britains to aid them against their enimies, were most louinglie receiued, and highlie rewarded for their seruice: but they contrarilie in recompense of such kindnesse, shewed themselves in stead of aiders, enemies; in stead of defenders, destruc-ters: turning their weapons points against the Britains, by whome they had bene so sent for to their aid; and now haue not onelie destroyed a great number of them by fire and sword, but also they haue spoiled them of their kingdome & libertie. What league or truce haue they at anie time kept (you your selues are not ignorant of this which I speake) where either they saw occasion to vex their neighbors, or hoped to gaine anie thing by falsifying their faiths, as they that haue neuer bene ashamed so to do, where hope to haue commoditie (if I may so call it) hath at anie hand bene offered. Into what sundrie and most miserable calamities hath the trecherie of the Saxons brought the illie Britains: How oftentimes haue they broken the peace establisshed with vs, and also with the Picts; euen when we least thought vpon anie such thing: Yea and that more is, amongst them selues at this season the Englishmen warre one against another, more with craftie traines than with open force, in such wise that in Northumberland so manie kings, and so manie noble men haue bene traitorously murdered and made auaite, that scarce

To induce others to his purpose, he taketh the advantage of casual hap, charging the whole nation with the fault of a few particular persons.

" may there be anie found that will take upon him the supreme gouernement of that countrey. It is not manie yerres ago, since Edwin king of that countrey was rid out of the waite through treason of Oswie that succeeded him in the kingdome, and was after deppriued both of life and kingdome by Drike, whome Egbert desirous to reigne in his place, found meanes by traitorous practise to dispatch. Egbert was slaine by Oswie, and Oswie by Alfred, which Alfred was after slaine by the guilefull craft of Ethelbert. Neither had Ethelbert anie better successe in the end, for now of late betrayed by his owne subiects, he was by them shamefullie slaine and murthered. Neither with lesse traitorous shifts and deulces do the Englishmen mainteine their warres in all places where they are inhabiting within Albion. The reuerend fathers of the spiritualtie, and other goodlie men addicted to vertue, vnto whom the setting forth of Gods word hath bene committed, wearie of and abhorring this woad madnesse, rage and wicked demeanour of that nation, haue left their bishopps, abbeyes, monasteries, and cels, and from thence haue remoued into foren regions. Therefore where the Englishmen do absteine at this present from making vs warres, it is not to be imputed to anie reuerence they haue vnto faith, equitie, or respect of the league, which they haue made with vs, but onelie vnto such ciuill sedition and discord, as now doth reigne amongst them. Neither ought anie of vs of right to doubt, but that when the same once ceaseth, they will immediatlie take weapon in hand against vs, notwithstanding all leagues or covenants of peace confirmed to the contrarie. To repress therefore and abate their subtill practises, I can find no readier meane than to enter into friendship, and conclude a league with that people, which being ioined with vs, may chastise such outrageous furie of this wicked nation, as cause and oportunitie shall require. Fortune hath offered vnto vs a conuenient meane and occasion hereunto. For here be at this present the French kings ambassadoys, offering that vnto vs, which being so great a benefit we might scarce wish for. What is, they require to haue vs to ioine in league against the Englishmen, with their king, whome France, Spaine, and no small part of Germany do acknowledge for their souereigne. Dought this to be despised of men that haue their perfect senses? Dought the societie of the French nation to be refused of vs, inhabiting here in the vttermost parts of the earth, the same being frelie offered by them, vnto whom for their sincere faith both towards God and man, the large empire of the world is granted? So that if we shall thankfullie receiue this most notable benefit, the same shall purchase vnto vs the friendship of the Spaniards, Frenchmen, Germans, and all those nations which acknowledge king Charles for their head and souereigne lord. Hereupon also free passage for merchants shall be open, to passe to and fro vnto vs, with all kind of merchandises and wares of traffike. I trust therefore that euerie one of you (so that he wele the thing with himselfe thoughtlie) will easilie iudge that the friendship and societie of the Frenchmen (verie puissant both by sea and land) and thereto of approued faith and stedfastnesse in promise, ought more to be esteemed, and is more beneficiall to the Scottish commonwealth, than the vntiedfast promises and great dissolutie of the Sarons. To which of you is it vnknewne that the English nation studieth no lesse to bring vs vnder the yoke of seruitude, than they do the Welshmen, if their force might answer direatlie to their wills? Therefore if we desire to auoid the violent power of most cruell enemies, if we meane to auoid their craftie practises, if we regard the christian religion, for the which the Frenchmen are continually in arms, if we set more by vertue and constancie than by vnfaithfulness and breach of covenants and promises, if we labor for the gloxie and honor of our nation, if we couet to aduance our countrey, our owne rest, and quietnesse; and to be brieue, if we passe vpon life and libertie, the most dearest things that may happen to man, let vs with ioisfull harts establish this league with the Frenchmen, and firmelie continue in the same, vpon assured trust and confidence that it shall bring perpetuall commoditie and renoume to vs, both for the safegard of our realme, and restraint of the Englishmens vnlawfull attempts and longfull iniuries, which hereafter they either shall or may at any time enterprise against vs. By this oration Albion drew the multitude easilie vnto his purpose.

Then Achaius vnderstanding how the minds of all his subiects were in manner wholie inclined to the league, commanded all the companie to be there in the same place againe the next day. And so breaking vp their assemble for that time, the king made the French ambassadoys that night a coslie supper with a banket, and after hauing conference with his nobles and lords of the counsell, it was agreed by generall consent amongst them, that for the solempne ratifying of this league with king Charles, according as he had required, there should go with his ambassadoys at their returne the lord William the brother of king Achaius, with foure other honorable and learned personages, being men of perfect knowledge and skill, and such as were esteemed most meet for such a purpose. Also, that they should take foure thousand men ouer with them to serue against the infidels and enemies of the christian religion, where and in such sort as king Charles should appoint them.

Whereupon the next day going first to church, and there making their common supplications vnto almighty God, according to the rites and ancient customs, they after resorted vnto the counsell chamber, where Achaius opened and declared vnto the French ambassadoys all that was concluded by him, and other the estates of his realme, touching the message which they had brought from king Charles. Who reioicing (as should appere) greatlie hereat, gaue most hartie thanks vnto him, and to all the residue for their beneuolent wills herein shewed towards king Charles their maister, and all the French nation. After this, remaining certeine daies with Achaius, who made them all the chere that might be imagined, they departed towards Hungus king of the Isles, vnto whom at their comming to his presence they made the like request on their maisters behalfe, which they had made before vnto Achaius.

It is said that Hungus gaue the Frenchmen most hartie thanks for their good wills, but yet he would not grant to conclude anie league with them at that time, for that (as he alledged) the matter being weightie and of great importance, required no small time to deliberate and take aduise for a full resolution therein. The ambassadoys hereupon returned vnto Achaius without speed of their purpose with Hungus, and the second moneth after, all things being ready for their returne, and the passage of those that should go with them, the lord William the kings brother, together with the same ambassadoys, & such foure persons as the king had chosen forth amongst all the learned clergie of his realme (whose names were Clement, John, Raban, and Alcuine) and also hauing with him those foure thousand men of war, which were at the first appointed to go with him, passed forth towards France, where he with all the whole companie landed within few daies after in safetie, according to their owne wished desires. Shortlie after also at the request of the Scottish ozabetwixt the Frenchmen and Scots was solemnlie chiefest articles compiled in this league were as fol-necessarie. The Frenchmen should contrariwise aid the Scots in time of wars against the Englishmen at their owne proper costs and charges. Whatsoeuer he were, priuat person or publike of these two confederat nations, that against either of them should aid the Englishmen with armour, counsell, bittels, or in anie other manner of wise, the same should be reputed for a traitor vnto both their princes and countries. Neither might either of them conclude a peace, or take anie truce without the consent of the other. These were the principall articles of the league, as then confirmed betwixt the Scots and Frenchmen, indited in Latine, and faire ingrossed in parchment, and referued as a monument in both realmes, for a witnesse vnto such as should come after of this friendship thus begun, as the Scottish chronicles affirme.] And for further memorie of the thing, Achais did augment his armes, being a red lion in a field of gold, with a double trace seamed with floure delices, signifieng thereby, that the lion from thence forth should be defended by the aid of the Frenchmen; & that the Scottish kings should valiantlie fight in defense of their countrie, liberties, religion, and innocencie, which are represented by the lilles, or floure delices, as heralds do interpret it. The lord William, the said Clement, and John, remained still with king Charles, but Kabane & Alcuine returned into their countrie. In all such warres and iournies as Charles afterwards made against anie of his enemies, the said lord William was a chiefe dower in the same, so that his fame and authoritie dailie grew in all places where he came. His seruice stood king Charles in notable stead in his expeditiōs against the Sarons, Hungarians, and other; but namelie his estimation in Italie was most highlie aduanced, at what time the said Charles reedified the citie of Florence, apoin-ting this William to be his lieutenant in Luscan, and to haue the chiefe charge for the refozoyng of the said citie, which he with such diligence applied, that withyn short time the same was not onelie fortifed with new walls, repared and replenished with great numbers of houses, churches, and other beautifull buildings, but also peopled and furnished with citizens, a great companie of nobles and gentlemen being called thither out of euerie citie and towne thereabouts for that purpose.

The citie being thus refozoyed to his former estate and dignitie, through the bounteous benefit of king

Charles, and the diligent administration of his lieutenant the foresaid William, the citizens to shew themselues thankefull, deuised for a perpetuall memorie to beare in their armes a red lillie, resembling one of those which the kings of France giue, saue that it differed in colour, to testifie thereby, that their citie (after the destruction therof by the Goths) was reedified and refozoyed to the former dignitie, by the benefit of the Frenchmen. And to acknowledge the diligence herein of the lieutenant, they did institute publike plaies to be vsed and celebrated etierie yeere, wherein with manie pompous ceremonies they crowne a lion. And further that there should be kept vpon the charges of the treasure within the ci-tie certeine lions (for the foresaid lord William gaue a lion for his cognisance) and therevpon as the Scottish chronicles affirme, those beaſts grew to be had in such honoz amongst the Florentines. Thus this valiant capteine, the foresaid lord William, passing his time in notable exercises, and worthy feats of chualtrie vnder king Charles, is accounted in the number of those twelue martiall warriors, which are called commonlie by the Scottishmen, Scotelgillmoze.

And for that he was continuallie occupied in warres, he was neuer married, whetvpon growing in age, and purposing to make Christ his heire, he builded diuers abbies and monasteries both in Ita-lie and Germanie, richlie indowning the same with lands and rents, sufficient for the finding of such number of monks, as he appointed to be in the said abbies, wherein none might be admitted, according to the ancient ordinance by him deuised, except he were a Scottishman bozne. In witnesse of which ordinance, there are sundrie of these houses remaining in Almaine euen vnto this day, nothing changed from the first order or institution. Before the accomplishment of these things, by the foresaid lord William, brother (as is said) to the Scottish king Achais, I find that the vniuersities of Paris and Pavia were instituted by king Charles, chiefele by the helpe and means of these two fore-remembered Scottishmen, John and Clement, inſomuch that Clement was appointed chiefe president of all the students at Paris, and John of the other at Pavia.

But now to returne to the other doings of Achais, ye shall vnderſtand, that about the same time, or not much differing from the same, Adelfane the sonne of Ethelwolfe king of Westſarons, taking vpon him the dominion of Kent, Eastſaxon, Mercia, and Northumberland (which Egbert his grandfather had receiued into his gouernement) desirous now to enlarge his kingdome, entred into that part of the Britiſh dominion, which ancientlie bight Deira, and contained the marches about Berwike, alledging how the same apperteined to his kingdome of Northumberland, and had bene fraudulentlie taken from his ancessors by the Brits: but forſomuch as there was a commotion raised the same time in Mercia, he was called backe to appease it, and here-vpon putting all to the fire and sword in Deira, saving such prisoners as he brought away with him, he returned. Hungus the Britiſh king ſore ſoma-ching this inſolent enterpriſe of the Englishmen, determined to reuenge the same in all poſſible haſt, and therefore made inſtant ſute vnto Achais (who had married his ſiſter) to haue his aid against them.

Achais of his owne accord minding to do the Englishmen a diſpleaſure, ſent forthwith vnto Hungus to the number of ten thousand men. With which, and with his owne power, king Hungus inuaied the borders of Northumberland, ſetching from thence a great bottie of goods and prisoners; but yet he forbore ſlaughtering of men, and burning of houses,

houses, for a reuerence which he had, as is supposed, towards the christian religion. Athelstane being certified hereof, omitting his iournie into Mercia, turned all his power against the Picts: and hearing that they were withdrawen into their countrie, he followed them so nere at the heeles, that verie earlie in one morning he was upon their backs where they lodged by a broke side, not passing two miles from Whaddington, before they had anie knowledge of his approach. Athelstane upon a fierce courage, hauing thus found his enemies according to his wished desire, and herewith comming upon them in such order of battell, as they had no waie forth to escape without fight, he commanded a proclamation to be made by one of his heralds, that all the whole number of the Picts should passe by the edge of the sword.

The Picts thus seeing their enemies at hand, and hearing this cruell commandement, were wonderfullie amazed with the strangenesse of the thing, and oppressed so with feare, that they wist not what might be best for them to do. At length by commandement of Hungus their king, they fell unto fortifying of their campe; but yet they quicklie perceived how that it would not long preuaile them, considering that their enemies had gotten into their hands not onelie the spoile which they had brought with them out of Northumberland, but also all other their prouision, trulle, and baggage, which they had left in a field there adioining unto the side of their campe. Whereupon manie reasons were put forth amongst them, which way they might escape out of that present danger. In which meane time Athelstane hauing brought his people into good order of battell, prouoked the Picts to come forth of their strength into the plaine field, there to trie their forces. But for that day no notable thing was done; the Picts keeping themselves still within their campe.

In the night following, after sundrie consultations had amongst them, it was agreed by generall consent, that the next day they should giue battell to the Englishmen. And so hereupon preparing themselves for the purpose, euen upon the breake of the day, forward they make towards their enemies with fierce willes, spectallie incouraged thereto by the comfortable words of Hungus. The Englishmen halfe amazed at the hardie approach and onset of the Picts, were not long able to susteine their foie impression; so that beginning somewhat to swaue, at length they were forced to flee unto the place, where ye heard how they toke the baggage and spoile of the Pictish campe: where they were beaten downe in greater numbers than before, insomuch that such prisoners as they had before taken of them that kept the said spoile, greatlie now to aduance the victorie of their fellows, shewed more crueltie towards the Englishmen than anie of the rest, now that they saw once how the victorie was inclined to the Pictish side.

In fine, such slaughter was made, that of the whole English host which was there assembled, there bineth escaped fure hundred. Athelstane himselfe at the first was run through the bodie with a speare, and so died, giuing name to the place of the battell, which continueth euen unto this date, being called Athelstans forð. This victorie fell to the Picts by miracle: for in the night season, as Hungus was laid downe to sleepe (after it was agreed that they should giue battell) there appeared unto him the apostle saint Andrew (as the tale goeth) promising him and his people victorie against their enemies on the day next following; and for an assured token thereof, he told him that there should appeare ouer the Pictish host in the element such a fashioned crosse, as he sometime suffered vpon. Hungus awakened, and beholding the skie, saw the crosse, as the apostle had told him: whereupon calling his people together, he not onelie shewed them the same sight, but also declared vnto them that vision had appeared vnto him in his sleepe; willing them therefore to be of good comfort, sith there was cause of such assured hope to haue assistance from above against their cruell enemies.

The signe of the foresaid crosse was not onelie scene of the Picts and Scots being there with them in aid, to both their great comforts and gladnesse, but also of the Englishmen to their no lesse discouragement, as they that vnderstood saint Andrew to be patrone and protector of the Scottish and Pictish nations. For it did put such a feare into their hearts, that when they came to the point of ioining, their stomachs so failed them, that with small resistance they were easilie vanquished (as is said) and put to flight. For this so manifest a miracle, after the battell was once ended, and the victorie obtained, Hungus repaied with his people following him, vnto the church of that blessed man saint Regulus, now called saint Andrewes, where they made their offerings with humble deuotion vnto the reliques of the apostle, rendering thanks vnto him for their victorie with deuout prayer after the accustomed manner. They bowed there also at the verie same time (as the same goeth) that from thenceforth as well they as their posteritie in time of war should weare a crosse of saint Andrew for their badge and cognisance. Which ordinance continuallie after remained with the Picts, and after their destruction and extermination with the Scots euen vnto our time. The bodie of Athelstane was buried in the next church vnto the place where the field was fought, howbeit, some haue left in writing that his head was cut off from the bodie, and brought to Inchgaruic, where being set vpon a stake, it was shewed to the people in reproch of his inuiolent enterprise.

Hungus the Pictish king to shew himselfe yet more mindfull of the due honoring of the holie apostle, by whose aid he acknowledged himselfe to haue got the victorie aforesaid, not onelie augmented his church with new bildings & needfull reparations, but increased the number of priests for the celebrating of diuine seruice; he also gaue manie rich and costlie ornaments vnto the same, as chalices, cruets, basons, & such like. Moreover, he caused to be made the images of Christ and his 12 apostles of fine gold and silver, which he bestowed there; with a case also of beaten gold, therein to inclose the reliques of saint Andrew. And besides this, he ordeined that the spirituallie should haue the tenths of all increase of goods: as of cozne, cattels, herbage, and such like through his realme; and further that spirituall persons should not be compelled to answer before anie temporall iudge. But these beneficiall priuiledges the Pictish clergie did not long inioy. For Feredeth that was the fourth, which reigned amongst the Picts after Hungus, toke from them all such gifts as this Hungus had giuen them, and further ordeined to the derogation of their priuiledges, that they should answer for secular crimes afore secular magistrates; and that liuing vpon their former reuenues, soldiers & men of war should inioy the other which Hungus, had so frelie bestowed vpon them.

The nobles of the land maintained Feredeth in his doings, reckoning all that spirituall persons had to be but cast away, which was the cause (as some thought) that their kingdome came into such ruine, as shortly after followed. Where be some chronicles that write how these things, which are mentioned of Hungus, and Athelstane, chanced not altogether about about this season, but Hector Boetius folloiweth Veremond in most of his accounts, as the author whom he taketh to be most certeine, as well for the account of the time as in the course of the whole historie. And for that we meane not to presume wholie to derogate the same Boetius his credit, we haue not much dissent from him, but rather followed him in most places, leauing such doubts as may be worthilie put forth of that which he writeth, vnto the consideration of the diligent reader, sith it is not our purpose to impugne, but rather to report what we find writtten by others, except now and then by the way to admonish the reader of some vnlikelihoods (as the same dooth seeme to vs and others) and happilie not without iust occasion.

But now to our purpose. As well Hungus king of Picts, as Achaisus king of Scots, after the overthrow and death of Athellane, liued with their people in good quiet and rest: for the Englishmen attempted nothing against the Scots and Picts afterwards, during the time of their reignes. At length Achaisus, after he had reigned 32 yeares, departed this life, in the yeare of our Lord 819, which was about the first yeare of Hungus his dominion ouer the Picts. His bodie was buried in Colmekill, according to the maner of kings amongst his predecessours. In the daies of this Achaisus (beside Clement and others, of whome before ye haue heard) liued bishop Ceruadius a notable preacher in Murray land, also bishop Glacian with Apoban and Apedan two brethren, all doctors and men of singular knowledge, in respect whereof they were had in great credit and estimation with the people.

A severe punisher of malefactors.

Alpine constrained by the nobles, taketh vpon him to be crowned king.

Alpine binuiling to receiue the crowne fled.

Alpine was iustilie receiued of Dongall.

After the deceasse of Achaisus, Conuall that was his vnckles sonne Dongall, the brother of king Ethelne, succeeded in gouernement of the Scottish kingdome. Betwixt this Conuall and Hungus the Pictish king, there was wonderfull loue and amitie shewed, both of them studieng by all means how to mainteine the ancient league and alliance betwixt their people, whereupon ensued great wealth and quietnesse vnto both their kingdoms. Finally Hungus waxed with a continuall consumption decayed, deliuering by his kingdome into the hands of his sonne Doxstologus, and that in the presence of king Conuall, who likewise liued not long after him, for in the first yeare of his reigne he likewise departed out of this world, by force of naturall sickness.

Dongall the sonne of king Soluastius was receiued to succeed by the common consent of the states of all the realme, a man of singular wisdom and great knowledge. But for that he was somewhat seuer in punishing the misordered behaviours of the nobilitie, and misgouerned youth of his realme, diuers of the nobles conspired against him, forcing one Alpine the sonne of Achaisus to make claime to the crowne; who perceiuing there was no remedie, but either to follow their minds, or else to be murdered amongst them, consented to go with them into Argile, where they purposed to crowne him king sitting vpon the chaire of marble, according to the manner. Howbeit, at his comming into that countrie, he found means to conuey himselfe from amongst them, least through his means the quiet state of his countrie should be brought into trouble: and forthwith being escaped out of their hands with a few other that were praiue to his intention, he maketh all the hast he could, till he came to the presence of Dongall, who receiued him in most iustill wisse, promising that if it should be thought necessary by the states of the realme, he would gladlie resigne vnto him his whole crowne and dignitie, desirous of nothing more than to see the aduancement of the house of Achaisus. Such (saith he) were the merits of that famous prince towards the preservation of the Scottish common wealth, that it were too much wickednesse to go about to defraud his issue of the inheritance of the realme.

Alpine giuing the king most hartie thanks, besought him to continue in the administration, praising God and the world to witnesse, that he minded nothing lesse than to be about to claime the gouernement of the kingdome so long as he liued. For as touching his offense, in that he had gathered an armie, and led the same into Argile, it was not his fault, but the conspirators which had forced him thereto, being determined to haue slaine him, if he had not consented vnto their desires. Within thre yeares after, there came messengers from the rebels to excuse themselves also, & to put all the fault in Alpine: but king Dongall giuing small credit to their forged words, gathereth his power, and maketh such speed towards the place where he understood the said rebels were assembled together, that he was vpon them yer they had anie knowledge of his setting forwards. So that before they could make anie shift to escape out of danger, which they went about to do, they were apprehended, and immediatlie condemned and put to death. Which execution put other presumptuous persons in feare, so that the state of the realme remained afterward a great deale more in quiet.

Alpine his excuse vnto Dongall.

Dongall maketh an armie against the rebels.

Whilist things passed thus in Scotland, Eganus the second sonne of Hungus the Pictish king, found means to murder his brother Doxstologus, to the end he might reigne in his place: and though support of some of the nobilitie he attained to his purpose. And for that he would assure himselfe the more firmitie in the estate, he franklie bestowed his fathers treasure amongst his lords and chieftest peers of his realme, and toke to wife Bzenia the king of Spercias daughter, whom his brother the forermentioned Doxstologus had married, that thereby he might assuage the said king of Spercias displeasure, which otherwise he should happilie haue conceived for the death of his other sonne in law the same Doxstologus. His feare was great on each side, and therefore had small assistance in anie person, doubting lest one or other should seeke to reuenge his brothers death. He durst neuer go anie waies forth abroad without a guard of men of warre about him, whome he had woone & made his fast friends by his passing great largesse and bountifull liberalitie. At length yet, his wife to reuenge his former husbands death, found means to strangle him as he lay one night fast asleepe, hauing drunk a little too much in the euening before, and in this sort he came to his end, after he had reigned much what about the space of two yeares.

Thus both Eganus & Doxstologus being made away, without leauing anie issue behind them, for so much as now there remained none of the posteritie of Hungus to succeed in gouernement of the Pictish kingdome, Alpine nephue to the said Hungus, by his sister Sfergusiana, with the aduise of king Dongall, made claime thereunto, and ther vpon sent his messengers vnto the lords and peers of the Pictish dominion, to require them on his behalfe, that he might be receiued to the gouernement of the kingdome due vnto him by lawfull inheritance, as they well understood: and that if they throughlie considered of the thing, they might perceiue it was the prouision of almightie God, that for want of lawfull succession lineallie descended from Hungus, now to succeed in the estate of the Pictish kingdome, by this meanes both the nations Scots and Picts should be ioined in one, to the abolishing of all such mortall

The Dixons nobilitie, hauing knowledge that these messengers with such kind of message should shortly come from Alpine, with generall consent and whole agreement, chose one Feredeth to be their king, a man of great authoritie amongst them, sup-10 posing this to be a meane to defeat Alpines title, and that thereby he should seeme to be excluded from any further claime. Within few daies after, came vnto Camelon the Scottish ambassadors, where Feredeth with his nobles at that present were assembled: they being admitted therfore to declare their message, when they began to enter into their matter of the right which Alpine had to the kingdom of the Dixons, the people would not suffer them to proceed anie further therein, but began to make such an uprore, that to appease the noise, Feredeth himselfe took vpon 20 him to make answer vnto the ambassadors: and therbyon commanding silence, declared vnto them that the Dixons neither might nor ought to admit any stranger to reigne ouer them: for there was an ancient law among them, of most high authoritie, that in case of necessitie they might transpore the crowne from house to house: and further, that by the same law there was an ordenance decreed, that if anie man were once made and created king, he might not be deposed during his naturall life. And therfore 30 though it were so, that Alpine were the nephew of Hungus by his sister Fergusiana: yet because he was a stranger borne, and considering withall, that the people by their full authoritie had translated the regall administration vnto an other house, of the which one was alreadie proclaimed and inuested king, there was no reason now, why Alpine should make anie further claime or demand vnto the kingdom.

Vpon the messengers returne home with this answer, Dongall shewed himselfe to be in no small chafe, that the Dixons should thus go about by such subtil arguments and contriued inuentions to defie and Alpine of his right. And therbyon the second time he sent his ambassadors vnto them, requiring them 40 either to doe him reason without anie further furnished cauations: either else within three moneths space after to loke for open warres at the Scottish mens hands. These ambassadors passing forth on their iourneie, at their approaching vnto Camelon, certaine sergeants at armes met them, and did for-50 bid them to enter the citie: also they further commaunded them in name of Feredeth their king to auoid out of the confines of his dominions within foure daies space, vpon paine of death.

The ambassadors being terrefied with such manner of inhibitions, they went no further: but yet according as they had in commission, they pronounced the warre in the name of Alpine and Dongall, requiring those that thus came to meet them, to giue signification therof vnto their maister Feredeth, and to the whole Dixons nation: and so returned home the same way they came. When did the Scottish lords repaire vnto Dongall, who at the same time laie in Carrike castell, and there taking counsell for the maintenance of these warres, not one was found amongst them which offered not to spend both life, 60 lands, & goods in Alpines iust quarell. By this means was great preparation made on both sides for the warre, the Scots minding to set Alpine in his right, and the Dixons determining not to receiue any prince of a strange nation to reigne ouer them. But whilest Dongall goeth about to prouide all things readie for his enterprise, he chanced to be brotton in the riuer of Speie, as he was about to passe the same in a bote. This mishap chanced him in the first yere of his reigne, and after the birth of our Saviour 830. His bodie was buried in Colmekill, with all funeral obseques.

After Dongall was Alpine receiued to the crowne and gouernement of the realme, by the generall voices of all the people, whose chiefest studie was vpon his first entring into the estate, to follow his sute touching his title to the Dixons kingdom: and herbyon with all diligence preparing a mightie host and all other things (which were thought requisite for the furthering of his enterprise) he passed forth towards Angus, not straieng till he came to the castell of Forfar, which he besieged: but the third day after his comming thither, Feredeth the Dixons king with a great armie of his subiects aranged in good order of battell, came and presented himselfe in sight of the Scots, wherbyon immediatlie nere vnto the towne of Keskennoth they met, and joining

At length Feredeth perceiving the middle ward of his battell a litle to shrink, speedilie pressed forth to succor the same with a chosen companie of such as he had appointed to attend him: but entring thus with great violence amongst the thickest prease of his enemies, he was closed in on each side, and excluded so from the residue of his owne people, that he could neither returne the same way he entered, neither yet by anie other, so that he with those that were with him, perceiving their liues to be in present

Yet herewith did not the other Dixons giue ouer the battell, so long as anie daie light was on the skie. So that the night in the end parted them in sunder, both the armies withdrawing to their camps with small joy or triumph, by reason of the great

The captains of the Dixons weeing with themselves the losse of their king, and great multitude of their men, thought it not best to abide any longer in the field: wherfore leaving their wounded people behind them, with all their baggage in the campe, they fled incontinentlie the same night, some into one place, & some into another, where they thought best for their owne wealth and safetie. The Scots had fled immediatlie likewise, but that word was brought them as they were about to depart, how the Dixons were gone alreadie, and had left their campe bold of men of warre to defend the same. ted not a little the Englishmens offers, by reason of the old eninitie betwixt the Picts and them. In this meane season the Scots take and seise vpon all the countrie of Angus, euen from the mountaine of Crangebene vnto the riuer of Tait, wherof Wardus being certified, sendeth a post with all speed vnto king Edwine king of Northumberland, requiring him to send to his aid a power of Englishmen, to helpe to resist the Scots, which at that present inua-10 ded his countrie. To which demand Edwine made this answer, that he was not onelie troubled with ciuill war made against him by other Englishmen, but also had bene requested by Alewes surnamed Pius, as then French king, in no wise to indamage the Scots his confederats, so that for that yere present he might not conuenientlie send to him anie succours, but if he would defer the warres till the next yere, he should haue the best helpe that he were able to shew him.

20 Wardus perceiuing himselfe thus mocked and deluded by the Englishmen, commanded by solenne summons, that all such of his subiects, as were able to beare armoz, should assemble in nether Cal-don within eight daies after, with conuenable pro-uision of vittels, there to know his pleasure. His commandement was obeyed: so that a mightie armie of men at the day and place appointed came together, which being mustered, they freitwaies re-maue vnto Calidon castell, now called Dunkeld, 30 where they passe the riuer of Tait, and so enter into Angus, not without some difficultie: but being once gotten ouer, they march forthwith towards the place where they vnderstood their enemies did lie. Wardus the night before the day in the which he thought they should haue battell, by the aduise of certeine expert warriours, which he had with him, appointed all the horses that were in the campe, seruing for burden, to be bestowed amongst the women, lackies, and coistrels, part of them being clad in armoz, and part in 40 white linnen, with long poles in their hands like to speares and lauelins. Amongst them also he ordeined an hundred horsemen to be placed, whome he made pruise as then to his intention, by whose leading that feat which should be wrought in this behalf, was to be achieved. These he caused to lie couertlie within a wood nere vnto the place where the battell should be fought, giuing them in commandement not to shew themselves till the battell were begun.

King Alpine all this while held himselfe in a castell which stood vpon an hill, a little from Dundee, being 50 now decayed, so that little thereof remaineth to be sene at this day. Vpon the north side of the hill, there lieth a great large plaine, compassed on eay side with mounteins, as then full of woods & launds, but now for the most part bare and without anie trees or bushes. In this plaine were the Scots incamped. Alpine beholding forth of the castell, how the Picts ap-proched to giue battell, got him into the campe, & exhorting his people to shew themselves valiant, placed them in arate. The Picts no lesse desirous to fight 60 than their gouernors would haue wished them, began the battell before they had commandement, with such violence, that the right wing of the Scots was sore disordered. But Alpine perceiuing that, came speedilie to their succours, greatlie repprouing them for their faintnesse of courage. To be short, he did so much to timbolden them, that by his means the fight was renewed in most cruell wise: insomuch that those which before were put backe, began to winne ground againe, and to beate downe their enemies verie sterclie.

But herewith did the counterfet troope of horsemen, which was hid in the wood suddenlie come forth, and shewed themselves vpon the backe halfe of the Scottish

Alpine himselfe commanded the bodie of his enimie Feredeth to be laid in christian buriall not farre from Forfar. After this causing the mulsters of his people to be taken, he found that he had lost the third part of his armie in that mostfall and cruell battell, and therevpon brake vp his campe for that time, li-cencing those that were left aloue to returne vnto their homes. This battell being fought in the first yere of the reignes of the two foresaid kings, weak-ned the forces of both nations, so farre forth that the Scots doubting to bring the realme into danger of vtter ruine (if they should commit their whole puissance effectles to the hazard of another foughten field) determined to pursue the warre by making of incursions and inrodes onelie vpon their enemies, so to vex the Picts, and to bring them vnto reason, if it were possible. And so much verely the Scottishmen did by such their continuall rodes & incursions which they made into Angus, that the countrie was left void and desolate of all the inhabitants.

Neither did Wardus the sonne of Feredeth, (whome the Picts had chosen to succed after his father in the kingdome) find anie speedie redresse to withstand those daile inuasions thus made by the Scots vpon his countries and subiects. For he was but a slouthfull person, and verie negligent in his office, wherevpon he was had in derision of his owne people, who in the end due him amongst themselves before he had reigned fullie the terme of one whole yeare. Then succeded Keneth, the second sonne of Feredeth, with no better hap or end than his brother.
For gathering together an armie of his subiects, and comming with them into Angus, he came no soner within sight of his enemies, but that casting off his armoz, he fled incontinentlie, leaving his people in the field; and for that his haste, was slaine by a plow-man that met him by chance, and knew him not, but yet perceiuing how he had fled from his companie, and therefore deserued not to haue anie other fauour.
His people seeing themselves destitute of their head capitaine and gouernor, retired from their enemies, keeping themselves in order of battell without anie further attempt.

After this infortunate end of Keneth, the Picts chose to their king one Wardus, a man of a stout and manlike stomack, who immediatlie vpon his entring into the estate, comming into Angus (which region the Scots had made waste) caught there certeine Scottish robbers, and forthwith hanged them vp vpon gibets. After this, he sent forth his ambassadozs vnto king Alpine for reformation of all iniuries and wrongs betwixt the two nations, and to haue the arcentine league renewed betwixt them. Alpine and the Scottish lords, hauing quicklie aduised what to answer, declared vnto the Pictish ambassadozs plainelie, that they would not heare anie treatie for peace, till the Picts had deliuered the kingdome vnto the right heire. Wardus vnderstanding by this answer, that the Scots would still follow the warres against the Picts, to be the better able to withstand their malice, he purposed to procure the friendship of the Englishmen, to haue their aid against the Scots.

He sent therefore his ambassadozs with a great summe of monie vnto Edwine king of Northumberland, requiring him of his fauour, and to haue some number of his people for his wages to serue him against the Scots.

Edwine receiuing the monie, promised to come himselfe with a mightie armie, at what time & place Wardus should appoint, to go against the Scots in defense of him and his subiects the Picts. And of the Picts reioiced greatlie, that they should haue aid thus of the Englishmen, hoping thereby to haue assured victorie of their aduersaries. Other mistrust Scotishmen, appearing in sight to be an huge number, & farre more than they were in deed: with which sight the Scots being brought into a sudden feare, least they should be compassed about with multitude of enimies, they brake their arraie, threw off their armor, and took them to their feet, so to escape and saue themselves by flight. Thus few were slaine in the battell, but a great number died in the chafe, & were beaten downe on ech side as they were ouertaken by the Picts. Alpine himselfe was taken, and hauing his hands bound behind him, was led to the next towne, and there beheaded. The place beareth the name of him vnto this day, being called Malapine.

His head also was set vpon a pole, and borne vnto Camelon, and there set vpon one of the highest turrets of the wall. The Scots that escaped from this sorrowfull ouerthrow, got them with all speed into Argile, where they inuested Kenneth the sonne of Alpine king of their realme. This was in the yere of our Lord 834, and the fourth yere after Alpine entred first into the estate.

The Picts hauing atchued this great and ioufull victorie, assembled at Camelon by commandement of their king, where causing a soleinne procession to be made, in rendering thanks to almightie God for their good successe in their passed iourne: they take a generall oth vpon the gospell booke, that from thenceforth they would not cease to make the Scots war, till they had utterly destroyed the race of them: and herewith ordeined a law, that if anie man made mention of anie peace or league to be had with the Scots, he should lose his head for it. There were indeed some ancient personages amongst them, that spake against this insolent outrage of the people, allegging that in time of prosperous successe men ought to vse a modestie: but certeine youthfull persons offended with such graue aduise, thrust the authors thereof out of the church, within the which they were as then assembled. The Scots being certified hereof, were nothing herewith discouraged, but rather put in good hope of better successe, with the enimies abused themselves thus in time of felicitie.

The next summer after, the Picts assembled their powder together, and setting forward towards the Scots, though a light occasion they fell at variance amongst themselves, and fought with such hatred together, that the king was not able to appease the fraie, till night parted them in sunder. Then calling the lords afore him, he assaied alwaies to haue agreed the parties, but when he saw it would not be, in the morning he gaue them licence to depart eu-erie man to his owne home, breaking off his iourne for that time. Wydus liued not past thre moneths after, for though griefe that things went not forward as he wished, he fell into a greuous disease, and fi-nallie thereof died. After whose deceasse, the Picts chose his brother named Wulken, to succeed in go-uernment of the kingdome, who applied his whole indewour vpon his first entring into the estate, to appease the ciuill discord amongst his subiects.

But whilest he was thus buslie occupied about the same, there were certeine Scots, which were disdained to vnderstand that the head of their late king should remaine vnburied, in such reprochfull sort amongst their enimies. Whereupon hauing perfect knowledge of the Pictish tong, they feined themselves to be merchantmen of that countrie, & com-ming vnto Camelon, watched their time, till they found means in the night season to scale to the walls, and secretlie taking awaie the head, escaped with the same home into their owne countrie.

This act of theirs was not a little commended: and so now the head of king Alpine being recoured, was closed in a ledden coffin, and Kenneth himselfe, hauing in his companie a great number of his nobles, went with it ouer into Colmickill, where he buried it in the abbey, amongst the sepulchures of his elders, together with the residue of the bodie in verie solemne wise, as appertained. And further, those persons that had put their liues in aduenture to fetch the same head from the walls of Camelon, were by Kenneth rewarded with rich gifts and lands in perpetuities, to remaine to them and to their heires for e-uer. After this, Kenneth deuising for the suertie of his subiects, furnished all the holds and castles on the frontiers of his enimies with men and munition, according as he thought expedient: and moreover tooke order, that all the youth of the realme should be in a readinesse vpon an houres warning, to go forth against the Picts, if they attempted anie new inua-sions.

But the Scottish lords had no great lust to take anie enterpryse in hand against the Picts, re-membryng how infortunatellie they had sped the last time: so that for the space of thre yeres there was no great exploit atchued, saue certeine roads and incursions, which both the nations continuallie vsed to make one vpon another, as time and occasion ser-ued. At length king Kenneth being verie desirous to be reuenged of the Picts, for the death of his father king Alpine, and other iniuries by them done and attempted against the Scottish nation, in the fourth yere of his reigne, he assembled the peeres and chiefest nobles of his realme, trusting to perswade them to aid him in all such enterpryses as he ment to take in hand against the Picts, whome he purposed to pursue with open warres, till he had them at his pleasure. But calling his lords and peeres thus assembled on a day before him, and going earnestlie about to moue them to the warres, he could stir them no more to his purpose, than if he had bene in hand to haue counselled them vnto that which in no wise had appertained vnto their duties: which their lacke of stomach, Kenneth perceiuing, he began to deuise a pretie shift, whereby to induce them to his accord.

First therefore, breaking vp the assemblee for the same day, he commanded that they should come together againe on the next morow, to consult further for the state of the realme, as they should see cause.
The same euening also he had them all to supper, which being prolonged till farre in the night, it was late before they went to bed, so that being ouerwached, when they were once gotten to rest, they were sone brought into a sound sleape. Now had the king appointed for euerie one of their chambers one man apparelled in garments prettie deuised and made of fish skins unskaled, bearing in one of their hands a staffe of such rotten wood as shineth in the night, and in their other hand a great ore horne, to the end that bittering their words through the same, the sound of their voices should seeme farre differing from the small speech of man.

Thus appointed in the dead of the night, they enter the chambers to ech of them assigned, where (as is said) the lords laie fast asleepe, who being at the first as if were halfe awakened, were wonderfullie amazed at the strangenesse of the sight (doubting whether it were but a dreame, or some true and unfein-ed vision.) Herewith also were heard certeine seuerall voices, far greater than those of men, declaring that they were messengers sent from almightie God vnto the Scottish nobilitie, to command them to obeye their king, for his request was iust: the Pic-tish kingdome due vnto him by rightfull heritage, & ought to be recovered from that people, which for their great offenses and sins towards almightie God, should therefore come to utter destruction: such was the determinate pleasure of his diuine maietie, in deed.

ieslie, against the which might neither counsell nor puissance of man be able to resist.

When the counterfeited messengers had thus made an end of their words, they silie hid their faces vnder their innermost garments, and therewith quicklie conueied their hyppermost vestures made of fish scales (as I haue said) into their bosoms, in such slight and nimble wise, that it seemed these visions had suddenly banished a waie. Those lords that had seene these sights, laie still for that night, greatlie musing on the matter. In the morning being got vp, and assembled in the counsell chamber, they declared to ech other what they had seene and heard in the night passed. And for that all their visions which they had seene by ech others report, were in euerie behalfe like, and nothing differing one from an other, they beleued verelie it was some celestiaall oracle & message sent from God. Therefore presentlie they go vnto the king, declaring vnto him how they had bene admonished from aboue, to continue the wars with all their forces against the Picts.

The lords declare their vision vnto the king.

The answer of king Kenneth.

The king told them he had seene the like vision, but they ought to keepe it close, least by glozieng too much in the fauour shewed by almighty God toward them, they might happlie displease his diuine maiestie, which other wise they might perceiue was readie in their aid. When finally might the vision be published, when thozough his fauourable assistance, the warres were brought to a luckie end. This aduise of the king was well liked of them all, and commandement giuen, that all manner of provision should be prepared with all speed for an armie to be set forth into Pictland. The lords going busilie about to provide themselves of all things necessarie, mustered their men in all parts, so that there was leued a greater host than had bene seene in those parties of long time before. When the whole power was come together, Kenneth marched forth with the same, entring by great violence into the Pictish borders about Sterling.

Kenneth entered into Sterlingshire. Drusken haile invaded his enemies.

Drusken the king of Picts aduertised hereof, and hauing his armie in a readinesse both of Picts and such Englishmen as he had retained, to serue him for his wages, fetcheth a compasse about, and passing by the Scottis armie in the night, incampeth betwixt them and home, in such sort that the day did no sooner appere, but the one part desirous to be in hand with the other, without token of trumpet, or commandement of capteine, they rushed togither most fiercelie. The hastie speed of the Picts to foine, put them to no small disauantage; but the departure of the Englishmen, withdrawing themselves aside to the next mountaine, most of all discouraged them: for the Scots therewith giuing a shout, declared themselves to be highlie recomforted with that sight. Drusken in all haste sent vnto those Englishmen a messenger, willing them with large promises of reward to returne to his aid; but the Englishmen answered, that their vse was not to fight without order and commandement of their generall, and that the Picts like vnskillfull men had cast a waie themselves to be slaine by the enemies hand, where it appertained vnto warlike knowledge to auoid the battell, when no hope of victorie appered.

The Englishmen fled.

Drusken sent to the Englishmen.

The middle ward of the Picts seeing themselves left naked on the one side, and assailed on the backs; whereas the Englishmen should haue kept their ground and defended them, they began to shrink: which the Scots perceiuing, strooke on the more fiercelie, till at length the Picts not able to withstand their force, fell to running a waie. They made their course towards the water of Forth, which was not farre from the place of the battell, where being overtaken, they were beaten downe & slaine in great numbers: for Kenneth gaue commandement that they should spare none of the Picts nation, neither gentleman nor other, that fell into their hands. The Englishmen whilst the Scots and Picts were thus occupied in the fight and chase, withdrew homeward with all speed; and by reason of the mountaine which they had to passe, that toke a waie the sight of them from the Scots, they escaped into their countrie without anie pursute. Drusken himselfe so soone as he perceiued how the field went against him, got him to his horse, which he had appointed to be readie for him at hand vpon all occasions, and so escaped out of danger with a few other in his companie.

The Englishmen escape.

Drusken escaped by flight.

The Scots returning from the chase, remained in the place of the battell all night, keeping strong watch about their campe, for doubt least the Englishmen had bene lodged in some secret place nere by to haue set vpon them at vnwares, if they might haue seene anie aduantage; but in the morning when it was knowne how they were quite gone their waies, and returned into their countrie (as before ye haue heard) then was the spoile of the field and Pictish campe gathered and bestowed amongst the soldiers, after the ancient custome of that nation. And then were they all licenced to depart euerie man to his home, with thanks for their seruice and paines in this iourne so manfullie imploied. Within few daies after, the Pictish king Drusken sent his ambassadors vnto king Kenneth to sue for peace. Kenneth was contented to heare him, and promised to grant a peace, so they would surrender into his hands the gouernement of their kingdome due vnto him by right of inheritance. But this condition being vterlie refused of the Picts, was the cause that the warre was afresh renewed with more crueltie than before.

The Picts sue for peace.

The yere next insuing this battell, Kenneth got Bernes, Angus, and Fife into his hands, furnishing all the castles and holds with men, munition, and vittells. But whilst he went about to subdue the countries about Sterling, word was brought him that such as he left thus in garison in those countries, were betrayed by the inhabitants, and slaine euerie mothers sonne. Kenneth wonderfullie kindled in wrath for the newes, left off his treatie, which then he had in hand with the people of Berneish and Sterlingshire for their submision, and returned in great hast towards Fife, where being arrived, he put all to the fire and sword, not leauing one aliue of the Pictish nation within all those quarters. The like crueltie was shewed through the whole countres of Berneish and Angus, for an example to other to beware how they falsified their faiths once giuen by waie of allegiance.

Kenneth getteth Bernes, Angus, and Fife.

Fife is put to the fire and sword.

Bernes and Angus is cruelly punished.

In the meane time that Kenneth with his Scots raged in such wise through those countries, Drusken assembling all the power of his countries, came forth into the field to meet the Scots, meaning either to put them backe out of the confines of his dominion, either else to die with honor in the attempt thereof. Thus passing through the countrie, at length he came vnto Scone, where afterwards stood a famous abbey of chanoins of saint Augustines order; and here he found Kenneth with his armie already incamped. The next day, when both parties were ready to haue giuen battell, Drusken wishing rather to aske peace whilst his power was yet in safetie, than after he were once vanquished (if such were his misadventure) to intreat for the same in vaine, sent an herald at armes vnto Kenneth, willing that he might talke with him before he ioined, for that he had to say certaine things, which being followed, might turne to the great benefit and commoditie of both the Scottis and Pictish nations.

Drusken cometh to rescue his people.

Kenneth

Kenneth for that he would not seeme to refuse anie indifferent offers, was contented to come to a communication, and so thereupon both the kings in presence of both their armies arranged in the field ready to fight, came together in a place appointed, either of them being accompanied with a like number of their nobles, as by the heralds it was accorded. Where Duskenn with manie reasons going about to persuaide peace, shewed how necessarie the same was betwixt the two nations: and againe, how doubtfull fortune was to them that trusted to much in hir vnstedfast fauour: at length he grew to this end, that if Kenneth could be contented to grant a peace, the Picts should release all such right, title and interest as they had in the countreies of Bernes, Angus, and Fife, vnto him and his successors the Scottish kings for ever, so that he should make no further claime vnto anie other of those countreies which the Picts as yet possessed.

sion of peace

Kenneth his answere.

Wherevnto Kenneth answered, that he well vn-derstood how vnstable fortunes lawes were, but sithens the Picts fought in an vniust quarell, as to defraude the posteritie of their lawfull king Hungus, who latelie reigned amongst them, of the rightfull inheritance of their kingdome, they themselves had fust cause to doubt fortunes chance, where the Scots hauing put vpon lawfull armour, and seeking to attaine that by warre which by other means they could not ataine at the hands of the vniust possessors, they had lesse cause to mistrust hir fauour, & therefore if the Picts were desirous of peace, they ought to cause a surrender to be made of their kingdome into his hands, accordinglie as they well knew it was reason they should. And what commoditie might thereof in issue to both nations, being by such means once ioined and vniued into one intire kingdome, he doubted not but they vnderstood it sufficientlie inough.
And as for other conditions of peace than this, he told them plainelie there would be none accepted.
Thus did the kings depart in sunder, without anie agreement concluded: and being returned to their armies, they make ready to trie the matter by dint of sword.

The order of the battell.

Kenneth exhorted his people that day to shew themselves men, with the same should iudge whether the Scots should rule and gouerne the Picts, or the Picts the Scots. With these and manie other effec-tuall words when he had encouraged his folks to the battell, he diuided them into three wards, as two wings and a maine battell. In euerie of them he set first archers and arcuballisters; and next vnto them pikes and speares, then bilmen and other with such short weapons: last of all, an other multitude with all kind of weapons, as was thought most expedient. The fore ward was committed to the leading of one Bar, a man right skilfull in all warlike knowledge, the second one Dongall gouerned, and the third was led by Donald the kings brother. The king himselfe with a troupe of horsemen followed them to succour in all places where he saw need.

King Duskenn

Then commanded he his trumpets to sound to the battell, which the Scots began with such a cherefull shout, that the Picts euen vpon the first onset were so amazed, that if Duskenn had not with comfortable words relieved their fainting stomachs, the most part of them had fled without anie stroke stricken. But being encouraged through the presence of their king, shewing himselfe with cherefull countenance amongst them, and therewith exhorting them to stand by him at that present, there was fought a right fore and cruell battell betwixt them. The women that were amongst the Picts, of whom there was no small number, speciallie in the right wing, made such a woofull noise, when they beheld the men one kill an other, that they were a more cumbzance to the Picts, than aid, when it came to the point of seruice: by reason whereof that wing was shortly beaten downe, and put to flight. Which when Kenneth beheld, he set in with his horsemen on the backs of the Picts, now left bare by the running thus away of those in the foresaid wing: and so entring in amongst them, disordred their arraie in such wise, that by no means they were able to aid themselves, or come into anie order againe: so that in the end they were faine to throw downe their weapons, and take them to their sate, thereby to escape the danger. Such heaps of slaine men, armour, & weapons laie here & there streued in the place of the battell, that the Scots were forced in following the chase to breake their arraie, so to passe the more speedilie: by means whereof, falling amongst whole bands of the Picts, manie of them were slaine.

This mischiefe Kenneth perceiuing, commanded to sound the retreat, and so gathering his people about their standards, he appointed certene companies in warlike order to pursue in chase of the enemies, whilst he himselfe with the residue abode still in the place (where the field was fought) all that day and the next night following. The Sco-tish captiues that were sent to follow the chase, earnestlie executing their kings commandement, made great slaughter of Picts in all places where they might ouertake them. Duskenn the Pictish king himselfe being pursued to the riuer of Tait, for that he could not passe the same, was there slaine with the whole retinue which he had about him. It is said, that the Scottishmen incountred with the Picts that day at seven sundrie times, and in seven sundrie places, and still the victorie abode with the Scots. The day after the battell, such as had followed the chase returned to the campe; where they presented vnto Kenneth their king, the armour and other spoile of Duskenn the Pictish king, which they brought with them, besides great abundance of other pillage and riches, which they had gotten of the enemies that were slaine. Duskenns armour and other things belonging to his owne bodie, was offered vp to saint Colme, in the church dedicated to his name within the Ile of Colmekill, there to remaine as a monument of this victorie to such as should come after.

After this the whole preie and spoile was gathered and diuided amongst the souldiers. Kenneth was counsellor to haue discharged his armie, and to haue departed home; but he purposing now to make an end of the whole warres, with he was in such a for-wardnesse, called together the multitude, and in this wise began to utter vnto them his mind and purpose. ¶ It is the dutie of a good capitaine, when he hath the victorie in his hands, & as yet the warres not ended, if he mind the preservation of himselfe and his countrie, and to vse the victorie as he ought, not to cease from pursuing the enemies once vanquished, till he haue either made them his friends, or else vtterlie destroyed & rid them out of the way; for if anie man shall thinke it best to suffer the enimie to remaine in quiet, after he be once weakened and brought to a low ebbe, till time peraduenture he shall haue recovered his forces againe, he shall procure to himselfe (as I gesse) more danger than happilie he is well ware of. And that we may speake somewhat of this danger now present, the state of the Pictish kingdome (as ye know) is soe infiebled, their power being diminished by force of warre, is brought to that point, that it resteth in our hands vtterlie to destroye and exterminat the whole nation.

to our friendship. But the Picts are of such a stubborne nature, and so desirous of reuenge, that so long as there remaineth anie one of them alieue, they will beare in their hearts a desire to reuenge all such losses as they haue in anie wise sustained by this warre. Wherevpon I doe verelie beleue, that there is none of the Pictish nation from henceforth, will beare anie faithfull friendship towards the Scots. Therefore sith we can not make the Picts, thus lately scourged by vs, our friends, I thinke it best (except we will neglect our owne safeties) vtterlie to destroie the whole nation, by putting to the sword not onelie both men and women, but also all their youth and yong children: least they being descended of that linage, hereafter in time to come, arme themselves to the reuenge of their parents deaths, and that not without perill of the vtter losse of our countrie and kingdome.

This sentence of the king, though it seemed too cruell to many, yet whether for that they saw the same to stand with the kings pleasure, or that they thought it most expedient for the suretie of the Scottish common-wealth, it was allowed and ratified by them all. Such crueltie herevpon was forthwith thewed throughout all the Pictish regions, that there was not one liuing creature of humane shape left alieue, sparing such as saued themselves within the walles of Camelon, or in certeine other bels and fortresses, and also about two thousand of those that fled into England: for all the residue were most inmercifullie murdered and slaine, without respect either of age, sex, profession, or estate. Thus Kenneth hauing dispatched the inhabitants, seized the countrie into his owne hands, making partition of the same as he saw cause, and diuiding it amongst his nobles, according to the merits of euerie of them duly weied and considered, he added new names vnto eu-erie quarter and region (either after the name of the gouernor, or else of some promontorie, riuer, or other notable water or place, according as was the ancient custome of the nation) that the memorie of the Pictish names might end togither with the inhabitants.

The countrie ancientlie called Horestia, was gi-uen vnto two brethren, Angulian, and Pernan, by reason whereof the one part of the same countrie was called Angus, and the other the Pernes. The linage of those two noble men remaine vnto this day. The region which till then was named Othol-nia, was turned afterwards to the name of Fife, after the name of one Fife Duffe: whose valiancie was throughe tried in these last warres with the Picts. There remaine vnto this day tokens and old ruines of a castell situate betwixt the riuer of Leuin and saint Kenneths church, which (as yet appeareth) was fenced about with seuen rampires, and as manie ditches, wherein the posteritie of this worthie man after his decess had their habitation by the space of manie hundred yeres. Louthian retained still the former name, so honozable was the remembrance of that famous prince king Loth amongst all men. The strongest castell of the whole countrie, Kenneth bestowed vpon that valiant capteine named Bar, whose counsell and forward seruice stood the Scots in no small stead in those warres, in which the Picts were thus subdued. That fortresse euer si-thence (after his name) hath bene called Dunbar, that is to say, the castell of Bar.

There descended of him a noble house or familie, bearing the name of this castell, continuing in great fame and honoz, euen vnto our time, of the which the earles of March had their beginning, and continued long in that dignitie from one to another, with sundry branches of right famous memorie. The names of diuerse dales were also changed, but yet some kept their old names still. Sydolucia thortlie after began to take the name of Annandale, of the riuer of Annan that runneth through the same. And so likewise Tweedale toke name of the water of Tweed. And Cludedale of the riuer of Clude. In like manner manie other countries, townes, and castels had their names changed at the same time, after they came into the possession of the Scottishmen, vpon sundrie considerations, for a witnesse of their victorious acts achieved against the Picts. Furthermore, into the citie of Camelon were withdrawne the most part of all the noble mens houses of the Picts, with their children, vpon trust to be in safetie in the same, as well by reason of strength of the place, as also of the strong garison which was appointed to defend it.

Kenneth therefore hauing taken his pleasure abroad in the countrie, came thither with a mightie armie to besiege the citie. And first sending vnto them within, to know if they would yield, he was answered, how sith it plainelie appeared, that the Scots could be satisfied with nothing but with the slaughter of all such as fell into their hands, aswell of women and children, with impotent aged, as of others, they were minded neuer to surrender their holt with life.
Wherevpon the siege continued by the space of manie daies. Whilest the Scots in the meane time got togither a great number of fagots, and other such brush and stuffe to fill the ditches withall, which were verie deepe and broad, at length when they within began to want vittels, they required a truce for three daies, in the which meane time they might take ad-uise for the surrender of the citie. Kenneth misdru-sting no deceit, granted their request, and therevpon commanded his people to ceasse from all manner of annoiance of the enemies, for that terme.

But in the meane time the Picts prepared themselues of all things necessarie to make an issue vpon the Scots. There was also an old gate soylet and stopped by with earth and stones vpon the one side of the citie, so that of a long time before there had bene no way forth by the same. Wherefore in the darke of the night the Picts ribbing away the earth and ramell therewith it was closed vp, about the third watch they passe forth at that gate in good order of battell, setting first vpon such Scots as kept the standing watch, who were in doubt of nothing lesse than of anie issue to be made on that side, by means whereof they were easilie oppressed, and likewise the other that kept the inner watch, inasmuch that the slaughter went on almost euen to the kings tent with great noise and clamor, as is commonlie seene in such sudden tumults, especiallie chancing in the night season.

When the day began once to appeare, the Picts withdrawing towards the citie by the same waie they came, were pursued by the Scots, and no small number of them slaine at the entring. The citie also had bene taken at the same time, but that the Picts out of the turrets and lonpes of the walles, discharged a wonderfull number of quarels, barts, arrows, stones, and other things vpon the Scots, as they approached nere to the gate, where their fellowes (that made the issue) halted to enter againe into the tolowe. There were slaine of the Scots at this bickering aboue six hundred, wherewith Kenneth was so kindled with wrath, that detesting the falschod of the Picts, he vowed by open oth that he would not depart from the siege, till he had put the citie and them within to fire and sword, without sparing of anie, either one or other.

Sundrie times he attempted to haue wonne the citie by force of assault, but the Picts still defended their walles so frontlie, that he could not atchieve his purpose. Whereupon the siege continued for the space of foure moneths together. So that such scarcitie of all kinds of vittels still arose amongst them, that the wretched citizens abstained from nothing that might in anie wise be eaten, though it were neuer so much to be abhorred. And yet although they were brought into such miserable state, that there was no hope longer to defend themselves, if anie man notwithstanding all such extremitie, were heard make mention of surrendering, he was forthwith slaine by his fellowes, as an enimie to his nation and a friend unto the Scots. It was thought that Kenneths oth made them so obstinate in their wilfull contumacie, because they saw nothing but death, which way soeuer they inclined.

A pretie craft used by Kenneth.

At length when the citie was thus reduced into all extreme miserie, and the ditches filled with faggots and other such stufte, Kenneth one night appointed six hundred of his choicest souldiers to lie in ambush within a wood, joining nere to one side of the citie, so that in the morning when he should give the assault on the contrarie side, they might suddenly come forth and scale the walles on that other. These souldiers, according to that which they had in commandement, shortly after the breake of day, hearing that Kenneth had begun the assault on his part, quickly came forth of the wood, and having their ladders ready, came to the walles, reared them up, and swiftly getting into the citie, opened one of the gates where one part of the armie entered; the citizens standing in no doubt at all of anie attempt on that side: so as being gotten together to defend the walles on that part where Kenneth gaue the approach, and now hearing how the enimies were got into the citie, and coming on their backs, they were wonderful amayed, but yet so long as they were able to make anie resistance, they did what lay in their utmost power to beat backe the Scots, and to drive them out of the citie againe.

The Scots enter the citie.

The Scots are miserable slaine, without regard of person.

Ladies and gentlewomen desire the king to be pardoned of their lives.

All the Scottish nation destroyed. The citie of Camelon is throwne downe.

The slaughter therfore was great which the Scots made of the Scots in euery passage & corner of the streets, insomuch that the Scottish lords and other captiues, in reuenge of the late receiued losse of their men, though the false practised policie of the Scots, commanded in a great furie to set fire on the houses, and to kill and slaue all such of the Scottish nation as came in their way. Thus the murder proceeded upon all estates, aswell religious as other, and likewise upon women and children, without anie difference. A number of ladies and gentlewomen, getting them into the presence of king Kenneth, besought him in most lamentable wise, to haue pittie upon their twofull estate, and to saue their liues from the hands of his most cruell souldiers. But such was the rage kindled in the Scottishmens hearts, that there was no more fauor shewed toward them than toward the other, and so immediatlie were they also slaine without all compassion. So farre forth was the murder executed on all hands, that there was not one left aliue of the Scottish nation, neither man, woman, nor child to bewaile that miserable destruction of their countrie and kinsfolkes. When were the walles throwne downe & made euen with the plaine ground. The houses and buildings aswell priuate as publike, with churches and chappels, were set on fire, and that which might not be consumed with the rage of fire was ruinated and destroyed with hand, so that there remained of all that famous citie, nothing but the ashes, with heapes of the broken and burned stones, and likewise of the pavement and foundation of some part of the walles.

At the same time the castell of Maidens, now called commonlie Odenborough castell, was still kept with a mightie garrison of Scots, but they hearing of the miserable destruction of Camelon, and doubting to fall into the like mischance, left the castell void, and fled to Forthumberland. Thus ended the kingdome of the Scots in Albion, in the yere after they first began to reigne therein 1173, and in the yere after the birth of our Saviour 839, from the first coming of Fergus 1166, and after the creation of the world 4806, if the Scottish chronicles be true. ¶ But where as the truth concerning the time of the first coming into this Ile, aswell of the Scots as Scots re- steth doubtfull, and that aswell by authoritie of approved writers, as by reasonable coniectures, we haue in the historie of England more largelie written thereof; we referre those that be desirous to see further of that matter, unto the same, following here in this historie of Scotland the report most an end, as we find it in Hector Boetius, and other the Scottish writers, not taking upon vs so franklie to set downe our owne opinion in this Scottish, as in the English historie, through want of such helps in the one, as we haue got in the other.

There were seene the same yere two comets or blasing starres of dreadfull aspect to the beholders, the one went before the sunne rising in haruest season, and the other followed the going downe thereof in the spring of the yere. There was oftentimes also seene in the aire a vision of fire armies, running together with burning flames, and the one being vanquished, they suddenly both of them vanished away. Also at Camelon, as the bishop was at seruice holding his crozier staffe in his hand, it was kindled so with fire, that by no meane it could be quenched, till it was burnt euen to ashes. About none daie, the aire being faire and cleare, as well in the countreies of the Scots as of the Scots, there was heard such a noise and clattering of weapons and armor, with braying of horses, as though two armies should haue bene together in fight, whereby manie of either nation which heard it, were put in great feare. These vnconth wonders were interpreted by diuiners diuerlie: some of them affirming the same to be token top and happie prosperitie, and other alledging, how they signified rather mishap and bitter calamitie.

But to returne to our purpose. King Kenneth having thus destroyed the Scottish kingdome, together almost with the whole nation, caused the marble stone (which Simon Breke sometime brought out of Spaine into Ireland, and the first Fergus out of Ireland into Albion, as before is recited) to be brought now forth of Argile (where till that time it had bene diligentlie kept) into Courie, which region before appertained to the Scots, there to remaine from thenceforth as a sacred token for the establishment of the Scottish kingdome in that countrie: he placed it at Scone upon a raised plot of ground there, because that the last battell which he had with the Scots was fought nere unto the same place, the victorie (as before is specified) chancing to the Scots. Upon this stone (as before is rehearsed) the Scottish kings were used to sit, when they receiued the inuestiture of the kingdome. ¶ Some writers haue recorded that by commandement of Kenneth, at the same time when this stone was thus by him removed, those Latine verses were grauen upon it, whereof mention is made before, where we spake of the aforesaid Fergus the first his coming ouer forth of Ireland into Albion there to reigne.

Now in the meane time, when those few of the Scots, which by flight had escaped the Scottishmens hands, and were gotten into England, could by no meanes persuade the Englishmen, being troubled with intestine warre, to aid them in recouerie of their countrie, some of them passed the seas ouer into Norway, and some into Denmarke, and diuerse other of them remained still in England, where they got their living either by some manuell occupation, either else by seruice in the warres. The Scots from thenceforth liued in quiet, during the life time of A. J. Kenneth, who deserued eternall fame, by the enlarging of the bounds of his kingdome, so mightilie and in such wise, that where he found the frontiers, he made the same well nere the middell of his kingdome. Other things he did also touching the politike gouernement of his subiects in time of peace, no lesse worthe of praise than his noble and famous conquests: but speciallie he ordeined certeine lawes for the wealth of his people, whereby his iudges and other officers should proceed in the administration of iustice, of the which I haue thought requisite to rehearse part as yet being vsed, that aswell the author, as the time of their first establishment, maie the better appeare, vnto such as shall peruse this historie.

The Chapters of those lawes which yet remaine to be obserued, are these.

The Scots liue in quiet.

Kenneth made lawes & ordinaunces.

Lawiers necessarie.

The tables of the law to be kept.

Robbers to be hanged.

Punishment for theft and murder.

A woman condemned to die, either let hir be drowned in some riuer, either else let hir be buried quick.

Blasphemers haue their tongues cut out.

The punishment for a lie.

A man accused to be condemned by an odd quest of men.

Robbers to be put to the sword.

Bagabonds to be whippied and burnt in the cheeke.

The wife shall not suffer for the husbands offence.

The concubine and hir maie to haue a liues punishment.

Et euerie shire haue certein men skilled in the lawes appointed to be resident in the same, according as in the beginning it was instituted. Let their sonnes also in their youth be brought vp in knowledge of the same lawes.

Let them onelie keepe in their custodies the tables of the lawes, with the register booke of the kings & peeres of the realme.

If any of them be conuicted of extort bribing, or other the like vnjust dealing, let him die vpon the gallowes, and his bodie remaine vnburi.

Such as are condemned for theft, let them be hanged, and those that are proued guiltie of murder, let them lose their heads.

A woman which is condemned to die, either let hir be drowned in some riuer, either else let hir be buried quick.

He that blasphemeth the name of God, of the saints, of his prince, or of the capitaine of his tribe, let him haue his tongue cut out.

He that is conuicted of a lie to his neighbours hinderance, let him haue his sword taken from him, and be banished out of all mens companie.

Such as be accused of any crimes that deserue death, let them passe by the sentence of 7 honest men, either else of 9, 11, 13, 15, or more, so that the number be odd.

Robbers by the high waies, destroyers of cozne growing in the fields, as is vsed by enemies in time of warre, let them die by the sword.

Fugitiues, bagabonds, and such other idle persons, let them be whipt and burnt in the cheeke.

Let not the wife suffer for the husbands offense, but the husband shall answer for the wifes misdoings, if he be proued the rebiter.

Any mans lemman or concubine shall suffer the same paines that he doth which offendeth with hir.

He that rauisheth a maid shall die for it, vnlesse she require for safegard of his life, to haue him to hir husband.

If any man be taken with an other mans wife in adulterie, the consenting vnto him therein, they shall both suffer death for it. But if she consent not, but be forced against hir will, then he shall die onelie for the same, and she shall be released.

If the child hurt the father either with tongue, hand, or foot, let him first be deprived of that member, and then hanged, his bodie to remaine without buriall.

A murder, a dumbe person, or he that is vnthankfull to his parents, shall not inherit his fathers patrimonie.

Juglers, wizards, necromancers, and such as call by spirits, and vse to seeke vpon them for helpe, let them be burnt to death.

Let no man sow in the earth any graine before it be purged of all the weeds.

He that through negligent slouth, suffereth his arable ground to be choked by and ouergrowne with weeds; for the first fault let him forfeit an ore, for the second ten oren, and for the third let him forgo the same ground.

Thy companion in the warres, or thy friend being slaine, see him buried, but let the enimie lie vnburi.

Anie straie cattell that cometh into thy grounds, either restore them to the owner, either els deliuer them to the searcher out of thæues, commonlie called Tonodrach, or to the parson or vicar of the towne: for if thou reteine them in thy hands by the space of thre daies, thou shalt be accounted guiltie of theft.

He that findeth anie thing that belongeth to an other man, let him cause it to be cried in the market, or els he shall be iudged for a felon.

He that striketh him, with whom he goeth to the law, about anie matter in controuersie, shall be iudged guiltie of the action, and the other set free.

If oxen or kine chance by running together to kill one another, the truth being not known which it was that did the hurt, that which is found without hornes shall be iudged the occasion of the death; and he that is owner of the same, shall haue the dead beast, and satisfie him for the losse to whome it belonged.

If a sow eate hir pigs, let hir be stoned to death, and buried, so that no man eate of hir flesh.

A swine that is found eating of cozne that groweth in the field, or wroting vpon the tilled grounds, let it be lawfull for anie man to kill the same without danger.

Other kinds of beasts, wherein other men haue anie proprietie, if they breake into thy pastures, or eate by thy cozne, impound them, till time the owner haue satisfied thee for the quantitie of the damage.

These were ciuill ordinaunces belonging to the good gouernement of the people, or ther there were, which apperteine to religion:

Rauishers of maids shall die.

Adulterers shall die.

A child hurting his father shall die.

Who are not to inherit.

Juglers and wizards, &c.

Sowing of graine.

Small husbandrie.

Buriall of friends.

Wailes and straies.

Things found.

Adversaries in suite of law.

Oxen or kine hurting each other.

A sow.

Swine.

Beasts damage faultant.

Articles touching religion.

gion: as these.

Thou shalt deuoutlie reuerence the altars, temples, images, oratozies, chapels, priestes, and all men of religion.

Keeping of holie daies.

Thou shalt obserue with due reuerence festiuall and solemne holie daies, fasting daies, vigils, and all maner of ceremonies instituted by the godlie ordinance of man, in the honoz of our S. Chist & his saints.

Priests.

To hurt a priest, let it be accounted an offense worthe of death.

Ground to be left untilled.

That ground wherin anie that is slaine lieth buried, leaue it untilled for seuen yeres space.

Graues.

Repute euerie graue holie, and adorne it with the signe of the crosse, so as thou shalt be well aduised that in no wise with thy feet thou tread vpon it.

Buriall.

Burie the dead according to the quantitie of his substance.

Buriall of noble men.

The bodie of a noble man & of him that hath well deserued of the common-wealth, shall be buried in solemne and pompous wise, but yet in mourning sort & dolorous manner.

Let there be two knights or esquires to attend his bodie to the graue. The one being mounted vpon a white horse shall beare the coate-armoz of the dead, and the other in mourning apparell with his face couered shall ride vpon a blacke horse; who after the corps is brought to church, turning his horse from the altar, shall crie out how his maister is dead: and there with the people making an outcry against him, he shall streitwaies depart and get him with all speed to the place fro whence he came: the other going streight to the altar, shall there offer vp vnto the priest his coate-armoz with his horse, as a token to signifie thereby that his maister dooth inioy euerlasting life, in the land of permanent light and ioies eternall.

¶ But this custome of buriall, as that which was supposed not appertaining to the order of the christian religion, the age that followed did vtterlie abolish, appointing to the priests in stead of the horse and armor, five pounds sterling in monie for the offering. With these and diuers other ordinances, which time and other statutes by other kings deuised haue abrogated, Kenneth gouerned his people in great felicitie during his life time.

S. Keme his church, now called S. Andrewes.

The bishops se, which before had bene at Abirneschie, he translated vnto the church of that holie man S. Keme. Euer since which time the towne hath bene called S. Andrewes, and those which gouerned the same church a long time after, were called the great bishops of Scotland: for the realme was not diuided into dioceses till the daies of Malcolme the 3, who by diuine inspiration (as is said) ordeined the se of Myrthlake, now called Abirden: but such as were reputed of vertuous behauiour and knowledge met for the office, vsed the authoritie & name of bishops, in what place soeuer they were resident. Yet such was the continuance of those which gouerned the church of S. Andrewes, that there haue bene about the number of fortie bishops resident there, since the first institution of that se: manie of them for the opinion conceiued of their holinesse, being numbred according to the manner in times past in the register of saints. But now to returne vnto Kenneth, who hauing (as is said) enlarged the bounds of his kingdome, so as the same stretched forth vnto the confines of Northumberland on the one side, and to the Isles of Orkney on the other, the sea compassing the residue, at the length after he had reigned about twentie yeres in great renowne and glorie, he departed out of this life, through too much abundance of rheumatike matter, at Forthuiot, in the yere of our Lord 856. His bodie was conueied into the Ile of Colmeckill, and there honozable buried amongst his ancestozs.

The bounds of the Scottish kingdome.

King Kenneth departed out of this life, 855. H. B.

After his deceasse succeeded in gouernment of the realme his brother Donald, farre differing in qualities from his noble brother the foresaid Kenneth; but yet before he came to the rule of the realme, he disclosed not his vicious nature, for doubt of offending the king his brother. Neuerthelesse he had continued scarce two yeres in the estate, but that he had subuerted all good orders in his realme, by his naughtie examples of dissolute liuing: for his mind was set on nothing but on wanton pleasure; as in the vnlawfull vse of concubines, riotous banking, keeping of hawkes, hounds, & horses for pleasure, and not for the vse of warres, whereof he had no regard at all: for such charges as he should haue bene at for maintenance of men of warre to keepe the frontiers of his realme, were imployed on a sort of rascals, that serued him in the furtherance of his wanton delights and voluptuous desires, as huntsmen, falconers, cokes, batwades, ruffians, and such like lozels.

Donald. Donald the fourth of this name succeeded his brother Kenneth. The king is of dissolute behauiour.

Wherevpon diuers of the nobles remembzng what appertained to their duties, spared not but freely admonished the king what danger would insue of his misordered behauiour, if he reformed not his manners, nor restrained the licentious doings of his seruants and familie. But when they perceived that their wordes were not regarded, but for the same they themselves ran into displeasure; they sorowed not a little, to see so small hope of amendment of such enormities, as euerie where reigned through the region: for all youthfull persons given to sensuall lust followed the same without anie feare or care of correction, so that there was no measure of offending and haunting of euill rule in all parties, insomuch that thoztie, through want of all good gouernance, wrong was placed in stead of right, and contempt of Gods honoz embraced euerie where in place of vertue and godlinesse.

The king is admonished of his nobles.

In this meane while, the residue of the Picts remaining amongst the Englishmen, ceased not to solicit the gouernozs of the countrie to aid them towards the recouerie of their dominion out of the Scottish mens hands, promising to be subiects vnto the English nation, if by their helpe they might be restored to their ancient seates. At length Osbert and Ella kings of Northumberland were perswaded through instant sute to take that enterprise in hand, the rather vpon trust of god successe, for that they vnderstood what lacke of politike gouernement then remained amongst the Scots, by reason of the kings naughtie demeanoz and most inordinat trade of life. But first there was a league concluded with new articles of agreement betwixt the Englishmen and Britains, as yet inhabiting alongst the coasts of Cumberland, by meanes of which league both Britains and Englishmen ioined their powers together, and in most speedie and forcible wise passed the water of Tweed, first pitching their campe in the countrie of Mers. From whence immediatlie king Osbert (being appointed as generall in that iourne)

The Englishmen and Britains ioined their powers with the Picts.

Osbert and Ella kings of Northumberland.

The Englishmen and Britains ioined their powers with the Picts.

The whole realme of Scotland is conquered.

In herall sent vnto naid.

Osbert is to fight at Jedburgh.

Osbert his provision of water is taken by the Scottishmen.

A great disorder in the Scottish campe.

The Scottish campe is ordered.

20000 Scottishmen slay King Donald taken with the nobilitie.

The campe is raised.

In herald is sent unto Donald the Scottish king, commanding him either to surrender by unto the Brits all such regions as the Scots had taken from them; either else to looke to haue the Englishmen and Britains no lesse their enemies than the Brits; whose cause they had taken vpon them to mainteine and defend.

Donald being at the first sore troubled with these newes, yet at length (by the aduise of his nobles) he took a good hart vnto him, and in defense of his realme caused musters to be taken throughout all his dominions, and forthwith came into the field to encounter his enemies, whome he found at Jedburgh ready to giue battell: where after sore fight, in the end Olbert with his people was chased to the next mounteins. Donald hauing thus obtained the victorie in this conflict, supposed all had bene his owne, and thereupon remoued ouer Tweed with all possible hast, marching forth till he came to the mouth of that riuer, where there laie at anchor certeine English vessels, laden with provision of vittels and all other things necessarie for the furniture of an armie. Donald setting vpon these ships, with small resistance took them, spoiled them of all such things as were found aboard, and after set fire on them. The spoile was diuided amongst the souldiers and men of warre, which serued them to small vse or commoditie: for all the pouth of the armie, through example of their prince, was so corrupted in vicious customes, that the campe was replenished with hoyses, balwds, stews, and dicing tables, in such wise, that all such provision as should haue serued for foze and staple of vittels, was spent in riotous banketing without anie order or measure: & oftentimes (as it chanceth where politike gouernement lacketh) there happened amongst them in the armie, discord and variance with sundrie murders and slaughters.

When the enemies were aduertised how far out of order all things stood in the Scottish campe for want of god and discreet chieffains, Olbright with all speed got a mightie host together againe, and before his approach was looked for of the Scots, he cometh vpon them one morning in the breake of the day, and assaileth them in their lodgings, wherein he found them so vnprouided of all helps to make resistance, that it was a wonder to see the disorder that appeared amongst them: some of them running vpon their enemies naked without all discretion, other breaking forth of the campe to saue themselves by flight, not sparing hill nor dale where they saw anie way to escape the enemies hands, though it were with present danger of breaking their necks downe the sliding banks and craggie rocks, being forced thereto by the fierce pursute of the Englishmen and Britains, who most eageertie pleased vpon them in all places, to reuenge the late receiued ouerthrow and slaughter of their friends and kinsfolks. There died of the Scots in this mortall bickering aboute twentie thousand persons. King Donald being fast asleepe at the first assault of the enemies, as he that had drunke ouer night more than inough, was taken before he could make anie thist for himselfe, with the residue of the nobilitie, that escaped with life.

The Scottish campe, the next day after this overthrow, was rised, the spoile being diuided amongst the Englishmen and Britains. But when the fame of this infortunat battell was noised once through the realme of Scotland, how the king was taken prisoner, his campe towne, the armie discomfited, and almost all the souldiers and men of warre slaine, those few of the nobles which were left alue remaining prisoners in the enemies hands; there was such dole and lamentation made ouer all, as though the realme had already bene lost without re-couerie. Some there were that blamed fortune, some cursed the wicked trade of life in the king, other bewailing the great calamitie of this mischance put the fault in diuers other things, as in such cases commonlie it falleth out: for in sundrie heads are euer sundrie opinions. Panie ran vp and downe the streets and high waies, to inquire the certentie of all things, and whether there were anie hope at all left to resist the enemies, also which way the enemies held, whereabout they went, and what they purposed to do.

Anon after, when it was certeinlie knowne that the Englishmen were entred by Louthian, and the Britains by Galloway, there was such feare mixed with sorrow (for losse of their friends and kinsfolks) stricken into the peoples hearts, and namelie into the womens, that a greater hath not bene heard of in anie region. So that all provision to defend their countrie was quite neglected, so amazed were the Scots with the sudden change of fortunes fauor. The Englishmen hereupon took all the countrie euen to the water of Forth, and likewise the Britains seized into their hands all that which lieth from the bounds of Cumberland vnto Sterling bidge, finding no resistance in their way at all. Herevnto as well the Englishmen as Britains vsed the victorie verie cruellie, sparing neither one nor other of the Scottish blood, that by anie means fell into their hands, but priests and all passed one way, that is, by the edge of the sword.

King Olbert purposed to haue passed the water of Forth, that waie to haue entered into Fife, & so ouer Tais into Angus: but hearing that the Scots had gathered a power to impeach his passage, he staied certeine daies. At length understanding that the enemies were nothing of that puissance or number, as at the first they were reported to be, he determined to set ouer in certeine boats ten thousand of his men; but through a sudden tempest of wind and weather, that rose in that instant, there were fine thousand of them drowned, the residue being constrained to land againe on the same side from the which they lofed, hauing lost through violence of the weather all their tackle and whole furniture of their vessels. Olbert being also admonished with this misfortune, thought god to attempt no more the furious rage of the water, but determined by land to go vnto Sterling, where he understood he should find the Britains, with whome he might ioine his power, and passe ouer the bidge there, and so invade other of the Scottish regions which lay thereabout.

But at his coming thither, certeine Scottish ambassadors came vnto him to sue for peace, which they humble required at his hands in name of the whole realme, beseeching him to consider well the state of the case as it stood, and not to trust to much on brittle fortune, the which sheweth hir selfe neuer stable; but commonlie vseth to call backe againe hir grant of prosperous successe, where the receiuer hath not skill to vse it moderatlie, and the banquished seemeth to haue bene sufficientlie corrected. As for the Scots, though it might appeare that their force was greatlie abated, & that resistance should little aniale them: yet were they minded to die in defense of their liberties, rather than to submit themselves vnto anie conditions of vile seruitude. The two of these ambassadors being thoughtlie wooed (though some took them in great disdain) yet in the end it was supposed that after victorie thus had against the enemies, honorable conditions of peace ought to be preferred before doubtfull warre.

Whereupon answere was made to the ambassadors, that both the English and British people with The Englishmen made Louthian, the Britains Galloway.

The Scots left countesslesse.

The Britains as yet kept possession of Cumberland, and those other countries it eng by the coast of those west seas. The victorie vied cruellie.

A great manie Englishmen drowned.

Ambassadors sue for peace.

Fortune is brittle.

Peace granted with conditions.

Articles of peace proposed.

The Forth called the Scottish sea.

Dumberton. It was called before Caler Arcluth, that is, the citie upon Clud, as H. Lhoid holdeth.

Hoffages are required.

The Scots unlike the articles of peace.

Calene his grave counsel taketh place.

The multitude consented unto Calene his sayings.

The Scots receive the peace.

Their kings were contented to have peace with the Scots (though it laie in their hands now to destroy the whole nation) if so be the Scots would agree to resigne aswell to the Englishmen as Britains all such lands and countries as they had now gotten into their possessions, without anie claime or title to be made to the same from thenceforth, either by them or anie of their posteritie, so that the water of Forth on the east halfe, should divide the Scottish dominions from the confines of the Englishmen & Britains, and be called from that time ever after, the Scottish sea. On the west the water of Clide should divide the Scottish lands from the Britains; the castell of Alcluth, standing at the mouth of the same river, to remaine in the hands of the Britains, from thenceforth to beare the name of Dumberton, that is to say, the castell of the Britains. And furthermore, that if anie of the Scots should attempt to passe the said bounds into anie of the British or English borders, he should die for that offense. And if by force of tempest it chanced anie of them to be driven to land on the south shore, within anie of those parties, they should take nothing away with them but water or bittels, and depart within thre daies, except some reasonable cause of straie constrained them to the contrarie. Moreover, they should not fortifie anie towne or castles on the frontiers nere to the English or British confines. And further, they should covenant to pay unto the Englishmen and Britains, within the space of twentie years, the summe of one thousand pounds of silver. For performance of which articles of agreement, the Scots should deliver thre score hostages, being the sonnes and helres apparant of the chiefest noble men of all their realme and countrie. And if it so were that they misliked and refused anie of these articles, he commanded that there should no other ambassadour come to him for anie other treatie of accord.

The ambassadours returning home, and declaring how they had sped, manie of the Scots thought the articles nothing reasonable for fre people to accept; other iudged that either they must come to some agreement with the Englishmen and Britains, or els put the land in extreme perill. Thus had the people bene divided into two contrarie opinions and factions, had not one Calene a noble man, bozne of high parentage, and gouvernour of Angus, with sober reasons and strong arguments appeased this contention, perswading them to have respect to the time. And sith the force of the realme was so imbebled, abated, and brought under foot through aduerse fortune: better it was to yeld unto necessitie in saving part at that present, in hope after, when occasion served to recouer the residue, than through obstinat willfullnesse to lose the whole. For considering the present danger, it could be reputed no dishonour to receive conditions of peace at the enemies hands, sith there wanted not the like example of the Romans, who gladly accepted such articles of peace, as that noble prince king Calo appointed them: and yet it is not to be iudged, that there wanted men of great knowledge and wisdom amongst them, and such as regarded their honor, so far forth as reason in anie wise did reach.

The multitude moved with these words of Calene, whose grave authoritie (by reason of his age and name) was of no small reputation amongst them, having lost nine of his owne sonnes in the last battell, they finally determined to follow his opinion in receiving the same conditions of agreement which Mbert had prescribed: and thereupon sent againe their ambassadours with the hostages appointed for the establishing of the peace, in manner as is before rehearsed. Which being throughlie accomplished in such sollemne wise, as in those daies and in the like cases was accustomed, Mbert set Donald with his nobles at libertie, sending them home together with the ambassadours, being earnestlie required so to do, both by the English lords, and also by the Britains.

The agreement being thus made, the lands were divided betwixt the Englishmen and the Britains, in such sort as the Britains had for their part all that which lieth from Sterling unto the west sea, betwixt the rivers of Forth and Clide, unto Timberland: and the Englishmen possessed the other parcels, lying from Sterling unto the east sea, betwixt the Scottish sea and Northumberland: so that by this means, Clide water, Forth, and the Scottish sea (where Forth runneth into the maine sea) divided the Scots from the Englishmen and Britains. And thus was the towne of Sterling a common march unto those thre people; the same towne with the castell remaining unto Mbert, as it was covenanted amongst other articles of this peace. Here (as the Scottish writers have) he ordeined his mint, and his coiners of monie to inhabit, whereupon came by the name of Sterling monie: but therein they are deceived, for (as in the historie of England shall appere) that name came not in use till manie yeeres after. Mbert also in this place caused a stone bridge to be made over the water of Forth, in stead of the wooden bridge which the Scots had made there, and was now pulled downe, and in the midst of this new stone bridge he set up a crosse, whereon were ingrauen these verses, to be read of the passers by:

Arma hic stant Briti, stant Scoti hac sub cruce tuti.*

I am free march as passengers maie ken,
To Scots, to Britains, and to Englishmen.

The Scots which had bene with the Englishmen in this iourne, ever hoping to be restored to their lands and former possessions by Mbert, when they saw how he retained the same in his owne hands, appointing his subjects to inhabit therein, they doubted that which afterwards came to passe in deed, least the Englishmen of friends would now become enemies, seeking the destruction of the whole British generation; thereby to assure themselves in the possession of those lands and living, whereunto the Scots (as they thought) would ever make some claime and title, whilst anie of them remained alive. Upon this mistrust therefore did those Scots, which were amongst the Englishmen, make the best shift they could for themselves, so that manie of them got ships, and sailed into Norwaye and Denmarke, unto their countreimen there: the other that could not make shift to get away, were slaine anon after by the Englishmen, so that one of them was not to be found alive within anie of the English dominions. And such was the end of the Scots that fled unto the Englishmen for succour. In this meane time the Scottish king Donald being restored againe to his countrie, was received with more joy and honor than he had deserved, in hope yet by this scourge of aduerse fortune, that he would have reformed his former abuses. Nevertheless, he had not bene at home anie long time, but that he fell to his old vicious trade of life againe, removing from his court such honorable personages as wished the better of his estate, with the advancement of the common welth, to the reliefe and ease of his poore miserable subjects. At length the nobles of the realme, perceiving the danger that their countrie stood in, by reason of Donalds insolent misorder, and disorderly rule and government, they found means to apprehend and commit him unto safe keeping. But the monstrous creature, within a few daies after he

The same yeare that the realme of Scotland was brought vnto such miserable state by the puissant force of the Englishmen and Britains, as aboue is rehearsed, there were sundrie wonders heard of in the countrie; as in Louthian a child of one moneth old and a halfe, admonished the mother to flee out of that countrie: for it would come to passe, that the enimies should come and take that region out of the Scottishmens hands. Beasts also, as they were pasturing abroad in the fields there, roaring after a strange sort, suddenly died. Fishes likewise, in shape resembling the figure of man, were found dead in the sands of the Scottish sea. In Galloway there fell such abundance of adders and snakes out of the skie, that the aire being corrupted with the saour of them lying on the ground, both men and beasts died of certaine diseases, which they took through infection thereof.

Such as were accounted to be skillfull in diuination, affirmed that these things did signifie an in-fortunat reigne, with an euill end vnto king Donald, as afterwards it happened, who hauing made away himselfe in prison (as before is exprest) Constantine the sonne of king Kenneth was crowned king at Scone, in the chaire of marble there, according to the manner as then vsed. After his first en-tring into the estate, he would gladlie haue gone in hand with the wars against the Englishmen, to haue recouered out of their possessions, those countries which they had lately taken from the Scots in his predecessors time: but his counsell aduised him otherwile, declaring that the state of the commonwealth was so decayed by the misgouernance of his said predecessor, that till the same were reformed, and such intestine discords, as through licentious libertie reigned amongst his subjects might be appealed and quieted, there was no hope to atchieue anie worthie enterprize abroad against forreigne e-nimies.

Whereupon by their aduertisements and good ad-uise, he deuised a reformation of all such misorders as were growen vp in all parts of his realme: and first for the spiritualtie, he ordeined that priests should attend their cures, and not to intermeddle with anie secular businesse, but to be free from going forth to the warres: neither should they keepe horses, hawks, or hounds. And if anie of them were found negligent in doing his dutie appertaining to his vocation, he should for the first fault forfeit a peece of monie, but for the second he should lose his benefice: For the youth of his realme he took order (to bryble them the better from wanton delights and sensuall lusts) that none of them should haue past one meale a day, and that of no fine or deuntie deli-cats, and to abstaine from all such drinke as might distemper their braine, so that if anie young person, either man or woman were knowne to be drunken, they should die for it.

He commanded further, that all the youth of his realme, should exercise running, wrestling, shouting, throwing of the dart and bowle: so to auoid slouthfullnesse, that their bodies might with such exercises be made the more able to indure paines and trauell: and for the same purpose he took order, that they should lie vpon the bare boards, with one man tell onlie thowen vnder them, so that they should tall nothing neither by day nor night, that might nosell them in anie wanton delights or effeminat pleasures. It was also ordeined, that all such as kept vittelling houses for banquetting there, should be banished the realme, with those that kept brothell houses. Thus were the Scots by obseruing of these ordinances, made within short time of glorious and excellent feeders, sober and temperat men: of delicate and easfull persons, hard, tough, and able to abide anie trauell or labor, were the same neuer so painfull: and hereof the state of the commonwealth began to grow to good perfection, so that Constantines administration was liked of the most part of all his subjects.

The first that went about to disquiet the prosperous reigne of that worthie prince, was one Euan, a man of an ancient house, & bozne in the westerne Isles. Such haue bene the vnquiet nature of the Scottishmen, euen from the beginning, neuer to liue contented anie long time either with peace or warre: for being once wearied with the charges of the warres, they streightwaies wish for peace; and hauing in time of peace heaped together some wealth, then can they not suffer the gouernement of their superiours, but either are readie to fall out with some forreigne enemy, or else to raise some commotion amongst themselves. This Euan therefore being the kings lieutenant of his castell of Dunstaffage in Louthquhaber, practised a conspira-cie against the king, with a number of other light persons being gentlemen bozne, mistaking the administration of things, onelie for that they saw how their inordinat libertie to oppresse inferiour persons, and to vse such wild and insolent misdeemeanour, as they had done afore time, was now restrained by lawfull iustice and execution of due punishment for the same.

But as these conspirators went about to haue moued the people of Louthquhaber, Murray land, Koller, and Cathnessie, to haue ioined with them in their traitorous enterprize, some of them in whom Euan put most trust, secretly aduertised the king of all the whole matter, who gathering a competent number of men together, made such speedie hast towards Dunstaffage, where the chiefe captaine of the rebels as then lay, that he came before the same person in killing were knowne to them within of his approch. By meane whereof committing vpon them so at once, he had the castell some at his pleasure; and immediatlie hereupon caused Euan to be trussed by on a high paire of gallows, for a spectacle to all his complices. And furthermore, leaue the other conspirators might prouide them of some other chief-teine, he apprehended diuerse of the nobilitie that were accused to be of Euans confederacie, the which he put in strict prison, there to be safely kept, till the peeres of the realme had determined with god deliberation, what should become of them. This busines being in this wise appealed, when all men looked for quietnesse, there suddenly followed a greater and more pernicious trouble: for such is the course of the world, that when men least thinke of mischiefe, they fall oftentimes into most danger.

Cadane king of Denmarke, pretending a title to all such lands as somtimes belonged to the Picts, for that the residue of that nation which had escaped the hands of the Scots and Englishmen, had resigned vnto him all their right & interest of the same lands, he determined in that quarrell (and in reuenge of the injuries which the Picts alledged they had sustained) to make warres both vpon Scots and Englishmen.
He caused therefore an huge number of ships to be prepared, and a mightie armie of men to be put in a readinesse, to passe in the same ouer into Albion, vnder the leading of his two brethren, the one named Hungar, and the other Hubba. These two chief-teins hauing their ships and men with all provision appertaining once readie, took the sea, and sailed forth.

The Danes being set on land, spared no kind of crueltie that might be shewed against the inhabitants, and namelie for that they had not as yet receiued the faith of Christ, they raged without all measure against priests, and religious persons, overthrowing and burning up churches and chapels, wherefoerer they found any in their way. Whereupon the Englishmen that inhabited in Louthian, and the Scots that dwelled in Fife, left their houses & possessions, fleeing into other parties, where they thought they might best escape the hands of their new come aduersaries. A great companie also of such vertuous and godlie persons, as about the same time laboured busilie in setting forth the word of life vnto the people in those parties, fled with one Adrian as then bishop of the Scottishmen, into the Island called Spate, which lieth in manner in the midway of the passage ouer the Forth betwixt Fife and Louthian, where as then there was a famous monasterie of monks. But neither the reuerence of the place, neither the innocencie of those harmles creatures could restrain the Danes from polluting their wicked hands in murdering that deuout companie, as they were then esteemed.

This is that reuerend band of martyrs, which the Scottish people haue had in such reuerence in the foresaid Island of Spate; a few names of some of that multitude as yet remaining in memorie amongst writers, as the foresaid bishop Adrian, Claudian, Caius, or (as others write) Ponanus archdeacon of saint Andrews, and bishop Stobrand: the names of the residue are forgotten. ¶ Some there be that affirme how this companie were Hungarians, the which fleeing out of their countrie, from the persecution which was their exercised by men of misbeliefs against the Christians, they arrived here in Scotland, and applied themselves to the instructing of the Scottishmen in the way of saluation. Other write that they were Scots and Englishmen thus assembled there together. But of whence soeuer they were, certaine it is that by custome they were become Scots, and instructed the Scots (as before is said) in the way of saluation. After this cruell slaughter thus by the Danes committed, they continued in their wood rage, as they passed through Fife and the other countries nere bordering vpon the same, till all the inhabitants were auoided out of their houses, either by flight or slaughter.

Constantine the Scottish king being kindled in the meane time with passing great displeasure, for these so notable injuries receiued at the hands of the Danes, thought good with all speed to go against them, and to attempt the chance of battell before they had wasted any further within his dominions, so greatlie to the diminishing of his roiall power and estimation amongst his subiects. Whereupon leuelling his people, and assembling a mightie host together, he passed forth with the same towards his enemies, the which were lodged in two seuerall camps, the one being distant from the other about a quarter of a mile, seuered in sunder with the course of a little riuer called Leuin, the which (vpon the approach of the Scots vnto that part of the campe that lay on the further side next vnto them) chanced to be raised on such height, though abundance of raine, that in two daies after vnneth it might be passed ouer at the swords.

After this sore and tempestuous weather, the aire cleared vp and waied verie faire and calme, giuing occasion to the Scots to worke their feat against one part of their enemies, whilst the other could not come ouer vnto their aid and succors. In this campe which lay on that side the riuer next vnto the Scots, Hubba was lodged, who did what he could to haue staied his men from issuing forth of the campe, to giue battell when the Scots drew nere to the same, and assailed all waies by prouoking the Danes with skirmishes to come forth and fight with them in plaine field. But notwithstanding all that he could doe, forth they rushed in such wise by plumps, and with so great noise and clamour, that the captiues were constrained of necessity to set them in order of battell, with they would needs giue the onset vpon their present enemies.

The Danes did weare aloft vpon their armor ceruene linen garments, wrought with red silke, shewing faire and white both at hand and a far off. Their weapons were of such sort as serued for the push rather than for downe-right blowes, the points being of such a handsome strong fashion, that no armor might lightlie hold forth against them. These kind of weapons, together with the mulker of their huge bodies, was dreadfull at the first for the Scottishmen to behold, as they marched towards them in arae of battell. But anon comming nere together ready to ioine, the Scots manfully taking to them new courages, set vpon the Danes with great violence, who likewise began the battell verie stoutlie, so that the same continued right fierce and cruell a good space. At length the Danes being assailed on each side, both afront before, and on their backs behind, oppressed as it were with multitudes, did throw downe their weapons and fled amaine. Many of them making towards their campe were overtaken and slaine, diuerse of them falling into the ditches were oppressed with throng, aswell of their owne companie, as of their enemies, as they passed ouer them in following the chase, and straining to enter the campe vpon such as stood to defend them from entering. Other there were that leaping into the water in hope to get ouer, were drowned in the whirling waues of the streame; though some, through helpe of their fellowes (which stood on the other side ready to haue passed the water, if they might so haue done without manifest danger of drowning) escaped and got ouer, amongst whom Hubba was one, to the great reioicing of his brother Hungar, to see him thus deliuered thence from perill of death, as first from amongst his enemies, and secondlie out of the roying streame of that deepe and swift raging riuer.

The Scots hauing thus put one part of their enemies to the worke, with that hapie successe took such comfort and immoderate ioy, as though they had bene now sure of victorie ouer all the residue; so that for two daies together, there was such dancing, singing, and piping amongst them, as the like hath not bene heard of. So farre proceeded their insolent outrage, that they began to contend amongst themselves for the prisoners and spoiles, which they counted now their owne, as though already they had the same whole in their possession: and further reasoned, not without altercation, whether the Danish captiues after they had them once in their hands, should be put to death, or els be kept aliuie to be shewed to the people in triumph; or no. Great adoe and manie vaine words were spent hereabout, in such earnest sort, that they were at point to haue fallen out amongst themselves: but there was no mention at all made touching the ordering of their battels, and other the necessarie proceedings against their enemies. At length, when the riuer was fallen and come to his old course againe, so that it might easilie be passed, Constantine in order of battell got ouer with his people, to the other side where the Danes were lodged, who hauing more mind to set themselves in such order, whereby they might gaine the victorie, than to denie for the diuiding of the spoile, perceiving occasion now offered to giue the onset, forthwith araid their people in this sort.

Hubba with six thousand Danes, was placed in the right wing. The left was led by one Buerne an Englishman borne, who was fled out of his countrie, for that he could not beare such iniuries as Albert offered him in forcing his wife, to the great reproch and dishonor of his house and name. He had with him in this left wing certaine bands of Englishmen, with those that had escaped ouer into Denmarke (as before is mentioned.) Hungar with all the residue of the armie, kept the battell in the middle ward, exhorting his men to shew their force & manhood that day, with the same should either put them in possession of the whole land of Albion, with all the substance and riches contained therein, or else bring them perpetuall seruitude with ignorance amongst their most cruell and fierce aduersaries. He therefore himselfe openlie in presence of them all, bowed with solemne oth, either to returne with victorie to his campe, either else to die in the place, willing them all to make the like couenant. Whereupon the vniuersall multitude allowed him so much for this his motion, that there was not one amongst the whole number, which agreed not to sweare the like oth. Constantine keeping in manner the like order, placed in the right wing his brother Ethus, in the left Duncane the lieutenant of thane of Athole, appointing to either of them ten thousand men a peece.

All the residue were set in the battell where he himselfe stood. And first he gaue them all hartie thanks in that they had so valiantlie achieved the victorie in the last battell, requiring them now not to blemish their former glorie with any faintnesse of courage, recreant cowardise, or dishonorable flight: and further he willed them in no wise to be afraid of their enemies, in respect more for their hugeness of bodie, than for any of their valiant stoutnesse of heart: for if they assailed them with one whole and entire consent, according to their wonted forwardnesse & manlike prowes, they should quicklie put them to flight, and obtaine a full victorie. Wherewith he also warned them not to run rashly vpon the enemies, but to suffer them first to giue the charge: for by that meanes he thought the Danes would with their earnest violence disorder themselves, and so should it be more easie for the Scots to breake in amongst them.

But this deuise did not a little abate the Scottish mens courages. For the Scots see is, when they shall enter into battell, to make a great shout and noise, and therewith to run vpon their enemies, by which meanes (as they suppose) they both put the enemy in feare, and encourage themselves to the battell. The Danes at the sound of the trumpet marched forth towards the Scots, where they stood thus in order of battell: but when they perceived that the Scots came not forward, they also staid in the midway to refresh themselves, least at the joining they should be out of breath. Anon after, passing forward an easie pace, they shot quartels, and threw darts at their enemies verie freshlie, and the Scots let flie at them againe with arrowes and darts as thicke as it had bene a storme of haille.

After this they rushed together with great violence on both sides: but within a while, the Danes had put both the wings of their enemies to flight, and after compassing the maine battell round about, they constrained the same in the end with great blowes and slaughter to giue backe and flie out of the field. Ten thousand Scots died that day in this unfortunate battell with Constantine himselfe, who being first taken was had into a caue by the sea side a mongst the rocks, and there cruellie murdered by the enemies. The place was called certaine yeeres after, the blacke den: but now they name it the diuels den, in memorie of that heinous murder there committed. The Scottish nation also had bene better lie as then destroyed, had not Ethus the brother of Constantine, perceiving how the field was lost, escaped awaie with two companies of his best men of warre, so reseruing himselfe to the time of more luckie fortune.

The people likewise doubting for want of a gouernour, to be the sooner overcome by their enemies, did lead the said Ethus to Scone, where they crowned him king, in the yeere after the birth of our Saviour 874, and the 13 after Constantine began to rule the estate of the realme. The same yeere were manie wonders and vniuersall sights seene within the Scottish dominions. In the mouth of the Forth, otherwise called the Scottish sea, there appeared fishes in great numbers, like vnto men in shape, swimming vp and downe in the streame with halfe their bodies aboue the water, and hauing a blacke skin, which couered their heads and necks, from their shoulders vponwards like an hood. These are called Bassinates, and vse to go in great companies together, as though they were skulles of herrings, signifieng (when they are seene) some great misfortune vnto the countrie, as the common people haue long had an opinion. Also the loches, riuers, and all maner of other waters were frozen from the beginning of Nouember, till the latter end of April: and when the frost brake, and the snow melted, there was such a flood flowing ouer all the plaines euen to the roots of the mounteins, as the like had not bene seene. Furthermore, when the same thynke and went away, in the mud and slime there was such a sort of frogs left, that when they were dead, and began to putrifie, the aire was so infected, that manie deathlie diseases ensued, whereof great numbers of the inhabitants did perish. Moreover, there was a mightie starre or comet seene with fire rates issuing forth of the same, which both night and day followed the moon during the moneth of April, to the great horror of all that beheld it.

But to proceed. The Danes (as is said) hauing banquished the Scots, and wasted the countrie of fife, passed ouer into Lothian, where robbing and spoiling all before them, they pursued the inhabitants into Northumberland, whither they fled for refuge. Where the Danes being aided with certaine Englishmen in fauour of Buerne, slue in battell both Albert and Ella, kings of that countrie. The crueltie of the Danes was such after they had achieved the victorie, that few escaped with life, but such as saued themselves by flight. But chiefe there rage appeared most against priests, and such as professed themselves men of religion. For the Danes being Ethnicks, persecuted most egerlie those that in any wise professed Christ. The like outrageous murdering of the christians was practised thorough out the countrie, and at length came vnto that blessed king saint Edmund, reigning as then ouer the people of the East Angles, as in the English historie more plainlie maie appere. Doubtless other of the English kings maintained the warres with these Danes certaine yeeres after this, with variable fortune: the most part of those people which inhabited on that coast toward the Germane seas, either being slaine or brought into miserable bondage and thraldome. But Alured, which succeeded his brother king Edelfred, not in the kingdom of Northfolke and Suffolke (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) but in the kingdom of the Westsaxons, redressed a great part of this miserie, into the which the countrie was thus and thereupon was surnamed Lightfoot: but of what nimble lightnesse of bodie soever he was, truth it is that he was of disposition in mind brist to have the order of anie publike regiment. For whereas he might have recovered Fife and Louthian with other regions, whilst the Englishmen and Danes were together by the eares, he passed over that occasion, delighting more in following the pleasures of the bodie & sensuall lusts, than to bestow his time in feates of chivalrie and other warlike exercises. The nobles of the realme perceiving him thus to abuse the wozthie gifts of his person, mistrusting least his insolent doings should indamage the publike state of the common-wealth, they toke counsell togither how they might apprehend him, and to send him some whither out of the waite where to be safely kept, and then to place some other in the government of the realme, that might rule the same with more discretion & better advise. And least their resolution should be disclosed before it toke effect, they slackt no time, but went speedilie about their businesse. And coming to the king, whome they found a hunting in Calidon wood, they suddenlie arrested him, and ther-with committed him to safe keeping: & those whome they knew to be favourers of his euill rule and mis-governance, they put them also fast in irons, till they had answered unto such articles as should be laid to their charge. This done, they proceeded to the election of a new king; and in the end by the persuasion of one Dongall gouernor, or thane of Argyle, they chose Gregorie the sonne of that Dongall, which reigned before Alpine, who was not past two moneths old when his father died.

This Gregorie being knowne to be a man wozthie of the come, though he himselte onlie was against it, at length by persuation received the inuesture of the kingdome at Scone, with all due solemnnitie. Ethas hearing thereof, through anguish of mind died within thre daies after, in the second yere of his reigne, and 876, after the birth of our Saviour. There be that write how he was strangled in prison by Dongall his procurement, least by adventure he might haue bene restored unto libertie, and withall haue made claime to the crowne againe.
Gregorie being thus established in the estate, considering that the suertie of all realmes rested in the hands of the diuine maiestie, to begin his government with some luckie enterprise, caused a convocation to be holden at Forfar, for the advancement of Christs religion: where amongst other things, it was ordained, that priests from thenceforth (to the end they might more frelie attend to their vocation) should be exempt from paying of tribute and all manner of exactions. Also that they should not be constrained to go unto the warres, neither to come before anie temporall iudges, but onlie before their or-dinarie and bishops, by whome they should be iudg-ed in all causes. The same ordinaries and bishops should also haue authoritie to order all men, both publike and priuate, aswell for the keeping of faith gi-uen, as to constraine them to confirme the same, and to punish such as should be found in the contrarie; likewise in causes of controuersie touching matri-monie, tithes, testaments, legacies, and such like: moreouer the correcting of those that blaspheme either God or his saints.

Heretikes and necromancers, with other the like offenders against the lawes and articles of the christian religion, was assigned unto the bishops and their substitutes, so that all those which were found disobedient unto them, and refused to be at their commandement, they should haue authoritie to excommunicate them out of the church, and from compa-nie keeping with anie of the cōgregation, so as they that were thus excommunicated, should be deprived of all abilitie to take anie inheritance or right to lands or possessions whatsoever they were. Neither should they be accepted as a witness in anie maner of cause, neither beare anie office or rule in the common-wealth. This Gregorie also (as is said) was the first author of that ordinance, by the which the Scottish kings at their coronation use of ancient custome to vow by solemne oth, that during their liues, they shall mainteine and defend the church with his ministers, in all ancient liberties and priuileges, and not to suffer anie man to hurt or infringe the same.

There was suerlie in this Gregorie a certeine naturall inclination to vertue, with such abstinence in all his wozds, that he uttered few or none but that the same seemed to be spoken with verie great consideration. He was neuer married, but continued in chastitie all his life time. Of meate & drinke he was verie spare, delighting in all kind of sobrietie, more watchfull than giuen to sleepe. But his fame increased most for his maintaining of iustice and ciuill administration concerning the state of the commonwealth, not omitting the practise of warre, where ne-cessitie required. The first expedition which he toke in hand, he made into Fife, to reconquer that countrie to the crowne of Scotland. At whose entrance into the same, the Picts, whome the Danes had left in those parties at their departure thence, being stricken with fear to fall into the hands of the Scots their ancient enemies, fled forthwith into Louthian, leauing Fife in manner void, and without anie that would offer to defend it against the Scots.

Whereupon Gregorie so finding it desolate of inhabitants, sent for people out of other parts of his realme, appointing them dwellings in that countrie as he thought most expedient. This done he passed into Louthian, where taking the fortresses and places of defense, some by force, and some by surrender, he easilie reduced that countrie into his subiection, so that within a few daies, hauing there all at his pleasure, he came unto Berwik, where there were a great number of Danes ioined togither with the Picts, as men not minding to flee anie further, but to fight with the Scots even there, if they should come forward vpon them. But when they saw what number the Scots were of, and herewith doubting the Englishmen to come on their backs if the matter went not well with them; they thought it best that such Danes as were of anie great reputation of nobilitie, should withdraw into Berwik before the enemies were at hand, and the residue to passe ouer Twed into Northumberland, there to ioinie with other Danes that in those parties were latelie arrived.

But the Englishmen within Berwik, abhorring nothing more than to be vnder subiection of the Danes, in the euening after the receiuing of the Danish nobles into their towne, deliuered it togither with their guests unto the Scottishmen, who suffering the Englishmen at their pleasure either to go their waies with all their goods, or to remaine still in their houses, due the Danes, without sparing either man, woman, or child. Then leauing a strong garrison of Scottishmen within Berwik, Gregorie marched forth with the residue of his people into Northumberland, to visite that countrie to other of his dominions that bordered vpon the same.

In those parties at that selfe time there were two armies lodged in the fields, the one of Danes not far from York, vnder the leading of one Herdunt, who had latelie taken and sacked that citie, and the other of Englishmen that late 20 miles off from the said Danes. Herdunt hearing of the slaughter which the Scots had made of his countreymen at Berwick, threatened sore that he would not leave a man alive of the Scottish race within anie part of the confines of Albion. Which bow manie of the companie, following their capitaine's example, likewise made. Shortly after, hearing of their enemies approach, the whole host (by commandement of Herdunt) issued forth of their campe to giue battell.

Here the Scottish king standing with his people in order of battell, had thought to haue vsed some comfutable speech vnto them, thereby to encourage them to fight: but such hast was made by the Scots to please vpon their enemies, that he saw it more needfull to take heed to the ordering of them in perfect arais, than to stand about to exhort them, whome he saw ready enough of their owne accord to fight. Wherefore he said no more vnto them, as he went amongst the ranks, but onelie willed them to remember how cruellie Constantine their king was sometime murdered, after he had yielded himselfe prisoner to these enemies, with whome they should now foine.

The Scots here vpon running to the battell with no lesse stoutnesse of mind than violent force, gaue their enemies scarce space to charge their weapons, but bare them downe with long speares and taue-lins, and withall the bilmen following them made great slaughter on ech side, so that there needed neither exhortation of capitaine, nor diligence of soldiers to keepe them in arais. For the wrathfull stormes of the souldiers onelie wrought the feat in such sort, that the Danes were quicklie put to flight and chased. Those that could not escape to the campe, got them vnto the next mountaine, who chanced vpon better lucke than those that escaped to the campe, for the egerneesse of the Scots was such in chasing the enemies, that neither ditch nor rampire could staie them from entring the campe vpon the Danes where they made greater slaughter than they had done in the field.

The next daie Herdunt goeth about to assemble his men together againe, being disperfed here and there: but when he vnderstood how he had lost the more halfe of his whole host, he cursed that unhappy day, and determined to retire vnto Kassin, who as then was capitaine generall of all the Danes that were in England. But Herdunt by reason of his wounded men, whome he was faine to carie with him, could not make forward with anie great speed, so that he was scarce forty miles got forth on his waie, when word came to him, that Kassin fighting with the Englishmen vntwarlike, at a place called Helcades, chanced to be slaine with a great multitude of his people: and there vnto his head was carried abroad vpon and downe the countrie from towne to towne to be sene. By such mishaps the prosperitie of the Danes so much flourishing of late, began now manifestlie to decaye.

Herdunt although he was not a little discouraged therewith, yet he chose forth a plot of ground most meet for his purpose, where he determined to abide in campe, till he might vnderstand what the Danes in other places were minded to do. But Gregorie king of Scots, hauing thus expelled the Danes forth of Northumberland, brought that countrie vnder his subiection: neuertheless he permitted the inhabitants to inioy all their possessions still, onelie re-ceiuing of them in name of soueraintie a yecrelie tribute. So that within a few daies after, he brake by his armie, and went himselfe into Berwick, where he remained all the winter season: in consultation with his nobles about the publike affaires of the realme.

In the beginning of the next summer, he prepared againe for warre, and raising an armie, he purposed to make a iourne against the Britains, who held (as before ye haue heard) a great part of Scotland. But he was not driuen to vse anie force in this warre: for the Britains being vexed afore this time with warre by the Danes, had compounded with them for an huge summe of monie to haue truce for twentie yeres space: but the Danes without regard to their promise, shortly after (with a greater power than at the first) entered into the British borders, renewing the warre so fiercelie, that albeit their force was fore enfeebled, by reason of the two last overthrowes; yet the Britains doubting the worst, feared to incounter with them, and therefore after consultation had, they thought it best to aduise if they might happilie allure the Scots, of their enemies to become their friends. Wherevpon sending vnto the Scottish king an herald, they require to ioine with them in armes against the Danes, common enemies to both their countries, promising that if they would so do, they would willinglie render into his hands all such possessions which they held at anie time belonging vnto the Scottish kingdome.

Gregorie weighing with himselfe how necessarie this friendship should be, not onelie to the publike weale of all the whole land of Albion, but also of the good libertie and aduancement of Christs religion, whereof the Danes were greivous aduersaries (for this he thought, that if Scots, Englishmen, and Britains did ioine in one, and knit themselves together in aiding each other, there was no nation in the world that they needed to feare) he consented vnto the request of the Britains, and so accepting their offer, he had all those regions which pertained sometime to the Scots, and were now in possession of the Britains, surrendered into his hands, and so by this means were the Scottish confines enlarged and extended vnto their owne ancient limits and former bounds.

This dissention and variance being ceased after this manner, it greatlie reioiced the minds of all the inhabitants of this Ile, but contrariwise the Danes looked for nothing more than present destruction to inue vpon them, if this amitie should continue anie while amongst their enemies. Wherefore they practised sundrie means to breake th amitie thus remaining betwixt their aduersaries, Scots, Englishmen, and Britains. Wherein they needed not greatly to trauell, for within a short time after the conclusion of the same league, the prosperous successe of the Englishmen (which for a season had followed them vnder the conduct and gouernement of their king Alured against the Danes) occasioned the Britains also (hauing now no further feare of the Danish puissance) to repent themselves of the league, which they had latelie made with the Scots, so that Constantine, whome a little before they had receiued to be their king after the deccasse of his father, raised a power, and with the same entered into Annandale, to recover that countrie out of the Scottish mens hands. But hearing in the end that Gregorie was comming with a great armie to succour his subiects, whome the said Britains on each side had fore afflicted, they began to draw backe towards Cumberland with their bottie, thinking there to be in safetie, vntill a time more conuenient.

with them at Lochmaben, and there gaue them battell, wherein when Constantine perceived how his people began to thinke backe, as one hauing moze regard to his honoz than to the suertie of his life, he rushed forth into the foremost pzease, there to succour and relieue his standards: but being compassed about amongst a great companie of his enimies, his chance was there to be slaine with a number of the chiefeest lords of all the British nation. The other multitude seeing the day go thus against them, fled to saue their liues, leauing the victorie so vnto the Scots.

This overthrow did put the Britains in danger to haue bin vtterlie ouerrun, what by the Scots on the one side, and Danes on the other: for as for forren aid to be looked for of the English, they had plaine answer they should haue none, sith they had so vntrustlie broken the league concluded with their confede-rats the Scots, to the great hinderance of the prosperous proceedings of all the inhabitants of this Ile, against their common enimies the Danes.
Yet the better to establish the estate of their coun-trie, and in hope of some recouerie of their former damages, they crowned to their king one Herbert oz (as some copies haue) one Hebert the brother of the last Constantine, and herewith sent ambassa-dours vnto Gregorie king of the Scottishmen to excuse themselves, in that they had so wrongfullie attempted the warres against him and his people, laing all the fault in Constantine, who against the wills and contrarie to the minds of his subiecs, did take vpon him that dishonorable and most infortunat enterprife.

Gregorie hauing heard the message of these ambassadors, for answer declared vnto them, that he vnderstood well enough, that the Britains now sued for peace vpon no reuerend consideration they had vnto their oths of covenant; but onelie for that they saw how if they should pursue the warre still, they were sure that in the end they should be like to haue the solle: and therefore he was fullie thus resol-ued, not to conclude anie peace oz truce with such disloyall people, till they had resigned ouer into his hands the whole possession of the countreies of Cumberland and Westmerland, with assurance neuer to pretend anie claime oz title vnto those dominions from thenceforth: and herewith for performance of covenants, to render into his hands not onelie the keies of all the towne, castels and fortresses in the same countreies, and to auoid quite their waies into Wales to ocher their countriemen there, but also to deliuer fittie noble mens sonnes and heires apparent as pledges to remaine with the Scots.

The ambassadors returning home with this message, and reporting it accordingly vnto their king, when all men had said their aduise, in the end they condescended to conclude a peace with the rehearsed conditions prescribed by the Scottish king, sith they saw no better meane to preserve their nation from present destruction. And thus deliuering the appointed number of pledges, they left the countreies of Cumberland and Westmerland void, surrendering into the Scottishmens hands the possessions of all the towne, castels and fortresses, and therewith departed into Northwales, where they placed themselves in the countrie betwixt Contway and the riuer of Dee, out of the which they expelled the Englishmen (that were then in possession thereof) and therewith they erected a kingdome there, which they named Stradcluid, mainteining warres against the Englishmen manie yeares after.

King Gregorie hauing thus enlarged his kingdome, assembled his nobles at Carleill, where he resolved (with their aduise) to followe such good fortune as by Gods prouidence shallice chanced vnto them. Whereupon it was agreed, that they should go first vnto Yorke to conuere that citie, whilst the Englishmen in Kent were occupied with the Danes that were come thither; so as neither the one nation noz the other could attend to make anie attempt to hinder the Scottishmens enterprife. But in the meane time came ambassadors vnto Gregorie from king Alured, to congratulat his prosperous successe against his enimies the Danes and others. These ambassadors also willed to haue the ancient league betwixt Englishmen and Scots renewed, by which means both their powers might ioine togither against their common enimies, when they should attempt anie wrongfull inuasion.

This request was granted, so that shortly there-vpon peace was established betwixt those princes and their people, with confirmation of the old league, thereto were added these articles; That the Scots should inioy possession of Northumberland without anie claime to be made to the same by the Englishmen; If the Danes chanced to inuade either of their dominions, the warre should be accounted as common to them both; Neither should the Scots grant passage to anie enimie of the Englishmen through Scotland, neither the Englishmen suffer the Scottishmens enimies to passe through England; If anie Englishmen did rob oz steale anie thing out of Scotland, that should not bzeake the league; but the offendours with the receiueurs should be deliuered to the Scottish magistrats, to be punished according to the qualitie of the offense; and the like should be obserued by the Scots towards the Englishmen.

Thus things being quieted with the Englishmen, as Gregorie was about to lay armour aside, word came to him of new troubles forth of Galloway, by reason of an inuasion made by the Irishmen into that countrie. For the Irishmen hauing knowledge that the inhabitants of Galloway had spoiled two ships of Dublin arriuing on their coast, sent ouer a great power of men, the which landing in Galloway, made great slaughter of the people on each side.
King Gregorie being aduertised hereof, straightwaies made towards them, but they hauing knowledge of his coming, drew their ships with a great prey of goods and cattels, and returned therewith immediatlie backe into their owne countrie.

Whereupon Gregorie without delate got togither his ships and followed the enimie with all his armie, and landing in Ireland, put the nobles of that realme in great feare, who as then were in contention togther which of them should haue the gouernement, by reason their king was latelie dead, and had left a sonnie behind him being but a child in yeres, to succeed him in his throne. Some therefore of the wisser sort, and such as tendered the wealth of their coun-trie, went earnestlie about to agree the parties, but when they saw that it would not be, they did so much pzeuasle, that a truce was taken betwixt them for a while, least fighting still amongst themselves, they should put their countrie in danger to be ouerrun of the Scots: against whome when they had agreed vpon the foresaid truce, either of the factions raised a power, one Ben being generall of the one, and Cornelius of the other; for these two princes were heads of the parties, betwixt whom the controuersie for the gouernement of the realme rested, and therevpon by consent of the restidus had the leading of all them that were of their faction.

These two captains with their armies inuaded themselves vpon the bankes of the riuer Bane, vnder the mountaine called Fute: their camps being seuered by a small distance the one from the other, in such a strong place, that it was not possible for the enemies to approach them without manifest danger to cast away themselves. Their chiefe purpose was to prolong the time here in this place, till they had furnished the Scottish armie, and then to deale with them at their pleasure. But the industrious pro-uision of Gregorie passed the politike deuile of the Irishmen: for he had commanded that euerie one of those Scottishmen, which passed the seas with him, should purueie himselfe of wittels, according to the custome of the countrie, for fiftie daies space, as of bread, cheefe, butter, lard, and powdered biefe: as for drinke, they knew they should not need to care, sith they were sure to find water inough in euerie place where they chanced to come: for as yet filthie & seruile gluttonie had not softened nor inured with wanton delicacie the warlike natures of the Scottish people.

In the end Gregorie, hauing for certeine daies rested himselfe and his men, and deuising in the meane time which way he might best indamage the enemies; at length concluded to send in the night season two thousand of his souldiours by to the ridge of the fosenamed mountaine called Jfute, through the thicke bushes and woods, wherewith the same was conuced, to the end that getting to the top of that hill, right ouer where the Irish camps laie, they might in the morning (at what time Gregorie with the rest of the armie went about to assaile his enimies) tumble downe stones from the bowes of the hill vpon them, thereby either to destroy great numbers of them, either else to constrain them to come forth of their strength into the plaine fields, and so to fight with them in a place indifferent.

Kenneth Cullan the thane of Carriske, toke by on him to haue the conduct of them that should go about this interprise, who conueleng his hand ouer the water of Wane, and so vp on the backside of the mountaine, in the morning when their felows fell in hand to assaile the Irish campe, where Wren lodged, they tumbled such plentie of mightie stones downe vpon the Irishmen, that aboue a thousand of them being slaine, all the residue were forced to forsake their ground, & to flee in maner without anie stroke stricken. The Scots that were sent to pursue them, toke a great number of them prisoners, and due but a few, hauing before hand such commandement from their prince.

Whilist this mischiefe fell vpon Wren and his people, Cornelius with his folkes cursling that in-fortunate date, left their lodgings, and marched their waies in god order of battell, till they were farre inough out of danger. The bodie of Wren also was found amongst other in the rising of the campe, with the head bzuisled in peces, and the baines pa-shed out with some stone throtone downe by the Scottishmen from the hill side: which Gregorie at the request of some of the prisoners, caused to be buried in chistian sepulchre. He caused also women and children to be sent auaite harmlesse, onelie re-teining the men of able age prisoners. Furthermore he commanded that they should vse neither fire nor sword, but against such onelie as with weapon in hand made anie resistance: and commanded them also that they should prouide themselves of wittels to serue them, whilist they should lie abroad & remaine there in that countrie.

Whereupon manie of the Irish people thus talking the mercifull clemencie of the Scottish king, yeldded themselves vnto him with sundrie fortresses, so that Gregorie finding sufficient prouision of wittels to serue his host for a long season, he went vnto the strong citie of Doungarg, or Doungard, which he en-uironed about with a strong siege, & continuing the same certeine daies, at length they within wearied with continuall tranell and lacke of wittels, opened the gate, and suffered him to enter. He would not permit his men to meddle with anie of the spoile, but appointed the toluenemen to redeme the same (their armour excepted) of his souldiours for a peece of monie.

Afterward, tarieng in this citie by the space of thre daies, he departed and came afore another citie called Pontus, which he receiued by surrender, and therefore preferued the citizens from all hurt & annoiance. From thence he purposed to haue gone vnto Dublin, about 14 miles distant from Pontus, but as he marched thitherwards, he was aduertised that Cornelius was comming towards him with such an huge armie, as the like had not bene scene with, in the memorie of man in that Ile. Whereupon Gregorie changing his purpose of going to Dublin, vpon report of these newes, he got him vp into the next mountaine.

The next day came the Irishmen ranged in thre battels. In the first there was a great multitude of kernes with darts and bowes: in the second were a great number of mightie tall men, armed in cotes of male, with bucklers and great long swords, which they carried vpon their right shoulders. In the third battell, wherein stood their generall Cornelius, with all the chieftest nobles of the countrie, were an infinite companie of all sorts of souldiours, chosen forth of all the whole numbers. The Scots (according to their custome) diuided themselves into two wings, and a middle ward, in euerie of the which were thre sorts of souldiours: as first archers, and those with long speares, then bilmen, and last of all such as bare long swords and leaden malles.

Thus the battels being ordered on both parts, forward they make one towards another to begin the fight. The Scots (after their shot and thowling of darts was spent, and that they came to iouine) kept off their enemies with long speares or sauelins, in such sort, that they were not able to come nere them: which disadvantage Cornelius perceiving, commanded on high, that they should with their swords cut those sauelins in sunder. And as he lifted vp the visor of his helmet, the better to exhort his people to the execution hereof, he was so wounded in the face with a speare, that he was faine to withdraue apart out of the field. The Irishmen supposing he had fled, incontinentlie to saue themselves, they off their armour and fell to running auaite. Thus did the victo-rie incline to the Scottish standards.

There died but a few (to speake of) in the battell, whobest in the chafe there was a wonderfull number slaine: for the Scots pursued them euen vnto Dublin gates, which citie the next daie Gregorie beset on each side with a mightie siege. There was got into this citie at the same time a wonderfull multitude of people, what of such as were receiued into it fleeing from the battell, as also of other which were there assembled before, in hope of assured victorie and safegard of their goods. By reason wherof being thus besieged, they began quicklie to want wittels, so that either they must of necessitie yeld, either else by some issue auoid that danger wherein they were presentlie beuoyaped.

But forasmuch as they saw no great likelihood of god successe in that exploit, in the end it was concluded amongst them, that (sith there was no meane for those noble men which were inclosed within that citie to escape the enemies hands, and that there were none other of anie reputation abroad able to defend the countrie from the Scottishmens puillance) they should fall to some treatie with the Scottish king for a peace to be had, with so reasonable conditions as might be obtained: for other remedie in that present mischief they could devise none, and therefore this was iudged the best waie of the whole number, namelie of Cormach bishop of Dublin, a man for his singular vertue and reputation of bright life, of no small authoritie amongst them.

Cormach B. of Dublin went unto K. Gregorie. He toke vpon him also to go vnto Gregorie to breake the matter, & so comming afore his presence, besought him most humbly to haue compassion vpon the poore miserable citie, and in such sort to temper his wrath, if he had conceiued anie pece of displeasure against the citizens, that it might please him yet vpon their humble submission to receiue them vnto his mercie, and further to accept into his protection his cousine yong Duncane, vnto whome the kingdome of Ireland was due of right, as all the world well vnderstand. He besought him also to remember, that it appertained more to the honor of a king, to preferue the lawfull right of other kings and princes with the quiet state of cities and countreies, than by violent hand to seke their destruction.

A little saieng. Wherevnto the king answered, that he was not come into Ireland for anie couetous desire he had to the realme, or to the intent to spoile his kinsman of the gouernement thereof, but onely to reuenge such iniuries as the Irishmen had done to his subiects. Not the Scots but the Irishmen themselves were they that had giuen the occasion of the warre, which they had deseruie bought with no small portion of their blood (which had bene shed) as punished for that crime worthilie by the iust iudgement of almighty God. But as touching an end to be had of his quarrell, & for the reseruing of the kingdome vnto yong Duncane behoufe, when he had the citie at his pleasure, he would then take such order as he should thinke most conuenient.

King Gregorie his wife & godly answer. This answer of the Scottish king being reported vnto them within the citie, they determined forthwith to set open their gates to receiue him: who, when he had caused search to be made whether all things were true as he ment according to the outward shew or not, he marched forth towards the citie to enter the same in order of battell, with all his whole armie, into the which he was receiued with procession of all the estates: for first there met him all the priests and men of religion, with the bishop the foresaid Cormach, who hauing vpon him his pontificall apparell, bare in his hand the crucifix: then followed the nobles with the other multitude.

Dublin is surrendered vnto K. Gregorie. Which order when Gregorie beheld, he commanded his battell to staie a little, and therewith he himselfe advanced forth on foot till he came to the bishop, and falling downe vpon his knees, he reuerentlie kissed the crucifix, wherevpon receiuing humble thanks with high commendation of the bishop for such his clemencie, he entered the citie, not staing till he came into the market place, where commanding one part of his armie to keepe their standing, he went with the residue vnto the church of our ladie, and after to that of saint Patrike, where hearing the celebration of diuine seruice, when the same was ended, he entered the castell, where his lodging was prepared. In the morning he caused execution to be done of certeine vnrulie persons of his armie, who in the night passed had broken vp the houses of some of the citizens, and rauished diuerse women. And for this act Gregorie being had in high reuerence of the Irish people, lodged part of his armie within the citie, and part he commanded to lodge without in the campe.

He entred the castell. At length hauing remained a season in this estate at Dublin, he caused the Irish lords to assemble in counsell, where in the end the peace was concluded betwixt him and them, with these articles and covenants. First it was agreed that the yong king Duncane should be brought vp vnder the gouernement of wise and discret persons, to be instructed in all princelie knowledge, within a strong castell, (wherein he had hitherto remained euer since his fathers decease) till he came to yeeres of discretion. And that in the meane time Gregorie should haue the gouernance of the realme, receiuing all the fortresses into his possession. He should also haue the appointment of the magistrates, who should see iustice ministred according to the old statutes & ordinances of the Irish kingdome. That the Irishmen should receiue neither Englishman, Britaine, nor Dane, into their countrie, no not so much as for trade of merchandize, without safe conduct to be granted by him. So that things being thus brought to a quietnesse in Ireland, he receiued an oth of the chieft of them for performance of the covenants, and here with taking with him threescore hostages, he returned with his victorious armie backe into Scotland.

After this there chanced no notable trouble to the Scots, neither forreine nor ciuill, by all the time of king Gregories reigne, so that passing the rest of his life in quietnesse, he studied chieflie for the politike gouernement of his people in good order and rule, to the auancement of the common-wealth: and finally died an happy old man, in a castell called Doundore within the countrie of Garioch, in the 18 yere after his entring into his estate, and after the birth of our Sauour 893. He was neuer married, but liued in continuall chastitie: for his famous victories and other his princelie doings, he deserued of the Scots to be numbered amongst their most high and renowned princes. Amongst other his princelie acts which he set forward in his life time, to the auancement of his countrie and common-wealth, Aberdine (of a village) was advanced by him to the state and dignitie of a citie, and the church there indowed with faire reuenues, and sundrie priuiledges. His bodie was conueied vnto the abbey of Colmekill, and there buried with all solemne pompe and requies: ouer the which his next successor, Donald the first of that name, caused a faire towe to be erected.

In the daies of this Gregorie also, there liued that famous cleark John Scot, a Scottishman in deed borne, but brought vp in studie of good literature at Athens, where hauing learned the Greeke tongue, he was sent for into France, to come vnto the emperor Lewis, with whom he remained in seruice for a time: and by whose commandement he translated the booke of saint Dionysie, intituled Hierarchia, into Latine. Afterwards being sent ambassadoe from the same Lewis vnto Alured or Alfred king of England, he continued with him and taught his children, hauing a place thereto appointed him within the abbey of Balincbarrie, where he had such resort of hearers and scholars, that it was a wonder to behold. Notwithstanding, at length when he ceased not to blame and sharpelie to reprove the corrupt maners of such his scholars, as were giuen more to libertie than learning, he was by them murdered with daggers, as he was reading vnto them, and was afterwards registred amongst the number of martyrs.

But to our purpose. After Gregorie succeeded Donald the 5. in gouernement of the kingdome, he was the sonne of Constantine the second; who finding the state of the realme in good quiet and flourishing in welth, he applied his whole studie to mainteine the same in semblable plight and condition. And before all things he caused iustice to be duly ministred, so that no iniurie, speciallie if it were done to anie poore person, escaped unpunished. Christ the Lord of all vertue had giuen him such a godlie disposed disposed mind, whose religion (to the advancement of his glorie) he had euer in high veneration. Among other his godlie ordinances, he made this statute to be obserued as a law, that such as by swearing vnabusedlie blasphemed the name of almightie God, or in cursing and banning called vpon the name of the wicked fend, and betoke anie christian creature vnto his hellish power and domination (a vice naturalie following the people of that nation) should haue his tongue thrust through with a burning iron. But too woorth the negligence of such as haue succeeded him, in suffering so necessarie an ordinance to be abolished and toozne out of vse, considering the horrible othes and blasphemie, with the bitter and deadlyfull cursings so much frequented of all estates in this our time, as well in Scotland as elsewhere, as without great hozroz of the hearers cannot be halfe expressed.

But to our purpose touching the gouernement of Donald, it chanced after wards, that he had knowledge how Goymond a Dane was landed with a puissant armie vpon the coasts of Northumberland, and had pitched his campe nere vnto the shore, without doing anie damage to the countrie: so that it was vncertaine what he intended, whether to begin a conquest there, or to passe ouer Humber to make warres on the Englishmen. To preuent therefore all dangers, Donald hastened towards Northumberland; howbeit he was not farre forwards on his iornie, but that word came to him, how Goymond was already passed ouer Humber, and entered into the English borders. But yet did not Donald staie his iournie, till he heard certeinlie that Goymond keeping vpon his way, was aduanced forward at the least 40 miles off from the riuer of Humber, doubting least haplie he had ment some deceit, as suddenly to haue returned vpon the Scots in Northumberland, when the king had bene once gone backe.

But now, when it was knowne that his purpose was onelie to assaile the English countries, according to the league newlie confirmed, Donald sent 5000 Scottishmen vnto the aid of the Englishmen; and also appointed two thousand horsemen to remaine with him in Northumberland (where he staied for a time) discharging the residue, & licencing them to returne vnto their homes. Shortly after Goymond fought with Alured at Abingdon, where in the end the victorie abode with the Englishmen and Scots, though the same was got with such losse of men after long and doubtfull battell, that they were not able to pursue the enemies in chase, but constrained immediatly after to conclude a necessarie peace with them, on condition that the Danes should enjoy common seats with the Englishmen in Albion, & that Goymond with his Danes should be baptised and professe the christian religion. Herevpon also were pledges deliuered on both parts, and Goymond comming to receiue baptism had his name changed and was called Athelstane, during whose life the peace continued betwixt the two nations.

Whilist things passed thus in England, there rose a peece of trouble betwixt the inhabitants of Murrey land and Rosse, which disquieted king Donald not a little. The occasion grew by reason of certein theues, which comming forth of Rosse in the night time, secretly entered into Murrey land, to fetch booties from thence. At the first they of Murrey land made resistance against them as well as they might, but after calling their neighbours to aid them, they skirmished in such wise, that within two moneths space, there were slaine betwixt them two thousand of the one side and of the other. Donald being not a little offended to haue his peace broken with inteltime discord, gathered a great power, and with the same hastened into Murrey land: where calling the chiefe doers and maintainers of this businesse to make answer to that which was laid to their charge, when they were not able to cleare themselves of the crime, he put them to open execution of death, to the example of other. This trouble being in this sort quieted, he went into Northumberland, to be there in a readinesse, if the Danes or Englishmen (whome he suspected) should attempt anie thing against his subiects in those parties: where in the end, after he had reigned almost 11 yers, he departed this world. His bodie was buried in Colmekill amongst his ancestors, with a marble tombe set ouer his graue, as the manner in those daies was customablie vsed.

After Donald the first, there succeeded in rule of the realme Constantine the third of that name, the sonne of Ethus the swift, beginning his reigne in the yere after the incarnation 903. He was more apt for ciuill gouernement, than for the ordering of warlike affaires. King Edward that latelie succeeded Alured in rule ouer the Englishmen being ware thereof, sent vnto him an herald at armes, commanding him to restore vnto his subiects the Englishmen, the countries of Northumberland, Cumberland, & Westmerland (which the Scottish king Gregorie had in times past by occasion of the trouble, some season taken from the right owners by force) either else to loke for warres at his hands within forty daies after this summons.

Constantine herevnto answered, that if king Edward were minded to make him wars for those lands which he held by rightfull title, he with his people would be readie to defend themselves, hoping in the almightie God that he would turne the punishment on them that vnjustlie had piked the quarrell. Herevpon ensued manie rodes and forraies betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, made (as occasion serued) into ech others countrie, with diuers skirmishes and light bickerings for twelue moneths space together, without anie notable incounter of their maine powers. In which meane time the Danes increased in puissance, more than was thought requisite for the suertie either of the Englishmen or Scots, which moued king Edward by perswasion of his nobles, to make meanes vnto Constantine to haue the peace renewed: wherevnto Constantine lightlie agreed: so that the league was confirmed againe with the former articles betwixt the English and Scottish nations.

Shortly after also the warre was renewed betwixt the Englishmen and Danes, and a peace againe confirmed by conclusion of a mariage betwixt Sithrike king of Northumberland, and Beatrice daughter of king Edward, till at length Sithrike was poisoned by his wife the said Beatrice: and then because Anaslus (whome the English writers name Aulase) and Godfrie, the sonnes of Sithrike, put the same Beatrice to death, his father king Edward moued warre against them, and in foughten field discomfited them, but was slaine in that battell himselfe (as Hector Boetius saith). But for the further truth of this matter, ye may read more in the historie of England.

The Danes being certified, that king Edward was thus slaine, conceived such hope of good successe after to come, that albeit they were at this time vanquished, they immediatlie made new preparation for the warre, and first of all Anaslus the one of the two brethren before mentioned, sent vnto Constantine the Scottish king, to allure him to ioine with them against the Englishmen, which with great gifts and large promises he easilie brought to passe, the league notwithstanding which remained betwixt the English and Scottish nations. Hereupon both the Scots and Danes made the greatest provision that might be, thinking verelie to subdue the Englishmen, and to bring them to utter destruction.

Malcolm sonne to king Donald was appointed by king Constantine to haue the leading of the Scottish armie, containing the number of twentie thousand men. The same Malcolm also at the same time was created here apparent of the realme, hauing Cumberland assigned vnto him for the maintenance of his estate. And euen then it was ordeined, that he which should succed to the crowne after the kings decesse, should euer inioy that prouince. Malcolm ioining his power with Anaslatus and Godfric (who had assembled in like manner a mighty host of Danes) they all together brake into the English confines, sparing no kind of crueltie that might be deuised, murthering the people without any pittie or compassion in all places where they came, to the intent that the Englishmen moued with the slaughter of their kinsfolks and friends, should come forth into the field to giue battell, supposing they should not be able to withstand the force of the Danes and Scottishmen now ioined in one armie together.

But the more vilanie they shewed in their doings, the soner were they punished for the same. For Althelstane the base sonne of king Edward (whome the Englishmen had chosen to succed in gouernement of their kingdome after his fathers decesse) with all speed fought to be reuenged of such insurious doings. Whereupon getting together an armie, he encountered with them at a place called Bowningfield, or Bownenburgh, in July, in the yere 937, where the English at the first of purpose gaue something backe, as though they had fled: which manner when the Danes and Scots beheld, supposing the Englishmen had fled in deed, they began to pursue amaine, leauing their order of battell, ech of them strining who might be the foremost.

The Englishmen (according to the order appointed to them by their capteins) suddenlie fell into arraie againe, and fiercelie returning vpon their enimies, did beat them downe in great numbers, & so atchiued a most triumphant victorie. There died in this mortall battell manie thousands of Danes and Scottishmen, but chieflie the Scottish nobilitie bought the bargaine most deere, who choosing rather to die in the field than to suffer rebuke by dishonorable flight, it came so to passe that few of them escaped. There died on that side (as some write) 20000 men in this battell, together with Wilfert king of the Guentes, Hantwall king of Britains, and seuen dukes that came to helpe the Scots and Danes. Althelstane by good aduise following the victorie, entred into Northumberland, and finding the countrie dispeopled of men of warre, he easilie made a full conquest thereof, hauing all the holds and fortresses deliuered into his hands.

Then without further delate he passed into Westmerland, and after into Cumberland, where the inhabitants of both those regions bare-footed and bare-headed, in token of most humble submission, yielded themselves vnto him, promising from thenceforth to continue his faithfull subiects. In the meane time Malcolm being sore wounded in the battell, escaped yet with great danger, and in an horse-litter was conueied home into his countrie, where he declared to king Constantine the whole circumstance of the ouerthrow and losse of his countries aforesaid. Whereupon Constantine caused a counsell to be called at Abirneithie, where he perceiued how sore his realme was infiebled through lacke of such of the nobilitie as were lost in the last battell, by reason the residue that were left, seemed through want of yeres, neither able by counsell nor by force to defend the realme, so as he utterlie despaired either to be of power to beate backe the enimies, or to gouerne his realme in such politike sort as he would haue wished. And therefore, to rid himselfe of all such cares and troubles, and withall despising all such worldlie pompe as might withdraw him from diuine contemplation (wherevnto he was partlie bent) he gaue ouer his kinglie estate, and became a canon within the abbey of saint Andzeues amongst the couent there.

This was in the yere of our Sauour 943, and in the fortith yere of his owne reigne (as Hector Boetius saith:) but if he did thus forsake the world, and entred into religion immediatlie after the battell fought at Bowningfield or Bownenburgh (so so we find it named by some writers) then must it needs be before this supposed time alledged by the same Boetius, for that battell was fought anno 937, as the best approued amongst our English writers doe report, so that it should rather seeme that Constantine refused in deed to deale with the gouernement of the realme, about the same yere of our Lord 937, or shortly after; and that Malcolm gouerned as regent and not as king whilist Constantine liued, who departed this life (after he had continued in the abbey of saint Andzeues a certaine time) in the said yere 943, falling in the fortie yere after he first began to reigne. He was first buried in the church there amongst the bishops, but afterwards he was taken vp and translated vnto Colmekill, where he had a tome set ouer him, as was conuenient for the memorie of his name.

In the 36 yere of his reigne there were two monstrous creatures borne in Albion, the one amongst the Danes being an hermaphrodite, that is to say, a child with both sexes, hauing the head like a swine, the brest standing forth more in resemblance than the common shape of man, a fat bellie, with scate like a gosse, legs like a man, full of biffels, and a verie euill fauored thing to behold. The other was borne in Northumberland, onelie hauing a mans sex, with one whole bellie from the nauill downe, but aboue the same diuided with two brests crested or compalled ridge-wise, and not broad like to the shape of man: beside this it had foure armes and two heads. And euen as from the nauill bywards it was thus diuided into two bodies, so did it appeare there was two contrarie wils or desires in the same, euer lusting contrarie, as when the one did sleepe, the other would wake; when the one required to haue meat, the other passed for none at all. Oftentimes would they chide and bzall together, in somuch that at length they fell so far at variance, that they did beat and rent either other verie pitifullie with their nailes. At length the one with long sicknesse wearing away and finalie decessing, the other was not able to abide the greuous smell of the dead carcase, but immediatlie after died also.

About the same time there issued forth a founteine of blood out of the side of a mounteine in Gallo way, and flowed in great abundance for the space of seuen daies together, so that all the riuers therabout (whereof there is great store in that countrie) had their waters mixed with blood, and so running into the sea, caused the same to seeme bloudie certaine miles distant from the shore. These prodigious sights put men in great feare, for that diuiners did interpret the same to signifie some great bloudshed to fall vpon the Scots shortly after. They were also the better beleued, for that within a while after, that great ouerthrow happened at Bowningfield, as before is specified.

Malcolme

After that Constantine (as is said) was entred into religion, the before named Malcolme the sonne of Donald was admitted king, or rather regent: who although he perceived right well how the force of the realme was so infabled, that there was no hope to mainteine warres abroad; yet his chiefe studie was by all means possible to defend the borders of the Scottish dominion, and before all things to procure peace with the Englishmen. But as he was about to haue sent ambassadours vnto king Athelstane, to haue treated for peace, he was credibly informed, how Athelstane had giuen Northumberland vnto Aualassus, and made a league with him to haue his aid against the Scots. Which newes put Malcolme in wonderfull dread, for that he vnderstood how his realme was unpurued of skillfull capteins to make resistance. Yet he caused a counsell to be called, wherein when such as were assembled proponed manie fond and childish reasons, it might happen there was small hope of anie good conclusion; but euen as they were at a point to haue broken by without anie certaine resolution, word was brought how through seditious discord, which had chanced betwixt the Danes and Englishmen being assembled together in campe, they had fought a right cruell and bloudie battell, the victorie in the end remaining with the Englishmen, who ceased not to pursue the Danes in chase, so long as anie day light appeared in the skie.

The English men and the Danes fall out together, and fight.

Aualassus fled into Westmerland, raised the Ile of Man, and got him into Ireland.

They go in procession in Scotland for 107.

Ambassadors sent vnto Malcolme.

The league was confirmed againe.

Northumberland allotted vnto England.

Cumberland and Westmerland to be made vnto England.

Aualassus with such Danes as he might get together after that ouerthrow, fled into Westmerland, and within thre daies after, in such ships as he found there vpon the coast, he sailed ouer into the Ile of Man, and spoiling the same, with all the prete he passed from thence ouer into Ireland. In the meane time king Athelstane hauing lost no small number of his people in the foresaid battell, omitted his iourne into Scotland, and lay still in Northumberland, no man vnderstanding what he intended to do. Which newes were so pleasant to the Scottishmen, that there was common supplications and processions made through the whole realme, in rendering thanks to almighty God for deliuering the people by this means from so great and present a danger.

Shortly after came ambassadours from Athelstane vnto Malcolme, to moue means for a peace to be concluded betwixt the Scottish and English nations, according to the articles of the old league, which motion was iustly heard of Malcolme, though he set a countenance of the matter as though he passed not whether he had warre or peace: but in the end, for that (as he said) peace was most necessarie for all parts, he shewed himselfe willing to haue the old former league renewed betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, with anie reasonable conditions which should be thought requisite.

After the returne of the ambassadours, the league was newlie confirmed betwixt the two kings and their people, with the semblable articles as were comprised in the old league, with this article onelie added therevnto; that Northumberland, being as now replenished most with Danish inhabitants, should remaine to the Englishmen; and Cumberland with Westmerland to the Scots: vpon this condition, that he which should succeed as heire vnto the crowne of Scotland after the kings deceasse, being heire apparant, should hold those regions, and do homage vnto the king of England as his vassall perpetuallie for the same. The peace being thus established betwixt these nations, Indulph the sonne of Constantine the third was proclaimed prince of Cumberland, and inheritor to the crowne of Scotland.

After this, Malcolme passed the residue of his life in god quiet, without anie troubles of warre, as a man onelie studieng to mainteine the state of his realme in good order, as well for the wealth of the tempoialtie, as spirituallie, wherevnto he was equallie inclined. At length, as he rode about the prouinces of his realme, to see the lawes duly ministered, at Urine a village in Gurrey land, where he caused iustice to be somewhat streiallie executed vpon offenders, he was murdered in the night season by treason of a few conspirators, in the sixtenth yeare of his reigne. But such as did this wicked deed with their complices, by diligent examination were tried out, and on the next day being apprehended, suffered due execution, according as they had deserved, being torne in peeces with wild horses, and those peeces sent vnto sundrie cities, where they were hanged up on the gates and towres, untill they rotted away.

They that were the deniers of the murder also, and procured the doers thereof, were thrust quite through vpon sharpe stakes, and after hanged by also on high gibbets; and other of the conspirators were put to other kinds of death, as the case seemed to require. The death of Malcolme chanced in the yeare after the death of our Sauour 959. ¶ Here we haue thought god to put you in remembrance, that either the Scots are deceived in their account of yeares; or else mistake the names of the kings of England: for where they write that this Malcolme departed this life about the 22 yeare of Athelstane king of England, that can not be; if Malcolms deceasse chanced in the yeare 959, for Athelstane was dead long before that time, to wit, in the yeare 940, and reigned but sixtene yeares.

Moreover, where the Scottish writers make mention of the warres which king Edmund that succeeded Athelstane had against Aulase and the Danes of Northumberland, in the daies of king Indulph that succeeded Malcolme, it can not stand by anie means (if they mistake not their account of yeares;) for the same Edmund was slaine in the yeare 948. But verelie this fault in the first account of yeares is but too common in the Scottish historie, and therefore to him that should take vpon him to reforme the errors thereof in this behalfe, it were necessarie to alter in a maner the whole course of the same historie. And therefore we will not wish anie man to giue anie credit vnto their account in yeares, touching the reignes of the English kings, further than they shall see them to agree with our writers, whom in that behalfe we may more safely follow, and by conferring the same with the Scottish writers in some places, happily perceiue the true time, as well of the reignes of their kings, as of acts done, to fall out in yeares and seasons, much differing from their account: whereof to admonish the reader, as well here as in the English historie, we haue thought it not impertinent.

And albeit that some may aske what reason we haue to moue vs to doubt of their account of yeares, more than we doe of that in our owne writers: We will referre the same vnto their iudgements that are learned, and haue traueselled indifferently alike, as well in perusing the one as the other without affection. But as the errors are sooner found than amended, so haue we thought god to set downe in the margin of this booke, the yeares as we find them noted in the Scottish writers, speciallie in places where we differ anie thing from them, because we will not seeme by way of controuersie to preiudice the authors, further than by due consideration the well aduised reader shall thinke it expedient.

959. The mistake of the names and times of the English kings in the Scottish histories.

Indulph.

mongst his predecessors in the abbie church of Colmehill, Indulph prince of Cumberland was placed in the marble chaire at Scrone, there receiving the crowne and other the investitures of the kingdome. In the administration whereof he continued for the space of five yeares without anie notable trouble, in the end of which terme, he was required by messengers sent unto him from Anaslus, to ioint with him in league against the Englishmen, in reuenge of that ouerthrow, which also the Danes as Scots had receiued at Bioningfield, alledging that opportunity was now offered, sith after the deceasse of Athelstane, the Englishmen had created Edmund to be their king, a man of a dull wit, & not fit for the administration of high affaires: neither did the league concluded betwixt Athelstane and Malcolm inforce anie impediment, but that he might enter the warre against the Englishmen, considering that both the princes that were the authors of that league were departed out of this life, by whose deceasse the said league was ended.

Indulph is prouoked by Anaslus to warre against England.

Indulph his answer.

The Danes not pleased with such an answer propose warre against England.

The Norwegians come to the aid of Indulph. Harold a valiant captain.

Elgarine persuaded the Scots into the Danes.

10000 soldiers sent unto king Edmund.

Elgarine is taken prisoner.

But Indulph for answer hereunto declared, that the league was concluded betwixt Malcolm and Athelstane, by great deliberation of aduise, and by consent of all the estates of both realmes, taking their solemne oth for the true obseruing thereof, so that he could not, vntlesse he should violate that oth, attempt anie thing to the breach of peace with the Englishmen, procuring the iust indignation of almighty God against him and his people in that behalf. Hereupon the Danes accounting Indulph but a foolish and negligent person for this kind of answer, as he that regarded not the honor of his realme and people, in letting passe so great opportunity to be reuenged of the Englishmen for the death of such Scots as died in the ouerthrow at Bioningfield, determined not to be noted with the like sort of reproch: but with all speed sending for aid into Norwaie, prepared to passe over into England, vnder the conduct of Anaslus, who ioining his power with the Norwegians, which came to his aid vnder the leading of a right valiant captain called Harold, transported with all speed over into Northumberland, unto whome the gouernour there named Elgarine, acknowledging himselfe to be descended of the Danish blood, yielded all the castles, townes & forts, promising to aid Anaslus against king Edmund to the uttermost of his power.

These newes coming to the knowledge of Edmund, with all speed he gathereth his power, and sending into Scotland for such aid as he ought to haue from thence by covenants of the league, there came unto him ten thousand Scottishmen with ready wills to serue him in these his wars against the Danes. Then ioining his owne people with those Scottishmen, he set forward towards the enimies. There were an 8000 Northumberland men with Anaslus, the which vpon the first encounter with the Englishmen, fell straight to running away, which made an open and readie breach vnto the English part, to attaine the victorie: for the Danes being not able to resist the violent force of their enimies, incouraged now with the sight of the Northumbers, were quickly constrained to giue backe, and in the end to die aaine, the Englishmen and Scots following in the chase with such fiercenesse, that all such as they overtooke died vpon the sword, though they submitted themselves neuer so humbly in requiring mercie.

Elgarine yet chancing to fall into his enimies hands was taken alive: for so had Edmund commanded, that if anie man might take him, he should in anie case saue his life, that he might put him to death in most cruel wise, to the example of other.

After this, and for the space of three daies after the battell, Edmund lay still in the fields nere vnto the place where they fought, and then repaired vnto Forke, where Elgarine for his treason was drawn in pieces with wild hordes. There chanced also no notable trouble in Albion, during the space of foure yeares after this said ouerthrow of the Danes with their captaine Anaslus, who is also otherwise called Aulaf, as is to be seene in the English histories, where the same make mention of the foresaid king Edmund, whome likewise they affirme to be the brother of Athelstane, and not his sonne, as before is partly touched. Indulph in this meane time did with great diligence see to the good order of his realme, shewing therein what belonged to the office of a worthy prince. But euen as all things seemed to rest in peace & quietnes through the whole Ile of Albion, Hagon king of Norwaie, and Helrike king of Denmarke, of purpose to reuenge the slaughter of their countymen lately made in Northumberland, came with a mightie nauie vnto the coasts of Scotland, assailing to land with their whole armie, first in the Forth, then in the riuer of Tair; but yet through such resistance as the Scots made, being assembled together to keepe them off, they were faine to with draw, and waisting alongst the coasts of Angus, the Sparnes, Spar, and Buthghane, at length faining as though they would haue taken their course homeward, they lanchd forth into the high seas. But within foure daies after returning againe to the shore, they landed their people earlie in one morning vpon the coast of Boen, at a place called Cullane, a countrie ioining vnto Buthghane, putting such of the countrie people to flight, as presented themselves to impeach their landing and inuasion.

But Indulph being aduertised hereof, forthwith assembling the whole power of his realme, drew towards that part with such speed, that he was come into Boen before his enimies were certified that he was set forward. So sone therefore as they heard he was come, such as were abroad forraising the same countrie, were called backe to the campe. But Indulph without protracting of time came still forward, and vpon his approach to the enimies, he prepared to giue battell, and with a short oration began to incourage his people to fight manfully. But before he could make an end, the Danes gaue the onset with such violence, that the battell a long space continued doubtful on both sides, the Danes on the one part and the Scots on the other, doing their bittermost endeours to achieve the victorie, till at length they of Louthian with their captains Dunbar and Grame began to appeare on the backe halfe of the Danes. With which sight they were put in such feare, that those which fought in the fore ward, retired backe vnto the middle ward, whome the Scots eagerly pursuing, beat downe euen till they came vnto the reare ward, which conetng rather to die in the fight, than to giue backe, and so to be slaine in the chase (for those in the reare ward were heauie armed men) continued the battell more with a certaine stiff stubbornnes of mind, than with anie great force or forcast, being so overmatched as they were, & forsaken of their fellows: for other of the Danes, namelie the archers and Bernes fled their waies, some towards their ships, and some here and there being scattered abroad in the fields, fell into the mosses, the marshy grounds, and other strieds, where they were slaine euerie one by such as followed in the chase.

Indulph himselfe with certeine companies about him, departing from his maine battell to discouer the fields, as though all had bene quiet on each side, fell by chance vpon a whole band of the Danes, where the same lay in couert within a close ballie, being sleed from the field thither upon the first joining of the battels, with the which entering into fight, he was shot through the head with a dart, and so died; but not before he was revenged of those his enemies, the whole number of them being slaine there in the place. His bodie was first buried in Collane, a towne of Boorne, and after translated unto the abbie of Colmekill, and there interred amongst other his predecessors the Scottish kings. Andulph reigned about nine yeares and died thus valiantlie, though infortunatlie, in the yeare after the incarnation 968, as faith Hector Boetius.

After the corps of Andulph was removed unto Colmekill and there buried, Duffe the sonne of R. Malcolme was crowned R. at Scone with all due solemnitie. In the beginning of his reigne, Culene the sonne of R. Andulph was proclaimed prince of Cumberland: immediatlie whereupon the king transported ouer into the western Jles, to set an order there for certeine misdemeanors vsed by diuers robbers and pillers of the common people. At his arriual amongst them he called the thanes of the Jles asse him, commanding freightlie as they would auoid his displeasure, to purge their countries of such malefactors, whereby the husbandmen and other commons might liue in quiet, without veneration of such barretors and idle persons as sought to liue onlie vpon other mens goods.

The thanes vpon this charge giuen them by the king, took no small number of the offenders, part-lie by publike authoritie, & partlie by lieng in wait for them where they supposed their haunt was to resort, the which being put to execution according to that they had merited, caused the residue of that kind of people either to get them ouer into Ireland, either else to learne some manuell occupation therewith to get their liuing, yea though they were neuer so great gentlemen bozne. Howbeit the nobles with this extreme rigor shewed thus by the king against their linage, were much offended therewith, accounting it a great dishonor for such as were descended of noble parentage, to be constrained to get their liuing with the labor of their hands, which onlie appertained to plowmen, and such other of the base degre as were bozne to trauell for the maintenance of the nobilitie, and to serue at their commandement by order of their birth, and in no wise after such sort to be made in manner equall with them in state and condition of life.

Furthermore, they murmured closelie amongst themselves, how the king was onlie become friend to the commons & cleargie of his realme, hauing no respect to the nobilitie, but rather declared himsel-fe to be an bitter enemy thereof, so that he was vnwor-thy to haue the rule of the nobles and gentlemen, vnles he knew better what belinged to their degre.
This murmuring did spread not onelie among them in the Jles, but also through all the other parts of his realme, so that they ceased not to speake verie euill of the gouernement of things. In the meane time the king fell into a languishing disease, not so græuous as strange, that none of his physicians could perceiue what to make of it. For there was seene in him no token, that either choler, melancolie, legime, or any other vicious humor did any thing abound, whereby his bodie should be brought into such decaye and consumption (so as there remained bunneith anie thing vpon him saue skin and bone.)

And sithens it appeared manifestlie by all outward signes and tokens, that naturall moisture did nothing faile in the vitall spirits, his colour also was fresh and faire to behold, with such liuelines of looks, that moze was not to be wished for; he had also a temperat desire and appetite to his meate & drinke, but yet could he not sleepe in the night time by anie prouocations that could be deuised, but still fell into exceeding sweats, which by no means might be restrained. The physicians perceiuing all their medicines to want due effect, yet to put him in some comfort of helpe, declared to him that they would send for some cunning physicians into forreigne parts, who happlie being inured with such kind of diseases, should easilie cure him, namelie so soone as the spring of the yeare was once come, which of it selfe should helpe much therevnto.

Howbeit the king, though he had small hope of recouerie, yet had he still a diligent care vnto the due administration of his lawes and good orders of his realme, deuising oft with his counsell about the same. But when it was vnderstood into what a perilous sickness he was fallen, there were no small number, that contemning the authoritie of the magistrats, began to practise a rebellion. And amongst the chieft were those of Spurrey land, who slaying sundrie of the kings officers, began to rage in most cruell wise against all such as were not consenting to their misordered tumult. The kings physicians for-bad in anie wise, that the king should be aduertised of such businesse, for doubt of increasing his sicknes with trouble of mind about the same. But about that present time there was a murmuring amongst the people, how the king was vered with no naturall sickness, but by forcerie and magicall art, practised by a sort of witches dwelling in a towne of Spurrey land, called Fozes.

Where vpon, albeit the author of this secret talke was not knowne: yet being brought to the kings eare, it caused him to send forthwith certeine trustie persons thither, to inquire of the truth. They that were thus sent, dissembling the cause of their iourne, were receiued in the darke of the night into the castell of Fozes by the lieutenant of the same, called Donwald, who continuing faithfull to the king, had kept that castell against the rebels to the kings vse.
Vnto him therefore these messengers declared the cause of their comming, requiring his aid for the accomplishment of the kings pleasure.

The souldiers, which late there in garrison, had an inkling that there was some such matter in hand as was talked of amongst the people; by reason that one of them kept as concubine a yong woman, which was daughter to one of the witches as his paramour, who told him the whole maner vsed by hir mother & other hir companions, with their intent also, which was to make awaie the king. The souldier hauing learned this of his lemmann, told the same to his fellows, who made report to Donwald, and he shewed it to the kings messengers, and therewith sent for the yong damosell which the souldier kept, as then being within the castell, and caused hir vpon strict examination to confesse the whole matter as she had seene and knowen. Wherevpon learning by hir confession in what house in the towne it was where they wrought there mischievous mysterie, he sent forth souldiers about the middelt of the night, who breaking into the house, found one of the witches roasting vpon a wooden broch an image of wax at the fier, resembling in each feature the kings person, made and deuised (as is to be thought) by craft and art of the diuell: an other of them sat reciting certaine words of inchantment, and still basted the image with a certeine liquo: verie buslie.

The souldiers finding them occupied in this wise, toke them together with the image, and led them into the castell, where being strictly examined for what purpose they went about such manner of inchantment, they answered, to the end to make away the king: for as the image did waiste afore the fire, so did the bodie of the king breake forth in sweat. And as for the words of the enchantment, they secured to keepe him still waking from sleepe, so that as the war euer melted, so did the kings flesh: by the which meanes it should haue come to passe, that when the war was once cleane consumed, the death of the king should immediatlie follow. So were they taught by euill spirits, and hired to worke the feat by the nobles of Spurrey land. The standers by, that heard such an abhominable tale told by these witches, straightwaies brake the image, and caused the witches (according as they had well deserued) to be burnt to death.

It was said, that the king at the verie same time that these things were a doing within the castell of Fozes, was deliuered of his languor, and slept that night without anie sweat breakeing forth vpon him at all, & the next daie being restored to his strength, was able to do anie maner of thing that lay in man to do, as though he had not bene sicke before anie thing at all. But howsoeuer it came to passe, truth it is, that when he was restored to his perfect health, he gathered a power of men, & with the same went into Spurrey land against the rebels there, and chasing them from thence, he pursued them into Kosse, and from Kosse into Cathnessle, where apprehending them, he brought them backe vnto Fozes, and there caused them to be hanged vp, on gallows and gibets.

Amongest them there were also certeine yong gentlemen, right beautifull and goodlie personages, being nere of kin vnto Donwald captaine of the castell, and had bene perswaded to be partakers with the other rebels, more through the fraudulent counsell of diuerse wicked persons, than of their owne accord: wherevpon the foresaid Donwald lamenting their case, made earnest labor and sute to the king to haue begged their pardon; but hauing a plaine deniall, he conceined such an inward malice towards the king (though he shewed it not outwardlie at the first) that the same continued still boiling in his stomach, and ceased not, till through setting on of his wife, and in reuenge of such vnthankfulness, hee found meanes to murder the king within the foresaid castell of Fozes where he used to sojourn. For the king being in that countie, was accustomed to lie most commonlie within the same castell, hauing a speciall trust in Donwald, as a man whom he neuer suspected.

But Donwald, not forgetting the reproch which his linage had susteined by the execution of those his kinsmen, whom the king for a spectacle to the people had caused to be hanged, could not but shew manifest tokens of great griefe at home amongst his familie: which his wife perceiuing, ceased not to trouble with him, till she vnderstood what the cause was of his displeasure. Which at length when she had learned by his owne relation, she as one that bare no lesse malice in hir heart towards the king, for the like cause on hir behalfe, than hir husband did for his friends, counselled him (sith the king oftentimes vsed to lodge in his house without anie gard about him, other than the garrison of the castell, which was whole at his commandement) to make him awaie, and shewed him the meanes wherby he might soone accomplish it.

Donwald thus being the more kindled in wrath by the words of his wife, determined to follow hir aduise in the execution of so heinous an act. Wherupon deuising with himselfe for a while, which way hee might best accomplish his cursed intent, at length gat opportunitie, and sped his purpose as followeth. It chanced that the king vpon the daie before he purposed to depart forth of the castell, was long in his or-atozie at his prayers, and there continued till it was late in the night. At the last, comming forth, he called such afore him as had faithfullie serued him in pursuit and apprehension of the rebels, and giuing them heartie thanks, he bestowed sundrie honorable gifts amongst them, of the which number Donwald was one, as he that had bene euer accounted a most faithfull seruant to the king.

At length, hauing talked with them a long time, he got him into his priue chamber, onelie with two of his chamberlains, who hauing brought him to bed, came forth againe, and then fell to banketting with Donwald and his wife, who had prepared diuerse delicate dishes, and sundrie sorts of drincks for their reare supper or collation, wherat they fate vp so long, till they had charged their stomachs with such full gorges, that their heads were no sooner got to the pillow, but adlepe they were so fast, that a man might haue remoued the chamber ouer them, sooner than to haue awaked them out of their drunken sleepe.

Then Donwald, though he abhorred the act greatlie in heart, yet through insigation of his wife hee called foure of his seruants vnto him (whome he had made priue to his wicked intent before, and framed to his purpose with large gifts) and now declaring vnto them, after what sort they should worke the feat, they gladlie obeted his instructions, & speedilie going about the murder, they enter the chamber (in which the king late) a little before cocks crow, where they secretlie cut his throte as he lay sleeping, without anie buskling at all: and immediatlie by a posterne gate they caried forth the dead bodie into the fields, and throwing it vpon an horse there provided readie for that purpose, they conuey it vnto a place, about two miles distant from the castell, where they staied, and gat certeine labourers to helpe them to turne the course of a little riuer running through the fields there, and digging a deepe hole in the channell, they burie the bodie in the same, ramming it vp with stones and grauell so closelie, that setting the water in the right course againe, no man could perceiue that anie thing had bene newlie digged there. This they did by order appointed them by Donwald as is reported, for that the bodie should not be found, & by bleeding (when Donwald should be present) declare him to be guiltie of the murder. For such an opinion men haue, that the dead corps of anie man being slaine, will bleed abundantly if the murderer be present. But for what consideration soeuer they buried him there, they had no sooner finished the worke, but that they shue them whose helpe they used herein, and straightwaies therevpon fled into Dornie.

Donwald, about the time that the murder was in doing, got him amongst them that kept the watch, and so continued in companie with them all the residue of the night. But in the morning when the noise was raised in the kings chamber how the king was slaine, his bodie conueied awaie, and the bed all berated with blood; he with the watch ran thither, as though he had knowne nothing of the matter, and breaking into the chamber, and finding cakes of blood in the bed, and on the floze about the sides of it, he forthwith shue the chamberlains, as guiltie of that heinous murder, and then like a mad man running to and fro, he ransacked euerie corner within the castell, as though it had bene to haue seene if he might haue found either the bodie, or anie of the murderers hid in anie priue place: but at length comming to the posterne gate, and finding it open, he burdened the chamberlains, whome he had slaine, with all the fault, they hauing the keys of the gates committed to their keeping all the night, and therefore it could not be otherwise (said he) but that they were of counsell in the committing of that most detestable

Finallie, such was his ouer earnest diligence in the severe inquisition and triall of the offenders herein, that some of the lords began to dislike the matter, and to smell forth the twob tokens, that he should not be altogether cleare himselfe. But for so much as they were in that countrie, where he had the whole rule, what by reason of his friends and authority together, they doubted to utter what they thought, till time and place should better serue thereunto, and hereupon got them awaie euerie man to his home. For the space of six moneths together, after this heinous murder thus committed, there appeared no sunne by day, nor mone by night in anie part of the realme, but still was the skie couered with continuall clouds, and sometimes such outrageous winds arose, with lightnings and tempests, that the people were in great feare of present destruction.

The murder of the king is revealed.

The castell of Forres is taken and all the inhabitants slain.

In the meane time Culene prince of Cumberland, the sonne (as I haue said) of king Indulph, accompanied with a great number of lords and nobles of the realme, came vnto Scorne, there to receiue the crowne according to the manner: but at his coming thither, he demanded of the bishops what the cause should be of such vntemperate weather. Who made answer, that vndoubtedlie almightie God shewed himselfe thereby to be offended most highly for that wicked murder of king Duffe: and suerlie vnto the offenders were tried forth and punished for that deed, the realme should feele the iust indignation of the diuine iudgement, for omitting such punishment as was due for so greivous an offense. Culene hereupon required the bishops to appoint publike processions, fastings, and other godlie exercises to be vsed of the priests and people, through all parts of the realme, for the god appeasing of Gods wrath in this behalfe; and in such sort and manner as in semblable cases the vse and custome in those daies was. He himselfe made a solemn bow, confirming it with a like oth, before all the pères & nobles there assembled, that he would not cease till he had reuenged the death of king Duffe upon the false inhabitants of Murray land, to the example of all other.

The multitude being present, getting them to armo, followed their prince, taking his iourne without further delate towards Murray land, the inhabitants of which region hearing of his approach, and the cause of his coming, were stricken with exceeding feare: but namelie Donwald, being gillie in conscience, doubted lest if he were put to torture, he should be enforced to confesse the truth. Whereupon without making his wife priuie to his departure, or anie other of his familie, saue a few such as he toke with him, he secretlie got him to the mouth of the riuer of Spey, where finding a ship readie, he went aboard the same, purposing to haue fled his waies by sea into Norway: for this is the peculiar propertie of a gillie conscience, to be afraid of all things, and either in gesture or countenance to betraie it selfe, accounting slight most sure, if occasion may serue thereto. For this Donwald, whome no man (though some partlie suspected him) might well haue burdened with the crime of his maisters death (by reason of his faithful service shewed towards him aforetime) had he not thus sought to haue auoided the countrie, was now detected of manifest treason, euerie man detesting his abhominable fact, and wishing him to be ouerwhelmed in the raging floods, so to paie the due punishment, which of right he thought, for his vile treason in murdering his naturall lord.

Culene being hereof aduertised, passed ouer Spey water, and taking the castell of Forres, slew all that he found therein, and put the house to sacke and fire. Donwalds wife with his three daughters were taken: for Culene commanded, that whosoer could light vpon them, should in anie wise saue their liues, and bring them vnto him. Which being done, he had them to the racke, where the mother vpon his examination confessed the whole matter, how by his procurement chiefe his husband was moued to cause the deed to be done, who they were that by his commandement did it, and in what place they had buried the bodie. Here would the multitude haue run vpon him and tozied him in paces, but that they were restrained by commandement of an officer at armes. The next day with the residue for that night rested themselves, and in the morning toke order for due pouision of all things necessarie to take vp the bodie of king Duffe, and then to conueie it vnto Colmekill, there to be buried amongst his predecessors.

But as they were busie hercabout, word came that the traitor Donwald was by shipwracke cast vpon the shore within foure miles of the castell, as though he were by Gods pouision brought backe into his owne countrie to suffer worthy punishment for his demerits. Whereupon the inhabitants of the places next adioining toke him, and kept him fast bound till they knew further of the kings pleasure: who verie glad of the newes, sent forth immediatlie a band of men to fetch him. They that were sent did as they were commanded: and being scarce returned, there came in diuerse lords of Kesse, bringing with them Donwalds foure seruants, which (as before is said) did execute the murder. Thus all the offenders being brought together vnto the place where the murder was both contriued and executed, they were arraigned, condemned, and put to death in manner as followeth, to the great reioysing of the people that beheld the same.

They were first scourged by the hangman, and then bowelled, their entrails being throwen into a fire and burnt, the other parts of their bodies were cut into quarters, and sent vnto the chiefest cities of the realme, and there set vp aloft vpon the gates & highest towers, for example sake to all such as should come after, how heinous a thing it is to pollute their hands in the sacred blood of their prince. This dreadful end had Donwald and his wife, before he saw anie sunne after the murder was committed, and that by the appointment of the most righteous God, the creator of that heauenlie planet and all other things, who suffereth no crime to be vntreuged. Those that were the takers of the murderers were highly rewarded for their paines and trauell therein sustained, being exempt from charges of going forth to the warres, and also of all manner of payments belonging to publike duties, as tributes, subsidies, and such like.

These things being thus ordered, the bodie of king Duffe was taken vp, and in most pompous manner conueied vnto Colmekill, accompanied all the waie by Culene, and a great multitude of lords both spirituall and temporall, with other of the meaner states. There be that haue written how his bodie (though it had laine six moneths vnder the ground) was nothing impaired either in colour or otherwise, when it was taken vp, but was found as whole and sound as though it had bene yet alive, the skarres of the wounds onelie excepted. But to proceed, so soon as it was brought aboue the ground, the aire began to cleare vp, and the sunne brake forth, shining more brighte than it had bene some aforetime, to anie of the beholders remembrance. And that which put men in most deepe consideration of all, was the sight of manifold flowers, which sprang forth ouer all the felds immediatlie thereupon, cleane contrarie to the time and season of the yere.

Within a few yeres after this, there was a bridge made made ouer the water in the same place, where the bodie had bene buried, and a village builded at the one end of the byidge, which is called vnto this day, Kil-bow, that is to say, the church of bowers: taking that name of the wonder there happened at the remouing of the kings bodie, as the same authoꝝ would seeme to meane. But there is now (or was of late) a rich abbeye, standing with a verie faire church, consecrat in the honor of the virgine Marie. Monstrous sights also that were seene within the Scottish kingdome that yeres were these: hoyles in Louthian, being of singular beantie and swiftnesse, did eat their owne flesh, and would in no wise taste anie other meate. In Angus there was a gentlewoman brought forth a child without eyes, nose, hand, or foot.

There was a sparhawk also strangled by an owle.
Neither was it anie lesse wonder that the sunne, as before is said, was continuallie couered with clouds for six moneths space. But all men understood that the abhominable murder of king Duffe was the cause hereof, which being reuenged by the death of the authoꝝ, in maner as before is said; Culene was crowned as lawfull successor to the same Duffe at Scone, with all due honor and solemnitie, in the yere of our Lord 972, after that Duffe had ruled the Scottish kingdome about the space of foure yeres.

The beginning of Culenes reigne, begun with righteous execution of iustice, promised a firme hope of an other manner of prince, than by the administration which followed he declared himselfe to be:
for hostile after losing the rains of lasciuious wantonnesse to the youth of his realme, through giuing a lewd example by his owne disordered doings, all such as were inclined vnto licentious liuing, followed their sensuall lusts and vnbizded libertie, abandoning all feare of correction more than ever had bene seene or heard of in anie other age. For such was the negligence of the king, or rather maintenance of misordered persons, that whatsoeuer anie of the nobilitie did either against merchants, priests, or anie of the commons, though the same were neuer so great an iniurie, there was no punishment vsed against them: so that all men looked for some commotion in the common-wealth thereupon to in-sue, if there were not other order provided therefore in time. The ancient pæres of the realme also being griued thereat, spared not to admonish the king of his dutie, declaring vnto him into what danger the realme was likelie to fall through his negligent be-hauour.

Culene answered them, that he wist well inough how yong men were not at the first borne graue and sage personages, like to them with hoarie heads: wherefore their first youthfull yeres could not be so stable as they might be hereafter by old age and continuance of time. But as for such rigorous extreni-tie as diuerse of his elders had vsed towards their subiects, he minded not (as he said) to follow, being taught by their example (as by the kings, Indulph, Duffe, and such other) into what danger he might in-curre by such sharpe seueritie shewed in the government of the estate. Whereupon he was determined so to rule, as he might giue cause rather to be beloved than feared, which was the onelie meane (as he thought) to reteine his subiects in due and most faith-full obedience. This answer was such, that although it seemed nothing agreeable for the preservation of the publike state in quiet rest and safetie, yet was there no man, by reason of his regall authoritie, that durst reproue the same, but diuerse there were that praised him therein, as those that hated all such as loued the byright administration of iustice.

But such ancient counsellors as had trulie ser-ued in rule of the common-wealth in the daies of the former kings, Indulph & Duffe, mistaking the state of that present world (wherein the youth of the realme, namelie all such as were descended of noble parent-age, and vsed to be about the king, followed their wilfull & sensuall lusts, growing euerie day through want of correction to be worse and worse) departed from the court, and withdrew to their homes, without meddling anie further with the publike administration. In whose place there crept in others, that with their flatterie corrupted the residue of such sparks of good inclination as yet remained in the king, if anie were at all; inso much that in the end he measured supreme felicitie by the plentifull intoi-eng of voluptuous pleasures and bodilie lusts. He sanctified onelie such as could deuise pronocations thervnto, and in filling the bellie with excellence of coslie meates and drinks, those that could excell other were chieflie cherished, and most highlie of him este-med.

Herevnto shall he was giuen vnto lecherie beyond all the bounds of reason, sparing neither maid, widow, nor wife, prophane nor religious, sister nor daughter (for all was one with him) that to heare of such villanie and violent forcings as were practised by him and his familiars, it would loth anie honest hart to vnderstand or remember. He was so farre past all shame in this behalfe, that when his lecherous lust by too much copulation was so tired, that he might no more exercise his former lewdnesse, he tooke speciall pleasure yet to behold other to do it in his presence, that his decayed lust might be the more stirred by with sight of such filthinesse. This abhorri-nable trade of life he practised for the space of three yeres together, giuing occasion of much spoile, rauine, manslaughter, forcings, and rauishments of women, with all such kind of wicked and diuelish transgressions: no execution of lawes (instituted by authoritie of the former kings, for restraint of such flagitious offenses) being put in vze, through negligence of this monstrous creature.

So farre forth also increased the libertie of thieues, robbers, and other offenders, mainteined by such of the nobilitie as consented vnto their vnlawfull doings, and were partakers with them in the same, that if anie man went about to withstand them, or refused to accomplish their requests and demands, he should be spoiled of all that he had, and hapilie haue his house burnt ouer his head, or otherwile be missed in such outrageous and violent sort, that it would griue all those that had anie zeale to iustice, to heare of such enormities as were daily practised in that countrie. Holobeit, at length the death of king Culene brought an end to all such wicked dealings: for falling into a filthie disease (through abuse of excessiue drinking and lecherie) called the wasting of nature, he consumed awaie in such wise by rotting of his flesh, that he appeared more like vnto a dead carcase, than vnto a liuelie creature, inso much that his owne seruants began to abhor him.

Whereupon the lords and other honorable personages of the realme, vnderstanding his case, caused a parlement to be summoned at Scone, where they determined to depose king Culene, and appoint some other (whome they should iudge most meetest) to reigne in his place. Culene also not knowing wherefore this counsell was called, as he was going thitherwards, at Heston castell, being almost in the mid waie of his iourne, was murdered by one Cadhard thethane of that place, whose daughter he had rauished before time amongst diuerse other. This end had Culene together with all his filthie sensuali-tie: but the reprochfull infamie thereof remaineth in memorie with his posteritie, and is not like to be forgotten gotten whilſt the world goeth about. He was thus diſpatched in the ſixt yere of his reigne, and after the birth of our Sautour 976, the nobles & great peres of the realme reioiſing at his death, though they allowed not of the manner thereof.

Kenneth.

After that the bodie of king Culene was once conveyed unto Colmekill, and there buried amongſt his elders, the nobles and great peres aſſembled together at Scone, where they proclaimed Kenneth the ſonne of Malcolm the firſt, and brother unto Duſſe, king of the realme. In the beginning of his reigne, he had inough to doe to reduce the people from their wild and ſavage kind of life (into the which they were fallen through the negligent government of his predeceſſor) unto their former trade of civill demeanour. For the nature of the Scottiſhmen is, that firſt the nobles, and then all the reſidue of the people tranſforme themſelves to the uſage of their prince: therefore did Kenneth in his owne trade of living ſhew an example of chaſtite, ſoberietie, liberaltie, and modeſtie, miſuſing himſelfe in no kind of vice, but reſtraining himſelfe from the ſame. He baniſhed all ſuch kind of perſons as might prouoke either him or other unto anie lewd or wanton pleaſures. He mainteined amitie aſwell with ſtrangers as with his owne people, puniſhing moſt rigorouſlie all ſuch as ſought to moue ſedition by anie manner of meanes. He tooke buſie care in cauſing the people to auoid ſloth, and to applie themſelves in honeſt exerciſes, iudging (as the truth is) that to be the waie to aduance the common-wealth from decaye to a flouriſhing ſtate.

On the morrow after the nobles comming together into the counsell-chamber, they had no ſoner taken their places, euerie one according to his degree about the king, but that the armed men beſore mentioned, came ruſhing into the houſe, placing themſelves round about them that were ſet, according to the order preſcribed by former appointment. The lords with this preſent ſight being much amazed, beheld one another, but durſt not ſpeake a word. When the king perceiuing their feare, began to declare vnto them the whole cauſe of his calling them to counsell at that time, and why he had appointed thoſe armed men to be there attendant. The effect of his oration there made vnto them was, that he had not cauſed thoſe armed men to come into the chamber for anie harme ment towards anie of their perſons, but onelie for the publike preſeruacion of the realme. For ſo much as they knew, there was one kind of people much noiſome to the common-wealth, being confederate as it were together by one conſent to exerciſe all ſorts of miſchiefe and oppreſſion againſt the poore people, as to rob, ſpoile, and take from them all that they had, to rauſh their wiues, maidens, & daughters, and ſome times to burne their houſes: the which licentious libertie in ſuch wicked perſons, though want of due puniſhment in the daies of king Culene, what danger it had brought vnto the whole ſtate of the Scottiſh common-wealth, there was none but might well vnderſtand.

An oration made by the king.

A rebuff of all enormities

For ſith it was ſo, that the lords and other high eſtates liued by the trauell of the commons, then if the ſame commons ſhould in anie wiſe decaye, the lords and ſuch other high eſtates could in no wiſe proſper: for if the labourer through iniurie of the robber were forced to giue ouer his labour, where ſhould the lord or gentleman haue wherevpon to liue? So that thoſe which robbed the husbandman, robbed alſo the lord and gentleman; and they that ſought to mainteine ſuch loſtering perſons as ſeeked to rob the poore man, went about the deſtruction both of king, lord, and gentleman; yea and finallye of the vniuerſall ſtate of the whole common-wealth. Therefore he that loued the common-wealth, would not ſeake ſhelle to defend the commons from ſuch iniuries as theues and robbers baillie offered them; but alſo would helpe to ſee iuſt execution done vpon the ſame theues and robbers, according to the laudable lawes and cuſtomes of the land. The laſt yere (ſaid he) you your ſelues remember (I thinke) how I purpoſed by your helpe and counſell to haue proceeded by order of the lawes againſt all enimies and perturbours of the peace. At Lamerke was the day appointed for them to haue appeared, but there was not one of them that would come in, but contemptuouſlie diſobeieng our commandement kept them aſwaie, by whoſe counſell I know not. But I haue bene informed by ſome how diuers of you fauoring thoſe rebels, by reaſon they were of your linage, were of counſell with them, in withſtanding themſelves ſo from iudgement.

The often ſending of meſſengers betwixt them and you, well nere perſuaded vs to thinke that this report was true. But yet not withſtanding, I haue put away all ſuch ſtriſter ſuſpicion out of my head, wiſhing you (as I truſt you be) bold of all ſuch diſimulation. And now I require you, not as ſantors of the rebelles, but as defenders of the common-wealth, though happlie ſome what ſlacke heretofore in diſcharge of your duties, to ſhew your ſelues ſuch in helping to apprehend the offenders, as that the world may perceiue you to haue made full ſatisfaction for your fault and error, if beſore in you there were were anie. In the end he was plaine with them, and told them flatlie that they should assure themselves to haue those armed men which they saw there present, to be continuallie attendant about them, till he might haue all the rebelles at commandement.

The lords gentle submission, with a large promise.

The lords hauing heard the kings speech, and perceiving what his meaning was, first partly excused themselves so well as they might of their cloyed dissimulation, and then falling downe upon their knees afore him, besought him to put away all displeasure out of his mind, and clearelie to pardon them, if in anie wise they had offended his maiestie, promising that they would with all diligence and faithfullnesse accomplish his desire, in causing the offenders to be brought in vnto iudgement: and till the time that this were brought to passe, they were well contented to remaine in such place where he should appoint them to abide. The counsell then being broken vp, the king with those lords passing ouer the riuer of Tait, went vnto Bertha, which towne during the kings abode in the same, was streialie kept with watch and ward, that no creature might enter or go forth without knowledge of the officers appointed by the king to take heed thereunto. If anie idle person were espied abroad in the streets, streightwaies the sergeants would haue him to ward.

The nobles remained in the kings house, or in other lodgings to them assigned, procuring by their friends and ministers to haue such offenders as bled to rob and spoile the husbandmen, apprehended and brought to the king to Bertha, there to receiue iudgement & punishment according to their merits: for so they perceiued they must needs worke, if they minded the safegard of their owne liues. Whereof it folowed also, that within short space after, there were brought vnto Bertha to the number nere hand of five hundred such idle loiterers as bled to liue by spoile and pillage, manie of them being descended of famous houses: all which companie being condemned for their offences to die, were hanged vp on gibbets about the towne, and commandement giuen by the king, that their bodies should not be taken downe, but there to hang still to giue example to other, what the end was of all such as by wrongfull means sought to liue idlie by other mens labours.

The rebelles being thus executed, king Kenneth licenced the lords to depart to their owne houses, exhorting them to remember their duties towards the common-wealth, and to studie for preservation of peace and quietnesse according to their vocation. After this, the realme continued in quietnesse without anie foraine or inward trouble for the space of certeine yeares following, and had remained in the same state still, if the Danes had not made a new inuasion, who being soze greued in their hearts for such displeasures as they had sustained in Albion, determined now with great assurance to reuenge the same. Whereupon gathering an huge multitude of men together, they were imbarcked in vessels provided for them; and sailing forth, they purposed to take land vpon the next coast of Albion where they should chance to arriue; & being once on land, to destroye all befoze them, except where the people should submit & yeld themselves vnto them. This naute being once got abroad, within short time arriued at that point of land in Angus, which is called the red Baites, or red head, not far from the place where the abbie of Abirborth, or Abirborthoke was afterward founded.

Here the Danish fleet first casting anchor, their capitaine fell in consultation what they were best to do. Some of them were of this opinion, that it was not most expedient for them to land in that place, but rather to passe from thence into England; for at the Scottishmens hands being poze, and yet a fierce and hardie nation, there was small good to be got, being thereto accustomed to giue moze ouerthrowes than they commonlie receiued. Againe, the soile of that countrie was but barren, and in manner ouergrown with woods (as it was in deed in those daies) with few townes & small habitations, and those so poze, that no man knowing the same, would bouch safe to fight for anie possession of them: wherein contrariwise England (that part namelie which lieth towards the south) was so fruitfull of coigne and cattell, so rich of mines, and replenished with so manie notable cities and townes inhabited with men of great wealth and substance, that few were to be found comparable thereto. So that the matter being well considered, they could not do better, than to saile into Kent, where they might be sure of rich spoile, without anie great resistance. Other there were that held how that this iourne was attempted by the counsell of their superiors, onlie to reuenge such iniuries as the Danish nation had receiued at the hands of the Scottishmen, and not to attaine riches or anie dominion.

The Scots also being a cruell people, & readie to fight in defense of other mens possessions (as in the warres of Northumberland it well appeared) would suerlie be readie to come to the aid of the Englishmen into Kent, euen so soone as it was known that the Danes were on land in those parts: so that by this means they should be constrained to haue to do both with the Scottishmen and Englishmen, if they first went into Kent: where if they set on land here in Scotland, they should encounter but onelie with the Scots. Therefore, the best were according to their first determination, to land amongst the Scots, sith & nce had brought them vnto those coasts; adding that when they had somewhat abated the arrogant presumption of their enemies there, then might they passe more safelie into England, after a luckie beginning of fier and sword, to proceed against their aduersaries in those parties as fortune should lead them. This deuise was allowed of the greatest number, being glad to get beside the water. Whereupon the mariners (vpon commandement giuen) drew with their ships into the mouth of the riuer called Esk, the which in those daies washed on the walles of a towne in Angus called then Celurke, but now Spountros. Here the Danes taking land, put the inhabitants of the countrie thereabouts in great feare, so that with all speed for their safegard they got them into Spountros: but the towne being quickelie assailed of the Danes, was taken, put to the sacke, and after rased, castell and all to the bare ground, not one liuing creature being left aliae of all such as were found within the same.

ber there was no place to attaine mercie; for either must they trie it out by dint of sword, or else if they slew, in the end to looke for present death at the enemies hands, who would not craffe till time they had found them forth, into what place so euer they resorted for refuge, if they chanced to be vanquished. The Scots being not a little incouraged by the kings words, kept their order of battell according as they were appointed, still looking when the onset should be giuen. Malcolme Duffe prince of Cumberland led the right wing of the Scots; and Duncane lieutenant of Atholl the left: King Kenneth himselfe go-uerned the battell. The enemies on the other part had taken their ground at the foot of a little moun-taine right afoze against the Scottish campe. Thus both the armies stood readie ranged in the field, beholding either other a good space, till at length the Scots desirous of battell, and doubting least the Danes would not come forth to anie euen ground, advanced forward with somewhat more haile than the case required, beginning the battell with shot, and throwing of darts right freshlie.

The Danes being backed with the mountaine, were constrained to leaue the same, and with all speed to come forward vpon their enemies, that by joining they might auoid the danger of the Scottish mens arrowes and darts: by this meanes therefore they came to hand-strokes, in maner before the signe was giuen on either part to the battell. The fight was cruell on both sides: and nothing hindered the Scots so much, as going about to cut off the heads of the Danes, euer as they might overcome them.
Which maner being noted of the Danes, and perceiuing that there was no hope of life but in victorie, they rushed forth with such violence vpon their ad-uersaries, that first the right, and then after the left wing of the Scots, was constrained to retire and slew backe, the middle ward stoutly yet keeping their ground: but the same stood in such danger, being now left naked on the sides, that the victorie must needs haue remained with the Danes, had not a reueler of the battell come in time, by the appointment (as is to be thought) of almighty God.

For as it chanced, there was in the next field at the same time an husbandman, with two of his sons busie about his worke, named Haie, a man strong and stiffe in making and shape of bodie, but indued with a valiant courage. This Haie beholding the king with the most part of the nobles, fighting with great baliencie in the middle ward, now destitute of the wings, and in great danger to be oppressed by the great violence of his enemies, caught a plow-beame in his hand, and with the same exhorting his sonnes to do the like, passed towards the battell, there to die rather amongst other in defense of his countrie, than to remaine aliue after the discomfiture in miserable thraldome and bondage of the cruell and most vnnmercifull enemies. There was nere to the place of the battell, a long lane fenced on the sides with ditches and walles made of turfe, through the which the Scots which fled were beaten downe by the enemies on heapes.

Here Haie with his sonnes, supposing they might best staie the flight, placed themselves ouerthwart the lane, beat them backe whome they met fleeing, and spared neither friend nor fo: but downe they went all such as came within their reach, therewith diuerse hardie personages cried vnto their fellowes to returne backe vnto the battell, for there was a new power of Scottishmen come to their succours, by whose aid the victorie might be easilie obtained of their most cruell aduersaries the Danes: therefore might they chole whether they would be slaine of their owne fellowes conning to their aid, or to returne againe to fight with the enemies. The Danes being here staied in the lane by the great baliencie of the father and the sonnes, thought verely there had bene some great succors of Scots come to the aid of their king, and thereupon ceassing from further pursute, fled backe in great disorder vnto the other of their fellowes fighting with the middle ward of the Scots.

The Scots also that before was chased, being incouraged herewith, pursued the Danes vnto the place of the battell right fiercelie. Whereupon Kenneth perceiuing his people to be thus recomfited, and his enemies partlie abashed, called vpon his men to remember their duties, and now with their ad-uersaries hearts began (as they might perceiue) to faint, he willed them to follow vpon them manfully, which if they did, he assured them that the victorie undoubtedlie should be theirs. The Scots incouraged with the kings words, laid about them so earnestlie, that in the end the Danes were constrained to forsake the field, and the Scots egerlie pursuing in the chase, made great slaughter of them as they fled.
This victorie turned highlie to the praise of the Sco-tish nobilitie, the which fighting in the middle ward, bare still the bzunt of the battell, continuing manfullie therein euen to the end. But Haie, who in such wise (as is before mentioned) staied them that fled, causing them to returne againe to the field, deserued immortall fame and commendation: for by his meanes chieflie was the victorie atchieued. And therefore on the morrow after, when the spoile of the field and of the enemies campe (which they had left void) should be diuided, the chiefest part was befoved on him and his two sonnes, by consent of all the multitude; the residue being diuided amongst the soulders and men of warre, according to the ancient cus-tome vsed amongst this nation.

The king hauing thus vanquished his enemies, as he should enter into Bertha, caused collicke robes to be offered vnto Haie and his sonnes, that being richlie clad, they might be the more honoured of the people: but Haie refusing to change his apparell, was contented to go with the king in his old garments whither it pleased him to appoint. So entring with the king into Bertha, he was receiued with little lesse hono: than the king himselfe, all the people running forth to behold him, whome they heard to haue so baliantie restored the battell, when the field was in maner lost without hope of all recouerie. At his entring into the towne he bare on his shoulder the plow-beame, more honourable to him than anie sword or battell are might haue bene to anie the most valiant warrio: Thus Haie being honored of all estates, within certeine daies after, at a counsell holden at Scone, it was ordeined, that both he and his posteritie should be accepted amongst the number of the chiefest nobles and piers of the realme, being rewarded (besides monie and other great gifts) with lands and reuenues, such as he should chofe

It is said, that by the counsell of his sonnes, who knew the fruitfulness of the soile, he did alke so much ground in those parts where the river of Tair runs by the towne of Arrore over against Jfife, as a falcon would flie over at one flight. Which request being freely granted of the king, the place was appointed at Jnschire for the falcon to be cast off: the which taking his flight from thence, never lighted till the came to a great stone nere a village called Kofse, not passing foure miles from Dundee. By which means all that countrie which lieth betwixt Jnschire aforesaid, and the said stone (being almost six miles in length, and foure in breadth) fell vnto Haie and his sons. The name of the stone also being called the falcons stone to this daie, doth cause the thing better to be beleued, and well nere all the foresaid ground still continueth in the possession of the Haies cun vnto this day. Besides this, to the further honoring of his name, the king gaue him armes thre scutcheons gules in a field of silver, a plover beame added therevnto, which he used in stead of a battell are, when he fought so valiantlie in defense of his owne countrie. Thus had the Haies their beginning of nobilitie, whose house hath attained vnto great estimation of honor, and hath bene decozated with the office of the constableship of Scotland, by the bounteous beneuolence of kings that succeeded. These things happened in the first yere of king Kenneth.

In the residue of the time that he reigned, though there chanced no great businesse by fozen enemies, yet by ciuill sedition the state of the realme was wonderfullie disquieted. First a companie of Berns of the wessterne Isles inuading Kofse, to the intent to haue fetched a bottie, were met withall by the waie and ouerthrowne by the inhabitants of that countrie. After this sturre, another followed, farre moze dangerous to the whole state of the common-wealth, raised by one Cruthlint, one of the chiefest lords of the Bernes, who was sonne vnto a certaine ladie named Jfenella, the daughter of one Cruthneth, that was gouernor of that part of Angus which lieth betwixt the two rivers, the one called Southeske, and the other Northeske. So it chanced, that on a time Cruthlint came vnto the castell of Delbogin to see his grandfather, the said Cruthneth as then lieng in the same: where vpon light occasion a fraie was begun amongst the seruingsmen, in the which two of Cruthlins seruants fortun'd to be slaine. Which inurie when Cruthlint declared by waie of complaint vnto his grandfather, he was so slenderlie heard, and answered in such reprochfull wise, as though he himselfe had bin the author of the busines, so that Cruthlins seruants perceiuing how little he was regarded of their maister, fell vpon him and beat him, that not without danger of life he brake forth of their hands, and hardlie escaped away.

In his returne homewards, he came to his mother Jfenella, where she lay with in the castell of Jfithcarne, the chiefest fortreffe of all the Bernes. Where being incensed through his mothers instigation, being a woman of a furious nature, he attempted forthwith to be reuenged of the iniurie received: so that assembling a number of his friends and kinsfolks so secretlie as he might together, with a band of the inhabitants of the Bernes, he entereth into Angus, and comming vnto the castell of Delbogin in the night season, was suffered to enter by the keepers of the gate, nothing suspecting anie treason in the world, by reason wherof was Cruthneth suddenly oppressed, the house sacked and rased, not one that was found within the same being left aloue. The spoile also was diuided by Cruthlint amongst them which came with him. The next day likewise he for-raied the countrie all there abouts, returning home with a great bottie.

They of Angus prouoked herewith, rested not long; but assembling themselves together inuaded the countrie of Bernes, where making great slaughter on each side, they left the countrie void almost both of men and cattell. Thus did the people of those two countries pursue the warre one against another a certaine time, with daillie incursions and wastings of either others countries, in such cruell wise, that it was thought the one of them must needs shortly come to bitter destruction, if speedie remedie were not the sooner prouided. The king being informed of this mischete and great trouble, which was fallen out through sedition amongst those his subiects, he made proclamation by an herald, that those of Angus and Bernes, whom he vnderstood to be culpable, should appeare within fiftene daies after at Scone, there to make answer afoze appointed iudges, to such things as might be laid to their charge, vpon paine of death to euerie one that made default. When the day of appearance came, there were but few that did appeare.

The most part of them doubting to be punished for their offences with Cruthlint their capteine, fled out of Bernes, taking with them their wifes, and their children, and all their goods. The king being sore moued herewith, perceiued how readie the Scottish people were by nature vnto rebellion, when they were gentlie used: and againe how they obied the magistrates best when they were restrained from their wild outragious doings by due punishment and execution of iustice. He considered therefore that if he did not cause those seditious rebels which had thus disobeyed his commandements to be punished according to the order of the lawes, he should haue the whole realme shortly disquieted with ciuill warre and open rebellion. Wherevpon with all speed he caused earnest pursuit to be made after Cruthlint, and the residue of the offenders, the which at length being taken in Lochquahar, were brought vnto a castell in Gotozie called Dounsinnam, where after iudgement pronounced against them, Cruthlint first, and then other the chiefest stirrers on either side were put to execution. The commons, for that it was thought they followed their superiours against their wifles, were pardoned and licenced to depart to their houses.

For this equitie shewed in ministring iustice by the king, he was greattlie praised, loued, and bread of all his subiects; so that great quietnesse followed in the state of the common-wealth, greatlie to the aduancement thereof, and so continued till the 22 yere of this Kenneths reigne. At what time the blind loue he bare to his owne issue, caused him to procure a detestable fact, in making away one of his nearest kinsmen. This was Malcolme the sonne of king Duffe, created in the beginning of Kenneths reigne prince of Camberland, by reason wherof he ought to haue succeeded in rule of the kingdom after Kenneths death. Whereat the same Kenneth græuing not a little, for that thereby his sonnes should be kept from inioyning the crowne, found meanes to poison him. But though the physicians vnderstanding by such euident signes as appeared in his bodie, that he was poisoned indeed, yet such was the opinion which men had of the kings honor and integrity, that no suspicion at all was conceiued that it should be his deed.

The cloked loue also which he had shewed toward him at all times, and so sudden commandement giuen by him vpon the first newes of his death, that his funerals should be celebrated in euerie church and chappell for his soule; and againe, the teares which he shed thod for him, in all places where anie mention chanced to be made of the losse which the realme had sustained by the death of so worthe a prince, made men nothing mistrustfull of the matter, till at length some of the nobles perceiuing the outward sorow (which he made) to passe the true griefe of the heart, began to gather some suspicion, that all was not well: but yet because no certaintie appeared, they kept their thoughts to themselves. About the same time came ambassadors forth of England from king Edward the sonne of Edgar (which after through treason of his stepmother Esculda, was made a martyr) requiring that sith Malcolme the prince of Cumberland was deceased, it might please the king with the states of the realme to chose some other in his place, who doing his homage vnto the king of England, according as it was covenanted by the league, might be a meane to confirme the same league betwixt the two nations for the auoiding of all occasions of breach thereof that otherwise happilie might insue.

Kenneth at the same time held a counsell at Scone, where hauing heard the request of these ambassadors, in presence of all his nobles, he answered that he was glad to vnderstand that king Edward was so careful for maintenance of loue and amitie betwixt his subjects and the Scottishmen, according to the articles of the ancient league in times past concluded betwixt them, the ratification whereof for his part he likewise most earnestlie desired, and therefore in rendering most heartie thanks vnto him for his gentle aduertisement, he purposed by the advice of his nobles, and the other estates of his realme as then there assembled, to elect a new prince of Cumberland, without anie further delaie: and thereupon required the ambassador to be present on the morrow, to heare what he was whom the nobles should name to be preferred vnto that dignitie. The ambassadors hereupon departing forth of the coun-cell chamber, were conueied to their lodging by di-uerse of the nobilitie that were appointed to keepe them companie.

Then Kenneth with a long oration went about to persuaide the pères, and other the estates of the realme there (as I said) assembled, to alter the cus-tome and ancient order vsed by their elders in chosing of him that should succede in the gouernance of the realme, after the deceasse of him that was in possession. He vsed to manie reasons as was possible for him to deuise in that behalfe, thereby to induce them to his purpose, which was to haue an act established for the crowne to go by succession, onelic to this end, that one of his sonnes might inioy the same immediatlie after his deceasse. He declared also what discommodities, seditions, and great inconueniences had growne, in that the crowne had gone in times past by election: for though it was ordeined at the first that it should so doe, vpon a good intent and great consideration, yet in proceesse of time proofe and experience had shewed, that more hinderance happened vnto the common-wealth thereby (beside the danger euer insuing incidentlie vnto such issue as the king left behind him) than profit, if the sundrie murthers, occasions of ciuill discord, and other wicked practises were throughlie treued and considered, the summe whereof he recited from point to point, and so in the end with great instance besought them, that so pernicious a custome might be abolished and taken away, to the great benefit of the whole state of the realme, speciallie sith in all realmes common-lie the order was, that the sonne should without anie contradiction succede the father in the heritage of the crowne and kinglie estate.

The king had no sooner made an end of his long oration, which he handled after the pithiest sort he could, but that diuerse of the noble men which were there amongst other, being made priuie to the matter aforesaid, motioned meanes to haue Malcolme the son of Kenneth created prince of Cumberland, that he might so haue an entrance to the crowne after the deceasse of his father. This motion by and by was in manie of their mouthes, which Kenneth perceiuing, he required of the most ancient pères whome they would name to be prince of Cumberland, that there might be a meane to ratifie and con-firme the league betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, Constantine the sonne of king Collin, and Grime the nephue of king Duffe by his brother Mo-gall: whome by the force of the former law they might by god reason haue looked to haue had the preferment themselves.

But yet perceiuing it was in vaine to denie that which would be had by violence (although they should neuer so much stand against it) being first demanded of the herald what they thought, they an-swerd (notwithstanding against their minds indee) that the king might order all things as should stand with his pleasure, appointing whom he thought most meet to be prince of Cumberland, and to abrogate the ancient law of creating the kings, in deuising new ordinances for the same, as should seeme vnto him and those of his counsell most requisite and necessarie. The multitude then following their sentence, cried with loud & vndiscreet voices, to haue Malcolme the sonne of king Kenneth created prince of Cumberland. And thus the same Mal-colme (though as yet vnder age) was by the voices of the people ordeined prince of Cumberland, in place of the other Malcolme sonne to king Duffe.
The daie next following, the ambassadors comming into the counsell chamber, heard what was decreed touching their request, and then being highlie rewarded of the kings bountious liberalitie, they returned into England, and Malcolme with them, to be acquainted with king Edward, and to do his homage for the principalltie of Cumberland, as the cus-tome was.

At the same time also there was a new act deuised and made, the old being abrogated (by the appointment of the king) for the creation of the Scottish kings in time to come, manie of the nobles rather consenting with silence, than greatlie allowing it either in harts or voices, though some currisaours among them set forward the matter to the best of their powers. The articles of this ordinance were these. The eldest heire male of the deceased king, whether the same were sonne or nephue, of what age soeuer he should be, yea though he should be in the mothers wombe at the time of the fathers deceasse, should from thence forth succede in the kingdome of Scotland. The nephue by the sonne should be preferred before the nephue by the daughter, in attaining to the heritage of the crowne. And likewise the brothers sonne should be admitted before the sisters son.
The same law should be obserued of all such of the Scottish nation, as had anie lands or inheritance comming to them by descent. Where the king by this meanes chanced to be vnder age, & not able to rule, there should be one of the chiefest pères of the realme chosen and elected to haue the gouernance of his person and realme, till he came to 14 yéres of age. The which foureteenth yere of his age being accomplished, he should haue the administration committed to his owne hands. The heires of all other persons of ech estate and degree should remaine vnder the wardship of their appointed gouernors, till they came to the age of 21 yéres, and not till then to meddle with anie part of their lands and linings.

These lawes and ordinances being once published and confirmed, king Kenneth supposed the kingdome to be fallie assured vnto him and his posteritie, and thereupon indued himselfe to win the hearts of the people with upright administration of iustice, and the fauour of the nobles he sought to purchase with great gifts which he bestowed amongst them, as well in lands belonging to the crowne, as in other things greatlie to their contentation. Thus might he seeme happie to all men, hauing the loue both of his lordes and commons: but yet to himselfe he seemed most unhappie, as he that could not but still liue in continuall feare, least his wicked practise concerning the death of Malcolme Duffe should come to light and knowledge of the world. For so cometh it to passe, that such as are pickt in conscience for anie secret offense committed, haue euer an vnquiet mind. And (as the same goeth) it chanced that a voice was heard as he was in bed in the night time to take his rest, uttering vnto him these or the like words in effect: 20
"Thinke not Kenneth that the wicked slaughter of Malcolme Duffe by thee contriued, is kept secret from the knowledge of the eternall God: thou art he that didst conspire the innocents death, enterprising by traitorous meanes to do that to thy neighbour, which thou wouldest haue reuenged by cruell punishment in anie of thy subiects, if it had bene offered to thy selfe. It shall therefore come to passe, that both thou thy selfe, and thy issue, through the iust vengeance of almighty God, shall suffer worthy punishment, to the infamie of thy house and familie for euermore. For euen at this present are there in hand secret practises to dispatch both thee and thy issue out of the waie, that other maie inioy this kingdome which thou dost endeavour to assure vnto thine issue.

The king with this voice being striken into great dread and terroz, passed that night without anie sleepe comming in his eyes. Wherefore in the morning he got him vnto bishop Spouean, a man of great holiness of life, vnto whome he confessed his heinous and most wicked offense, beseeching him of counsell, which waie he might obtaine pardon and forgiveness at Gods hands by worthy penance. Spouean hearing how the king demoned his offense committed, he willed him to be of god comfort. For as the wrath of almighty God was prouoked by sinne and wicked offenses, so was the same pacified againe by repentance, if so be we continue penitent and willing to amend. King Kenneth being confirmed in hope of forgiveness by these and sundrie other the like comfortable words of the bishop, studied vnfeinedlie to do worthy penance, leauing nothing vndone which he thought might serue for a witnesse of his penitent hart, thereby to auoid the vengeance which he stood in feare of to be prepared for him, by reason of his heinous and wicked crime.

It chanced hereupon, that within a short time after he had bene at Fordune, a towne in Spences, to visit the reliks of Maladus which remaine there, he turned a little out of the waie to lodge at the castell of Fethircarne, where as then there was a forrest full of all manner of wild beasts that were to be had in anie part of Albion. Here was he receiued by Fenella ladie of the house, whose son (as ye haue heard) he caused to be put to death, for the commotion made betwixt them of Spences and Angus. She was also of kin vnto Malcolme Duffe, whome the king had made awaie, and in like manner vnto Constantine and Crime, defrauded of their right to the crowne, by the craftie deuise of the king (as before is partlie mentioned.) This woman therefore being of a stout stomack, long time before hauing conceived an immortal grudge towards the king, vpon the occasions before rehearsed (namelie aswell for the death of hir sonne Cruthlint, as hauing some inkling also of the impossioning of Malcolme Duffe, though no full certaintie therof was knowne) imagined night and day how to be reuenged.

She understood that the king delighted aboute measure in goodlie buildings, and therefore to the end to compasse hir malicious intent, she had caused a tower to be made, joining vnto hir owne lodging with in the foresaid castell of Fethircarne. The which tower was couered ouer with copper finclie ingrauen with diuerse flowers and images. Here to was it hong within with rich cloths of arras wrought with gold and silke, verie faire and costlie. Behind the same were there crossebowes set readie bent with sharpe quarrels in them. In the middell of the house there was a goodlie basen image also, resembling the figure of king Kenneth, holding in the one hand a faire golden apple set full of pretious stones, denised with such art and cunning, that so soone as anie man should draw the same vnto him, or remoue it neuer so little anie waie forth, the crossebowes would immediatlie discharge their quarrels vpon him with great force and violence.

Fenella therefore being thus prouided aforehand, after meate desired the king to go with hir into that inner chamber, into the which being entered, he could not be satisfied of long with the beholding of the goodlie furniture, aswell of the hangings as of diuerse other things. At the last hauing viewed the image which stood (as is said) in the middell of the chamber, he demanded what the same did signifie: Fenella answered, how that image did represent his person, and the golden apple set so richlie with smaragds, sapphires, topases, rubies, turkasses, and such like pretious stones, she had prouided as a gift for him, and therefore required him to take the same, beseeching him to accept it in god part, though it were not in value worthy to be offered vnto his princelie honor and high dignitie. And herewith the herselfe withdrew awaie, as though she would haue taken some thing forth of a chest or coffer, thereby to auoid the danger.

But the king delighted in beholding the gems and orient stones, at length remouing the apple, the better to aduise it, incontinentlie the crossebowes discharged their quarrels so direcalie vpon him, that striking him through sundrie places, he fell downe stark dead, and lay flat on the ground. Fenella as soone as she beheld him fall to the ground readie to die, she got forth by a backe doze into the next woods, where she had appointed hories to stae for hir, by meanes whereof she escaped out of all danger of them that pursued hir, yer the death of the king were openlie knowne vnto them. His seruants still waiting for his comming forth in the utter chamber, at length when they saw he came not at all, first they knocked at the doze skillic, then they rapped hard thereat: lastlie, doubting that which had happened, they brake open doze after doze, till at length they came into the chamber where the king lay cold dead vpon the floze.

The clamor and crie hereupon was raised by his seruants, and Fenella cursed and sought for in euerie place, that had committed so heinous and wicked a deed: but the ingratiuous woman was conueied so secretlie out of the waie, that no where could she be heard of. Some supposed that she fled first vnto Constantine, by whose helpe she got ouer into Ireland. The ambitious desire which the same Constantine shewed he had to succeed in government of the kingdome after Kenneths deceasse, increased that suspicion greatlie. For immediatlie after it was known that Kenneth was dead, he got his friends together, and went vnto diuerse places requiring the lordes to Malcolm seareth friends against Constantine.

God counsell was given him.

Yet other counsell was given him.

Malcolm goes with an armie to fight with Constantine. Constantine went to meete Malcolm.

Constantine procured friends so on each side, that by their meanes being of high authoritie in the realme, he was brought by them vnto Scone, and there crowned king the 12 day after Kenneths deceasse, in the 25 yere after that the same Kenneth had begun his reigne ouer the Scottishmen, and in the yere of our saluation a thousand iust, in the which yere (as is said) sundrie birketh sights were seene as well in Albion, as in other places. The sea left vpon the sands on the coasts of Buchuane, an infinite multitude of fishes, the which lieng there dead, caused such a stinkie sauer, that the aire being therewith infected, great death of people ensued. The mane appeared of a blondie colour, to the great terror of them that beheld it. In the summer next following, corne failed, and cattell died so generallie, that if there had not bene more plentie of fish got than was accustomed to be, the people had bene famished in manie places. In Albion and also France it rained stones. But all these dreadful wonders might not withhold the Scottishmen from their wicked vices, wherevnto in those daies they were wholie giuen, though there wanted not diuerse vertuous men, as well bishops as other, that in their sermons exhorted the people to repent and amend their naughty liuings: for other wise vndoubtedlie such grislie sights and tokens as chanced in those daies, menaced some great mischief to fall vnto the whole nation. And suerlie their words proued true: for the Scots continuing in their wilfulnesse, being stubborne harted one against another, brought their countrie into danger of utter destruction.

Malcolm the sonne of Kenneth, created (as ye haue heard in his fathers life time) prince of Cumberland, hearing that Constantine (against the ordinance latelie made) had usurped the crowne, as soone as his fathers bodie was buried in Colmekill, with such funerall pompe as appertained, he desired his fathers friends to giue him such faithfull counsell as they thought most expedient, which way he were best to walke for the appealing of the sedition now begun, by reason of Constantines presumptuous attempt. There were some amongst that companie that toke it to be best, first to vnderstand the minds of all the pères and nobles of the realme, before they went about anie exploit against the tyrant; least whilst Malcolm should seke to deliuer himselfe from danger, he might happilie wind himselfe further into trouble, than without extream perill of the common wealth he should be able to get forth thereof againe. Other there were that iudged it best suddenly to go against Constantine before he made himselfe strong: for if they came vpon him per he were provided for their coming, manie of them that feigned themselves to be his friends, would forsake him, so soone as they saw anie power of his enemies at hand. And then should he either fall into their hands, or be driven to flee the realme for safeguard of his life.

The fierce yong man following this counsell as the best to his seeming, & trusting more to his owne wit than to the graue aduise of men of skill, assembled together in all hast possible about the number of ten thousand men, with whome making towards Constantine with speedie footnes, at length he came into Louthian. Constantine being informed of all his aduersaries doings, had gotten together also an huge power, so that passing forth with the same to incounter them, the hate which ran of his great number and puissance, caused Malcolm for verie feare that he should not be able in anie part to match him, to breake vp his armie, and to flee backe into Cumberland: by reason whereof he had bene put to such hinderance and dishonour, as would not easilie haue bene recovered, had not Kenneth the bastard sonne of his father the aboue mentioned Kenneth incamped with a mightie power about Sterling, & defended the passages of the Forth, that Constantine with his armie could not come ouer. Then rose there great famine and penurie of vittels in both hostes, so that Constantine with great indignation was constrained to breake vp his campe, and so to leaue his enterpryse for that season.

Thus was the realme diuided into two sundrie factions, wherevpon followed waistings and incursions made into each others possessions, with such crueltie, that the same might be a sufficient instruction what mischief happeneth through ciuill discord. The poore commons and husbandmen were brought to such miserie through the often spoiling and robberies vsed by the men of warre, that they were not able to till their grounds. Finally, there rose one mischief so fast in the necke of an other, that no kind of crueltie was spared, robbing, reauing, and forcible extortion was exercised on all sides without hope of anie redresse or amendment. Whilst the Scottishmen were thus at dissension amongst themselves, renting and pulling in peeces their owne miserable native countrie, Edward king of England being oppressed with invasion of Danes, was glad to buye peace at their hands, for himselfe and his people, with right large summes of monie; but perceiving that his enemies ceased not daile to spoile and rob his subjects, he purposed to trie what he might doe by making them warre: and to make his part the stronger, he required Malcolm prince of Cumberland to aid him against the Danes, according to the couenant of the ancient league. Malcolm consenting to Edwards request, came with a mightie armie of Cumberland men to support him: by reason whereof the Danes doubting to be ouermatched, after certeine light skirmishes, without anie great bloodshed, condescended to haue peace, which was concluded with these conditions: that king Edward should paie vnto the Danes a thousand pounds of gold, for the which they should content themselves with those lands which they had alreadie in possession, and to inuade no further vpon the Englishmen; but contrariwise to be ready to fight in their defense, if anie forreine enemy sought to make anie warres vpon them. In the meane time, whilst Malcolm was thus in England occupied in aid of king Edward against the Danes, king Constantine thought the time to serue verie well for his purpose, to reduce all those regions of Scotland, which toke part with his aduersarie (the foresaid Malcolm) vnder his subjection.

He assembled therefore twentie thousand men, and comming into Louthian, heard how Kenneth the bastard aforesaid (being left by his brother Malcolm to resist Constantines attempts) had got together an huge armie of his brothers friends, and was come vnto Craymond, where the riuer falleth into the Forth, three miles from Edinburgh, purposing there to abide his enemies, if they minded to assault him. Constantine herevpon hastened thitherwards, and comming within sight of his enemies, straightwaies ioined battell with them; immediatlie therewith there rose such an outrageous tempest of wind, comming out of the east, & driving the sand in the faces of Constantines men, that they were not able to see about them to make anie defense against Grime.

Grime used liberalitie and gentlenesse towards Constantines friends.

Malcolme prince of Cumberland is moued against Grime. A good counsell.

Malcolme sendeth priuie to the lordes of Scotland.

Malcolme his promise vnto the Scots.

Malcolme his messengers are committed to prison.

Malcolme being offended therewith, gathered an armie.

Grime is of greater force than Malcolme.

Malcolme would not haue his people to vnderstand the trueth thereof.

His aduise auailed not.

gainst their enemies that then pressed vpon them right eagerlie. By means whereof the discomfiture lighted vpon Constantines side, though neither part had anie great cause to reioice: for in the hottest of the fight, Constantine and Kenneth chanced to encounter together, and so fighting man to man, either slue other. Thus Constantine ended his life by dint of the enemies sword, in the third yeare of his reigne, & in the yeare after the incarnation 1002, & his bodie was buried in Colmekill amongst his predecessors.

Then Grime nephew to king Duffe, hearing of the slaughter made betwixt king Constantine and Kenneth, gathered together the residue of Constantines armie, being scattered abroad after the ouerthrow, supposing that by the death of Kenneth, the partie of his brother Malcolme was soe weakened, & thereupon he came vnto the abbete of Scone, and there caused himselfe to be crowned king, as lawfull successor vnto Constantine, by force of the old laws and ordinances of the realme. And to establish himselfe the more firmelie in the state, he shewed great gentlenesse towards all them that were friends vnto Constantine, and bestowed vpon them manie bountifull gifts. Neither was his liberalitie shut vp from other that had fauored Malcolme, for to the end he might allure them to beare him good will, he rewarded them highlie both in lands and treasure: but other of the same faction, whome he saw by no means could be wonne, he caused them to be proclaimed traitors, and confiscated their goods as rebels to his person, and enemies to the crowne.

Malcolme prince of Cumberland soe moued in his mind that Grime had thus taken vpon him the crowne, called his friends together, requiring to haue their aduise, which way he were best to worke in this so great a matter. They counselled him in no wise he should despise the force of his enemies, but rather to assaie by all means to draw those nobles vnto his purpose, which were assitant vnto Grime. Whereupon Malcolme following the counsell of his friends, sent forth secret messengers vnto those lords that took part with Grime, requiring them to remember their promised faith, giuen vnto his father king Kenneth, concerning the obseruance of the law established by their consent for the succession of their kings: which if they would do in renouncing their obedience vnto the vsurper Grime, he promised so to gouerne the realme with equall iustice, that no estate in reason should find cause to mislike with his doings. Manie of the nobles by means of this message revolted from the said Grime soliciting their friends by earnest trauell to do the like. But other & the greater number took those that brought the message, & sent them as prisoners vnto Grime, who presentlie committed them to prison.

Malcolme soe offended therewith, by counsell of his friends, assembled an armie to go against them, that (contrarie to the law of all nations, as he seemed to take the matter) had imprisoned his pursuants and messengers: but as he was marching forward on his purposed iourne, he heard by the way, how his aduersarie king Grime had gathered a farre greater power than he had with him, not onelie of all such of the Scottish nation inhabiting beyond the riuers of Forth and Clide, but of them also of the wessterne Isles. Malcolme doubting least if the certaintie hereof were once bruted amongst his people, the same would increase the terror more than needed; he gaue commandement therfore that no maner of wight should be suffered to come into his armie, vnlesse he were first brought to his presence. But this deuise nothing auailed him: for thereby, that which he desired to be concealed and kept most secret, became the more manifest, by reason that such as had some inkling of the matter, told it from one to another; making it much more than it was in deed. For there rose a murmuring amongst them, that there was such treason contriued, that if Malcolme with his armie went forward to ioin with his aduersaries, he should not be in danger onelie of them, which he knew to come against him in Grimes host; but also of no small number of them which were in his owne armie, who vpon the joining had determined to turne their speare points against him in Grimes quarell.

This rumor passing from one to another, put the whole number in great feare. It was first raised by certeine merchantmen, of whome there was a great number in Malcolms host, hauing more skill in buying and selling, than in anie warlike feats or enterprises. These at the first suing for licence to depart home, and could haue no grant, began to lament their miseries, in such dolefull wise, that all the campe was troubled with the noise; inasmuch that euen the old men of warre, and diuerse of the capteins were not a little discomfited and amazed with such wailfull clamors. Malcolme being aduertised hereof, thought not good to match in battell against his fierce enemies with his people thus affrighted through dread and terror, and therefore gaue licence to the most part of his host to depart for that time, and aboard onelie with certeine bands of his most faithfull friends nere to the water of Forth, to stop his enemies from passing ouer that riuier.

Whilste the realme of Scotland was thus disquieted and troubled with ciuill discord, Fothadus the great bishop of Scotland, a man of right approved vertue and clemencie, soe lamenting to see his countrie thus diuided and rent as it were in peeces, got him into his pontificall vestures, with a multitude of other reuerend priests and ecclesiasticall ministers, in humble wise comming and presenting themselves before king Grime, who with great reuerence receiuing them, willed to vnderstand the cause of their comming. Then Fothadus answered, that he was come as the seruant of Christ, the author of all peace and concord, beseeching him by way of humble supplication to take ruth and pittie of the great trouble and miserie fallen to the realme, since the time he had taken the gouernance vpon him, the state of things being such, as if some redresse were not found in all speedie wise, the vtter ruine of the common-wealth must needs insue, by reason of the fundrie debats and factions daillie rising among the people of all sorts and degrees, so that murders, robberies, rapes, with all other kinds of iniuries & mischief were still put in practise without restraint or punishment, in such licentious sort that no man could assure himselfe of his owne: for whether it were within doores, or without, the robber was as ready to laie hands on it as the owner. Neither was there anie hope of reformation so long as the ciuill wars lasted. Therefore if it might stand with the pleasure of king Grime in reliefe of the poore commons of Scotland, to condescend vnto some necessarie agreement with Malcolme, Fothadus offered to undertake to conclude a peace betwixt them, in such wise as should in no maner of behalfe be preiudiciall to his honor and roiall maiestie.

Grime moued with the wordes of the bishop (who most instantlie besought him, although the calamitie and great affliction of his people did but little mollifie his heart; yet in respect of his owne suertie, which might not continue if his people were once destroyed, to remit part of his high displeasure) answered, that peace he could be contented to haue, so the same might be concluded with his honor saued: for suchlike wars he neuer desired but onelie in defense of his good title and right, which he had to the crowne descended vnto him by the old lawes and ancient ordinaunces of the realme, and therefore he purposed not to leaue the same with life, but to fight for it against Malcolme, and all his partakers, euen vnto death. But if it were so, that Malcolme would content himselfe with the principallitie of Cumberland, and so thereupon breake vp his campe, and depart forth of the lands pertaining vnto the crowne, he would gladly come to a communication with him for peace; but if Malcolme refused thus to do, he assured him that he would not leaue off to pursue him to the vttermost of his power, as his most cruell and fierce enimie.

Fothadus hauing heard Grimes words, besought him to staie a time, till he might go vnto Malcolme, to vnderstand what his full mind was in this behalfe not doubting but to find him conformable vnto anie reasonable motion, for relieuing of the poore afflicted state of the land. Grime granting vnto this request, Fothadus in like sort and habit as he came vnto Grime, went vnto Malcolme, whome he found at Sterling; where comming before his presence with a long oration, he greatlie bewailed the dolorous calamities of the Scottish common-wealth, into the which it was fallen through ciuill sedition onlie, and herewith declared also by great likelihood of substantiall reasons, how infortunat and miserable the end should be of the warres, if the same were pursued to the vttermost. His tale being throughlie heard and well digested, wrought so with Malcolme, that he promised to withdraue into Cumberland without anie further attempt, if Grime would in like case breake vp his campe, and agree to haue a truce for thre moneths space, in which meane time they might by certeine commissioners appointed and authorised thereto, talke and common for concluding of a finall peace and concord betwixt them.

Grime refused not this offer, and so thereupon licenced his people to depart to their homes, repairing himselfe with certeine of his nobles into Angus vnto the castell of Fozfayr, there to take further aduise what was to be done touching the appointed communication of peace. But Fothadus would in no wise rest, till the commissioners were met and assembled together in communication at Seone, where within few daies after (chiefly through his earnest diligence) peace was concluded with these conditions. First, that Grime during his life time should inioy the crowne, and after his decesse the same to remaine to Malcolme & his heirs by lineall descent for euer, according to the ordinance & decre made & established by R. Kenneth. And whosoever should go about either by word or deed to impeach or hinder the said ordinance and decre, should be reputed for a traitor to the common-wealth & realme. Furthermore all the lands lieng betwixt Louthian & Northumberland, and betwixt Clide and Westmerland, euen from the Almaine seas to the Irish seas, should presentlie remaine & be transported vnto the dominion & gouernement of Malcolme, with the which contenting himselfe, during the naturall life of Grime, he should continue in friendship with the said Grime, & so in no wise stirre or moue anie warre or debate, either against him or anie of his friends: for if he did, and went about to breake anie of the articles of this peace, he should not onlie lose those lands which he now held, but also be depriued of all the right, title, claime, and interest which either he or his posteritie might make or pretend vnto the crowne at anie time hereafter.

When both the princes had bound themselves by sollemne othes to performe euerie point and points in these articles comprised, they laid armes aside, and began to take order for reforming of all misdeemeanours, which had happened within the land, by reason of the ciuill contention moued betwixt them and their partakers. Wherbet, commandement was giuen by either of these princes, that their subjects should be still in a readinesse with armour and weapons (if need required) to defend themselves against all sudden inuasions of their neighbours, whereby it may be gathered, that the one had the other still in some mistrust, that countenance sooner they shewed outwardlie. Yet notwithstanding, for the space of 8 yeares together, the peace continued without breach, or any notable trouble betwixt them.

But Grime at length of a chaste & liberall prince, through long flouth and increase of riches, became a most couetous tyrant, and so corrupted in maners and conditions, that it passed the bounds of all reason and equitie: insomuch that when he had put vnto death diuerse of his nobles, to the end he might haue their lands and goods as forfeited by attainder, he oppressed the people by continuall exactions also each day more than other. His subjects being thus brought into extreame miserie through his wicked and vniust gouernement, not knowing where to seeke for redresse, saue onlie at the hands of almighty God, the punisher of all sinne, besought him to haue pitie of their afflictions and miseries, and to change the gouernement of the realme into some better state. The lords also hauing great indignation of the trouble fallen to the realme, by the kings misgouernance and auaricious crueltie, appointed a certeine number of gentlemen to go vnto him as ambassadors from them, to require him to put awaie from him such naughtie persons as by euill counsell had peruered his mind, & moued him to do things contrarie to his honor, and the wealth of his realme.

One of these ambassadors (to whome the charge was giuen) had the words in name of them all, who comming before the kings presence, declared to him that they were sent from the residue of the nobles and peers of his realme, to admonish him of things pertaining to the suertie of his estate, and common wealth of his dominions: which was, that whereas through persuation of euill counsellors he suffered manie enormities to be committed by his ministers and officers against his subjects, to their bitter impoverishment and bndowing, the rebuke whereof did rebound vnto his dishonour, if it would please him to remoue out of his presence and seruice all such disloiall persons as sought the hinderance of the common-wealth, he should win thereby the loue of all his liege subjects, which now could not but grudge and repine at this his gouernement, as men by the same brought into such calamitie, that better it were for them in their iudgements to be dead than aliue, if reformation were not the sooner had against such enormities as his seruants and officers did daillie practise, and for the which no doubt he must needs answer, sith the sword was committed vnto him, not to inrich couetous persons, nor to oppress innocent and true dealing people, but contrarily to punish and correct guiltie and vniust dealers.

When king Grime had heard that message these ambassadors had brought, he answered to the same with fained words, and willed them vnder the pretext of courtesie to a banquet, in purpose to haue put them all in prison: but they being aduertised thereof got them in all hast to their hostles, and fled forthwith vnto Bertha, where the residue of the nobles at the same time were assembled. Grime hauing thus no regard to the wholesome aduertisement of his nobles, thought that all things would come forward with such felicitie and hap as he wished, not ceasing from raising new payments and exactions still of his subiects, till at length he was aduertised how his nobles had raised open wuarre against him, at which newes being sore kindled with displeasure, he got together a great number of men, and marched forth towards them that had so rebelled against him. Then followed more mischief and trouble than euer had bene seene afore that time in Scotland: for by reason of this ciuill dissention, castels were rased and ouerthrowne, towne burned vp, cozne destroyed, fields waisted, and the people slaine in all places, yea as well in churches as elsewhere.

Malcolme prince of Cumberland hearing of such cruell wars as were thus raised in Scotland betwixt the king and the nobles of the realme, to the danger of the bitter euerfion of the whole common-wealth, returned with all speed forth of England (where he was with an armie as then in aid of king Egeldred against the Danes) into his owne countrie for defense of his subiects, if anie attempt should happilie be made against them in that troublesome season. Hotobrit, he was no sooner returned home, but the nobles of Louthian came vnto him, beseeching him to take pitie vpon his miserable and forne countrie, & to imploie his whole force to remoue away from the people such imminent destruction as daily hasted towards them, which to do they thought it was partie euen his dutie, sith God had bestowed vpon him such gifts, both of bodie, mind, and fortune, as most plentifully appeared in him, not onelie for the weale of himselfe, but also of his friends & countrie, & therefore his part was to shew his earnest diligence to deliuer the common-wealth of such tyrannie as was practised by the misgouernement of Grime and his unhappie counsellors. Which being done, he might order all things as should like him best.

Malcolme moued with these and the like persuasions of the Scottish lordes, which daily resorted vnto him, resolved with promise of their support to leue wuarre against Grime in this so necessarie a quarrell, and so assembling a great puissance together, he did set forth towards his aduersarie. By the way also there came still vnto him great numbers of men from each side to aid him in this enterprise, offering by solenne othes to become his liegemen and subiects. Grime likewise being aduertised of those newes, with all speed got together such people as he might assemble for the time, and comming forthward with the same at the towne of Auchnabart, both the armies pitched downe their tents, the one fast by the other, on the Ascension daie. Here Grime supposing that he might take his enimies at some aduantage, if he came vpon them on the sudden, for that being giuen to deuotion, they would looke for nothing lesse than for battell on that daie, he got forth of his campe in the dawning of that morning, in purpose forthwith to assaile them.

Notwithstanding, Malcolme being aduertised thereof, sent vnto Grime, requesting him to desist from battell for reuerence of that blessed feast, but Grime would in no wise assent thereto, but neddes would come on without stop or staie; wher vpon both the armies rushing together met right fiercelie, so that in the beginning there was great slaughter made on both sides, but within a while king Grimes side was put to the worse, and in the end clearelie discomfited. In the chafe were manie slaine, but yet no such number as so notable a victorie required. It is said that Grime was taken aliue standing at defense, & most fiercelie fighting, who being sore wounded in the head, had both his eyes put out, and afterwards continuing so in great miserie and languor certaine daies, at length departed out of this life, in the 9th yeare of his reigne, and was buried in Colmekill, after the incarnation 1010 yeeres.

After this victorie thus obtained by Malcolme, he called such noble men as were taken prisoners in this battell before him, vising manie gentle wordes toward them, declaring that the right of the crowne appertained vnto him, and that the wuarres which he had made, were not attempted against the common wealth of the Scottish estate, but rather in reliefe thereof, to the end the people might be deliuered of the tyrannie exercised by Grime and his counsellors. When he had thus vttered his mind vnto them, he appointed a publike assembly to be kept at Scone (for the election of a new king) there to be holden within 15 daies after. Whither the Scottish nobilitie comming together at the time & place appointed, and consenting to crowne Malcolme king, he vtterlie refused to receiue the crowne, except the law established by his father Kenneth for the succession thereof were first confirmed and approued, wher vpon the lordes bound themselves by solenne othes to performe the same, and neuer to breake and violate it in anie condition. His request herein being granted with generall consent both of the nobles and commons, the crowne was set vpon his head, he being placed in the chaire of marble, to the great reioicing of all the people present.

When the sollemnitie of this coronation was ended, he called before him againe all the lordes and peeres of his realme; of the which, part had aided him in the last wuarres, and part had bene assistant vnto his aduersarie Grime: and there vied the matter in such wise amongst them, that he made them all friends, each one promising to othe to forget all former offenses, displeasures, and controuersies past, which he did to auoid all intestine trouble that might grow out of the rotes of such rancor and malice, as in time of the ciuill discord had sprung by among them. Further, for the better administration of iustice in due forme and maner, he bestowed publike offices vpon discret persons, skillfull in the laws and ordinances of the realme. Other offices pertaining to the wuarres & defense of the realme, he committed to such as were practised & trained in such exercises, so that iustice was ministred on all sides throughout the kingdome, with such equitie and vprightnesse, as had not bene heard of in anie age before him. Whilest the Scottish estate was gouerned in such happie wise, by the prudent policie of king Malcolme; it chanced that Sueno king of Danes landed in England with a mightie nauie, in purpose to reuenge the iniuries done before vnto his people by the Englishmen.

This Sueno (as appeareth more at large in the historie of Denmarke) first being an earnest persecutor of christian men, and punished by the diuine prouidence for his crueltie in that behalfe, thewed by sundrie ouerthrowes receiued at the enimies hands, as in being thrise taken prisoner, and in the end diuened and expelled out of his kingdome, he came into Scotland for reliefe and succour, where through the wholesome instruction of goodlie and vertuous men, he renounced his heathenish belefe, and receiued the christian faith, and being baptised, at length was restored home to his kingdome. Shortly after with a mightie armie of Danes, Gothes, Norwegians, and Swedeners, with other northerne people, he arriued (as is said) in England, and chased king Egeldred into Northumberland, who there receiuing aid from the Scots, according to the league which latelie before he had contracted with them, he determined effronies to trie the chance of battell with his enimies. Marching forwards therefore towards them, he came to the riuer of Wuse, nere to the banks whereof, not farre from Pothe, he pitched downe

When Sueno not forgetfull of the benefitts and pleasures received but latelie at the Scottismens hands, sent an herald at armes vnto them, commanding them to depart their waies home, and to refuse Egeldzeds compaignie; either else to looke for most cruell battell at the hands of the Danes, the Northwegians, and others the people of Germanie, there ready bent to their destruction. Egeldzed being aduertised that his aduersaries messenger was thus come into his campe, caused him to be staied and arrested for a spie. And the same day he brought forth his battels readie ranged into the fields, to trie the matter by dint of sword, if Sueno were so minded; who verie desirous to accept the offer, brought forth also his people in perfect order and well arraigned to fight, so that there was no staie on either part, but that together they shue most fiercelie, & in such eger wise, that neither side had leasure to bestow their shot, but euen at the first they buckled together at handblowes, continuing certeine houres with great & cruell slaughter, till at length the Englishmen were put to flight, leauing the Danes a verie dēre and bloudie victorie. The murther also that day of the Scots was great, but yet nothing to the number of the Englishmen. Egeldzed himselfe with a few other, got a bote and passed ouer Duse, so escaping out of the enemies hands, but the rest were for the most part either taken or slaine.

Thus Egeldzed being utterly banquished and despairing of all recouerie, fled out of England ouer into Normandie, where he was verie friendlie receiued of Richard as then duke of Normandie, and afterwards purchased such fauour there amongst the Normans, that he married the ladie Emme, daughter vnto the said duke, and begot of hir two sonnes. Alured and Edward, as in the English chronicles moze at large it doth appere. Sueno hauing thus overcome his enemies, and now put in possession of the whole realme of England, was in mind to haue destroyed all the English generation, so to establish the kingdome to him and his posteritie for euer, without anie impeachment afterwards to be made by such as should succed of them that were then aliue. But the nobles of England aduertised of Suenos determination, came humble before his presence, & falling downe on their knees at his feet, besought him in most pitifull wise to haue compassion on their miserable estate, who in times past being a most puissant nation, both by sea and land, were now satisfied (if he would grant them life) to continue vnder what bondage and seruitude it should stand with his pleasure to prescribe, for they desired neither possession of castels, towne, or other souereignties, but onelie to liue with their wiues and children vnder subiection within their owne native countrie, at the victors will and appointment.

Sueno, albeit he was of nature verie cruell, yet he qualifed his displeasure by this humble submission of the English nobilitie; in such sort, that he vsed the victorie farre moze gentlie, than at the first he had purposed, commanding that the whole English nation should remaine in the countrie, but in such wise, as by no meanes they should presume to beare anie armoz or weapon, but to applie themselves vnto husbandrie, and other seruile occupations vnder the gouernement of the Danes, vnto whom they should resigne and deliuer all their castels, forts, and strong holds: and taking an oath to be true liege men vnto Sueno, as their souereigne lord and king; they should bring in (to be deliuered vnto his vse) all their weapons and armoz, with other munition for the warres, also all their gold and silver, aswell in plate as coine. If anie of the Englishmen refused thus to do, proclamation was made that he should immediatlie lose his life as a rebell and a disobedient person. These conditions were hard, and hardlie vsed. The Englishmen were brought vnto such an extremitie, that they were faine to accept these conditions of peace, for other meane to avoid present death they knew none. And thus was the dominion of England conquered by the Danes, after the Saxons had reigned in the same 564 yeeres.

Such tyrannie also after this was vsed by the Danes, that none of the English nation was admitted to anie office or rule within the realme, either spirituall or tempozall, but were utterly remoued from the same, and some of them cast in prison and daillie put in hazard of their liues. Finallie, the Englishmen were brought into such miserable thraldome, that euerie householder within the realme was constrained to receiue and find at his owne proper costs and charges, one Dane, who should continually giue good watch what was said or done in the house, and to aduertise the king thereof, for doubt of conspiracies or treasons to be contriued and practised against his person and roiall estate. This Dane by the good man of the house and his familie, for honoz sake, was called lord Dane, which word was afterwards turned to a name of reproch, as where anie idle person liued loitering, without the vse of some honest exercise to get his liuing withall, the people were and yet are accustomed to call him a lordaine.

¶ Thus farre out of Hector Boetius we haue shewed of Suenos doings in England, the which although it agre not in all points with our English histories, yet fith the historie of Scotland in this place seemeth partlie to hang thereon, we haue thought good to set it downe as we find it in the same Boetius: but aduertising the reader withall, that if our histories be true, this which followeth touching Suenos inuading of Scotland, chanced before that Egeldzed, whome the Scottish writers name Eilred, was duen to flie into Normandie. For when that Sueno lastlie returned into England, and constrained Egeldzed so to forsake the land, he liued not long after but departed this life about Candelmas, in the yeere 1014 (as in the English histories ye may read moze at large) not hauing time to make anie such iournie into Scotland: so that it may be thought, if he did enterpris anie such exploit there, it was before this his last arriual in England.

But now to proceed according to that which we find in the foresaid Boetius. Sueno hauing spoiled the Englishmen of their liberties (in manner before remembred, or rather brought them to become tributaries vnto him, as at the first time of his arriual here he did in deed, he thought it necessarie, for the moze suertie of his estate in England, to conclude some peace or league with his neighbours the Normans, Britains, & Scots, vnder condition that they should not support anie Englishman against him. But for, somuch as he could not compasse his intention here, in, he furnished all the castels and fortresses on the sea-coasts, ouer against Normandie, with men, munition, and vittels, to resist all sudden inuasions that might be attempted on that side. And on the other part towards the north, he made all the prouision he could deuise to make mortall wars vpon the Scots: and the moze to annoie his enemies, he sent commandement vnto Olauus his lieutenant in Northwaie, and to Onetus his deputie in Denmarke, to come with all the power they might leaue into Scotland, to make warres on his enemies there.

Whereupon shortly after those foresaid capitains arrived with an huge armie in the mouth of Speie, and landed in such puissant order, that the inhabitants of Spurrey land fled out of their houses, with their their wiues, children, and gods (such as they could conueie awaie with them) into places where they thought to remaine most out of danger. But the Danes, after their manner, burne and spoile all be- fore them, as well churches and chappels, as other build- ings and edifices. Such of the people as could not flee in time, but by chance fell into their hands, were slaine without all mercie. Also all the strengths and holds in the countrie were taken by the Danes, three castles onelie excepted: that is to say, Elgin, Forres, 10 and Jarne, which the Danes named afterwards Burg, and for that they trusted (when the same was twome) the other two would yeld without anie fur- ther defense, they first laid siege vnto this castell of Jarne, inforcing themselues with all their power to win it: but in the meane time, they were informed how Malcolme the Scottish king was come within fve miles of them with all the forces of his realme to giue them battell.

Incontinentlie hereupon they raised their siege, 20 and hastned forth to meet him, with no lesse courage than if victorie were already present in their hands. Shortly after, there came vnto them heralds also from Malcolme, to vnderstand whie they had thus invaded his realme with open and most cruell warre, hauing no occasion giuen by him or his subiects so to do: who scarcely had done their message, but that they were slaine forthwith by cruell outrage of the Danes. Malcolme being soe moued to vnderstand the law obserued by all nations for the safetie of mes- sengers to be thus violated by the enimies, kept on his iourne with the more fierce courage, till he came to a meadow a little beside Killos, where he incam- ped for that night. Great noise and clamour was heard throughout the armie, euerie man being desirous of battell, to reuenge the iniuries done by the Danes against their friends and countriemen: not withstanding on the morrow, when they saw their e- 30 nimies in farre greater number, and in better order than euer had bene sene by anie of them before that time, their hart began to woe faint, hauing greater care which wale to saue their owne liues, than to giue the onset vpon their enimies.

Malcolme perceiuing such dread to be entred into the hearts of his people, that they were now more like to run awaie than to fight, if he should bring them forth to battell, got him to a little hill, and calling his nobles about him, he declared vnto them how he could not but detest their great cowardise, that were thus affrighted at the first sight of their enimies, with- 50 out further triall of their forces. ¶ At home (said he) ye are most hardie and valiant, where no danger ap- pareth. What rebuke then is it vnto you, to be thus faint hearted (now that ye are come where valancie should be shewed) in degenerating so far from your worthie fathers and noble progenitors, the which at Loncart vnder the conduct of my father Kenneth, obtained so famous a victorie of the selfe same nati- 60 on, whose furious puissance ye sene now so much to feare: There hath bene triall made in battell with this enimie in our time, both within the bounds of Scotland, and also of England, to the great honor and renowne of our elders. What discomfitures the Danes haue receiued are yet fresh in memorie, so manie of them losing their liues amongst vs, that Albion may well be reckoned the sepulture of Danes; as some of you can well record by your owne remembrance, and other haue heard by report of their forefathers and ancestors. ¶ Ye ought then (said he) to be of god courage, rather than to faint now at need, considering ye haue to doe with those e- 60 nimies, who are but the remnant of the other, which before haue bene banquished and ouerthrowne by Scottishmen, both at Loncart, and in diuerse other places; yea and besides that, such as mowing warres now at this present without iust occasion, haue vio- lated the lawes both of God and man, deserting thereby iust vengeance at Gods hands, the punisher of all such traitor offendours. There is great hope therefore of victorie (said he) left vnto all such as fight against these enimies, if we take manlie harts vnto vs, and shew our selues in valiant constancie like to our elders, whereby it shall then appere what outra- 70 gious follie remained in the Danes, to invade vs without occasion of iniuries preceding. Therefore if ye haue not more regard to the safetie of your fraile bodies, which must needs at length perish, than to the defense and preservation of your common countrie; why passe ye not forward, sith there is now no place nor time to take longer aduise in the matter, as ye may well vnderstand by the presence of the enimie ready to ioine?

The nobles moued with these wordes of their prince, began boldlie to exhort their people to battell. Incontinentlie whereupon rose such noise and raging furie through the armie, that without measuring ei- ther their owne forces or their enimies, they rush forth vpon them without anie order or god arae. ¶ launs & Dnetus beholding the Scots to come thus furiously against them, boldlie incourted them with arraied battels. Whereupon ensued a verie ter- rible fight, with great manhood shewed on both sides, nothing being let passe that might appertene to worthie captains: the Scots inforcing themselues 80 to defend their countrie and ancient liberties on the one side, and the Danes doing their best indurour by valiant hardinesse to saue their liues and honors on the other. At length, after huge murther & slaugh- ter made on both parts, the Scots were put to flight, Malcolme was soe wounded, & had his hel- met so fast beaten to his head, that it might not well be got off, yet was he conueied out of the field in ma- ner for dead, and kept secret in a wood, till he was somewhat amended, and then got him into places out of danger. The Danes hauing got this victorie, and gathered the spoile of the field, returned to be- siege efflonies the castell of Jarne, with more force and violence than before.

This castell in those daies was inclosed on eche side with the sea, hauing one narrow passage as an entrie vnto it, made by craft of man in manner of a bridge. Those that were within it, having know- ledge of the ouerthrow and losse of the field, rendered the fortresse, on condition, that leauing all their ar- mor, weapon, and other munitions behind them, they might depart with their liues and other goods saued. ¶ Neuertheless the Danes, contrarie to their faith gi- uen, being once entred the castell, hanged all those which they found within it ouer the wals, in most de- spitefull manner. Thus was Jarne twome by the Danes, the strongest hold within Murray land, and so garnished with men, munition, and vittels, that it was thought impregnable. ¶ Then those souldiers which kept Elgin and Forres, hearing what crueltie the Danes had thus used, fled out of those castles, and left them void without anie person to defend them. The Danes reioicing at this good fortune, trusted to establish themselues sure seates in Murray land, and thereupon sent backe their ships into Norway and Denmarke, to fetch from thence their viues and children. In the meane time they constrained such Scots as they had laid hands on, to reape and inne the corne growing abroad in the fields, vnto their vse and commoditie.

and came in god order and most warlike arraie unto Murchlake, a towne of Mpar, where the first erection of the bishops see of Abirben was founded. Here the one armie comming in sight of the other, they were suddenlie both amazed. For the Scots having had too much experience of the crueltie shewed afore time by the Danes, were put in no small feare now at the plaine & open sight of them. The Danes being farre off from the sea side, and vpon an unknowne ground, were moze afraid of some guilefull practise, than of the open violence and force of their enemies. Yet neuertheless in the end, by the encouragement of the capteins on both sides, they buckled together with great fiercenesse and most cruel malicious hatred on ech hand.

In the first brunt three valiant capteins, that is to say, Kenneth of Gla, Grime of Stratherne, and Patrike of Dunbar, rushing ouer fiercelie on their enemies, were slaine, and gaue occasion to manie of the Scottishmen to flee, but the place was such, that they could not well make their course ante waie forth, by reason of the narrownesse thereof, fenced on either side with deepe trenches full of water and mud: also in trauerses were laid sundrie trees, as it had bene of purpose to impeach the passage, deuised in that sort (as was thought) in time of some ciuill warres. Here though Malcolme like a valiant champion, did his best to staie them that fled, yet was he borne backe with the preasse, till he came to the midst of this place, where stood a chappell dedicated in the honor of saint Mholke, the which Malcolme beholding, cast by his hands towards heauen, making his praier on this wise. Great God of vertue, rewarder of pietie, and punisher of sinne, we thy people seeking to defend our native countrey granted to vs of thy beneuolence, as now destitute of all mortall helpe, and thus oppressed with the iniurious inuasion of Danes, do flee vnto thee in this our extreme necessitie, beseeching thee to haue compassion vpon our miserable estate: remoue (oh mercifull lord) this dreadful terror from thy people. And oh thou mother of God, the sweet refuge of mortall people in their distresse and miseries: and thou saint Mholke to whom this chappell was dedicate, helpe vs at this present, and in the honor of you I haere make a vow to build a cathedrall church for a bishops see, to remaine as a monument, to testifie vnto our posteritie, that by your support our realme hath bene defended.

Scarcellie had Malcolme made an end of this praier, when diuers of the nobles with a lowd voice, as though they had bene assured that his praier was heard, cried to their companies; Stand god fellows, for suerlie it is the pleasure of almightie God, that we returne and renew the battell against our enemies. Hereupon rose a wonderfull noise amongst the souldiers, ech one encouraging other to withstand the enemies, and to fight in most manfull wise in defence of their countrey and ancient liberties, & forthwith as it had bene by miracle they returned vpon their enemies, making great slaughter on ech side, without regard to their liues or bloudie wounds, which they boldlie and without feare receined. Here with Malcolme with an ambushment of stout warriors came vpon Onetras, who was prancing vp and downe the field without anie helmet on his head, as though the Scots had bene alreadie without recouerie clearelie discomfited, and so there was he beaten downe beside his horse, and amongst the footmen slaine out of hand. The residue of the Danes beholding the slaughter of their capteine, staied from further pursute on the Scots. Whereof ensued great boldnesse to the Scots, and discouragement to the Danes: albeit the battell continued still a long space, the souldiers doing their best on either side, till at length the Danes were put to flight, manie of them being slaine, and but few taken. Mlauius beholding the discomfiture of his people, & how his companion in authoritie was slaine, fled into Murey land with a small companie about him.

The next day, Malcolme considering what a number of his most valiant capteins he had lost in this battell, diuided the spoile of the field amongst his men, and ceassing from further pursute of the Danes at that time, went into Angus, where he remained the residue of the yere within the castell of Forfair, taking counsell with his nobles touching the publicke affaires of the realme, and how to recouer his countrey of Murey land out of the enemies hands. King Sueno hearing in the meane time how infortunatlie his people had sped thus in Scotland at the battell of Murchlake, in reuenge thereof determined to inuade the Scots with two mightie nauiies, the one to be rigged in England, and to come forth to the riuer of Thames; and the other to be sent from Denmarke, one Camus a Dane, verie expert in warlike knowledge, being appointed to be gouernor of all the men of warre that should come from both those parties.

The yere next ensuing, both these fleets according to commandement and order giuen, arrived and met together within the mouth of the Forth, nere to saint Ebbes head. Here Camus going about to land his men, was kept off by the stout resistance of the Scots, there assembled for the same intent. Camus then plucking vp the sailles, directed his course vnto the Ile of Sketh, where stoing at anchor for the space of one moneth, and abiding for some prosperous wind, at length when the same came once about, he passed from thence vnto the Redbraies, called in Latine Rubrum promontorium, there landed his whole armie, before the countrey could be gathered to resist him. Camus being once landed, got him to the next hill, and beholding the ruine of the towne of Montros, which a few yeres before had bene destroyed by the Danes, he reioiced not a little, for that his chance was to come on land in the selfe same place, where the Danes had earli vanquished their enemies, hoping of like lucke in this his enterpryse and present expedition.

After this, he took his iourne through Angus, sparing no manner of crueltie that might be deuised: cities, townes, villages, and churches, with all manner of other buildings publicke and priuat were consumed with fire. At his comming to Brechin, for that the castell there in those daies was of such strength, that it might not be hastilie wonne, he caused the towne and church being right faire and sumptuouslie built in honor of the Trinitie (to whom it was dedicated) to be spoiled, & so rased to the earth, that one stone was not left standing vpon an other. With these and the semblable cruelties, Camus raging both against God and man, was finally aduertised that king Malcolme was come to Dundee with all the power of Scotland. Then suddenlie he took the next way towards the sea side, comming the next day following vnto a village called Balbrid, where he pitched downe his tents. The same day, king Malcolme making all hast possible to succour his subiects, and preserue the countrey from the cruell outrage of the Danes, came to the towne of Warre two little miles from the place, where his enemies were incamped. In the morning he drew into the field, in purpose to giue them open battell.

But before he arrated his battels, he called his nobles and capteins together, desiring them to consider how they should match in fight against people blinded with vile auarice, lining on the spoile and pilage

lage got by theuerie, and not by anie iust warres: enemies not onelie to the christian faith, but also to all innocent people, whome they sought vniuallie to innade, without hauing occasion so to doe, saue onelie vpon an inlicitious meaning to liue by spoile of other mens goods, wherein they haue no maner of propriety. He willed them therefore to remember how they were come thus against those enemies in defense of their native countrie, appointed vndoubtedlie by God to reuenge the cruell iniuries done by the Danes against his name, and people that professed the same. They ought not then to measure force in number of souldiers, but rather in manhood and valiance of heart. Camus likewise exhorted his people, not vsing manie words, but yet pithie, desiring them to remember how it behoued them either to win immortall fame by victorie, either else to die with miserie in an vnconth land, by the hand of their most fierce and cruell enemies.

Herewith Malcolme imbattelling his people, brought them forth stronglie ranged in good order to encounter the Danes, which likewise approached towards him in good arrate of battell. His heart was filled the more with hope of victorie, for that he had tried sundrie times before the force of the enemies in diuers conflicts and encounters. For such is the nature of noble and valiant stomachs, the more experience they haue in honorable enterprises, the more are they kindled in desire to shew their powers in famous acts and worthie attempts. The armies herevpon on both sides, fiercelie rushing together, began a battell right cruell & terrible, continuing certeine houres with such bloudshed, that the riuer of Lochle ran with a purple hue downe into the Almaine seas. The fields also where they fought, though they were full of sand (as the nature of the soile giueth) yet were they made mossie by the abundance of blood spilled in the same. Spante there were so earnestlie bent to be reuenged on the enimie, that after they had their deaths wound, they would run themselves forward vpon their aduersaries weapon, till they might close with him, inforcing their bittermost powers to dispatch him also; so that diuers were seene to fall to the ground together fast grasping one another, and so immediatlie both of them to die withall: such burning hatred kindled their hearts, that thus were they wholie set on reuenge. At length yet the honor of the field remained with Malcolme.

Camus perceiving the discomforture to light on his side, with a small companie about him thought to haue escaped by flight vnto the next mounteins, but being pursued of his enemies, he was slaine by them yer he was got two miles from the place of the battell. The place where he was slaine, is named after him vnto this day, and called Camestone, where is an obeliske set vp in memorie of the thing, with his picture grauen therein, and likewise of those that slue him. The principall fear of Camus was one Keith, a yong gentleman of right hardie courage, whose seruice in the battell was verie notable, in recompense whereof he was rewarded by king Malcolme, with sundrie lands and faire possessions in Louthian. His familie (saith Hector Boetius) hath and doth continue in great honor amongst Scottishmen euen vnto this day, and is decozated with the office of the marshallship of Scotland, to the high renowne and fame thereof, amongst the chiefest peers of the realme.

An other companie of the Danes flieng from this ouerthrow were slaine at Abirlemon, not pass foure miles from Brechin, where is set vp a great stone or obeliske, grauen with certeine characters or letters, to aduertise them that passe that waies forth, of this slaughter of Danes there made by our worthie elders. The residue of the Danes that escaped with life from the field, hauing certeine Scottishmen to their guides corrupted with monie fled to their ships, declaring to their fellows that mishap had fortuned. King Malcolme after he obtained this famous victorie (as before is said) at Barre, he caused the spoile of the field to be diuided amongst his souldiers, according to the labors of armes; and then caused the dead bodies of the Danes to be buried in the place where the field had bene fought, and the bodies of the Scottishmen which were found dead were conueied vnto the places of christian buriall, and there buried with funerall obsequies in sundrie churches and churchyards. There are seene manie bones of the Danes in those places where they were buried, there lieng bare aboue ground euen vnto this day, the sands (as it often chanceth) being blown from them. The other Danes, which escaped to their ships, pulled by sailes to haue passed into Murray land vnto Dlauus, but remaining on the seas the space of foure daies together, tossed to and fro by contrarie winds, at length by a streinable east wind they were giuen vpon the coast of Buchquhan, and through want of conuenable harbor were in present danger to haue bene cast away. At length, after they had ridden at anchor in the fifth there, to their great displeasure a long space, and finding no prosperous winds to depart from the shore, for that their vittels began to faile them, they set fire hundred of their best and lustiest souldiers on land, to fetch in some botie or preie of cattell, therewith to relieue their hunger and famine. They that were thus sent forth, being perfectlie appointed with armour and weapon, ranged abroad till they had got together a great number of beasts, with the which drawing towards their ships, they were encountered by the way by Sparnachus the thane of Buchquhane accompanied with the power of that countrie, whose force when they saw how they were not well able to resist without some aduantage of place, they got them vp into an high crag, where, with tumbling downe stones vpon the Scottishmen as they mounted vp towards them, they caused them some what to faile; but at length through the earnest exhortation of Sparnachus, the Scots (as people inflamed with wood desire to be reuenged) mounted the hill in despight of their enemies, though diuers of them were slaine in that assault. Those which wan the height of the crag vpon the Danes, made such a cruell battell with them, that there was not one Dane that escaped their hands.

Danes slaine nere vnto Gemmer.

This conflict was fought nere vnto Gemmer a village or totone in Buchquhane, where, in memorie thereof, lie manie great bones of the Danes to be seene yet euen vnto these daies. It should appeare by the same bones, that men in former time were of more huge growth and stature, than they be at this present. The other Danes which were on ship board, vnderstanding what had hapened to their fellows (because they returned not againe to the ships) so sone as the wind came about for their purpose, hoised by sailes, and toke their course forthright towards Murray land. In the meane time king Sueno hearing of these ouerthrowes, which his people had in such sort receiued at the Scottishmens hands, as a prince of a right haughtie courage, not lightlie overcome with anie aduerser fortune, made preparation in all speedie wise to be reuenged, appointing his brother Canute, as then hauing the administration of Denmarke, to come from thence with a new fleet and armie against the Scots. It is said, that this Canute, according to order prescribed him by his brother Sueno, landed first in Buchquhane, and destroyed destroyed a great part of that countrie by fire and sword, in reuenge of the slaughter of his countrie-men the Danes, which had bene there made late-lie before.

King Mal-colme determination.

Malcolme soe kindled in wrath by these injuries, though through continuance of the wars his power was greatlie decayed, yet did he assemble an armie with all speed he could deuise, and marched with the same towards the Danes, in purpose to slaine them with often skirmishes and light encounters, but in no wise to leopord with them in anie pitcht field or generall battell, for feare least if he had the overthrow, he should not be able to furnish a new power for defense of his countrie, against the rage of the enimies. For the space therefore of fiftene daies together, there was often skirmishing betwixt the parties. The which terme being expired, the Scots beholding so huge murder of their countriemen and friends, with the spoile of the fields, and destruction of the towne and villages, burning and blasing on each side before their faces, they come to king Mal-colme, and desired him that he would grant them licence to fight with their enimies, protesting plainelie, that if he would not consent thereto, they would giue battell at their owne chosse.

mens request

cence to fight.

Malcolme perceiuing the earnest minds of his people to encounter their enimies in plaine field, and that he might no longer protact the time, he granted their petition, and therewith beseeching them to remember their honors and duties: incontinentlie the onset was giuen with great hatred and malice on either part, so that most egerlie continuing in fight a long time, they enforced themselves to rid each other out of life: so that all the nobles well nare on both sides were slaine, the name of victorie rather than the victorie it selfe remaining with the Scots, who were so feeble and faint with long fight & slaughter, that in the end of the battell they were not able to pursue those few of the Danes, which escaping with life fled faintlie out of the field. And so for that night, which followed the day of this bloodie battell, they lodged here and there in seuerall places, at aduenture as well as they might.

On the morrow after, when it was understood on both parties, what losse they had sustained, their minds were conuerted rather to peace than to renew battell, because they were not of power longer to mainteine it. Wherevpon by mediation of such as toke vpon them to treat a peace, the same was concluded with these articles. First, that the Danes should depart out of Spurrey land, Buchquhan, and all other the bounds of Scotland. That the warres should clearelie cease betwixt the Danes and Scotishmen, during the naturall liues of Sueno and Malcolme, or either of them. That neither of those two nations should aid or in anie wise support the others enimies. That the field where the last battell was fought, should be hallowed for christian buriall, within the which the Danes that were slaine in the same battell should be buried, and a church to be built there, and lands appointed for the maintenance of priests, to celebrate there according to the order of the christian religion, then vsed by both the people: for the Danes latelie before that season had also receiued the faith. This peace being ratified by the solemne othes of both the kings, Sueno and Mal-colme, Camte with his Danes resigning vp the possession of such holds and places as they held in Spurrey land, Buchquhan, or else where within anie part of the Scotish dominions, got him to his fleet, and departed with the same home into Denmarke.

Canute retur-

Denmarke.

King Malcolme hauing thus restored his countrie vnto full peace, thought nothing to god as to per-forme the articles of the agreement accorded betwixt him and the Danes, and therefore caused a church to be builded in the place appointed, dedicating the same in honor of saint Olauus patron of Denmarke and Norwaie, to signifie vnto such as came after, that sundrie nobles of the Danes late buried in that church. In memorie hereof, the lands that were giuen to the same church, are called euen yet vnto these daies Crowdan, which signifieth as much as if ye should say, The slaughter of Danes.

The church which was first builded there, chancing as often happeneth in those parties, to be ouercast with sands, an other was erected in place not farre off, hauing a more commodious site. Sundrie of the bones of them that were buried in this place, being left bare by reason that the sands were blowne alway besides them, Hector Boetius (the writer of the Sco-tish chronicle) beheld in the yere 1521, which seemed more like vnto giants bones, than to men of common stature (as he auoucheth) whereby it should ap-peare, that men in old time were of much greater stature and quantitie of bodie, than anie that are to be found in these our daies.

Malcolme being thus deliuered of his enimies the Danes, caused publike praiers generallie to be made throughout the realme, in rendering thanks to almightie God, that it had pleased him to deliuer his people from the troubles of warre. He toke order also, that churches should be repaired, which by the enimies in time of the warres had bene destroyed.
And further, he caused the administration of the lawes and wholesome ordinances of the realme to be vsed and put in practise, according to the due forme of the same, which manie yeres before could haue no place, by reason of the warres. He caused an assembly of all the estates of his realme to be called at Bertha castell, in those daies standing not farre from the place where the towne of Perth now standeth. In which convention were manie things enacted, both for the setting forth of Gods honor, and the weale of the realme, whereby Malcolme won much praise amongst his subjects, to the eternall memorie of his name.

After this, supposing it most honorable to aduance the blood of such as had serued well in the last warres, or had their fathers or other friends slaine in the same, he called a parlement at Scone, in the which, causing partition to be made of the realme, by diuiding it into baronies, he bestowed it amongst the nobles, according to the qualitie of euerie one his merits, reseruing in maner nothing to the maintenance of the crowne, common entries onelie excepted, with the mountaine wherein the marble chaire stood, and a few other possessions which he purposed to giue vnto churches and chapels. The nobles on the other part, to the end the king might haue sufficient wherewith to mainteine his roiall estate, granted vnto him and his successors for euer the custodie and wardship of their heires, if they chanced to die leaving them vnder the age of 21 yeres: and in the meane time till the same heires came to the said age, they agreed that the king and his successors should intoy the vse and profits of their lands, whether they were men or women, and when they came to the age of 21 yeres, that then they should enter into the possession of their lands, yielding vnto him or his successors one yeres rent in name of a reliefe; and if they chanced not to be married before their fathers deceasse, then also should they marrie at the kings appointment, or else compound with him for the same.

Thus ended the parlement for that season, with great ioy and comfort on each hand, for that the king had shewed such liberall bountifullness towards his barons, and they no lesse mindfull of their duties had declared such benevolent hearts, as appeared in that their free and large gift granted in forme and maner as before is exprested. Neither did Malcolme forget the vow which he made at Spurthlake, when he was in danger to haue receiued the ouerthrow at the hand of the Danes. For according to the same vow, he caused a church to be built in the same place, erecting a bishops see there, and indowed it with the lands & possessions of these three places, Spurthlake, Cleoneith, and Dummeth, with all ecclesiasticall iurisdiccions and tithes appertaining thereto. The bishops that sat in this see were called the bishops of Spurthlake, till the daies of king David the first, who changing the name, caused them to be called the bishops of Abirden, augmenting the see with sundrie faire revenues to the better maintenance thereof.

Malcolme thus hauing purchased rest from farther troubles of warre, gouerned the realme a certeine time after in good order of iustice, and caused a booke to be set forth, called Regia maiestas, containing the lawes and ordinances wherby the realme should be gouerned: and assigning forth in the same what fees also should be giuen vnto the chancelor, secreta-rie, constable, marshall, chamberleine, iustice, treasurer, register, comptroller, and other the officers of his house. Such princelie dotings and noble vertues were found in this Malcolme for a season, that if the same had continued with him in his latter age, there had neuer reigned anie king in Scotland, that might haue bene thought to haue passed him in worthie fame: neuertheless his excellent qualities were stained at length by that reprochfull vice of vile auarice. For as it oftentimes happeneth, conetousnesse and age laid hold on him both at once. He then began to repent in that he had bene so liberall in giuing away his lands to his barons; & to recouer the same againe, he surmized feigned matter by vntrue suggestions against diuerse of the chiefest nobles, putting some to death, & banishing other, that he might by this meanes inioy their lands and goods as confiscate to the crowne for their supposed offences.

The nobles hauing great indignation at such cruelty vsed by the king against them and their linage, and that vpon no iust causes, but onelie vpon forged deuises, they conspired in sundrie meetings secretly appointed amongst them, to find some meanes to dispatch him out of life. At length he chanced to haue some inkling whereabout they went, & doubting to fall into their hands, fled for safegard of his life vnto Glamis, where diuerse of the conspirators were brought into his lodging, by some of his owne household seruants, and there slue him in reuenge of their friends, whome he before had wrongfullie put to death. These murderers with their complices incontinentlie fled with all speed possible to auoid further danger for this their act: but missing their way (for the ground was quite couered as then with snow) they finallie came to the loch of Forfar, which was the same time frozen ouer. They therefore thinking to passe ouer it, when they came into the midst, the ice brake vnder them, so that sinking in, they were finallie drowned. Howbeit their bodie were afterwards drawne forth of the loch with drags, and dismembred, and their heads and quarters were sent to diuerse towne of the realme, and there hong vp for a signification of their wicked treason. This was the end of king Malcolme in the 32 yeere of his reigne, if ye reckon from the death of Constantine, or 25 after the death of Grime, and after the incarnation of our Sautour 1034 yeeres. He was buried in Colmekill with his ancestors.

In this season was seene manie wonders and strange sights in Albion. On Christmas daie there was an earthquake, and a great rift of the earth made therewith in the midst of Strineling towne, out of the which issued such an abundant streame of water, that it bare away the next wood that was adjoining to the riuer of Forth. In the summer the sea rose higher, & flowed further into the land, than euer it had bene seene at anie other time. On Midsummer daie, which is the feast of saint John Baptist, there was such a vehement frost, that the corne and other fruits of the earth were blasted and killed, so that thereupon folloved a great dearth in all the countrie.

After Malcolme succeeded his nephew Duncane the sonne of his daughter Beatrice: for Malcolme had two daughters, the one which was this Beatrice, being giuen in marriage vnto one Abbanath Crinen, a man of great nobilitie, and thane of the Isles and west parts of Scotland, bare of that marriage the foresaid Duncane; the other called Wodada, was married vnto Sinell the thane of Glamis, by whom she had issue one Hakbeth a valiant gentleman, and one that if he had not bene somewhat cruell of nature, might haue bene thought most worthie the gouernement of a realme. On the other part, Duncane was so soft and gentle of nature, that the people wished the inclinations and maners of these two cousins to haue bene so tempered and interchangeable bestowed betwixt them, that where the one had too much of clemencie, and the other of crueltie, the meane vertue betwixt these two extremities might haue reigned by indifferent partition in them both, so should Duncane haue proued a worthie king, and Hakbeth an excellent capteine. The beginning of Duncans reigne was verie quiet and peaceable, without anie notable trouble; but after it was perceiued how negligent he was in punishing offenders, manie misruled persons took occasion thereof to trouble the peace and quiet state of the common-wealth, by seditious commotions which first had their beginnings in this wise.

Wanguho the thane of Lochquhaber, of whom the house of the Stewards is descended, the which by order of linage hath now for a long time inioied the crowne of Scotland, euen till these our daies, as he gathered the finances due to the king, and further punished somewhat sharpelie such as were notorious offenders, being assailed by a number of rebels inhabiting in that countrie, and spoiled of the monie and all other things, had much ado to get awaie with life, after he had receiued sundrie grievous wounds amongst them. Yet escaping their hands, after he was somewhat recouered of his hurts, and was able to ride, he repaired to the court, where making his complaint to the king in most earnest wise, he purchased at length that the offenders were sent for by a sergeant at armes, to appeare to make answer vnto such matters as should be laid to their charge: but they augmenting their mischievous act with a more wicked deed, after they had mistised the messenger with sundrie kinds of reproches, they finallie slue him also.

They doubting not but for such contemptuous demeanour against the kings regall authoritie, they should be inuaded with all the power the king could make, Hakdovald one of great estimation amongst them, making first a confederacie with his nearest friends and kinsmen, took vpon him to be chiefe capteine of all such rebels as would stand against the king, in maintenance of their grievous offences lately committed against him. Manie slanderous words also, and railing taunts this Hakdovald uttered against his prince, calling him a faint-hearted milkesop, more meet to gouerne a sort of idle monks in some cloister, than to haue the rule of such valiant and hardie men of warre as the Scots were. used also such subtil persuasions and forged allu-ments, that in a small time he had gotten together a mightie power of men: for out of the wessterne Isles there came vnto him a great multitude of people, of-Spakdowald thus hauing a mightie puissance about him, incountered with such of the kings people as were sent against him into Lochquhaber, and discomfiting them, by mere force took their captaine spalcoline, and after the end of the battell smote off his head. This ouerthrow being notified to the king, did put him in wonderfull feare, by reason of his small skill in warlike affaires. Calling therefore his nobles to a counsell, he asked of them their best ad-uise for the subduing of Spakdowald & other the rebels. Here, in sundrie heads (as euer it happeneth) were sundrie opinions, which they differed according to euery man his skill. At length Spakbeth speaking much against the kings softnes, and ouermuch slacknesse in punishing offenders, whereby they had such time to assemble together, he promised notwithstanding, if the charge were committed vnto him and vnto Banquo, so to order the matter, that the rebels should be shortly vanquished & quite put downe, and that not so much as one of them should be found to make resistance within the countrie.

And euen so it came to passe: for being sent forth with a new power, at his entering into Lochquha-ber, the fame of his coming put the enemies in such feare, that a great number of them stole secretly awaie from their captaine Spakdowald, who ne-uertheless enforced thereto, gaue battell vnto Spakbeth, with the residue which remained with him: but being overcome, and fleeing for refuge into a castell (within the which his wife & children were inclosed) at length when he saw how he could neither defend the hold any longer against his enemies, nor yet vpon surrender be suffered to depart with life saved, he first slue his wife and children, and lastlie himselfe, least if he had yielded simple, he should haue bene executed in most cruell wise for an example to other.
Spakbeth entering into the castell by the gates, as then set open, found the carcasle of Spakdowald li-eng dead there amongst the residue of the slaine bodies, which when he beheld, remitting no pece of his cruell nature with that pittifull sight, he caused the head to be cut off, and set vpon a poles end, and so sent it as a present to the king, who as then late at Bertha. The headlesse trunk he commanded to bee hiong vp vpon an high paire of gallowes.

Them of the wessterne Isles suing for pardon, in that they had aided Spakdowald in his traitorous enterprize, he fined at great sums of monie: and those whome he took in Lochquhaber, being come thither to beare armes against the king, he put to execution.
Vpon the Ilandmen conceiued a deadie grudge towards him, calling him a couenant-breaker, a bloudie tyrant, & a cruell murderer of them whome the kings mercie had pardoned. With which reprochfull words Spakbeth being kindled in wrathfull ire against them, had passed ouer with an armie into the Isles, to haue taken reuenge vpon them for their liberall talke, had he not bene otherwise perswaded by some of his friends, and partly pacified by gifts presented vnto him on the behalfe of the Ilandmen, seeking to auoid his displeasure. Thus was iustice and law restored againe to the old accustomed course, by the diligent means of Spakbeth. Immediatlie there-vpon word came that Sueno king of Norway was arrived in Fife with a puissant armie, to subdue the whole realme of Scotland.

But here to the intent it maie be the better perceined, what this Sueno was, I will somwhat touch from whence he descended. That Sueno, who (as ye haue heard) conquered the realme of England, being also king of Denmarke and Norway, had three sonnes, Harold, Sueno, and Canute; the first he made king of England, the second king of Norway, and the third king of Denmarke. Harold inioined not the same dominion of England past three yeeres after his fathers deceasse, but he slaine by Etheldred or Egeldred, whom his father Sueno had chased into Normandie. But the same Etheldred kept not long the kingdome in peace, for Canute king of Denmarke, to reuenge his brothers death, landed in England with a mightie host, and sleaing Etheldred, recovered the kingdome to the use of the Danes: but yet one Edmund sonne to the foresaid Etheldred, surnamed Ironside, mainteined the warre against Canute for a season, till at length by both their consents they agreed to fight a combat singularlie man to man, so to trie the matter betwixt them, who should reigne as king ouer the Englishmen.

In this fight when they had continued a long space, and shewed right notable proofes of their manhood: Edmund (saith Canute) sith it hath pleased al-mightie God, that thou shouldst thus trie the force of my hand without hurt or wound, I thinke it bee likewise his pleasure, that thou shouldst inioy part of the realme: go to therefore, I receiue thee as partener with me in the kingdome, so that (if thou be contented let vs diuide the kingdome betwixt vs without any more contention. Edmund gladly accepted this condition of agreement, supposing it better to haue halfe the kingdome, than to stand to the doubt-full trial of losing the whole: for he had receiued a wound at Canutes hands, though Canute vnder-stood not so much: againe, he foresaw that occasion hereafter might be offered, whereby he might without all trouble come to inioy the whole. Wherevpon either of them leapt beside their worried horses in that fierce & earnest fight, & embracing each other became good friends, in diuiding the realme according to the aboue mentioned motion of Canute. That part of England that lieth ouer against France was assigned vnto Canute; and the other, that is, the north parts vnto Edmund. In the meane time Emma the wife of Etheldred, with hir two sonnes (which she had by the same Etheldred) Alured and Edward, fled ouer into Normandie, doubting least this concord betwixt Canute and Edmund should turne smallie

But now touching the arrivall of Sueno the Norwegian king in Fife (as before is exprest) ye shall vnderstand, that the presentie of his coming was to reuenge the slaughter of his vnkle Canus, and other of the Danish nation slaine at Warre, Crowdane, and Gemmer. The crueltie of this Sue-no was such, that he neither spared man, woman, nor child, of what age, condition or degree: sooner they were. Whereof when B. Duncane was certified, he set all slouthfull and lingering delays apart, and began to assemble an armie in most speedie wise, like a berie valiant captaine: for oftentimes it happeneth, that a dull coward and slouthfull person, constrained by necessitie, becommeth verie hardie and actiue.
Therefore when his whole power was come together, he diuided the same into three battels. The first was led by Spakbeth, the second by Banquo, & the king himselfe gouerned in the maine battell or middle ward, wherein were appointed to attend and wait vpon his person the most part of all the residue of the came into Culros, where encountering with the en-mies, after a foie and cruell foughten battell, Sueno remained victorious, and Malcolme with his Scots discomfited. Whobett the Danes were so broken by this battell, that they were not able to make long chase on their enemies, but kept themselves all night in order of battell, for doubt least the Scots assembling together againe, might haue set vpon them at some aduantage. On the morrow, when the fields were discovered, and that it was perceiued how no enemies were to be found abroad, they gathered the spoile, which they diuided amongst them, according to the law of armes. Then was it ordeined by commandement of Sueno, that no souldier should hurt either man, woman, or child, except such as were found with weapon in hand ready to make resistance, for he hoped now to conquer the realme without further bloodshed.

But when knowledge was giuen how Duncane was fled to the castell of Bertha, and that Malcolme was gathering a new power to withstand the incursions of the Danes, Sueno raised his tents, & com-ming to the said castell, laid a strong siege round about it. Duncane seeing himselfe thus environed by his enemies, sent a secret message by counsell of Banquo to Malcolme, commanding him to abide at Inchcuthill, till he heard from him some other newes. In the meane time Duncane fell in fained communication with Sueno, as though he would haue yielded by the castell into his hands, under cer-teine conditions, and this did he to drue time, and to put his enemies out of all suspicion of anie enterprise ment against them, till all things were brought to passe that might serue for the purpose. At length, when they were fallen at a point for rendring vp the hold, Duncane offered to send forth of the castell into the campe great prouision of vittells to refresh the armie, which offer was glablie accepted of the Danes, for that they had bene in great penurie of sustenance manie daies before.

The Scots hereupon took the iuice of mekilwort berries, and mixed the same in their ale and bread, sending it thus spiced & confectioned, in great abundance vnto their enemies. They reioising that they had got meate and drinke sufficient to satisfie their bellies, fell to eating and drinking after such greedie wise, that it seemed they stroue who might deuoure and swallow by most, till the operation of the berries spread in such sort through all the parts of their bodies, that they were in the end brought into a fast dead sleepe, that in manner it was impossible to awake them. Then forthwith Duncane sent vnto Malcolme, commanding him with all diligence to come and set vpon the enemies, being in easie point to be ouercome. Malcolme making no delay, came with his people to the place, where his enemies were lodged, and first killing the watch, afterwards entered the campe, and made such slaughter on all sides without anie resistance, that it was a wonderfull matter to behold, for the Danes were so heauie of sleepe, that the most part of them were slaine and neuer stirred: other that were awakened either by the noise or other waies forth, were so amazed and dis-headed vpon their waking, that they were not able to make anie defense: so that of the whole number there escaped no more but onelie Sueno himselfe and ten other persons, by whose helpe he got to his ships lieng at rode in the mouth of Taie.

The most part of the mariners, when they heard that plentie of meate and drinke the Scots had sent vnto the campe, came from the sea thither to be partakers thereof, and so were slaine amongst their fellowes: by meanes whereof when Sueno perceiued how through lacke of mariners he should not be able to conuie alwaie his nauie, he furnished one ship thoroughlie with such as were left, and in the same sailed backe into Forwaie, cursing the time that he set forthward on this unfortunate iourne. The other ships which he left behind him, within three daies after his departure from thence, were tossed so together by violence of an east wind, that beating and rushing one against another, they sunk there, and lie in the same place euen vnto these daies, to the great danger of other such ships as come on that coast: for being couered with the floud when the tide commeth, at the ebbing againe of the same, some part of them appeere aboue water.

The place where the Danish vessels were thus lost, is yet called Dronelows lands. This ouerthrow re-ceiued in manner afore said by Sueno, was verie displeasing to him and his people, as should appeere, in that it was a custome manie yeeres after, that no knights were made in Forwaie, except they were first sware to reuenge the slaughter of their coun-triemen and friends thus slaine in Scotland. The Scots hauing wone so notable a victorie, after they had gathered & diuided the spoile of the field, caused solemne processions to be made in all places of the realme, and thanks to be giuen to almightie God, that had sent them so faire a day ouer their enemies.
But whilest the people were thus at their processions, word was brought that a new fleet of Danes was arrived at Kingorne, sent thither by Canute king of England, in reuenge of his brother Sueno ouerthrow. To resist these enemies, which were alreadie landed, and busie in spoiling the countrey, Malcolme and Banquo were sent with the kings au-thoritie, who hauing with them a conuenient power, incountred the enemies, due part of them, and chased the other to their ships. They that escaped and got once to their ships, obtained of Malcolme for a great summe of gold, that such of their friends as were slaine at this last bickering, might be buried in saint Colmes Inch. In memorie whereof, manie old se-pultures are yet in the said Inch, there to be seene grauen with the armes of the Danes, as the manner of burieng noble men still is; and heretofore hath bene used.

A peace was also concluded at the same time betwixt the Danes and Scottishmen, ratified (as some haue written) in this wise: That from thenceforth the Danes should neuer come into Scotland to make anie warres against the Scots by anie maner of meanes. And these were the warres that Dun-cane had with foreign enemies, in the seventh yeere of his reigne. Shortly after happened a strange and vncouth wonder, which afterward was the cause of much trouble in the realme of Scotland, as ye shall after heare. It fortuned as Malcolme and Banquo iourned towards Forres, where the king then laie, they went sporting by the waie together without other companie, saue onelie themselves, passing through the woods and fields, when suddenlie in the middest of a laund, there met them three women in strange and wild apparell, resembling creatures of elder world, whome when they attentiuely beheld, wondering much at the sight, the first of them spake and said; All hail Malcolme, thane of Clammis (for he had lately entered into that dignitie and office by the death of his father Sinell.) The second of them said; Hail Malcolme thane of Caluder. But the third said; All hail Malcolme that hereafter shalt be king of Scotland.

Then Banquo; What manner of women (saith he) are you, that seeme so little fauourable vnto me, whereas to my fellow here, besides high offices, ye assigne also the kingdome, appointing forth nothing for me at all? Yes (saith the first of them) we pro“ mife greater benefits vnto the, than vnto him, for he “ shall reigne in deed, but with an vnluckie end: nei“ ther shall he leaue anie issue behind him to succed in “ his place, where contrarie thou in deed shalt not “ reigne at all, but of the those shall be bozne which “ shall gouerne the Scotch kingdome by long order “ of continuall descent. Herewith the foresaid women vanished immediatlie out of their sight. This was reputed at the first but some vaine fantasticall illusion by Macbeth and Banquo, in somuch that Ban-quo would call Macbeth in iest, king of Scotland; and Macbeth againe would call him in sport likewise, the father of manie kings. But afterwards the common opinion was, that these women were either the weird sisters, that is (as ye would say) the goddesses of destinie, or else some nymphs or seicres, indued with knowledge of prophesie by their necro-manticall science, because euerie thing came to passe as they had spoken. For shortly after, the thane of Cawdor being condemned at Forres of treason against the king committed; his lands, linings, and offices were giuen of the kings liberalitie to Macbeth.

The same night after, at supper, Banquo iested with him and said; How Macbeth thou hast obtained those things which the two former sisters prophesied, there remaineth onelie for thee to purchase that which the third said should come to passe. Wherevpon Macbeth reuoluing the thing in his mind, began euen then to denie how he might attaine to the kingdome: but yet he thought with himselfe that he must farie a time, which should aduance him thereto (by the diuine prouidence) as it had come to passe in his former preferment. But shortly after it chanced that king Duncane, hauing two sonnes by his wife which was the daughter of Siward earle of Northumberland, he made the elder of them called Malcolme prince of Cumberland, as it were thereby to appoint him his successor in the kingdome, im-mediatlie after his deceasse. Macbeth soze troubled herewith, for that he saw by this means his hope soze hindered (where, by the old lawes of the realme, the ordinance was, that if he that should succed were not of able age to take the charge vpon himselfe, he that was next of bloud vnto him should be admitted) he began to take counsell how he might vsurpe the kingdome by force, hauing a iust quarell so to doo (as he tooke the matter) for that Duncane did what in him lay to defraud him of all manner of title and claime, which he might in time to come, pretend vnto the crowne.

The wordes of the three weird sisters also (of whom before ye haue heard) greatlie encouraged him here-vnto, but speciallie his wife lay soze vpon him to attempt the thing, as she that was verie ambitious, burning in vnquenchable desire to beare the name of a queene. At length therefore, communicating his purposed intent with his trustie friends, amongst whome Banquo was the chiefe, vpon confidence of their promised aid; he slew the king at Cnuerns, or (as some say) at Botgossuane, in the first yeare of his reigne. Then hauing a companie about him of such as he had made priue to his enterprise, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed king, and forthwith went vnto Scone, where (by common consent) he receiued the inuesture of the kingdome according to the accustomed manner. The bodie of Duncane was first conueied vnto Elgine, & there buried in king-lie wife; but afterwards it was remoued and conueied vnto Colmekill, and there laid in a sepulture amongst his predecessors, in the yeare after the birth of our Sautour, 1046.

Malcolme Cammore and Donald Bane the sons of king Duncane, for feare of their liues (which they might well know that Macbeth would seeke to bring to end for his more sure confirmation in the estate) fled into Cumberland, where Malcolme remained, till time that saint Edward the sonne of Ethelred recouered the dominion of England from the Danish power, the which Edward receiued Mal-colme by way of most friendlie entertainement: but Donald passed ouer into Ireland, where he was ten-derlie cherished by the king of that land. Macbeth, after the departure thus of Duncanes sonnes, bled great liberalitie towards the nobles of the realme, thereby to win their fauour, and when he saw that no man went about to trouble him, he set his whole intention to mainteine iustice, and to punish all en-ormities and abuses, which had chanced through the feble and slouthfull administration of Duncane.

And to bring his purpose the better to passe without anie trouble or great businesse, he deuised a subtil uile to bring all offenders and misdoers vnto iustice, soliciting sundrie of his liege people with high rewards, to challenge and appeale such as most oppressed the commons, to come at a day and place appointed, to fight singular combats within barriers, in triall of their accusations. When these shauens, barretors, and other oppressors of the innocent people were come to darren battell in this wise (as is said) they were streight waies apprehended by armed men, and trussed vp in halters on gibbets, according as they had iustlie deserued. The residue of misdoers that were left, were punished and tamed in such sort, that manie yeares after all these and reifings were little heard of, the people inioyng the blissefull benefit of good peace and tranquillitie.
Macbeth shewing himselfe thus a most diligent punisher of all iniuries and wrongs attempted by anie disordered persons within his realme, was accounted the sure defense and buckler of innocent people; and hereto he also applied his whole indowto cause young men to exercise themselves in vertuous manners, and men of the church to attend their diuine seruice according to their vocations.

He caused to be slaine sundrie thanes, as of Cashnes, Sutherland, Stranauerne, and Ross, because through them and their seditious attempts, much trouble daily rose in the realme. He appeased the troublesome state of Galloway, and slue one Makgill a tyrant, who had manie yeares before passed nothing of the regall authoritie or potuer. To be briefe, such were the iustic doings and princelie acts of this Macbeth in the administration of the realme, that if he had attained thereto by rightfull means, and continued in vprightnesse of iustice as he began, till the end of his reigne, he might well haue bene numbered amongst the most noble princes that anie where had reigned. He made manie hole some lawes and suffered him to get his with child; which being once understood, his father the prince conceived such hateful displeasure towards Fleance, that he finally slew him, & held his daughter in most vile estate of servitude, for that she had consented to be on this wise deflowered by a stranger. At the last yet, she was delivered of a sonne named Walter, who within few yeares grew a man of greater courage and valiance, than any other had commonlie bene found, although he had no better bringing up than (by his grandfathers appointment) among the baser sort of people. Howbeit he the while euer even from his infancy, that there reigned in him a certaine stoutnesse of stomach, ready to attempt high enterprises.

It chanced that falling out with one of his companions, after manie taunting words which passed betwixt them, the other to his reproach obiected that he was a bastard, and begotten in unlawfull bed; where- with being fore kindled, in his raging furie he ran vpon him and slew him out of hand. Then was he glad to flee out of Wales, and comming into Scotland to seeke some friendship there, he happened into the companie of such Englishmen, as were come thither with queene Margarete, and behaued himselfe so soberlie in all his demeanours, that within a while he was highly esteemed amongst them. Not long after by such means attaining to the degree of high reputation, he was sent with a great power of men into the westerne Isles, into Galloway, & other parts of the realme, to deliuer the same from the tyrannie and inuiours oppression there exercised by diuers misgouerned persons; which enterprise according to his commission he achieved, with such prudent policie and manhood, that immediately vpon his returne to the court, he was made lord steward of Scotland, with assignement to receiue the kings rents and duties out of the parts of the realme.

This Walter Steward had a sonne named Alane Steward, who went after with Godfreie of Bullogne duke of Lozaine, & Robert duke of Normandie sonne to king William the bastard that conquered England, into the holie land, at what time they with other westerne princes made the great iourne thither, in the yeare 1099. Alane had issue Alexander Steward, that founded the abbey of Pasleie of saint Benedicts order. Walter Steward, whose valiance was well notified at the battell of Largs, as hereafter shall be shewed, was the sonne of the said Alexander. The same Walter had issue two sons, the one named Alexander, fought right ballantlie in defense of his father at the foresaid battell; and the other named Robert Steward got the lands of Terbolwtoun, and married the heire of Cruikeshoune, from whom descended the earles of Leuenor and Dornie. Moreover, the aboue mentioned Alexander Steward that founded Pasleie, had diuerse mo sonnes, as John and James, with sundrie other. Howbeit they tooke new surnames by the name of those lands, vnto the which they succeeded. The afore rected John Steward, after the death of his brother James, married the heire of Bonhill a virgine of great beautie, and had by his Walter Steward that inherited the lands of Bonhill, Kanfrew, Kothelsaie, Bute, and Steuatoone, after that his father the forenamed John was slaine at Falkirke.

He married Margerie Bruce daughter to king Robert Bruce, by whome he had issue king Robert the second of that name. This Robert the second tooke to wife one Isabel Pure, a damsell of right excellent beautie, she was daughter to sir Adam Pure knight, and brought forth issue, three sonnes and three daughters. The eldest sonne hight John Steward otherwife named Robert, who succeeded in mediatlie after his fathers decesse in gouernance of the crowne. The second called Robert was made earle of Fife and Menteith, also he was created duke of Albanie, and ruled the realme of Scotland vnder the name of gouerneur, for the space of fiftene yeares. The third sonne named Alexander was earle of Buchquhane and lord of Baudrynot. The eldest daughter was married to James that was the sonne and heire of William earle of Dowglas. The second daughter was married to John Dunbar, brother to George of Dunbar earle of March, and was made to the advancement of his further fame earle of Murray. He begot on his one onelie daughter, that was married to the Dowglas, and so Dowglas came to the earldome of Murray. The third daughter was married vnto John Lioun, that was after made lord of Glamis.

Moreover, the foresaid Robert that was the first of the Stewards which ware the crowne in Scotland, married Eufame daughter to the earle of Ross, and got on his two sonnes, Walter earle of Atholl, and David earle of Strathern. This Walter solicited Robert duke of Albanie, to slea David Steward duke of Rothsaie. And after that James the first was returned home forth of England, he did what he could to moue him to slea all the linage of the said duke still being in hope after the dispatch of his kinsmen to come to the crowne himselfe, which hope moued him to procure his nephue Robert Steward, and Robert Graham his daughters son, to slea king James the first also, for the which crime the same Walter was after consulted and destroyed with all his sonnes. His brother David earle of Buchquhane died without issue, and so the lands of both these brethren returned againe to the crowne, without any memorie of their blood. Of Robert Steward duke of Albanie, came duke Murdo, who married the earle of Lennox daughter, and got on his three sonnes, Walter, Alexander, and James.

Duke Murdo himselfe with his two first sonnes were slaine at Strueling by king James the first, & the third brother James in reuenge thereof burnt Dunbertane, and was after chased into Ireland, where he decessed without issue. Robert the third of that name married Annabill Drommond, daughter to sir John Drommond of Strobhall knight, and got on his David and James. The first died in Falkland, and the other attained the crowne, and was called James the first, and married the ladie Jane daughter to John Beauford erle of Summerset in England. He had by his two sonnes bozne at one birth, Alexander and James. The first died young, the second attained the crowne, named James the second. James the first had also six daughters, of the which the eldest was giuen in marriage to the Dolphin of France, the second to the duke of Britaine, the third to the lord of Feir, the fourth to the lord of Dalkeith, the fift to the earle of Huntley, and the sixt had no succession. James the second married Margarete daughter to the duke of Gelderland, and begot on his three sonnes, and two daughters.

The first succeeded him in the kingdome, and was called James the third: the second named Alexander was duke of Albanie, and married first the earle of Menteiths daughter, and got on his Alexander, that was afterward bishop of Murray, and then parting with his went into France, where he married the countesse of Bullogne, and begot on his John Steward duke of Albanie, that was gouerneur of Scotland manie yeares in the minority of James the fift. The third sonne, John Steward was earle of Mar, whose chance was to be slaine in the Cannogat in a battell. The first daughter of James the second, was married to the lord Boid, who begot on hir a sonne that was slaine by the lord Spungumrie, and a daughter that was married to the earle of Calsels. After the death of the lord Bold, the husband of this first daughter of James the second, she was effronces married to the lord Hamilton, and by that means was the house of the Hamiltons honored with the kings blood. The other sister was married to the lord Creighton, of whom came small succession worthy to be mentioned. James the third married Margaret daughter to the king of Denmarke. Of the which marriage was borne James the fourth, Alexander that was bishop of saint Andrews & duke of Albanie, and John Stewart earle of Spar, but these two died without issue.

James the fourth married Margaret daughter to king Henrie the seventh of England, and begot on hir James the fift, who marieing first the ladie Spag-dalen daughter to Francis the French king, had no issue by hir, for that she died in the yere next after hir comming into Scotland, and then shortly after the said James the fift married the ladie Marie de Loreine, duchesse of Louuile, a widow, and by hir had he issue Marie quene of Scotland, that toke to husband Henrie Stewart lord Dornlie, by whome she had issue Charles James, now king of Scotland. But to returne unto Spakbeth, in continuing the historie, and to begin where I left, ye shall understand that after the contrived slaughter of Banquo, nothing prospered with the foresaid Spakbeth: for in manner euerie man began to doubt his owne life, and durst benneth appeare in the kings presence; and euen as there were manie that stood in feare of him, so likewise stood he in feare of manie, in such sort that he began to make those awaie by one surmized canillation or other, whome he thought most able to worke him anie displeasure.

At length he found such swaetnesse by putting his nobles thus to death, that his earnest thirst after blood in this behalfe might in no wise be satisfied: for ye must consider he was double profit (as hee thought) hereby: for first they were rid out of the way whome he feared, and then againe his coffers were enriched by their goods which were forfeited to his use, whereby he might better mainteine a gard of armed men about him to defend his person from iniurie of them whom he had in anie suspicion. Further, to the end he might the more cruellie oppresse his subiects with all tyrantlike wrongs, he builded a strong castell on the top of an hie hill called Dunsmene, situate in Gowrie, ten miles from Perth, on such a proud height, that standing there aloft, a man might behold well nere all the countries of Angus, Fife, Stremont, and Ornedale, as it were lying vnderneath him. This castell then being founded on the top of that high hill, put the realme to great charges before it was finished, for all the stufte necessarie to the building, could not be brought vp without much toile and businesse. But Spakbeth being once determined to haue the worke go forward, caused the thanes of each shire within the realme, to come and helpe towarde that building, each man his course about.

At the last, when the turne fell unto Spakduffe thane of Fife to build his part, he sent workemen with all needfull promise, and commanded them to shew such diligence in euerie behalfe, that no occasion might bee giuen for the king to find fault with him, in that he came not himselfe as other had done, which he refused to do, for doubt least the king bearing him (as he partly understood) no great good will, would laie violent hands vpon him, as he had done vpon diuerse other. Shortly after, Spakbeth comming to behold how the worke went forward, and because he found not Spakduffe there, he was soe offended, and said; I perceiue this man will neuer obeye my commandements, till he be ridden with a snaffle: but I shall prouide well inough for him. Neither could he afterwards abide to looke vpon the said Spakduffe, either for that he thought his puissance over great; either else for that he had learned of certaine wizzards, in whose words he put great confidence (for that the prophesie had happened so right, which the three faries or weired sisters had declared unto him) how that he ought to take heed of Spakduffe, who in time to come should seeke to destroy him.

And suerlie herevpon had he put Spakduffe to death, but that a certaine witch, whome hee had in great trust, had told that he should neuer be slaine with man borne of anie woman, nor banquished till the wood of Bernane came to the castell of Dunsmene. By this prophesie Spakbeth put all feare out of his heart, supposing he might do what he would, without anie feare to be punished for the same; for by the one prophesie he beleued it was impossible for anie man to banquish him, and by the other impossible to slea him. This vaine hope caused him to do manie outrageous things, to the greivous oppression of his subiects. At length Spakduffe, to avoid perill of life, purposed with himselfe to passe into England, to procure Spalcolme Cammoye to claime the crowne of Scotland. But this was not so secretlie deuised by Spakduffe, but that Spakbeth had knowledge giuen him thereof: for kings (as is said) haue tharpe sight like unto an eye, and long ears like unto spiders. For Spakbeth had in euerie noble mans house, one lie fellow or other in fee with him, to reueale all that was said or done within the same, by which sight he oppressed the most part of the nobles of his realme.

Immediatlie then, being aduertised whereabout Spakduffe went, he came hastily with a great power into Fife, and forthwith besieged the castell where Spakduffe dwelled; trusting to haue found him therein. They that kept the house, without anie resistance opened the gates, and suffered him to enter, mistrusting none euill. But neuertheless Spakbeth most cruellie caused the wife and children of Spakduffe, with all other whom he found in that castell, to be slaine. Also he confiscated the goods of Spakduffe, proclaimed him traitor, and confined him out of all the parts of his realme; but Spakduffe was already escaped out of danger, and gotten into England vnto Spalcolme Cammoye, to trie what purchase hee might make by means of his support, to reuenge the slaughter so cruellie executed on his wife, his children, and other friends. At his comming vnto Spalcolme, he declared into what great miserie the estate of Scotland was brought, by the detestable cruelties exercised by the tyrant Spakbeth, hauing committed manie horrible slaughters and murders, both as well of the nobles as commons, for the which he was hated right mortallie of all his liege people, desiring nothing more than to be deliuered of that intollerable and most heauie yoke of thraldome, which they sustained at such a castifes hands.

Spalcolme hearing Spakduffes words, which he vttered in verie lamentable sort, for more compassion and verie ruth that pearced his sorrowfull hart, bewailing the miserable state of his countrie, he fetched a deepe sigh; which Spakduffe perceiuing, began to fall most earnestlie in hand with him, to enterprise the deliuering of the Scottish people out of the hands of so cruell and bloudie a tyrant, as Spakbeth by too manie plaine experiments did shew himselfe to be: which was an easie matter for him to bring to passe, considering not onelie the good title he had, but also the earnest desire of the people to haue some oc-caution ministered, whereby they might be reuenged of those notable injuries, which they daily sustained by the outrageous crueltie of Makhbeths misgouernance. Though Malcolme was verie sorrowfull for the oppression of his countrymen the Scots, in manner as Makhduffe had declared; yet doubting whether he were come as one that ment vnfainedlie as he spake, or else as sent from Makhbeth to betray him, he thought to haue some further triall, and thereby on dissembling his mind at the first, he answered as followeth.

Malcolme
Canmore his answer.

I am trulie verie sozie for the miserie chanced to my countrie of Scotland, but though I haue neuer so great affection to relieue the same, yet by reason of certaine incurable vices, which reigne in me, I am nothing meet thereto. First, such immoderate lust and voluptuous sensualitie (the abhominable founteine of all vices) followeth me, that if I were made king of Scots, I should seeke to desloue your maids and matrones, in such wise that mine intemperancie should be more importable vnto you, than the bloudie tyrannie of Makhbeth now is. Wherevnto Makhduffe answered: This suerlie is a verie euill fault, for manie noble princes and kings haue lost both liues and kingdomes for the same; neuertheless there are women enow in Scotland, and therefore follow my counsell. Make thy selfe king, and I shall conueie the matter so wisely, that thou shalt be so satisfied at thy pleasure in such secret wise, that no man shall be aware thereof.

Makhduffe
answer.

Then said Malcolme, I am also the most auaritious creature on the earth, so that if I were king, I should seeke so manie waies to get lands and goods, that I would sea the most part of all the nobles of Scotland by surmized accusations, to the end I might inioy their lands, goods, and possessions; and therefore to shew you what mischief may issue on you through mine insatiable conetousnes, I will rehearse vnto you a fable. There was a for hauing a soze place on him ouerset with a swarme of flies, that continually sucked out his bloud: and when one that came by and saw this manner, demanded whether she would haue the flies dyen beside him, he answered no: for if these flies that are already full, and by reason thereof sucke not verie egerlie, should be chased awaie, other that are emptie and fellie an hungered, should light in their places, and sucke out the residue of my bloud farre more to my greauance than these, which now being satisfied doe not much annoy me. Therefore saith Malcolme, suffer me to remaine where I am, least if I arteine to the regiment of your realme, mine vniuenchable auarice may proue such; that ye would thinke the displeasures which now grieue you, should seeme easie in respect of the vniuenchable outrage, which might issue through my comming amongst you.

Conetousnesse the root of all mischiefe

Disimulation and deitings in liues.

Makhduffe to this made answer, how it was a far worse fault than the other: for auarice is the root of all mischiefe, and for that crime the most part of our kings haue bene slaine and brought to their final end. Yet notwithstanding follow my counsell, and take vpon thee the crowne. There is gold and riches enough in Scotland to satiffie thy greedie desire. When said Malcolme againe, I am furthermore inclined to dissimulation, telling of leasings, and all other kinds of deceit, so that I naturallie reioice in nothing so much, as to betray & deceiue such as put anie trust or confidence in my words. Then stith there is nothing that more becommeth a prince than constancie, veritie, truth, and iustice, with the other laudable fellowshipp of those faire and noble vertues which are comprehended onelie in soothfastnesse, and that lieng vtterlie ouerthroweth the same; you see how vnable I am to gouerne anie prouince or region: and therefore stith you haue remedies to cloke and hide all the rest of my other vices, I praye you and stith to cloke this vice amongst the residue.

Then said Makhduffe: This yet is the worst of all, and there I leaue thee, and therefore saie; Why ye vnhappie and miserable Scotishment, which are thus scourged with so manie and sundrie calamities, each one aboute other! Ye haue one cursed and wicked tyrant that now reigneth ouer you, without anie right or title, oppressing you with his most bloudie crueltie. This other that hath the right to the crowne, is so replet with the inconstant behauiour and manifest vices of Englishmen, that he is nothing worthe to inioy it: for by his owne confession he is not onelie auaritious, and giuen to vnsatiable lust, but so false a traitor withall, that no trust is to be had vnto anie word he speaketh. Adieu Scotland, for now I account my selfe a banished man for euer, without comfort or consolation: and with those words the blackish teares trickled downe his cheekes verie abundantly.

At the last, when he was readie to depart, Malcolme toke him by the sleeve, and said: Be of good comfort Makhduffe, for I haue none of these vices before remembred, but haue iessed with thee in this manner, onelie to proue thy mind: for diuerse times heretofore hath Makhbeth sought by this manner of meanes to bring me into his hands, but the more slow I haue shewed my selfe to condescend to thy motion and request, the more diligence shall I vse in accomplishing the same. Incontinentlie herevpon they embraced each other, and promising to be faithful the one to the other, they fell in consultation how they might best prouide for all their businesse, to bring the same to good effect. Some after, Makhduffe repairing to the borders of Scotland, addressed his letters with secret dispatch vnto the nobles of the realme, declaring how Malcolme was confederat with him, to come hither into Scotland to claime the crowne, and therefore he required them, stith he was right inheritor thereto, to assist him with their powers to recouer the same out of the hands of the wrongfull usurper.

In the meane time, Malcolme purchased such favour at king Edwards hands, that old Siward earle of Northumberland was appointed with ten thousand men to go with him into Scotland, to support him in this enterprize, for recouerie of his right. After these newes were spread abroad in Scotland, the nobles dyen into two severall factions, the one taking part with Makhbeth, and the other with Malcolme. Wherevpon ensued oftentimes sundrie bickerings, & diuerse light skirmishes: for those that were of Malcolmes side, would not leopord to ioine with their enemies in a pight field, till his comming out of England to their support. But after that Makhbeth perceived his enemies power to increase, by such aid as came to them forth of England with his aid, he recoiled backe into Fife, there putting to abide in campe fortified, at the castell of Dunfinane, and to fight with his enemies, if they ment to pursue him; howbeit some of his friends advised him, that it should be best for him, either to make some agreement with Malcolme, or else to flee with all speed into the Isles, and to take his treasure with him, to the end he might waige sundrie great princes of the realme to take his part, & retaine strangers, in whome he might better trust than in his owne subjects, which shall daillie from him: but he had such confidence in his prophesies, that he beleued he should neuer be vanquished, till Birnane wood were brought to Dunfinane; nor yet to be slaine with anie man, that should be or was borne of anie woman.

A parliament at Forfar.

Malcolme following half lie after Hakbeth, came the night before the battell unto Birnane wood, and when his armie had rested a while there to refresh them, he commanded euerie man to get a bough of some tree or other of that wood in his hand, as big as he might beare, and to march forth therewith in such wise, that on the next morrow they might come close lie and without sight in this manner within view of his enemies. On the morrow when Hakbeth beheld them comming in this sort, he first marvelled what the matter ment, but in the end remembered himselfe that the prophesie which he had heard long before that time, of the coming of Birnane wood to Dunstan castle, was likelic to be now fulfilled. Heverthelesse, he brought his men in order of battell, and exhorted them to do valiantlie, howbeit his enemies had scarcelie cast from them their boughs, when Hakbeth perceiving their numbers, betooke him streit to flight, whom Hakdusse pursued with great hatred even till he came unto Lunfannatne, where Hakbeth perceiving that Hakdusse was hard at his backe, leapt beside his horse, saying; Thou traitor, what meaneth it that thou shouldest thus in vaine follow me that am not appointed to be slaine by any creature that is borne of a woman, come on there fore, and receive thy reward which thou hast deserved for thy paines, and therewithall he lifted by his sword thinking to haue slaine him.

But Hakdusse quicklie avoiding from his horse, per he came at him, answered (with his naked sword in his hand) saying: It is true Hakbeth, and now shall thine insatiable crueltie haue an end, for I am even he that thy wizards haue told thee of, who was neuer borne of my mother, but ripped out of her wombe: the rewt shall he slepe unto him, and slue him in the place. When cutting his head from his shoulders, he set it upon a pole, and brought it unto Malcolme. This was the end of Hakbeth, after he had reigned 17 yeres over the Scottishmen. In the beginning of his reigne he accomplished manie worthy acts, verie profitable to the common-wealth (as ye haue heard) but afterward by illusion of the diuell, he defamed the same with most terrible crueltie. He was slaine in the yere of the incarnation, 1057, and in the 16 yere of king Edwards reigne over the Englishmen.

Malcolme Cammore thus recovering the relme (as ye haue heard) by support of king Edward, in the 16 yere of the same Edwards reigne, he was crowned at Scone the 25 day of Aprill, in the yere of our Lord 1057. Immediately after his coronation he called a parliament at Forfar, in the which he rewarded them with lands and linings that had assisted him against Hakbeth, advancing them to fees and offices as he saw cause, & commanded that speciallie those that bare the surname of any offices or lands, should haue and enjoy the same. He created many earles, lords, barons, and knights. Many of them that before were thanes, were at this time made earles, as Fife, Penteth, Atholl, Leuenor, Murray, Cathnes, Ross, and Angus. These were the first earles that haue bene heard of amongst the Scottishmen (as their histories do make mention.) Manie new surnames were taken up at this time amongst them, as Cauder, Lokart, Gordon, Selton, Lauder, Malwane, Meldun, Schaw, Leirmouth, Libertoun, Strachguben, Targill, Kattrey, Dundas, Cockbourne, Pirrton, Penzeis, Abercrommie, Lillie, with manie other that had possessions giuen them, which gaue names to the owners for the time. Others got their surnames by offices, as Steward, Durward, and Banerman. Also the proper names of manie valiant captiues were turned into generall surnames, as Kennedie, Graham, Haie, with diuerse other so long here to rehearse. So that it came to passe then, as it hath bene manie times since, that new surnames haue woone the old out of vse.

In the foresaid parlement thus holden at Forfar, in the beginning of his reigne, there were manie hole some ordinances established, both appertaining to ciuill administration, and also to the ecclesiasticall jurisdiction. In reward also of Hakdusses seruice, who (as ye haue heard) chiefie aided him to the attaining of the crowne, he honored him and his posteritie with three sorts of priuileges. First, that the earle of Fife for the time being, at the coronation of a king, should by his office set the crowne on the kings head. The second was, that when the king should giue battell to his enemies, the same earle should lead the bauntgard of his host. The third, that the lineage of Hakdusse should enjoy regall authoritie and power within all their lands and romes, as to appoint officers and iudges for the hearing and determining of matters and controuersies (treason onelie excepted) and that if any of their men or tenants were called to answer in any court out of their circuit, they might appeale to their owne iudges to be appointed, as before is expressed.

Iohannes Maior writeth in his chronicles, that the third priuilege, which Malcolme granted unto this Hakdusse and his posteritie, was this, that for euerie gentleman that any of them should hap to kill by chancemedlie, and not upon pretended malice, for the summe of 24 marks he should redeeme his punishment due for the same: & for the casuall slaughter of a meaner person he should be fined at twelue marks. So that murderers were wont to say, that if they were able to paie that summe to the Kinboe, they ought to be released of further punishment, by Hakdusses priuilege. But this third priuilege, together with the other two former grants, the said Maior soe reprehendeth, and not without cause, as may appere, considering the naturall inclination of that people unto murder, which by this meanes nourishing secret hatred and malice in their hearts, might vnder the cloke of casuall falling out, slea whom they listed.

It was ordeined also at this parlement, that barons which had liberties within themselves, should make gibbets, whereon men that deserved death should suffer execution: and also draw-wels, wherein women that were condemned should be drowned, according to the order of the ciuill lawes used in Scotland. Moreover, all the lawes that Hakbeth had ordeined, were abrogated at this parlement. Thus whilest Malcolme was buied in setting orders amongst his subiects, tidings came that one Lugtake surnamed the sole, being either the sonne, or (as some write) the cosen of the late mentioned Hakbeth, was conuicied with a great number of such as had taken part with the said Hakbeth unto Scone, and there by their support receiued the crowne, as lawfull inheritor thereto. To appeale this businesse, was Hakdusse earle of Fife sent with full commission in the kings name, who incountring with Lugtake at a village called Glen in Bogdale, slue him, and confiscated his whole power, ordering the matter with them in such wise, that afterwards there was no more trouble attempted in that behalfe.

After this, the realme continued in peace certaine yeres, till it chanced a great number of theues and robbers assembling themselves together at Cockbourne pethes, did much hurt, by robbing and spoiling the people in the countreies of Spers and Louthian: howbeit, at length one Patrike Dunbar of Dunbar, by commandement of the king, sought with them, slue their capteine, with six hundred of his companie,

A conspiracie. Shortlie after he got knowledge, how there were certeine gentlemen that had conspired to slea him, & therefore taking occasion to go on hunting, where this act should haue bene erected, he calleth the chiefe authoz of the conspiracie apart into a certeine ballie, which was closed on euerie side with thicke woods, and there brake the matter vnto him, in repro-uing him verie sharpelie, for that he had so traitorouslie conspired his death, whose preseruacion he ought chieslie to haue wished, considering the man-fold benefitts he had receiued at his hands. And herewith leaping from his horse, drew his sword, commanding the other likewise to draw his, that now hauing conuenient time and place thereto, they might trie the matter betwixt them, who should be thought most worthie of life, by open force of knightlie prouesse. The conspirator hearing these words, as a man altogether astonied, fell downe vpon his knees at the kings feet, beseeching his grace of mercie for his wicked purpose and heinous offense: who seeing him thus penitent, had him arise, and said, I am content herevpon to forgive thee, so that thou be not of counsell hereafter in anie such traitorous practise.

The manlie courage of R.
Malcolme. Whilest things passed thus in Scotland, great and marvellous chanches came to passe within the realme of England. For after the death of king Edward, surnamed the Confessor, Harold the sonne of earle Godwine toke on him the kingdome. But William bassard duke of Normandie, pretending title to the crowne of England, at length invaded the land, and sleaing Harold in field, made a full conquest of the realme, and was crowned king at London by Edmoz archbishop of Dorke. Here ye haue to understand, that king Edward in his life time had sent for his nephew Edward, the sonne of his brother Edmund Ironside, to come home forth of Hungarie, whither (after his fathers deccasse) he and his brother Edwine had bene sent abate, as in the historie of England it appereth more at large. This Edward had married the daughter of the emperoz Henrie, named Agatha, sister to the queene of Hungarie, and not the king of Hungaries daughter, although the Scottish writers doe so affirme. By hir he had issue a sonne named Edgar, and two daughters, the one named Margaret, and the other Christen.

He more hereof in England. King Edward ment that his nephew the said Edward should haue succeeded him, and (as some write) he would in his life time haue resigned the crowne vnto him. But he (a thing worthie of admiration) utterlie refused it, and would not once meddle therewith during his uncles life time; & (as it chanced) he died, whilst his uncle king Edward was yet liuing.
His sonne Edgar therefore, to whom it seemed that the crowne was due, when he saw the realme conquered by the Normans, despairing to recouer it out of their hands, got a ship, and determined with his mother and sisters to passe over into Germanie to his friends and kinsfolke there: but by contrarie windes he was driuen to shoure in the Forth, at a place called vnto this day the queenes ferrie. Malcolme being at the same time at Dunfermeling, when he heard of the arrivall of this ship, and understood what they were that were aboord in hir, he resorted thither with an honorable companie about him, to visit them for honours sake, vpon fauour he bare towards them, for that they were descended of that noble prince king Edward, in whome afore time he had found so much gentleness and friendship.

Finalle, when he understood their estate, he brought them home with him to his palace, shewing them all the loue and friendship he could deuise; and in the end considering the excellent beutie, wisdom, and noble qualities of the ladie Margaret, sister to the same Edgar, he required of Agatha hir mother to haue hir in mariage, wherevnto Agatha gladlie condescended. Shortlie after, with an assemblie of all the nobles of Scotland, this mariage was made and solemnized after the octaues of Easter, in the yeare 1067, with all the top & triumph that might be deuised. R. William conqueror of England, being informed hereof, feared least this alliance betwixt Malcolme and Edgar might breed some trouble and disquietnesse to his estate, with the same Edgar had manie friends through all the parties of England.
To preuent therefore the occasions of intestine troubles, he confined all the linage of the foresaid Edgar, by reason whereof, a great number of Englishmen came into Scotland vnto king Malcolme, and manie of them obtaining liuinges at his hands, remained there continuallie during their liues, leauing to their posteritie their names & possessions. Amongst whome were these, Lindseie, Haas, Ramsie, Louell, Tothris, Drestonne, Sandlands, Bilsart, Sowlis, Wardlaw, Marwell, with diuerse other.

There came diuerse also out of Hungarie with queene Margaret, who likewise left their names to their families, which yet remaine euen vnto this day, as Creichtoune, Fotheringham, Giffart, Mel-mill, Bothwike, and others. Also there haue come at sundrie seasons out of France diuers surnames into Scotland, as Fraiser, Sinclair, Boswell, Spowtray, Mountgummerie, Campbell, Bois, Betoun, or Betuin, Laillefer, and Bothwell, besides sundry other which were but superfluous to rehearse at this time. ¶ But to the order of the historie. It is recozded by writers, that these (which at this time came out of England vnto Edgar) brought great quantitie of gold and siluer with them; also manie reliques of saints, and (amongst other) that blacke crosse which king David gaue vnto the abbete of Holie rood house in Louthian, which he founded at his owne charges. Shortlie after the proscription of these Englishmen, William the conqueror sent an herald at armes vnto king Malcolme, demanding to haue Edgar deliuered into his hands, and threatning that if he refused to deliuer him, he would sur-lie fetch him, and that smallie for Malcolms commoditie.

But Malcolme, though he understood that he should be sure of wars at R. Williams hands for his deniall; yet he declared plainelie to the herald, that his maisters request was unreasonable, & therefore he minded not in anie wise to gratifie him therein.
King William receiuing this answer from king Malcolme, proclaimed open warre against Scotland. In the meane time all Northumberland toke part with R. Malcolme, for that he was their earles sisters sonne. Wherevpon R. William sent a balliant capteine, a Norman borne named Roger, to inuaue Northumberland. Which Roger gathering a power of men, came bassilie into that countrie, howbeit he abode a short time there in honoz, for by the Scots & Northumberland men his armie was discomfited, and he himselfe traitorously slaine by his owne soldiers.

But king William nothing discouraged with this overthrow: sent one Richard earle of Gloucester (whome amongst all the Englishmen he had most in trust) with a mightie armie into Cumberland, a gainst whome were sent the earles of March and Wentesh, who defended the countrie right manlie from the invasion of the said earle, so that he was not able to take anie advantage of them. King William advertised herof, wared wonderfull wroth, that no more good was done against his enemies, whereupon he sent a new power thither with all speed, under the leading of his brother Odo, who was both bishop of Bataur, and earle of Kent. By this last armie, the countrie of Northumberland was soze spoiled, and a great number both of Scots and Northumberlandmen discomfited and slaine. But as Odo was preparing to returne, there came Malcolme, with all the power he might make, and giving an onset upon his enemies, slue a great number of them, and recovered all the botie which Odo men had got in the countrie, and so right full of that victorie, returned into Scotland. King William yet nothing abashed for these mishaps, sent his sonne called Robert, with a far greater power than at anie time he had sent before, into Northumberland, who remaining a long season in campe nere to the river of Tyne, attempted no notable enterprise, saying that he repared and newlie fortified the towne of Newcastle, which standeth upon the same river of Tyne; and then at length a peace was concluded betwixt the two kings under these conditions, that king Malcolme should enjoy that part of Northumberland which lieth betwixt Tyne, Cumberland, and Stainmore, and to do homage to the k. of England for the same. In the midst of Stainmore there shall be a crosse set up, with the king of Englands image on the one side, and the king of Scotlands on the other, to signifie that the one is march to England, and the other to Scotland. This crosse was called the roicrosse, that is, the crosse of the kings. Moreover, it was concluded that Walthof or Woldofus (as the Scottish writers name him) the sonne of Steward earle of Northumberland should marie king Williams nere, bozne of his daughter, and to be free from all payments and exactions due to the king by anie manner of prerogative or means, for the space of twentie yeares next ensuing.

In the necke of this peace thus concluded betwixt the kings, happened new trouble in Scotland, by reason of intestine rebellion: for the people of Galloway, and the Island men, rose in great numbers, and spoiled the borders of their neighbors, not sparing from slaughter in all parts, where they were anie thing resisted. Against these rebels was sent by king Malcolme, Walter the sonne of Fleance (of whome there is mention made before) with a convenient armie, who at his coming into Galloway, first gaue the people of that countrie an overthrow, and slue their chiefe capteine Malglaue. Then afterwards fighting with them of the Isles, he subdued them in such wise, that all things were pacified even at commandement. For which high prowess and diligence in this piece of service shewed, he was created by Malcolme high steward of the realme, so that afterwards both he and his posteritie ever since have bozne that surname, even unto these our daies.

After the quieting of this businesse, there sprang a new tumult more dangerous than the former, for the Murrepleand men, procuring them of Kesse and Casknes, with diuers other to ioine with them in confederacie, did not onelie sea the kings servants, and those that were appointed under him to see to the minstres, but through support of one Malglaue, whome they chose to be their capteine, they also wasted and destroyed the kings possessions, with more crueltie than ever had bene heard of before. Wherefore to punish these traitorous attempts, Malglaue was sent with an armie into Mar. But the traitors doubting least they should not be able to withstand his puissance, thought nothing more available than to stop him with monie: but in the meane time came the king himselfe in good season into Monimusk, where he was advertised, that in maner all the north parts of Scotland with the Isles, were confederat with the Murrepleand men against him. The king astonished something at these newes, boined to give the baronnie of Monimusk (which he understood to be lands pertaining to the crowne) unto the church of saint Andrew in Fife, if it might please God to send him victorie over his enemies.

At length coming unto the water of Speie, he beheld his enemies on the further side, in greater number, and in better furniture for armie than he thought had bene possible to have found in all Scotland: he perceived also that his standard-bearer began to shrink, and not to shew the like cheerefull countenance as he ought to have done. Wherefore he pulled the banner from him, and gaue it to Sir Alexander Carron, who with this his new office obtained sundrie faire lands and possessions, to him and to his heires for ever: but his surname was afterwards changed, and called Skrimgeour; of the which is descended a noble house, continuing yet in great honor in the same surname and office. When the king was once passed the water, and the armies on both sides ready to have joined, through mediation of bishops and other vertuous men, the matter was taken up, and peace made on these conditions; That the commons that took part with the rebels, should returne home out of hand, and the gentlemen to submit themselves to the kings pleasure, their lives and lands saved. Howbeit manie of them were kept in perpetuall prison during their lives, and all their goods confiscated to the kings use.

All civill trouble and commotion being thus quieted, king Malcolme (speciallie by the good admonishment and exhortation of his wife quene Margaret, a woman of great zeale unto the religion of that time) gaue himselfe in maner altogether unto much devotion, and woorkes of mercie; as in doing of almes deeds, by providing for the poore, and such like goodlie exercises: so that in true vertue he was thought to excell all other princes of his time. To be brieve, herein there seemed to be in maner a certaine strife betwixt him, and that vertuous quene his wife, which of them should be most fervent in the love of God, so that manie people by the imitation of them were brought unto a better life. Agatha and hir daughter Christine also, by the example of these two holie liners, renounced the pompe of the court, and got them to a privat and solitarie life, wherein they gaue themselves wholie to divine contemplation. Furthermore, Malcolme by the setting on of the quene his wife, ceased not to let his induer wholie to the advancement of the christian religion, and to restore things that were decayed by the negligence of his predecessors. Therefore whereas before his time, there were but foure bishops sees in Scotland, as saint Andrew, Glascol, Galloway, and Murrepleake, and two of them, that is to say, saint Andrew and Murrepleake remaining onelie in good reparation (the other being decayed) he restored the other two to their former beauties, and furthermore erected two other of new, as Murreple and Casknes, placing men of singular vertue and purenelle of life in the same.

But to proceed. It is said, that such outrageous riot entered at this time, and began to grow in use among the Scottishmen, together with the language and manners of the English nation (by reason that such a multitude of the same, fleeing out of their countrie, were daily received as then into Scotland to inhabit there, as before is shewed) that divers of the nobles perceiving what discommoditie and decaye to the whole realme would insue of this intemperance, came to the king, lamenting grievously the case, for that this venomous infection spread so fast over the whole realme, to the pernicious and utter removing of the ancient sobrietie of diet used in the same. Wherefore they besought him to provide some remedie in time, before hope of redresse were past, that the people might be againe reduced unto their former frugalitie, who hitherto used not to eat but once in the day, and then desiring no superfluous meates and drinks to be sought by sea and land, nor curiously dressed or served forth with sauces, but onelie feeding to satisfie nature, and not their greedy appetites.

Targot.

Through this their sober fare, with the exercising of their bodies herewith in continuall trauell, they grew more strong and greater of bodie, than their offspring are found to be in these daies: for they were more in resemblance like unto giants than unto men of our time, with great and huge bodies, mighty armes and limbs, pressing upon their enemies like unto fierce lions, bearing downe all before them, without dread of any danger, for that they exceeded all humane strength and power. Hereupon king Malcolme took great paines to haue redressed this infective poison, and bitterlie to haue expelled it forth of his realme. Howbeit the nature of man is so prone and ready to embrace all kinds of vice, that where the Scottish people before had no knowledge nor understanding of fine fare or riotous surfeit; yet after they had once tasted the sweet poisoned bait thereof, there was now no meane to be found to restraine their licentious desires. And yet those corrupted abuses and riotous superfluities (which came into the realme of Scotland with the Englishmen) planted therein by the daies of king Malcolme, are not to be compared in excess with things used in our time. For in those daies, as yet the nature of man was not so overcome with the abuse of superfluities, as it is now adays; for then though they were gone from the ancient sparseness of diet, they yet did not eat past twice a day, and had but two dishes at a meale: but now the greedy taste of mens insatiable lust is such, that no kind of flesh, fish, fruit, or whatsoever may be gotten, is vnneth able to quench their gluttonous appetit & ravenous gormandizing; so that neither land, sea, nor aire, is left unsought to satisfie the same, as though they were worthy of most high commendation that may deuour most: wherein they may be iustlie compared to greedy wolves and coyotes. But to bewaile that in words which cannot be amended in deeds, is but a follie; for the infection is so entered into the inner parts of the intrails, that neither with purging, cutting, nor searing, it may be holpen. Soner shall you destroye the whole nation, than remove this vice.

In the meane time whilist things passed thus in Scotland, king William the Conqueror died in the 21st yere of his reigne, and after the incarnation of our lord 1087. About which time king Malcolme caused the old church of Durham to be plucked downe and builded up a new, beginning even at the first floze. In which season, one Egellwin or William (as the Scottish writers say) was bishop of that see, and prior of the abbey was one Targot, who afterward was made bishop of saint Andrews, and wrote the liues of queene Margaret and Malcolme his husband in the Scottish tongue. Afterward he deceased in saint Andrews, but his bodie was brought unto Durham, and there buried, because he was first prior thereof. King Malcolme by perswasion of his Targot, builded also a church in Dunfermling, dedicated to the Trinitie, ordering from thenceforth that the common sepulture of the kings should be there, in like manner as it had bene afore time in the Isle of Iona at the abbey of Colmekill.

Amongst other vertuous ordinances also, which were devised and made by king Malcolme (through exhortation of his wise queene Margaret) mentioned by Targot in the booke which he wrote of their liues, this is not to be forgotten, that he abrogated that wicked law, established by king Edwin the third, appointing halfe a marke of silver to be paid to the lord of the soile, in redemption of the womans chastitie, which is used to be paid yet unto this day, and is called the marchets of woman: where otherwise by tenor of king Edwin's law, the lord had the use of their bodies all the first night after their marriage. King William surnamed the Red, the second sonne of king William the Conqueror, and successor to him in the kingdome of England, not well contented nor pleased in his mind, that the Scots should introy a great portion of the north parts of England, ancientlie belonging to his crowne as parcell thereof, he raised a great armie, and before any denouncing of warre by him made, invaded Northumberland, and took the castell of Anwyke, putting all such to the sword as were found in the same.

King Malcolme, to withstand such exploits attempted by his enemy, leuied a great host of his subjects, and comming with the same into Northumberland, besieged the said castell of Anwyke. And now when the keepers of the hold were at point to haue made surrender, a certeine English knight concealing in his mind an hardie and dangerous enterprise, mounted on a swift horse without armor or weapon, saving a spear in his hand, upon the point whereof he bare the keyes of the castell, and so issued forth at the gates, riding directlie towards the Scottish campe. They that warded, mistrusting no harme, brought him with great noise and clamour unto the kings tent. Who hearing the noise, came forth of his pavillion to understand what the matter ment. The Englishman herewith condeed his staffe, as though it had bene to the end that the king might receive the keyes which he had brought. And whilist all mens eyes were earnest in beholding the keyes, the Englishman ran the king through the left eye, and suddenlie dashing his spurs to his horse, escaped to the next wood out of all danger. The point of the speare entered so farre into the kings head, that immediatlie falling downe amongst his men, he yielded up the ghost. This was the end of king Malcolme in the midst of his armie.

It is said, that king William changed the name of this aduenturous knight, & called him Percie etc, for that he stroke king Malcolme so right in the eye, and in recompense of his seruice gaue him certeine lands in Northumberland: of whose those Percies are descended, which in our daies haue intitled the honorable title of earles of Northumberland. The Scots after the slaughter of their king, brake up their campe, and buried his bodie within the abbey of Tynmouth in England. But his sonne Alexander caused it afterwarde to be taken up, and buried in Dunfermling before the altar of the Trinitie. At the same time was Scotland wounded with another mishap. For Edward the prince of Scotland, eldest sonne to king Malcolme, died of a hurt

- hurt which he receiued in a skirmish not farre from Antwike, and was buried in Dunfermling, the first of the blond roiall that had his bones laid in that place. Quene Margaret being aduertised of the death both of hir husband and sonne, as then lieng in Edenburgh castell, hir disease increased through griefe therof so vehementlie, that within thre daies after she departed out of this life, vnto an other moze sofull and blessed. King Malcolme was slaine in the yere of our redemption 1092, on the 13 day of November, and in the 36 yere of his reigne.
- In the same yere, manie vncouth things came to passe, and were seene in Albion. By the high spring tides which chanced in the Almaine seas, manie towncs, castels, and woods were drowned, as well in Scotland as in England. After the ceasing of which tempest, the lands that sometime were earle Godwins (of whome ye haue heard before) lieng not farre from the towne of Sandwich, by violent force and drift of the sea, were made a sand-bed, and ever since they haue bene called Godwins sands. The people haue thought that this vengeance came to that peece of ground being possessed by his posteritie, for the wicked daughter of Alured, which he traitorously continued, Moreouer sundrie castels and towncs in Surrey land, were ouerthrowne by the sea tides. Such dreadfull thunder happened also at the same time, that men and beafts were slaine in the fields, and houses ouerturned even from their fundations. In Louthian, ffife, and Angus, trees and corne were burned by fire, kindled no man knew how, nor from whence.
- In the daies of this Malcolme Canmore, liued that famous historiographer Marianus a Scottish man borne, but professed a monke in the monastrie of Fulda in Germanie. Also Veremond a Spanish priest, but dwelling in Scotland, storied about the same time, and wrote the Scottish historie, whome Hector Boetius so much followeth. Malcolme had by his wife quene Margaret (otherwise called for hir holinesse of life saint Margaret) six sonnes, Edward (as is said) was slaine: Edmunde, which died in his tender age, and was buried in Dunfermling: and Edmund which renounced the world, and liued an holic life in England: the other thre were named Edgar, Alexander, and Dauid. There be that write how Edmund was taken, and put to death by his vncle Donald Bane, when he invaded the kingdome, and vsurped the crowne, after the deceasse of his brother king Malcolme, and so then was Edgar next inheritor to the crowne.
- This Donald Bane, who (as before is mentioned) fled into the Fles to eschue the tyrannicall malice of Malcolme, after he once heard that his brother king Malcolme was dead, returned into Scotland by support of the king of Norwaie, vnto whom he couenanted to giue the dominion of all the Fles, if by his means & furtherance he might obtaine the crowne of Scotland. Hereupon landing with an armie in the realme, he found small resistance, and so with little adoe receiued the crowne. For manie of the people abhorring the riotous maners and superstitious gormandizing brought in among them by the Englishmen, were willing inough to receiue this Donald for their king, trusting (because he had bene brought vp in the Fles with the old customes and maners of their ancient nation, without tast of the English lickerous delicats) they should by his seuerer order in gouernement recouer againe the former temperance of their old progenitors.
- As soone as Edgar Etheling brother to Quene Margaret was aduertised that Donald Bane had thus vsurped the crowne of Scotland, he sent secretly for his thre nephues, Edgar, Alexander, and Dauid, with two sisters which they had, to come vnto him into England, where he had not kept them anie long while, but that a knight whose name was Edgar or Edgar, accused him of treason, alledging how he nourished his sisters sonnes and daughters within the realme, in hope to make them inheritors to the crowne: but the malice of this false surmise remained not unpunished, for one of Edgars friends, taking in hand to darraigne battell with Edgar, in defense of Edgars innocencie, slue him within lists. After that Donald had receiued the crowne at the abbete of Scone, he perceiued that some of the nobles grudged at his pzeferment, shewing by some tokens that they had more affection vnto king Malcolmes children, than vnto him: and therefore he cast out a word amongst his familiars, that yet it were long the nobles should repent them of their doing, if they applied not them selues the moze to his opinion.
- Which words being marked, and depelie imprinted in some of their hearts, turned afterwards to his great displeasure. For shortly after came Duncane the bastard sonne of king Malcolme out of England into Scotland, supported with an armie of men appointed by king William the Red, to place him in the kingdome, and to expell Donald out of the same by force of armes, if he attempted anie resistance. Now when Donald approached with his puissance, in purpose to haue giuen battell, the most part of his people did forsake him, and drew vnto Duncans side, so that Donald thus abandoned of them that should haue aided him, was constrained for his refuge to flee againe into the western Fles: and so Duncane then comming vnto Scone, receiued the crowne of Scotland. But for that he had bene trained the most part of his life in the warres both in England and France, he had small skill in ciuill gouernement, iudging that thing onelie to stand with iustice, which was decided with speare and shield. By reason whereof Scotland was shortly filled with new troubles and seditious diuisions.
- Donald Bane being aduertised of all those things, that thereby happened in Scotland, solicited Malcolme erle of Wernes to take his part, and by some meanes to slea Duncane, which enterprise Malcolme taking in hand, at length (in Wentesh) accomplished the same in the night season, when he had espied such aduantage and opportunitie of time, that not so much as one man was found to pursue him. But to say the truth, Duncane was so farre out of the peoples fauor, that moze reioises than were for his death. After he was thus dispatched, his vncle Donald was restored againe to the kingdome, chiefe by support of the forenamed Malcolme, after his nephew the foresaid Duncane had reigned one yere and an halfe, where Donald himselfe had reigned (before he was expelled by his said nephew) the space of six moneths, and now after he had recouered the kingdome, he continued in the regiment thereof thre yeres, not without great trouble and intestine commotions: for the most part of the lords maligning his aduancement, sought occasions daile to depole him.
- In the meane time the Flandmen made some strife, neither did the warres with England cease, (though without anie great exploit or enterprise worthy of remembrance) sauing a few light skirmishes betwixt the parties, as occasion serued. At length came Magmus king of Norwaie with a great fleet, and sailing about the western Fles, gathered all the strengths within them in most defensible wise, with men, munition, and vittels, vsurping the dominion as soueraine lord of the same Fles: and at the same time ordained those lawes and constitutions, situations which are used there amongst the inhabitants even unto these dates. The Scottishmen having great indignation, that the Isles being ancientlie parcel of the crowne, should be thus alienated from the same, sent orators unto Edgar (who was, as ye have heard, the fourth sonne of king Malcolm) desiring him most instantlie to come into Scotland, to recover his fathers heritage and crowne of Scotland out of the usurpers hands.

Edgar taking deliberate advise touching this request, first sent ambassadours unto Donald, promising that if he would be contented to restore unto him the crowne, being due to him by lawfull succession, he would gladly reward him with great lordships and revenues in Louthian: but Donald was so farre from minding to do him reason in this behalfe, that causing them which brought this message to be put in prison, he finallye sue them. Then Edgar by counsell of his uncle Edgar Etheling, purchasing an aid of men at the hands of king William Rufus, set forthwards toward Scotland. At his com-ming to Durham, he was admonished by a vision in his sleepe, that if he took with him the banner of Saint Cutbert, he should have victorie. On the morrow after, he came into the abbey church, where first hearing divine service, when the same was ended, he displayed the foresaid banner, and caused it to be borne before him in that tourne. Nevertheless king Donald met him with a mightie armie, and after long fight, was chased into the Isles, where he was taken and brought unto Edgar. Some say that when the battels were ready to have joined, his men beholding the banner of Saint Cutbert sped against them, immediatlie forsooke him, so that he being destitute of succour, fled, in purpose to have saved himselfe in some one of the western Isles: but being apprehended by the inhabitants, was brought (as is said) unto Edgar, by whom he was (howsoever the hap of his taking chanced) cast immediatlie into prison, wherein he shortly after died. The victo-rie thus achieved, Edgar went unto Edinburgh, and from thence unto Dunfermeling to visit the se-pultures of his mother and brethren.

Afterwards comming to the abbey of Scone, and assembling the lords of the realme, he received the crowne, and shortly after was annointed by the archbishop of Saint Andrews named Godlike, in the yere of our redemption 1101. For his mother queene Margaret purchased a little before hir death of Urbane the pope, that from henceforth all the kings of Scotland should be annointed. This priviledge was confirmed afterwards by pope John the second of that name. The first king that was annointed according to that grant, was this Edgar, in the yere aforesaid. About two yers before this Edgar recovered thus the crowne of Scotland, was that generall passage made into the holie land under Godfrie of Bullongne, and other christian princes.

Amongst them, as one of the chiefe, Robert duke of Normandie went, and should have bene created king of Jerusalem, had he not at the same time heard how his brother William Rufus the king of England was slaine by chance, through glancing of an arrow shot at a dere in the new forest; and then hoping to succeed him in the kingdom of England, he preferred that honoꝝ to the other, wherein he saw to be more traueil than gain. But at his com-ming home, he found that his youngest brother Henrie surnamed Beauclerke, was placed in the kingdome of England, and so was duke Robert his hope frustrate of both the kingdoms, and that woꝝthilie (as most men thought) for that he refused so necessarie a dignitie, wherein he might have served the common cause of the christian common-wealth. Unto Henrie Beauclerke in the second yere of his reigne king Edgar married one of his sisters called Maude.

The other named Marie he coupled with Eustace earle of Bullongne: in which marriage was borne a daughter that was the onelie heire of the same Eustace in the countie of Bullongne, the which when she came to womans state, was married unto Stephan earle of March in England, and of Poiteigne in France, nephew to Henrie Beauclerke by his sister. The king of England Henrie, had issue by queene Maude, two sonnes and two daughters, William and Richard, Eustace and Maude.

But now to returne to king Edgar, to the some token of thanks towards Saint Cutbert for his aid shewed, as was thought, in the battell against his uncle Donald, he gave unto the monks of Durham the lands of Coldingham: and to the bishop of Durham called Canulph, he gave the towne of Werwike. But for that the same bishop wrought afterwards treason against him, he lost that gift, and the king resumed that towne into his hands againe. I do not find that Edgar had anye warres anye waie forth during all the time of his reigne, a prince rather reuerenced than dread amongst his subjects for his singular equitie and upright dealing. He departed out of this life at Dundee, in the 9 yere of his reigne, and after the birth of our Saviour 1107.

After the deceasse of this Edgar, succeeded his brother Alexander the fierce, so called for his rigorous valiancie in pursuing of theues and robbers. In the beginning of his reigne, the inhabitants of Murray land and Ross, beholding him to be most an end in the church at his praiers, and divine service, after the maner of his parents, supposed he would prove no great quickie sufficient in punishing offenders, and thereupon most presumptuous-lie they began to rob and reave on eche side, not sparing to kill and slea all such as came in their hands, without respect to age or sex; insomuch that the yong infants smiling upon the murderers, being about to erecte their detestable crueltie, passed by the sword as well as the resistors: such rooted malice remained in their beaklie harts, which upon renewing their old grudges they now accordingly shewed.
King Alexander therefore advertised hereof, came into those parts with a competent armie, and apprehending the chiefe authors and capteins, strooke off their heads. As he returned backe through Bernes, there came a woman unto him weeping in most lamentable sort, who fell upon hir knees at his feet, beséeching him to pittie hir case, having lost both hir husband & sonne, by the tyrannous crueltie of the maister of Bernes, who for that they had called him before a iudge in an action of debt, had slaine and murthered as well the one as the other. The king moved with this detestable kind of iniurie, lighted from his horse, and would not mount by againe, till he had sene the author of that heinous trespass hanged up on a gibbet. After his comming into Cotwize, he toke in hand to finish and make by the castell of Wal-ledgar, the foundation whereof his brother Edgar had begun, that it might be an aid to chastise a sort of theues and robbers which haunted the woods thereabout, to the great disquietnes of all the countie. He gave also to the maintenance of that house certeine lands, which the earle of Cotwize had given him at the font stone, when he became his godfather.

Whilste he was thus busied about the furtherance of that woꝝke, divers of those theues that were accustomed to live by robberies in those parts, percei-ving that this castell, which the king was about to build, should turne unto their destruction, they conspired his death, and winning by rewards and promises the helpe of the kings chamberlaine to the accomplishing of their traitorous and most diuellish practises, they entered one night through a priuie into his lodging, in purpose to haue slaine him as he slept in his bedchamber: but he by Gods prouidence hauing knowledge of their comming, started out of his bed, and caught a sword which hong nere at hand, wherewith he slue first his chamberlaine that had brought them in, and then dispatched six of the other traitors (which were already entered his chamber) with singular force and manhood: the other fearing least with the noise, his seruants that lodged within the house should haue bene raised, and so haue halled to assaile them on the backs, fled in all haste possible. Penerthelesse, such pursute was made after them, that manie of them were apprehended, & vpon their examination, being brought befoze the king, they declared plainlie how they were incouraged to worke that treason which they had gone about, by sundrie great barons and gentlemen of the countrie. Finally, the matter was so handled with them, that they disclosed the names of those that had thus procured them to the treason. Wherevpon the king gathering an armie, he marched forth to pursue them, but befoze he came vnto the water of Spaie, the conspirators had gotten together their power, & were lodged on the further side of the same water, to stop him from passing ouer.

The king seeing them thus assembled to impeach his passage, sent his banner-man sir Alexander Carron with a chosen part of his armie to passe the water, and to fight with his enimies, where, by the hardie onset of the said sir Alexander, they were quickly put to flight, and manie of them that were taken in the chase suffered death, according as they had well deserved. The realme after this execution done on these offenders, continued manie yeeres after in good tranquillitie. This Alexander Carron also for that he was seene in the kings fight that day to fight most manfully, in slaying diuers of the rebels with a crooked sword which he had in his hand (of which sort manie were used in those daies) he was highly rewarded at the kings hands, & ever after named Skrimgeour, that is to say, An hardie fighter. He had also his armes increased with a rampant lion holding a crooked sword, as is to be seene in the armes of his posteritie vnto this day. Where there be that say he got the surname of Skrimgeour, because he slue an Englishman in a singular combat. The principall of this surname in our time held the constableness of Dundee, bearing in his armes a crooked sword in fashion of an hooke.

After that king Alexander had appeased the intestine commotions thus within his realme, he set in hand to reare the abbeye of Scone, wherein he placed regular canons, dedicating the church in the honor of the Trinitie, and saint Michaele. Not long after this also, he chanced to come into saint Colmes Inch, where he was constrained to abide thre daies together through violent rage of weather and tempests: and because he found some reliefe of meate & drinke, by meanes of an heremit that dwelt within the same Inch, and kept a chappell there dedicated to saint Colme, he made of that chappell an abbeye of regular canons, in the honor of saint Colme, endowing it with hundre lands and rents for the maintenance of the abbat and convent of that house. He also gaue to the church of saint Andzweles, the lands called the Boarrinke, so named, for that a great bore was slaine vpon the said ground, that had done much hurt in the countrie thereabout. The tusk of this bore do hang in chains vpon the skales of the quier in saint Andzweles church afore the high altar, and are 16 inches in length, & foure inches in thicknes.

ness. Moreover, the abbey of Dunfermling was finished by king Alexander, and endowed with sundrie lands and possessions.

Whilest king Alexander was thus occupied in building and repairing of religious houses, his brother Dauid liued in England with his sister quene Paul, & through fauour which the king his husband bare towards him, he obtained in marriage one Paul, daughter vnto Mollofius, or rather Maltheo earle of Huntington and Northumberland, begot of his wife the ladie Judith that was nece vnto king William the Conqueror. And for that the said Mollofius or Maltheo had no other issue to inherit his lands, Dauid in right of his wife Paul inherited the same, and was made earle of Huntington and Northumberland, and had issue by his wife a son named Henrie, by whome the lands of Huntington, and some part of Northumberland were annexed vnto the crowne of Scotland, as after shall appere. Paul the daughter of king Henrie Beaucherce, was married vnto Henrie the emperor, the fourth of that name. William, Richard, and Cufeme, the residue of the issue which the same Henrie Beaucherce had by his wife (surnamed for his singular bounty, outlesse, the good quene Paul) in coming forth of France to repasse into England, perished in the sea by a tempest, to the great dolour of the king their father, and to all other his subiects of ech estate and degree. Their mother the said Paul was before that time departed out of this life. It was not long after, but that Alexander decessed also, and was buried in Dunfirmling besides his fathers sepulture, in the 17 yere of his reigne complet, and from the Incarnation of Christ 1125 yeres.

In the daies of this king Alexander, the kindred of the Cummings had their beginning, by one John Cumming, a man of great prowesse and valancie, obtaining of the king in respect therof, certeine small portions of lands in Scotland. The house of these Cummings rose in procelle of time thus from a small beginning to high honor and puiſſance, by reason of the great possessions & ample revenues which they afterwards attained. At length (as often hath) the importable height of this linage was the onelle cause of the decaye and finall ruine thereof, as in the sequele of this histoꝛie ye may at full perceiue.

Also in the daies of king Alexander, the order of knights of the Rhodes had their beginning, and likewise the order of White monks, the author whereof was one Podobert. About the same time lived that holie man Richard de sancto Victore, a Scottisſhman borne, but dwelled for the moze part of his time at Paris in France, where he died, & was buried with in the cloister of the abbey of saint Eldoꝛ, being a brother of the same house.

BEcause of Alexander the fierce and first of that name, his brother Dauid came vnto Scone, and there receiued the crowne, as lawfull heire to his brother, for that he left no heire behind him. This Dauid, according to the example of his noble parents, let his whole care about the due ministring of iustice, to the honor of almightie God, and the weale of his realme. He had no trouble by warres with anie foraine enemies, so long as king Henrie Beauderke liued. Therefore hauing opportunitie of such a quiet time, he roode about all the parts of his realme, and vfed to sit in hearing of iudgement himselfe, speciallie concerning poore mens causes and matters: but the controuersies of the lords and barons he referred to the hearing of other iudges. If he vnderstood that anie man were indamaged by anie wrongfull iudgement, he recompensed the partie wronged, according to the value of his losse and hinder-

Thus in the first years of his reigne he did manie things to the advancement of the common-wealth, and banished such banketting cheare as was used amongst his people after the example of the Englishmen, perceiuing the same to breed a great weakening & decaye of the ancient stoutnesse of stomack, that was wont to remaine in the Scottish nation. He builded to the number of fiftene abbeyes, part of them in the beginning of his reigne before the warres were begun which he had with the Englishmen, and part after the same warres were ended. The names of those abbeyes are as followeth: Holie roth house, Kelso, Jedburgh, Melrose, Petwobottell, Holmcultrane, Dunstanane, Cambuskenneth, Paisiois, Dunfirmling, Holme in Cumberlanc; also two nunnies, the one at Carleill, and the other at north Berwick: the one of saint Benedicts order, and the other of white monkes. He created also foure bishoprikes within his realme, Kioffe, Brechin, Dunkeld, and Dublane, indowring them with rich rents, faire lands, and sundrie right commodious possessions. Moreover he translated the bishops see of Gurthlake unto Aberdeen, for sundrie aduised considerations, augmenting it with certeine reuenues, as he thought expedient.

He was admonished (as the report goeth) in his sleepe, that he shuld build an abbey for a religious order to liue in togither. Whereupon he sent for workmen into France and Flanders, and let them in hand to build this abbey of canons regular, as he was admonished, dedicating it in the honor of a crosse (whereunto he bare speciall deuotion) for that verie strangellie it slipped into his hands (on a time) as he was pursuing and following of a hart in the chase. But inough of these monkish deuises. Manie prudent men blame greatlie the vneuerall liberalitie of king David, the which he used towards the church, in diminishing so hugellie the reuenues of the crowne, being the cause that manie noble princes his successors haue come to their finall ends, for that they haue bene constrained through want of treasure to mainteine their roiall estates, to procure the fall of sundrie great houses, to possesse their lands and liuinges; also to raise payments and exactions of the common people, to the vtter impoverishment of the realme. And sometime they haue bene constrained to inuade England by warres, as desperat men, not caring what came of their liues. Otherwhilles they haue bene inforced to stampe naughtie monie; to the great preiudice of the common-wealth. All which mischiefes haue followed since the time that the church hath bene thus enriched, and the crowne impoverished.

Therefore king James the first, when he came to king David his sepulture at Dunfirmling, he said, that he was a soze saint for the crowne, meaning that he left the church ouer-rich, and the crowne too poore. For he took from the crowne (as Iohn Maior writeth in his chronicles) 60 thousand pounds Scottish of pærelie reuenues, wherewith he indownd those abbeyes. But if k. David had considered how to nourish true religion, he had neither indownd churches with such riches, nor built them with such roialtie: for the superfluous possessions of the church (as they are now used) are not onelie occasion to euill prelats to liue in most insolent pompe & corrupt life, but an assured net to draw gold and siluer out of realms. But now to returne where I left, touching the historie, we shall note that (as I said before) David had by his wife Maude inheritor of part of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington, a sonne named Henrie, who married the earle of Warrens daughter, a ladie of high parentage, as descended of most noble blood both French and English. On whome he begat three sonnes, Malcolme, William, and David; also three daughters, Adhama, Margaret, and Maude. But now in the incane time, whilst the estate of the common-wealth in Scotland stood in high felicitie, under the prosperous gouernement of king David, there happened to him an heauie losse. For the queene his wife the foresaid Maude deceased in his flourishing age, a woman of passing beautie and chastitie, which two points (as is thought) commend a woman aboue all the rest. King David therefore took such griefe for his death, that he would neuer after giue his mind to marie anie other, but passed the residue of his life without companie of all women. She was buried in Scone, in the yeare of our Lord God 1132.

Whilst these things came thus to passe in Scotland, Henrie Beauclerke king of England, caused all the nobles of his realme to take their othes, that after his deceasse they shoud receiue his daughter Maude the emperesse for their souereigne ladie and queene. She was as then returned into England; for his husband the emperour was latelie before deceased. King David also took his oth, and therefore when king Stephan (who vsurped the crowne of England after king Henries deceasse against the said emperesse) sent vnto king David to come and do his homage for the earldomes of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington (according as by his tenure he was bound to do) with intimati- on that if he refused, king Stephan would inuade him with open warre; king David answered, that he had giuen his faith once aforehand for those lands vnto the emperesse Maude, which he minded not to breake for the threatening words of anie new inuasi- ons. King Stephan moued with this answer, sent a power of men to the borders of Northumberland, (which as then was under the dominion of the Scots) to make a rode vpon the inhabitants of that countrie. They that had the charge of this enter- prise, entering into the lands of their enemies, put all to fire and sword that came in their way. The Scots kindled with that displeasure, roded into England, and did the like displeasures and hurts there. For the yeare after, the earles of March, Menteth, and Angus entred into England with a great armie, against whome came the earle of Gloucester, and giuing them battell at Northalerton, lost the field, and was taken prisoner himselfe, with diuers other nobles of England. King Stephan therefore, constrained to redeme the captiues, gaue not onelie a great summe of monie for them; but also made resignation of all such title, claime, or interest, as either he or anie of his successors might make or pretend to the counties of Northumberland and Cumberland. Howbeit his nobles were no sooner returned home, but that repenting him of that resignation, he gathered his puissance againe, and entering into Northumberland, fought with the Scots that came forth to resist him, and obtaining the victorie, took a great part of the countrie into his possession.

King David, to redresse these iniuries, gathered a mightie armie, with deliberat mind, either to expell the Englishmen out of all the bounds of his dominions, or else to die in the field. But shortly after, Thurstane archbishop of Yorke came vnto Roxburgh, called in those daies Parken, to treat for peace, where a truce was concluded for three moneths, with condition, that the Englishmen shoud deliuer vp the dominion of Northumberland vnto the lord Henrie king David his sonnes. much as this covenant was not performed on king Stephens side, king David inuaeth that part of the countrie which the Englishmen held, making great slaughter of all them that he found there about to resist him. King Stephan moved herewith leuied his people, and came in puissant arate vnto Roxburgh; but for that he had secret knowledge that some of the nobles in his armie sought his destruction, he was constrained to returne without atching of anie worthie enterpryse.

The yere next ensuing, a peace was talked by, on the archbishops of Canturburie and Po:ke appointed commissioners in the treatie thereof on the behalfe of king Stephan, and the bishops of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and saint Andrews on the part of king David. But Maude queene of England, the daughter of Eustace earle of Bullongne, and neere to king David by his sister Marie, was the chiefeest doer in this matter, to bring them to agreement. The one of the kings, that is to say Stephan, laie at Duresme with his nobles; and the other, that is to say David, lay at Newcastle, during all the time of this treatie, which at length sorted to the conclusion of a peace, on these conditions: that the countie of Northumberland and Huntingdon should remaine in the gouernement of Henrie prince of Scotland, as heire to the same by right of his mother; but Cumberland should be reputed as the inheritance and right of his father king David. And for these lands and segnoies the forenamed prince Henrie & his successors, princes of Scotland, should doe homage vnto king Stephan and his successors kings of England, for the time being.

The peace thus ratified betwixt the two kings and their subiects, K. Stephan returned into Kent, and king David repaired into Cumberland, where he fortified the towne of Carleill with new walles and ditches. Thus passed the first thre yeres of king Stephens reigne. In the fourth yere came Maude the emperesse into England to claime the crowne thereof (as in the English historie more plainlie may appeare). But whilest England was soze tormentted with warres by contrarie factions of the nobles for the quarrels of these two persons, no small sorow hapned to Scotland for the death of Henrie the prince of that land, and onelie sonne vnto king David, who died at Helso, and was buried in the abbeie church there, in the yere of our redemption, 1152. His death was greatlie bemoaned aswell of his father the king, as of all other the estates and degrees of the realme, for such singular vertue and noble conditions as appeared in him. But yet, for that he left issue behind him thre sonnes and thre daughters (as before is mentioned) the realme was not thought vnprouided of heires.

The king also being mortified from the world, toke the death of his sonne verie patientlie, considering that all men are subiect vnto death by the law of nature, and are sure no longer to remaine here, than their day appointed by the eternall determination of him that giueth and taketh away life & breath when it pleaseth him, as by daily experience is most manifest. Therefore that king David weied the losse of his sonne in such balance, it may appeare by an oration which he made to his nobles, at what time (after his sonnes deceasse) they came to comfort him. For he perceiuing them to be right heauie and sorowfull for the losse which he and they had sustained by the death of so towardlie a prince, that was to haue succeeded him, if God had lent him life thereto; in the end of a roiall feast, the which he made vnto those nobles that came thus to visit him, he began in this wise.

How great your fidelitie and care is, which you beare towards me, although oftentimes heretofore I haue proued it, yet this present day I haue receiued most ample fruit thereof: for now do I plainelie see, that you lament no lesse for the losse of my late deceased sonne, than if you had buried some one of your owne sonnes, and are therefore come to your great trauell and paine to comfort me, whom you esteeme to be soze afflicted for the ouer-timelie death of my said most obedient sonne. But to let passe for this time due yeelding of thanks to you for the same, till occasion and leasure may better serue thereto; this now may suffice, that I acknowledge my selfe to be so much beholden to you, that whatsoeuer thing I haue in the world, the same is readie to do you pleasure. But concerning the cause of your coming hither, in shewing your courtesies therein, you shall vnderstand, that my parents, whom I trust to be in heauen, and (as saints) inioy the fruits of their vertuous trauels here taken on earth, did so instruct me from my tender youth, that I should worship with all reuerence the most wise creator and prudent gouernor of all things; and to thinke that nothing was done by him in vaine, but that the same is prouided and ordeined to some good vse by his high and vnsearchable counsell. And therefore whilest day and night I haue and doe reuolue and call to remembrance the precepts and instructions of my parents, whatsoeuer hath chanced either touching aduersitie or prosperitie, good hap or bad, the same hath seemed to me (at the first) receiuing all things with equall and thankfull mind, and interpreting them to the best, farre more light than they commonlie seeme to others; and lesse they did disquiet me: so as with vse I haue learned at length, not onelie patientlie to beare all aduersities that may happen, but also to receiue the same as things pleasant and euen to be desired. And verelie my hap hath bene to be greatlie exercised in this behalfe, for I haue first seene my father, more deere to me than anie earthlie treasure; and no lesse profitablie than greatlie desired of all the people: and yet neither the loue of the people, nor of his kinsmen and friends might warrant him from this fatall necessitie of death. I haue knowen my mother right famous in the world for hir singular vertue to passe hence in like manner. My byethren that were so louing, and againe so greatlie beloued of me; also my wife whom I esteemed aboue all other creatures, are they not gone the same way, and compelled to beare deaths hard ordinance? So verelie standeth the case, that no man might yet at anie time auoid the violence of his force when he cometh, for we all alike owe this life vnto him, as a due debt that must needs be paid. But this is to be receiued with a thankfull mind, in that the bountifull beneuolence of our God hath granted that we shall be all immortall, if we our selues through vice, & as if were spotted with filthie diseases of the mind, do not fall into the danger of eternall death. Wherefore of right (me thinke) I haue cause to reioice, that God by his singular fauour hath granted to me such a sonne, which in all mens iudgements was worthy to be beloued whilest he was here amongst vs, and to be wished for now, after he is departed from hence. But ought we to take it heauilie, that he to whom he belonged, and who had lent him vnto vs, should call for him againe, and take him that was his owne? For what iniurie is it, if (when I see occasion) I shall aske that againe, which you haue possessed through my benefit as lent to you for a time? Neither do I trust to want him long, if God shall be so mercifull vnto me, as I wish him to be: for I hope shortly to be called hence by commandement of that most high king, and to be caried by to rest among that fellowship of beauenlie spirits, where I shall shall find my father and mother, my brethren, wife, and sonne in far better estate than here I knew them. Wherefore that I may repeate it once againe, I reioise (I say) to haue obtained in my sonne, by the grace of the supernall God, that I am assured by faith, he is already in that place to the which all we doe earnestlie wisly that we may attaine, and doe endeavour by all means, that when the time commeth in which our soules are to be losed forth of these fraile bodies of ours, as out of prisons, they may be found worthy of that companie, in which our confidence is that he now most blissefullie is remaining. Except anie man may thinke that we are so enuious, that therefore we doe lament, because as yet we sticke fast overwhelmed and drowned in such filthy miers, and cumbered in such thornie thickets and bushes, out of the which he (being now deliuered of all carres) hath escaped. Malcolme the sonne of Henrie proclaimed prince of Scotland.

Earle of Northumberland.

Henrie the emperours sonne receiveth the order of knighthood.

The exhortation of king David to his nobles.

King David departeth out of this life.

I I 5 2.

After that the king had made an end of his oration, and thanks given to God for his bountifull magnificence, they rose from the table, and departed to their lodgings, they all greatlie maruelling at the kings high prudence and godlie wisdom. When was Malcolme, the eldest sonne of the before mentioned prince Henrie, proclaimed in his place prince of Scotland, and conueied through the most parts of the realme by Duncane earle of Fife, and other of the nobles appointed to attend upon and receiue the othes of all the barons for their allegiance in his name. William the second sonne of prince Henrie was conueied into Northumberland by the foresaid nobles, and there proclaimed and created earle of that countrie. Then went king David himselfe vnto Carleill, where he met with Henrie the sonne of the emperesse, who receiued the order of knighthood there at his hands. This was a little before that the same Henrie came to an agreement with king Stephan, whereby he was admitted to the possession of halfe the realme of England, and promised by oth of assurance (as the Scottish writers say) that he should neuer go about to take the countries of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington from the crowne of Scotland.

Shortly after was king David taken with a sore disease and maladie, which continued with him to the end of his life. And so when he perceived himselfe to wax faint and feeble, he required to be borne in to the church, where he receiued the sacrament of the Lords bodie and bloud, with most solemn reuerence: and then being brought againe to his chamber, he called together his nobles, and commending to them his young nephues, the sons of his son the forenamed prince Henrie, he kissed ech one of them after another, most instantlie desiring them in the honor of almighty God, to seeke the preservation of common quiet, to the advancement of the publike weale. This done, he departed out of this life in the 29 yeare of his reigne, or rather in the 30 yeare, if he reigned 29 and two moneths, as John Maior saith. His bodie was buried in Dunfermeling, after the incarnation of Christ our Saviour 1153 yeares. How farre this prince king David excelled in noble vertues and sober conuersation of life, I haue thought it better to passe ouer with silence, than to go about in few words to comprehend that, wherein if I should spend much time, I were not able in anie wise worthyly to performe. For where in such cases few things are slenderly shewed, the residue may seeme to be omitted through fault of the writer.

But yet this is not to be forgotten, that where his singular pitifull regard, which he had toward the reliefe of the poore, passed all other his notable vertues, he purged his court also in such wise of all vicious rule and misordered customes, that his whole familie was giuen onelie to the exercise of vertue. No riotous banquetting nor surfeiting there was bred amongst them, no lasciuious word heard come forth of anie mans mouth, nor yet anie wanton signes shewed to prouoke sensuall lust or carnall concupiscence. All the words, works, and whole demeanour of his seruants tended to some conclusion: nothing moued to stirre strife or sedition, but all things ordered in such friendlie and peaceable sort, that the chaine of brotherly loue seemed to haue linked them all in one mind and will. Such a rule was their master king David vnto them and all other, to direct and frame a perfect and godlie life after.

King David being dead & buried (as is before said) Malcolme nephew to him by his son Henrie succeeded in the estate. He was but 13 yeeres of age, when he began his reigne; but yet his modestie and vertuous conditions were such, that all men conceived a good hope that he would proue a right noble and worthy prince. He was nourished and brought vp in such vertue, even from his infancie, that delighting in chast conuersation and cleannesse of bodie and mind, he liued single all the daies of his life, and without marriage: wherefore he was surnamed Malcolme the maid. About the time of his entering into the possession of the crowne, there was a great dearth through all the bounds of Scotland. And sone after followed a sore death both amongst men and beasts, though it was not perceived that the disease whereof they died was anie thing contagious.

Hereof did one Somerleide the thane of Argyle take occasion to attempt an higher enterpryse than stood with the basenesse of his linage and estate: for considering that the one halfe of the realme was consumed by mortallitie, and the other halfe nere hand famished through lacke of food, he thought it an easie matter for him, now whilst the king was tender yeeres of ripe discretion, to surpe the gouernance of the realme into his owne hands, and so assembling together an huge companie of such as in hope of preie lightlie consented to his opinion, he came forwards, to make as it were a full conquest, sleaing and spoiling all such in his way as went about to resist him. But his presumptuous enterpryse was shortly repressed: for Gilcriff earle of Angus lieutenant of the kings armie, raised to resist Somerleids attempts, incountred with him in battell, & slew 2000 of his men. Somerleide hauing receiued this overthrow, and escaping from the field, fled into Ireland, and so saued his life.

Henrie the second of that name king of England, hearing that Malcolme had thus subdued his domesticall enemies, feared least he being imboldened therewith, should now attempt somewhat against the Englishmen; and therefore by counsell of his nobles, he sent an herald vnto king Malcolme, commanding him to come vp to London, there to do his homage vnto him, for the lands of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Huntington, in manner and forme as his grandfather king David had before done vnto his predecessor Henrie the first, with certificat, that if he failed, he would take from him all the said lands. King Malcolme obeyed this commandment of king Henrie: but yet vnder condition (as the Scottish writers affirme) that it should in no manner wise prejudice the franchises and liberties of the Scottish kingdome. At the same time king Henrie had warres against Lewes the first, king of France,

In all which enterprises he had Malcolme present with him, to the end that Malcolme might incurre such hatred and displeasure of the Frenchmen, that thereby the bond betwixt them and the Scots might finally be dissolved. But in the end king Henrie hauing lost diuers of his noble men by sicknesse, returned into England, and then licenced king Malcolme to returne home into Scotland; who at his comming home, sent the bishop of Purree, and one of his secretaries vnto the see of Rome, as ambassadoz vnto the pope, which as then hight Eugenius the third of that name, to recognise the obedience which he owght to the Romane see. Shortly after also, there was a parlement holden at Scone, where king Malcolme was soze rebuked by his lordz, in that he had bozne through his owne follie, armed against the Frenchmen their old confederate friends and ancient allies: but king Malcolme excused the matter with humble wordz, saying he came vniwarlike into king Henries hands, and therefore might not chose but accomplish his will and pleasure at that time; so that he supposed verelie the French king would take no great displeasure with his doings, when he once vnderstood the truth of the matter.

King Henrie hauing perfect vnderstanding of this grudge betwixt the Scottish lordz and their king, thought to renew the same with more displeasure, and thereupon sent for king Malcolme to come vnto Yorke, to a parlement which he held there, where at his comming he was burdened with a right grievous complaint furnished against him by king Henrie, for that he should reueale vnto the Frenchmen all the secrets of the English armie, when he was with him in France, at the aboue remembred iourne, alleging the same to be sufficient matter, for the which he ought to forfeit all the lands which he held of the crowne of England, as Cumberland, Northumberland, and Huntingdon. And though king Malcolme by manie substantiall reasons declared those allegations to be vnture and vniustlie forged, yet by king Henries earnest enforcing of the matter, sentence was given against him, by the generall consent of all the estates there in that parlement assembled. And moreover, to bring king Malcolme in further displeasure with the nobles, king Henrie gaue notice vnto them, before king Malcolme returned backe into his countrie, how he had of his owne accord renounced all his claime, right, title, and interest, which he had to the foresaid lands, supposing by this means to make king Malcolme farre more odious to all his lieges and subiects, than euer he was before.

Malcolme therefore, upon his returne into his countrie, not vnderstanding anie thing of that subtil contriued policie and slanderous report, was besieged within the castell of Bertha by the thane of Ceredale, and diuerse others. But after it was knowne how euill king Malcolme had bene used, and most vnturle slandered, they desired pardon of their offense, as induced thereto by vnture reports, which once being granted, they brake vp their siege, and euer after continued in faithfull allegiance like true and most obedient subiects. But king Malcolme soze moued for that he was thus iniuriouse handled by king Henrie, first desiring restitution to be made of all such things as had bene wrongfullie taken from him, and so detained by the Englishmen, proclaimed open warres against them. At length, after sundrie harmes done, as well on the one part as the other, they came to a communication in a certaine appointed place, not far from Carleill, where (to be brieft) it was finally concluded, that K. Malcolme should receiue againe Cumberland and Huntingdon: but for Northumberland, he should make a plaine release thereof vnto king Henrie, and to his successors for euer.

A conclusion of agreement

For the which agreement he ran so farre into the hatred of his people, that he might neuer after find means to win their fauor againe; but doubting least if they should stirre anie rebellion against him, they might become an easie preie vnto the Englishmen, they remained quiet for a time. Whobest shortly after, there arose another pece of trouble, though lesse in outward apperance, by reason of the small power remaining in the author, yet dangerous inough, considering it was within the realme it selfe. One Angus as then the thane of Galloway, perceiving he might not by secret practise atchieue his purposed intent (whatsoeuer the same was) determined by open force to assaie what luckie success fortune would send him; hoping that those which through feare late as yet still, would assist him in all his attempts, so soone as they saw anie commotion raised by him to occasion them thereto. Whereupon he assembled together a great companie: but before he could worke anie notable feat, to make anie account of, Gilcriff earle of Angus (whose faithfull valiance was before manifestlie approued in the suppression of Somersleids rebellion) discomfited his power, in three sundrie bickerings, & chased Angus himselfe into Whiterne, where is a place of sanctuarie privileged for the safegard of all offenders that flee thereto for succor in the honor of saint Martin.

Malcolme then, for that he durst not breake the franchises of that place, set a band of men of warre round about it, to watch that he should by no means escape awaie; so that at length wearied as it had bene with long siege, he yielded himselfe to the king, who taking his sonne to pledge for his good beaueing in time to come, licenced him to go whither it should please him: but the most part of his lands and liuings were confiscated to the kings vse. Whereupon when he saw he might not mainteine his estate as he had done before, he became a canon in Holie rood house, and there ended his life (as it is reported). It was not long after the pacifying of this trouble, but that a new rebellion was raised: for the Purree land men, by the prouocation of their capteine called Gildo, wasted with fire and sword the countreies of Rolfe, Botogewall, or Boudale, Spar, Carroch, Buchquhane, and the Hernes, in more cruell sort than anie forreine & most barbarous nation would haue done; inso much that when the king sent diuers of his seruants vnto them to vnderstand the cause of their rebellious doings, they slue those messengers, contrarie to the law of nations.

Hereupon the king himselfe, supposing that his presence was needfull to encourage his people after this overthrow, came with a farre greater power than he had sent forth before, with displayed banner, ouer the riuier of Speie, nere to the mouth whereof he fought with the enemies, and in the end (after soze and long fight continued with great slaughter and bloodshed) he gaue them the overthrow, and in reuenge of their cruelties shined in time of this their rebellion, and to giue example to all other his subiects that should go about to attempt the

In this meane time, Somerleith the thane of Ar-gile, who (as ye haue heard) was fled ouer into Ire-land, vpon trust of the hatred into the which Malcolme was run, with the most part of all his nobles and commons, through this slaughter of his people, and namelie of them of Murray land, he thought to assaie fortunes chance once againe, and so therevpon returned with certeine kernes and naked men into Scotland. But this last enterprise of his came to a more unluckie end than the first, for being banquished in battell at Kenfrow, he lost the most part of all his men, and was taken prisoner himselfe, and after hanged on a gibbet, by commandement of the king, according to that he had iustlie merited. Malcolme hauing thus subdued his aduersaries, and being now in rest and quiet, he set his mind whole to gouerne his realme in vpright iustice, and hauing two sisters marriable, he coupled the elder named Margaret with Conon duke of Britaine, and the younger called Adhama he married with Florens earle of Holland.

After this, there was a counsell holden at Scone of all the Scottish nobilitie, where when they were assembled together in the counsell-chamber, Arnold archbishop of saint Andrews stood vp, and by a vertie pithe oration, toke vpon him to aduise the king to change his purpose touching his bow, which (as appeared) he had made to liue chaff. He declared vnto him by manie weightie reasons, that it was not onlie necessarie for him and his realme, that he should take a wife (by whome he might raise vp seed to succeed him in the possession of the crowne) but also that he might not chuse a more perfect state of life (considering the office wherein he was placed) than matrimonie, being instituted, not by this law-maker or that, but by God himselfe, who in no one of all his ordinances might erre or be deceived. Againe for pleasure, he affirmed how nothing could be more delectable to him, than to haue a womanly ladie to his betfellow, with whome he might conferre all the conceits of his hart, both of grieve and gladnesse, she being a comfort vnto him as well in weale as in woo, an helpe both in sicknesse & health, reddie to allwaie anger, and to aduance mirth, also to refresh the spirits being wearied or in arte Wolfe faint through studious trauell and care of mind.

When shewd he that an aid children were vnto their parents, namelie to kings, how in peace they might gouerne vnder them, to the great commoditie of the common-weale, and in warre supplie their comes as lieutenants in defense of their countries, to the no small terroz of the enemies. Wherefore sith men are not borne onelie for their owne weale, but also for the profit of their friends, and commoditie of their countrie; it could not be chosen, but that he ought to persuaide with himselfe to alter his purposed intention, concerning the obseruance of chastitie, and to take a wife to the great ioy and comfort of his subjects, sith it was commendable both before God and man, and so necessarie withall and profitable, as nothing might be more. But these and manie other most weightie reasons could nothing moue his constant mind, hauing euen from his tender yeeres affianced his virginie vnto Christ, trusting that God would so provide, that the realme should not be destitute of conuenient heires, when the time came that it should please his diuine maiestie to take him hence to his mercie from amongst his subjects. Thus brake vp that counsell without anie effect of the purpose for the which it was called.

Shortlie after it chanced that king Malcolme fell sicke, continuing so a long time, by reason whereof he sought meanes to conclude a peace with Henrie king of England; which being brought to passe, he set workemen in hand to laie the foundation of saint Andrewes abbey, which afterwards bare the name of saint Andrewes. When he had finished this house, being a goodlie pace of work, and vertie collic, as may appere at this day by the view thereof, he assigned forth certeine rents for the sustentation of the canons, whome he placed there of the order of saint Augustine, not so largelie as serued for the maintenance of superfluous chere, but yet sufficient for their necessarie finding: by reason whereof, the canons of that abbey liued in those daies in most feruent deuotion, hauing no prouocations at all to inordinate lusts and sensuall pleasures; but onelie giuen to diuine contemplation, without respect to auarice, or enlarging the possessions and reuenues of their house. He founded also the abbey of Couper of the Cisterciens order, and indowed it with manie faire lands and wealthie possessions. Finally, being vbered with long infirmities, he departed out of this life at Jedburgh the 12 yeere of his reigne. A certeine comet or blazing starre appeared 14 daies together before his death, with long beames verie terrible to behold. His bodie was buried at Dunfermling, after the incarnation 1185 yeeres. In the daies of this Malcolme, Roger archbishop of Yorke, constituted the popes legat, could not be suffered to enter into Scotland, because he was a man highlie defamed for his couetous practising to enrich himselfe by unlawfull meanes.

After Malcolme succeeded his brother William, surnamed for his singular iustice, the Lion. Shortlie after his coronation, he sent ambassadores vnto Henrie king of England, requiring him, that according to iustice, he would restore vnto him the earledome of Northumberland, sith it appertained by god and lawfull interest vnto his inheritance. King Henrie answered the messengers, that if king William would come vnto London, and there do his homage for Cumberland and Huntingdon, he should be assured to haue all things so ordered, as he reasonable could with or demand. Wherevpon king William went into England, and so came to London, and after he had done his homage for Cumberland and Huntingdon, he required the restitution of Northumberland. But king Henrie made answer as then, that for so much as the same was annexed to the crowne, he might not without the assent of all the estates of his realme make restitution thereof. Notwithstanding, in the next parlement, he promised to cause the matter to be proponed: and if it came to passe that his demand were found to stand with reason, he would do therein according to conscience, when time expedient should serue thereto.

About the same season, king Henrie passed ouer into Normandie with an armie, and caused king William, with manie other nobles of Scotland, to go with him in that iourne. For king William would not disobey his commandement at that present, in hope to attaine in quiet and peaceable manner his sute touching the restitution of Northumberland (as the Scottish writers do affirme) but in the end, after he had continued a long time with king Henrie, and perceived no comfort to recouer his lands, he got licence with much ado to returne home: and so coming backe into England, passed through the realme with with his nobles into Scotland, where he applied his whole endeavour to vnderstand the state of the common-wealth of his subjects, and speciallie he took order in most diligent wise, to punish cruelties done by theues and robbers, which vndoubtedlie was one of the most profitable acts that he could deuise to accomplish at that present, considering the state of his realme, as it then stood. For if the damages & skathes committed by theues and robbers were equallie pondered with the hurts and hinderances which daily grow by open warre against anie foren nation, it may well appere, that more harme ariseth, & more heinous cruelties are exercised against the poore and miserable commons and innocent people, by such as liue by rapine & spoiling at home, than by anie outward enemies, be they neuer so fierce and strong in the field. And therefore the prudent consideration of this prince was no lesse to be commended, in that he sought to repress the licentious outrage of such arrand theues and priuie murderers, than if he had slain manie thousands of foren enemies.

When he had once cleared the realme of those misgoverned persons, he sent eiesones his ambassadors to king Henrie, requiring (as before) to haue Northumberland restored vnto him, with notice giuen, that if he might not haue it with fauour, he would at saie to recouer it by force. King Henrie perceiving that he must either satisfie king Williams request, either else haue open warres with the Scots, by aduise of his nobles, restored to king William so much of Northumberland as his grandfather King Malcolm had in possession. King William accepted the offer, but so, as he protested that he received not that part in full recompense of the whole which was due vnto him (so saie the Scottish writers) but so as his entier right might alwaies be saued as well to the residue as to that which was then restored. Within few yeeres after, king Henrie feeling what hinderance it was for him to forbear the commodities of those lands, which were thus deliuered vnto the Scottish kings use, repented him of that bargain: and therefore to find some occasion to recouer the same again, he procured his subjects that dwelled vpon the borders, to make forreies into the lands pertaining to the Scots, so to prouoke them to battell.

Complaint of these iniuries being brought vnto the warden of the Scottish borders, by such Scots as had lost such goods as were taken awaie by the Englishmen, he sent to demand restitution; but for so much as he could haue no towardlie answer, he got together a great number of men, the which entering into the English ground, did much hurt on eche side where they came. At the same time was king Henrie in France, and therefore the Englishmen thought it sufficient to defend themselves as well as they might without attempting anie notable enterprise in reuenge of the displeasures done by the Scots. Warrest was also at hand, and thereupon they ceased on either part from further inuasions, till the winter season, which passed also without anie exploit achieved, which to be remembred; sauing certaine small rodes made by the Scots into the English borders, as they saw occasion to serue thereto.

But in the summer next following, king William raised a mightie armie, and came with the same into Cumberland, the right wing of the which armie was led by Gilcriff, whose appoynded baliance often helued in the time of king Malcolm, had advanced him to marie with the kings sister. The left wing was assigned vnto the conduct of one Rowland the kings cosen, who was also lieutenant of the bordermen. The middle ward or battell the king himselfe led. The Englishmen, to the intent they might haue time and leasure to assemble their power, sent vnto king William, offering vnto him, not onlie large summes of monie; if he would returne backe with his armie without further inuasion, but also redresse of all maner of iniuries and wrongs, if anie such on their behalfe were to be proued. But king William for answer heretvnto declared, that he had not begun the warre for anie desire he had to monie; neither had he first giuen the occasion, as one that was ever willing to liue vpon his owne: so that if they could be contented to restore Northumberland being his rightfull heritage, he was not so desirous of bloud, but that he would glablie cease from all further attempts.

The Englishmen hauing receiued this answer, to the end they might protract the time in sending still to and fro, till they might espie some occasion to worke such feates as they had imagined, addressed forth other ambassadors vnto king William, with diuerse faire offers and golden promises. In the meane time, to take the Scottishmen at some aduantage, they conueie their whole power in the night season nere vnto the place where the same Scottishmen laie in campe, & diuiding themselves into two parts, the one was appointed to abide in the fields, till the sunne were vp, and then to helpe themselves to the enemies, to traine them forth to battell: the other companie was laid closelie in a ballie not farre off, to take the aduantage as they saw their time. In the morning about the rising of the sunne, those that were appointed to procure the skitmilch, approached so nere to the enemies campe, till they came euen with: in sight of them. The Scots amazed with the strangeness of the thing, for that they had not heard before of anie assemblie of the Englishmen, at the first were somewhat afraid: but anon encouraging one another, they boldlie issued forth vpon their enemies, who of purpose (at the first) made but weak resistance, and at length fled amaine, to the intent to cause the Scottishmen to breake their arrate of battell in pursuing them, which they did so egerlie, that they left their king but slenderlie garded with a small companie about him. Then the ambushment lieng in the ballie, brake forth vpon him, according to the order before appointed, and in the meane time, the other that fled cast themselves about, and manlie abode their enemies, so earnestlie laing it to their charge, that in fine they droue them backe, and constrained them to slee in good earnest, which they themselves had but onlie counterfeited to doe before.

King William perceiving his people thus discomfited, and himselfe inclosed on eche side amongst his enemies, after he had assaied to breake forth on some side from amongst them, when he saw his inuon could by no meanes preuaile, and that the enemies made onelie at him, he yelded himselfe. There was not much bloud spilled on either side at this bickering, for the one part in the beginning of the fraie (as ye haue heard) fleeing of set purpose to the place where their ambush laie, escaped without much hurt; and the other, scared by the breaking forth of the ambush, abode the hurt but a small while, returning immediatlie towards the king; and then perceiving they could do no good, they made the best shift they could eche man for himselfe, to escape the enemies hands. The king being thus taken of his enemies, was conueied to king Henrie ouer into Poyman die, where he was as then remaining. The yeere that king William was thus taken, was after the birth of our Sauour Christ 1174, and the ninth of king Williams reigne.

Northumberland, not ceasing till he came to Antwerp, where he staid for a time to haue had battell: but in the meane while the Englishmen laie close together without noise or appearance, in such wise that no Scottishman could haue understanding where they were. At length king William wearied with long tarieng thus at Antwerp, and seeing no entines to appeere, determined to worke some exploit yet before his returne, and thereupon sent forth the most part of all his armie abroad into the countrie, to forreie the same, keeping no great companie about him, till the returne of the other thus sent forth. Whereupon incontinentlie a great ambushment of Englishmen came vpon him with counterfeited Scottish ensignes, and were not once suspected for Englishmen, till the king was compassed in by them on eche side, and so finally taken and led awaie per anie Scottishman with thereof, saue a few which were left (as is said) with him for the time. In deed Wilhelmus Paruus, a canon sometime in the abbey of Wyndlesham in Northfolke, in that his booke which he writes of the Norman kings of England, affirms how there were not manie more than about thre score horsemen with king William, while he was thus taken; and that the Englishmen were not past foure hundred horsemen, which toke vpon them that enterpryse; whose captains (as he reciteth) were these: Robert de Stuteuill, Ranulfe de Glanuil, Bernard de Balliol, and diuerse other.

The same author writeth, that after the taking of the king, there rose a mutinie amongst the Scots: for whereas the Irish Scots bare a naturall grudge against the English Scots, yet whilest the king was present amongst them, they durst not utter their malicious intentions: but now that he was thus taken from them, so manie of the English Scots as fell into the hands of the Irish, paid dearlie for the bargain, being cruellie murdered and slaine: so that the residue were constrained to get them out of the waie into castles and towers, where they might be receiued. But now it is to be considered, that because there was no great slaughter made at the taking of king William, the warres notwithstanding continued betwixt England and Scotland: for the two before specified chieftains Gilcriff and Rowland stoutlie withstood the Englishmen, and beat them backe as they enterprised to enter into Cumberland. At length a peace was taken, during the time that king William remained in captiuitie: vnder these conditions, that Northumberland should continue vnder the dominion of the Englishmen, and Cumberland (with the earldome of Huntington) to remaine (as before) vnder the gouernance of the Scottishmen.

And in like manner it was covenanted and agreed, that all the prelates of Scotland, and their successors, should recognise their wanted subiection to the church of England, and do fealtie to the king of England, so manie of them as he should appoint. Moreover, the king of Scots should paie for his redemption one hundred thousand pounds sterling, the one halfe to be paid in hand: and for sure payment of the other halfe, the earldomes of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland should be deliuered vnto king Henrie in pledge or mortgage, till the time that the same summe was paid. And for the more suertie of these covenants, and that the Scots should moue no warre against the Englishmen, foure of the strongest castles within Scotland, that is to saie, Berwik, Edinburgh, Roxburgh, & Strueling, were deliuered into the Englishmens hands. These things being thus ordered the eight day of December 1175, & the king restored home, there followed a new stirre in Scotland, for Gilbert of Galloway, a right cruell and most mischievous person, purposing to conquer the crowne by force, made great slaughter of all them that withstood his desire. And because his brother reprooued his doings, he put out his eyes, and cut off his hands. Against this Gilbert was Gilcriff sent with an armie by the king. There was fought a fore battell betwixt them, for the most part of those that followed Gilberts commandement, were desperat fellows, such commonlie as for murder and other heinous crimes by them committed were in danger of the lawes, and therefore vpon hope of pardon desired a change; but yet in the end, Gilcriff with multitude won the field of them, and slue more in the chase than in the battell. Gilbert himselfe escaped and got ouer into the Ile of Man, and fled from thence into Ireland. Wilhelmus Paruus reporteth this matter somewhat otherwise, as thus: In the armie of king William (saith he) when he was taken nere vnto Antwerp, were two brethren, Gilbert and Wared, that were lords of Galloway, hauing there with them a great retinue of their countriemen. These were the sonnes of Fergusus, sometime lord of that prouince; after whose decess the king of Scots that is superiour lord thereof, diuided the countrie betwixt these two brethren. But Gilbert the eldest brother found himselfe much grieved to haue anie part of those lands (which were his fathers) giuen from him; yet doubting punishment at the kings hands, he durst not attempt anie thing against his brother, till it fortune the king to be taken. And then deliuered of the feare which had staied his mischievous purpose, he taketh his brother at vnwares, and cruellie murdered him, after no common maner; but rather martyred him in beaustie wise, so to satisfie the instinct of his diuillish nature. And immediatlie after inuading the vpper countries, he exerciseth great slaughter of men on each hand. But his brother had a sonne called Rowland, which prouing a valiant yong gentleman, boldlie resisted his vnles rage, with the assistance and aid of his fathers friends. And thus was Scotland brought into trouble (as Wilhelmus Paruus recozeth) till by the foresaid Gilcriff the murderer was expelled, as before is expessed. In the yeare following came Hugo cardinal of saint Angelo as legat from the pope into England, with authoritie to refozme the English churches, in such cases as were thought requisite; and after he had made an end there, to doe the like in Scotland.

Scotland. When he had therefore finished with England, he cited all the bishops of Scotland to appeare before him at a day prefixed at Porthampton. They came according to his appointment, and being assembled there in consistorie, he went about in most earnest wise to persuaue them to receiue the archbishop of Dork for their metropolitane. But one Gilbert a yong man, holobest singularie well learned, and for his holiness of life much commended (as Hector Boetius writeth) being sent of purpose by king William unto this conuocation, to foreshew that nothing were concluded in the same, preiudiciall to the ancient liberties and franchises of the realme of Scotland, did argue so stiffly to the contrarie, that the cardinall left off the pursute of such maner of matter, and brake vp that counsell without determination of anie thing to the purpose in that behalfe.

This Gilbert that thus defended the cause and liberties of the Scottish clergie, was afterwards made bishop of Cathnes, and finally after his departure out of this transitorie life, registred for his supposed perfect holiness of life among the number of saints. The chiefest cause that mooued the Sco-tish clergie to withhold their obedience from the primasie of Dork, was the dissention and continuall enmitie betwixt the two nations for superioritie in tempo-ral causes. The same yeare that this counsell was holden at Porthampton, sundrie wun-ders were seene in Albion. On the thirtieth day being the feast day of the natiuitie of saint John the Baptist, there fell such a storme of haile, that it killed manie sheepe and small cattell: people that were out of houses, and from vnder couert anie where abroad, were beaten to the earth with violence of that storme. The sunne in September about noontide was darkened for the space of two houres together, without anie eclipse or cause natural by interposition of clouds. In Dorkshire was such terrible thunder with strange lightening, that manie abbeyes and churches were consumed with the fire.

About this season, the abbey of Arbroth was built in most magnificent wise, and endowed with lands and reuenues in such ample sort, that few houses within the bounds of Albion might compare therewith. The church was dedicated in the yeare of Grace 1178, by king William, in honor of Thomas Becket archbishop of Cantuarburie, with whose (as is said) he had great familiaritie in time of his yong yeares. At the same time the abbey of Haddington was founded by Adhama the mother of king William, and shortly after she had built it, she died. Not long after, king William sent as ambassadoys John bishop of saint Andrews, and Reginald abbat of Ar-broth unto pope Alexander the third, to present unto him his obsequies, according as he thought stood with his duteie. The pope seeming to reioice thereat, sent shortly after unto the king a rose of gold, filled with balme, and certeine new priuileges concerning the libertie of the church of Scotland. At the same time Gilcriff, having his wife in suspicion of adulterie, droue hir out of doores, and afterwards strangled hir in a village called Panis, not past a mile from Dundee. The king for that she was his sister) toke such indignation therewith, that he seized upon all his lands and goods, purposing to haue put him to death if he might haue got him into his hands: but when he saw he could not be found, he proclaimed him traitor, and rased his castell (where in he had dwelled) quite to the ground, in such wise that vnneth remaineth anie token at this day where it stood. This Gilcriff had a brother that hight Bre-dus, who before this mischance had got the lands of Dgiltie: of whose house the house of the Dgilties toke their beginning, that after came to great authori-tie in the court, though at this time (though Gil-criffs offense) his whole familie was nere hand destroied. About this time also, the quene, king William his wife, deceased. A daughter which he had by hir, named Adhama, he gaue in marriage unto the earle of Laon: but he himselfe after the deceasse of this his first wife married Emengard, daughter to Richard vicount of Beaumont that was sonne to a daughter of king William the Conquerour. By this marriage and alliance, the peace was newlie confirmed betwixt England and Scotland, in such wise, that neither part might receiue anie rebels to the other, by means whereof Gilcriff, that before was fled into England, was constrained to returne into Scotland, disguised in poore weed, with two of his sonnes, and there passed forth his life a long time in great miserie amongst the woods and in out places, vnknewen to anie man that he was, by reason of his poore and simple habit. Somewhat before the aboue remembred marriage, Henrie king of England at the motion of Hugh bishop of Durham rendered by the castell of Edenburgh into k. William his hands.

About this time the Souldane named Saladine prospered hugely against the christians in the holie land, making such cruell slaughter of them, that to heare thereof, all christians hearts were moued to pittifull commiseration and dolorous teares: in so much that Henrie king of England desired to go thither with an armie to relieue the common necessities of the christians publicke weale, and had gone in deed, if he had not bene hindered by the conspira-cie of his sonne, whose latelie before he had caused to be crowned king, that went about to vnturpe the sole administration to himselfe now in his fathers life time. About the same time William went with an armie into Hesse, against Hakulzen and Hakbein, two captiues of the westerne Isles, which vsed upon occasion to passe ouer into Hesse, Cathnes and Murrey land, spoiling and wasting those countries; when they heard of anie power comming against them, they would straight returne to their ships, and repasse againe into the Isles. But at this time, the king had sent forth a nanie to burne all those vessels, wherein the robbers had passed ouer and had left at anchor, by reason whereof when they were inclosed in on euerie side by the king, and taken prisoners, they after had suffered death on the wheele, according to the maner of the ciuill law.

The king in his returne from this iourneie, came by the abbey of Abirbrothoke, to view the workes of that house, how it went forwards, commanding them that were ouersers and maisters of the workes to spare for no costs, but to bring it vp to perfection, and that with most magnificence. After his departure from thence, he toke the way toward Bertha, and by aduenture espied where Gilcriff was deli-uing vp turfes, together with his two sonnes. And though he knew not what they were, yet he mused to see two such goodlie yong men, as by resemblance they appeared to be, to be thus occupied in such to-ling and base labour. Incontinentlie herewith Gil-criff with his bald head came afore him, and falling downe on his knees at the kings feet, said: If there be anie mercie in thee (most ruthfull prince) for them that are brought through their offenses into extreme miserie, hauing suffered condigne punishment for the same; I beseech thee for the loue that Christ had to all sinfull people, not sparing to shed his most precious blood for their redemption, to haue some pittie & compassion on me, & these my poore & miserable sons, which with me haue suffered much griefe and pene-rie, not hauing deserued the same by anie crime by he is.

At the last, when king William had inquired of him what he was, and how it chanced he fell into such kind of miserie, the teares came so fast trickling from his eies, that of a long time he was not able to declare his owne name. At length being come to himselfe, he said: I am Gilcriff (noble prince) the most sorrowfull creature on earth, which (alas) put my hands in thy blood, and was therefore dishonoured of all my lands, and banished with these my two sonnes out of thy realme, whereupon we remained in England for a time, till through proclamation made against outlawes, I was constrained to come hither againe with my said sonnes, where we have lived by roots all the summer season, and now in the winter are glad to get our living with travell of hand thus in digging and delving of clods. Therefore if auncie ruth or pittie have place in thy heart, or that thine indignation be qualified, have mercie on our sorrowfull estate, and remit the offense, whereby thou maist not onelie purchase great honor, and fame by example of pittie, being highlie renowned for that vertue amongst all nations, but also win great merit afoze God, for shewing thy selfe the follower of Christ, the giuer of all mercie, grace, and peace.

The king taketh Gilcriff to his fauour, and reioyeth vnto him his lands.

Gilcriff's gift vnto the house of Abirborthoke.

Laws devised by king William against thages.

The king moued by these wordes, and remembering the good seruice which Gilcriff had imploied so oftentimes afoze in defense of the realme; and againe pitying his case, to consider from what degree of honor he was fallen into the deepest bottome of extreme miserie, he took him wholie to his fauour, and not onelie forgave him his former offenses, but also restored vnto him, and to his sonnes, all such lands as sometimes appertained vnto them, except so much as the king had already giuen vnto the abbey of Abirborthoke. Gilcriff euer after persevered in due obedience to his prince. And forsomuch as his eldest sonne deceased before him without heires, that his younger sonne, by reason of some impediment which he had, was vnmet for marriage, he gaue the most part of his lands after his owne deceasse vnto the said house of Abirborthoke. His younger sonne also, no lesse well affectionated towards the same house, gaue the residue of his lands therevnto. The father and both his sonnes are buried before the altar of S. Katharine within the church of this abbey, as the superscription of their tomes sheweth.

Though king William was earnestlie occupied in the aduancing forward of the building of Abirborthoke, yet did he not forget his dutie in the administration of his lawes; but diligentlie caused iustice to be executed, to the punishing of the wicked, and the rewarding of them that well deserved. He made also sundrie new lawes for the restraining of theues and oppressors of the people, so rigorous, that they might be in feare to heare him named. Furthermore, where as the church of Scotland was subiect to the church of Rome, he obtained of pope Clement the third of that name, letters of exemption for his clergie, whereby the church of Scotland (within the which were contained the bishops sees of saint Andrews, Glasco, Dunkeld, Dublaine, Bighne, Aberdeen, Murray, Ross, and Cathness) was declared exempt from all other foreign iurisdiccions, except onelie from that of the see of Rome, so as it might not be lawfull from thenceforth for any that was not of the realme of Scotland, to pronounce sentence of interdiction or excommunication, or otherwise to deale in iudgement of ecclesiasticall causes, except such one as the apostolike see of Rome should specially appoint, and send thither with legantine power. The date of the said bull or letters of exemption thus obtained was at the popes palace of Laterane, the third Ides of March, and first yeere of the said pope Clements government. Shortly after, to wit in the yeere 1198, died Henrie king of England, after whom succeeded his second sonne Richard: for Henrie his eldest sonne deceased before his father.

The death of Henrie king of England.

R. Richard.

King Richard, after his coronation, prepared him selfe to passe with an armie into the holie land, and therefore made peace with all his neighbors, that no trouble should follow to his realme by reason of his absence: and hereupon to keepe the Scots in friendship, rather by beneuolence than by feare, he rendered into their hands the castles of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Saterling: and moreover that part of Northumberland which his father had taken from king William when he took him prisoner. He also deliuered the earldomes of Huntingdon and Cumberland; but vnder condition, that all the castles and holds within them, should be in the keeping of his capitains and souldiers, such as he should appoint. He released to king William also the residue of such summes of monie as were due for the foure castles laid to gage, ten thousand pounds onelie excepted, which he receiued in hand at that present towards the charges of his iourne. When king William had thus receiued his lands and castles by surrendre, he made his brother Dauid earle of Huntingdon, who thereupon doing his homage vnto king Richard, according to the old ordinance devised by king Malcolm the first, went with him also in that voyage with five hundred Scottishmen, or rather five thousand (as the translator of Hector Boetius saith) if no fault be in the printer.

The castles of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Saterling rendered to king William.

Earle of Huntingdon, Scots with king Richard in the holie land.

As the christian armie laie at siege before the citie of Acres, otherwise called Acon, it chanced that one Oliuer a Scottishman borne, was within the towne retained in seruice among the Saracens; for being conuict of felonie in his native countrie he was banished out of the same, and fled to the Saracens, remaining so long amongst them, that he had learned their tongue verie perfectlie, so that as then few knew what countreman he was. It fortuned that this Oliuer had one of the gates in keeping, on that side the towne where was but a single wall, without trenches, or auncie other fortification. He happened by some good aduenture to espie amongst the watch of those that were of the retinue of Dauid earle of Huntingdon, one of his owne kinsmen named John Durward, with whom of long time before he had bene most familiarlie acquainted; and incontinentlie he called to the same Durward, desiring vnder assurance to talke with him. After certaine communication, for that this Oliuer had not as yett betterlie in his heart renounced the christian faith, he appointed with Durward to giue entrie at a certaine houre vnto earle Dauid, and to all the christian armie, vpon condition that earle Dauid would see him restored againe vnto his land and heritage in Scotland. The houre set, earle Dauid came with a great power of men to the gate before rehearsed, where he was suffered to enter according to appointment, and incontinentlie with great noise and clamour brake into the midst of the citie.

The siege of Acres. Oliuer a Scottishman.

John Durward.

Earle Dauid entered the citie Acon.

In the morning betimes, king Richard perceiving the citie thus wonne, entered the same, and shortly after wane a towre, which the Saracens for a while manfully defended. Thus was the citie of Acres wonne from the Saracens, chiefie by means of the Scottishmen. But now touching their returne from this voyage (for sith in other places more large mention is made of such exploits as were achieved therein, I passe ouer to make auncie longer discourse thereof in this place) ye shall vnderstand, that in that terrible tempest, in the which king Richards nauie was disperied in his comming homewards (as in the the historie of England is more at large expressed) the ship also that earle David was in, chanced to be thowne on land on the coasts of Aegypt, where being taken prisoner, and led into Alexandria, at length he was redeemed by certeine merchants of Venice, and first conueied unto Constantinople, and after unto Venice, where he was bought out & redeemed by the English merchants, and in the end suffered to depart home. At his comming into Flanders, he hired a vessell at Sluis, therewith to returne into Scotland; but being losed a little off from the shore, such a vehement tempest suddenlie arose, that drove him, not without great danger of life, nere to the coasts of Norwaie and Shetland.

Here in the midst of this extreame teopardie (as hath bene reported) after he had made a vow to build a church in the honor of the virgin Marie, if he might escape that danger of seas, he arrived at length in Laie water beside Dundee, not far from saint Nicholas chapell, without either rudder or tackle. The place where he arrived before that time hight Alectum, but he as then changed the name, and called it Dundee, which signifieth as though ye should say, The gift of God. When his brother the king heard that he was returned, supposing long time before that he had bene dead, he came spædilie unto Dundee to welcome him home, shewing himselfe most glad of his returne, insomuch that he caused publike processions to be celebrate through the realme, to give God thanks that had thus restored his brother home into his countrie. Earle David, according as he had vowed, builded a church in the field commonlie called the wheat field, and dedicating it in honor of the virgin Marie, made it a parish church. At a parlement also holden after this at Dundee, licence was granted unto him to build an abbie in that place if shuld please him within Scotland, and to indow it with lands and rents as he should thinke good. There were also manie priuileges granted the same time unto Dundee, which indure to this day.

Earle David not refusing the grant and beneuolence of the king his brother, builded an abbie called Lundozis, for monks of the order of saint Benedict. One thing there is much to be wondered at, as a strange singularitye. For whereas that house standeth in a ballie, inclosed on each side with wood and water, by reason whereof there is great abundance of adders; yet doth no man catch hurt by anie of them, insomuch that ye shall see yong children play and run vp and downe amongst a great number of them, without anie skath or hurt following unto them thereof. In this meane while, Richard king of England (who also in his returne out of the holie land was taken prisoner by the emperor of Almanis) was deliuered for a great summe of monie, and so returned into his countrie. King William hearing of king Richards returne into England, to congratulate the same, tooke his brother earle David with him, and came unto London, where, in token of ioy, that he had vnsuethlie conceived for his safe comming home, after all troubles and dangers which he had passed, he gaue vnto him two thousand markes sterling, for that he knew at what great charges he had bene, aswell for furnishing of his voiage, as also for redeeming of his libertie.

By these friendlie points of humanitie shewed, there followed great amitie and loue betwixt these two kings. But king William fell sicke in England, and as it often happeneth, such as were vniquiet persons, desirous to be deliuered of all feare of lawes, were straight way put in an vntreue beliese, that he was dead: and causing it to be bruted abrode, began to exercise all kind of misdeameanors by inuading the poze and simple people, with spoilings and slaughters in all parts. But after it was certeinlie knowne, that the king was not onelie aliue, but also recovered of his infirmitie, and comming homewards, those raskals and wicked rebels withdrew vnder the conduct of one Herald the thane of Cathnes, and erle of Dykenie, vnto the uttermost bounds of Scotland. Howbeit the king pursued them in such diligent and earnest maner, that he apprehended the most part of them in Cathnes, and commanded iustice to be done on them, in such wise, that mercie was not yet wanting: for such as were thought to be after a sort gilllesse, were pardoned, and the other punished, euerie one according to the measure of his offences.

But the principall leader of them, that is to say, the forrenamed Herald, for that time escaped into the westerne Isles, but shortly after, returning to Cathnes, he was taken and brought to the king, who caused his eies first to be put out, then gelded, and lastlie to be hanged on a paire of gallowes. Also all those of his linage that were men, were likewise gelded, that no succession shoulde follow of so wicked a seed. In the yere next insuing was more dearth felt in Scotland, than euer was heard of before: for a measure of barlie, in Scottissh called a boll, was sold for five crownes; and yet in the yere next following, accounting from the natiuitie of our Sautour 1199, was more plentifull abundance than euer had bene scene afore. The same yere king Williams wife Ermengard was deliuered of a yong sonne named Alexander. The same yere also died Richard king of England, & his brother John succeeded in his place. About thre yeres after this, was the foresaid Alexander the kings sonne created pynce of Scotland. And the same yere came a legat from the pope sent to B. William, presenting vnto him a sword, with a sheath whils of gold set full of rich pzetious stones. He presented vnto him also a hat or bonet, made in maner of a diademe of purple hue, in token (as it should meane) that he was defender of the church. Spanie indulgences and priuileges were granted at the same time by the pope, for the libertie of the church of Scotland. It was ordeined also the same time, that saturdaye should be kept as holidate from none for ward, and great punishment appointed for them that transgressed this ordinance, in doing anie bodilie worke from saturdaye at none, vntill mondaye in the morning.

After this, king William returned againe into England to do his homage vnto king John, for the lands of Cumberland, Huntington, and Roxthumberland. Immediatlie whereupon king John willed him to passe with him into France, to make warres against the Frenchmen. And because he refused so to do, king John made claime to all the foresaid lands as forfeited to the crowne of England, and caused a great bottie of gods to be fetched out of the same: so that open warres had immediatlie followed, if the English lordes had not compelled B. John to make restitution of all the goods so taken; because they thought it not expedient in anie wise to haue warres with the Scots at the same time, being already in trouble with the Frenchmen. In the winter following, the frost was so vehement, & continued so long, that till mid March, no plough might be put into the ground. Ale was frozen in such wise within houses, and cellers, that it was sold by weight. Such a great snow fell also therewith, that beafts died in manie places in great numbers. Moreover, from the Twelfth tide till Februarie, there was euerie day verie terrible earthquakes.

After the end of winter, king John hauing made an end of his warres with France, began to build a castell

After the decease of king William, his sonne Alexander the second of that name succeeded, and was crowned at Scone with all due solemnitie, which being finished, he went unto Ayr, to which there he remained 14 daies, in attending the fune- rall obsequies of his father, and commanded that no publike places nor great assemblies should be kept in that parte, to the intent the death of his father might be lamented through the whole realme. The king himselfe, and all his servants also, were clothed in mourning weed, during the space of one whole yeare. The first parliament which he called, was holden at Edinburgh, in the which he confirmed all the acts and ordinances devised by his father: and fur- ther appointed that all such as had borne offices under him should still enjoy the same. Patrick he com- manded that William Wood bishop of Dunblane should still continue lord chancellor, and Alan of Celloway high constable, which is an office of most honor & reputation next to the king, as be that hath power of life and death, if any man draw blood of another by violence with in two miles of the court.

When this parliament was ended, because the old quarre his mother determined to remaine, during the residue of his life, in the place where that holie woman quene Margarete sometime led her life, he gave unto her towards the maintenance of his estate, the castles & townes of Gascoigne, with the lands and possessions to the same be longing. He also appointed certaine sage and most graue personages, to be choosen such as iudges, which should be residernt in euery cite and good towne of his realme, for the hearing and due determining of all quarrels and matters in controuersie betwixt parreil and parreil. In this meane time great dissention rose betwixt John king of England, and his barons, by reason whereof great warres ensued, as in the English historie dooth appeare. The barons made lute both to the French king, & to the king of Scots for aid, so that at length it came the French kings seruice came out to support them, whereof when king Alexander was aduertised, he himself came with an armie through England into London, casting his shoulders by the waie to aduance from doing any hurt of damage to the people. By his comming things were parties quieted for a time, and shortly after that he had commended with Helmes touching sundrie affaires pertaining to both the realmes. They passed the seas withen twelfe ouer into France, leaving their powiers behind them to assist the English lords.

The French king advertised thereof, came dolours to Hollougne, where finding his son and king Alexander, he renewed the ancient bond of amitie betwixt France and Scotland, with the same Alexander, according to the covenants of the old league, with this addition, that neither prince should receive the enemies of the others realm, nor to marrie with any stranger, the one not making the other partie thence. These things being ratified, king Alexander and Lewis returned into England: Speciale thereupon, king Robert was, more through anguish of mind and melancholie, than by fever of any other natural disease. His son Edward, the third of that name, succeeded him. And in the same time had the pope ascended both Lewis, and king Alexander, with all those that favoured their cause against king John, which curie was pronounced in a general council, which was holden at Rome by pope Innocent, there being present four hundred and fiftie bishops, and eight hundred abbots. King Alexander after the decrees of said a council returned homeward, his death bearmie, though he might have passed quietly without any assistance by the waie, though means whereof he lost a certaine number of his men, being suddenly invaded by Irish Englishmen, as was then their time to take the Scots at some advantage, in straining abroad out of order: with which untimely King Alexander was so manned, that he spoiled and harried all the countries by the which he passed, till he was entred within the confines of his owne dominion.

Shortlie after, Cardinall Cuala came into England furnished with the popes authoritie, to denounce the excommunication about remembered, against E. liues and Alexander, with all their fautors, whereupon he accursed not onlie the foresaid persons, but also interdicted all the places where they came, inasmuch that in the end E. liues was constrained to buy an absolution with no small summes of monie. Of that auaricious cardinall Cuala: and after upon agreement also made with king Henrie, he returned into France. Not long after came in Henrie with an armie into Scotland, soe murthering the countrey: but so soon as he was aduertised that king Alexander had assembled all the power of his realme to giue him battell, he returned with all speed into England. The king of England had in his armie at the same time 12000 men of armes, vnto perfitie appointed and furnished with armes and beaues as was requisite, and the king of Scots but onlie five hundred. What of soldiers there were in the Scottish armie 60000 able personages well appointed, with axes, speares, and bowes, ready to doe and lye like their prince, constantlie blessing, that to lose this precious life here in his defense, was an assured waye to be saved in an other world.

After that king Henry was gone backe into England, king Alexander followed after him into fortherberland, where he overthrewe a great nombre of manie castles and strongth, which the Englishmen held. Then marching through the countrie unto Carlisle, he won that citie, and garnished it with his people. After this, laying siege unto Bergham castle, when he was continued at the same a certaine time, and perceived hein be left but his traucell, he left it, and returned home with great honor and triumph for his other arduous enterprises in that bounde. King Henry being once aduertised that king Alexander had broken up his campe, incontenentlie got together his people togither, and coming to Berwick, won both the towne and castell. After entering into Scotland, he burned and spoiled the countrie along by the sea coasts, till he came as farre as Haddington, putting all such to the sword as were found in the way; women, preests, and children cruelly executed. The assaile to have wonne the castell of Dunbar, notwithstanding his purpose thereto, he returned into England.

In the interim time, the ambitious poplar Grail, upon trust to purchase some large portion of manors in Scotland, put the same timber parcels of extremely dung, & namely be accounted king Alexander much terrible, for that he had invaded England, and as he alleged spoiled churches as well as private places. Their cruelties to enkindle the hearts of the Scottishmen much heated against the Englishmen, that the same was not like to have ended without the utter destruction and ruine of both their realms. Howbeit at length, by the diligent travail of the bishops of Dunelm and Salisbury, which came unto king Alexander to treat an agreement, a small peace was concluded, under these conditions. First it was agreed, that king Alexander should render the cite of Carlisle unto the Englishmen's hands, and king Henry the countie of Northumberland to the Scots. The whole borderland of Cumberland to remain unto king Alexander, with the one half halfe of Northumberland, to the Kierosse. And further, that king Alexander should be absolved of the censures of the church, which Gualo the cardinall had denounced against him.

Thus the two kings being accorded, the two foresaid bishops comming unto Bertouke, absolved king Alexander, and deliuered his realme of interdiction, by such authoritie as they had procured of the cardinall Gualo. But yet the same cardinall, not minding to depart with emptie hands, summoned all the prelats of Scotland to appeare before him at Bertouke, there to receiue their full absolution, to the intent by such means to trouble them, till they had disbursed to his vse some large portion of monie. Sunoie of them which loued quietnesse more than contention, satisfied his mind; but others refused utterlie so to do, taking great indignation that spirituall causes were thus dispatched for monie, and ecclesiasticall preferments bought and sold, no otherwise than secular possessions and prophane dignities. Incontinentlie thereupon Gualo cited them to Rome, supposing that rather than to take vpon them so long a iourne, they would haue compounded with him at his pleasure. Notwithstanding they being nothing in doubt thereof, went vnto Rome, and at their comming thither, made vnto the pope their complaint in most greuous manner, of the insufferable iniuries attempted in England and Scotland, by his most couetous legat the foresaid Gualo: by reason of which complaint, and of sundrie such letters & informations as daillie came out of England and Scotland, from other bishops & abbats, containing right greuous accusations, concerning the insatiable auarice of Gualo, the pope reuoked him home to Rome, to make answere in his presence vnto such matters as were laid to his charge.

At his returne thither, for so much as he was not able to discharge himselfe of such manifest crimes wherewith he was burdened, the pope condemned him in a great summe of monie, to be paid as a fine for his trespasses and transgressions. And those Scottish bishops, which were come for their absolution, were absolved by the pope, and suffered to depart in peace. In this meane time, Dauid earle of Huntingdon, brother to William late king of Scots, (of whome ye haue heard before how he went in the iourne made by the christian princes into the holie land) deceased, and was buried within an abbey in England. Henrie king of England, after he came to yeares of perfect discretion, shewed himselfe to be more desirous of peace than of warres. Whereupon at Berke there was a meeting appointed betwixt him and king Alexander, where mutuall alliance was accorded betwixt them on this wise. Jane the sister of king Henrie was promised to be giuen in marriage to king Alexander, and two sisters of king Alexanders were despoised vnto two great princes of the English nobilitie. These marriages were thus concluded in the yeare of our Lord, 1220.

In the yeare next following, came a legat into Scotland from pope Honorius, with bulls to gather a summe of monie towards the furnishing forth of an armie against the Turks or rather Saracens. This legat was a cardinall, and named Egidius, who hauing purchased no small quantitie of coine both of the cleargie and laitie of Scotland, spent the same in riot and outrageous insolencie, making his ercule at his returne to Rome, how it was taken from him by certeine Brigants and robbers. With in short while after, was an other legat with semblable commission sent into Scotland from the foresaid pope. But king Alexander, being aduertised of his comming, called a councell, in the which one of the bishops (as should seme) toke great indignation, to see how couetousnesse reigned in most shamefull wise amongst the Romish legats, and spake in maner as followeth.

Albeit sundrie considerations there are which might stay me from uttering such things as be most prejudiciall to the common-wealth, yet (most noble prince) when I consider thine humanitie, faith, and constancie, giuen to nothing more than to the defense and weale of thy true liege people, I cannot but (for the zeale I beare to common libertie) declare the truth. For sith all maner of tyrannie is intollerable, yea even that which is exercised by kings or princes descended by lineall succession to their rightfull heritage: much more is that tyrannie to be detested, which is exercised by men of vile and base linage. Therefore, if the sundrie and manifest wrongs done to vs these manie yeares now passed, had come by the popes themselves, the same might somewhat more sufferable haue bene borne: but sith naughtie & vile persons, of base birth and obscure linage, promoted to benefices and ecclesiasticall dignities onelie for their wicked and horrible vices, haue not onelie interdicted our realme, without lawfull commission; but haue also consumed in maintenance of their wanton and insolent vices, that monie which they gathered in our countrie by the popes authoritie, vnder colour of raising an armie to go against the Turks and Infidels; I am of this opinion, that their cursed auarice ought to haue no further place amongst faithfull people, speciallie amongst vs, whose simplicitie and humblenesse they haue in contempt. In the yeares passed, ye complained of the iniuries done by Gualo, when he had put your realme vnder the censure of interdicting, and the most part of your prelats vnder the curse; because they would not answer him with monie, according to his couetous demands, wherewith he might mainteine his outragious lusts. Which Gualo also (as should appeare) by most certeine coniectures, was of such a diuelish nature, that though he were sent to treat a concord betwixt the Englishmen and Scots; yet to satissie his auaritious desire, he ministred such occasion of warre betwixt them, that both the realmes (had not the matter bene sooner taken vp) were at a point to haue entered so far into malitious hatred the one against the other, that it was not like that anie peace would haue taken place, till the one or both had bene utterlie destroyed. But since these heinous and terrible deeds are manifest inough; to what end should I here remember them, sith the same cannot be done without your great griefe and displeasure? Moreover, after we were deliuered of this Gualo, hostile after cometh another, one shewing himselfe to come forth of the same thop; for in conuersation of life he was to be iudged no whit better, but rather worse: for after that he had got by amongst vs of this realme large summes of monie, vnder pretense of redeming the christian prisoners out of the Saracens hands, and wagging of new armies against them; he waisted the same monie in riotous lust and insolencie, feining, when it was gone, that it was bereft him by Brigants. Therefore sith we haue had experience, and are already sufficientlie taught by the doings of the two fore-remembered legats, to our heauie griefe and no small damages; we may be twofoldie reputed vniuste and berie soles in deed, if we now admit the third. For it is not to be thought, that this new legat shall vse the matter in anie better sort, than his fellows haue done before him. And herelike, if anie man shuld demand of me, what I thinke ought to be done in this matter, I do for my part protest, that neither this legat, nor anie other in times to come,

These words of this bishop (whatsoeuer he was) were liked so well of all the counsell, that the legat could not be receiued into the realme. After the breaking vp of this counsell, the marriage was consummat betwixt king Alexander and Ione, sister to Henrie king of England; also betwixt Hubert de Burgh high iustice of England, and Margaret sister to king Alexander, by reason of which marriages, the peace was confirmed with the Englishmen, and as it had bene sealed vp for a more full and certeine assurance. Shortly after followed ciuill warres in Scotland, by the motion of one Gillespie Wolfe, who hauing liued most licentiouslie in riotous outrage, at length arreared open warre against the king, and first slaing diuerse such of his companions as had kept him companie aforetime in his lewd misdemeanors, for that they refused now to sticke to him in this rebellious enterprise, he went with the residue that offered to take his part vnto the towne of Cnuernes, which he toke and burned, with diuerse other places being of the kings possessions, till at length John Cammin earle of Buchquhane coming against him with an armie deliuered to him by the king, pursued the said Gillespie in such earnest wife, that finally he toke him with two of his sons, and striking off all their three heads, sent the same to the king as a witnesse how he had sped.

This businesse being thus quieted, an other ensued after this maner: The men of Cathnes soze offended with their bishop named Adam, for that vpon refusal to pay their tithes he had accursed them, fell vpon him within his owne house, and first scourging him with rods, at length set fire vpon him and burnt him within his owne kitchen. Which act being reported to the king, as then sojourning at Edinburgh, he halloed forth with all speed to punish the offenders, not ceassing till he had taken foure hundred of them, all the which number he caused to be hanged; and for that he would haue no succession to come of such a wicked seed, he appointed all their sons to lose their stonies. The place where they were so gelded, is called euen to this day the stonie hill. The earle of Cathnes, for that he neither succoured the bishop in time of need, nor yet sought to punish the offenders that did this cruell deed, was depriued of his earldome, and the lands belonging to the same. The pope highlie commended king Alexander for this punishment taken of them, that had so cruellie murdered their bishop.

After this, king Alexander coming vnto Aberdeen, gaue manie large gifts and priuileges thereunto, although the same before this time intoted sundrie notable comodities and endowments giuen and confirmed by other kings his predecessors. The buis which were granted by sundrie popes concerning the liberties of the churches in Scotland, were committed by the king to the custodie of one Gilbert archdeacon of Murray, who succeeded next after the foresaid Adam in the see of Cathnesse. In the third yeare after, as king Alexander with his mother Grimingard were sitting at their banquet on the twelue day in Christmas, othertwise called Yule, the earle of Cathnes, hauing good opportunitie thereto, presented himselfe before the king, and besought him of grace and pardon for his passed offense. King

Alexander taking ruth & pittie of him, restored him (vpon his fine to be paid in maner as was agreed betwixt them) vnto all his former honors, lands and possessions. Wherefore the offense that was pardoned by man, was afterward punished by the iust iudgement (as some thought) of almightie God: for he was slaine as he lay in bed one night by his owne meniall seruants, whome he had roughlie intreated, as the same went. The house also wherein he was thus slaine, was likewise set on fire and burnt ouer him, that no man should haue suspicion of his slaughter, but that it might seme as though it had come by some sudden aduenture.

About this time, or somewhat before, there came into Scotland (sent by saint Dominicke) certeine blache friers, of which order the same Dominicke was the first author. These men that were first sent by him, liued according to his institution, more perfectlie than such as followed: for as it often happeneth, althings commonlie from a good beginning fall into worse estate, so that the successors of those men declined from all good religion, into most insolent abuses and misorders, and so continuing in vicious liuing the space of three hundred yeares, at length were perfectlie reformed into a better rule, by a frier named John Adamson, that proceeded doctor in the profession of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Aberdeen, at the same time that Hector Boetius the Scottish chronographer proceeded there in the same facultie. In the same maner, about the selfe same time, were sent into Scotland, as well as into all other parts of the christian world, friers minors, of saint Francis his order. Manie of them also after his decesse fell to dissolute liuing, keeping no such strict rules, as both he prescribed, and also obserued.

But now to returne to the residue of the historie. The Scottish people intioied peace a long time after the appeasing of the trouble in Cathnes, till time that Alane lord of Galloway and constable of Scotland departed out of this life; and for that he had diuided his lands before his death amongst his three daughters, his bastard sonne gathered an armie of 10000 men, in hope to attaine the possession of Galloway by force of armes; but at length, after he had wrought much scath in the countrie by his violent inuasion, he was slaine with foure thousand of those that toke his part, by the earle of March, and Walter Steward of Dunwald, which was sent against him with a power. The eldest daughter of the aboue mentioned Alane of Galloway, was giuen in marriage vnto Roger Quincie earle of Winchester, who after his father in lawes decesse, was made constable of Scotland, which office continued in the hands of his succession, till king Robert the second his daies; in whose time this Roger of Quincies posteritie was dispersed and ertinguished, for certeine offenses committed against the kings maiestie, and then afterwards the office of the constable was giuen to the Haies of Arroll. The second daughter of the foresaid Alane was married vnto John Balliol; & the third to the earle of Albemarle. Thus was the lordship of Galloway diuided into three, by reason whereof the inhabitants of that countrie, taking displeasure therewith, cleaued vnto the aboue mentioned bastard, till he was vanquished and slaine, as before ye haue heard. This trouble being appeased thus within the realme, & Alexander was aduertised of great dissension rising betwixt king Henrie of England and his nobles, and therefore to helpe towards an agreement betwixt them, he went to London with his wife quene Iane, and Isabel his sister. Thorough his earnest diligence, all the debates and quarrels were removed, and the parties thoroughlie accorded. Which being done, he married married Isabell his sister unto the earle of Hozfolke, and in the meane time his wife queene Jane deceaseth, without leauing anie issue behind hir, which chance caused the king his husband to returne with great grieve and lamentation into Scotland. In the yeare next following, which was after the incarnation 1239, king Alexander (because he had no succession begot of his bodie) married at Rockburgh the daughter of Ingelram lord of Conche, a virgin of excellent beantie named Marie, on whome he got a sonne named Alexander, which succeeded after his deceasse in the gouernement of the realme.

About the same time, John Cumyn earle of Angus, being sent in ambassage to Lewes the French king, died by the way. Also at Haddington was holden a roiall tournament, where knights and esquires advanced themselves by valiant prowesse to win hono: neuertheless the end of all that pleasure and pastime ended in sorrow. For Patrike Cumyn earle of Atholl was slaine within his lodging in the night, and the house set on fire and burned ouer him, to the intent no suspicion should rise, but that it happened by some euill misfortune, and negligence of fire. But yet was John Bissart, with Walter Bissart his uncle shewoble suspected for the matter, inasmuch that though no euident proffe could be had against him, yet were they banished the realme, and lost all their goods by confiscation to the kings vse. After these things were thus passed, a conuocation was called of the clergie at saint Johns towne. In the which were diuerse provinciall ordinances and statutes, made by consent of the king and nobles of the realme, which were obserued in the church of Scotland unto these late daies. About the same time also, one Somerleith thane of Argyle, the sonne of that Somerleith of whome ye haue heard before, following his fathers steps, rebelled against the king, forso indamaging by rodes & forages the parts bordering vpon the confines of his countrie of Argyle, till at length the earle of March brought him to the hynke of such extreme necessitie, that he was faine to yeld himselfe, with a cord about his necke in token of submission; and being so brought before the king, obtained pardon of his heinous offense.

In the same season, Henrie king of England, prouoked by the setting on of such seditious persons remaining in his court, as trusted by wars to aduance their priuat gaine (during which time law and iustice haue no place) began to build a castell in against Berwikke, in the same place where the other was begun afore by king Richard, which (as before is shewed) was rased and thowen downe by king William, by the articles of agrement with covenant that it should neuer be builded vp againe. This attempt of the Englishmen had ministred sufficient occasion of warre, if the nobles of England (considering that the building vp of this castell was contrarie to their bond and promised faith) had not staied the woike, and so thereupon that beginning of new trouble betwixt the English and Scottish nations for that present ceased.

In the yeare following came ambassadors forth of France into Scotland, declaring that H. Lewes was ready to passe forward on that iourne, which he had taken in hand to make into Jewrie, and therefore desired aid of king Alexander, to support him in those warres against Gods enemies. With these ambassadors were sent ouer into France, certeine chosen bands of men of warre under the leading of Patrike earle of March, David Lindseie of Glenelke, and Walter Stewart of Dundonald, three captains of great wisdom, and perfect experience in feats of chivalrie. The most part of all those Scottishmen, that thus went forth in that iourne, perished in Egypt either on the sword or by sicknesse, so that few or none of them returned home againe. From henceforth, king Alexander liued not long: but falling into a sore and grievous sicknesse within a certeine Ile called Carnere, not far distant from the coast of Argile, deceaseth in the same Ile shortly after, in the 51 yeare of his age, the 35 of his reigne, and of our redemption 1249, his bodie (according as he had commanded in his life time) was buried in Melroffe.

After that Alexander the second was thus dead and buried, his sonne Alexander the third of that name, not passing nine yeeres of age, was proclaimed king. There was no small adu on the daie of his coronation amongst the nobles, for that by reason of the obseruation of starres, it was indged to be an infortunate daie for him to receiue the diademe. And againe some held opinion, how he ought to be made knight first, before he were crowned; so that thus they were at strife together, in such earnest manner, that it was doubted, least this contention would haue bred some great inconuenience, had not the earle of Fife prevented the same, in causing vpon a sudden the crowne to be set vpon the kings head, being placed in the marble chaire, according to the custome, without regard to the ridiculous allegations of them that spake to the contrarie. When the solemnitie was ended, there came before him an Hillandman (for so they call such as inhabit the mountaine countreies of Scotland) who in a kind of meter of the Irish language, saluted him as king, thus: Bennach de re Albin Alexander, mak Alar, mak William, mak Henrie, mak David, and so forth (reciting in manner of a genealogie or pedigree, all the kings in order of whome he was descended, till he came vp to Cathelus the first beginner of the Scottish name & nation.) The words in English are as followeth: Haille king of Albine, Alexander the sonne of David, the sonne of Alex, the sonne of William, the sonne of Henrie, the sonne of David, and so forth as before. This Hilland Scot was highly rewarded by the king for his labour, according as was thought requisite.

In the second yeare of his reigne, king Alexander (or rather such as had the gouernement of the realme vnder him) assembled together all the prelates and barons of the realme at Dunfermling, and there ordeined to take vp the bones of his grand mother queene Margaret, which being done, he caused them to be put into a shute of silver, the 21 day of Iulie, and minding to place the same where it resteth at this present, as it was borne forth toward that place, when the bearers came against the sepulchre of hir husband king Malcolme, they were not able to remoue the reliques anie further, till by the counsell (as is said) of an aged man that was then & there present, they toke vp the bones of the same Malcolme also, and bare them forth with theirs to the place aforesaid, where they after rested in great veneration of the people. Such as were appointed gouernors (during the minority of king Alexander) doubting least the tender yeeres of their soueraine might embolden the enemies of the realme to attempt some inuasion, sent ambassadors unto Henrie king of England, requiring that the peace might be ratified anew with him and his people, and further to make a motion of mariage to be had betwixt king Alexander and a daughter of king Henries.

Shortly after, vpon this motion, both the kings met at Berke with a great number of lords, as well spirituall as temporall of both the realmes, where king Alexander (according to the promise before that time made) married the ladie Margaret daughter to the forenamed king Henrie, on saint Stephens day following.

in Christmaste, with all solemnitie and iollfull mirth that might be deuised. The charges whereof were borne partlie by king Henrie, & partlie by the archbishop, who in feasting those princes spent right liberallie. At length, king Alexander after he had solaced himselfe in the companie of his father in law king Henrie a certeine time, returned into Scotland with his new married wife. During the minority of h. Alexander, the realme of Scotland was gouerned in great prosperitie by the nobles: but after his comming to ripe age, he was informed of certeine extortions done by some of the pæres of his realme against the poore people, and thereupon determined to see redress therein. Amongst other there were accused of such transgression, the earles of Menteith, Atholl, and Buchquhane, with the lord of Strabogie, which were of one surname, that is to saie, of the Cumins. These being summoned to appeare before the iustices, with one Hugh Aberneth, and other of their complices, upon their contempt so to do, were proclaimed traitors, and as the Scottish men tearme it, put to the horne.

The foresaid lords moued with this displeasure, purposed to reuenge the same, and assembling their powers in secret wise, took the king at Rainroffe, and brought him into Striueling, where they kept him as captiue in ward a long time after. Although which aduenture much harme ensued, by reason of misdeed persons, that wrought manie oppressions against the people, in hope to escape the due punishment for their mischievous acts provided, sith the king who should haue sene iustice ministered, was holden in captiuitie by his presumptuous aduersaries. But of this matter ye maie see more in the English chronicles, about the 39 yere of Henrie the thirde. The house of the Cumins was in those daies of great power within the realme, both in multitude of offspring, riches, lands, possessions, and maintenance. There were at the same time to the number of 32 knights of that surname within the realme, all men of faire possessions and reuenues. But as it often happeneth, that men of great possessions and dominion are had in suspicion with the prince, whereby the same is for the more part the cause of their ruine and fall, speciallie when they presume too farre upon their high power: so it chanced here. For within a short time after that the king was thus taken (as before is shewed) the chiefe author of the whole conspi-racie, that is to saie, the lord Walter earle of Menteith, who was highest in authoritie among all those Cumins, was poisoned (as was thought) by his owne wife, through which mishance the residue of the Cumins were so exanimated, that obtaining their pardon, for all offenses passed of the king, they did set him againe at libertie.

This woman did thus make awaie hir husband the earle of Menteith through instigation of an Englishman called John Russell, as by coniectures it was suspected; namely, for that refusing to marrie with anie of the Scottish nobilitie, he took the said Russell to husband, though in estate to be compared with hers, he was iudged a match farre vnmeet, and thereupon constrained to lie with him into England, he died there in great miserie. About this time pope Urbane the fourth of that name instituted the feast of Corpus Christi, to be celebrated each yere on the thursday after Trinitie fundaie. The Carmelite friars came at this time into Scotland, and erected a chappell of our ladie without the walles of saint Johns towne, which the bishop of Donkeld appointed them, therein to celebrate their seruice. It was also said, that in this season a monke of Melrose was admonished in a dreame, where he should find a part of the holie crosse, not far from Deplis in Louthian, inclosed in a case ingrauen with the title of S. Nicholas. And not farre from the same was likewise found a stone chest, right cunninglie wrought and ingrauen, wherein were found certeine bones wrapped in silke, but whose bones the same were it was not knowne. As sone as the case was opened, within the which the crosse was included, manie miracles were wrought (as it was then beleued,) king Alexander for deuotion hereof, builded an abbey in honor of the holie crosse, in the same place where that peece of the crosse was so found. In this abbey afterwards there were monks inhabiting of the order of the Trinitie.

Not long after, the two kings of England and Scotland met together at Warke castell, accompanied with a great number of the nobles and gentlemen of both their realmes, for the redress of certeine misorders committed betwixt the borderers. Such reformation also was here deuised, and recompense made on either side, that both the realmes continued afterwards in more perfect tranquillitie for a certeine space, than euer was sene in anie kings daies before that time. In this season was the church of Glasco finished in that perfection as it stands to be sene at this day, right sumptuously builded, for the most part at the charges of William bishop of that see, who liued not long after the finishing of the said worke. In the yere following, which was the yere after the birth of our Saviour 1263, there fell a great dearth through both the realmes of England and Scotland, by reason of the wet harvest preceeding, so that the corne and graine was quite marred and corrupted before it could be got beside the ground.

Acho king of Norwaie, being informed how the Scots were thus oppressed with famine and other miseries, by report of them that made the same more than it was in deed, supposed to find time and occasion fit for his purpose, to subdue them whole to his dominion. Hereupon, preparing an armie and a fleet of ships conuenient for such an enterpryse, he landed with the same in the weserne Isles, on Lamas day other wise called Petri ad Vincula. Whose Isles continued under subiection of the Norwegians and Danes, from king Edgars time vnto the daies of this Acho. From thence the said Acho with a mightie power of his Danes and Norwegians came ouer into Aran and Bute, which are two Isles, and onelic at that time amongst all the residue were under the dominion of Scots. But Acho hauing quicklie subdued them at his pleasure, in hope of more prosperous successe, transported his whole armie ouer into Albion, and landed with the same on the next coasts, where after he had besieged the castell of Aire a certeine time, he took the same, and began to waste and spoile all the countrie thereabouts.

King Alexander being soze affonied with these newes, for that he was yong, and not able (as it was doubted) to resist the force of his enemies, imboldened upon such frequent victories as they had attained, thought best to prolong the time by colour of some treatie for a peace, that waie to diminish the enemies force, by long sojourn in campe without trial of anie battell. Whereupon were ambassadores sent vnto Acho, of the which one amongst them appointed thereto, being well languaged and wise, at their first comming before him spake in this manner.

Where it not that our king & nobles of the realme (by an ancient custome obserued euen from the beginning) doe be first to seeke redress of all iniuries received, before they offer to be reuenged with the sword; ye should not now behold oratores sent vnto you to talke of concozd, but a mightie armie in ordi-

The cause of Achos com.

“ nance of battell comming towards you to giue the onset. We are of that opinion, that we neuer get so much gaine by victorie of the enimies, no though they haue robbed and spoiled our confines, but that we account it much better to haue peace, if we may haue restitution of wrongs done to vs, by some manner of honest meanes. For what greater follie may be, than to seeke for that by fier and sword, which may be purchased with faire and quiet words: Neuertheless, when our iust desires and reasonable motions are refused of the enimies, when we find them not willing to haue peace (for the obtaining whereof all warres ought to be taken in hand) but rather that their onelie seeking is to haue warres, not respecting the quartell: we are ready to rise whole together in reuenge of such contempts with all possible speed and violence against our aduersaries. We are sent therefore from our king and soueraine, to inquire what occasion you haue thus to invade his realme and subiects, in violating that peace and league, which hath bene obserued and kept betwixt vs and your nation, the space of this hundred yeres, and not onelie to take from him his two Isles of Bute and Aran, but also to invade the maine land of his dominions, with such crueltie, as neither consideration of age or person seemeth to be had; but that women, children, and feeble old persons haue passed by the sword, as well as those that haue stood at resistance with weapons in hand against you. What heinous offense haue the Scottis men at anie time committed either against you or anie other (whose reuengers ye may seeme to be) that they should deserue to haue such crueltie shewed against them? What furious ire hath moued you to burne the churches of God and his saints, with the murther of his people that flee into the same for safegard of their liues: But if you dread not God that governeth all things (by his diuine providence) which here in this world we see; if ye dread not the saints nor vengeance to come on you by the punishment of the righteous God: ye ought yet to dread the two most puissant kings of Albion, alied together in bond of amitie and marriage, which shall come against you with such puissance, that ye shall not be able to resist the same. Therefore sith ye may depart with honor, we on the behalfe of him from whome we are sent, do admonish you, that better it is for you to redresse such iniuries as ye haue already done, and therewith to repaire home, than to adventure to be brought unto such desperate ends, that when ye shall be constrained to seeke for mercie, the same in no wise will be granted unto you. These words were spoken by the ambassadors, upon purpose to put some terror into the hart of this hardie king Achos.

“ Neuertheless he was abashed so little therewith, that he answered them in this manner. Your beliefe is (I perceiue) ye ambassadors, to abash vs with your fierce and awfull words, supposing vs so weake harted, that we should leave off our enterprize through your menacing threats: but ye are farre deceived suerlie if your imagination be such. And where ye exaggerate our iniuries done to you in taking from you certaine Isles, we perceiue you are not met nor indifferent persons to be chosen for iudges in that cause, neither do we mind to learne of you, what we ought to esteeme right or wrong in such behalfe. If ye desire further to know and vnderstand the cause why we haue invaded Aran and Bute, we saie and asseuerme, that not onelie those two Isles pertaine to vs and our people by god title and ancient right of inheritance, but also all the other Isles of Scotland, as we are able by firme euidences sufficiently to proue. And therefore are we now come to take presentlie so much in value out of Scotland, as ye haue taken in

Isles and profits out of those Isles in thine past from vs. Shew then to your king, that we feare neither his menacing words, nor yet anie other violence that he can shew against vs. Notwithstanding, if he be more desirous of peace than of battell, and lusteth to avoid the spoiling and burning of his townes, and slaughter of his people; or if he desired not to see the utter extermination of his realme afore his eyes, command him to send vnto vs forthwith ten thousand marks sterling for the fruits of our lands taken by and receiued by him and his elders in times past, and further that he make a cleare resignation of all claime or title that he may seeme to pretend vnto the said Isles, in such sort that the same may passe vnder our dominion in perpetuitie without anie contradiction.

When king Alexander had heard what the answer of his enimie was, he was therewith so moued, & perceiving no waie to eschue the battell, but that he should be constrained to trie fortunes chance, he assembled together an armie of forty thousand men, that though he were not able to match his enimies in prowesse, he might yet passe them in number. He diuided his host into three battells. In the right wing was Alexander Stewart, a very valiant knight, nephew to that Alexander which indoued the abbie of Paislie. He had with him all the men that came forth of Argile, Leuenor, Atholl, and Galloway. In the left wing was Patrike Dunbar, hauing with him the men of Louthian, Fife, Fers, Berwick, and Striuelinghire. In the middle ward was the king himselfe, with all the remnant people of the other parts of Scotland, to succour the wings when danger appeared. These battells were ordered in such arrate, that euerie band had a capteine assigned to them of their owne language, to exhort them to manhood, thereby to win praise and honor.

At his entring into the confines of Conningham, where he came first within sight of his enimies, he called his people together, and exhorted them to do their dutifull indeuors like hardie and valiant men, against those enimies that invaded their countrie without anie iust cause or title of warre, and to put their trust in almighty God, desiring him to grant victorie vnto that part, which had most right and iustest cause of battell. He further shewed how necessarie it was for them to behaue themselves valiantlie, and how much it stood them in hand to fight with manlie courages, in defense of their townes, children, liberties, and lands, hauing no hope of suertie of life but in the valiant vsing of their able hands, so that their whole safegard rested in this point, either to vanquish their enimies with manhood, or else to liue in seruile bondage as their slaues and miserable thralls, and to suffer their townes and daughters to be abused at their lust and pleasure. He willed them therefore to consider, that not onelie he, but all Scotland should see them fight that day, noting both their manhood & cowardise. But sith their cause was iust, and moued onlie in defense of their native countrie and ancient liberties, he trusted they would shew the more hardinesse and courage, namelie against them that sought onelie bloud and spoile. These words with other the like words king Alexander uttered with bold spirit, to encourage his people. And on the other part king Achos likewise thought it expedient to vse some exhortation vnto his armie, that they should not be afraid of the great number and huge multitude of the Scots.

The chiefe point to encourage them to do valiantlie, he supposed was the hope of spoile, and therefore he put them in remembrance, how by victorie not onelie all such riches as the Scots had brought thither with them (which could not be small) but also all the whole substance and treasure of the realme to be at their commandment, yea and the realme it selfe, if they minded to inioy it: so that this was the day which they had so much desired, wherein sufficient opportunity was offered to shew what reward should follow to ech man for his good and valiant service. But for that high enterprises and famous exploits might neuer be achieved without extreme cowardie, it behoued them to attaine to these so great commodities by perishing thorough, and overthrowing by dint of sword the arraied battels of their enemies, which how easie a matter it should be for them to bring to passe, such as well considered the circumstances, might soon coniecture. For through dearth and famine which so long hath reigned amongst the Scottish people, their bodies and forces (saith he) are so wonderfullie inflebled, that they appeere to represent rather shadowes than full personages of men able to make resistance.

Again, in consideration how necessarie it was for euery man to fight without fainting, sith they were inuironed on ech part without meane to escape, he desired them, that if it to fell out, that they should chance to be overcome (which as he trusted should not come to passe) that in such misadventure they would yet sell their liues dearelie, and not to die vnreuered. Thus hauing opened vnto them what prosperous hap followed by victorie, and what danger by the overthrow, he thought to haue sufficientlie instructed them to put all feare aside, and to do what lay in their uttermost forces to vanquish the enemies.

The kings on either side, hauing thus exhorted their people to do their deuours, they arraie their battels. Acho disposed all his best souldiers and whole force of his armie in the middle ward, for that he had knowledge how the Scottish king was placed in the middle battell of his people: wherefore he supposed, that if he might overthrow and vanquish that part where the king stood, he should easilie then put the residue to flight. His wings (because he had not number sufficient to furnish them fullie) were arraied more weakelie in slender and thin ranks: but yet at the first encounter there was a terrible fight betwixt them, especially where the two kings fought: for they pressed still with great violence on that part where they saw anie danger, not ceasing to exhort & encourage their men to stand to the bargain with manlie stomachs, so that on either side these two kings played the parts of verie valiant capteins.

Acho with a band of verie hardie souldiers assailed sundrie times to perse and disorder the battell where king Alexander fought: notwithstanding he had so great number of people there with him, that he sufficed even the ranks with fresh men where he saw it needfull. Also betwixt the wings, there was no lesse crueltie shewed on either side in the beginning of the battell, till at length the Norwegians, perceiving themselves overpressed with multitude, and compassed in on euery side, did somewhat begin to shrinke, and first those in the left wing, constrained to breake their order, fell to running awaie. Alexander Steward therfore, that had the leading of the right wing of the Scots, hauing pursued the enemies a certaine space, and slaine Achos nephue, a man of high reputation and authoritie amongst the Norwegians, caused the retreat to be sounded, and gathering his men againe into arraie, brought them against the enemies of the middle ward, where was hard hold betwixt the two kings, the battell continuing with great slaughter on both parts, and vncertaine a long while to whether part the victorie would incline: but the Norwegians being now assailed on the backs by a new power of their enemies, at length they began to flie amaine.

In the meane time, the left wing of the Scots, whereof one Patrike had the leading, was in great danger, by reason the capteine himselfe was fore wounded, and thereby all the companies in the same wing fore discomfited: but after they once beheld how the middle ward of their enemies was put to flight, they recovered new courages, and with great force caused their aduersaries, with whom they were matched, to giue backe also: and so were the Danes and Norwegians chased by the Scots, with verie cruell slaughter thorough all Cunningham, not ceasing from the pursute of the enemies, till night made an end of that daies worke. King Acho with a few other escaped out of danger, and comming to the castell of Aire, which (as ye haue heard) he had wonne before, he was there informed of an other losse which he had sustained: for his fleet containing the number of an hundred and fiftie ships, were so beaten with an outrageous tempest, that there were not past foure of all that number saued, the residue being drowned and broken against the rocks and cliffes. The mariners also, being constrained to come on land for safeguard of their liues, were slaine by the people of the countrie, so that few of them or none at all escaped.

Acho being thus abashed with these two unfortunate mishances, aswell for the losse and discomfiture of his armie by land, as for the perishing of his naue on the seas, got him vnto those foure ships that were saued, and sailed with them about the coast, till he arrived in Orkneie. In this battell, which was fought at Llargis on the third day of August, in the yere 1263, there were slaine of Danes and Norwegians 24 thousand, and of Scots about five thousand. Thus saith Hector Boetius. But Fourdon saith not to agree altogether herewith, who writing of this inuasion made by the Norwegians into Scotland, saith, that they were but twentie thousand men of warre in all, imbarcked in foure score ships, which comming to the new castell of Aran, besieged as well the said castell of Aran, as the castell of Bute, and took them both, spoiling also the churches alongst the sea coast, and after arriving at Llargis in Cunningham, on the feast of the natiuitie of our ladie, lost the most part of their vessels, which were drowned together with thousands of men in the same. The residue that got to land, incountring with the Scots led by Alexander Steward of Dondonald, were discomfited, put to flight, chased & drowned in the sea, into the which they were driven. Amongst other that were slaine, a nephue of king Acho was one, a yong gentleman of great valencie, and sore lamented of his uncle. Acho had much ado to escape himselfe, he was so egerlie pursued of his enemies.

Thus haue I thought good to shew the diuersitie of writers in this behalfe, that it may appeere how things are sometimes amplified by Boetius, to aduance the glorie of his countrymen, further perhaps than by the simple veritie of those that did write before him, may in some points be well auerred. But now to proceed. King Acho at his comming into Orkneie, sent into Norwate and Denmarke for a new armie, providing ships & all other things necessarie, to haue made a new inuasion into Scotland against the next spring: but for that he himselfe departed out of this life in the beginning of the yere next following, all that purueiance and great preparation was dashed, and came to none effect. The same day that Acho deceased, that is to saie, the 21 day of Ianuarie, Alexander prince of Scotland, the eldest son of king Alexander, whom he begot on his liue quene Margaret, the sister of Henrie king of England, was borne, to the great reioysing of the people. Acho prepared to make a new inuasion into Scotland, but died before his preparation was ready. Alexander prince of Scotland, the eldest son of the king is borne.

ne the hereof, because that both a new prince was borne, and that enemie dead which fought the destruction of the whole realme. After the decess of king Aho, his sonne Magnus succeeded him, a verie faithful prince, and one that had the feare of God before his eyes.

In the second yere of his reigne, he sent his ambassadoys (of whom the chiefe was the chancelor of Norway) unto king Alexander, whom they found at saint Johns towne, and there signified unto him, that king Magnus their maister would willingly give ouer all his title, right, and claime unto Aran and Bute, so that the residue of the Isles might remaine in quiet possession of him and his successors in time comming. Hereunto was answer made by king Alexander, that the Isles by right of old inheritance pertained unto him and his progenitors kings of Scotland, and therefore he might not make anie agreement with the Danes or Norwegians, till he had recovered the full possession of the same Isles.

The ambassadoys being dispatched and sent abacke with this answer, incontinentlie Alexander Steward of Walsleie, and John Cumin were sent with an armie ouer into Aran, which Ile they then recovered (though not without blood) from the hands of the Danes and Norwegians, who had kept the same in possession now for the space of 167 yeres passed, but not without some alteration and trouble, as may appere by the annales of Richard Southwell, a writer (as should seme) well instructed in matters as well touching Scotland, and the north parts, as also concerning the state of the out Isles. And therefore that the same may the better appere to the readers, I haue thought it not impertinent to set downe what I haue read in the same Southwell, touching the kings, or rather viceroies of Aran, and those Isles which for a season (as should seme in deed) were substituted by the kings of Norway, though it may also appere, that sometime there was a certaine succession in them, as from the father to the sonne, & from the brother to the brother, &c. in manner as if it had bene by waie of inheritance.

In the daies of king John therefore (as saith the foresaid Southwell) one Godfred reigned as king in Aran. And in the yere 1228, one Reginald being king of those Isles, was murdered by wicked persons, & then his brother Olave reigned in his place. In the yere 1230, the king of Norway appointed one Husbac, the sonne of Simund (surnamed Hascun) to gouerne the said Isles called Sodorrenes, that is to say, the Ile of Aran, & the other Isles thereabouts the coasts of Scotland; the which Husbac, together with two other capitaines Olave and Godfred, surnamed Don, came by sea, and arrived at Bute, where they wane the castell: but Husbac was slaine with a stone that was throwne downe upon him. And then after this, the foresaid Olave and Godfred came unto the Ile of Aran, where they diuided the kingdome of the Isles betwixt them, so as Olave had Aran allotted to him for his part, and Godfred the other Isles. But after that Godfred was also slaine, Olave gouerned both in Aran, and in all the other Isles (those excepted which the sonnes of Somerleis held in possession.) In the yere 1237, in the moneth of Maie, Alane king of Aran, the sonne of Godfred, & brother to Reginald, departed this life, after whose decess his sonne Harold succeeded him, and reigned 12 yeres, being but 14 yeres of age when he began his reigne.

In the yere 1247, Vasco king of Norway sent for Harold king of Aran to come unto his coronation, who comming thither, was honorablie receiued, and obtained king Vasos daughter in marriage: but as he returned from thence, in the yere 1249, together with his wife, they perished in the seas by a tempest on the coasts of Ireland. Then succeeded his brother Reginald, who reigned but 27 daies, for he was slaine the first of June the same yere, by the seruants of a knight called Vuarus. Then Harold the sonne of Godfred Don gouerned Aran one yere, being removed by the king of Norway: & after him Magnus the sonne of Olave began his reigne ouer Aran & the other Isles, by consent of the thanemen themselves. But in the yere 1254, one Vuarus was ordeined king, or rather viceroi of those Isles, & gouerned the same, till the foresaid Magnus king of Norway resigned his title to all the said Isles unto king Alexander (as ye haue heard) who placed his lieutenants there, of whom the first was called Godfred mac Hares, the second Alane. And after him Maurice Dharfaire succeeded; and then followed one that was the kings chaplaine.

For the time of the resignation made, I followe Hector Boetius, by reason of some contrarietie which appeareth in Southwell in the account of the yeres assigned to the reignes of those Island kings, if you confer the same with the time of the foresaid resignation. But now to the matter. The lieutenant appointed to haue the rule of those Isles, now that they were thus come into the hands of the Scots, was bound by his office to be readie with thirtene ships, and five hundred mariners to come to the aid of the Scots, at all times when he should thereto be required. After this, were the earles of Atholl, Carrlike, and March, Alexander Steward, with the thanes of Argile, and Lennox, sent with a puissant armie unto the other of the weserne Isles, the which those that were greatest, they brought with much adoe vnder the obedience of the crowne of Scotland, the residue submitted themselves.

Magnus king of Norway informed hercof, sent thither his chancelor in ambassage unto king Alexander, to trie if he might by treatie recover againe those Isles: and if he might not bying that to passe, yet to compound with him for a yerie tribute. The first motion of the chancelor would in no wise be heard, therefore surceasing to spend anie longer time about it, they fell in communication touching the second, which toke effect at length in this wise. King Magnus by his letters vnder his great seale, renounced and gaue ouer his right or claime that he had or might haue, both for him and his successors to all the Isles of Scotland. And king Alexander for this resignation was agreed to paie the said king of Norway, foure thousand marks sterling, together with a pension or tribute of an hundred marks by yere. And for the more confirmation of loue and amitie betwixt the two kings and their people, Margaret the daughter of king Alexander, being not past one yere of age, was promised in marriage unto Hanigo, the sonne of king Magnus, the same marriage to be consummated when he came to yeres mariable. Further, in place where the greatest slaughter of Danes and Norwegians had bene made, it was couenanted that an hospitall should be erected & founded there, for the sustentation of poore folks.

About this season, there were great warres in England betwixt king Henrie and his barons, of whom the chiefe was Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester, and diuerse other. King Henrie being not well able to withstand his aduersaries attempts, requested king Alexander to send him some aid of Scots to subdue the rebels of his realme, that had arreared warres against him. Hereupon shortly after, was Alexander Cumin, with five thousand chosen men, sent by king Alexander into England, who right valiantlie bare themselves in that war which king Henrie held against his barons, whereof in the English chronicle ye may read more at large. In these daies (as the translator of Hector Boetius hath written) that notable and most famous outlaw Robin Hood lived, with his fellow little John, of whom are many fables and merie tests devised and song amongst the vulgar people. But John Maior writeth that they lived (as he doth gesse) in the daies of king Richard the first king of England, 1198.

In the yeare next and immediatlie following, after that Henrie king of England had subdued his domesticall enemies, there came a legat from pope Clement the fourth, requiring him to haue a collection of monie in Scotland towards the charges of leueng an armie against the Saracens. But this legat was not receiued into the realme, but commanded to shew his message vpon the borders. He demanded therfore of euerie parish-church in Scotland foure marks sterling, and of euerie abbey foure scope marks. And to the end he might the sooner purchase fauor to the furtherance of his purpose, he deuised by the way certeine statutes and ordinances right profitable to be vsed in the realme of Scotland, as he iudged. But king Alexander for answer hereunto alledged, that the Scots minded not to receiue anie statutes or decrees, other than such as were ordeined by the pope, or some generall councill: for by a generall rule; The more precepts, the more offendours are alwaies found. And as touching the request made for the collection of so great summes of monie, it was not thought necessarie, that so much coine should go forth of the realme: neuer thelesse if it were thought expedient, he would be contented to send forth at his owne proper costs and charges, a number of armed men to go with the christian armie against the Turks: but for monie otherwise forth, the realme would not depart with anie, least it should be wastfullie spent, or taken by the way of theues, as it had bene aforesaid.

Henrie king of England passed much the wiser done of king Alexander for this his answer, as he declared shortly after by his sonne prince Edward, who came to visit his suster the queene, and his brother in law king Alexander at Roxburgh, where they met him; for ye must vnderstand that king Henrie had also learned by experience to be wise in that behalfe, as well as others. King Alexander yet after this sent vnto the pope a thousand marks in silver: and vnto the French king, that required his aid in that iourne which he made into Affrike against the Saracens there, a thousand souldiers, vnder the leading of the earles of Carrike & Atholl, John Stewart brother of Alexander Stewart, Alexander Cummin, Robert Beth, George Durward, John Quincie, & William Gordon. All these going ouer with king Lewis into Affrike, died there, either vpon the enemies sword, or by the intemperat heat of that countrie (whereunto they had not bene accustomed) in the yeare after the incarnation 1270. The earle of Carrike, whose name was Thomas, perishing thus amongst the residue in Affrike, left no inheritor behind him to inuoy his lands, sauing a daughter named Martha, being then about fifteene yeares of age. This yong ladie, chancing to ride on hunting in the woods for pastime and solace, as the vse is, fortunely by aduenture to meet with a noble yong man one Robert Bruce the sonne and heire to Robert Bruce the lord of Anandale in Scotland, and Cleueland in England, begot of Isabell the second daughter of David earle of Huntingdon. The ladie immediatlie became so inamored of this yong gentleman, that she led him with hir home vnto Carrike, where (without making hir friends priuie to the matter) she married him in all hast, least anie man should be about to hinder hir determined purpose. Of this mariage was borne that Robert Bruce which afterwards (through want of heires of the linage of king Alexander) attained the crowne of Scotland. As soon as Alexander was aduertised hereof, he took such indignation that he should bestow his selfe so lightlie vpon one whom he neuer saw before, that he seized his castell of Turneberie into his hands, with all his other lands and possessions, as it were by escheat, for that he had married without his consent. Notwithstanding, within shortly after he took pitie on his case, and for an easie composition of monie which she paid for his mariage, restored to hir againe all his lands and liuings, suffering hir to inuoy her husband without anie more trouble or vexation. In the third yeare after, the said ladie was deliuered of the afore-remembered Robert Bruce that was after king of Scotland. And the same yeare, which was the yeare after the birth of our Sauour 1274, David the second son of king Alexander deceased; and the third yeare after, the bethzen of Edward king of England came into Scotland to visit the queene their suster, & their brother in law the king: after did attend them in their iourne to London, whither they went to be present at the coronation of the foresaid Edward, as then returned south of Affrike after the deceasse of his father king Henrie, to take vpon him the gouernement of the kingdome descended vnto him by right of inheritance. He was crowned the same yeare on the day of the assumption of our ladie in August, with great solemnitie and triumph.

At the same time there was a Rozman in king Edwards court, of such passing strength of bodie, that he ouerthrew all men with whom he wrestled, till at length one Fergushard a Scottishman borne, of the countrie of Kesse, descended of noble parentage, vanquished him to his great praise & advancement in honor: for king Alexander in guerbon of so worthie a deed there done in the presence of so honorable an assemblie, gaue vnto him the earldome of Kesse for euermore. Of this Fergushard succeeded five earles all of his surname, but the first earle was named William Kesse, otherwise Leslie, in whose sonne the seventh earle failed the dignitie of that house for fault of succession. At the same time prince Alexander king Alexanders sonne did homage vnto king Edward for the earldome of Huntingdon, as the Scottis writers do testifie. Shortly after that king Alexander was returned south of England at that time into Scotland, his wife queene Margaret deceased, and was buried in Dunfermling. She bare by him two sonnes, Alexander and David, and one daughter named Margaret, the which (according to the assurance before made) was married about thre yeares after his mothers deceasse, vnto Hango, or rather Aquine king of Portugal, and deceased in the second yeare after the solemnization of the mariage, leauing behind hir a daughter named also Margaret.

But before this hap fell so out, euen immediatlie after the death of queene Margaret the mother, hir yonger sonne David deceased: by reason whereof, king Alexander being carefull of his succession, procured a mariage for his elder sonne prince Alexander, with the earle of Flanders his daughter, the which being brought into Scotland, was married vnto the said prince in Jedburgh, on the sunday after the feast of saint Martine in winter, in the yeare of our Lord 1279. The feast of this mariage was holden with great triumph and solemnitie continually for the space of fifteene daies together. & This yeare a number of the Scottis nobilitie, which had attended the ladie Margaret into Portugal, were lost

In the same yere was a generall counsell holden at Lions, the pope and a great multitude of the prelates of christendome being there assembled. To this counsell were summoned to appeare all the pynceps, wardens, and ministers of the begging friers. And for that there were so manie sundrie orders of them, each man deuising of his owne bzaime some new alteration; all those orders were reduced into the foure orders, which after by the church of Rome were approued and allowed. A generall commandement was also giuen, that no man should go about to begin anie new forme of such vaine superstitious orders, which appoint themselves to eschue labor, to the end they may liue in pleasure, lust & idleness, upon the trauell of other mens bzuies. In this mean time, after that the christian armie was returned home out of Affrike, by reason of a truce concluded with the Soldan, the same Soldan (that truce notwithstanding) ceased not to make great slaughters and inuasions upon those christian men that remained behind. The christian pynces soe moued herewith, made their apperalls for a new expedition into the holie land. The Scots gaue the tenth partie of all their lands, or rather (as some booke say) the tenth part of all tithes belonging to churches, to the furtherance of this iourne: notwithstanding through such enuie and contentions as rose amongst the said pynces, that iourne brake, to the great damage and pzeiudice of the christian faith.

King Alexander hauing lost his wife and children, in maner as is before expessed, not onelie he himselfe, but also all Scotland was in great penfuellenesse and sorow, each man by a certeine fozeludgement and misgiuing in mind, doubting the mishap that might thereof insue. But yet did king Alexander, by the aduise of his nobles, in hope of new issue, marie the daughter of the earle of Champagne in France, named Yolant. The marriage was celebrated at Jedburgh with great feasting and triumph: but that ioy and blithnesse indured not long after. For the same yere on the 18 day of Aprill, as he was galloping vpon a fierce horse at Kingorne, forcing him in his race somewhat rashlie, he was throught over the west cliffe towards the sea by a wonderfull misfortune, so rudelie, that he brake his necke, and so therewith immediatlie died in the 42 yere of his reigne. He was buried at Dunfermling, in the yere after the incarnation 1290. It is said, that the date before the kings death, the earle of March a little before night, demanded of one Thomas Leirmont, otherwise named Thomas the rimer, or (as the translatoz of Hector Boetius saith) Thomas Erilton (who in those daies was reputed for a noble prophet) or (as we may call him) a soothsaier, what weather they should haue on the morrow. To whome the said Thomas answered, that on the morrow [before none] should blow the worst wind and tempest that euer was heard of in Scotland at anie time before.

On the morrow when the skie appeared cleare and bright, without cloud or anie other signe of foule weather, and that it dyed nere vnto the midd of the daie, and no wind heard from anie side, but all calme and quiet, the earle of March sent for the fozenamed Thomas, and told him that he had mistaken his marks, in prophesying of anie such notable tempest as he had spoken of the night before, considering it proued so lithe a daie, without appearance of anie tempest to insue. This Thomas said little thereto, sauing that he said it was not yet past none. And incontinente herevpon came a post to the castell gate of Dunbar, where this earle of March as then late, bzinging word of the kings sudden death, as before is recited. Then said the prophet: That is the scathfull wind and dreadfull tempest, which shall blow such calamitie and trouble to the whole state of the whole realme of Scotland. This Thomas was a man in great admiration of the people, shewing sundrie things, as they afterwarde chanced: howbeit they were euer hid and inuolued vnder the veile of darke and obscure speeches.

Manie strange wonders and vnketh sights were seene in the daies of this Alexander the third. In the 17 yere of his reigne, there was such an infinit number of woymes through all the parties of Albion, that not onelie the leaues and fruits of trees, but also flowres & herbs in gardens were eaten vp and consumed with them. And in the same yere, the waters of Fozth and Tait rose with such high tides in flowing ouer the banks, that manie towines and villages were drownded, to the great destruction both of men and beasts. In the 20 yere of his reigne, there was a comet or blasing starre seene of a meruellous quantitie, shining euerie day toward the south, euen about none daies. On the Epiphanie day next after, rose so great winds, with stormes of such vnmeasurable great hailestones, that manie towines were throught downe by violence thereof. In the meane time, rose through the vehement rage of winds, a sudden fire, in manie bounds within the realme of Scotland, that did much hurt to buildings and edifices, burning by steeples with such force of fire, that the belles were in diuerse places melted, as though it had bene in a foznace. Amongest other, those of the abbey of Abirbrothoke were most pretious, which were as then consumed together with the steple wherein they hong. The towines of Aberdeen and Perth were burned the same time: also part of Lainrike, with the temple, and all the towines and villages in Clow, a part of Angus: and likewise manie towines and other buildings in Louthian, and in diuers other parts of the realme, so long here to rehearse.

In the 31 yere of his reigne, was the first coming of the pestilence into Scotland, with great mortalitie of the people, where it had not bene heard that euer this sicknesse had come within that realme before that time. In the solemnization of the second marriage of king Alexander, as the brydegrome (according to the manner) led the bryde in a danse, a great number of lords and ladies following them in the same danse, there appeared to their sight as it were closing vp the hindermost of the dansters, a creature resembling death, all naked of flesh & liue, with bare bones right dreadfull to behold. Through which spectacle, the king and the residue of all the companie were so affonied, and put in such fright & feare, that they had quicklie made an end of their danse for that time. In the daies of this Alexander the third, lined sundrie great clearkes. Amongst other, Michaell Scot was reputed for an excellent physician, and for his singular practice & knowledge in that profession was no lesse esteemed and had in high fauour with Edward king of England, than with king Alexander, during his life time.

The historie of Scotland.

* This Alexander made manie healthfull and good lawes, whereof most by the negligence of men, and longnesse of time are now a way; so that things so profitablie by him devised, seme rather by report to have bene ordeined, than that they are by custome practised. He divided the kingdome into foure parts, through which he made his progresse almost euerie yere, remaining about thre moneths in euerie place, there to sit in iudgement, and to heare the complaints of the poore, at what time the meanest person might haue free acceſſe vnto him. As often as he went into anie prouince to giue sentence of law, he commanded the gouernor of that place to receiue him with a chosen companie; and when he departed thence, to bring him to the borders of his iurisdiction, where he was honorablie receiued of the next gouernors. The which travelling about his realme he vsed, to the end that he might know all his nobilitie, and that he might also be knowne of all others. During which time of his progresse, no great traine or multitude of courtiers did follow him; because he would not charge his people in retreating of them; and for that cause also abated and restrained the troop of horsemen which followed the nobilitie, and brought them into a certeine & meane number, because he supposed that the multitude of horses (whereof in warre there was no vse) were needlesse deuourers of meat. Further, he forbade his people to trauell by sea for gaine or merchandize, when he considered that through the unskillfulness of sailing, the rashnesse that men vsed in committing themselves to the seas, and the rapine of pirats, manie men were lost, and their goods spoiled: whereby the merchants were bzien to extreamie poertie. Which precept when it had continued almost a whole yere, and by manie mens speeches was reprehended as dangerous and hurtfull to the weale publike, at the length there arrived such plentie of strange merchandize in Scotland, that the abundance and cheapnesse thereof did exceed the memoire of anie former age. But yet to take order with and for the benefit of the merchants, he forbade his people to buie anie thing brought in by strangers, but such as were merchants of his land, and that all the other people should buie of them such things as they needed.)

Sir gouernors chosen to

of Scotland.

King Alexander the third, being in such miserable wise deceased, as before is specified, the realme remained in great discomfort, by reason he had neither left anie issue behind him to succeed in the gouernment thereof, neither taken order in his life time by testament, or other wise, for anie other to supplie the ronne of a gouernor, so that hereof insued such infinite misorders, by the presumption of wicked and vngovernable persons, the which vpon hope to escape unpunished (because iustice was like to want due process) ceased not to attempt manie vnlawfull acts, to the grieuous oppression of the people: which misruled demeriors and disordered enterprizes of those outrageous persons, when such as had anie zeale to the wealth of their countrie vnderstood daily to multiplie and increase, they thought it apperteined to their duties to prouide some remedie in due time, and therevpon called a counsell togither, wherein after sundrie consultations had, and manie matters debated touching the rule of the realme, it was finally agreed, that sir gouernors should be elected and chosen, of the which three should haue the administration and rule of the north parts and these were William Frazer bishop of saint Andrews, Duncane earle of Fife, & John Cummin earle of Buchquane. The other three were appointed to the gouernance of the south countreies, that is to say, Robert bishop of Glasgowe, sir John Cummin (a man of high estimation for his wisdom and experience as well in matters concerning peace as warre) and James high steward of Scotland.

But in the meane time Edward king of England, surnamed Longshanks, cast in his mind, how he might make some conquest of Scotland, now the same was thus destitute of an head to governe it. And for that he well vnderstood that the daughter of Bozwaie (of whom before ye haue heard) was right inheritor to the crowne of Scotland, though she were but verie young in yeres, & not able for marriage: yet to compasse his purpose that waies forth, he sent his ambassadoers vnto the lords of Scotland, requiring to haue hir to wife, and the realme with all, as due vnto hir by good title and right of inheritance. The lords, after long deliberation herein had, consented to his desire, vnder these conditions, that the realme should remaine in all freedoms and liberties, without anie kind of seruite subiection, in the same maner and state as it was vsed in the daies of king Alexander last deceased, and other his noble progenitors; and if it chanced, that no issue came of this marriage to succeed them, then should the crowne returne by remainder ouer to the next heirs of king Alexander, without anie claime or pretext of title to be made by king Edward, or anie of his successors in time to come.

Immediatlie heretofore, two noble knights, sir John Scot of Albawore, and sir James Wlemis, were sent into Bozwaie to fetch the bride ouer into Scotland: but before their coming thither, she was deceased, & so they returned backe into Scotland againe without effect of their errand. And thus by means of hir death, all amitie betwixt Englishmen and Scots ceased. Then began to insue great trouble and businesse in Scotland, by reason of the contention which sprang betwixt the kinsmen of king Alexander, for the title and claime which they severallie made and pretended to the crowne. Thers were three chiefe that seemed by nearnesse of blood to haue most right, and therefore made most earnest sute in their claime: John Balioll, Robert Bruce, and John Hastings. This Robert Bruce was sonne to the son of that Robert Bruce, which married Isabel the youngest daughter to David earle of Huntingdon, on whom he got a son named also Robert, that married the inheritor of Carrick, as we haue shewed before, whose sonne this Robert Bruce was, that now claimed the crowne. John Balioll came of Margaret, eldest daughter to the foresaid David earle of Huntingdon: for Alane lord of Galloway, which married the said Margaret, begot on hir two daughters, of the which the eldest named Deruogill, was giuen in marriage vnto sir John Balioll, father vnto this John Balioll, that thus made claime to the crowne: alledging that forsomuch that he was come of the eldest daughter of earle David, the brother of king William, he ought by reason to be reputed as next heire to the same king William, with none other person alie approached so nere vnto him in blood.

* Here I thinke it conuenient before any more be spoken of this historie, to interlace somewhat (besides that which is alreadie spoken, being here in part repeated) of the descent of this Deruogill, the daughter of Alane lord of Galloway, beginning the same somewhat higher, in this sort. In the reigne of William the first of Scots, which began in the yere of Christ 1160, as saith Lelless, lib. 6. pag. 226, Fergusus gouernor of Galloway left two sons, Gilbert, and Ethelred, who after the death of their father, fell at variance for the lands of Galloway, to be divided betwixt them in equall portions. This Ethelred comming to the eares of king William, he was desirous to quench quench those flames of unkindnesse betwene the said brethren, and for th it cause with indifferencie (as he supposed) he ment to pacifie and satisfie each part, by diuiding the inheritance equallie betwene them. But Gilbert highlie taking this partition in grudge (because he was eldest, & that the whole inheritance belonged to him) did with like hatred pursue both the king and his brother, the one as enuious against him, and the other as an vnequall iudge, in giuing his right from him. Wherefore when king William was taken prisoner of the Englishmen, this Gilbert being of bold spirit (and now by the kings mishap out of all danger, being deliuered from the feare of anie law) began to utter his concealed hatred till this time couertlie concealed. For vpon the sudden, he took his brother prisoner, put out his eyes, cut out his tong, and not contented with a simple death (to be giuen vnto him at one instant) did most miserable a long time together put him to paine, by dismembryng the scuerall parts of his bodie, before he should die. After which wretched fact against his owne brother, he ioined himselfe to the English nation, and taking preies on the borders, he did vnnaturallie and traitorouslie (as it were an vtter enemie to his countrie) rage against his owne citizens, with all kind of murder and slaughter of battell. In which he did such harme, and so great oppression, as if he had not bene resisted by his nephue Rowland (gathering a strong power to him of such common people as remained stedfast in dutifull obedience to the imprisoned king) he had vtterlie spoiled all the countreies adioining to England, or else would wholie haue brought them into his subiection. For this Rowland a lustie yong gentleman, bold of spirit, indued with noble strength of mind and bodie, did not onelie beat downe the force of his vncke, but did manie times (and that sometimes most hapilie) fight with the English, when they spoiled his native soile, or that he made anie inuasion into their borders.

At length when king William was deliuered of restraint, and returned into Scotland, this Gilbert (notwithstanding all his former euils) by the mediation of his friends, found fauor in the king, and was pardoned of all his offenses, but yet so as he promised to make recompense of all such damages as he had committed; for the sure performance whereof, he found sufficient pledges to the king. But Gilbert shortly after departing this life, they which had serued vnder him, giuen by continuall vse vnto theft and blood, did yeld themselves to the fauourable protection of the king of England, either for inconstancie of mind, or feare of punishment, being touched with remorse of conscience for the euill which they had before committed. These men thus shadowed vnder the wings of England, did againe take armes against their countrie, vnder the conduct of Gilpatricke, Henrie Bennedie, and Samuell, who before had bene authoers and executors to Gilbert, of all such euils as were by him performed. Against whom was Rowland sent with an armie, who in a set battell slue the capitaine, and a multitude of both kinds of the common people. They which escaped the conflict, did flie to the refuge of one Gilcombe, capitaine of such persons as liued vpon spoile and pilfering, who by continuance of followers, & increase of people, were now growne to some number, & did wander ouer all Louthian, robbing & spoiling in euerie place where they set foot: and not so content, did from thence passe into Galloway, where this Gilcombe took in hand the defense of Gilberts cause (now vtterlie forsaken of all men) vnder colour whereof, he not onelie challenged the inheritance belonging to Gilbert, but also behaued himselfe as chiefe lord of all Galloway. At length encountering with this

Rowland in the kalends of October (the third moneth after the companie of this Gilbert was before dispersed) this Gilcombe was valiantlie slaine, with the greatest number of his followers, by the said Rowland, on whose part there was verie few missing.

The king of England highlie offended therewith (because the yere before they had swoorne themselves to serue faithfullie vnder him against their owne blood) came in haste with a maine armie to Carleill to seeke reuenge thereof. Which when William king of Scots vnderstood, he laboured by all the means he could, to appease the king of Englands displeasure, and to reconcile this Rowland vnto him. In the end the king of Scots wrought so with the English, that Rowland was admitted to come to Carleill to the presence of the king of England; the which Rowland did accordingly. At what time before the king of England, refelling the slanderous accusations of his aduersaries (and further declaring that he had done nothing either rashlie, or vniustlie against his and the common wealths entrie) he was honorablie by the English king suffered to depart from Carleill. These things thus done, & king William returned into Scotland, he called to remembrance the continuall constancie and good seruice, which the father of Rowland had manie times done to him and to the realme; therewithall not forgetting the worthie exploits which this Rowland had of late performed for the common wealth: for which considerations he worthilie recompensed the said Rowland, in bestowing on him the whole countrie of Galloway. And further (although he did not merit the same by reason of his fathers euils) yet the king mildlie considering, that the sonne was not to beare the offense of the father (but hoping by this vnderferued liberalitie, to bind him faithfullie to serue him) did giue the lands of Carrikie vnto the sonne of the said Gilbert. All which William Parvus reporteth to haue happened in the yere of Christ 1183.

Rowland being thus made lord of Galloway, married the sister of William Peruill constable of Scotland, who dieng without issue, obtained the same office by inheritance in right of his wife, from whome did issue Alane lord of Galloway, and constable of Scotland, by inheritance from his mother, a valiant gentleman, and such a person as for his notable seruice (imployed in Ireland on the behalfe of John king of England) was rewarded by the said king with honozable and rich reuenues: for which by the permission of William king of Scotland, he professed himselfe the liege man of John king of England, and swore fealtie vnto him. This Alane (as is before said) married Margaret the elder daughter of Dauid earle of Huntington, of whome he raised three daughters, whereof the eldest being Doznagill, was married to Balioll, the second to Bruce: in right of which Doznagill, the sonne of this Balioll challenged the crowne of Scotland, as descended from the elder sister. On the other side Robert Bruce, albeit he was descended of the yongest daughter to earle Dauid, yet was he come of the first issue male, for his father was first borne, and therefore if king William had decessed without issue, the crowne had descended to him: for which consideration he maintained that he ought now to be preferred. Hastings also for his part, because he was come of the yongest daughter of king Dauid, married to his father Henrie Hastings, wanted not allegations to propose, why he ought to be admitted. Beside these, there were other also, that made claime to the crowne of Scotland, and had matter sufficient to mainteine their sute. This controuersie being brought before the gouernours, was at sundrie times argued with much contention, tention, not without the assistance of the nobles fauoring the parties: as occasion of friendship or kin-red moued them, namely Baskoll and Bruce had no small number that leaned vnto their parts, by reason whereof, the governours were in doubt to proceed to anie definite sentence in the matter, least if they declared one of them king, an other would attempt to stirre the crowne by force.

Whereupon they iudged it best to referre the decision of all this whole matter to some mightie king, which was of puissance able to constrain the parties repugnant to obeye his sentence. Wherevnto was none thought so meet as Edward king of England, and therefore they chose him [Of whose faith and loue towards them, they did not anie whit mistrust, because Alexander the last king of Scots had found the father of this Edward, both a louing father in law to himselfe, and vpright tutor to his realme. Wherevnto also they ioined this cause of hope in king Edward, for that the said Edward had of late before tried the fauor of the Scots towards him, by a singular testi-monie, in that they so easilie consented to ioine the heire of Scotland with the son of the said Edward.] Whereupon king Edward toke this charge vpon him, as competent iudge, & promised by a certain day to come vnto Berwikke, willing that their counsell might be assembled there against that time. At his comming thither, at the day assigned, and hauing heard what could be said on ech part, and throughlie considering at length their allegations, he perceiued the same doubtfull, and required a longer time to discuss the truth by god aduise of counsell: and therefore required to haue twelue Scottishmen, the best learned and most skilfull lawyers of all the realme to be associat with twelue Englishmen, which he promised to chose forth of the most perfect and wisest clerks that might be found within all his dominions, to the intent that by their ripe and aduised debating of the matter, the truth might appere, according to the which he minded to giue sentence, without fauor either of one part or other. [Before which he toke a solemne oth of the ambassadoers of Scotland, and such nobles as were there to stand to his definitive sentence, further thereupon requiring a writing to be made, sealed with the seales of the same nobles.] After when all such matters and proses as were proponed by the parties, alledged by them for furtherance of their titles were put in writing, as matter of record, he returned backe againe into England.

¶ Here the Scottish writers report, that king Edward vsed himselfe nothing vprightlie in this matter, but accordinglie (as it often happeneth) had the eyes of his conscience blinded, vpon hope to gaine somewhat by this credit thus to him committed. But how vntuillie he is slandered in this behalfe, I leaue to the indifferent readers to consider, by conferring that which the Scots do write thereof, with that which is to be found in our English historie. But to proceed as we find it in the Scottish writers. King Edward to be satisfied in knowledge of the truth, sent into France for men learned and of great experience in the lawes, that he might haue their opinions in the demands of the parties for their doubt-full rights. But (saith Hector Boetius) he first commanded them in no wise to agree vpon anie resolute point, but rather to varie in opinions, that when the plée should seeme doubtfull by reason of their contrarietie in deciding thereof, he might the better vnder-stand that colour, giue iudgement with which partie he thought most expedient to serue his purpose.

Whobeyt the most part of the lawyers iudged with Robert Bruce, both for the worthines of his person, and also for that he was come of the first issue male.
But some there were that gaue sentence with John Baskoll, for that he was descended of the eldest sister.

King Edward supposing this to be the time most conuenient for his purposed intention to conquer the realme of Scotland, returned to Berwikke, where he had appointed the 24 learned men before specified, to be present, that final sentence might be giuen, according as he had before promised. When he was come thus vnto Berwikke, and the foresaid 24 learned lawyers assembled as assistants with him, and the parties appering before him in a chamber prouided for the purpose, he caused the doores to be shut kept, and the entries strongly warded, that no man might come in or out, but by his appointment and licence. His purpose was to make him king, that would be sworne to hold the crowne of Scotland of him, as superiour lord thereof. And because he knew that Robert Bruce was a man of singular manhood and wisdom, he thought best to assaie him first, and if he found him not conformable to his purpose, then he minded to trie what the Baskoll would do.

When Robert Bruce had throughlie heard king Edwards motion, he answered that he weied the libertie of his countrie, more than his priuate preferment, and therefore minded not to deliuer his coun-trie (which euen to that day had bene free) into the bondage and seruitude of the Englishmen. King Edward perceiuing his stoutnesse of stomack, brake off with him, and fell in talke with the Baskoll, who had such blind desire to attaine the crowne, that he passed not whether he inioied the same in libertie or seruitude, so he might haue it. Whereupon when this Baskoll had giuen his faith by assured oth vnto king Edward, that he would do homage vnto him for the realme of Scotland, and acknowledge to hold the same of him as superiour lord, king Edward gaue sentence with him, to haue most right to the crowne and realme of Scotland, now thus in controuersie.

It is said, that the earle of Gloucester, a man of great prudence and authoritie in England (seeing the Baskoll thus made king, and Robert Bruce without reason put backe) spake in this sort to king Edward: Oh king, remember what is done by thee this day, sparing to giue righteous sentence in this matter; for though the same be now couered and hid, it shall be reuealed, when the great iudge that searcheth consciences, and the secrets of euerie mans mind, shall cause thee to answer for it at the dreadfull day of that vniuersall iudgement: thou hast now giuen sentence on a king, but then shall iudgement be gi-uen on thee. Shortly after, John Baskoll went in great arraie vnto Scone, where he was crowned king of Scotland on saint Andrews day, in the yeere from the incarnation 1292. In the yeere next insuing, on saint Stephens day in Christmasse, he came to Newcastell vpon Tyne, and there did homage vnto king Edward for the realme of Scotland, contrarie to the mind and consent of all his nobles, for that by this meanes, he seemed to submit his realme (which had remained in freedom vnto those dates) into the seruitude of the Englishmen: but small felicitie succeeded therof. And here it appeareth by Buchanan, that the nobilitie of Scotland, which held with Baskoll, did also their homage: for being farre from home, they durst not contend against the power of two kings. Whereof some taking it greivouslie in their hart, dissembled with the present time, and couered their anger vnder the cinders of a faire countenance, which yet in the end burst out, notwithstanding this painted shew. For the declaration and proue thereof, there was shortly after occasion offered to Spaldusse, by the death of the earle of Jesse, being (in the time when there was no king) made one of the six governours of the realme: for this earle was not onelie killed by these of Abirneschie driven into

John was comming with his armie to their soc-cors. The Scots that were within the towne, believing it had bene most true, set open the gates, and came forth against their king (as they supposed) to haue received him with all ioy and gladnesse.

But when they came nere vnto the Englishmen, they perceiued both by their language and habit what they were: but this was not before the Englishmen were hard at the gates, so that when the Scottishmen would haue fled backe to haue got into the towne againe, the Englishmen pursued them so fast at the heelles, that they entered the gates with them, and so tooke the towne with great slaughter, as well of the souldiers and men of warre, as also of women, children, and aged persons, without all ruth or compassion, so that they left not one creature alive of the Scottish blood within all that towne. Thus was Berwikke wonne the 30 day of March, in the yere 1296. Such abundance of blood was spilled thro-rough all parts of the towne (as the Scottish choncles testifie) that where at the falling tide the water was not able to drine about the milles, some of the same milles yet were now at a low water set on gate, by reason the streames were so hugelie augmented with blood. There were slaine about seven thousand persons that day, with the greatest part of all the nobles and gentlemen of Fife and Louthian.

King John hearing of this slaughter of his people at Berwikke, in great desire to be auenged, gathered his power, and sent the same forth against king Edward, with whom they met not farre from Dunbar, and there incounting with him in battell, the Sco-tish host was discomfited, the most part of the Scots being either slaine or taken. The earles of March and Penteth, with 70 knights, fled to the castell of Dunbar, but they were besieged so streitlie by the English power, inuironing the castell on ech side, that in the end they were constrained for lacke of vittells to yeld themselves to king Edward, on condition to haue their liues saued, which couenant was not obserued; as the Scottish writers affirme: for king Edward hauing got them into his hands, caused them forthwith to be put to death. It was reported that Robert Bruce vpon secret conference had with king Edward before this battell at Dunbar, sollici-ted all his friends in the Scottish armie, to flie vpon the first ioining, which the residue perceiuing, were so discomfited, that incontinentlie they threw awate both armour and weapon, and so were banquished without resistance.

Truth it is, that after this victorie, Robert Bruce submitted himselfe vnto king Edward, requiring him to performe his promise touching the right which he had to the crowne of Scotland: howbeit he recei-ued no answer to his liking touching that request: for k. Edward had no lesse desire to inioy the kingdome of Scotland, than Bruce, as the Scottish writers affirme. Therefore to cast off Robert Bruce concerning his demand, he answered thus, as is said: Belieuest thou that I haue nothing else to do but to conquire realmes, and to deliuer them ouer againe vnto thee? Robert Bruce hereby perceiuing the subtle meaning of k. Edward, returned right sorrowfull vnto his lands in England, hauing great indignation in his mind, that he had obeyed king Edwards requests: but yet considered with himselfe that he must suffer for the time, till occasion serued to reuenge the iniuries receiued, which he minded to do, and that in most cruell manner, as afterwards it will appeare. King Edward after he had thus wonne the castell of Dunbar, got likewise both the castles of Edinburgh and Strirling, and pursued king John, till he had constrained him to take for his refuge the castell of Forres. Wherewith

John Cumyn lord of Strabogie came to king Edward, and was sworne his liege man.

Shortly after, by a politike practise of the same John Cumyn, king John with his sonne Edward came to Spountros, where perceiuing himselfe dutiewise to be fallen into the hands of king Edward, through feare of death which he doubted by reason of the menacing words of king Edward, he suffered himselfe to be spoiled of all his kinglie abilliments, and with a white wand in his hand (as the maner is) presented himselfe before king Edward, resigning there vnto him all his right and title which he had to the crowne of Scotland, utterlie renouncing the same both for him and his heires for ever. Hereof was a charter made in most sufficient wise, confirmed with the hand and seale of king John, and other the nobles of Scotland substantiallie as might be deuised, bearing date the fourth yere of his reigne. After this, king Edward assembled all the lords and barons of Scotland at Berwikke, where he caused them to be sworne his liege men; and to do homage vnto him as to their soueraigne lord and supreme gouernor. Which William Douglas (a man of noble birth and famous for his deeds) refused to do, and for his obstinacie was cast into prison, where after a few yeaeres he ended his life. And for the more suertie of their allegiance, he constrained them to surrender into his hands all the strengths & holdes of the realme, both as well those that stood on the sea coasts, as also such other as were situat in the inner parts of the countrie.

These things done, and order taken in each behalfe as was thought requisite for the quiet keeping of the countrie, he sent king John and his sonne Edward Balliol vnto London; where they were kept in strong ward; till at length he suffered the said king John to returne into Scotland: but leauing still his sonne in pledge behind him, lest he should attempt anie new rebellion after his departure; which after was deliuered at the request of the pope. King John vpon his returne into Scotland, perceiuing that he was in the hatred both of his lords and commons, he withdrew againe of his owne accord into England, forsaking wholie the administration of the Scottish dominion, and final-lie went ouer into Normandie to his ancient inheritance and lands there; where at length falling blind, and wasting away by long age, he departed out of this world in the castell Calliard, leauing those lands which he possessed on that side the sea, vnto his sonne Edward Balliol, who being released out of captiuitie, was come quer to his father before his deceasse.

In the meane time, king Edward hauing well remembrance the warres which he had intended to make against France, had he not bin staid through the businesse of Scotland, purposed now to pursue the same with all diligence; & therefore garnishing all the strengths & forts in Scotland to withstand the Scots, if they attempted anie rebellion against him in his absence, he appointed Hugh Cressin-gham regent there, whilst he should be occupied in France, which Cressingham before was treasurer.
Then hauing provided a great nauie of ships, he passed ouer into France, trusting that the Scots would not stir, sith they had of late sustained so manie overthrowes and soze losses one after an other by the last wages: but tyrannie is of such a nature, that by no kind of prouision it may anie long time be suertie defended. For those people that be oppressed by anie tyrannicall seruitude, will not faile to seke to deliuer themselves from the yoke of that impossible burden when soeuer opportunities of time and having knowledge that king Edward was passed ouer the seas, they got them all togither straightwaies, and assembled in counsell at Striueling, where by generall agreement, twelve noble men were chosen to be gouernors of Scotland, euerie one in their limits appointed, that they might the better prouide to resist the enimie. Amongest these gouernors, John Cummin earle of Buchquhan was principall, a man of great wisdom and singular knowledge in all affaires, as well of peace as of war.

This earle of Buchquhan raised a mightie armie, and with the same entered into Northumberland, where he wasted with fier and sword all that coun-trie. After this, he laid siege to Carleill, but he wan nothing there, the towne was so well defended. In that season also, the same of William Wallase began to spring, a young gentleman of so huge stature and notable strength of bodie, with such skill and knowledge in warlike enterprises, and hereto of such hardinesse of stomach in attempting all maner of dangerous exploits, that his match was not ante where lightlie to be found. He was sonne to one sir Andrew Wallase of Cragie, knight, and from his youth bare euer an inward hatred against the English nation. Sundrie notable feats also he brought against the Englishmen in defense of the Scots, and was of such incredible force at his com-ming to perfect age, that of himselfe alone, without all helpe, he would not feare to set vpon three or four Englishmen at once, and vanquish them.

When the same therefore of his worthie acts was notified thorough the realme, manie were put in good hope, that by his means the realme should be deliuered from the seruitude of the Englishmen within short time after. And hereupon a great number of the Scottish nation as well of the nobilitie as other, were readie to assist him in all his enterprises.
By reason whereof he might not easilie be intrapped nor taken of the Englishmen, that went about to haue got him into their hands. At length, when occasion serued to be the helpe of such a notable chief teine, he was chosen by generall consent of the Scotishmen as gouernour vnder John Ballioll, to deli-uer his countrie from bondage of the English nation. At the same time manie abbeies & spirituall be-nefices in Scotland were in Englishmens hands.
Pouertheless, this William Wallase by commission had of William Fraser bishop of saint Andrews, auoided and put them forth of all parts of Scotland, leauing neither temporall nor spirituall person of their blood within that realme. For shortlie after, by publike authoritie, he receiued the armie that John Cummin earle of Buchquhan had led before, and constrained those Scots that fauored king Edward, to obeye his commandements, in renouncing all such faith and promise as they had giuen or made vnto him.

This done, he passed forth with great puillance against the Englishmen, that held sundrie castels within Scotland, and with great hardinesse & manhod he wan the castels of Forfair, Dundee, Brechen and Dountrous, sleaing all such souldiers as he found within them. Wallase now full of this his prosperous successe, and hearing that certeine of the chief selfe captians and officers of those Englishmen that kept the castell of Dunnoter, were gone forth to consult with other Englishmen of the forts next to them adjoining, came suddenly to the said castell, & took it, not leauing a man aloue of all those whome he found as then within it. Then after he had furnished that hold with his owne souldiers in most defensible wise, he went to Aberdeen. The towne he found in maner void of all the inhabitants, but the castell was so stronglie garnished with men and munition, that considering it might not be woone without great murder, he raised from thence, and returned into Angus. King Edward as then being in France, hearing of these exploits atchiued by this Wallase his aduersarie, sent diuerse noble captians vnto his lieutenant Hugh Cressingham, with an armie into Scotland to redresse the matter.

Wallase in the meane time had laid siege vnto the castell of Couper, but now being aduertised of the comming of this armie against him, he raised his siege, & went to Striueling to defend the bridge there, that Hugh Cressingham with his armie should not passe the same, according as the report went his intent was to do. Where encountering with the enimies, the thirde Ides of September, he obtained a verie worthie victorie, for he slue not onelie the for-said Cressingham with a great part of his armie being passed the riuer, but also forced the residue to flee, in such sort, that a great number of them were browned, and few escaped awaie with life. Thus hauing gotten the upper hand of his enimies here at Stri-ueling, he returned againe to the siege of Couper, which shortlie after vpon his returne thither, was renoued vnto him by those that were within in garrison. There were manie of the Scottish nobilitie the same time, that sent vnto him, offering to leaue the king of Englands part, and to aid him with monie and vittels, if he would onelie receiue them into fa-uour, wherevnto he granted. By which means, sundrie other castels were yielded vnto him, the which after he had garnished with men, munition, and vit-tels (according as was thought requisite) he brake vp his campe, and went with sundrie of his most faith-full friends vnto the castell of Striueling.

Afterwards perceiuing that though scarstie of corne, great dearth arose on each side within the realme of Scotland, he deuised which way he might best relieue the peoples necessitie and lacke in that behalf, and hereupon he determined to passe with a mightie armie into England, and to sojourn there the most part of the winter, in sustaining the whole number of his men of warre on such prouision as they might find within the bounds of their enimies countrie. He commanded therefore that all the Scots, appointed to go with him in that iournie, should be readie at a certeine day and place prefixed.
But diuers of the northerne Scots (as they of Aber-den and other) for that they disobeyed his commandements set forth by letters and proclamations, were hanged as rebels and traitors to their coun-trie. By whose example, other being put in feare, his commandements were the better obeyed, so that hauing got togither an huge host of men, he entered with the same into Northumberland, waiking and spoiling the countrie euen vnto Newcastle. Thus putting the enimies in great feare and terro: of his atofull name, he brought his armie backe againe into Scotland, laden with spoile and glorie of their prosperous atchiued iournie. They entred into England (as Io. Maior writeth) about the feast of All saints, and remained there till Candlemas after, liuing still vpon the spoile of the Englishmens goods.

Edward king of England, being informed of the great slaughter of his people, and what damage the Scots had done in Northumberland, returned in great displeasure out of France into England, and sent his ambassadors vnto Wallase, for menacing him, for that he had invaded his realme in such cruell wise in his absence, which he durst (as he sent him word) full little haue done, if he had bene at home himselfe. Wallase herevnto answered, that he had taken the advantage for the atchiuing of his interprise, touching the inuasion of England, in like sort as king Edward had done for the conquest of Scotland,

land, at such time as he was chosen by the nobles of the realme as indifferent iudge in decision of the right and lawfull title of the parties that stroue and were at contention for the crowne. And further, to the end it might appeare vnto king Edward, that he innaded England in defense of his owne native countrie, and that he was fullie bent to imploie his whole induos to deliuer the same from all manner of subiection to any forreine power, and to reuenge the iniuries done to them by the Englishmen in times past; he willed the English ambassadoz to declare from him vnto king Edward, that he purposed to hold his Caster in England (if God afforded him life) and that in despite of king Edward, and all such as would beare armoz against him.

Wallase entered England with an armie of 30000 men.

And vndoubtedlie according to his promise he kept his day: for assembling together an armie of 30000 men, he entered into England at the time before appointed, where king Edward was readie with an armie vpon Stanesmore, double in number to the Scots, to giue them battell: but when the time came that both parties were readie to haue ioined, the Englishmen withdrew, hauing no lust (as should seme) to fight with the Scots at that time: who perceiuing them to giue backe, incontinentlie would haue rushed forth of their rankes to haue pursued in chase after them: but Wallase (doubting least the Englishmen had ment some policie, and saing (as writeth Io. Ma. lib. 4. cap. 14.) that it was honoz enough for him that he had enforced so mightie a prince in his owne countrie to forsake the field) caused the Scots to keepe togither in order of battell, and so preserving them from the deceitfull malice of their enimies, brought them backe into Scotland with liues and honozs saued, besides the infinit spoiles and booties which they got in this ioine.

But as in the beginning all men were glad to support Wallase in all exploits and enterprises which he toke in hand, so afterward when his fame began to war great, to the derogation of other mens reputations, such as were farre his superiours in birth and linage, that fauor which manie bare him at the first, was now turned into enuie, hauing no small indignation, that a man of so base parentage should so surmount them in all honoz and dignitie. Those that enuied him most, were of the Cumins blood, and Robert Bruce. King Edward being aduertised of this enuious grudge, and new sedition amongst the nobles of Scotland, had secret conference by his agents with the chieft amongst those that thus enuied the high glorie of Wallase, and vpon trust of such practise as was concluded by reason of the same conference, he came with a mightie armie into Scotland, and at Falkirke met with this Wallase, who mistrusting no guile, had raised a power to resist him: but now being come in sight of the Englishmen, there rose a right obious contention betwixt the head capteins, who should haue the leading of the vantgard, which is reputed a most high honoz among the Scottishmen. And among other, John Stewart, and John Cumins, thought coine, that Wallase a man of so low beginning, should be preferred before them in that honour: but on the other part, Wallase considering that the charge of the whole was giuen vnto him by agreement and consent of the three estates, thought it no reason that he should giue place to anie of them, though vnto his face, as saith John Maior, the lord Stewart had before vpheld him with his pride, comparing him to an owle, which from his originall had begged a feather of euerie bird, and being now enriched with abundance of feathers, did aduance himselfe aboue all other birds.

In the meane time came the Englishmen vpon them right fiercelie, before the Scottish chieftains (hauing their breasts filled with more malice one against another, than with desire to defend their countrie against their enimies) could bring their men into anie perfect arate. Herewith at the coming to the point of ioining, the Cumins with their retinues fled out of the field, and left the residue of the Scots in all the danger. Robert Bruce seruing that day among the Englishmen, fetched a compasse about an hill, and came on the backs of the Scots, so that they were in maner compassed in, and beaten downe on each side: yet Wallase left nothing vndone that might pertaine to the dutie of a valiant capteine. But at length, all his induos notwithstanding, the Scots (ouerfet with multitude of enimies, as the Scottish writers affirme) were slaine in such huge numbers, that he was constrained to draw out of the field, which such small remnants as were left alive. The Englishmen pursued fiercelie after him, & namelie one valiant capteine named Frere Brian Jais, a templer, whome Wallase perceiuing to be within his danger, stepped forth vnto him, and slue him there in sight (as it is said) of all the English armie. Which valiant act of Wallase caused the Englishmen somewhat to staie, for doubt of further perill by their vniuersal pursue likelie to befall them. In this infortunate battell, were slaine on the Scottish side, John Stewart of Bute, with his Wardens (for so they name them that are taken up to serue in the warres south of the Stewards lands) Spaldouie earle of Fife, with sir John Graham, whose death was much lamented by Wallase, as one whome he highly esteemed for his great experience in warlike knowledge. Spanie other noble and valiant men died in this conflict, whose names would be too long to rehearse. This battell was stricken on Marie Magdalens daie, in the yere of our Lord 1298, and therefore the Englishmen haue holden it euer since an happie day for to fight against the Scots.

When William Wallase was passed the riuer Carran, where he might defend himselfe, and gather his disperled people, Bruce desired to speake vnto him, which Wallase did not denie. Wherevpon each of them (drawing alone by themselves without any arbiters to the bankes of the riuer in such place as it was narrowest, and they might without anye companie best heare one another; Bruce began to say as followeth. I do much muse, thou most valiant of all men, what came into thy mind to be caried away by the vncertaine fauor of the common people, and to stand against the mightiest king of our age, supported with the greatest forces of the Scots: and daile to offer thy selfe to euerie danger, and that for no reward assured to thee for all thy labors. For if thou shouldst ouercome king Edward, the Scots will neuer aduance thee to the kingdome, and if thou be ouercome, there resteth no refuge for thee, but onlie the mercie of thine enimie. And dost thou not see the Cumins, and mee, and the most of the nobilitie, to follow the English faction? Neither dost thou consider the malice of the princes conceived against thee? Look vnto thy selfe, and thou hast but a few of the nobles thy partakers, and a small number of the commons (which are more vncertaine than the wind) to follow thee, whose fortune is now almost ouerthrowne. All these words John Maior suppose that Robert Bruce did speake, to serch the mind of Wallase, whether he ment to aspire to the crowne or no: being in deed rather contented that Wallase had left the field, than otherwise to reduce him to the part of king Edward.

come; for my birth and fortune neither did oꝛ could deserue it, and my mind did neuer desire it: but the negligent slooth of the (to whome the right of that diademe doth apperteine, and who doth graedilie hunt thereafter) made my citizens (perceiuing themselves destitute of faithfull gouernours) to follow me, and caused me (when I saw them in that miserie, rather but cherlie to me, than in honest seruitude to be oppressed) to seeke for libertie. Which fuerlie I had obtained for them and you, if the nobilitie had not euillie strided against me, restrained themselves for comming into the field, and had but sent their hinds (which till their land) forth to the battell, at which time I had scarce 10000 men, & those of common sort. Trulie if the princes had not bene impediment thereto, I could haue brought forth to fight a hundred thousand bold and cherefull souldiers. But now in truth I perceiue the hatred of the nobles against me this day. Wherefore if thou pretend to possesse the kingdome, I giue thee faithfull warning, expectallie to beware of the Cumins: who if they had more regarded the glorie of their countrie, than of secret malice to others, would not so wickedlie haue forsaken the field, what hate soeuer they had conceived against me. If they haue giuen their faith to the king of England, they are not bound to keepe it: in a wicked promise no oth is to be performed. I am now wearie of my life, and rather desire to die, than to liue in this sort, to see the miserie of my beloued countrie. Wherefore embrace you this thraldome (which is so much esteemed of you) to whome sithie seruitude with ease seemeth more pleasant, than honest libertie with danger: for I had rather chuse willing death with freedome (in which I meane to spend my blood) than to doe as you haue done, because the loue of my countrie shall not depart from my hart, before the life of my bodie depart from his office. Which being said, Wallace burst forth in teares, considering the nobilitie of the mind of Wallace, although perhaps he nothing misliked the misfortune of the man, as doubting the end of all his pretense to be, to attaine to the crowne. This being thus done, they both depart to their companies. By which conference (saith Leslee bishop of Koffe) this god was wrought to Scotland (to recompense the ouerthrow of Falkirke) that Wallace partlie by the bitterness of his words, and partlie for the loue of his countrie, did now draw Wallace from the English, to take part with the Scots.)

Wallace renounced his office.

Philip king of France.

A truce.

Scottish ambassadors sent to pope Boniface.

But notwithstanding all these valiant speeches of Wallace, when he considered the infortunat discomfiture by him so treacherouslie receiued, he came to Perth, and there uttering by complaint the inuictous enuie of the nobles against him, he renounced and discharged himselfe of all the authoritie which had bene committed to his hands, touching the gouernance of the realme, and went into France, as saith Leslee. But Iohannes Maior saith, that he neuer came there, although he will not flatlie denie it. The same time, Philip king of France, the fourth of that name, and surnamed le Beau, hauing great ruth in his hart for the miserable calamities thus chanced to his ancient confederat friends the Scots, and that chieflie for the quarrell of France, sent his ambassadoꝛs vnto Edward king of England, who had latelie before married his daughter, requiring that there might be some peace oꝛ abstinence of warre granted. At his request therefore a truce was taken betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, to indure from the feast of All saints, till the feast of Pentecost next following.

The Scots in the meane time soꝛe oppressed by reas- son of long warres, sent ambassadoꝛs to pope Boni- face, in presenting a verie grievous complaint vnto him, for the great affliction done to them by king Edward, who was fullie bent by inuiros meanes (as they alledged) to conquer their realme, and therefoꝛe they besought him to constrain king Edward by vertue of his prerogatiue, which he pretended to haue ouer the realme of England, to stand to his oꝛder in deciding the right concerning the liberties of Scotland, which might no other waies be determined, but by intollerable damage falling to the people through blind desire and couetous ambition of the nobles, contending for the crowne. The pope (as is said) after he had by god and deliberat aduise heard the matter, gaue sentence with the Scots, that they had iust cause of warres in defense of the liberties of their countrie, against R. Edward and his fauours. ¶ But for this matter, loke in the English chronicles, where it shall well appere, that the pope by these letters of king Edward, was fullie satisfied of his superiority ouer Scotland.

The opinion of the pope.

John Cummin the younger elected gouernour of Scotland. An armie of Englishmen sent into Scotland.

The Scots somewhat recomforted herevnto, thoztie herevpon chose John Cummin to their gouernour, in purpose to trie with the Englishmen for their liberties. Whereof king Edward being aduertised, sent forthwith an armie into Scotland, which passed through the countrie to saint Johns towne, with great damage of those that were aduinged rebels to king Edwards empire. All the countrie in manner vnto Forthie, at this season was subiect to the Englishmen, sauing such few of the inhabitants, as liued within the woods, hauing more regard to the ancient liberties of their countrie, than to anie desire of preseruing their goods oꝛ liues. John Cummin therefore, desirous to redresse this heauie miserie and lamentable case of his countrie, admitted Simon Fraser fellow with him in the administration of the warres against the Englishmen, and therewith gathering an armie of eight thousand hardie men of warre, set teth in hand to reuenge the iniurious doings of the enemies, chasing out of the realme all such officers with their seruants, as king Edward had placed in anie townes within the bounds of Scotland; and such as resisted, he pursued in most cruell wise, not sparing to put them vnto the sword in all places, where he might find them.

King Edwards officers chased out of Scotland.

Scotland againe invaded.

King Edward soꝛe kindled in displeasure with these attempts of such desperat persons, called an armie of thirtie thousand men, and sent the same into Scotland, vnder the leading of a verie stout and valiant capteine, named Radulph oꝛ Rafe Constraie. This Radulph at his comming into Scotland, toke small regard to the ordering of his field, but diuided his armie into thre parts, euery part containing ten thousand men, and appointed them to passe forth to forraie the countrie, and to meet altogether at Rosslyn, in such sort and time as he prescribed. John Cummin and Simon Fraser being aduertised hereof, gathered their powers togither, to the number of seuen oꝛ eight thousand men, and determined to trie the chance of battell with one part of the English armie first, trusting that if they happened to haue the vpper hand of one of the thre parts, the other two would be the more easie to deale with. The Scottish capteins resolved thus vpon that point, exhorted their people to remember how they were to fight in defense of their vniuers, their children, their goods, and liberties of their countrie, against such as sought to bring them into thraldome and vile seruitude.

Radulph oꝛ Rafe Constraie. I remember not that anie of the English nobilitie bare this surname in those daies, wherefoꝛe I thinke it was the lord John Hegraue. John Cummin and Simon Fraser.

With which words the Scots were so imboldened, that minding either to die oꝛ to win the victorie, they gaue the onset so fiercelie on their enemies, that the first battell of the Englishmen was quicklie ouerthrowen and banquished. But scarce he had they gathered the spoile, when an other part of the English men came vpon them with more fiercenesse than the other other before: neuertheless, the Scots encouraged with their fresh womie victorie, got themselves speedie into arrate, & receiued their enemies with such incredible manhood, that they had quickly got the upper hand of these also. But scarce had they made an end with this second battell, when the third part was at hand ready to charge them, being now sore infested, that thorough wearinesse and wounds receiued in the two former encounters, besides the want of such of their numbers as were slain: yet by exhortation of their capteins, and the valiant presence of the officers of bands beside, they rushed forth on their enemies with such earnest forwardnesse to recieue them, that after a verie sharpe bickering, they put the whole number of them to flight. Few of the Englishmen had escaped the Scottishmens hands, had they not bene so wearied with continuall fight, that they were not able to follow anie great waite in the chase.

The matter to the better

This victorie fell to the Scots in manner as is before rehearsed, upon saint Patthewes day, in the yere after the birth of our Sauour 1302. The glorie of this victorie was great, considering that thirtie thousand Englishmen well furnished, & thoroughly appointed for warre, should be thus in one day banquished with an handful of Scottishmen. For as their histories make mention, they passed not eight thousand at the most: and therefore all men supposed that it came to passe by the singular fauour and grace of almighty God. But yet the Scots did not long introy the benefits of so notable a victorie. For king Edward hearing of this discomfiture of his people at Roslin, gathered a mightie armie of Englishmen, Gascoignes, Irishmen, and such Scots as toke his part, and having all his furniture and purueiance ready both by sea and land, he set forward with the same to invade the Scots on eche side. The Scots perceiving they were not of puissance able to resist his inuasion, withdrew to their strengths: by means whereof the English armie passed through all Scotland, even from the south parts to the north, & found few or none to make resistance, except Wallace, and such as followed his opinion, which were fled to the mountains and woods, to eschue the malice of the Englishmen.

It is said, that king Edward required by a messenger sent vnto this Wallace, that if he would come in and be sworn his liege man and true subiect, he should haue at his hands great lordships and possessions within England, to mainteine his port as was requisite to a man of verie honorable estate. But Wallace refused these offers, saieing that he preferred libertie with small reuenues in Scotland, before anie possession of lands in England, were the same neuer so great; considering he might not introy them, but under the yoke of bondage. The castell of Sterling at the same time was in the keeping of one sir William Althred knight, who would not render it to king Edward by anie summons or other meanes, till after thre moneths siege he was constrained to give it ouer under these conditions; That all persons being within the castell, should depart by safe conduct with bagge and baggage at their pleasure. Neuertheless king Edward caused the said sir William Althred to be conueied to London, where he remained as prisoner manie yeres after.

Sundrie other castells were taken by force the same time by king Edward, and all such as resisted, being found within anie of them, slain without mercie or ranfome. Amongest other, the castell of Arquhard in Murray land was taken by force, and not one left alieue that was found in the same (one gentlewoman onelie excepted) who being great with child, was in that respect preserved. She was the wife of Alexander Boyis, lord of that house, though by reason she was got into poore apparell, the Englishmen toke hir but for some other woman of meaner estate. She therefore with hir life saured, being suffered to depart, got hir ouer into Ireland, where she was deliuered of a son, that was named at the font-stone Alexander, who when Scotland was recovered out of the Englishmens hands, came to king Robert le Bruce, requiring him to be restored vnto his fathers heritage, being as then in the occupation of other possessors. King Robert doubtfull what to do here in, for he thought it neither conuenient that a prince should take lands or possessions from noble men, which had bene giuen to them in reward of their manhood, shewed in defense of the realme; neither iudged he it reason to keepe him from his rightfull inheritance that had lost his father, his friends, and all his whole substance in the like cause and quarrell by iniurie of the common enemies.

Wherefore to qualifie the matter, he deuised this meane: he gaue vnto this Alexander Boyis certeine other lands in Spar, nothing lesse in value (considering the largenesse and fertilitie) than the other of Arquhard were: and willed him to content himselfe with those, in recompense of such as belonged to his father: to the intent that all parties might be satisfi- ed, and no man should seme to haue wrong in being deprived of his rightfull possessions. This Alexander Boyis had afterwards his name changed, and was called Forbesse, for that he due a beare in those parties, by great and singular manhood. And so the surname of the Forbesses had beginning, as descended from him. Scotland being subdued by the mightie puissance of king Edward, he went about to abolish all the old statutes and ancient constitutions of the realme, trusting by that meanes, that Scots living togither with Englishmen, vnder one vni forme manner of lawes, they should finallye sort themselves to be of one mind and opinion, as well touching the supreme gouernement of their publike weale, as also in all other things, touching the friendlie societie of life.

He burnt all the chronicles of the Scottish nation, with all manner of booke, as well those containing diuine seruice, as anie other treatises of profane matters, to the end that the memorie of the Scots should perish: and thereto appointed greuous punishments for them that should disobey his commandements herein, in keeping anie of the said booke vndeaced. And he ordeined also, that the Scots should occupie church booke after the vse of Sarum, and none other. Whereouer, he compelled all such Scottishmen as were of anie singular knowledge in learning or literature, to be resident in Oxford, doubting least the Scottish nobilitie increasing in politike prudence by their instructions, should seeke to throw off the yoke of bondage. Thus king Edward going about (as the Scottish writers doe report) to ertinguish the name of Scots, togither with their rule and empire, passed through the most part of all the bounds of Scotland. And vpon verie hate which he had to the Scottish antiquities, at his coming to Camelon, he commanded the round temple standing ouer against the same, to be thrown downe, which was builded (as before is shewed) in the honor of Claudius the emperoz, and the goddesse Victoria. But for that his commandement was not immediately put in execution, he changed his purpose, and appointed onelie that the monuments of Claudius, with the superscription of his name, should be taken awaie; and in place thereof, the armes of king Arthur, with his name to be set vp; commanding the place to be called Arthurs hois (as ye would say) Arthurs is examined.

Forreuer king Edward at his returning into England, took the chaire of marble with him, and causing it to be conuied vp to London, did place it at Westminster, where it remaineth yet vnto this day. Furthermore, before his departure out of Scotland, he appointed all the Scottish lords to assemble at Scone, where he caused them to take a new oath, that from thenceforth they should take him for their soueraigne lord, and to obeye him in all things as loiall subjects. All the nobilitie of Scotland was sworne to him that day (Wallace onelie excepted) who eschewed more than the companie of a serpent, to haue anie thing to do with the Englishmen, touching anie agreement to be made with them, agreeable to their desires. Forreuer, to keepe the Scots from rebellion, king Edward ordeined Domare de Clarence to be gouernour there, as his generall lieutenant ouer the whole realme of Scotland in his absence. And hauing thus set all things in good and quiet order (as he supposed) he returned into England with great ioy and triumph.

In the meane time, John Cumin surnamed the red, and Robert Wylse hauing conference together, complained the one to the other of the miserable seruitude wherein the realme of Scotland as then stood by the oppression of king Edward. And at length by on offers made betwixt them, it was agreed, that if by anie means they might deliuer the realme out of the Englishmens hands, the one of them should be king, that is to say, the Wylse, and the other, that is to say, the Cumin, should inioyn all the Wylses lands and possessions, with manie other preferments of honours and dignities, as next vnto him in all authoritie touching the gouernement of the realme. There were indentures made betwene them, subscribed with their names, and sealed with their seales interchangeably, for the full ratiffing of covenants agreed in this confederacie betwixt them. Shortly after, upon deliuerie of those writings, Wylse went into England, for he might not remaine long in Scotland, for doubt of suspicion which king Edward had in him, because of the title which he had to the crowne of Scotland (as before is specified) so that (as was thought) king Edward would haue put both him and his brethren vnto death long before, if he might haue once got them all into his hands.

John Cumin (after that he and Wylse were thus agreed upon articles, and departed the one from the other) began to doubt, least this conspiracie deuised betwixt them, would not sort to anie luckie conclusion for his purpose, either for that he feared the great puissance of king Edward, either else for that his authoritie and power (as he mistrusted) would not be great, if the Wylse once attained the crowne: and hereupon he sent one of his seruants to king Edward, with his counterpane of the indenture, containing the covenants of the conspiracie, signed and sealed with Wylses owne hand and seale. The messenger deliuered this writing in secret wise to king Edward, declaring vnto him the whole matter, as it was passed and concluded betwixt the Wylse and his maister, according to instructions giuen him in that behalfe. But king Edward at the first gaue light credit either to the writings or words of the Cumin, supposing that the same proceeded onelie through enuie, which he bare towards the Wylse, euer dreading lest he should beare no rule in Scotland, if the Wylse once attained anie authoritie within the same. Yet at length, king Edward pondering with himselfe the whole circumstance, and being in some doubt of the matter, he shewed the counterpane of the indenture vnto Wylse himselfe, questioning with him, if he knew his owne hand: Wylse stoutlie denied that he was pxtie to anie such deusse or writing, and there-fore desired of king Edward to haue the same for one night, to peruse and scan ouer at leasure, & then if he were not able to proue that it was forged, and maliciouslie deuised upon an enuious purpose, to put him in danger of life, he would forsaik all his lands and liuings that he held either within the realme of England, or else where. King Edward, because he coniectured at the first how this accusation of Cumin was nothing like to be true, granted his request, wherein manie iudged he did vnwiselie: but such was the ordinance of almighty God, that Wylse should escape that danger, to accomplish that whereunto he was appointed. The earle of Gloucester immediatlie after that Robert Wylse was departed from the kings presence, sent vnto him twelue sterling pence, with two sharpe spurs, whereb he coniectured his meaning to be, that the best shift for him was to auoid out of the waie in most speedie wise, whereupon he causing a smith to shoo thre horses for him, contrailie with the calkins forward, that it should not be perceined which waie he had taken by the tract of the horses, for that the ground at that time (being in the winter season) was couered with snow: he departed out of London about midnight, accompanied onelie with two trustie seruants.

It chanced also, that there fell on the same night more snow aloft upon the other snow that was fallen before, by reason whereof it could not easilie be traced in the morning which way he was gone, though king Edward upon knowledge had that he was fled, sent out a great manie of horsemen after, to haue brought him againe, if they might anie where haue found him. But Wylse hasted forth with such speed in his iourne, that the seventh day of his departure from London, he came to Louchmaben in Annandale, and there found David, (as some books haue) Edward his brother, with Robert Fleming, a worthy yong gentleman, vnto whom (they musing what he meant by his sudden comming) he declared into what perill of life he had fallen by means of Cumin, and how narrowlie he had escaped out of king Edwards hands. His brother hearing the matter, consented to go with him, and to be partaker of all haps that might fortune to fall out in his flight; and by the way they chanced to light vpon one of Cumins seruants, that was going with letters vnto king Edward from his maister the said Cumin, signifieng by the same, that if Wylse were not the soner put to death, there would insue shortly such trouble and ruffling in Scotland against R. Edward, that it would be much adu to appeale it.

These letters being found about Cumins servant, through means of yong Fleming, the Wylse after he had apposed the bearer throughlie in each behalfe, and learned of him that his maister the said Cumin was in the friers at Dunfrise, he first sue this fellow that was thus sent with the letters, & after in all hast possible came to Dunfrise, by the guiding of the same Fleming, where in the quier of the friers church there he found Cumin. And reasoning the matter there with him, for that he had vsed him so euill, and withall shewing him the indenture which king Edward had deliuered to him, as before is mentioned, in the end (after some multiplieng of words together) Robert Wylse plucked forth his sword, and stroke the fore said Cumin a sore blow in the bellie, and thereupon flasing out of the church, met with two of his dearest friends, James Lindsay, and Roger Keithpatrick, who beholding his countenance altered, and comming forth of the church in such hast, demanded of him what was the matter: I trow (said he) that Cumin is slaine. an enterprife, and left it doubtfull: And immediatlie herewith they went to the place where Cumin lay wounded (as before is mentioned) and asked of him whether he thought he had anie deaths wound, or hoped to recouer if he might haue a good furgian.
And for that he answered how he trusted to do well inough if he might haue a good furgian in time; they gaue him thre or foure other wounds so grieuous and deablie, that forthwith vpon the same he paelded by the ghost. This chanced in the yeare of our Lord 1305, the fourth Ides of Februarie. About the same time was William Wallase taken at Claskoto by the means of sir John Spenteth and others, in whome he had euer put a most speciall trust; but they being corrupted with the offers of large rewards promised by king Edward to such as could helpe to take him, wrought such fetches that he was apprehended at length by Ddomare de Valence earle of Penbrooke, who with a great power of men brought him to London, where he was put to death, and his quarters sent into Scotland, and set vp in sundrie great towne there for a spectacle, as it were to giue example to other. This was the end of that puissant champion William Wallase, passed amongst the Scottismen aboue all other in that age, for so much as he would neuer yeld or consent to acknowledge anie superiouritie in the Englishmen ouer his countrie, no not when all other had submitted themselves to king Edward as his liege subiects and most obedient bassals. It is said, that when he was young and went to schoole, he learned by heart two verses of his scholemaster, which euer after he bare in mind, and vsuallie would rehearse them, (when a toy toke him in the head) as followeth.

*Dico tibi verum, libertas optima rerum, Nunquam seruis, sub nexu uiuio fli.
My sonne I say, freedome is best, Then neuer yeeld to thrals arrest.*

Of this William Wallase one Henrie, who was blind from his birth, in the time of my natiuitie (saith John Maior) composed a whole booke in bul-gar verse, in which he witteth all those things bul-garlie spoken of this Wallase. But I do not in all points saith the same author, giue credit to the wittings of such as he was, who onelie get their food and clothing (whereof this man was most worthy) by reciting of histories before the nobilitie of Scotland.

But now touching Wallase; after he had slaine Cumin (as before is mentioned) he purchased an absolution from Rome for that act: and to the end he might then through authoritie obtaine some aid to resist the puissance of his aduersarie king Edward, he went by support of friends vnto Scone, & there caused himselfe to be crowned king, on the 27 day of March, though he had no great number that toke his part in the beginning, as shortly after well appeared. For when he should assemble an armie against a power of Englishmen that were sent against him by king Edward, immediatlie vpon knowledge had of his attempts, he was not able to get together anie sufficient number to resist his ad-uersaries, though with those few which came vnto him, he thought to trie the chance of battell, and so incountering with Ddomare de Valence lieutenant of the English armie at Speffen the 19 day of June 1306, he was there put to flight; and though the slaughter was not great, yet for that it was iudged to be an euill signe to haue such infortunat lucke vpon his entering into the estate, the peoples fauor spanke greatlie from him.

Ddomare de Valence after he had obtained this victory against king Robert, banished the wiues of all those that supported the same Robert, by means whereof, manie ladies and gentlewomen were constrained to flee into woods, and other desert places, to escape the crueltie of their aduersaries. King Robert also after this ouerthrow, fled into Atholl, and from thence to Streill, where the third Ides of August at a place called Dalreie, he fought againe with the Cumins and other such Scots & Englishmen as were assembled in those parties ready to pursue him, and had the like lucke here that had chanced to him before at Speffen; for he was put to flight after the same maner, though he lost here but few of his men, neither in the fight nor chase. This place Dalreie is as much to say, as the kings field: Buchan lib. 8, which is also called Dalwhie by I. Maior. lib. 4. cap. 19, who supposeth that Bute had so hard a beginning for a punishment of the death of Cumin, slaine in the church by him and his friends.

Wherevpon finding fortune thus contrarie vnto him in these two seuerall battels, he was left so desolat and unprouided of all friendship, that he was constrained for his refuge to withdraw into the woods and mounteins, with a few other in his com-panie, and there liued on herbs and roots oftentimes for want of other food.

Whilste he remained in this estate of aduerser fortune, there were two that shewed themselves right trustie and faithfull seruants vnto him aboue all the rest, the earle of Leuenor, and Gilbert Hare: for though either inforced by persequer of enemies, or constrained through some other necessitie, they departed sometimes from his presence; yet did they e-uer acknowledge him for their soueraigne lord and onelie king, ready at all seasons to serue and obey him in each behalfe. The most part of all other his friends yea and seruants, in that present miserie, did cleaue for sake him; so that sometimes he was left with onelie one or two in his companie, & glad to keepe himselfe secret in desert places, where no person lightlie vled to resort. His wife & queene fled to saint Duntholme, and chanced to be taken by William Cumin earle of Ross, who deliuered hir to king Edward, by whose commandement the was committed to safe keeping at London, where she remained till after the battell of Bannockburne. His brother Nigel was also taken, and so afterwards were his two other brethren, Thomas and Alexander, with manie other nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, of whome some were executed at Car-leill, and some at Berwik. Nigel was taken at the castell of Biddome whither he fled, and came to Berwik. Thomas and Alexander were taken at Locheis, and carried to Carleill, and so beheaded.
Io. Maior lib. 4. cap. 19. Finally the most part of all such as had aided him before, and were now drawne from him, were within one yeare after, either slaine or kept as prisoners in England.

Yet though he was thus left desolat of all aid and succor, hauing his brethren and other of his friends murdered and slaine to his vtter discomfort and ruine (as was to be supposed) he neuertheless liued e-uer in hope of some better fortune, whereby in time to come he might recouer the realme out of the enimies hands, and restore the ancient libertie thereof to the former estate. As for the paines which he toke in liuing barelie for the most part by water & roots, & lodging oftentimes on the bare earth, without house or other harborough, he was so accustomed thereto by haunting the warres in his youth, that the same griued him little or nothing at all. But to conclude, such was his valiancie and most excellent fortitude of mind and courage, that no iniurious mischance of froward aduersitie could abash his inuincible heart and manlike stomach. At length, after he had wandered from place to place in sundrie parts of Scotland, the better to auoid the sleights of them that laie in wait to apprehend him, he got ouer into one of the Iles, where comming vnto one of his speciall friends, a man of high nobilitie and welbeloued of the people in those parts, he was most hartlie welcome, and glablie of him receiued, to his great ease and comfort.

Here when he had remained a certeine space, hee got suppozt of men, armor and weapons, by meanes whereof taking new courage, he passed ouer vnto Carrik, & winning the castell there that belonged to his fathers inheritance, he due all the Englishmen, which he found within it, and bestowed all the spoile of monie and goods gotten there amongst his souldiers and men of warre. His friends that late hid in covert and secret corners, hearing of these his doings, began from each side to resort vnto him, by whose assistance thortlie after he wan the castell of Inuerneffe, and due all them that were within it in garrison. With the like felicitie he got the most part of all the castells in the north, racing & burning by the same till he came to Glennesk, where being aduertised that John Cummin with sundrie Englishmen and Scots were gathered against him, because he was vpon a strong ground, he determined there to abide them: but they being thereof informed, and wondering at his manlie courage, durst not approach to giue him battell, but sent ambassadozs vnto him to haue truce for a time, vnder colour of some communication for a peace, till they might increase their power more strongly against him: which being done, they pursued him more fiercelie than before. Neuertheless King Robert receiued them at all times in such warlike order, that they might neuer take him at anie aduantage, but were still driuen backe with slaughter and losse, though the same was of no great importance to make account of, but such like as happeneth oftentimes in skirmishes & light encounters, where the battels come not to soine puilliance against puilliance. The same thereof yet procured him the fauour of sundrie great barons in Scotland.

* About this time, Simon Fraser, and Walter Logan (most valiant knights, and greatlie fauouring their countrie) were taken (by such as followed the faction of Cummin) deliuered to the English, sent to London, and there executed. Almost about which time, James Dowglas joined himselfe to the part of King Robert. This James being the sonne of William Dowglas, was a yong gentleman very active and forwarde in all chiefe exercises and arts. Who when he gaue himselfe to studie at Paris (hearing that his father was by the king of England cast in prison, in which he thortlie after died, as is before noted) returned home to dispose the rest of his life after the aduise of his friends. But being without living, & all his other friends by misfortune dispersed: he committed himselfe to the seruice of W. Lambert bishop of saint Andrews, of whome hee was gentlie receiued into his familie, and well intertained: vntill King Edward comming to Sterling (after that he had almost pacified all the rest of Scotland) to besiege Striueling: at what time Lambert going to Sterling to salute the king, caried Dowglas to attend vpon him, to the end to prefer him to his living and inheritance. Whereupon the bishop finding the king at conuenient leisure, besought him to be fauourable to this Dowglas: to restore him vnto his fathers patrimonie: and that (receiuing the yong man into his fealtie and defence) it would please him to implete him in his faithfull and warlike seruice: adding further such commendations in the behalfe of James, as for that time he thought most conuenient. But the king vnder-standing his name and kindred, spake bitterlie of the disobedience and stubbernesse of his father William Dowglas: further answering, that he would neither be the same James, nor his trauell in anie thing, neither that he could (if so he would) restore him to his patrimonie, because he had with the same gratified other that well deserued it. For which cause being by the king so repelled, he remained still in the bishops seruice, vntill Bruce came into Berne, at what time (least he might lose the opportunity to offend King Edward, whome he secretlie in heart disdained) this Dowglas departed from Lambert his maister, taking with him all the bishops gold, and certeine of his best horses, with the which, hauing in his companie diuerse other hardie yong gentlemen, priuie to his doings, he fled with all speed vnto King Robert, offering him his seruice, and to spend his life in his quarell and defence. The bishop was priuie to his counsils going awaie, yet no means it should outwardlie so appeare, for doubt least if things had not come to passe as he wished, he might haue run in danger for his cloaked dissimulation. The Dowglas was iustlie receiued of King Robert, in whose seruice he faithfully continued both in peace and warre to his liues end.

Though the surname and familie of the Dowglases was in some estimation of nobilitie before those daies, yet the rising thereof to honoz chanced through this James Dowglas: for by meanes of his aduancement, other of the same linage took occasion by their singular manhood and noble pzooves shewed at sundrie times in defense of the realme, to grow to such height in authoritie & estimation, that their mightie puilliance in mainrent, lands, & great possessions, at length was (through suspicion conceived by the kings that succeeded) the cause in part of their ruinous decay. Edward king of England hearing of the doings of his aduersarie King Robert, doubted (if some redresse were not found in time) lest the Scots reioicing in the prosperous successe of his said aduersarie, would revolt wholie from the English obedience: and hereupon purposing with all speed to subdue the whole realme of Scotland from end to end, he came (with a far greater armie than euer he had raised before) to the borders; but before his entring into Scotland, he fell sicke of a right fore and grieuous maladie, whereof he died thortlie after at Burgh vpon sands, as in the English historie more plainlie doth appeare, though Buchanan say he died at Lancaster.

The Scottish writers make mention, that a litle before he departed out of this world, there were brought vnto him 55 yong striplings, which were taken in the castell of Bilszummie, after it was wonne by the Englishmen, and being asked what should be done with them, he commanded they should be hanged incontinentlie, without respect to their yong peeres, or consideration of their innocencies that might haue moued him to pittie. After his decesse, his sonne Edward of Carnaruan succeeded in the gouernement of England, who following his fathers enterprize, called a counsell at Dunfreis, summoning the lords of Scotland to appeare at the same, and caused a great number of them at their comming thither to do their homage vnto him, as to their superiour lord and gouernoz: but yet diuers disobeyed his commandements, and would not come at his summoning, vpon trust of some change of fortune by the death of his father, for that the son was much giuen (as was reported) to incline his eare to lewd counsell, not without the great griefe of his people, and namelie of the lords and chiefe nobles of his realme.

of Carnaruan

Shottlie after this, the said Edward of Carnarvan returned into England, and in the meane time John Cumyn erle of Buchquhane gathered a mighty armie, both of Scots and Englishmen to resist against king Robert, that he might thereby declare his faithfull affection toward the new English king. He trusted onelie with multitude of people to cause his enemies to giue place: but king Robert though he was holden with a sore sicknesse at that time, yet he assembled a power, and caused himselfe in a horse-litter to be caried forth with the same against his enemies, who abiding him at a streight, supposed it had bin an easie matter for them to be put to flight: but it chanced quite contrarie to their expectation, for in the end the Cumyn with his whole armie was discomfited, and a great number of king Roberts aduersaries slaine or taken. This victorie was gotten at a village called Cnuerrour, ten miles distant from Aberdeen, on the Ascension daie, wherewith king Robert was so much refreshed in contentation of mind, that he was suddenlie therupon restored to his former health, hauing at that time also taken the castell of Aberdeen, which he utterlie destroyed, and caused to be leuelled with the ground, to the end his enemies might haue no more refuge thereby.

Robert, and was on the feast day of the apostles Peter and Paule discomfited by Edward Bruce the kings brother, at the water of Weir. At this battell was a right valiant knight named Rowland, slaine of the English part, with a great number of other about him, and Donald himselfe was taken prisoner. Thus king Robert through fauour of prosperous fortune, obtaining the victorie in sundrie condias, came with an armie into Argile, and not onelie subdued the countrie to his obeisance, but also toke Alexander lord of Argile out of a strong castell in that countrie, and banished him with all his friends into England, where shottlie after he decessed. In the yere next following, king Edward came with an armie into Scotland, where ioining with an other armie of Scots that were assembled readie to aid him, he passed through the countrie vnto Kanfrax, and at length without atchiuing anie notable enterprise twoyche the mentioning, he returned againe into England.

In the same yere, through continuall warres, there rose such dearth & scarcitie of things in Scotland, that neither coine nor other vittels could be had for monie: for the ground in manner generallye through the countrie late vntilled, and beastes with all kind of cattell were giuen auaie, as booties taken by the enemies. By reason wherof the famine so increased on each side, that the people were constrained to eat horses, and other lothsome flesh & meats, thereby to susteine their liues. In the yere following which was after the incarnation 1311, king Robert chased the Englishmen out of all parts of Scotland, winning manie castles out of their hands, diuerse of the which he rased and consumed with fire. After this entring at sundrie times into England with his fierce armie, he brought from thence innumerable booties of cattell and other riches, afflicting the Englishmen with like slaughter and calamities, as the Scots had suffered in the yeres before, by the outrageous force and puissance of king Edward. On the eight day of Januarie next ensuing, king Robert won by fine force the strong towne of Perth, sleaing and hanging all the people both English and Scottish, which were found in the same. He threw also the walles of that towne to the ground, and filled the ditch with the rampire. The same yere the castles of Dunfreis, Aire, Lanarke, with manie other strengths and castles were rendered vnto him, and cast to the ground.

The castell of Rokesburgh was taken by sir James Dologlasse on feastings euen, in the yere 1313, when they of the garison were ouercome with immoderate surfetting by meats and drinks excessive taken, according as on that day the accustomed vse is. In that yere also Thomas Randall, afterwards created earle of Murray, won the castell of Edinburgh. In which yere also, Bruce won the Ile of Man; John Maior lib. 5. cap. 1. And the same yere Edward Bruce besieged the castell of Strueling: but the strength of the house was such, that by nature of the high crag whereon it stood, and what by fortification of mans hand beside, all his trauell and inforcement diligently imployed to win it, produced vaine for the time. Within this castell as capteine thereof, was a right valiant knight named sir Philip Potowray, a Scottish man borne, but taking part with the English men, who feared nothing the siege, for he had sufficient store of men, vittels, munition, and all maner of purueance sufficient to defend the hold for a long season: so that finallye Edward Bruce, perceiuing no meanes whereby to atchiue the enterpryse, which he had rashly taken in hand, was abashed thereof: for by force he saw well enough it could not be brought to passe, and by large offers made to the capteine, if he would render the place, and become seruant to the king his brother, he could not once moue him to giue anie care thereto, inso much as at length he sought to trie him another way forth, which in the end toke better effect than was likelie it would haue done, considering the lacke of circumspection vsed in the bargain making: as thus.

After long siege, and (as before is said) no good done, there was a motion made betwixt him and the capteine within for a truce, which was accorded on this wise: that if the fortreffe were not succoured within twelue moneths next ensuing, it should then be rendered vnto king Robert, and in the meane time no force should be vsed against it. This composition was vnwiselie made, as most men iudget: for euerie man of anie wisdom might easilie coniecture, that king Edward hauing so long day to make his prouision, would come in support of them within the castell, and that so stronglie, as would be hard for the Scots to resist him. King Robert himselfe also was sore offended with his brother for his follie shewed in this behalfe: but yet he would not go about to breake the couenant accorded, for doubt to lose his brother, whose aid he might not well want.

In the meane time king Edward sent forth messengers with letters, not onelie vnto all his subiects, but also vnto all his confederats and allies, to haue men of warre taken by and refuted to serue him in his warres against the Scots, which he intended to solow to the utter destruction of the whole nation. There came therefore in hope of spoile, not onlie such as were appointed by commissioners of the musters, but also a great number of other that offered themselves of their owne accord to go in that iournie, namelie such as had little to liue vpon at home, and trusted to amend the matter by some good fortune in the warres abroad. The countries out of the which it is reported by the Scottish writers, that such aid came to the English, were these; Holand, Zeland, Brabant, Flanders, Picardie, Bolognois, Gascolgne, Normandie, Guien, and Burdelois. For all these at that time were either subiect to the king of England, or else in confederate league with him. There were also manie Scots that were English by deuotion, and aided king Edward at this time.

But the number of naturall Englishmen exceeded anie one nation beside, insomuch that the whole armie what of one and other, contained (as the same went) one hundred and fiftie thousand footmen, and almost as manie horsemen, beside cartage-men, coistrels, women, and lackies, but the same herein belike (as often hapenech) did farre exceed the truth.
For it is not to be thought (as John Maior himselfe writeth) that he should get such a number together, not for that England it selfe is not able to set forth such a power: for as the same Maior saith, as manie men as are to be found in England of lawfull age, so manie able personages may be found there to passe for able souldiers. But either kings are not of abilitie to find so great a multitude with vittels and sufficient provision, or else they will not streine them selues thereto. Penethelesse, the whole number by all likelihood was great, for many as well strangers as Englishmen, brought their wiues, their children, and whole household-maine with them, in hope after the countrie were once subdued, to haue dwelling places appointed them in the same, there to inhabit: for so had king Edward promised them. By reason whereof the disorder was such, that no warlike discipline might be obserued amongst them: for men, women, and children, were all mixt together, with such clamor and noise, through the huge number of people, and diuersitie of languages, that it was a thing right strange to behold a campe so confusedlie ordered.

King Edward himselfe most proud and insolent of such incredible number, took no heed at all to the gouerning of them, supposing victorie to be alreadie in his hands; insomuch that at his coming to the borders, he took advise with his counsell to what kind of torment and death he might put king Robert, for he had no doubt of catching him at all.
He also brought with him a religious man somewhat learned belike, of the order of the Carmelites, to describe the whole maner of his conquest and victorie ouer the Scots: so sure he thought himselfe that all things would come to passe as he could wish or de-uise. This Carmelite, as may appeare in John Bales booke, intituled A summarie of the writers of great Britaine, was named Robert Basson, and had the gouernance of an house in Scarborough, of the Carmelites order, he being (as before is said) of that cote himselfe.

On the contrarie part, king Robert ordered all his doings by god & prudent advise, and with men, right hardie and thoughtlie exercised in wars, came forth against his enemies, shewing no token of feare in the world, but boldlie pitched downe his tents in god order and warlike arate, vpon a plaine a little aboue Bannockshorne. Whether he did this for the great confidence he had in the hardinesse of his people, or for that he would shew how little he doubted the puissance of his enemies, least they should haue him in contempt, it is vncertaine. Indeed there were diuerse expert warriours amongst the Englishmen, that said (when they heard how the Scots were thus assembled to fight) that the victorie would not be had, except it were dearelie bought: the wisdom and manhood of king Robert was knowne so well amongst them, that they were assured he would not leaue himselfe in such a case, but that he knew he had such fellows about him, as would sticke to their tackle.

Whereouer the Scots by appointment of their king, to the furtherance of his hardie enterprize, had cast deepe pits and ditches in the place where it was iudged the battels should ioine, and pitched sharpe stakes within the same, and after couered them ouer slighlie with greene turfes or sods, in such wise that a few footmen might passe ouer well enough; but if a nie great number should come preealling together, or that anie horsemen came therevpon, the sods would shinke and fall to the bottome of the trenches, with extreme perill of the men and horses, that were sure to fall vpon the stakes set there for that purpose; or else to be so inclosed, that they should not be able to get out of those pitts. By the place where king Robert was thus incamped, there runneth a great broke or water called Bannockshorne, so named of open-cakes called bannocks, which were used to be made commonlie at the mills standing on the banks of the said water. It falleth into the forthright famous afterwards by reason of this battell fought nere to the same.

When both the armies were approached within a mile together, king Edward sent eight hundred horsemen by a secret waie, vnto the castell of Striue-ling, to giue notice to sir Philip Mowbray the captaine, that he was come with his armie to succour him. K. Robert being aduertised of their gate, & beholding them which way they took, he sent Thomas Randall with five hundred Scottish horsemen to saue the countrie from spoile, who with singular manhood incountered with those Englishmen in sight of both the armies, there ensued a cruell fight betwixt them for so small a number, continuing a long space with vncertaine victorie. In the meane time sir James Douglas, dreading that his speciall friend the said Thomas Randall should be overfet with multitude of the Englishmen, came to K. Robert, and falling on his knees before him, required license to go forth to the support of them that were thus fighting with their enemies: which because the king would not grant at the first, he rushed forth of the campe without licence, hauing in his companie a small band of men, but yet chosen out for the purpose, that if it were but by shewing himselfe, hee might put the enemies in some feare.

Notwithstanding, when he was come nere to the place where they fought, and saw how the Scots had got the victorie with great murder of the Englishmen, he staied and went no further: least he should by his coming seeme to beaue them the glozie of the victorie, which had toone it with so great proweesse & singular valiance. All those in the Scottish campe were relieved, in god hope of greater successe to follow in the whole enterprize by so happie a beginning.
The Englishmen passed little thereof, but yet for that the Scots should not waie proud, and take ouermuch courage thereby, they determined to giue them battell the next morow. King Robert with great diligence caused his people to prepare themselves readie to receiue the enemies, though he was nothing able to match them in number, denifing which waie he might traine them into the ditches before prepared. He commanded through the armie that euery man should on the next morow receiue the sacrament of the Lords bodie, through the which they might haue the better hope of victorie against the vntast invaders of their realme and countrie.

On the other side, the Englishmen trusted that all things would prosper with them, even as they could best deuise: for by one small daies labour they hoped to be lords of all Scotland, and to dispose of the lands and goods of their enemies, as should seeme to them good, and most for their owne auail. But king Robert all the night before the battell took little rest, hauing great care in his mind for the suertie of his armie, one while reuoluing in his consideration this chance, and an other while that; yea and sometimes he fell to deuout contemplation, making his prayer to God and saint Philane, whose arme as it was set and inclosed in a silver case, he supposed had iane.

bene the same time within his tent, trusting the better fortune to follow by presence thereof. In the meane time, as he was thus making his praier, the case suddenlie opened, and clapped to againe. The kings chapleine being present, astonished therewith, went to the altar where the case stood, and finding the arme within it, he cried to the king & other that were present, how there was a great miracle wrought, confessing that he brought the emptie case to the field, and left the arme at home, least that relike should haue bene lost in the field, if anie thing chanced to the arme otherwise than well.

The king verie ioyfull of this miracle, passed the remnant of the night in praier and thanksgiving. On the morow he caused all his folks to heare diuine service, and to receiue the sacrament, as ouer night he had appointed. The abbat of Inchaffraie did celebrate before the king that day, and ministered vnto him and other of the nobles, the communion, other priests being appointed to minister the same vnto the residue of the armie. After this, when seruice was ended, the king called the people to his standard, and first declared vnto them from point to point, how necessary it was for them to shew their wanted manhood, considering that such an huge multitude of people was brought thither against them by king Edward, not of one nation or dominion, but of sundrie languages and parties, as well subiects as allies to the Englishmen, with full purpose of heart to extinguishe the Scottish name and memorie, and to plant themselves in their seates and homes, as in possessions utterly voided of all the ancient and former inhabitants. To increase the fierce stomachs of the Scottishmen against the enemies, he recounted vnto them what he heard by credible report touching the menacing words and insolent brags of the same enemies, able to moue verie quiet minds vnto full indignation. Again, to auoid feare out of their hearts, which they might conceiue by reason of the multitude of their aduersaries, he rehearsed that a number of rascals were amongst them, without anie skill of warlike affaires, not taken vp by choice and election in appointed musters, but resorting without difference together, in hope of spoile and booties, hauing not else whereupon to liue at home in their countries.

Whereouer, if nothing else might raise their hearts in hope of victorie, their iust cause sith they came in defense of their countrie against inuiolent invaders, was matter sufficient to aduance their manlie stomachs, in trust of Gods aid in that quarrell, hauing partlie assured them thereof, by notable miracles shewed in the night last passed. Here to be added, that the greater multitude there was of the enemies, the more spoile and riches was to be got, if they attained the victorie. Finally, the more to stirre their hearts to do valiantlie, he required them of one thing, which he trusted (their manhood being such) they would not thinke hard for them to achieve, and this was, that euerye of them would but dispatch one of the enemies, which if they performed, he promised them assured victorie. As for ten thousand, he knew to be amongst them of such approued souldiers, and old men of war, as he durst safely undertake for them that they would slea two of the enemies a peece, at the least. Such manner of persuasions king Robert vsed to encourage his people.

* But Iohannes Maior, lib. 5. cap. 2. putteth speech much different from this, in the mouth of Wile, further saying, that when this oration was ended, that the king came downe the hill, on which he stood, when he uttered these words, and bareheaded embraced all the nobilitie in his armes, and after turning himselfe to the whole armie, he reached to euery man his hand, in signe of amitie: but I suppose he was over- wearied before he had shaken 35000 men by the hands. On the other part, king Edward caused the colonels of eche nation within his campe, to exhort their retinues to remember, that if they fought valiantlie for one houre or two, they should purchase infinite riches with the whole realme of Scotland, in reward of their labour: for he desired nothing for himselfe, but the superiortie. Again, he willed they should haue in remembrance that irrecoverable shame would follow (sith they had departed out of their countries in hope of gaine) to returne home with emptie hands, and void of victorie, not without some reproch and note of cowardise.

* Besides which (as seemeth by Iohannes Maior) king Edward clothed in his kingle robes, is said to haue vsed these speeches to the armie. If I did not behold the open victorie, I would this day (most valiant men) make an other beginning of speech vnto you. We are in preparation & number of souldiers farre beyond these miserable Scots. Besides which, we haue abundance of brasse peeces, catapultes, bowes, and other such engines of warre, which on the contrarie part the Scots doe want. They are onelie covered with leather pilches made of bucks skins, and with clothes like vnto the wild mountaine people, for which cause our archers, before the strength of the maine battell shall ioyne, will soon subdue them. Haruell not that they haue before time subdued some of my subiects, because they did it by their accustomed deceits, and not by strength of battell. And though by chance they haue overcome (in fight) some weake companie of equall number vnto them, yet are they not able to resist vs; being farre more excellent in number, preparation, and order of battell. The Scot hath a weake nation fighting on his owne charge, not hauing anie chosen souldier. God hath in this field inclosed that for Wile (nourished by my god father) to the end that he might receiue worthy punishment for his wickednesse. His three brethren were consumed by my father: wherefore it now remaineth that we apprehend (alike) these other two wicked and wavering men, to lead them to London, there to receiue their due punishment. You had great reuenues (noble princes) giuen to you by my father, in that kingdome. Wherefore now shew your selues valiant persons, that you may againe recover the same, at this day possessed by the vniust and vnrighfull owners. Besides which, I will further by line geometricallie measure forth all the land of Scotland, to be diuided vnto those that deserue the same, according to the merits of the men. Thus much Maior.)

But yet when they should march forward in arraye of battell towards the Scots, they might scarce be seuered from their wiues and children, which they had there in campe with them: neuertheless, at length by the sharpe calling vpon of their captains, they were brought into order of battell, not without much adoe, by reason of the vnrulie multitude. The archers were placed in wings, mingled amongst the horsemen on the sides of the wards and battels, which stood inclosed in the midst of the same wings. King Robert appointing all his battels on foot, diuided the same into three parts: the fore ward he committed to Thomas Randulfe, & James Douglas, captains of verie approued valiance, under whom went seven thousand of the borderers, and three thousand of the Irish Scots, otherwise called Waterars or Redshanks. These no lesse fierce and forward, than the other practised and skilfull. The second ward was gouerned by Edward the kings brother, wherein were ten thousand men: but for that he was suspected of too much rashnesse, there was ioined with him

Englishman.

The abbat of Inchchaffraie aforesaid (who as before is mentioned, did celebrate that morning afore the king) came forth before the battels, with the crucifix in his hands, bearing it aloft like a standard, ad-monishing them valiantlie to take in hand the defense of their countrie, and the libertie of their possession: for (saith he) you must not euerie man fight as it were for his owne priuat defense, his owne house and children, but euerie man for all men, and all men for euerie man must fight for the libertie, life, patri-monie, children, and wiues of all the realme: for such and so great is the dignitie of our countrie, as they which deface or spoile it, are to be punished with perpetuall fier, and they which do preserve it, are to be recompensed with an eternall crowne of glorie. And herewithall this abbat instructed them of manie things touching the loue of their countrie, which nature hath so planted in all men, that for the preseruation and libertie therof, none should refuse anie danger, no not the losse of life, yea though (if it were possible) that it might be manie times lost therfore.
Which done, he feared not to admonish them to worship the image of Christ, which he shewed them on the croffe. Incontinentlie wherupon, the Scottish armie fell on knees before it, devoutlie commending themselves to almightie God.

The English armie beholding the Scots fall on knees, thought verelie they had yielded without stroke stricken. But when they saw them rise againe, and to come forthward, they began to be somewhat doubtfull. And hereupon rushing together, at the first joining a great number of people on either side were beaten downe & slaine. The archers which were arraied on the vtter skirts of the English wings, soze annoied the Scots, till finally Edward Buse came on their backs with a thousand speares, and brake them assunder, in such wise that they did but little more hurt that day. Albeit incontinent-lie herewith a battell of horsemen to the number of thirtie thousand, came rushing together all at once in shoocke, to haue borne downe and overriden the Scots; but being so in their full race galloping with most violence towards them, they tumbled into the fosses and pits before mentioned, in such wise one vpon another, that the most part of them was slaine, without all recoverie. Neuerthelesse the Scots in maner oppressed through the huge multitude of the enimies, were nere at the point to haue bene vanquished. [During which conflict saith Buch, this happened (which though it be a small thing to put in writing, yet was such as oftentimes it chanceth in battell, and as brought no small benefit to the perfection of their businesse) that king Robert (who continuallie rode before the battell appointed to his gouernement) holding a mace of warre in his hand (and keeping the first order in the arraie) was espied of an Englishman that knew him verie well: and forthwith rode full against Buse with his spere.
But the king beating the stroke aside, came to his English aduersarie, overthrow him by the force of his horse, in the end killed him with his mace & so left him dead. Whereupon, the common people beholding the valure of their king and capteine, did with great force by the instigation of their fierce and ferie minds (and not by the kings perswasion) fall vpon their enemies in such sort, that they seemed to haue had the victorie of the aduerser battell of their enimies: had it not bene for the English archers, which were placed in the wings of the battell; whom Buse (sending out certeine light horsemen) did sone represse: whereby the Scots encouraged, made their partie good, rather by hidden policie, than prepared force. For a stratagem by the Scots de-uised, and an error by the English therof conceived, did far more hurt to the entinie, than the power assembled in the field. For that deuise in the end was the cause that the English lost the victorie, being in this sort.]

The Scots which were appointed to attend the carriage, as carters, wainemen, lackies, and the women, beholding in what danger their masters, friends, & countriemen stood, put on shirts, smocks, and other white linnen aloft vpon their vsuall garments, and herewith binding towels and napkins to their speares, and to other such staues as they got in their hands, placed themselves as well as they could in arraie of battell, and so making a great muster and shew anew, came downe the hill side in the face of their enemies, with such a terrible noise and hideous clamor, that the Englishmen fighting as then with most furie against the Scots with vncerteine victorie, and beholding this new reinforce coming downe the hill vpon their faces, supposing verelie it had bene some new armie, their hearts began to faint, the more in deed, for that they saw themselves vneth able to susteine the violent in-counter of the Scots then present. And hereupon they began to turne their backs, and fell to running away as people clearelie vanquished: on whome the Scots followed with insatiable ire, and slue them down on all sides where they might ouertake them.
Sir James Dologlas with foure hundred chosen horsemen, was commanded by king Robert to pursue the king of England with all speed, to trie if he might ouertake him.

Dologlas (according to his charge) followed him in chase to Dunbar, & casting betwixt that and the borders, late in wait to haue taken him, if he had returned by land; but he being receiued into the castell of Dunbar by Patrike Dunbar erle of March, with fiftene earles in his companie, was by the same erle of March conueied into certeine vessels, lieng there at anchor, with the which he passed alongst by the shoze into England, to shew an example of the vnstable state of princes: for though this Edward was that day in the morning right proud of the great puissance and number of people which he had about him, not vnlike sometime to the great armie of king Ferris, yet he was constrained before the evening of the same day, to saue his life in a poore fishers boat. In this battell were slaine fiftie thousand Englishmen (as the Scottish writers assirme) amongst whome was the erle of Glocester, with two hundred knights. On the Scottish part were slaine about foure thousand, and amongst other two balliant knights, sir William Wapount, and sir Walter Kesse. The spoile was so great of gold, siluer, and other iewels gotten in the field, that the whole number of the Scottish armie was made rich thereby: and besides this, they got little lesse mo-nie and riches by ransoming of prisoners taken at this battell, than of spoile gotten in the fight, campe, and field. But the death of sir Giles Argentine, that died amongst other in this mortall battell, was so displeasing to king Robert, for the familiaritie which he had sometimes with him in England, that he reioiced little of all the gaine got by so famous a victorie. He caused his bodie to be buried right honorable in saint Patricks church, beside Edendurgh.

in the English campe, were distributed to the abbeies and monasteries of the realme, to make there of vestments, copes, and frontals for altars. The Carmelite frier, of whome ye heard before, brought thither by king Edward to describe the victorie of the Englishmen, was taken prisoner amongst other, and commanded by king Robert to write contrarie the victorie of the Scots, according as he had sene: who thereupon gathered his rustic wits togther, & made certeine rude verses beginning thus.

With barren verse this rime I make,

Miracles if ye list to be-lieue them.

There be some that haue iudged, how this victorie was attained by the singular fauor of almightie God, by reason of miracles which they rehearse to happen at the same time. The night before the day of the battell, there came to the abbeie of Glasneburie two men in compleat armour, desiring to lodge there all night: the abbat keeping an house of great hospitalitie, receiued them right glablie, and making them good cheare, demanded what they were, and whither they were going: who answered that they were the seruants of God, and going to helpe the Scots at Bannockburne. On the morrow the chamberlaine found them departed before anie of the gates were opened, & the beds faire made, and not stirred otherwise than as they left them ouer night. The same day that the battell was foughten, a knight clad in faire bright armour, declared to the people at Aberdeen, how the Scots had gotten a famous victorie against the Englishmen, and was sene shortly after to passe ouer Pictland firth on horsebacke. It was supposed by the people that this was saint Magnus, sometime prince of Orkney, and for that cause king Robert endowd the church of Orkney with five poundes sterling of the cu-stomes of Aberdeen, to furnish the same church with bread, wine, and wax.

Robert fleeing rewarded for his faithfull seruice.

Manie noble men for their approued manhood shewed in this conflict, were highlie rewarded at the hands of king Robert. One Robert Fleming, by whose means he reuenged the treason wrought against him by John Cumyn, with slaughter of the same John, had the lands of Cummerdale given him, which were of the inheritance belonging to the said Cumyn. It is reported by writers, that two knights of Wabant that serued amongst the Englishmen, chanced to heare manie reprochfull words spoken in the English campe against king Robert, who being somewhat moued therewith, and misli-king such dismeasured talke, wished in words that the victorie might chance vnto him. For the which with Is. Edward informed thereof, caused them by a trumpet to be conuied vnto the Scottish campe, with commandement to aid king Robert to the vttermost of their powers, purposing to punish them according to his mind, if he attained the victorie, as he had no doubt but he should. Whereupon, before the ioining of the battels, he caused proclamation to be made, that whosoever brought their heads vnto him, should haue an hundred marks in reward.

tion.

The Scottis house in Antuerpe built by him.

King Robert hearing in what danger they had run for his sake, rewarded them with great riches of the spoile got in the field, with the which they returning into Wabant, built a goodlie house in Antuerpe, naming the same Scotland, and raising the Scottish armes, and the picture of Wose to be set vp in the same, appointed it for a lodging to receiue them of the Scottish nation that should resort vnto that towne, as may appeare euen vnto this day. And this was done for a memoriall, to the that loue and hartie beneuolence these two knights bare towards king Robert and his people, for the great liberalitie receiued at his hands. This glorious victorie chanced to the Scots on the day of the natiuitie of saint John Baptist, in the yeare 1314.

10 About this time for the varietie of fortune (in so small a course of yeares) happened a thing not vnworthy the reporting. For John Mentith, which before betrayed his deere friend Wallace to the English, being therefore (as of right he ought) extreme-lie hated of the Scots, was (in recompense thereof beside manie other rewards) benefitted with the gardianship of the castle of Dunbryton: which fort (after all the other castles before said were recovered to the Scots) was almost the onlie thing (except some few others) that remained in the hands of the English: and because this fort was by nature inerpugnable, king Robert dealt with the capteine (by such as were friends and of kindred vnto him) to betraie the castle into his hands, promising great recompense therefore. Wherevnto this Mentith by no means would agree, vnles Is. Robert would giue to him the earldome of Lennox for his reward. Whereupon the king being greatlie in doubt what to say therein, (though in deed he vehementlie longed for the said castle) because he did not thinke the obtaining thereof to be of such good vnto him, as that he would therefore offend or lose the earle of Lennox; who had in all his calamities bene the most certeine, and almost the onlie friend of the king: which doubt, when the earle vnderstood, he forthwith came vnto him, willing him in no wise to refuse the condition; wherupon the bargain was concluded betwene John Mentith and the king, and that in such sort, as it was most solemnlie confirmed.

John Men-tith made capteine of Dunbryton castle.

Now, when the king should come to receiue this castle (according to compositions) as he was in the wood Colchon, a mile distant from the same, a cer-teine carpentar called Rowland came thither secret-lie vnto him, & desired licence that he might speake to the king, for he would discouer a great matter touching a treason that was deuised and prepared against him, by the capteine of Dunbryton. Which pardon obtained, he opened vnto Wose, that below in the wine-cellar of the castle, were a number of English inclosed, which at dinner should either take or kill the king (being then safe) after that he had obtained the castle. Whereupon the king nothing abashed, but keeping on his former determination, & being (according to appointment) receiued by the said John Mentith in the castle of Dunbryton: after that he had searched all other places, and was courteously inuited to sit downe to dinner; answered that he would not eate, vntill he had loked into the cellar below. Wherevnto for excuse, and to defer the time, the capteine answered that the smith was absent and carted the key away with him.
But the king not waiting for the coming of the smith, did incontinentlie breake open the cellar dore, whereby all the deceit appeared. After which, the armed men were brought forth before the king, who being severallie examined, confessed the whole matter; and further, that there was a ship readie in the haven to haue caried the Is. prisoner into England, if they had taken him alive. Whereupon the rest being punished, John Mentith was onlie cast into prison, & reserved from further paine: because the king would not offend his friends & kindred in so dangerous a time as that was. For this Mentith had manie beautifull daughters married to men of great power & riches. After which imprisonment of Immediatlie after, king Robert called a parliament at Ait, where, by consent of the thre states he was confirmed king, and the crowne intailed to the heires male of his bodie lawfullie begotten, and for want of such heires, to remaine vnto his brother Edward Bzuse, and to the heires male of his bodie; and if he chanced to die without such heires, then should the crowne descend to Margerie the daughter of king Robert, and to the heires generall of hir bodie by lawfull succession. In which parlement it was further decreed, that if the king were in his minority, he should then be gouerned by Thomas Randolph, and if anie misfortune chanced vnto the said Randolph, that then the gouernement of the kings person and kingdome should be committed to James Dowglas.

This Margerie was gotten by king Robert on the earle of Mar his sister, his first wife, and was married by the aduise of his nobles vnto Walter great Steward of Scotland. Also king Robert, for that his first wife aforesaid was deceased, married shortly after Elizabeth the daughter of the earle of Wlster, on whome he got a sonne named David, and two daughters, the one named Margaret, and the other Maude. The first was married to the earle of Sutherland, and bare him a sonne named John: the second departed this world in hir infancie. After the marriage solemnized betwixt his daughter Margerie, and the foresaid Walter Steward, king Robert went through all the bounds of his realme, and did not onelie confirme the ancient liberties and priuileges of the burrowes and towne in all places where he came, but also augmented the same, and granted vnto diuerse, as well towne as baronies, sundrie new prerogatives and franchises, as may appere by his charters made vnto them of the same, speciallie to the towne of Perth, Dundee, and Aberdeen.

In the yeare following, which was in the yeare 1115, the princes of Ireland oppressed (as they toke it) with long and insufferable tyrannie of the Englishmen, and trusting by support of Scots to recover their libertie, now after so notable an ouerthrow of the whole English puissance, sent ambassadores vnto king Robert, requiring that it might please him to send his brother Edward Bzuse, to receiue the crowne and gouernement of their countrie of Ireland. This request being granted, Edward prepared to take that iourne in hand, and so with a small power of Scottishmen transporting ouer into Ireland, and joining with an armie of such as were ready to assist him there, he toke the towne of Wlster, and slew a great number of Englishmen which were found in the same. Then afterwards, by the generall consent of all the estates of Ireland, Edward Bzuse was proclaimed king of that realme, and certeine of the Irish nobilitie sent ambassadores vnto the pope, to sue for a ratification of their act and proceedings, for the suertie and weale of their countrie, sith they were not able longer to susteine the greivous yoke of the English thalldome. These ambassadores, through their earnest diligence, got such fauor in their sute, that the pope sundrie times charged the Englishmen to auoid out of Ireland: howbeit, they seemed to passe little of his commandements in that behalfe, for they dailie sought how to make themselves strong in that part, least they should lose the possession of that countrie, which their enemies were about to get forth of their hands.

King Robert being informed how through the reinforcement of the English armie, being dailie refreshed with new succors, his brother was like to run in danger to be cast away, he left sir James Dowglas gouernor in Scotland, with a competent number of men to defend the borders, and he himselfe with a great power of other souldiers and men of war went ouer into Ireland, to support his brother: but suffering great distresse at his first comming thither, for want of vittells & other provisions, he lost almost the one halfe of his folks through verie famine & hunger, & the residue were constrained to eate horses and other such lothsome meats, therewith to susteine their languishing liues. At length being approached within a daies iourne of his brother, in purpose to haue supported him with those people which he had left, his brother not abiding his comming, fought vntwifelie with the Englishmen at a place called Dundach, and receiuing the overthrow, was slaine himselfe with a great number of other. It is vncertaine whether he had anie knowledge of the comming of his brother king Robert, or that through desire of fame he feared least if he staied till his brother came, a great part of the praise (if they got the victorie) should remaine to him: and therefore he made such hast to fight. But howsoeuer it was, thus he was slaine on the fourteenth of October, in the yeare 1117.

Edward king of England, hearing that king Robert was passed ouer into Ireland, thought the time to serue well for his purpose, effrones to invade Scotland: and hereupon comming with a great power to the borders, he purposed to haue done some great feat. But sir James Dowglas the gouernor, hauing likewise gathered an armie, gaue him battell, and put both him & his people to flight. In this battell were slaine thre notable capteins on the English side: as sir Edmund Lilaw a Gascoigne capteine of Berwicke, with sir James Penell, and the third sir James Dowglas slue with his owne hands. King Edward perceiuing it was not like that he should doe anie good at that time against the Scots by land, thought it best to assaile them by sea, which way forth the Englishmen commonly were euer to god for the Scots. He rigged therefore a fleet of ships, and sent the same into the Forth, which burned the countrie on each side, and toke manie rich booties from the inhabitants nere to the thore.

Duncane earle of Fife, hearing of these cruelties done by the Englishmen, came forth with five hundred hardie souldiers, to defend the countrie from such inuasions: but when he perceiued that the enemies were of greater number than he was able well to encounter, hauing but an handful of men in comparison to them, he gaue somewhat backe, and in the meane time met with William Sinclair bishop of Dunkeld, hauing about thre score armed men in his companie, who blaming the earle for his faintnesse of courage, caused him to set forth againe towards the enemies, & finding them busie in spoiling & harrieng the countrie, they gaue an onset vpon them so fiercelie, that there was slaine at the first encounter to the number of five hundred of the Englishmen, and the residue chased to their booties lieng at Dunbrissell, which they entred in such haste, that one of the booties being pestered with ouer great number, sanke with them before they could get to their ships. Sir Robert euer after custonablie called this Wil. Sinclair his owne bishop, for the noble prowes which he shewed in this enterprife.

Trulie it were a wonderfull processe to declare what mischiefs came through hunger and other misfortunes, by the space of 11 yeres in Northumberland; for the Scots became so proud after they had gotten Berwike, that they nothing esteemed the English nation. But (amongst other things by the Scots attempted) much about this time, Adam de Gardonne came with 160 men, to drive awaie the cattell pasturing by Rotham, which the people of the towne perceiving, ran forth and encountered with the Scots, who had gotten the victorie of them, had not Thomas Grey capitaine of the castell, seeing them in some teopardie, issued forth with 60 of his souldiers, & slaine most part of the Scots, and their horses. The which Grey had bene twice before besieged in the castell of Rotham, once almost by the space of a whole yere, and another time by the terme of seven moneths, in which he behaved himselfe like a worthy gentleman, in that his enemies got none advantage of him, although that during the siege, they had erected manie fortresses before the castell, to annoie such as were within: of which forts they made one at Wpittington, and one in the church of Rotham, the castell whereof had bene twice teinted and in danger of losse, had not the lord Persie and Penill (being great succourers of the marches) rescued the same. For at one time the vtter ward of Rotham castell was taken in the time of this Grey but three daies, and their purpose in winning the same did vtterlie faile them.)

Scots had bene accustomed to do before time, burlerton and Burroldysdige; and coming to Kipon, they spoiled the towne of all the goods found therein; but compounding with them that kept the church against them for a thousand marks, they forbore to burne any of the buildings. After they had taried here three daies, they departed thence, and went to Banarsburgh, which towne they burnt, and brating the woods (into the which the people were with-drawne with their goods and cattell) they got a great battie, and returning homewards by Scipton in Craven, they first spoiled the towne, and after burnt it, and so marching thorough the countrie, came backe into Scotland with their spoiles and prisoners without any resistance. [This castell of Ban-

In the yere following, king Edward came and laid siege unto Berwike, but the towne was so well defended, that he was constrained with small honor to returne home, and leave it as he found it. For in the meane time, while king Edward lay at the siege before Berwike, Thomas Randall earle of Surrey, and the lord James Dowglas assembled their forces together; but perceiving themselves too weake to remove the siege by force, they passed by, and en-them, keeping on their way unto Burroldysdige:

shop, and the bishop of Ely, not making them of the countrie once privie to their purpose, but having in their companie a great number of priests and men of religion, they gave battell to the Scots one day in the after none, not farre from the towne of Spit-ton upon Swale, twelve miles distant from York northwards.

But forsomuch as the most part of the English men were not expert in the feates of warre, and came not in any orderlie arraie of battell, they were easilie vanquished & put to flight by the Scots, who were readie to receive them in good order, close together in one entier squadzone, and after their accustomed maner, at their first joining they gave a great shot, wherewith the Englishmen out of hand began to give backe: which when the Scots perceived, they got them to their horses, and followed the chase most egerlie, beating downe and sleaing the Englishmen, neither sparing religious person nor other, so that their died to the number of four thousand Englishmen that day, and amongst the rest was the maior of York one. In the water of Swale (as was said) there were drowned to the number of a thousand. So be thot, if night had not come the sooner upon, it was thought scarce there should any of the English part have escaped.

When king Edward lieng as yet at the siege of within his realme, he raised his siege, in purpose to have encountered with his enemies: but the Scots advertised of his purpose, returned with all their prisoners and spoile by Stanemore, and so through Gilland, and the west marches, withdrew home into their countrie. About the feast of All saints, when the inhabitants of the north parts had got in their harvest, so that their barnes were now stuffed with corne, of the which provision they were to live all the yere after, the Scots under the conduct of the said two capitaine, the earle of Surrey, and the lord Dowglas, entered into England, and burnt the countrie of Gilland, taking away both such people as they took prisoners, and also all the cattell which they might meet with, and so kept upon their iourne till they came to Burgh under Stanemore, destrui-eng all afoze them, & then returning through Westmerland, practised the like mischiefe there, in burning up houses and corne in all places where they came, as they had done before in Gilland. And fi-nallie passing through Cumberland with the like ha-uocke, at length they drew home into their owne countrie, with no small number of prisoners, and plentie of great riches which they had got in that iourne. [And the souldiers going backe againe to-but yet he dissembled for the time, and commended them for their noble hearts and valiant stomachs: neuertheless, he purposed to be reuenged of their proud presumptions, when more opportunitie of time serued thereto. Sundrie of the nobles perceiuing that the king bare an inward grudge towards them for this matter, deuised amongst themselves how to deliuer him into king Edwards hands, so to auoid all danger that might follow of his displeasure conceived thus against them. For the accomplishment of this their treasonable practise, they made a bond in witting, confirmed with their hands and seales betwixt them, & minded to send the same into England vnto king Edward. But king Robert hauing some inbelling of this their purpose, caused diligent watch to be laid by the way for such as should passe into England from them with the said bond, insomuch that in the end a palmer or pilgrime was apprehended which had the bond, and other writings inclosed within his pilgrims staffe.

King Robert vnderstanding by these writings all the manner of the treason, and what they were that had consented to the same, hastily sent for the whole number of them, as though there had bene some matter in hand wherein he wished to haue their aduise. They were no sooner come, but straightwaies calling them before him, he questioned with them whether they knew their owne hands and seales, and immediatlie therewith shewed the writings, which were found in the palmers staffe: and because they could not denie their owne act, they were committed to ward within sundrie castles, till he had taken further aduise in the matter. Incontinentlie after, he went to Berwik, and there arrested the capteine of the towne, named sir William Soules, and caused him to be conueied to Berth (committing the said William Soules (as saith Io. Maior) with the countesse of Straberne, to perpetuall prison) where shortly after he called an assemble of all the estates of the realme. This was called the blacke parlement, kept in the yere after the incarnation of our Saviour 1320. In this parlement, at the beginning thereof, was Dauid Abernethie, the sitters sonne of king Robert, accused as partie to the treason aforesaid, though being laboured vnto by the rest of the conspirators to soine with them therein, he refused so to do, but yet for that he did not vtter the thing, but concealed it with them, he was condemned & lost his head, the people sore lamenting his mishap, for the great valiance which was knowne to be in him, hauing serued honorable manie yeres before against the Saracens, and other miscreants in the parties of beyond the seas, where he was called the flower of chualrie.

In deed the king himselfe would gladlie haue saued his life, but for that he minded to do iustice on the residue, and finding no man to make sute for him, he permitted the execution to proceed against him. On the morrow after, he caused all the residue of the traitors to be brought forth to iudgement, and sentence being giuen against them, he commanded without delay that they should be executed. Then came diuerse and sundrie persons in most humble wise to make sute for pardon to the king for their friends and kinsmen: but he made them plaine answer, that there was none to be found that would make intercession for the sauing of his kinsmans life the day before, when he was led to execution, that had offended nothing so grieuousslie, in comparison of them for whom they now made sute, and therefore he had them be contented, for they should assuredlie haue according to that which they had deserued. And therewith were the officers commanded to make hast with the execution, which was done incontinent-lie without any further respit.

There were some that were accused to be partakers in this treason, but yet for that no euident proofes could be produced against them, they were dismissed, as Walter Partwell, with Walter Berclaie thiriffe of Aberdene, Patrike Graim, Hameline Reidinton, and Eustace Kathre, knights; besides eight others. But yet the countesse of Straberne & William de Soules were condemned to perpetuall prison. The earle of Buchquhanes lands, who suffered at that present, were diuided into two parts, the one being giuen to William Haie that was made constable of the realme in place of John Quincie, who likewise suffered at the same time; and the other part was giuen vnto William Keth, together with the office of the stewardship of the realme. About the same time the king of England by complaint made to the pope, purchased that a legat was sent from the see apostolike into Scotland, to admonish king Robert to cease from further disquieting the realme of England, by such cruell inuasions, as were furnished that he longfullie exercised against the same realme. But answer was made herevnto by the king, and other the nobles of the realme of Scotland, that all the world might well vnderstand that the whole occasion of all the trouble which had chanced betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, did onelie proceed of the couetous desire in the Englishmen, seeking to conquer that realme without any iust claime or title: and therefore they thought it reason first to suppress the losse stomachs of the Englishmen; and then if there were any thing worthy to be reformed on their behalves, they would be contented to stand vnto the order of the popes authoritie therein. Thus was the legat dispatched home, without other effect of his errand (sauiing (as saith Buchanan) he cursed and interdicted the Scots and Scotland.)

Shortly after, king Robert entered with an armie into England, and wasted the countrie before him, till he came to the recrosse, which standeth vpon Stanemore. Howbeit it should seeme by that which Richard Southwell writeth hereof, that king Robert was not present himselfe in person in this iournie, but that he appointed the earle of Murray to be his lieutenant, who with an armie, after the feast of the Epiphanie entered into England, and comming to Darington, staid there for a season, whilst the lord James Douglas, and the lord Steward of Scotland went abroad to harrie and spoile the countrie on each side, the one of them passing forth towards Hartlepole and Cliueland, and the other towards Richmond. The inhabitants of Richmondsheire, hauing no capteine amongst them to defend their countrie from that grieuous inuasion of the enemy, gaue a great summe of monie in like manner, as at other times they had done, to haue their countrie spared from fire and spoile.

The Scots taried at this time about 15 daies within England, and in the end returned without battell. For when the knights of the north countries repaired vnto the duke of Lancaster then lieng at Pomfret, and offered to go into the field with him against the Scots, he would not once stirre his foot, by reason of the discord that was depending betwixt him and king Edward: but howsoeuer the matter went, king Edward sore grieued in his mind with such inuasion made by his enemies the Scots, he gaue order to leaue an armie of an hundred thousand men, what on horsebacke and on foot (as the report went) appointing them to be ready to enter into Scotland at Lammas next: whereof king Robert being aduertised, ment to prevent him, and therupon in the octaues of the feast of saint John Baptist,

England,

The abbrie of Holme burnt. Baptist, he entered into England with an armie neere to Carleill, and burnt a manor place that some time belonged to him at Rolfe, and Allerdale, and spoiled the monastrie of Holme, notwithstanding his fathers corps was there interred.

Fourneis abbrie. From thence he marched forward, destroying and spoiling the countrie of Copland, and so keeping by, on his iournie, passed Woden sands, towards the abbrie of Fourneis: but the abbat meeting him on the waie, redeemed his lands from spoile, and brought king Robert to his house, and made to him great chere: but yet the Scots could not hold their hands from burning and spoiling diuerse places; and marching forward vnto Cartmle beyond Leuin sands, burnt and spoiled all the countrie about, except a priorie of blacke canons which stood there. Passing from thence they came to Lancaster, which towne they also burnt, saue onlie the priorie of blacke monks, and a house of preaching friers. Here came to them the earle of Murray, and the lord James Dologlas with an other armie, whereupon marching further southwards, they came to Preston in Anderneis, and burnt that towne also, the house of friers in no: onlie excepted.

Leuin sands. And thus being foure score miles within England from their owne borders, they returned homewards with all their prisoners, cattell, and other bosties which they had got in that iournie, comming to Carleill on the eue of saint Margaret, and lodging about that towne the space of fife daies, they wasted and destroyed the corne, & all other things that came within their reach. Which done, on saint James euen they entred into Scotland againe, hauing bene within England at this time thre weekes and thre daies. Immediatlie hereupon, to wit, about the feast of Lammas, king Edward with his armie came to Newcastle, and desirous to be reuenged of such iniuries done to his subiects, entered into Scotland, and passing forth till he came to Edinburgh, through want of vittels and other necessarie prouision, he was constrained to returne home within the space of 15 daies. For king Robert aduertised of his comming, had caused all the corne and cattell in the countrie to be conueied out of the waie into certeine forts, wherevnto the Englishmen might not come to get it into their hands, so to relieue themselves therewith. But in their returning homeward, somewhat to reuenge their displeasures, they spoiled and burnt the abbeies of Melrose, and Wiburgh, with diuerse other religious houses and places, not sparing anie kind of crueltie against all those of the inhabitants that fell into their hands.

The abbeies of Melrose or Melrose & Wiburgh burnt. King Robert inuadeth the north parts of England, approaching almost to York.

Shortlie after, king Robert sent an ambassador to the French king [to pacifie him offended with them for the English] and to renew the ancient bond of amitie betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France, which was accomplished with this new condition added to the former articles, that if it chanced that succession failed touching the inheritance of the crowne of either realme, so that a doubt should rise, who ought by right to inioy the same, the claime and title thereof should be tried and decided by the nobles of both the realmes; and further, that they should not onlie remove and exlude all such as went about wrongfullie to surpe the crowne, but also to defend and mainteine the true inheritor to the bittermost of their powers. In confirmation of this covenant, both the kings received the sacrament. And for further ratifieng of it, they made a prouiso, that whereas (then) they had the popes consent hereto, neither he, nor anie of his successors hereafter should dispense with them for the breaking of that bond; and if they did, euerie such dispensation should be reputed void and of none effect.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. The bond of amitie betwixt Scotland and France renewed with new articles. In this yere 1323 (as Richard Southwell reporteth) about the Ascension day, came commissioners from the two kings of England and Scotland, vnto Newcastle, there to treat of some agreement of peace. For the king of England came Amerie de Valence earle of Penbroke, the lord Hugh Spencer the younger, and foure other persons sufficientlie authorisid. And for the king of Scots came the bishop of saint Andrews, Thomas Randall earle of Murray, and foure other persons likewise of god calling. After much talke, in the end they agreed vpon a tence to indure for 13 yeres, which was proclaimed in both realmes about the feast of saint Barnabie next insuing. About this time also, or not long before, an Englishman descended of noble linage, called Hamton, chanced for speaking certeine words in commendation of king Robert, to fall at variance with one of king Edwards priue chamber, named John Spenser; in somuch that fighting together about the same words, Hamtons hap was to slea this Spenser, & thereupon knowing there was no waie but death, if he should hap to be caught, he fled with all speed into Scotland, where he was receiued of the king in most friendlie wise, and had giuen to him for the maintenance of his estate like a gentleman, the lands of Cadzow [which (as saith Buchanan) he called by the name of Hamilton.]

Ri. Southwell. Kinale abbrie. The posteritie of this Hamton remaineth in Scotland vnto this day, increased so in kindred and honor, by reason it was in processe of time mingled with the kings bloud, that few linages in that realme are of like estimation. They are now called Hamiltons, somewhat changed from the name of their first beginner. [Donald earle of Marre, was made by king Edward the second gardian or captaine of the castell of Wiffow in England, the which he kept untill the comming of quene Isabell against hir husband Edward the second, at that time he deliuered the same into the hands of the said quene, and returned into Scotland.]

In the meane time, Edward king of England being ruled altogether by two of the Spensers, as Hugh the father and Hugh the sonne, ran so farre into the hatred of his people, as well the nobles as commons, that in the end he was deposed of all kinglie kinglie authoritie, committed to prison, and in fine secretlie murdered, as in the English historie more plainelie appeareth.

King Edward the third crowned.
1326.
At Southwell.
The castle of Rothesham.

His sonne Edward the third was placed in his crone, and crowned the 26 day of Januarie, in the yere 1326. In the night of the same day in which he received the crowne, the Scots ment to have scale the castell of Rothesham by scaling, and they went so cunninglie about their purpose, that they were to the number of 16 of them got aloft on the walls: but the capteine of this castle Robert Spicers being warned aforehand of their coming by one of his souldiers that was a Scottishman borne, suddenly assailed them, slue nine or ten of them, and took five prisoners alive, but fore wounded, so as this misfortune falling to them in the beginning of king Edward the third his reigne, might have bene a forwarning of their losses to follow in the daies of his gouernement.

Whilste these things were a doing in England, king Robert though he might seme to haue title iust inough to the crowne of Scotland, which he had possessed now not onlie by rightfull conquest, but also by lawfull interest of inheritance for a certeine number of yeres, by consent of all the estates of the realme; yet to the end to put awaie all doubts, and to conclude the succession of the Ballioll from all claime, which hereafter they might pretend to the crowne of Scotland, he sent sir James Dowglas into France vnto the lord John Ballioll, to require him to transpore and resigne all the challenge of right and interest which he might seme to haue to the crowne of Scotland, as well for himselfe as his heires & successors for ever, to king Robert le Buse, and his heires. In consideration of which resignation, he offered faire lands and rents to him to be appointed forth in Scotland.

James Dowglas sent into France to the Ballioll.

The Ballioll being now fore woone with age, and thereto blind of bodilie sight, lightlie consented vnto this motion, considering (as he said) he toke it to be the ordinance of almighty God, that king Robert should inioy the gouernement of the Scottish kingdom, as most worthy and able thereto, having belivred the same, and defended it most valiantlie from the hands of most cruell enemies. He called therefore his friends and kinsmen together, in the presence of whome he wholie resigned vnto king Robert and his heires, all the right and title which he or anie other for him either had, or hereafter might haue to the crowne of Scotland, concerning anie interest or claime which might be auouched for anie cause or consideration, from the beginning of the world vnto that present day. After the returne of sir James Dowglas forth of France, with so good expedition and dispatch of that businesse wherabout he was sent, king Robert vertie iofull thereof, assembled a parlement of the nobles and other estates of the realme at Cambuskenneth, where he procured a new act to be established touching the succession of the crowne, which was, that if his sonne David deceased without heires of his bodie lawfullie begotten, that then Robert Stewart begotten on Margerie Buse his daughter, should succeed in possession of the crowne. All the lords at the same time were sworne to mainteine this ordinance.

In the meane while, king Edward the third sent vnto king Robert for peace, but so much as it was perceived to be but a coloured pretense, no conclusion thereof ensued, but preparation made on either part for wars. King Robert shortly after fell sicke, by reason thereof, being not able to ride abroad, nor to trauell himselfe, he committed the administration of all things touching the common-wealth, and other the affaires of the realme vnto Thomas Randall,

The rule of things committed to Thomas earle of Murray, and to the lord James Dowglas, two capteins, for their high prowesse and noble valiantie in those daies greatlie renowned. These two hardie chieftains assembling an armie of twentie thousand men, or (as some writers haue) 25 thousand, entered with the same into Northumberland, wasting & spoiling the countrie on each side. [And in countering with an assemblie of the English at Darlington, there slue manie of them, and put the rest to flight.] Against whome came king Edward with an armie of an hundred thousand men: of the which number there were (as Froissard saith) eight thousand horsemen, and 24 thousand archers. At their coming into Northumberland, they might well perceive by the smoke of the fiers, which the Scots made in burning of villages, houses, and townes, where the enemies were: but yet because they taried not long in a place, but passed on without following here or there, the Englishmen might not come nere to fight with them.

King Edward the third commeth with an armie against them.

King Edward therefore was counselled to draw towards Scotland, that lieng betwixt them and home, he might haue them at some aduantage as they should returne, which was thought should be shortly, as well for lacke of vittels, as also to defend their owne borders, when they heard once that the English armie drew that waies south. But coming to the riuer of Tyne, through abundance of raine (latelie fallen) the streame was so risen, that neither horse nor man might passe, so that the armie was constrained to incampe there for the space of three daies, in great scarcitie of vittels, till they were faine to send vnto Newcastle (which was distant from thence 26 miles) and to Carlisle (which was about 22. miles thence) for provision, which was sent them from those places in great plentie. In the meane time were thus certeine light horsemen sent abroad into the countrie, to vnderstand where the Scots were, and to view their doings. [Upon proclamation before made by the king (that who so could bring him word where the Scots were harboied, should haue a hundred pounds of yereleie reuenues in recompense for the same; Thomas Kokebeie after diligent search, brought word to the king thereof:) for those which were sent, finding where the Scots were incamped, upon the top of a mountaine, not past five miles from the English campe, returned backe to king Edward, and declared wh at they had sene and learned of the enemies doings.

Fr. Thin.

The Scots are incamped on a hill.

King Edward right iofull of the newes, caused his armie to be diuided into three battels, and forthwith marcheth on towards the place where his enemies laie. And coming about noone daies within sight of the Scots, he perceived at length that the place which they kept was so strong, that with the height of the ground, & thereto defended on the one side with the course of a riuer, that by no means they might be assailed without great and manifest danger. The Englishmen in the end thought it best to choose forth a place to incampe in for that night, and so doing, sent an herald at armes vnto the Scots, requiring them to come downe vnto some even ground where battell might be giuen; but the Scots refused so to do, alleging that sith the Englishmen were three to one in number, it was no reason to will them to forsake their ground of aduantage which they had taken and chosen forth for their owne defense.

The English men sent to the Scots.

The answer of the Scots.

Thus were they incamped nere together either in sight of other for the space of three nights, euery day shewing themselves in order of battell, without breaking their arrate, except certeine of the horsemen, which on either part now and then came forth and and fell in skirmish, so that sometimes a man might haue some good emptieng of saddles betwixt them. On the fourth day in the morning, when the Englishmen beheld the hill where the Scots had lien the night before, they perceived how they were gone, and thereupon sending forth light horsemen to trie out which way they had taken, word was brought how they were but removed to an other hill a little off, lying fast by the same river, and there lay incamped more strongly than before. Incontinentlie hereupon, king Edward rasseth his campe, and remoueth to an other hill lying ouer against that hill where the Scots with their power were now lodged. At length, after that both the armies had lien thus a good space the one ouer against the other, James Dowglas took aduise with himselfe to exploit a right hardie enterprize.

He chose forth two hundred of perfect good horsemen, mounted vpon verie swift and readie geldings, with the which in the night season he passed silie by the English watch, that he was not once descried by any of them, till he was entered into their campe, where, by the noise of the mouing of the horse set, some chanced to awake that lay asleepe. But yet per the alarme were raised to anie purpose, the Scots thus led by Dowglas had perished through, euen vnto the kings tent, and cut two cords of the same in sunder, so that the king was in no small danger to haue bene slaine, had not the Scots withdrawen the sooner for doubt of being inclosed with their enemies as now raised on each side to come to his succors, but Dowglas yet returned in safetie with his number backe againe to the Scottish campe, hauing slaine (as some books report) three hundred Englishmen at this bunt. The Englishmen warned hereby, took better heed after to their watch.

These armies lay thus one against an other for the space of eightene daies, till at length the Scots pmiuile in the night conuied themselves away, and returned home in most speedie wise, supposing they had done sufficientlie inough for that time. It chanced that in the evening, before the Scots went thus their waies, there was a Scot taken by the English watch, who being brought before the king, confessed that there was commandement giuen through the Scottish campe, that euery man should be readie with his armor and weapon to follow the standard of Dowglas at a certeine houre the same night, but whether they intended to go, it was vnknowne, saue onelie amongst the capitaines. Hereupon the English doubting least the Scots minded to giue them a cambrado that night, placed themselves in order of battell, and so stood till the next morning readie to haue receiued them, if they had come. The Scots also made great fires within their campe, that they might see about them. In the breake of the day, there were two Scottish trumpeters taken by the English scouts, the which being brought before the king, declared that the Scottish armie was broken vp and returned, and further shewed how they were appointed thus to declare vnto him, hauing suffered themselves to be taken for the same intent. As soone as the Englishmen were aduertised that the Scots were thus departed, they hastned to the place where they had lien incamped, in hope to haue found some riches, which for past they had left behind them: but at their comming thither, they found nothing, but 200000 paires of hieland shoes, which are made of the greene hides of beasts vntanned. Also they found three hundred hides of savage beasts set vpon stakes in stead of caldrons, therein to seeth their meat. Moreover, they had left behind them five hundred dead carcasses of beasts & sheepe, which for that they could not drue them away, they killed, to the end the Englishmen should haue no gaine by them. There were likewise found five Englishmen with their legs broken, & bound naked vnto trees, which were quicklie loosed and committed to the cure of surgeons. The enemies being thus departed, king Edward by aduise of his counsell brake vp his campe, and returned to London, supposing it but lost labour to trauell his people anie further at that time.

In this yeare died Walter Stewart, father to Robert Stewart, that was after king of Scotland. And in this yeare following, or rather the same yeare, D. Elizabeth mother to David Bruce the prince deceased, and was buried in Dunfermling in the yeare after the birth of our Sautour 1328. In the same yeare, king Robert wan the castell of Northham, and shortly after besieged the castell of Alnwick, where were slaine William de Mountaile knight, John Clapen, and Malisus de Dunbar, with diuerse other of the Scottish nobilitie. In the end of the same yeare, there were ambassadors sent from king Edward into Scotland for the conclusion of a peace, which was accorded in this wise: that Edward should renounce all his right & claime which he had or might haue to the crowne of Scotland, in declaring it free as it was in time of king Alexander the third, vnder these conditions, that Northumberland should be admitted for the marches of Scotland on the east part, and Cumberland on the west. For the which renuntiation thus to be made, and for the damages done to England by the Scots, it was couenanted that king Robert should pay to king Edward thirtie thousand marks sterling. And for the more suertie and ratification of this small agreement and peace betwixt the two nations, it was concluded that Jane the sister of king Edward should be coupled in mariage with David Bruce the prince of Scotland.

All which articles were put in writing, whereby to all the seals of the great lords within both the realms were set in most substantiall wise. The solemnization of the mariage before remembred was kept at Berwick within a while after, on the eighteenth day of Julie, in the presence of a great number of the nobilitie, both of England and Scotland. King Robert liued not past twelue moneths after this mariage, departing out of this life at Cardus the seventh day of Julie, in the yeare of our Lord 1329. In the latter end of his daies, he was grievously vered with a leprosie, which thus finally made an end of him, in the twentieth fourth yeare of his reigne, being one of the most valiant princes knownen in anie part of the whole world in those daies, hauing felt in his time the force of either fortune: for in the beginning of his reigne, such stormes of aduersitie surrounded him on each side, that if his constant manhood had not bene the greater, it might haue brought him in despair of all recovery: for beside sundrie discomfitures, which he receiued at the hands of the enemies, with losse of all his brethren (his brother Edward onlie excepted) the most part of all the lords of Scotland were against him, and aided his aduersaries to the uttermost of his power: yet he nothing discouraged herewith, ceased not to imploy all industrious means to deliuer his countrie from the yoke of seruile bondage (which he beleued would succed by the government of the English kings) till at length (as it were in despite of all former chances) he attained the effect of his whole indouors, so much the more to his praise, as he had found the hinderance and difficultie great in bringing the same fullie to passe.

This same therefore did spread hugelie, not onelie amongst amongst his owne people, but also amongst strangers, insomuch that his due praise was not wanting, no not euen amongst and in the midst of his verie enemies. For (as it is said) on a time it chanced that king Edward the third, sitting at a banquet amongst his nobles, fell in talke with them of warlike enterprizes, and of such notable capteins as had excelled in knowledge in that behalfe. At length, after much reasoning to and fro, he proponed this question to the king of heralds, that as then stood by, commanding him to declare which were the three most worthie & valiant capteins that he had knowne in all his daies. The herald aduising to himselfe of this matter, staied a space, in which meane while all the companie were quiet, longing to heare his an-swere therein, both for that they knew his skill was such as was able best to giue sentence in such a matter; and againe, for that manie of them thought he would haue numbred some of those that were there present amongst those three. But the herald did not onelic knowe all the noble men within the realme of England, but also all such strangers as had in anie wise excelled in partiall prowesse, hauing all their acts and valiant doings in fresh memorie, and thereupon boldly vttered his mind as followeth.

The first, most worthie and valiant chieffaine (said he) that hath liued in these our daies, was Henrie the emperour: for he subdued three kings and three realmes, and maintained his imperiall estate and prosperous felicitie to his liues end. The second, was sir Giles of Argentine, who in three sundrie battels against the Saracens got the victorie, & slue two of their principall capteins with his owne hands. The third (if vnder your graces correction I may praise the enimie) I must iudge to be Robert Ruse king of Scotland: whom the herald had no sooner named, but all those that were present, with scornfull laughter began to iest at the heralds presumption, for that he durst so malapertlie in the kings presence honour the enimie with so high praise. At length, at the heralds request, the king commanded them to be still. The herald then began againe thus: I beseech your highnesse (said he) if I haue ought offended, to take my words in god part: for I haue bene euer of this opinion, that the truth should in euerie case be vttered, receiued, and allowed in your presence; namelie, where your highnesse commandeth anie man to declare the same. This one thing therefore I shall desire you to consider, that if a man must needs be vanquished, it is lesse dishonour to be vanquished of him that is knowne for a right valiant personage, than of him that is but a coward. More-ouer, to shew plainelie vnto your grace, how much I esteeme the valencie of king Robert (whome I perceiue some here may not abide to haue numbred with the two former most valiant capteins) if truth might appeare, I durst be bold to preferre him with god cause before them both: for the valiant acts attributed by Henrie the emperour may be ascribed rather to the wisdomme of his counsellors, than to his owne valiantnesse and prudence: but contrarilie, king Robert being confined out of his countrie, and destitute of friends and all conuenient aid, re-couered the realme of Scotland, by his singular manhood, out of the hands of your noble father, and established it with such tranquillitie, that he appeared more terrible to his enemies of England, than euer they had bene afore to his subjects of Scotland. These or the like words vttered by the herald, were well allowed of the king, and stopped the mouths of them that toke the matter so strange-lie at the first.

But now to returne to the purpose. King Robert a little before the time of his death, called together into the chamber where he late, the chieffest pères of his realme, and there in presence of them all, committed vnto them the government of his sonne Da-uid, a child as then not past seuen yeres of age. He also aduised them of sundrie things touching the rule of the realme after his decease, which he perceiued was at hand. And first he counselled them, that in no wise they should at anie time make an absolute lord ouer the Isles, because the people of the same are of nature bittisfast, and some seduced and brought to moue rebellion against the king, into the which being once fallen, they are not easilie reduced to their due obedience againe, by reason their countries are of such strength, that they cannot be approached but by sea, as inuironed with the same. Secondarie, he ad-uised them neuer to appoint anie set battell with the Englishmen, nor to reopord the realme vpon the chance of one field: but rather to resist and keepe them off from indamaging their countrie, by often skirmishing, & cutting them off at streits & places of aduantage, to the intent that if the Scots be discomfited, they may haue some power yet reserved to make new resistance. Thirde, he forbade them in anie wise to make any long peace with England; for naturalie men war dull and slouthfull by long rest and quietnes, so that after long peace, through lacke of vse and exercise of armes, men are not able to sustaine anie great paines or trauell.

Moreouer, he alledged, how the Englishmen would continue in peace no longer than they wanted a oportunitie and conuenient occasion for them to attempt the warres: and therefore he iudged it best, that the Scots should neuer conclude anie perpetuall peace with them, nor take anie truce longer than for three or foure yeres at the most. He willed them further, to consider one thing, that when their appeared least occasion of warres with England, then they ought to be most circumspect, least peraduenture their enemies should come at vnwares, and find them vnprouided for timelie resistance. Herevnto he desired them, that after his deceasse, they would chose some one of the most worthie capteins within the whole realme, to beare his heart vnto Ierusalem, and there to see it buried within the temple, before the holie sepulchre of our Lord. For if he had not bene for a long space hindered by urgent businesse of warres at home, and lastlie prevented by death, he had vowed to haue passed with an armie into the holie land, in defense of the christian faith, against the Turkes and Saracens.

Herevpon when he was dead, the lords by one assent, appointed sir James Dowglass to take this enterprize in hand, who willinglie obeyed their order, as he that had euer during the life of king Robert, serued most faithfully the bodie wherein the same heart was inclosed, & for this cause the Dowglass beare the bloudie heart in their armes. The commendations of which king Robert, Buchanan setteth forth (to comprehend manie things in few words) to be: that he was euerie way a most worthie person, and that there were few to be found (from the former heroicall daies) equall vnto him in all kinds of vertue. For as he was in battell most valiant, so was he in peace most temperate & iust. And though his vndiuided god successe and perpetuall course of victories (after that fortune was once satisfied or rather wretched with his misfortunes) were verie great, yet he seemeth to Buchanan to be farre more won-derfull in his aduerse fortune: whose balure of mind was such, that it could not be broken (no not so much as weakened) by so manie evils as happened vnto him at one time: whose singular constancie appeared by the captiuitie of his wife, and the death of his valiant brethren. And besides that, his friends were at one time hered with all kind of calamities, and they which escaped death were banished with the losse of their substance: he himselfe was not onelie spoiled of all his patrimonie, but of the kingdome also, by the mightiest king of that age Edward the first, king of England, a man most readie in counsell, and of dispatch of his affaires as well in warre as peace. Pea, so farre was this Buse oppressed at one time with all these kinds of evils, that he was giuen into extreame pouertie. In all which misfortunes he neuer doubted of the recouerie of the kingdome, neither did he said anie thing unbecoming the noble mind of a king, for he offered no violent hands to himselfe, as did the late Cato and Marcus Brutus, neither with Spartus did he pursue his enemies with continuall hatred. For when he had recouered his former estate, he so liued with them that most occasioned his labour and trouble, that he rather remembered himselfe to be a king ouer them, and not an enemy vnto them. To conclude, he did not so forsake himselfe towards his end (when a grieuous disease added troubles to age) but that he confirmed and established the present estate of the kingdome, and provided for the quiet of posteritie, whereby his subjects did not so much lament his death, as that they were deprived of so iust a king and goodlie father.)

How often James Dowglasle had got the victorie.

Sir James Dowglasle then chosen as most worthy to passe with king Roberts heart vnto the holie land, closed the same in a case of gold, imbalmed with sweet spices, & right pretious ointments. And herewith hauing in his companie a number of nobles, and gentlemen, amongst whom sir William Sinclair and sir Robert Logan were chiefe, he passed forth till he came to the cite of Jerusalem, where he buried the heart aforesaid, with all reverence and solemnitie that he might deuise. This done, he resorted with such number as he had brought thither with him, vnto such other christian princes as at the same time were gathered with great puissance, from sundrie parts of christendome to war with the Turkes, and there in companie with them, he did so noble seruice against the common enemies of our religion, that by his often victories he wan great honor to the christian name. At length, hauing accomplished his charge in those parties, with no lesse fame and glorie than princelie magnificence, he toke the seas to haue returned home into Scotland: but by force of contrarie winds he was driuen on the coast of Spaine, landing there vpon the borders of Granada, where at the same time he found the king of Aragon, readie to make warres against the Saracens that inhabited in those parties.

The Dowglasle, to make his manhood and prowess the more knowne in all parts where he came, offered the king of Aragon to serue vnder him in those warres against the infidels, and so fought at sundrie times in his support against the enemies, with prosperous successe, till at length hauing too much confidence in fortunes fauour (which hath brought to manie noble men to their deaths) he waxed negligent, and toke small regard of dangers that might insue, so that in the end he was inclosed by an ambush laid for him by the enemies, and there slaine amongst them, with all such as he had about him. This was the end of that noble Dowglasle, one of the most valiant knights that liued in his daies. He had gotten the victorie 57 sundrie times in fight against the Englishmen, and 13 times against the Turkes, at it is written at length (saith Bellenden) in Scotichronicon. He might haue bene right necessarie for the defense of Scotland, if his chance had bene to haue returned home in safetie. He ended his life in maner (as is before mentioned) on the 26 day of August, in the yere of Grace 1330.

At now to proceed in order with the historie, David, shall note, that after the decease of king Robert, his sonne David, a child scarce seuen yeres of age, was proclaimed king, and afterwards crowned at Scone, the 23 day of Nouember, in the yere of our Lord 1331. During the time of his minority, earle Thomas Randall was ordeined gouernour of the realme, who for the space of foure yeres in the latter end of R. Roberts reigne, had the whole administration of things committed to his charge by the same king, for that by reason of sicknesse he was not able to attend the same himselfe. This earle Thomas then being elected gouernour by the generall consent of all the nobles of the realme, considered with himselfe, how necessarie it was for the people to continue in peace, till they had somewhat recouered their hindrance & losses chanced to them by the former wars. He addrest therefore certaine ambassadours immediately after the death of king Robert, vnto the king of England, to require a new confirmation of the peace betwixt both the realmes for a season. These ambassadours found the king of England easie enough to be intreated for the grant of their sute, so that a generall truce was taken for the space of three yeres.

In that meane time, earle Thomas applied his whole studie for the maintenance of iustice and equitie through the whole realme, not omitting yet to appoint order, that men should be prouided of armour and weapon for defense of the countrie, if necessitie so required. [Wherefore when he was going to Widdone (a towne in Galloway) word was brought to him, that there was a strang assemble of theues in that countrie, besetting the high waies, and spoiling the passengers: whereupon sending forth a companie of his followers, he apprehended and hanged them all, not fauouring anie vnder pretext of deuotion or religion. For one of them latelie come from Rome (and safe as he supposed by the charter of the popes pardon) was also apprehended and executed by appointment of this Randall, saying, that the pardon of the fault belonged to the pope, but the punishment thereof belonged to the king.]

Moreover, for the better p[ro]fesse of exercising iustice amongst them that coueted to liue by truth, and to haue more readie occasion to punish others that ment the contrarie, he commanded the saddles and bydes, with all other such instruments and stuffe as pertained to husbandrie, should be left abroad both day and night without the doores: and if it chanced that anie of them were stolen or taken awaie, the shiriffe of the shire should either cause the same to be restored againe, or else to paie for it on his owne purse. Finally, such punishment was exercised against theues in all places, that both theft and pilfering were quite suppressed, and the realme brought to more tranquillitie than euer it was in anie kings daies before. Anie insolent and misruled persons were tamed by his seuerer chastisement and iustice. Also that vertue might be cherished within the realme, he commanded that no vagabund nor idle person should be receiued into anie towne or place, except they had some craft or science wherewith to get their livings. By this meane he purged the realme of Scotland of manie idle & slothfull rogues and vagabunds.

It is said, that during the time whilst such streit punishment was exercised against offenders, by the ministers of the lawes thereto by him authorized and assigned: it fortuned that a carle of the countrie, because he durst not steale other mens goods, stole his owne plow irons, that he might haue the value of them recompensed to him by the shiriffe: neuertheless, such earnest diligence was vsed in the search and triall, who had the plow irons, that finally the truth came to light, whereupon for his craftie falshe how the partie guiltie was hanged, as he had well deserved. The gouernour himselfe, for that he saw how hard it was to reduce them that had bene brought vp in Southfull loitering, vnto honest exercise, held euer about him a gard of warlike persons, that he might the more easilie oppresse all stubborne offenders, which would not submit themselves to his commandements. Those that appeared before him, vpon summons giuen, had fauourable iustice, tempered with much mercie ministred vnto them.

Others that refused to obeie, were pursued with his gard, and hanged euer as they were taken: as it happened on a time at Haddington, where threescore euill and naughtie disposed persons being gathered together, robbed and spoiled the people on each side: and for that they regarded not, but rather misused a pursuant, whom he sent vnto them, they were all taken incontinentlie by his foresaid gard, which followed the said pursuant at the heeles, and without respect hanged them vpon gibbets to giue example to others. Thorough such rigorous iustice, no rebellion was heard of within the realme of Scotland manie yeres after, so that such tranquillitie followed, that not onelie thienes and loitering lubbers were daunted, but the realme also aduanced in wealth and riches, to the great terror of all the foes and enemies thereof. King Edward aduertised of this great felicitie chanced to the Scots by this meanes, began to enuie the same, and imagined with himselfe, that if earle Thomas, the author of the same felicitie were dispatched out of the way, it should not onelie impeach the proceeding of so great wealth to the Scots, but also make for the saertie of the realme of England: for the singular manhood and high prouesse of this earle was by him and other his nobles so suspected.

He thought god therefore to attempt the thing by sleight, which might not be done by force, that afterwards the realme of Scotland might be the more infabled, and as it were made open to receiue displeasure at his hands. For king David was young, and manie of his nobles bare small god will either towards him, or his house, for the slaughter of their fathers and friends in the blacke parliament. Whereupon he deuised, which way he might best deuioise earle Thomas, the onlie confounder of all his imagined hope, as to achieve anie luckie enterpryse against the Scots. At length he deuised to dispatch him by poison: and after he had long debated by whome he might worke that feat: finally he found none so fit for his purpose, as a monke of the order and facultie of those, that wandering from place to place, can with dissembling visage say that thing with mouth, which they neuer thought in heart: for oftentimes men of that order, put no difference betwixt shame and honestie, cloying their execrable wickednesse vnder the feined shadow of their hypocriticall cotwoles.

This monke, fullie instructed in that wherabout he was sent, came into Scotland, and setting himselfe to be a physician, got credit within a while amongst the people, to be a man of most excellent knowledge, for he had a companion with him, that being made priuie to the matter, set forth his cunning and practise to the uttermost, declaring what notable and most desperat cures he had taken in hand, and made the patients perfectlie whole of the same, where all other had quite giuen them ouer: namely he bruted it abroad, that for healing of the stone and grauell, his like was not to be found in all christendome, as euidentlie had appeared by cures which he had shewed vpon sundrie noble men, both in England and France. This he spake, for that it was knowne, how the lord gouernour was sore vexed with that disease, hoping by this meanes to haue him in cure, that he might thereby the more easilie worke his diuelish enterpryse.

And euen according to his desire it came to passe: for being taken for such a man as he was named to be, he was sent for to the gouernour, and comming before him, he handled the matter so with words, that the gouernour was contented he should take him in hand, which he did with such wicked intention, that perswading him to keepe such diet as he preferred, and herewith to take such sirrups & other things as he would giue him, at length he most traitorously poisoned him in deed. The venem was of such mixture, as would not flea him out of hand, but by little and little waste his entrails, that the monke might haue leasure to escape home into England, yet it were perceiued what he had done. He therefore after he had ministred his wicked poison, found meanes to conueie himselfe out of the waie, and returned most speedilie into England, informing king Edward how he had delt. The gouernour feeling himselfe tormented with the worse and worse in his stomach and wombe, and hearing that the monke was gone, and minded not to returne to him againe, he began to doubt the matter, and shortly after learned by physicians that he was poisoned, and that the venem had taken such hold within his bowels, that it was not possible to remoue it.

In the meane time was king Edward come with an armie to the borders, purposing to invade Scotland, for that he thought how the gouernour was either dead, or at the verie point of death, and therefore he was in hope, that comming in time of the trouble vpon his death into Scotland, he should find occasion to achieve some enterpryse, highlie to his aduantage. But the gouernour aduertised hereof, raised a power, and though he were not able either to ride or go, yet he caused himselfe to be caried forth in an horrellitter. King Edward hearing that the gouernour was comming towards him with an armie, & that himselfe in person quite contrarie to his expectation, he sent an herald vnto him for meane of communication of some peace, as was outwardlie pretended, though nothing else was ment but that he should escape how all things in the Scottish campe stood. The gouernour hearing of this heralds comming, arraigned himselfe in his best apparell, that it might appere he was rather recouered of his infirmities, than otherwise weake and feeble thorough his disease, and then causing the herald to be brought before him, where he was set in a chaire, to heare what his message was, which consisteth in certaine demands not greatly agreeable to reason, the gouernour with bold countenance answered, that he trusted within short time to make it knowne, what right the Englishmen had to moue such vnrasonable requests, and thus dispatching the herald, he gaue him all such gorgeous and rich apparell as he ware at the same time when he thus talked with him.

King Edward at the returne of the herald, not perceiuing otherwise by his report, but that the gouernour was in health, he returned immediatlie with his armie into England, and licencing euerie man to depart to his home, laid hands on the monke, and as one that had dissembled with his prince (for so he took it) caused him to be burnt for his vntruth. Thus was the wretched righteonslie recompensed, as he had most iustlie deserved. In the meane time, the gouernour returning homewards, though force of the venem still increasing, deceased at Spusleburgh, and was buried at Dunfirmling, in the yere of our redemption 1331. He left behind him two sonnes,

Thomas and John, worthy such a father, they being persons of great valure, and friends to their native countrie.]

Two gouernours chosen to rule Scotland.

After his decesse, by common consent of the three estates of the realme in counsell assembled, Patrike earle of March, and Dauid earle of Spar were chosen gouernours, the first (that is to say, the earle of March) had the charge of that part of the realme which lieth on the south side of the Forth, and the other (that is to say, the earle of Spar) was appointed to gouerne all that on the north side. Shortly after rose great trouble in Scotland by meanes of Edward Balioll, the son of John Balioll before remembred, as thus: It chanced there was one Twinam Lozison, a gentleman boyne, but spotted with vile conditions, as adulterie, and diuerse other, for the which being put vnder censures of the church by the official of Glasgow: he toke at length the same official as he was going towards the towne of Aire, and held him in captiuitie, till he had paid two hundred pounds for his deliuerance. But this iniurie remained not long unpunished: for Sir James Dowlgasse, before his passage to the holie land, would not suffer him to rest, till he had constrained him to flee into England for his more safeguard.

Twinam Lozison.

Scottish lords banished into England.

Twinam Lozison sent vnto Edward Balioll.

At his comming into England, he met with Dauid Cummin earle of Atholl, and manie other Scottishmen, which were banished in times past by king Robert, for that they assisted the king of England against him. These persons being driven out of the realme, and confederat altogether in one band, remained in England long time after, euer trusting to see some occasion offered, whereby they might one day returne againe into their owne native countrie. And now, hearing that earle Thomas Randall the gouernour was decessed, this Twinam Lozison in name of them all was sent ouer into France to perswade Edward Balioll to attempt the recouerie of the crowne and realme of Scotland, as the rightfull heritage of his father, and descended vnto him as lawfull and rightfull heire. Though the Balioll had no regard to make anie claime at all to the crowne of Scotland before this time, yet through the pittie perswasions of the earnest messenger, declaring how easie a matter it were for him to atchieue, considering the aid which he should haue in England, both at the kings hands, and also by the Scottishmen which remained there in exile, by whose meanes he might assure himselfe of support inough within Scotland if selfe, after he was once entered: finally he concluded to passe ouer into England, to proue what purchase he might make there.

Edward Balioll commeth into England.

The promise of the Balioll to R. Edward both agree to aid the Balioll. The English writers speak but of two thousand, or 2500. at the most. Ric. Southwell.

Fr. Thin.

At his comming thither, he made sute to the king, to aid him in his righteous quarell towards the attaining of the crowne of Scotland, which if he might bring to passe with prosperous successe, he promised to hold the same of him and his successors as superior lords thereof. King Edward gladly upon that condition, condescended to his request, notwithstanding the alliance contracted with king Dauid, by the marriage of him with his sister. Herevith he appointed forth six thousand men well apparelled and araided for the warre, to passe by sea with the Balioll, and other the confederats into Scotland, trusting that vpon their arriual there, they should find no small number of friends to assist them. For beside the Balioll, there was the lord Henrie Beaumont a Frenchman, who had married the earle of Buchan's daughter and heire: also the earles of Atholl & Angus [the lords Perth and Wake, Richard Talbot, Henrie Ferrers, John Spotsgrave] & other Scottish lords such as were banished Scotland, when R. Robert le Bruce recovered it out of the Englishmens hands. These were appointed to go with the Balioll to assist him in that enterpryse: and likewise the lord Stafford, and diuerse other English capitains, wherevpon when all their provision was once ready, with the number appointed them by king Edward, and a few others, they got them a shipboard, and sailing forth by the coast till they entered into the Forth, at length they came on land nere the towne of Kingorne, and shortly after, incountering with Alexander Seiton, they slue him, and put his folkes to flight.

The earls of Spar and March gather their people.

Balioll verie tofull of this happie successe, came with his people to Perth, otherwise called S. Johns towne, whereof the earles of Spar and March being aduertised, they raised two mightie armies, and hastened toward the enimies, not as though they should haue to doe with men of warre, but to chastise a number of thieues and robbers that were come out of England. Yet at length they concluded to ioine both together in Stratherne, that they might iointlie set vpon their enimies both at once. The Balioll seeing the matter brought so far forth, that no feare of death nor starting-hole by flight might auail him, boldlie came forward, and pitched downe his tents at Duplin nere to the water of Erne, trusting that if his armie would stand to it, and fight with manlike constancie, he should weild his enimies well inough, notwithstanding their huge number. The same night came the earle of Spar with his power, and incamped with the same within sight of the English armie, but the earle of March lodged about five miles from thence, at Athirardour.

Edward Balioll at Duplin.

The Scots that were with the earle of Spar, having knowledge of the small number of their enimies, made no accounts of them, so that they neither took heed to their watch, nor to anie other order for defense of themselves, but fell to singing, dancing, reueling, and drinking, in most dissolute manner. The Balioll taking occasion hereof, determined to assault them the same night in their campe, and therevpon causing his people to make them ready to accomplish that enterpryse, in the dead of the night he issued forth of his campe, and comming vnto the water of Erne, passeth the same by the fowd, where one Andrew Murray of Tullibard had pight a stake of set purpose, in midst of the streame, to shew them the waie. Thus having got all his armie ouer the water, without anie noise or din, so secretlie as might be deuised, he entered the campe of his enimies, and brake through till he came to the tent of the earle of Spar, the Scots generall, before he was once descried. Here at the first was the earle himselfe slaine, lieng fast asleep in his bed, & after with huge noise they set vpon the whole campe, murdering the Scots as then buried in slepe without all defense. And therevpon followed so cruell slaughter, that nothing was heard but grunting and groning of people, as they lay on heapes ready to die, weltering together in their owne blood. And if it had not bene that Edward Balioll had caused ech of his men to wzap a white cloth about his arme, no man might haue knowne (by reason of the darknesse of the night) his friend from his fo.

There were slaine of nobles and gentlemen, to the number of three thousand, beside innumerable of the commons. A certaine number of the Scots that escaped out of the place, closed themselves together, and in purpose to be reuenged on the Englishmen for the death of their fellows, returned vpon them againe, and were slaine themselves euerie mothers sonne. knight, William Haie constable of Scotland, with all his linage so whole, that had not his wife as then being great belied, bene afterwards deliuered of a sonne, all his surname had bene utterlie extinguished. [Whereupon saith Buchan. Thomas Randolph, Robert Bruce, William Seintclere bishop of Dunkeld, and Doncan Makduffe despairing of god suc-also Robert Keith marshall of the realme, with manie of his surname, David Lindsay of Glenelke, Alexander Beiton, George Dunbar, Robert Stra-thauchen, Thomas Haliburton, and John Skrimgeour knights, with manie other ouerlong to rehearse. The earle of Fife & a few other were taken.

This battell was fought on the thirtieth day of August, in the yeare 1332. After that Edward Balioll had atchined this vidorie thus at Duplin, he went straightwaies vnto Perth (otherwise called saint Johns towne) and giuing assalt thereto, quick-lie entered it by force, without anie great resistance.
The earle of March that lodged (as is said) the same night that the battell was fought, not past fife miles off, hearing what had chanced both in the battell and towne, came with his people arrayed in god and perfect order vnto Perth aforesaid, to besiege the Englishmen with Edward Balioll and other as then within it. But hauing lien there a certeine space, and filled the ditches in the meane time to such aduantage, that it was thought if he had giuen the assault, he must needs haue entered, he suddenly raised from thence, and departed, to the unspeakeable damage (as was thought) of the whole Scottish nation. The siege being thus raised, there came dailie great numbers of nobles and commons to the Balioll, offering him their aid and seruice as his loiall subiects, towards the attaining of his right to the crown.

Hereupon, perceiuing his power sufficientlie increased, and receiuing the othes of the earle of Fife, and William de Seintclere bishop of Dunkeld, he went accompanied with them and a great number of other, vnto Scorne, where he was crowned the 24 day of September, in the yeare last before remembred, and receiued there the same time the homages and fealties of a great companie of nobles & gentlemen, at that solemne feast there assembled. King David being not past nine yeares of age, to auoid all dangers in that troublesome time, as desistit of succors, by aduise of his counsell, was conueied ouer into France with quene Jane his wife, sister to Edward king of England, and was most friendly receiued by Phillip king of France the first of that name, so that they remained there with him for the space of nine yeares. And in the meane time diuers noble men that yet remained at the deuotion of king David, vnderstanding that Edward le Balioll totourned within the towne of Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, which standeth almost in the middle part of the realme, and was at that present not closed with anie wall, or rampire, they raised their powers, and besieged him within the same towne, he hauing as then no great companie about him.

Whereof when they of Galloway had aduertisement, because the king was their speciall lord and chiefe gouernor, they assembled togither vnder the conduct of the lord Cassace de Spakewell, and inuaded the lands of those Scottishmen that had thus besieged their lord king Edward Balioll, and by that means constrained the aduersaries to leaue their siege. Whereupon earle Patrike and the new earle of Murray, with the lord Andrew de Murray, and the lord Archembald Dowglas, with an armie assembled in all speed, entered into Galloway, doing all the mischief they could deuise, with fire & sword, taking & bringing away from thence a great number of cattell and other goods; but they slue no great number of people, for they found them not at home, being withdrawn out of the way for feare of this terrible inuasion. Thus did the Scots in that part of the realme spoile & harrie each others countries.

In the meane time, king Edward le Balioll fortified the towne of Perth, appointing the earle of Fife to the keeping thereof, whilst he with an armie passed into the countrie; but before he returned, his aduersaries (that is to say) the sonnes of them that had bene slaine at the battell of Duplin, Robert Keith, Alexander Lindsay, James and Simon Fraser wan saint Johns towne in the third moneth, after they had laid siege thereto, as Hector Boetius saith. But whether that is to be intended after the first besieging thereof, or now after their last coming thither, I can not affirme; but as the same Boetius writeth, now when the towne was twome, the earle of Fife, and Andrew Murray of Tullibard, were taken, with other of their complices. The earle with his wife and childzen were sent to the castell of Kil-dunmure, there to remaine vnder safe keeping; but Andrew Murray for his treason afore committed, was beheaded. The towne being thus wone, was deliuered to the keeping of John Lindsay. But Buchan. out of an other author supposeth that it was not committed to the custodie of anie; but that the walls were pulled downe to the ground. The gaining of this towne put the Scots in hope of more prosperitie to succed.

And thereupon John Randall the earle of Murray, sonne to earle Thomas late of famous memo-rie, and Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, the brother of James Dowglas latelie slaine (as before is mentioned) in Spaine with Simon Fraser and others, gathered a great armie, and came with the same [and William Dowglas lord of Liddesdale to Haulst] against the Balioll, who being aduertised thereof, met them in Annandale, where in-counting togither, after cruell fight & great slaughter on both parts, at length Baliolls part was put to the worst, so that he himselfe was glad to flee, having got an horse without a bridle, and rested not till he came to Roxburgh, or rather to Carleill, as Richard Southwell saith. In this battell were slaine sir Henrie Balioll, a man of great valiancie, sir John Spotobraye, Walter Cumin & Richard Kirkbie; but Alexander Bruce earle of Carrick, and the lord of Galloway were taken prisoners, and saued by the helpe of the earle of Murray, for that they had submitted themselves to the Balioll but latelie before. Shortly after the atchining of this vidorie, Andrew Murray a man of great puissance and possessions was chosen to be gouernor, as colleague and associat with the earle of March. These two gouernors, hearing that the king of England was minded to inuade Scotland with a maine armie, sent sir Alexander Beiton with manie other gentlemen vnto Berwick for defense of that towne and castell; [Alexander (as saith Buchan.) being capitaine of the towne, and Patrike Dunbar capitaine of the castell and borders adjoining.] Shortly after, the new gouernor Andrew Murray was taken prisoner at Roxburgh, by reason that hauing put his entines to flight in a skirmish which he made with them at the bridge without the castell, he pursued ouer rash-lie in the chase, and was inclosed amongst them, and so taken yet he might be rescued. [At which time also William Dowglas lord of Liddesdale was sent to Annandale, to defend the west marches.] There was also taken beside the gouernor, a notable pirate named Crab, who before that time had done manie displeasures to the Englishmen both by sea and land: and now because his countriemen would not ransom him, but to his further grieue had slaine his sonne within Berwikke, he became the king of Englands man, and did the Scots more damage afterwards, than euer he had done to the Englishmen before. The gouernor at length was ransomed for a great summe of gold.

About the same time William Dowglas of Liddesdale named for his singular manhood, The flower of chualrie, fought with the Englishmen in Annandale, where himselfe was taken, and his people discomfited. Both these noble men thus taken prisoners, were detained in captiuitie more than a twelue moneths space, & then ransomed for a great summe of gold. This William Dowglas was sonne to sir James Dowglas, of whom so often mention is made heretofore. The realme of Scotland being thus diuided in two parts, the one assisting the Balioll, and the other continuing in their allegiance sworne and promised to king David: Edward king of England iudged the time to serue well for his purpose to make conquest on the Scots, and herebyon gathering a mightie armie both of Englishmen and strangers, as well such as were subiects to him as other, whom he retained out of Normandie, Anjou, and Flanders, he came with the same to subdue (as he outwardlie pretended) onelie such Scots as would not yeeld themselves to the Balioll. The Scots perceiuing themselves thus ouerset with enemies on each side, sent John Randall earle of Murray into France vnto king David, that by his means they might purchase some aid of the French king to defend the realme from the force of the enemies. In the meane time the king of England besieged Berwikke both by sea and land, notwithstanding such as were within it defended the towne so manfully that he got but small gaines by assaults: by reason whereof the siege continued for the space of foure moneths: during which time manie issues and skirmishes were made betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, whereat manie proper feats of armes were atchieued with variable fortune.

William Seiton bassard sonne to the capteine of the towne was taken prisoner, and his bassard brother, as he assailed the English ships one night ouerfiercelie, was drowned by mischance in the sea. At length, when they within the towne began to want vittels, the capteine sir Alexander Seiton sent vnto king Edward, promising that if he would grant a truce for the space of 6 daies, if no succour came in the meane time to resist his siege, the towne should be deliuered into his hands at the end of that terme; and for the assurance thereof, he was contented that his eldest sonne and heire Thomas Seiton should remaine with the said king in hostage. Whilest things passed thus at Berwikke, the nobles of Scotland by common consent chose Archembald Dowglas to be gouernor in place of Andrew Murray. This Archembald Dowglas raising a mightie armie of Scottishmen entered with the same into the borders of England, so to withdraue king Edward from the siege of Berwikke to defend his owne lands from burning and spoiling. But king Edward aduertised hereof, deuised an other shift; for immediatlie sending a messenger to sir Alexander Seiton capteine of the towne, he certified him plainelie, that vnlesse he rendered the towne forthwith into his hands, both his sonnes which he had with him, the one as hostage, and the other as prisoner, should be without further delay hanged on a gibbet there in sight afore his owne face.

Sir Alexander Seiton hereto answered, that as yet the terme of the truce was not expired, & therefore desired the king either to obserue the covenants, or else to deliuer the pledges, that he might be at his aduantage: but king Edward (as saith the Scottish chronicle) immediatlie caused a paire of gallows to be raised before the towne, and both the sonnes of sir Alexander to be led thither, to suffer on the same without further respite. Sir Alexander Seiton being holding that pitifull sight, and weeing with himselfe, that he might saue the liues of those innocent creatures, if he would, was brought into great perplexitie of mind: the naturall affection and compassion which he bare towards his sonnes mouing him to haue rendered the towne on the one side, and the dutie with faith promised to his king and countrie restraining him from all such resolution on the other. But in the end, the tender regard he had to saue the liues of his sonnes, had overcome him, and caused him to haue rendered the towne into his enemies hand, had not his wife and mother to his said sonnes, exhorted him most earnestlie to the contrarie, alleging that such reproch and dishonour should rebound vnto them, and their posteritie, if through their fault the towne were traitorously deliuered into the enemies hand, that from thenceforth they should be infamed for euer: and as for the death of their sonnes, it was not to be counted a losse, for by this kind of death, they should win immortall name, & leave to their parents the high honor and renowne of faithfull & loiall subiects. Againe they were prouing enough to beget and bring forth new children, where they should be neuer able to recover honor once lost; if by deliuering the towne into the enemies hands, they should seeme to betraye their countrie, & falsifie their faith to their naturall prince and souereigne.

With such & manie other the like wordes, this noble & worthy ladie perswaded hir husband to refrain his inward grieue, and brought him with right sorrowfull and heauie chere vnto his chamber, that through commiseration had of his sonnes, he should commit nothing either against his honor or weale of the towne. In the meane time, his two sonnes were put to death, ending their liues (saith Hector Boetius) with most honor, for the righteous quarell of their countrie: [at what time R. Edward remoued his campe to Halidon hill.] Archembald Dowglas the gouernor, being at that present entered into Northumberland with his armie, hearing that king Edward had thus cruelle put to death those two young gentlemen, came the third day after with all his power, and pitched downe his tents not far from R. Edwards armie, fullie resolved to giue him battell, as well to reuenge the displeasure for the death of the said gentlemen, as to deliuer the towne of Berwikke from further danger of the enemies force.

Yet were there sundrie prudent counsellors in the Scottish armie, that for diuers respects aduised him in no wise to fight with the enemies at that present, considering the huge number of practised soldiers which they had amongst them, and the want of skillfull warriors on his side, hauing seto with him saue young men, and such as lacked experience in the wars, for that they had bene but little trained therein. Notwithstanding, he himselfe was of contrarie opinion, iudging that the good willes and desire which his people had to fight with the Englishmen, should supplie their lacke of skill: and thereupon determining to trie the chance of battell with them, commanded his armie to refresh themselves with meat, drinke, and sleepe for that night, and to prouide themselves readie for battell on the next morning. In the breake of the day he arraigned his people in order of battell. The haungard was giuen

On the other part, the Englishmen were nothing slow to come forward to encounter the Scots, but at the first to take the vantage of the ground, they gaue somewhat backe, withdrawing to the side of an hill, which they hauing once got, boldlie turned themselves to the Scots that pursued them ouer rashlie, in hope that the victorie had bene already theirs: but being here fiercelie receiued by the Englishmen, and beaten downe in heaps on each side, though they enforced themselves with all their might to be reuenged both for old and new iniuries which they had receiued, and so sue no small number of the enimies: yet in the end was the Scottish armie put to flight, and more slaughter made in the chase, than was afore in the battell: for one wing of the Englishmen making forwards to get before the Scots, so stopped their passage, that they were flaine miserablie on each side, as they had bene inclosed within a toile or deere-stall. There were but few in number that were taken prisoners, those on the next day were beheaded by commandement of king Edward, except a small number which were kept secret by some of the Englishmen for profit of their rancome. There were flaine on that day of the battell, to the number of fourtene thousand men, amongst whom were these as principall: Archem-bald Dowglas the gouernour, John Stewart, James Stewart, and Alane Stewart, the sonnes of Walter Stewart; the earle of Rosse, the earle of Southerland, Alexander Bruce earle of Carrike, Andrew, James, and Simon Fraiser. ¶ What this number and therewith manie mo do abound by one yeare, Wil. Harison doth gather together by the * feries, because Adam Meremouth saith, that Spagdalen day fell on the monday this yeare, and that the morrow after being tuesday, Berwik was surrendered. But for so much as the same Meremouth maie be perhaps deceived, or mistaken herein: I haue here thought good (as in other places) to note in the margent the yeare, according to the account of Hector Boetius, speciallie in this place, the rather because he agreeth with Richard Southwell, Robert Auesburie, and other of our English writers, concerning this yeare in which this battell was fought: but where the same Boetius saith, that it was fought on Spagdalen day, R. Southwell, Robert Auesburie, Thomas Walf. and diuers other affirme, that it was fought the nineteenth of Iulie being saint Margarets euen. But now to proceed. was not able to defend it against the English power comming toward him. R. Edward accomplishing his desire, returned backe into England, leaving behind him with the Balioll, manie great lords of England (amongst whom for chiefe was Richard Talbot) that vntill the aduise and counsell of them he might rule the realme of Scotland as should be thought expedient. Edward Balioll hereupon went thorough all the bounds of Scotland, placing garrisons of Englishmen in most part of all the strengths and castles of the realme, for he had them all at his commandeement, sive of them onlie excepted, which were kept by such Scottishmen, as would not renounce their allegiance promised to king David. For Dunbretton was kept by Malcolm Fleming of Cumrinald, Lochleuin by Alane of Geyont, the castell of Biddumnie by Christine Bruce, and Argubart by Robert Lauder, the pile of Loudopin, a strong thing of so small a compasse, was in the keeping of one John Thomson [who were supported with monie by Philip the French king] These captiues would by no means neither yeld themselves nor their fortresses to Edward Balioll, but defend them to the uttermost for the behoufe of their souereigne lord and maister king David.

not regarded.

In the meane time, Philip king of France laboured to the pope, that he might by his authoritie cause the Englishmen to surceasse from further vexing the Scots, by their cruell inuasions made into their countrie: but when the popes ambassadors came about this matter into England, they were so little regarded, that they could not get licence to declare that message, and so were they glad to returne without doing any thing in the matter whereabout they were sent. Shortly after was a parlement called at Perth, where Edward Balioll was confirmed king of Scotland, a great number of the nobles promising there by solenne othes, neuer to remoue any rebellion against him in times to come. In the meane time rose great alteration betwixt Henrie Beaumont, and Alexander Spowbraz for certeine lands in Buchquhane [which Edward the first had giuen John Spowbraz, brother of this Alexander.] Henrie Beaumont claimed those lands by the right of his wife, that was daughter to the said Alexander, but the Spowbraz claimed them as heire to his brother.

Strife betwixt Spowbraz &
Beaumont.
Fr. Thin.

After long contention, Spowbraz had the lands adiudged to him by sentence of the Balioll, by reason whereof, David Cummin earle of Atholl, and Richard Talbot, fauouring the cause of Henrie Beaumont, began to practise such conspiracies against the Balioll, that to auoid further danger, he was glad to repeale the former sentence by him giuen on the behalfe of Alexander Spowbraz, and by new sentence adiudged the lands vnto Henrie Beaumont, for that (as was alledged) he had married the inheritor thereof, which sentence he was constrained to change (saith Buchanan) by this means. * Balioll (fauouring Alexander) and hauing adiudged the matter on his side, so offended the minds of the aduersaries, that they feared not openly to complaine of the iniurie. But when they perceiued that they nothing profited therein by their speeches, they all departed from the court to their owne possessions, of which faction Talbot, whilest he goeth into England, was taken and carried to Dunbretton: Beaumont doth strengthen Dungard a strong castell of Buchquhan, and not onlie maketh the land whereof the contention was, but also the whole countrie adjoining, to be subiect to his gouernement. Cummin (returning to the part of David Bruce) goeth into Atholl (whereof he was earle) and sending the places of strength thereabouts, armeth himselfe to withstand all force, if if anie be prepared against him. Balioll fearing the conspiracie of these great men, changed his iudgement, and awarded the lands (whereof the contention grew) to Beaumont, and reconciled Cummin vnto him, by the gift of many rich possessions, that then belonged to Robert Steward, which shortly after was king of Scotland.

Thus through puissance of the parties, the truth in deciding the controuersie, might not onlie not haue place, but Balioll was also diuinen to that extremitie, that he must haue one of them (with his faction) to be his enemies. For now Alexander, stroken with this iniurie (to haue the iudgement giuen before for him thus to be reuoked) foraking the Balioll, ioined him selfe with Andrew Murray gouernour of Scotland (for David Bruce) hauing a little before ransomed himselfe, with a great masse of monie out of the Englishmens hands. These things (although done at feuerall times) we haue ioined together, leass by often repeating of them in other places, the course of the historie might be broken: for (vpon this) Andrew Murray besieged Beaumont in the castell of Dongard, the inheritance of his wife, where he surrendered the same, vpon condition that he might freely repaire into England: at what time also Richard Talbot (being beyond the mounteins, in the inheritance of his wife the daughter of John Cummin of Scotland (for now manie English nobles possessed great reuenues in Scotland by marriages) hearing of these newes, that Balioll was forsaken by the earle of Atholl and Beaumont, would haue gone into England, but was taken in Lownes. ¶ This yere the earle of March holding on the part of the king of England, came to him to Perthcastell vpon Aine, who returning homeward, was grievously wounded of the people of Northumberland, for countousnes, to haue robbed him of such monie as he. Edward had liberallie bestowed vpon him.)

Not long after this, Edward Balioll came to Kainstrew, and there receiuing the people into his obedience, had the keyes of the castell of Rothsaye and Dunnone, brought vnto him by sir Alane Ailethiriffe of Wate [at what time the king gaue to him the keeping of the castell of Rothsaye, hauing before made him thiriffe.] Thus did the Balioll increase in puissance, by such confluence of people as daile submitted themselves vnto him, & he enriched them liberallie with lands and goods still as they came to him, thereby to win there good wils. He sought by all meanes possible to haue gotten Robert Steward into his hands, as the person whome he knew to haue most right, next vnto king David to the crowne of Scotland: but through the diligent foresight of his friends, this Robert Steward being about the age of fiftene yeres, was conueied [with bote and horse, by the helpe of William Hariot and John Gilbert] to the castell of Dumbarton, where he was iustlie receiued by Malcolm Fleming the capteine.

The Balioll being soze offended, that such castles as were kept by his enemies, were so great an impediment to his interprises, by succouring and relieuing his aduersaries to make warres against him, he got together an armie, and the next yere laid siege to the castell of Lochleuin: but perceiving that this castell might not be wone without long siege, he appointed sir John Striueling to continue the siege with a great power of men, vntill the castell were yielded. There were left also with him, Michaell Hariot, David Wemmis, and Richard Paleuill, with diuerse other. These capteins aduising the place and site of the castell, lodged themselves within the churchyard of saint Serfe, beside Kinross, making bastiles and other defenses within the same, for their more safegard. Within the castell were two valiant capteins to defend it, the one named Alane Wepont and James Lambie, citizens of saint Andriew.

The enemies assaied all the meanes that might be deuised to haue wone this castell, but all was in vaine. At length, they deuised a subtil sleight, whereby to compasse their intent, on this wise. They went about to dam vp the mouth of the riuer where it issueth out of the Loch, with earth, trees, & stones, that the water being so kept in, might rise to such an height, that it should ouerflow the castell, and so drowne all the people within it. And to cause the Loch to swell more speedilie, they turned the course of diuerse riuers and brookes in the countrie thereabouts, and brought them into the same Loch. It chanced at the same time, that sir John Striueling capteine of the siege, with a great part of the armie, went vnto Dunfermling for deuotion sake, to visit the shrine of saint Margaret, sometime queene of Scotland. Whereof Alane Wepont then capteine of the castell, hauing vnderstanding, about midnight prepared three botes, and taking certeine soldiers with him, rowed forth to the head of the dam or water, and there, with such engins as he had deuised for the purpose, assaied to boare through and make a hole in the banke or rampire that kept up the water, which when they had brought to passe, they returned quicklie againe to the castell.

The water hauing once gotten an issue, within a while wore the hole so large, that entering with more violence, it finally brake downe the banke, and rushed forth with such an huge streame, that it bare downe all afoze it, drowning by the bastiles and tents of them that lay at siege there, and caried the same with men and all downe into the deepe sea, they were so suddenlie taken, yet they could make anie shift to escape. Alane Wepont, when the water was fallen to the old marke, issued forth of the castell, & setting vpon those that had escaped the danger of the water, sue part of them, and put the remnant to flight. John Striueling hearing the mischiefe that had happened to his folks, returned to the siege, and made a bow nener to depart from thence, till he had taken the castell, and slaine all them within it. But yet, after he had laine there a long time, and saw it was not possible to win that fortefesse, he was constrained to raise his siege, and to go his waies, after he had lost thereat no small number of his people. This siege of Lochleuin chanced in the Lent season, in the yere 1335.

In the yere following, king Edward prepared an armie both by sea and land, to enter into Scotland. He sent by sea 70 ships well and sufficientlie decked for the warres, to enter by the Forth: but by a soze tempest manie of those vessels perished betwixt Inchkeith and the North land. He himselfe hauing the Balioll in his companie, with fiftie thousand men, came by land vnto Glasgou, and perceiving there was little for him to do, for that no rebellion greatlie anie where appeared, he returned backe againe into England with the Balioll, and left David Cummin earle of Atholl gouernour in his come, to subdue the residue of the rebels, and to win those strengths, which as yet were defended against him. David Cummin left thus to be gouernour in Scotland, toke vpon him the rule in name both of the king of England, and also of the Balioll, and seized into his hands all those lands in Murray and Buchquhane, which pertained to Robert Steward, confiscating all the goods of such the inhabitants, as would not be swozne vnto him. his owne, would yet neuer surpe anie supertozitie to him himselfe in title, but passed all the grants and writings in the name of Edward king of England, and of Balioll king of Scots. At what time none would publickely professe him a subiect to Dauid Bruce, but boies, who in their plaies & games would alwaies call their king, Dauid Bruce.]

Incontinentlie hereupon, Robert Steward assembled his friends by the helpe of Dungall Campbell of Lochgubow, and suddenly toke the castell of Dunnone, sleaing all the Englishmen and other, which were found therein. [Which Campbell (as saith John Maior) came with 400 men, and by the testimony of Buch. was a man of great power in Argyle.] The commons of Bute and Arrane, glad of this prosperous beginning, assembled together to the number of foure hundred persons, and set forward, that they might come to support Robert Steward in such his late begun enterprises: and being encountered by the waite by Alane Lile thiriffe of Bute, they laid lo lustilie about them, that they slue the thiriffe, [with John Gilbert capteine of the castell of Bute] there in the field, & discomfited all his people [which they did after this manner. These people of Bute, (called the seruants of Batodanus) seeing such sturs to be made by Alane Lile, ran to a heape of stones not farre from them, and with great force pelting the thiriffe, they in the end killed him with stones, and put the rest to flight.] Diuerse of them taken prisoners, were brought awaie, and presented vnto Robert Steward, who in recompense of this seruice, granted sundrie priuileges vnto the inhabitants of Bute and Arrane: as among other things, to be free from paying tribute for their corne and graine. Such felicities succeding one another, caused manie of the Scots to ioine themselves with Robert Steward, in hope to recover the realme out of the English mens hands. Amongst other, Thomas Bruce earle of Carrike, and William Canther [whome John Maior calleth Carrucher, & Buchanan Carruder of Annandale] with a number of the commons came vnto him.

About the same time, the earle of Murray returned south of France, and landed at Donbaiton, where he was most iustlie receiued by the said Robert Steward. Shortly after the said Steward, and the said earle, hauing with them a great power of their friends and allies [as Godfrie Kofse, and others] came into Liddisdale, Kanfrew, Bile, Cunningham and Aire, which together with Ros and Murray, they reduced to the obissance of king Dauid. [At which time (as saith Buchanan) did Kanfraie come to his old lord the Stewards.] The earle of Murray also, went vnto Aberdeen, and there learning where he sojourned, made thither with all speed: but the earle of Atholl vnderstanding how all the countrie toke part with his aduersaries, fled into the mounteins, where he sustained his life with heards and roots for a time, and durst not come south to shew his head. At length, when he saw no waite to escape, he came south, and in most humble wise submitted himselfe to the lords that defended the part of king Dauid. They receiuing him vpon his submission, sware him to be true vnto king Dauid, and exhorting him to be as diligent in reconciling the people vnto king Dauid, as he had bene afore to subdue them to the obedience of the Balioll, they suffered him to depart.

About the same time, Sir William Dowlaglas of Liddisdale, and Andzew Murray, were ransomed home out of England, for a great summe of monie, after they had bene kept there by the space of three yeres in captiuitie. At their comming to Edinburgh, they found the lords assembled in counsell, at the which John Randolph earle of Murray, and Robert Steward, with generall voices were elected gouernours. Manie Scottishmen at this time revolted from the king of England, submitting themselves to king Dauid, as Alexander Ramsay, a verie skillfull warriour, Laurence Preston, John Herring, and John Haliburton knights, with diuerse other.

After this, John Randolph, and Robert Steward, were sent into the north parts with a strong armie, gathered of such as were wearied by the English gouernement, whereat Dauid Cumin (being feared with the sudden assemblie) fled for his safetie, whome they egerlie pursued, and taking him (being then beset in a narrow streit, and oppressed with penurie of all things) they compelled him to yeld (without anie more circumstances) to their faction, who then swearing fealtie to Dauid Bruce, was permitted to depart vpon his promise: whereunto they gaue such faith, that they left him deputie for them. At what time he did not faintlie dissemble the fauouring & defending of the part of Bruce. In the meane time, Randolph returned into Louthian, and ioined himselfe with his old friend William Dowlaglas latelie returned out of England, & now with great slaughters of his enemies egerlie reuenged the long losshomnesse of his imprisonment: to whome also to make their partie the stronger, came Andzew Murray, which was taken at Bokesborowe. Wherefore these gouernours sufficientlie garbed with the nobilitie, appointed a parlement at Perth, in the kalends of Aprill. Whither when the nobles came, there could not be anie thing performed, by reason of the secret hartburning harbored in the bosoms of William Dowlaglas, and Dauid Cumin earle of Atholl: the cause whereof was pretended to be, in that Dowlaglas did obiect vnto Cumin, that it was by his meanes, that he was no longer deliuered out of prison from the English: amongst which nobilitie, Steward fauored Cumin, and almost all the other toke part with Dowlaglas. Which dissention amongst the nobilitie, was occasioned for suspect which they had of the Cumins comming to that place with so great a traine: for he brought thither such number of his friends and followers, that he was a terror to all the rest of the assemblie, to the increase of which suspicion, they further ioined a conceit they had of Cumins great and changeable wit, his aspiring mind, and certeine rumors spread abroad of the comming of the English, with whome no man did doubt, but that the earle of Atholl would ioine for his defense.)

Edward king of England vnderstanding the rebellion of the Scots, determined to assaile them both by sea and land: and so prouiding a nauie of an hundred and foure score ships, sent the same well bittled and manned to saile into the Forth, the which being there arrived, burnt and spoiled the townes on both sides that riuer, but returning backe into England, they lost manie of their vessels by a tempest. King Edward himselfe, together with Edward the Balioll entered by land, with an armie of fiftie thousand men, leading the same to the towne of Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, and there lodged in campe, abiding for the comming of the earle of Atholl, who as then being solicited thereto by the king of Englands agents, was readie to turne againe incontinentlie to his side [who after accozdinglie, with Godfrie of Kofse, & Alexander Spowbait, with other, came to the king of England.]

The same time, whilst the king of England lay thus at Perth, the earle of Hamure (whom the Scottish writers wronglie name the duke of Gelderland) came into England with an armie, and purposing to passe thorough Scotland vnto the place where king Edward lay in campe, to come to his aid, was discomfited consisted on the Burrowe moor, beside Edinburgh, by the power of the governours, and others, which were there assembled against him. There died manie on both parts in the fight (as John Fourdon writeth) for the strangers fought verie balliantlie: insomuch that if William Dowglas, with diuerse other, had not come downe from the hills to the aid of the Scots, whilste they were thus fighting, the strangers that day had wonne the victorie. But now discouraged with the sudden comming of this fresh aid to their aduersaries, they began to giue place, and drew towards Edinburgh: neuertheless keeping themselves in order of battell, they fought still: and at length comming to Edinburgh, they were driven by thorough the friers street, and so by an other street, called saint Marie Wind, where one sir David de Andand, a verie balliant knight chanced to be wounded by one of the enemies, by reason whereof he was so kindled in wrathfull desire to be reuenged, that with an are which he had in his hand, he gaue his aduersarie (that had hurt him) such a blow on the shoulder, that he claue him downe together with his horse, that the are staid not till it light vpon the verie hard pavement, so as the print of that violent stroke remained to be seene a long time after in one of the stones of the same pavement.

The strangers still retiring, and manfully defending themselves, at length got to the hill where Edinburgh castle standeth, and there due their horses, making as it were a rampier of their carcasses, so to defend themselves from the force of their enemies: but being inuironed by the Scots on each side all that night, and hauing neither meate nor drinke wherewith to susteine their languishing bodies, the which beside hunger and thirst, were sore tormented with cold also, and want of conuenient lodging, they yielded themselves the next day, with condition to haue their liues saued. When the spoile of the field (where they first fought) was gathered, amongst the dead bodies there was found a woman of an huge stature, who in the beginning of the battell slept forth before hir companie, and incountered in singular fight with an esquire of Scotland, named Richard Shabo, she ouerthrew him, and afterwards beating downe hir enemies on each side, long it was ere she might be ouerthrought, which chanced not before she was inuironed about on each side with hir enemies.

The earle of Hamur having yielded himselfe into the hands of the governours, was verie courteously used, the earle of Murray not onely rendering vnto him all his goods, but also granting him licence to depart: and for his more suertie, he went himselfe in person with him to the borders, to see him safe deliuered out of all dangers. But by an ambush that lay in wait for the earle of Murray, he was taken prisoner, and brought to king Edward. David Cummin earle of Atholl, hearing that the earle of Murray one of the governours was thus taken, supposing king Edwards part to be much aduanced thereby, came straightwaies vnto Perth, and gaue his faith effronies vnto Edward Bailioll, and was againe established by him governour of the realme of Scotland, as he was before. The king of England, hauing in the meane time gotten the towne of Perth, returned into England, and toke the Bailioll with him, for doubt least when he had recovered the whole gouernement of the realme, he should shrinke awaie from him. The earle of Atholl hauing now regained his former authoritie, began to exercise great crueltie against all those that were enemies to the Bailioll.

The nobles of the contrarie faction (as Patrike Dunbar earle of March, Andrew Murray, & William Dowglas, with other) toke great despite thereat, and raising an armie to restraints his insolent doings, came towards him, whereof he being aduertised (as then lieng at siege before the castle of Kilburnie) rose and met them in the fields within the forrest of Kilblaine, where he gaue them a sore battell, and had gone awaie with the victorie, had not John Crag capteine of Kilburnie sallied forth of the castle with three hundred fresh men, and comming to the succour of his friends, renewed the battell in such earnest wise, that the aduersaries thereby were discomfited, earle David their chiefeine being slaine in the field, with Walter Bide, Robert Cummin, and a great number of other, both gentlemen and commons. Sir Thomas Cummin was taken prisoner, & beheaded the next day, being petyares day. For the battell before mentioned was fought the last day of December (as Fourdon noteth). Who further saith, that the earle of Atholl had with him three thousand men against his aduersaries, which were not past eleven hundred.

* This David earle of Atholl was verie inconstant & greedy of gouernment, who if he had brought all the Scots to haue taken king Edwards part, would out of doubt, haue afterward contended with king Edward, and inuaded the kingdome of Scotland by violence; he did most grieuouslie oppress the gentle and poore people, and wickedlie ordered all things after his own fantasie, without reason. Cummin earle of Atholl was slaine on this wise: Andrew Murray was chosen gouernour in place of the earle of Murray, taken (as before is said) by the Englishmen. This Andrew Murray in the beginning of his new office, laid siege to the castle of Couper, with a mightie power of men, but hearing that the Cummins made foule worke in the north parts of the realme, against such as fauoured not the English part, he left that siege, and went against them, with whome incountered in battell, he ouerthrew their armie, and put them all to flight.

At this bickering were slaine two of the Cummins, Robert and William, Thomas Caldar, and diuerse other balliant men, though enemies for the time vnto the gouernour. This victorie reduced all the north parts of Scotland vnto the obissance of king David. Few Englishmen after the same abode within the north bounds of Scotland, except those that were within the castle of Dungard in Buchquhane. At length this castle was wonne, & all that kept it slaine, except Gentie Beaumont the capteine, who being sworne neuer to returne againe into Scotland, was licenced by the gouernour to depart into England without anie interruption. After this, the gouernour came to the castle of Lochindor, and laid siege to it, where within was the countesse of Atholl, the wife of the late slaine earle David. This woman hauing knowledge aforesaid, that hir house should be besieged, had sent vnto the king of England and to Edward Bailioll for succours.

The king of England now doubting least all the strengths in Scotland, kept by such as were his friends, would be lost without recoverie, if the same were not the sooner rescued, he raised an armie of fortie thousand men, and entering therewith into Scotland, came to the castle of Lochindor as aforesaid. The Scots that lay there at siege, upon knowledge had of his comming towards them, brake vp, and departed from thence. Whereupon, when he had refreshed the hold with new men, munition, and vittels, he toke the countesse forth with him, and passed with bloudie sword thorough Murray, euen to Elghine, and returning by Perth, burnt the towne of Aberdeen. When he went to Striueling, where he strongly repaired the castle: from whence he toke his iourne to Bothenill, and there also in winter he made the castle the stronger, in which he placed a valiant garrison: to this fort the lord Berkeley conveyed bittels from Edinburgh, and in one night discomfited William Douglas that lay in wait to intercept him. After which, king Edward did shortly lose all the said castles, which he had before with so great care fortified. His name being on the sea at the same time, entered into the Forth, and spoiling (as other had done afore time) the church of saint Colme, felt reuenge thereof shortly after: for that ship (as they tell the tale) wherein saint Colmes goods (for so they call them) were laden, sank to the bottom of the sea, without force of anie tempest, or other apparant occasion.

The towne of Perth newlie fortified.

The king of England at his coming to Perth, forth of the north parts of Scotland, and finding the towne unfortified, caused the same to be newlie fenced with walls and bulwarks, at the charges and onerous expenses of these six abbeies, Aberbrothoke, Couper, Lundoch, Balmerinoch, Dunfermling, & saint Andrews. Henrie Beaumont also, who contrarie to his oth before taken, was now returned with king Edward into Scotland, was made capitaine of saint Andrews. Also Henrie Ferrar was made capitaine of the castle of Lucres, William Montacute of Strueling, William Felton of Rockburgh, and the keeping of the towne of Perth was committed unto one Thomas Wylred. Whilist king Edward ordered things in Scotland after this manner, his brother (surnamed by the Scottish writers Eltham) came unto him at Perth, who in the west parts of Scotland had exercised much crueltie, as well against the enemies of the Englishmen, as against those that were fauourers and friends unto them, inso much that passing through Galloway, Carrick, Kile, and Cunningham, he put all to the fier and sword that came in his waies. He burned the church of saint Bute, and a thousand persons within it, which were fled thither for safegard of their liues. At his coming to Perth, he found the king his brother within the church there, who being sore offended with him for his misordered doings, verie sharpelie reprimed him for the same: and forso much as he answered him somewhat frowardlie, he plucked forth his sword, and there thrust him through the bodie, euen before the altar of saint John, wishing that all such might perish on the same wise, as put no difference betwixt friend and fo, place hallowed and unhallowed, as being no reason, that the church should be anie more refuge for him, than he had made it for other.

Edward slew his brother Eltham.

It may be, that king Edward due some other man in this sort, as the Scots here doe write: but for the earle of Cornetwall that was brother to king Edward, and surnamed John of Eltham, because he was borne at Eltham, it is nothing true that he was so made a waie, for he died of a naturall infirmite, as by our English writers it manifestlie appereth. But now to proceed with the historie, as we find it written. Such things accomplished in Scotland (as before ye haue heard) king Edward returned into England, & left the Balioll behind him with a great power of men at Perth. About the same time, Henrie Beaumont due all such Scots as he might lay hands on, that had bene at the battell of Halblaine, where his cosine David Cumin was slaine. Whereuer now, after that king Edward was returned into England, Andrew Murray came forth of the mountains, into the which he was before withdrawn, to eschue the furie of the Englishmen, and by the assistance of sundrie of the nobles of Scotland, he wan the castle of Hinceluin, and raised it to the earth. Shortly after he came into Humes, and there toke the castle of Hillestie, and likewise raised the same.

Then passing forward, he burned Dunnoter.

On the other part, the Englishmen made no lesse spoile and destruction on eich side where they came, so that the Humes, Angus, Stermond, and Colvrie through spoile, murther, & other disgraces, chancing by continuall warre, were left in manner waste and desolat. At length, this Andrew Murray assembling a great power, with support of them of Murray, Mar, and Buchquhan, fought with his enemies at Panmore in Angus, where he obtained the victorie with huge slaughter of Englishmen, and other his aduersaries. In this battell was slaine Henrie Mountfort, who lastelie before had bene sent by king Edward into Scotland to support the Balioll, beside foure thousand others, the most part gentlemen: so that this ouerthrow was verie displeasing to the king of England, hauing his side fore weakened thereby. After the gaine of this victorie, Andrew Murray passed thorough Fife & Angus, ouerthrowing the castle of Lucres, with all the other strengths of Fife, the castle of Couper anelie excepted.

Andrew Murray gardian of the Scots (and sir David Bute) did much harme in the countrie of Carleill, from whence he went to besiege the castle of Edinburgh (as yet in the hands of the English) whose intent coming to the knowledge of the marchers of England, they hastened to repaire to raise the same siege of Edinburgh, and to rescue their countreymen within the towne. By meanes whereof, the Scots removed and came to Clerkington, and the English came to Brechtone not farre distant; betwene whome there was a great fight, and manie slaine on both sides. But the victorie inclining (without anie great conquest) to neither partie, both armies parted: for the English went ouer Tweed, and the Scots setting that they would go into England, lodged themselves at Caluskeill. So that king Edward hearing of such prosperous successe chancing to his aduersaries, sent incontinentlie two capitaines with two armies into Scotland, to the support of the Balioll.

William Tailbois a man of notable prowes, hauing the conduct of the one of these armies, was encountered by William Keith, and after the discomfiture of his people, being taken prisoner, was kept in captiuitie till he paid two thousand marks for his ranome. The other was led by Richard Mountfort with whome Laurence Bresson and Robert Gordon met, and giuing him battell, due the same Richard with the most part of all his companie. About the same time sir William Montacute earle of Salisbury, together with the earle of Arundell came into Scotland with a great power of men, and besieged the castell of Dunbar, lieng at the same for the space of 22 weeks. [At which battell also was king Edward, the earle of Gloucester, the lords Persie and Beuill, being in the yeare 1337, as saith Scala chron.] Within the said castell was the countesse hir selfe, surnamed blacke Agnes of Dunbar, who shewed such manlie defense, that no gaine was to be got anie waies forth at hir hands, so that in the end they were constrained to raise their siege, and to depart without speed of their purpose. It is said, that this countesse vsed manie pleasant words in teasing and taunting at the enemies doings, thereby the more to encourage hir followers.

One day it chanced that the Englishmen had deuised an engine called a sow, vnder the pentise of a covert wherof they might approach safelie to the walls: the beholding this engine, merilie said, that vnlesse the Englishmen kept their sow the better, they would make hir to cast hir pigs: and so she after destroyed it. In the yeare next after this siege, there was such a dearth thorough all the bounds of Scotland, land, with such mortallitie of people, as a greater had not lightlie bene seene nor heard of. The cause of which mortallitie proceeded (as was thought) for that the ground lay untilled and not occupied, by reason of the continuall warres before passed. [The marchers of England (that were left behind the lords that went into Scotland) were discomfited at Bersefen: where Robert Baners was taken, with manie other prisoners, beside a multitude that were slaine, by reason of certeine displeasing words amongst them, which caused that they brake order, divided themselves, and fought in an inconuenient place.] All the souldiers that kept the castell of Couper, for lacke of vittells left the house void, and coming to the sea side, hired a ship to haue passed into England, but through negligence of the maister mariner, they fell vpon a sand-bed, and so were cast away. About the same time the most part of all the strengths and fortresses in Louthian were kept by Englishmen.

The towne of Edenburgh was stuffed with a great number of souldiers, both Englishmen and Scots. Amongest whome there was a Scot of a right stout stomach named Robert Denbergess; he, for that it was perceiued he loued but little the English nation, was euill intreated and vsed amongst them, in so much that on a day, hauing his head broken by the marshall named Thomas Anaton, he ceased not to seeke some meane to be reuenged, till he bought his purpose to passe, so that shortly after he slue the said marshall, and after ward to auoid the danger of death due for that fact, he got away, and came to William Dowglas, whome he perswaded with all diligence to passe vnto Edenburgh, where he might find his enemies at some great aduantage, by reason of the slothfull negligence as then growne amongst them. William Dowglas following this aduertisement, came secretly on a night vnto the foresaid towne, and slue foure hundred Englishmen sleeping in sleepe and drunkenesse, before they were able to make any resistance.

Not long after, Andrew Murray the gouernor of Scotland deceased, to the great damage of the common-wealth, and was buried in Roslinarkie, in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour 1338. It came well to passe for Scotland, that about the same time the king of England entering into wars against France, was constrained to cease his pursuit of the conquest which he minded to make in Scotland, the which must needs haue come to full effect, if he had followed his former purpose and intent. But to proceed, after the deceasse of Andrew Murray the gouernor, Robert Stewart toke all the charge on him for the gouernment of the realme, till king David returned home out of France, and began to rule all things himselfe. Widdall also was recovered out of the Englishmens hands, with diuers other places, about this time, by the high prowes and manlie valiance of William Dowglas and other Scottish capteins; and therefore in the reward of the good seruice they did by the same William in conquest of that countrie, he intioied the same afterward as his rightfull inheritance. [Henric earle of Lancastier and Derby, hearing of the valure of these two worthy capteins, William Dowglas, and Alexander Ramsay, earnestlie desired to see them, and to trie their strengths in iusting. Whereupon, there was a day appointed therefore at Berwick by all the said parties, where they met with their complices provided accordingly. At what time a certeine Englishman asked Peter Crame, if he would not refuse to iust with him, to whome he answered, that he accepted the challenge, but willed him first to dine well, because he should that night sup in paradise. Which fell out accordingly, for in running together the Englishman was slain.] The king of England moued with high displeasure at these doings, sent a right valiant knight named Sir Thomas Berkeley with a great power of men into Scotland. Against whome came William Dowglas, and Robert Stewart the gouernor, and gaue him battell at Blackeborne, where the Scots were discomfited and so beaten downe, that few of them escaped, which were not either slaine or taken. Notwithstanding the two capteins saued themselves by flight.

Not long after, William Dowglas fought with his enemies at the Cragings, where hauing not past fortie men in his companie, he discomfited sir John Strueling, who had with him nere hand fure hundred Englishmen and Scots, that toke his part in the king of Englands quarell. In the yeare following, the same William Dowglas toke the castell of Hermitage, & slue all them that were found within it. In the yeare next after, he fought five times in one day with sir Laurence Abernethie, principall capteine vnder the Balliol, and being put to the worse at foure of those times, at the fift he vanquished his enemies, and toke prisoner their capteine the said sir Laurence, who was sent to the castell of Dunbretton, there to remaine in safe keeping for a time. For these and such worthy enterprises hardlie atchieued, his Will. Dowglas was much commended, and within a few daies after the taking of the said sir Laurence Abernethie, he was sent by the gouernor the said Robert Stewart into France, as ambassadoe to king David, for the dispatch of certeine weightie matters touching the state of the realme.

In the meane time, Robert Stewart the gouernor raised a mightie armie, and came with the same vnto the towne of Perth, planting a strong siege round about it; for diuiding his host into foure parts, he lodged them with their capteins in foure seuerall places. The first consisting for the most part of westerne Scots, he gouerned himselfe; the second he committed to Patrike Dunbar earle of March, the third to William earle of Ross, and the fourth, to Maurice of Motobray lord of Clidedale. These lay thus at siege of this towne for the space of ten weekes. And though sundrie times they gaue alarmes and assaults to it, yet was it so stoutly defended by Englishmen and other within, that the Scots for a long time lost more than they wan. At length when they were in maner past all hope to get the towne, & readie to haue departed from it, William Dowglas arriued in the late, bringing with him out of France in five ships, both men of war, and also munition of armour, artillerie, and weapons, which serued the Scottishmen in that season greatlie to purpose.

Amongest other, there were two knights of the familie of Castlegalliard, and two esquiers, Giles de la Hois, and John de Beise; also a noble pirat, named Hugh Handpile, who had the charge ouer the foresaid five ships. [While Edward the third was at the siege of Turnie, the earls of March and Northumberland made a rode into Scotland, and were discomfited by Thomas Greie the elder, Robert Baners, & John Copeland, with the garrison of Koksborow, then in the hands of the English, but after wone by the Scots, on Easter day, at the verie houre of the resurrection; the gouernment whereof seemed to be fatal, because all the capteins of this towne died of euill deaths, amongst whome was Alexander Ramsay the capteine hereof that died with hunger, being put in prison for verie enmie that William Dowglas bare vnto him.] About the same time, one William Bullocke had taken effioners the castell of Conper to the king of Englands be, but by perswasion of this William Dowglas, he rendered it by againe, and departed with bag and baggage. Those Scots that had served under him likewise, were content to forsake the king of Englands wages, and to serve William Dowglas, who led them forthwith to the siege of Berth, the which towne shortly after his coming was rendered into the gouernors hands, by Thomas Wynd the capteine, in the third moneth after it was first besieged, & in the yere after our redemption 1341.

Among other exploits attempted at this siege after the coming of the lord William Dowglas, the Frenchman Hugh Handpile, taking upon him on a day to approach the towne with his ships, and to giue an assault thereto, he lost the chiefest vessel he had, although afterwards when the towne was now rendered, the lord William Dowglas caused the same ship to be to him againe restored, and with great thanks and liberall rewards giuen as well to him as to the other of the Frenchmen, he sent them backe into France, greatlie to their pleasure and contentation; although in their returne, as they passed out of Dumlie firth, they escaped verie hardlie from the shore. [The winter after the siege of Turneie, king Edward went to Melrose, but from thence riding through part of the forrest of Etrike, in a tempestuous time, he came backe againe to Melrose, where Henrie earle of Lancaster lusted with William Dowglas (by covenant) in the kings sight. King Edward taking a truce, departed from Melrose, halfe overcome with melancholie against those that first moued him to this tourne, not succeeding as they hoped and desired that it should haue done.]

In the same yere (as some do write) or (accoding unto other) in the yere following, there was such a miserable dearth, both through England and Scotland, that the people were driuen to eat the flesh of horses, dogs, cats, and such like vniuersal kinds of meats, to susteine the ir languishing liues withall, yea, inso much that (as is said) there was a Scottish man, an vplandish fellow named Trissiclocke, spared not to steale children, and to kill women, on whose flesh he fed, as if he had bene a wolfe. Berth being once deliuered (as before is said) to the gouernor, he went with his armie to Struckling, and besieging the castell, had it rendered unto him the eight day after his coming thither, on these conditions, that Thomas Foulke the capteine, with his wife and children might safely passe into England, without fraud or guile of anie impeachment [of which castell (as saith Buchanan) Maurice the sonne of Andrey Pursey was made capteine.] Edward Balliol, by such good and prosperous successe, as did thus bailie fall into his enemies, to auoid further danger, after oft remouing from place to place, at length he was constrained to flee into England, lest he should haue fallen into his aduersaries hands.

Not long after, the castell of Edenburgh was waune by policie on this wise. William Dowglas hauing acquaintance with one Walter Towlers, [whom Buchanan called William Cur a merchant] caused him to prouide a ship, and to arrive therewith in the forth, feining as though he were a merchant, and to offer wines to sell unto the garrison that kept Edenburgh castell. This Towlers according to instructions thus giuen him, prouided him of all things necessarie for the purpose, & so coming into the forth with his ship, came on land himselfe, and brought with him into Edenburgh two punchions of wine, which he offered to sell unto the ward of household to the capteine of the castell, who falling at a price with him, appointed that he should bring them earlie in the morning by to the castell, that they might be receiued in. Towlers hiring a cart ouer night, came with the punchions by to the castell gate, earlie vpon the breake of the day in the next morning, and hauing the gates opened, entred with his cart, and being come within the gates with it, he plucked forth a trefuge or pin deuised of purpose, and immediatlie therewith the cart with the punchions fell downe, so stopping the entrie of the gates, that in no wise they might be shut or closed againe.

The Dowglasse hauing in his companie William Bullocke, Walter Fraiser, and John Sand-lands, right valiant knights, with diuers other bar-die and bold personages, laie in covert not far from the castell, & hauing knowledge giuen him by found of home, or other wise, when to come forth, he hasted therevpon with all diligence vnto the gates, and fir-ding them thus open, first slue the porters, and after into the castell, within a while had dispatched all them within, and so became maisters of that fortres, within the which for capteine they left one William Dowglas, the bastard brother of the other William Dowglas, by whose conduct chieflie, both this enterprise and diuers other were luckilie atchieued. Thus was the realme of Scotland clearelie recovered out of the enemies hands, the Englishmen, and all other that took part with the Balliol, constrained to auoid out of all the parts and bounds thereof. The castell of Edenburgh was thus recovered by the Scots in the yere last before remembred, to wit, 1341.

The same yere, or in the next ensuing, the second of June, king David with his wife queene Jane, and sumerie nobles both french and Scottish, came safe-lie through the seas, and arrived in Innerbernie, from whence with no small triumph they were conueied vnto Berth. About the same time, Alexander Ramsey of Dalehouse, one of the most valiant ca-pteins knowne in those daies, gathering a great power of men, entered into England, and hauing knowledge that the Englishmen were assembled, in purpose to giue him battell, laid an ambush for them, and trauailing them within danger thereof, by such a fierce and new onset as he gaue vpon them, he put them out of order, and chased them most egelie, killing and slaying a great number of them at his pleasure. Amongest the prisoners that were taken, the earle of Salisburie (as the Scottish historie saith) was one, and the capteine of Rokelburgh another.

Sir Alexander Ramsey, perceiuing that the most part of the garrison of Rokelburgh were either slaine, or taken in this last conflict, together with their capteine, came hastily thither, and giuing a right fierce assault thereto, by fine force took it.
Wherefore king David in recompense of his valancie thus declared in his seruice, gaue vnto him the keeping of this castell, together with the shirftwoike of Cintdale. Whereat William Dowglas took such displeasure, that seeking to be reuenged, he found meanes to apprehend this Alexander Ramsey within the church of Watouke, and put him in prison within the castell of Hermitage, where he remained in great miserie and lacke of food till he died. [About which time, by the said kind of death (as saith Buchanan) was William Bullocke slaine, by David Berhelie. The death of which two did draw Scotland into manie factions, and filled it with seditions.]

King David was sore moued herewith, purposing to see such punishment done vpon William Dowglas for that rebellious attempt, as might serue for an example to all other how they went about anie the like offense. Nevertheless, the Dow-glasse kept him out of the way amongst the moun-

Ambassadors from the king of France into Scotland.

Some after the earle of Salisburie was taken by sir Alexander Ramsay (as is said) he was exchanged for the earle of Murray, that had bene holden manie yeres before as prisoner in England. But it should appeare by other writers, that the earle of Salisburie was not taken at that time in the borders of Scotland (as before is supposed) but in the borders of France, where he was in the wars which king Edward the same time made against the Frenchmen, & now was exchanged for the earle of Murray. But howsoever it was, king David after the realme of Scotland was once brought into a quiet estate from the former trouble of war, he called a parliament at the towne of Perth, where he rewarded verie liberallie all such as had either done any notable service themselves, or had lost any of their friends or parents in defense & recoverie of the realme out of his adversaries hands. Among other, Hugh Boece had in recompense of his fathers slaughter at Duplin, the inheritance of a ladye of the baronie of Balbrid given him in marriage, which baronie is yet possessed by the heires of the said Hugh.

Shortly after upon the breaking up of this parliament, king David raised a mightie armie, and entered with the same into Northumberland; but committing the whole charge to John Randolph erle of Murray as lieutenant generall, he would not that a nie of his owne banners should be spied and borne in all that voiage [although himselfe were there in person, serving secretlie, and would not be knowne in this iournie.] The most part of all Northumberland was burnt and spoiled, for they remained there a moneth before they returned, conueying awaie with them great riches, which they got abroad in all places where they came. Shortly after, he came with a new armie into England, causing his owne standard to be carried afore him at that time, as he that toke upon him the whole gouernance of that enterprize himselfe. The Englishmen withstanding all their goods into strengths, minded not to giue the Scots any set battell, but to take them euer at some advantage, if they straid abroad any where vnwarlike to fetch in booties. Neither were they altogether disappointed of their hoped prey, for 5 Scottish knights, whose names were Stewart, Eglington, Craggie, Boyd, and Fullarton, pursuing their enemies on a time ouer fiercelie, were taken prisoners, and after redeemed for great summes of monie. At length, king David perceiuing that he wasted but time, returned into Scotland. But not long after he went againe into England, in which iournie his people were so beaten with vehement stormes of raine and haile, that they had much adoe to saue themselves from perishing through the vnmearurable force of that so rigorous weather.

On the other side, the Englishmen that were gathered to resist against him, were in semblable manner nere hand destroyed with the like rage of tempest. Hereupon king David, to the end that his enterprize should not seeme altogether to want effect, ouerthrew sundrie strong houses on the English borders, and so returned home without other damage either done or received. About the same time did Edward king of England besiege the towne of Calis. The French king therfore deuising all waies possible whereby to saue that towne, and to cause his aduersarie to raise his siege, sent ambassadors into Scotland, to require king David, that with an armie he would enter into England, and do what damage he might vnto the Englishmen, to trie if by that meanes king Edward could be constrained to leaue his siege, and to returne home for defense of his owne countrie and subiects. In the meane time also (as I find in the Scottish chronicles) king Edward addrest his orators into Scotland, offering vnto king David, vpon condition that peace might be had, to deliuer into his hands not onelie the towne of Berwike, but also Edward Baliol his old aduersarie, for whose cause the warre had so long continued betwixt them.

These offers being proponed in counsell, though some of the wisser sort gaue aduise that in no condition they ought to be refused; yet the king himselfe (for loue that he had to the French king with whome he had bene brought up) and other of the nobles hauing pong heads, vpon desire to be renewed of the Englishmen by practise of warres (wherevnto they were inclined) would needs condescend to the French kings chargeable request, & refuse the king of Englands beneficiall offers. Whereupon an armie was leuied, and solempne proclamation made, that all such as were able and fit to beare armour, should meet the king at a certaine day and place, which was to them in the same proclamation assigned. The earle of Ross therfore came with his people vnto Perth, and there made his musters before the king: but in the night following he slue the lord of the Isles, with seuen of his kinsmen as they were in their beds, and thereupon fled, and got him with all speed againe into Ross [whereby the armie was greatlie diminished, when the friends of both parts fearing ciuill warres amongst the families departed home.]

King David, though he was sore displeased here-with, and desired most earnestlie to haue punished that heinous act; yet because he would not hinder his iournie, he let passe the punishment therof, till more conuenient opportunitie might serue thereto. [Notwithstanding that William Dowglas of Liddell did earnestlie perswade him, at that time to leaue the iournie, and first to punish these turmoils at home, whereby all things might be quieted in his absence.] At his coming to the borders, and before he entered into England, he made manie knights, to stirre them the rather to do valiantlie; but first he created William Dowglas an earle, which William was sonne to Archembald Dowglas, slaine before at Halidon hill. There was vndoubtedlie a mightie power of the Scots assembled at that present; inasmuch as there was of earles, lords, knights, and gentlemen, to the number of two thousand men of armes; and of such armed men as they called hoblers, set forth by the burrowes and good townes twentie thousand; beside the archers and other footmen; so that they were at the least fortie thousand men in all, or (as some writers affirme) three score thousand.

King David with that his puissant armie, the first of October entered Northumberland, and coming to a fortrell not farre off from the borders called Liddell, they late round about that place for the space of three daies, without giuing thereto anie assault: but the fourth day they assailed it right fiercelie, and in the end entered by fine force, sleaing the more part of all those which they found within the house. The captaine sir Walter Selbie was taken alive, but immediatlie by king David his commandement, had his head stricken off, and was not permitted to haue so much time as to make his confession, which he instantlie desired to haue done, but it would not be granted. From thence the armie remained, and went vnto the abbie of Lauercoft, which they spoiled; and that done they departed, and passing by Batward castell, and the towne of Redpeth, kept on on till they came vnto the priozie of Berham, which they sacked; but the towne was saued from fire by commandement of king David, who in this fourtie appointed to preferre foure towne onelie from burning; to wit, Berham aforesaid, Cobridge, Darlington, and Durham, to the end he might in them lay by such store of vittels, as he should prouide abroad in the countrie, wherewith to susteine his armie during the time of his abiding in those parties.

From Berham, where he laie thre daies, he marched to Ebbesheffer, waisting and spoiling the countrie on each hand, and after turned towards the wood of Beaurepaire; and comming thither, lodged himselfe in the manour, and set his people abroad into the countrie to fetch in bottles, & to burne by the towne and houses in all places where they came. The spoile, waste, destruction, and slaughter which the Scots practised with fire and sword, was wonderfull to heare, and incredible almost to be told, they spared neither young nor old, church nor chappell: religious houses as well as other were consumed to ashes. The abbete of Durham, and all places thereabout (as the Scottish writers affirme) were spoiled and miserablie sacked, although it was said king David was admonished in a dreame, that he should in any wise abstaine from violating the gods and lands pertaining to saint Cuthbert.

The earle of Northumberland lieutenant of the North vnder king Edward, to resist these iniuries, raised a great power of men, and joining the same with such bands of old souldiers as king Edward had lately sent ouer out of France for that purpose, first dispatched an herald at armes vnto king David, requiring him to staie from further inuading the countrie, and to returne into Scotland, till some reasonable order for a small peace might be agreed vpon betwixt him and the king his maister: otherwise he should be sure to haue battell to the utterance within thre daies after. King David contemning this message, required his folks to make them readie to receiue their enemies if they came to assaile them, and on the next morrow, he diuided his armie into thre battells. In the first was Robert Steward prince of Scotland, and Patrike Dunbar earle of March: in the second were appointed John earle of Murray, and William earle of Dowglaste: in the thirde was the king himselfe, with all the residue of the nobles. [Contrarie to the which Buchanan placeth Dowglaste in the first, the king in the middle, and Steward in the thirde.]

In the morning earlie before the battell, the earle of Dowglaste departed from the armie to descrie the English host, and to vnderstand their force and order (if it were possible:); but entring somewhat vnwarilie within danger of his enemies, he was chased, and that to such disadvantage, that he lost fiftie, or rather fure hundred (as some booke haue) of young gentlemen, and such other light horsemen as he tooke forth with him, escaping vertie narrowlie himselfe also from being taken at the chase. In the meane season, the English host diuided likewise into thre battells, approached forward, and came within sight of the Scottish armie. Whereupon David Graham with a toing of fure hundred horsemen, well appointed gaue a full charge on the skirts of the English archers, thinking to haue distressed them: but he was so sharpelie receiued and beaten with arrowes, that losing a great number of his men, he was constrained to flee backe to the maine battell, and that not without great danger of being taken in his flight by such as followed him.

These two discomfitures notwithstanding, the Scots rushed fiercelie vpon their enemies, & fought with great manhood a long season; but in the end,

Robert Steward, and the earle of March, perceiving their people partlie to shrink backe, caused the retreat to be sounded, in hope to saue their men by withdrawing into some safer place: but this fleeing backe of the earle of March and Robert Steward, brought the discomfiture vpon all the residue of the Scots. For that battell of Englishmen that was first matched with them, came now with such violence vpon the maine battell where king David fought, that within a short while after, the same was utterlie discomfited and put to flight. In this business king David himselfe did in euery point plaie the part of a most valiant chieftaine, encouraging his people as well with words as notable examples to do their indeuours. Neither would he stie after he saw himselfe destitute of all conuenient aide, but still continued in earnest fight, desiring nothing so much (as should appeare) as death, for that he thought nothing more displeasing than life, after the slaughter of so manie of his nobles and liege people.

At length hauing his weapons stricken out of his hands, one John Copland came vnto him, and killed him to yeld; but he with one of his fists gaue this Copland such a blow on the mouth, that by force of the gantlet he strake out two of his teeth before he did yeld vnto him. Which Copland is misnamed by Iohn Maior, and not onelie called Constaunt, but also reported by him to be a Calcoigne, whereas it is euident by our histories, that he was named Copland, and a mere Englishman. But to our purpose. The Scots that fought in the reuerward had no better successe than the other: for that battell was also broken & put to flight, with great slaughter as well of the nobles, as other commons, besides those that were taken. There were slaine in this dolorous conflict, the earle of Murray, the earle of Stratherne, the constable, the marshall, the chamberleine and chancelor of Scotland, with a great number of other nobles and commons [with Maurice Murray]. There were taken with the king fure earles, that is to say, Dowglaste, Fife, Sutherland, Wigton, and Spenteith [the earle of March & the Seneschall fled, but after the earle of March being taken, was with the earle of Spenteith (as saith Scala chron.) byatone and hanged at London.] And besides other great riches lost in this field, the holie crosse (as they call it) of holie rood house, was found vpon king David, who bare it about him, in trust that by vertue thereof he should be invincible: but he was spoiled both of that and all other his iewels which were found vpon him at the same time. This battell was stricken nere vnto Durham, the 17 day of October, in the yere 1346. What countries and places the Englishmen got after this victorie, ye may read in the English histories.

In the yere following, the Balioll, with the earle of Northumberland made a road into Louthian, and Cliddesdale, bringing a great bottie of goods and cattell out of those countries into Galloway, in which countrie the Balioll abode a long time after. At length, the Scots recouering themselves with much paine, after the slaughter of so manie of their nobles and commons, beside the discomfort for the taking of their king, chose and appointed Robert Steward as gouernour to haue the rule of the realme. About the same time, William Dowglaste the sonne of Archibald Dowglaste, that was brother vnto god sir James Dowglaste, who (as before is said) was slaine in Spaine, returned south of France, and by support of his friends chased the Englishmen out of Dowglastdale, Twidale, Twidale, Strike forest, & Tweedale. John Copland capteine of Roxburgh, to resist such enterprises, gathered a number of men,

In the yere following, was the same sir William Dowglas, being lately before ransomed out of England, slaine, as he was hunting in Etrike forest, by his cosin and godsonne William earle of Dowglas, in reuenge of the slaughter of Alexander Hamley, and other old grudges. Thus was the house of the Dowglases diuided amongst themselves, pursuing each other manie yeres together with great unkindnesse, unnatural enimitie and slaughter. In the yere next following, which was 1355, shortly after Easter, there arrived in Scotland an noble knight named sir Eugenie de Garentis, with a companie of Frenchmen, though few in number, yet valiant and verie skillfull warriors, which were sent thither by John king of France, that succeeded his father king Philip of Maloie, lately before deceased, and deliuered vnto the gouernour and other nobles of the realme of Scotland, fortie thousand crownes of the sunne, to be imployed about the leuieng of an armie against the Englishmen, that they might be constrained the sooner to withdraw their powers out of France.

This monie was receiued, though a small part thereof came to the hands of the souldiers or men of warre of Scotland, for the lords and nobles kept it safe inough to their owne vse. Yet neuertheless, the earle of Morch, and William Dowglas, gather their people, and passe forth with the same to the borders, and entering into England, appoint William Hamley of the Dalehouse, to ride before with a number of light horsemen, to the end, that if the Englishmen did assemble and come forth too strong against him, he might retire backe to the maine battell, where they lay in couert, at a place called Misset moor. This Hamley doing as he was commanded, made a great forraie thorough the countrie, and hauing got together a great bovie of cattell, with, drew with the same homewards: but being sharpe-ly pursued by the Englishmen, in hope to recouer their goods, he fled amaine, and they following egerly in the chase, were vpon the Scottish armie before they were aware. The Scottishmen, and those few Frenchmen that were there, set vpon the Englishmen fiercelie, and finally put them to flight, though not without some slaughter on their part: for there were slaine of Scots sir John Holieburton, and sir James Turnebull knights. These were taken prisoners of Englishmen, sir Thomas Greie, and his sonne, with John Darcas, and manie other Englishmen.

* The taking of which Greie is reported by others to haue bene after this manner. The lords Perth and Penell, gardians of the English marches, toke truce with the lord William Dowglas, at the time that he conquered the lands which the Englishmen had twone of the Scots. But Patrike earle of March (being in confederacie with Garentis) would not by anie persuation consent to that leage: wherevpon (with a number of others) he made a road to the castle of Forham, ambushing themselves vpon the Scottish side of the riuer of Tweed, sending ouer a banneret with his ensigne, and 400 men to forrage & spoile the countrie, who gathering the preies, drawe them in despite alongst the castle: wherevpon Thomas Greie, capteine of Forham (sonne to Thomas Greie, that had bene thrice times by the Scots besieged in the said castle of Forham, in the reigne of king Edward the second) seeing the commons of England thus robbed (and deeming it his part to defend his countrie, friends, and their substance) issued forth of Forham with few men more than fiftie of the garrison of the castle, and a few of the common people vnexpert in matters of war; who (not knowing of the secret ambush of the band which Patrike had laied in wait behind Tweed) issued forth to follow and recouer the preie: but being so farre gone in chase of the enemie, as that he could not returne in safetie (because he was beset before and behind with the 400 on the one side, & the ambush laied by Tweed on the other side) the said Greie and his companie (finding none other remedie but to hazard the successe) forsooke their horses, and on foot (standing to the extremitie) with a wonderfull courage set vpon the Scots, whereof more were killed than of the English, but the Scots comming so close on the English (not able to resist) they began to flie, at that time Thomas Greie (as before is declared) was taken prisoner.

The earles of March, and Dowglas, after the obtaining of this victorie, came suddenly in the night season vnto the towne of Berwik, and raising vp ladders to the wals, wan the towne, but not without losse of diuerse Scottish gentlemen, as Thomas Claus, Andrew Scot of Balwerie, John Gordon, William Sinclair, Thomas Preston, and Alexander Spowbray knights. Of English were slaine Alexander Ogill capteine of the towne, Thomas Vertie brother to the earle of Northumberland, and Edward Greie, with others. Eugenie de Garentis with his Frenchmen did verie ballantlie beare himselfe in this enterpryse, whome Robert Steward the gouernour rewarding with great gifts, sent backe into France, commending him by letters vnto the French king, as he that had done his dutie in euerie behalfe verie thoroughlie. The castle of Berwik, notwithstanding that the towne was thus twone, held forth the Scots and Frenchmen, by reason whereof when an armie of Englishmen came to the succours thereof, they raced the wals, and burnt the houses of the towne, and so departed.

* The tidings whereof were brought to king Edward at the verie instant of his landing from Calis into England, for which cause he taried at his parliament appointed at London but thre daies, and with all speed came to Berwik, where he entered the castle; whereat the burgeses amazed, treated with him, and therevpon the towne of Berwik was redeliuered (against the minds of the Scots) to king Edward. As Edward himselfe being come to the rescue and recouerie of Berwik, and hauing receiued the towne, and finding it so defaced, toke order for the repairing thereof againe, went to Forburgh, and there receiued of the Balioll a full resignation of all his pretended right to the crowne of Scotland. [For there the 26 of Januarie, the said Balioll hauing resigned (as before) all his title to king Edward, alledged these causes: first, in consideration that the Scots were full of rebellion; also, because he had no best, nor anie verie neere of his linage: and for that he

he was of R. Edwards blod of England, he knew not where to bestow it better than upon him. This Balioll is by no autho^r (as Lesseus saith) placed in the catalog of the kings, as well for that he bound himselfe (by homage) to the gouernement of England with an oth, against the gouernement & maiestie of Scotland: as for that being a tyrant, & by force invading the crowne, he continued not long in the same. In truth, I suppose he held it not verie long, and that in continuall warre. But yet for that which I can see, he was crowned king at Scone, 1332, as Lesseus himselfe, Buchanan, and all other autho^rs do agree. Beside, he gouerned by him & his agents untill the yeere of 1342, at what time he yelded his crowne to king Edward of England; which was the full part of ten yeares, after which againe he recovered a good part of England. Wherefore it seemeth strange to me, that Roſe will not allow him a place in the catalog of kings, since Buchan. maketh him the ninth fourth king, and so placeth him under that title, and maketh David Bruce (who was crowned before Balioll, and gouerned after Baliols departing Scotland) the 98 king, naming also Robert (who succeeded after Bruce) the hundred king in order of gouernement; in such sort, that both these writing at one time (but with diuers affections) cannot agree on the number of their kings: one receiuing, & the other reiecting him to be placed in the catalog of their kings. After this, king Edward passing forth to Haddington, spoiled and wasted the countie by the way on each hand as he marched forward; and for displeasure that his name on the sea (after the soldiers and mariners had bene on land, and burned the church of our ladie in those parts called Whitekirke) had with force of a rigorous tempest bene soe shaken, and manie of the ships lost and drowned together with men and all, he fell into such a rage, that he caused all the buildings in those parts to be burnt and spoiled, as well abbeys as all other churches and religious houses, as though he minded (say the Scottish writers) to make warre both against God and all his saints. These things chanced in the yeare 1355, after our common account, about the feast of the Purification of our ladie, & by reason the Englishmen did so much hurt at that time in those parts by fire, they called it ever after: The burnt Candlemas. Shortly after that king Edward was returned into England, William Douglas of Piddeldale recovered out of the English mens possession the lands of Galloway, & the lands of Widdale were in like maner recovered by one Rirpatricke. In the same yeere on the 20 day of October, was the battell of Poitiers fought, where Edward prince of Wales, otherwise named the Blacke prince, ouerthrew the armie of France, and took king John prisoner, with his yongest sonne Phillip, and a great number of other of the French nobilitie besides. There was at this battell with king John, the earle William Douglas, & to the number of three thousand Scots, hauing diuers knights and gentlemen to their capteins, of whom there died in the same battell Andrew Steward, Robert Gordon, Andrew Holiburton, and Andrew Claus, knights. The earle of Douglas escaped with life and vntaken, but Archembald Douglas, son to sir James Douglas slaine in Spaine, was taken prisoner; albeit his taker suffered him to depart for a small ranſome, by reason that William Ramsay of Colliestie, who was also taken with him, made semblance as though the same Archembald Douglas had bene some poore slaue, causing him to pull off his boots, and to do other such vndignifying seruice, as fell not for the estate of a man of any estimation or honestie, to the end it should not be knowne what he was.

Thus the king of England at one time hauing two kings vnder his captiuitie, sat crowned betwixt them at meate in the feast of Christmasse, making (as the vs is) amongst the Englishmen in that season) a great banquet. And this he did (as is reported) to the intent that the maner thereof might be vnted abroad to his high praise & glorious fame. King David within certeine yeares after was conueied by the earle of Northampton vnto Berwike, where the most part of all the nobles of Scotland assembled together to consult with him touching some agreement to be had for his ranſome: but because they could grow to no certeine point therein, he was brought backe againe to London, and there remained in prison as before. In the meane time, Roger Rirpatricke was slaine by James Lindſeie, in a castell where the said James dwelled, and receiued the said Roger as his ghest. This Lindſeie fled upon the fact committed; but yet being apprehended and brought to the gouernor Robert Steward, he suffered death for that offense.

Shortly after, that is to wit at Michaelmasse next ensuing, after king David had bene at Berwike, there was an agreement made for his ranſome, whereupon being deliuered, he returned into Scotland, in the eleuenth yeare after his taking at Durham field. It was agreed that there should be paid for his ranſome one hundred thousand marks sterling, at sundrie dates of payment, as was accorded betwixt them. After he had bene 11 yeares in England, in which place also Froissard setteth downe that he paid but 50000 marks English. And Scala Chron. saith, that at the feast of St. Michael, David king of Scots was deliuered for 100000 marks of siluer: for which, his hostages came to Berwike, being the countie of Southerland, and his sonne that was borne of the sister of king David; Thomas Senescall that was named in Scotland earle of Angus; Thomas Demurrisse baron of Bothwell, and other twentie sons of noble men in Scotland.]

Cruc also was taken for the space of fourtene yeares betwixt both realmes, and diuers nobles of Scotland were appointed to lie as hostages in England, till the monie were paid, as is before mentioned [of which pledges (as saith Lesseus) most died in England, by means whereof, the king was deliuered of a great part of his ranſome.] R. David was also bound by couenant of agreement to race certeine castles within Scotland, which seemed most noſsome to the English borders: which couenant he performed. For upon his returne into Scotland, he cast downe the castles of Dalwinton, Dunfreis, Portolone, and Duridere. He also called a parlement, wherein he enacted sundrie things for the punishment of them that fled from him at Durham field: and first for that his cosine Robert Steward was one of them, being through means thereof a great cause of the ouerthrow, he procured that the act (by which the crowne was appointed for want of issue of his bodie lawfullie begotten, to descend vnto the said Robert Steward) was viterlie reuoked and disannulled, and John Southerland the sonne of Jane his yongest sister, appointed heire apparant in place of the said Robert. And all the lords of Scotland were sworn to obserue and keepe this ordinance.

The earle of Southerland, father to the said John, in hope that his sonne should inioy the crowne, gaue away the most part of his lands, diuiding the same amongst his friends, as to the Haies, the Sinclares, the Ogilbies, and Gordons: but he was neuertheless deceiued of his hope. For shortly after his son being one of them that was giuen in pledge to remaine in England, till the monie for the kings ranſome some was paid, died there of the pestilence, in such sort as the most part of the other pledges likewise did. And shortly after his deceasse, Robert Steward was reconciled to the kings sauer, and ordeined here apparant to the crowne in semblable manner as he was before. The cleargie of Scotland condescended to giue the tenth pennie of all their fruits & reuenues towards the payment of the kings ransom [which the pope caused the clergie to giue.] Not long after, king David called an other council, wherein (according to his promise made to the king of England before his deliuerance) he moued the lords and barons of Scotland in a matter wherof he wished not to haue of them anie towardlie answer, and that was this: Whether they could be contented, that after his deceasse, the crowne of Scotland should be transferred vnto the king of Englands sonne, and to his lawfull heires: [Which thing John Maior assigneth to the yeare 1363, who also saith, that it was this parlement (as he hath red) and done by the perswasion of Jane the queene, forgetting that he said before, that she died in the yeare 1357.]

The lords hearing what was proponed vnto them, answered without anie long studie, that so long as anie of them were able to beare armour or weapon, they would neuer consent thereto. King David right tofull to heare them at this point, thought himselfe discharged, for that he was not bound to labor further in this sute, because his promise made to the king of England touching this point, onelie was, that if the Scottish lords would agree, then he should intaile the crowne to his sonne. In the yeare next following, which was from the incarnation 1357, queene Jane the wife of B. David went into England to see hir brother king Edward, & died there before she returned (leaving no issue behind hir) [at Hertford in the yeare of our redemption (as saith Io. Maior) 1362, and was buried (as saith Sca. chro.) in the greie friers in London beside hir mother. This woman doth the said Maior commend for a most rare person, in that she neuer forsoke hir husband in his banishment into France, & in the time of his imprisonment in England; for which cause she deserueth as great praise as Penelope, although in hir life she imoyed small worldlie pleasure, having had hir bodie dedicated to the marriage bed. For

*Si nihil infausti duras ruli set viles,

According to which, it might haue bene said of this woman, that she might haue bene counted happy, if hir husband had neuer bene oppressed with these manie disgraces of fortune; but then she should neuer haue bene extolled with that commendation, which now to the worlds end she hath amongst the wisest.]

B. David, after hir deceasse, married a yong luscious gentlewoman named Margaret Logie, daughter to sir John Logie knight, but within three moneths after he repented him, for that he had matched himselfe with one of souncane parentage, to the disparagement of his blood. Whereupon he banished both hir and all other that had counselled him to marrie hir, confining them for euer out of all the parts of his dominions. She hir selfe went vnto Augnon, where as then the pope with all his confessorie remained, and entering hir plaint there in the court, followed the same with such diligence, that in the end sentence was giuen on hir side (that is to say) that king David should receiue hir againe into his companie, and to accept and vse hir as his lawfull wife. Thus should the realme of Scotland haue run in trouble and danger of interdiction, had she not departed out of this life by the way in return-

ning homeward. * Charles the fifth surnamed the hoise, being king of France (supported by the aids of Scots) prepared an expedition into the holie land, in which some, when a gracious contention fell among the French and English, the last were overcome by the first through the singular manhood of the Scots. Which benefit Charles not forgetting, erected an order of an hundred archers to be about his person, and by office to keepe watch and ward for him (in the night) within his court gates: which (upon this original) is obserued with great solemnitie, euen in this our age. B. David in the meane time repaired sundrie places and strengths of his realme, & built a tower in Edinburgh castell, bearing the name after him euen vnto this day, called Davids tower. * About this time (or rather more trulie as others haue before this written in the yeare of Christ 1356, or shortly after the deliuerie of David Buse from captiuitie as the third sort do say) William Douglas being about to go on pilgrimage beyond the seas (at such time as king John was preparing his host against the Blacke prince) went with B. John vnto the foresaid battell, being honored by his hands with the title of knighthood: but after, hauing manie of his men slaine, and being enforced to forsake the field, he returned home into Scotland. William Douglas shortly after, vpon the deliuerie of David Buse from the captiuitie of England, was created earle of Douglas. Such about which or at the selfe same time, the said king of Scots advanced William Ramsay to the earldome of Fife, by the means of the wife of the said Ramsay, whom the king intirelie loued (as the report went.) The right of which countie king David affirmed to be tustie in him (so that he might liberallie giue it) as trulie bested in his possession by the forfeiture which Duncan sometime countie of Fife had done in B. Robert Buses daies; in murdering of an esquier called Michael Beton, whome he miserable slue in a river for extreme displeasure. Wherefore this William Ramsay surmized that Duncan (to obtaine pardon for his offense) did by indenture make Robert Buse B. of Scots his heire in reuerfon, if he died without issue male. Yet had this Duncan a daughter (by his wife the countesse of Gloucester, and daughter to the king of England) which was entertained in England, and should haue bene sold to Robert the seneschall of Scotland. But she (rather respecting the satisfieng of hir loue, than the honor of hir estate, rather choosing to be a kings wife, than an earles ladie) toke to husband one William Felson, a knight in Northumberland, which (at the said time when William Ramsay was made earle of Fife) challenged that earldome in the right of his wife, daughter and heire to the said Duncan earle of Fife. But for anie thing that I can yet see, the said Ramsay went away with the honor thereof. After this appealing of certeine rebels that fought to trouble the quiet state of the realme, he purposed to haue gone to Jerusalem: but hauing provided all things necessarie for such a iourne, he fell sicke of a burning feauer, and died within the castell of Edinburgh in the thirtie ninth yeare of his reigne, and fortie seventh of his age, which was from the incarnation 1370, his bodie lieth in Holie rood house, where it was buried in the yeare aforesaid.

* During the time that this David Buse was prisoner in England, he did so earnestlie set his louing affection vpon Katharine Portiner, a damsell of London (by reason of familiar acquaintance with hir) that he could not forbear hir companie, but (as it seemeth) brought hir also into Scotland with him; whereat the lords disdaining, and highlie offended with the king therefore, procured one Richard de

Built, a ballet of Scotland (in feining some matter unto hir from the king, as being sent in message by him) to find meanes to rid hir out of life, which he did so covertlie, and handeled the matter so cunninglie, that he suddenlie murdered hir riding from Spelros to Seltrae. Whereupon, the king conceiving great dolor (not daring to take revengence thereof, for doubt of the nobilitie) caused hir to be honorablie buried at Newbottle, not ceassing (as farre as in him lay) after hir death, to manifest the singular love he bare unto hir in hir life.)

Sundry marvellous things were seene in the daies of this king David, within the boundes of Albion. In the 16 yeere of his reigne, crows, ravens, and pies, in the winter season brought forth their brood, and ceased in the summer and springtime, contrary to their kind. All the yewes in the countrie the same yeere were barren, and brought no lambes. There was such plenty of mice and rats both in houses, and abroad in the fields, that they might not be destroyed. In the 27 yeere of his reigne, the rivers and other waters rose on such heigh through abundance of raine that fell in the latter end of harvest, that breaking forth of their common chanelles, with their violent streame manie houses & towne were borne downe and destroyed. About this time lived divers clerks, in that age counted notable, as John Duns, of the order of saint Francis, Richard Middleton, and William Ocham, with others.

King David being thus dead and buried, the nobles assembled at Lithquo, about the election of him that should succede in his place. The greater part of the nobilitie, and such as were of the sounder iudgement, agreed upon Robert Stewart; but William earle of Dowglas being come thither with a great power, claimed to be preferred by right of Edward Balioll, and of the Cumin, which right he pretended to have received of them both, and there ought to be no doubt (as he alledged) but that the crowne appointed by full title unto them, as all the world knew, and therefore sith he had both their rights, he maintained that he was true and undoubted inheritor to the crowne. It appeared that the said earle Dowglas purposed to usurpe the crowne by force, if he might not have it by friendlie and quiet meanes: but nevertheless he was disappointed of his purpose, by reason that George earle of March, and John Dunbar earle of Murray, with the lord Erskine (which three were captives of Dunbretton, Sterling, and Edinburgh) and others (of whose friendlie furtherance he thought himselfe assured) gave their voices with the Stewart, assisting his side to their uttermost powers. The Dowglas perceiving hereby that he should not be able to mainteine his quarrell, resigned thereupon his pretended title, which in effect was of no importance, nor worth the discussing.

Robert. When was Robert Stewart conveyed to Scone, and there crowned with great solemnitie, and was called Robert the second. This came to passe in the 47 yeere of his age, on our ladie day in Lent, called the Annuntiation, being the yeere of Christ 1370. Moreover, that the firmer amitie & friendship might continue and be nourished betwixt this king Robert and his subject the earle of Dowglas aforesaid, it was accorded that Eufemie eldest daughter to king Robert, should be given in marriage to James sonne to the earle of Dowglas aforesaid. & Thus ye may perceiue how the Stewards came to the crowne, whose succession have intioied the same to our time: queene Marie mother to Charles James that now reigneth, being the eight person from this Robert, that thus first attained unto it [of whose first originall and descent you shall see before in the life of Duncan.

He had to wife at the time of his attaining to the crowne, Eufemie daughter to Hugh earle of Ross, by whom he had two sonnes, Walter and David. But before he was married to hir, he kept one Elizabeth pure in place of his wife, and had by hir three sonnes, John, Robert, and Alexander, with diverse daughters, of the which one was married to John Dunbar erle of Murray, and another to John Leon lord of Clames. The earldome of Murray continued in possession of the Dunbars onelie during the life of this earle John & his sonne, in whom the succession failed touching the name of the Dunbars, in the intioing of that earldome: for leaving a daughter behind him that was married to the Dowglas, the same Dowglas came by that means to the said earldome of Murray. King Robert after his coronation made sundrie earles, lords, barons, and knights. Amongst other, James Lindsay of Glenelke was made earle of Crawford. His wife queene Eufemie deceased the third yeere after hir husband attained the crowne, and then incontinentlie he married Elizabeth pure [or More], daughter to sir Adam pure knight] his old lemmann, to the end the children which he had by hir might be made legitimate by vertue of the matrimonie subsequent. [Although before he had procured this Elizabeth to be giuen in matrimonie to one Cifford a noble man in Louthian, which also died (as fortune served) when Eufemie first wife of the said Robert died, whereby they (being now both at libertie) might renew their owne old love, and in wedlocke possesse that which before they intioied in adulterie.]

Not long after, by authoritie of a parlement assembled, he made his eldest sonne John, begotten on Elizabeth pure aforesaid, earle of Carrick: his second sonne begotten on hir, earle of Menteith and Fife: and his third sonne Alexander, begotten likewise on the same mother, he created earle of Buchanane, and lord of Badenoch. [Besides which he had also two daughters by hir.] His eldest sonne Walter, begotten on Eufemie his first wife, was made earle of Atholl, and lord of Brechin: his second sonne David, begotten on the same Eufemie, was made earle of Stratherne. The said Walter procured the slaughter of James the first, for that he pretended a right to the crowne, as after shall appeare. Shortly after, he called an other parlement at Perth, where it was ordeined, that after the death of king Robert, the crowne should descend unto John his eldest sonne, and to his issue male; and for default thereof, unto Robert his second sonne, and to his heires male; and for default of such heires, to Alexander his third sonne, and to his heires male; and in default of them, to remaine to his sonne Walter, begotten on Eufemie his wife, & to the heires male of his bodie begotten: and if such succession failed, then it should descend unto his yongest sonne David the earle of Stratherne, and to his heires general either male or female. And all the nobles of the realme were sworn to performe this new ordinance touching the succession of the crowne, and that in most solemn maner.

About this time, the borderers, which are men ever desirous of warres and trouble, to the end they may applie their market, whereby they most chiefe live, that is to say, reise and spoile of their neighbors goods, through envie of long peace and quietnesse, upon a quarrell piked, one certaine of the household servants of George earle of Dunbar at the faire of Roxburgh, which as then the Englishmen held. Earle George so offended herewith, sent an herald unto the earle of Northumberland, warden of the English marches, requiring that such as had committed the slaughter might be delivered to recelue according to that they had deserued: but when he could get nought but dilatorie answers, full of derision rather than importing anie true meaning, he passed ouer his displeasure till more opportunitie of time might serue. In the yere following, against the next faire to be holden at Morburgh aforesaid, the said earle of Morch, with his brother the earle of Spurrey gathered a power of men secretlie together, and comming to the said towne, toke it, due all the Englishmen found within it, put their goods to the sacke, and after set the towne on fire, and so departed.

Whereupon the Englishmen hostlie after enter with an armie into Scotland, burning and dowing much hurt upon the lands of sir John Gordon, for that they ioined to the earle of Marches lands. Sir John Gordon verie desirous to reuenge this iniurie, came into England with an armie, and getting together a great botie of castell, returned therewith homewards, but being incountered by the way at a place called Carran or Carram, by John Lilborne and other Englishmen, there was a foze fight betwixt them, the victorie for a time shewing it selfe so variable and vncertaine, that sir John Gordon was foze wounded, and the Scots were fve times that day had in chase, and as oft got the like advantage of their enemies. In the end the Englishmen were clearelie discomfited, and their capteine sir John Lilborne, with his brother and diuerse other brought prisoners into Scotland [the manner whereof John Maior condemneth and laith the fault of breach in earle Dowglaste.]

To reuenge these displeasures, Henrie Perse earle of Northumberland entered into Scotland with seuen thousand men, & comming vnto Duns, there pitched downe his tents; but the night following came the herds and other people of the countrie, hauing prepared certeine bagges made and sowed together, of drie leather like to bladders, into the which they had put small peble stones, & running by & downe about the place where the Englishmen were incamped, made such a noise with those bags full of stones, that the Englishmens hoyses breaking their halters and byddes wherewith they were tied, ran from their maisters and keepers, and were scattered so abroad in the countrie, that the Scottish men got hold of them, and so in the morning the Englishmen that had watched all night (for doubt to haue bene assailed by their enemies) perceiving themselves set on foot, returned home without anie further attempt.

In the meane time, Thomas Musgrau captaine of Berwike, comming to the succours of the earle of Northumberland, chanced to meet with sir John Gordon vpon the way, by whom he was taken, and lead into Scotland as his prisoner. Neither had the Scots the better thus onelie on the east marches, but also on the west, where sir Jo. Johnston had sundrie skirmishes with the Englishmen, and went euer a waite with the upper hand. [All which before (vntill the death of Eufemie the quene) Buchanan appointeth to the first two yeres of the king, before the death of the quene.] About this time, pope Gregorie the 11 sent a legat from Auignon to king Robert, forbidding him in any wise to meddle with the goods pertaining to the church, after the decease of anie bishop, person, or vicar. [About this time happened the death of Edward the third, king of England. And Charles the first king of France sent ambassadours into Scotland, to renew the old leage betwene the two nations, and to persuaide him to warre vpon England, to the end the warres might thereby be withdrawne out of France: which was performed accordingly.]

On the 22 day of October, in the yere 1378, David Steward was bozne, which after wards was made duke of Rothsaie, and on saint Andzews day next following, towne of Berwike was taken by sir John Gordon, and sir or seuen other knights, but it was not long kept: for a number of English men entring by a posterne of the castell, recovered the towne easilie againe out of the Scottish mens hands. After this, William earle of Dowglas came with twentie thousand men to the faire of Pennire within England, and spoiled all the goods found as then in the same faire, and so returned with great riches into Scotland: but the Scottishmen smallie reioised at this gains, for with such cloth & other warres as they brought awaite with them from the foresaid faire, they drew into the countrie such a violent and foze pestilence, that the third part of all the people (where it came) died thereof. This was the third time that the pestilence was knowne to haue done anie great hurt in Scotland, being in the yere after the incarnation 1380.

The Englishmen [with the number of 1500, vnder the conduct (as saith Buchanan) of Talbot] to reuenge the displeasure done by the erle of Dowglas at Pennire, raised a great armie, and came with the same ouer Sulway, and invading the Scottish borders on that side most cruellie, spared neither fire nor sword. In the meane time, the Scots gathered to the number of fve hundred men, & stood in a strict till the Englishmen should come and passe by them, and then with such huge noise and clamor they set on the Englishmen, that in giuing backe there was foure hundred of them slaine, and a great number of the residue for haile drowned in the water of Sulway, and hereby was all the botie of castell & goods recovered againe by the Scots, and the most part of it restored to the owners. Charles the first as then French king, hearing of such prosperous aduenturs daillie chancing to the Scots, sent ouer his ambassadours vnto king Robert, exhorting him to follow his god fortune, and occasion thus offered to reuenge old iniuries against the Englishmen, now that their hearts seemed to faile them through losses sustained diuerse waies of late at the Scottish mens hands. An other cause of their message was also (as the Scots do write) to renew the old leage & band betwixt Scotland and France, which being done in solemne wise according to the manner, they returned into France, & with them went ambassadours from king Robert vnto their master the said R. Charles, Walter Marston, cardinall & bishop of Glasgou, with manie other noble men, who in like manner there renewed the same leage & bond of friendship, to the high contentation of both the princes. This was in the eleuenth yere of king Robert his reigne.

In which yere John Lion chancelor of Scotland was slaine by James Indefay, earle of Crawford. This John Lion grew into so high fauour with king Robert, that he gaue to him his daughter the ladie Elizabeth in mariage, with diuerse possessions and lands, called Glamis. Of him the surname of the Lions is descended: and in memorie thereof, they beare in their armes the lion & lillies, with the tresse in forme and fashion as the king of Scotland beareth his, saue that their lions are placed in a blacke field. The cause why the earle of Crawford thus slue the chancelor, was onelie vpon enuie and spite, for that after he had married the kings daughter, he attained to such estimation and authoritie, that he might do all things with the king, according to his owne will and pleasure. For this offense the earle of Crawford remained in exile certeine yeres after, and durst not returne home, till smallie through earnest sute made to

In the meane time, Edward king of England, the third of that name, departed this life, and Richard of Burdeaur, ſonne to the blacke prince Edward, that was ſonne to the ſaid king Edward, ſucceeded, in the fourth yere of whose reigne, being after the birth of our Saviour 1381, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, with other Engliſh lords, came into Scotland in ambaffage [to whom were appointed James earle of Dowglaſſe, and John Dunbar earle of Murray] to treat for the appeaſing of the diſcord as then continuing betwixt the two realmes: and in the end the matter was ſo handled, that a truce was concluded to indure for three yeres. As the ſaid duke was returning homewards, he was informed of the rebellion and inſurrection made by the commons of England againſt the nobles, having one Jackie Straw and others to their captains, whereupon doubting to paſſe thorough his owne countrie till things were better appeaſed, he returned into Scotland, and was conveyed by William earle of Dowglaſſe, and Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, to holie rood houſe beſide Edinburgh, where he remained till he heard that the rebels were ſuppreſſed, and their captains ſlaine or taken, and put to execution.

As ſone as the truce was expired, Archembald Dowglaſſe lord of Galloway, diſpleaſed in his mind that the Engliſhmen lieng in garriſon within the caſtell of Lochmaben, did daile harrie and rob the villages and countrie townes of Galloway and Annandale, raiſed a great power by ſupport of the earls James of Dowglaſſe, and George of March, and therewith laid a ſtrong ſiege unto the ſaid caſtell of Lochmaben, & having lien thereat the ſpace of nine daies, they fought with a number of Engliſhmen that came out of Carleill to reſcue this caſtell, whom having put to flight, they gaue therewith alſo a ſharpe aſſault to the caſtell, and put them within in ſuch feare, that ſir William Fetherſton then capitaine thereof, and the reſidue conſented to yeld the houſe unto the Scots even the ſame day without more ado, upon condition they might depart with their goods in ſafety into England.

But Fourdon writing of the winning of this caſtell, ſpeaketh not of anie overthrow given to thoſe that ſhould come from Carleill, in manner as other wiſe. For thus he ſaith. When Archembald Dowglaſſe had got knowledge that the ſame caſtell was utterly unprouided both of men and vittells neceſſarie for the defence thereof, he aſſembled an armie together, with the helpe of the earles of Dowglaſſe and Dunbar, who joining with him, inuiſioned the caſtell about with a ſtrong ſiege, ſo that no ſuccour could enter to the reliefe of them within at anie hand. Whereupon the capitaine ſir William Fetherſton knight, ſent letters unto the lord wardens of the Engliſh marches, requiring aid, and letting them to underſtand in what danger he ſtood for lacke of men and vittells. The wardens wrote to him againe, that he ſhould do his beſt for eight daies to hold out; and if no ſuccour came within that terme, then to do as he ſhould ſee cauſe. Whereupon ſir William Fetherſton requiring a truce of the Scottiſh lords for the ſpace of thoſe eight daies, within which terme if no ſuccour came to remove their ſiege, he would yeld the caſtell unto them, the liues and goods of them within ſaued. This was granted, and the Scots ceaſed further to annoy them within by aſſaults: and when the ninth day was come, and no aid from England appeared, they receiued the caſtell into their poſſeſſion, according to the covenant. And ſo the Scots having thus wonne the caſtell of Lochmaben, rased it quite downe to the earth.

King Richard hearing that the Scots had attained this enterpriſe, appointed the baron of Graiſtroke with a certeine number of men to go with vittells and munition unto Forburgh, for doubt leaſt if the Scots came to lay ſiege to that forteſſe, and finding it unprouided, they might peradventure bring it into further danger than would lightlie be remedied. As this baron was come within a mile of Forburgh, he was taken by the earle of March, and brought to Dunbar with all his prouiſion. The king of England being informed alſo of this miſhap, appointed two armies, one by ſea, and another by land, to invade the Scots; the duke of Lancaſter having the generall charge and conduct of them both, who giuing order to them that ſhould paſſe by ſea that they ſhould doe, entered himſelfe by land, and waiting the countreies of March and Louthian, came to Edinburgh, and toke the towne. But whereas his ſouldiours would haue ſpoiled and burned it, he compounded with the inhabitants for a ſumme of monie, and ſo returned without doing anie more damage.

His nauie being as then arrived in the Forth, ſet on fire behind, & firſt burning the abbey of ſaint Colmes Inch, a number of the ſouldiers with their captains landed in Fiffe, and ſpoiled diuerſe townes and villages there: but in the end, Thomas and Nicholas Crutcheſſes being brethren, Alexander Linſey, and William Cunningham of Kilmauris, ſet upon them, and ſlew the moſt part of them, ſo that few in number eſcaped againe to their ſhips, being purſued hard to the water ſide. The ſame yere the earle of Dowglaſſe recovered all the ſtrengths of Cuidale out of the Engliſhmens hands, which they had held ſince the battell of Durham unto thoſe daies. This earle of Dowglaſſe, one of the moſt valiant perſonages in thoſe his daies, within the whole realme of Scotland, died within his caſtell of Dowglaſſe, ſhortlie after he had attained this enterpriſe, and was buried in the abbey of Melroſſe.

After his deceaſe, his ſonne James, or (as ſaith Buchanan) William ſucceeded in the earldome of Dowglaſſe, a verie fierce and hardie knight, the which ſhortlie after appointed by the king to haue the guiding of an armie, he paſſed with the ſame into England, and burnt the countrie ſo farre as Petercaſtell. But being countermanded home, he returned and came unto Perth, where he found the lord John de Hain, admerall of France, and earle of Valentinois, who about the ſame time was arrived in Scotland with two hundred and forty ſhips well and perfectly furniſhed for the warres, and in them two thouſand and five hundred armed men, diuerſe of them being lords and barons, beſides gentlemen and others. Alſo there was amongeſt them 400 haggbutters (as Bellenden ſaith) and two hundred with croſſebowes: the reſidue bare pikes, halberts, and ſuch like weapons. They were paid their wages for one whole yere aforehand, and had brought vittells with them to ſerue them as long. They had brought alſo with them foure hundred paire of white curets, foure hundred halfe long ſwords, & fifty thouſand franks, to be giuen among the nobles of Scotland, accordinglie as king Robert ſhould appoint and thinke expedient.

The admerall and other the nobles of France, being thus come into Scotland to make warres on the Engliſhmen, were highlie feaſted by the king and lords of the realme, as then preſent with him; and when the earle of Dowglaſſe was once come, by common conſent of them all there aſſembled together in counsell, it was ordeined that an armie ſhould be raiſed with all ſpeed, that joining with theſe Castels won.

Frenchmen they might passe immediatlie into England. The earle of Fife sonne to king Robert was appointed to be generall of this armie, hauing with him the earles of Dotoglas, and March, Archembald Dotoglas lord of Galloway, and diuerse other of the Scottish nobilitie. This armie when they were all togither, amounted to the number of fiftie thousand men, the which entring into England, toke the castels of Marke, Foud, and Cornwell. After this, by robbing and spoiling the countrie betwixt Wernike and Newcastell, they did much hurt in all parts where they came; but through continuall raine which fell as then in great abundance, they were constrained to returne into Scotland, where they pitched downe their field nere to the castell of Rockburgh, purposing to haue assailed the winning thereof: but forso much as they could not agree in whose name it should be kept if it were wonne, they left that enterpryse. For the Frenchmen required that if they won it, that then it might be kept by them, in the name and to the behoofe of the French king, whereunto the Scots would not agree.

The French-

Yet after this, the Frenchmen wishing to accomplish some other enterpryse, went to the west borders, where joining with Archembald Dotoglas lord of Galloway, they passed ouer Sullway sands; and so entering into Cumberland, did wonderfull much hurt in that countrie. At length they determined to lay siege vnto Carlisle, but being called from thence they returned into Scotland, and then (as some authors write) and not before, they laid siege to Rockburgh, and raised from thence within eight daies after, by reason of the variance before alledged. At Allhallowentide next ensuing, the Frenchmen returned into France, hauing indured no small trauell and paines, since their first coming forth of their countrie. After they were gotten a shipboard to returne homewards, the Scots againe enter into England with an armie, remaining there for the space of two moneths (as the Scottish writers say.) And in the meane time king Richard assembled a mightie power, and inuading Scotland, passed through the Pers and Louthian, putting all the towne, countries, and houses vnto bitter ruine, as in the English historie more plainlie may appere.

In the yere next ensuing, Walter Wardlaw bishop of Glasgou and cardinall, departed this life. Also within a while after that king Richard was returned backe into England, Robert Stewart earle of Fife, with James earle of Dotoglas, Archembald Dotoglas lord of Galloway, entred into England with an armie of thirtie thousand men, coming so secretly thorough the water of Sullway, that they came to Cokermouth in such speedie wise vpon the sudden, that the people had not leasure to conueie away their goods: so that the Scots remaining there for the space of three daies, got a rich botie togither, and returned with the same thorough the countries of Westmerland and Northumberland safe, and without incounter againe into Scotland. Amongest certeine other things, found in rifeling and ransacking of houses in this iourne, there was a charter found of certeine lands given by king Athellane, in this forme: I king Athellane giues to Paullane, Odhiam and Rodhiam, als guid and als faire, als euer yai mine waire, and yarto winesse Mauld my wife. By tenure of which ded it may appere, that our ancestors gaue more credit to the true meaning of a few words barelie expressed in their writings, than that there needed so long processe and circumstance as is now vsed with long studie of penning, nothing being thought sufficient to assure the parties of their couenanted bargaines, and concluded agreements.

In this last iourne against the Englishmen, William Dotoglas bassard sonne to Archembald Dotoglas lord of Galloway, wan great fame and honor for his high prowes and noble valiance, shewed as well in certeine approaches made vnto Carlisle, as in diuerse other skirmishes elsewhere. The king also herevpon began to fauour him in such wise, that he thought him worthy of some high advancement; and therevpon gaue him his daughter in marriage, named Giles, a ladie of such excellent beautie, as her match in those daies was not to be found: [with whom for his dowrie, he gaue the lands of Fiddeldale.] He begat on her a daughter, which was after married to the earle of Arkenie. This William Dotoglas (as Iohn Fourdon noteth) was of a blackish or swart colour, not overcharged with flesh; but big of bone, a mightie personage, bright and tall, valiant, courteous, amiable, full of liberalitie, merite, faithfull, and pleasant in companie, but herewith he was of such strength, that whome soeuer he stroke either with mace, sword, or speare, downe he went were he neuer so well armed. At one time (as the same Fourdon saith) he hauing with him but eight hundred, fought against three thousand Englishmen, of whome two hundred he slue in the field, & brought five hundred prisoners with him into Scotland.

In the yere 1388, Robert earle of Fife, and Archembald Dotoglas lord of Galloway, entered with a proud armie into England, and in the meane time came sundrie Irishmen by sea to the coasts of Galloway, and landing in diuerse places, fetched awaie great boties of cattell, and other goods of the inhabitants: whereof William Dotoglas, sonne of the said Archembald being informed, got a conuenient power of men togither, by support of his brother in law, Robert earle of Fife, and by licence of the king passed ouer with the same, shipped in certeine vessels into Ireland, where being got on land, he laid siege to the towne of Carlingford. The townesmen doubting to be taken by assault, purchased a truce for certeine daies, promising to giue a great summe of monie to haue their towne saued: but in the meane time, they assembled the number of eight hundred men, through helpe of an other towne not farre off, called Doundalke, and joining with them, they diuided themselves into two parts. One part set vpon Robert Stewart of Duncideir, who hauing the conduct of the earle of Fifes men, was gone abroad into the countrie to fetch in some preie: and the other part assailed William Dotoglas, that lay still afoze the towne.

Nevertheless, the said Robert and William received the enemies with such manhood, that they put them in both places to flight, and immediatlie after gaue assault to the towne, and entring the same perforce, put all the goods found therein to the sacke, and then set it on fier, and burned it to ashes. This done, they toke thre score ships which they found in diuerse hauens and craks there on that coast, and fraughting fittene of them with such spoile as they had got, they burned the residue, and then returning homewards, spoiled the Ile of Man by the way as they passed. Shortly after their returne home, the king of England sent an armie into Scotland, which did much hurt in the Pers, in burning and overthrowing diuerse towne and houses. King Robert being certified hereof, as then remaining in the north parts of Scotland, assembled the nobles of his realme at Aberdeen: and there by all their aduises it was concluded, that the whole puissance of the realme should be raised with all speed, to reuenge those iniuries done by the Englishmen. Herevpon were two armies assembled, the one, wherein were fiftene thousand men, was committed to the gouernance of the earle of

These two armies parting in sunder at Jedworth, the earle of Fife with his people entered into Cumberland by the twelf marches, and the earles of Dowglas and March with theirs, entered on the other side into Northumberland, passing thorough the countie, spoiling and wasting the same, till as farre as Durham; and on the other part, the earle of Fife spared neither fier nor sword, all the way as he passed. At length both these armies met together about a ten miles from Newcastle. Here the earle of Dowglas chose forth ten thousand of the most able men that could be found amongst all the numbers, with the which he went to Newcastle, to trie if by anie meanes he might take the towne. There was gathered into Newcastle before his coming thither, the most part of all the chosen men from Forke to the borders, with the earle of Northumberland, who by reason of extreme age was not able to sturre abroad (anie thing to purpose) himselfe, but he had with him two of his owne sonnes, the one named Henric, and the other Rafe, verie forward and lustie gentlemen. This Henric being the elder, was surnamed for his often picking, Henric Hotspur, as one that seldome times rested, if there were anie seruice to be done abroad.

The earle of Dowglas comming to Newcastle, incamped with his people on that side the towne towards Scotland, and viewed the towne earnestlie, which way he might best come to give assault to win it. Henric Percie desirous to shew some proofe of his singular manhood, wherein he greatly trusted, required to fight with the earle of Dowglas man to man, which request the earle granting, together they ran, mounted on two great couriers with sharpe ground speares at the bitterance. The earle of Dowglas in this encounter bare himselfe so well, that in the end he droue the Percie out of his saddle. The Englishmen that stood without the gates, made to the rescue, recovered him on foot, and brought him forthwith backe into the towne. Incontinentlie hereupon, the earle of Dowglas caused the assault to be given, and filling the ditches with hate and sagots, came with ladders to the walls; but the Englishmen so well defended themselves, that the Scots were beaten backe, not without great losse and slaughter of their people.

Froissard making mention of this enterprize thus made by the Scots, varieth somewhat from the Scottish writers in this place: for he speaketh nothing that the Dowglas and the Percie should thus run together on horsebacke (as before is specified) but that in giving assault to the towne, it chanced, that as the Englishmen defended their barriers without the gate, the Dowglas fortun'd to be matched hand to hand with Henric Percie, and there by force plucked the Percies staffe from him, and in returning hoisted it up on height, saying, he would carrie the same for his sake into Scotland: and the next day after, he raised his campe and departed homewards towards the borders, & comming to a place called Strathborne, about twelue or foureteene miles from Newcastle, pitched downe his tents there, that his souldiours might take some rest, & refresh themselves after their great trauell, for they had not rested of all the day nor night before, nor to anie purpose, since their first entering into England.

In the meane time the English power was highlie increased at Newcastle, for a great number of the countie came, and entered into the towne the same night that followed the day of the assault. Henric Percie then perceiving his number sufficient to fight with Dowglas, set them in order of battell, & determined to issue forth upon the Scots, and to giue them an encounter: but when he understood that they were gone homewards, he followed them with all speed, for he would by no means that they should passe into Scotland without battell, trusting to recover the dishonor which he had sustained by losing his staffe at the barriers before the gate of Newcastle. Earle Dowglas advertised that the enimies were comming to giue him battell, exhorted his people with few words to remember their wanted manhood, that by gaining the victorie, they might win euerlasting fame and honor, with safeguard to themselves and their countie. The Percie likewise for his part, encouraged his men, willing them to fight manfullie in reuenge of their iniuries done to them and their friends by the Scots, and herewith commanding the trumpets to sound, he gaue the onset fiercelie.

Here both the armies joining together, a right terrible encounter ensued: but because the night was at hand, before they began to joine, through want of light to see what was to doe, they were seuered in sunder for that time; but remembering that the morrow would shortly rise, they determined so soone as the began to giue light, to renew the battell againe. As soone therefore as the morrow began to appeare, they joined againe with more malice than before. The Englishmen fought so egerlie, that putting the Scots backe, and causing them to giue ground, they had wonne the Scottish standards, and so by all likelihood got the upper hand, had not Patrike Hepburne with his sonne, & such other of his companie as attended him, come to the rescue, by whome the fight was begun afresh. Here with also came the earle of Dowglas, and with a great mace in his hand laid such force strokes round about him, that none came within his reach, but downe he went.

The said Dowglas the younger, hauing with him Robert & Simon Glendoure, was (all which notwithstanding) most grievously wounded, whom his friends (comming about to succor) found then cast upon the ground, next vnto whome lay one named Hart most miserablie wounded also. At what time a priest (which had faithfullie assisted this Dowglas in all distresse) did (now the bodie being faint and decayed) defend the same from other hurt of the aduersarie. Dowglas lieng in this estate, his nere friends (John Lindseie, John and Walter Seintclere) came vnto him, demanding how he did. To whome he stoutlie answered (as one whome the presence of death nothing dismayed) that he was verie well; for said he, I doe not now die in my bed (by sluggish destinie) but in the field, as almost all my ancestors haue done. Wherefore, this shall be the last thing that I will require of you: first to keepe my death most secret, secondlie that you suffer not my standard to be throwne downe, and lastlie that you reuenge my death: the which if I may before hand by your promise hope to be performed, I shall with more patience indure all other things. Whereupon they first seuered his bodie that it should not be knowne; then they erected his standard, crying (as the manner is) A Dowglas a Dowglas. At which voice, there was so great a concourse of people, & such a ioistill assault vpon the enimie; that forthwith they drave them from the place of the battell. For at the verie

Finallye, the whole number of the Scottishmen bare themselves so manfully, that the Englishmen being broken and put to flight, were slaine & borne downe. [But Lescus. lib. 7. pa. 263. saith that Henrie Hotspur was taken by Montgomerie, who for his ransom did build the castle of Bonnam, which his heirs to this day do inioy. There was also taken besides the two Perries, diuers other men of name, as Robert Ogill, Thomas Halberke, John Lilborne, William Mauchlut, Robert Heron, the baron of Hilton, John Colwell, and Patrike Louell knights. There were taken in all of Englishmen, to the number of a thousand and fortye, and slaine what in the field and chase (as Froissard recounteth) above an eightene hundred. [But Buchan. saith, there were 1840 slaine, 1000 wounded, and 1004 taken.] But yet the Scottish writers themselves report a lesse number. Neither did this victorie chance to the Scots without great losse and slaughter. For amongst other, the earle of Dowglas himselfe was thise stricken through the bodie, and also wounded so mortallye on the head, that being borne to his tent a little before the end of the battell, he died of those hurts immediatly after, to the great discomfort of all his armie, conceiuing more dolorous griefe for the losse of so worthy a chiefeine, than for the gaine of a great victorie. His bodie was conueied vnto Helros, & buried beside his father earle William in the abbey church there. And because this earle James had no heires of his bodie begotten, his cosine Archibald Dowglas lord of Galloway succeeded him in the earldome. The house of the Hepburns (of the which this Patrike Hepburne that fought so valiantly in this battell at Otterburne did descend) arose in Scotland after this wise.

It chanced in the daies of king Dauid the third, there was an Englishman of that name taken prisoner in Scotland, who by chance being in place where the earle of March was got vpon a yong gelding vnbroken, the which plaieng the vnculie fado, in fetching and dinging aloft, put the earle in great danger of his life; and when all other that were present there gaue backe, and durst not step in to make anye shift to helpe the earle: this Englishman leapt to him, and boldly catching hold on the bydle reine, held the horse fast, till the earle was safelye got beside him. In reward of which benefit, the said earle gaue vnto this Hepburne certeine lands in Lothian, whose posteritie increased afterwards in such power of lands and surname, that the same inioied not onelie the earldome of Bothwell, but was also diuided into sundrie branches, and manie knights thereof haue risen of right worthy fame and estimation. This battell of Otterburne was fought on saint Oswalds day, which is the first of August, in the yeare 1388.

*Amongst those that fled to the battell, was Patrick Kedman gouernor of Berwik, whom James Lindseie (supposing by the beautie of his armor to be of the nobler sort) did vehementlye follow by the space of thre miles. At the last, Kedman perceiving that he was not by flight able to escape (and deeming it better to hazard his life, than otherwise to be slaine without aduenture) alighted from his horse to fight with his enimie on foot, which Lindseie did accordingly; in the end after a long conflict betwene them, the Englishman (being as saith Buchanan inferior to the Scot in armor & weapon) did yeld himselfe to his aduersarie. By whome (after that he had giuen an oth to returne at a certeine day) he was permitted to go at libertie. Such in those daies was the humanitie amongst the bozders, and both nations towards their prisoners, which to this day doth continue betwene the inhabitants of those places. But if anye do not returne at the day appointed, this punishment is set vpon him for a perpetuall disgrace. That in the assemblies of true daies (to demand restitution of things and injuries done by the one nation vnto the other) they vse that he which complaineth himselfe to be deceiued by his prisoner (on his promise) doth carrie about a hand or gloue painted in a cloth vpon a long staffe or speare to be seene of all men; the which is accounted a singular infamie to the defecuers thereof. For they which haue so broken their faith, be euer after hated of their friends and acquaintance; for which dishonestie, they will not afford them good report or intertainment. Lindseie hauing with this condition dismissed his prisoner (and perceiuing a great number of armed men) made direclie towards them, not knowing that they were his enimies, vntill he had ridden so nake vnto them, that he could not withdraw himselfe out of their danger. These men were the bands of the bishop of Durham, who when he came too late to Petocastell (to ioinc with Perrie at the battell of Otterburne, because he supposed that the enimies would not ioinc vntill the next day) commanded his armie to rest there, and to fall to their supper. Shortly after which, he took his iournie towards the Scots.

But (before he was anye great way marched out of the towne) vnderstanding (by those that fled from Otterburne battell towards Petocastell) that Perrie was ouerthrowne, and had lost the field, he returned with his friends to Petocastell, to consult what he should do against the enimie. At which time it was declared, that the next day at the sunne rising, they should all be redie in armor to seeke the Scots. According wherevnto in the morning of the next day, the inhabitants bordering thereabouts were assembled, who (with these that the bishop had brought thither) were of all sorts gathered together, to the number of 10000 horsemen and footmen. These stirred the bishops mind, that (with all speed) he should lead them toward the Scots, and trie the successe of battell, for the Scots (said they) wearied with the former daies fight, and most of them wounded, will not be able to abide the second battell. With which speeches they persuaded themselves of an easie conquest. Wherevpon the bishop set forward with his armie, whose comming being vnderstood by the scouts of the Scots, the erle of Murray (whom now all men did follow after the death of Dowglas) called the present nobilitie together to consult what should be done with the prisoners, whom they could not in iustice now kill (hauing receiued them vpon ransome) but it would seme a most cruell part: and to rescue them (being their enimies, and almost an equall number to themselves) it was a thing most dangerous. Wherefore it was concluded, that the prisoners should sweare, that they would not stirre whilst the Scots and English were in fight; and further, that if the Scots were ouercome, and they (being now their prisoners) recouered from them, that yet they should still remaine prisoners vnto them as before, and so returne to them at a certeine day. These things thus done, they left the prisoners in the campe, with a small garb which should execute a present reuenge vpon them, if they did at anie time seme to attempt anie thing.

After this the Scots (full of the victories latelie obtained) a fresh descended into the battell, defended behind with the marches, and on the left and right side with the dead bodies of the former con- flic: at what time it was also commanded that eu- rie one (as he did approach the enimie) should blow the horne he caried about his necke (hanging at his backe) as loud as he could, which sound bring of it selfe terrible, was in the echo (by reflection of the hilles) so multiplied, that it forced the enimie to sup- pose the Scots to be of greater number than in truth they were. But before they entered into the bat- tell (as saith Iohn Maior) George of Dunbar earle of March encouraged his soldiers with these words. We haue this night (most noble Scots) sustained the chiefe heat and force of the battell, we haue ouer- throwne the youth and strength of Northumberland with their two princes: for which there is no cause why we (after such honor obtained against those va- liant princes) should now feare this sillie priest. Truie there remaineth nothing now for vs, but that euerie one of vs giue but two strokes, because the leader will die at the third, and all the stocke will follow. Since the shepheard is stoken, the sheepe will be disperfed. But if they shall so long contend with vs, that (as God most rightlie forbid) we chaunce to be overcome, then shall we most shamefully lose the glorie which we before haue honorablie gained by this nights trauell. But contrarie, if we be men, and put on vs such valiant hearts (as the preserua- tion of honor requireth) we shall easilie teach this mistred priest, that it had bene farre more honor to him, safetie to his, and most commoditie to them all, that he had remained at home, with rods to cor- rect vnbeydeled and negligent scholers, than with sword to enter battell against growne and bearded souldiers.

This being spoken, and the English now come to the point to ioine with the aduersarie, the Scots began the alarms with their hories, whereupon the English hearing that terrible noise (vnaccustomed to them in such multitude) remembryng that they must fight in the middle of dead carcasses of their friends and kindred latelie slaine (a spectacle of dis- courage most valiant hearts) and somewhat abashed at the cherefulness of the Scots standing against them (which they looked not for after the last battell) the English (I say) considering these things, retired towards the place from whence they came, and suf- fered the Scots to returne without anie other pur- suite against them. In the meane time, when Alex- ander Lindseie (taken as before, and as yet prisoner in Newcastle) chanced to be scene and knowne by Redman (his yelded prisoner) he was most cour- teouslie (after congratulation of amitie betwene them) suffered to depart fro Newcastle to Scotland.

In the yere following, a parlement was holden at Perth, in the which demonstration was made by king Robert, that forsomuch as he was broken by great age, and might not through febleness occasioned thereof attend to his office in gouernement of the realme, it was necessarie that some gouernor should be chosen; wherefore he required that his second sonne Robert earle of Fife might inioy that office, considering his eldest sonne John earle of Carrike (by reason of a stripe which he had receiued on the leg by an horse of sir James Dowglass of Dalkeith) was not able to trauell, but kept his bed, and might sturre no way forth abroad. The lords consented to the kings request, and so the earle of Fife was con- stituted gouernour of Scotland, by common consent of all the lords of the realme (before which time (as saith Buchanan) they were called wardens and not gouernors.) Also the earle marshall of England was sent by king Richard to the borders, to remaine there as warden in the place of Henrie Perle pri- soner in Scotland. It is reported by the Scottish writers, that this earle should make stout bags, that he would fight with the Scots the next time he met with anie power of them, whether he were like in number to them or not. But when it came to passe that Robert Stewart the Scottish gouernor was entered into Northumberland with an armie, hee withdrew into places of safegard, and suffered the most part of the countrey to be harried and burned. In deed our English writers affirme, that the said earle, hauing with him but fife hundred men of armes, was not able to accomplish anie notable exploit available against the great multitude of his enimies.

In the same yere was a truce taken betwixt England and France, the Scots (if they would so a- greed) being comprised therein. Whereupon there came ambassadors froth of England, to vnderstand what the king of Scots would determine in that behalfe. By whom it was answered, that he would with god will stand to the same truce according as it was concluded. Whilist things passed thus in Scotland, Alexander Stewart earle of Buchquhane burnt the cathedrall church of Durrey, the lantern and or- nament of all the north part of Scotland, vpon dis- pleasure conceiued against the bishop of the same place. Whereat his father the king took such indig- nation, that when his sonne the said Alexander was brought to his presence, he commanded him to be committed vnto stret prison, wherein he remained till after his fathers decesse. The realme being in this maner brought to god tranquillitie, king Ro- bert falling into great infirmite and febleness, by reason of extreame age, without any maner of other accidental sicknes, decessed at his castell of Dun- donald, the 19 day of Aprill, in the yere after our re- demption 1390, being as then about 75 yeres of age, and hauing reigned the space of 19 yeres, his bodie was buried at Scone before the high altar.

This Robert the second, though by reason of his great age, he went not forth into the wars himselfe, yet was there neuer prince afore him that had more happy successe by the conduct of his capitains which he sent forth as lieutenants vnder him, for they ne- uer lightlie returned home but with victorie. He was a prince of such constancie in promise, that hee selde spake the word which he performed not. Such an obseruer he was also of iustice, that when- soeuer he removed from anie place, he would cause proclamation to be made, that if anie of his men or officers had taken by anie thing vnpaid for, the par- tie to whom the debt was due should come in, and immediatlie he should be satisfied. He willinglie heard the complaints of the poore, and was no lesse diligent to see their wrongs redressed.

After the decesse of king Robert the second, his son John Stewart earle of Carrike was ad- mitted to the crowne, which he receiued at Scone on the Assumption of our ladie. And forsomuch as John was thought to be an vnfortunate name for kings, they changed the same, and called him Robert after his father, being now the third of that name. But whether the same was so altered, either for the cala- mities which happened to the two Johns, the king of England and the king of France, or for the god suc- cesse of the two former Roberts (Bruce and Ste- ward) had in the victories and gouernement of the realme: for their vertue in peace and warres: for their vniuersall happinesse in what they attempted:

I will leane vncerteine, hauing no certainte deli-uered thereof vnto me. This Robert the third rather lacked vices, than was beautified with anie extraor-dinarie vertues, for which cause he being king in name, his brother Robert was king in deed, as one vpon whome the whole gouernement did depend.
The king Robert did marrie Annabell (the daughter of John Drummond) whome he receiued into his bed, rather for hir singular beautie, than the honor of hir parents, or for anie benefit that might grow to the common wealth by hir or hir alliance. In the beginning of his reigne, a truce was taken betwene England and Scotland, for the space of thre yeres, which shortly after was proroged to the terme of four yeres.)

About the same time William Dowglas of Stridsdale was chosen by the lords of Strutsen, to be admirall of a nauie, containing two hundred and fortie ships, which they had rigged, and purposed to set forth against the miscreant people of the north-east parts. But being appealed by the lord Clifford an Englishman (who was there likewise to serue with the fore said lords in that iournee) to fight with him in a singular combat: before the day came appointed for them to make triall of the battell, the lord Clifford lay in wait for the Dowglas, and vpon the bidge of Danzke met with him, and there slue him, to the great disturbance and fay of the whole iournee. Whereafter, shortly after the coronation of king Robert the third, tidings came that Duncane (whom some call Daicly Stewart) sonne to Alexander Stewart the kings brother afore rehearfed, was entred into Angus with a great number of men, and slue Walter Ogilvie shiriffe of the countrie, that came forth with a power to resist him from spoiling the people, whom he miserablie afflicted; howbeit these his insolent doings were not long vnpuished. For the earle of Crawford being sent against him with an armie, caused him to disperse his companie, and to flee his waies; but being apprehended with the most part of his said com-panie, they were punished according to their demerits.

At this time also the most part of the north coun-trie of Scotland, was sore disquieted by two clans of those with Scots, called Katerans, which inhabit the hie-land countries, the one named Clankates and the other Clanquhattans. These two being at deadlie fude, robbed and wasted the countrie with continual slaughter and reise. At length it was accorded betwixt the parties, by the aduise of the earls of Murray and Crawford, that thirtie persons of the one clan, should fight before the king at Perth, against thirtie of the other clans men, with sharpe swords to the vtterance, without anie kind of armor or harnesse, in triall and decision of the quarell, for the which the variance betwixt them first arose. Both these clans right iofull of this appointment, came to Perth with their number, where, in a place called the North indy, a litle beside the towne, in presence of the king and other iudges assigned thereto, they fought according as it was agreed, and that with such rage and desperate furie, that all those of Clankates part were slaine (one onelie excepted) who to saue his life, after he saw all his fellows slaine, leapt into the water of Tate, and swam ouer, and so escaped. Where were 11 of Clanquhattans side that escaped with life, but not one of them vntounded and that verte soe. At their entring into the field or lists where they should fight the battell, one of the clans wanted one of his number, by reason that he which shuld haue supplied it, was priuilie stolen awaie, not willing to be partaker of so deare a bargain. But there was a countie-felow among the beholders, who being soze that so notable a fight shoulde be passed ouer, offered himselfe for a small summe of monie to fill vp the number, though the matter appertained nothing to him, nor to anie of his friends. [This man (as saith Buchanan) seemed to be a saddle-maker, who for halfe a French crowne, and his diet during his life (if he were victor) took the matter in hand, in which none behaued himselfe moze valiantlie than he, on whose part the said eleuen did suruiue, himselfe making vp the number.] This battell was fought thus betwene the two clans, in maner as is before remembred, in the yere 1396.

In the third, or (as saith Buchanan) the second yere after, a parlement was holden at Perth, wher-in, besides diuerse constitutions and ordinances enacted for the aduancement of the common-wealth, the king made his eldest sonne named David (that was then about eightene yeres of age) duke of Rothesay, and his brother Robert (that was earle of Fife and gouernor of the realme, as before ye haue heard) he created duke of Albanie. These were the first dukes that had bene heard of in Scotland, for till those daies there was neuer anie within the realme that bare that title of honoz. [Which virgin title (saith Buchanan of that honoz) gaue neuer god successe to the matters]. During the time that the peace continued betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, there were sundrie iustes and combats put in the, and exercised betwixt Scots and Englishmen, for profe of their valliant activitie in feats of armes, to win thereby fame and honoz. But amongst the residue, that was most notable, which chanced betwixt David earle of Crawford Scottish, and the lord Welles English.

It was agreed betwixt these two noble men, to run certeine courses on horsebacke, with speares sharpe ground for life and death. The place appointed for these iusts was London byssoe, and the day the thre and twentieth of Aprill, being the feast of saint George. At the place & day thus prefixed, they came redie to furnish their enterprize, and being mounted on their mightie courlers, they ran together right egerlie. At the first course, though they atteinted, yet kept they their saddles without anie perill of falling. The people beholding how stiffelie earle Da-uid sat without moning, cried that the Scottishman was locked in his saddle. He hearing this, leapt beside his horse, and verie nimble mounted vp againe into the saddle, armed as he was, to the great wonder of the beholders. This done, he took another stasse, & so together they ran againe right fierce-lie the second time, and yet without anie great hurt on either part: but the third time, the lord Welles was bozne out of the saddle, and soe hurt with the griuous fall.

And for bicause the earle of Crawford thus ban-quished his aduersarie on saint Georges day, he founded a chanterie of seuen priests to sing in our ladies church of Dundee, in memorie of S. George, which they did vnto our time, not without singular commendation of the said earle. After this, he remained thre moneths in England, in sporting and feasting amongst the nobles, before he returned into Scotland, highlie praised of all estates for his noble port and great liberalitie there shewed amongst them. Not long after, one sir Robert Douglas an Englishman, came into Scotland to trie his manhod in singular battell, with whome sooner would come against him: he vanquished one Archembald Cromston, and Hugh Wallace: but at length he was overcome by one Hugh Traill at Perthke, and died shortly after vpon displeasure thereof conceiued.

In the same yere, Richard king of England, married Isabell daughter to the French king, and some after went into Ireland, to subdue such Irish rebels, as troubled the quiet state of the countrey. But in the meane time, his lordes at home rebelled against him, and determined to depose him from the crowne, so that vpon his returne into England, he was apprehended, put in ward, and shortly after constrained to renounce all his right to the crowne, and adiudged therewith to perpetuall prison: yet at length (as the Scottish chronicle telleth) he got forth of prison disguised in womans apparell, and came into Galloway, where he fell in seruice with a Scottish man named Makdonald. But at the last, being bewated and knowen what he was, and thereupon brought to king Robert, he was right honorablie by him interteined: neuerthelesse, knowing himselfe deposed from his roiall estate, he gaue himselfe wholly to contemplation, till finally he departed this world at Sterling, and was buried in the blacke friers there within the same towne, as the same Scottish chronicles vnturly do report. But to the matter, Henrie the sonne of John of Gaunt, sometime duke of Lancaster, after that king Richard was deposed, was crowned king of England at Westminister, the thirtieth day of October, in the yere 1399.

the earle of March.

In the yere next insuing, that is to say, 1400, king Robert, in consideration of a summe of monie to him aforehand paid, contracted couenants of marriage to be had and made betwixt his sonne the duke of Rothsaie, and the earle of Marches daughter. But Archembalde earle of Douglas, hauing indignation that the earle of March should be preferred before him, by support of the duke of Albanie, procured a counsell to be called, in the which he found meanes to assure his daughter the ladie Margerie, or Marie (as saith Buchanan) vnto the said duke of Rothsaie, & with all speed went about to consummate the marriage betwixt them, to put the matter out of all doubt. The earle of March perceiuing this dealing, came to the king, and required to know his pleasure, if he minded to performe the couenants concluded, concerning the marriage betwixt the prince and his daughter, or not; making as it were a great complaint of that which was already done to the breach thereof; and receiuing answer nothing agreeable to his mind, he departed in a great fume, not sticking to say, he would be reuenged on such vntruth per it were long. Shortly after he fled into England, leauing his castell of Dunbar well staffed of all things necessarie for defense, in the keeping of his sisters sonne named Robert Pattland. But when Archembald Douglas came thither in the kings name, and required to haue the castell rendered into his hands, this Robert Pattland obeyed the kings commandement, and deliuered the house to the said Douglas.

George earle of March informed hereof, procured all his friends to conueie themselves into England, and determined with himselfe to do all the displeasure and mischief he might inuent against his owne native countrey. King Robert soze dreadding, least by this earles procurement some trouble might hap to follow amongst his subiects [did first considering his goods] send an herald at armes into England with letters vnto him, promising by the tenure of the same, not onlie to pardon him of all offences committed, but also to redresse all wrongs or injuries which he had anie waies forth receiued, if he would returne into Scotland. And forsomuch as the earle of March refused this offer, the same herald according to instructions giuen him at his departure from king Robert, went immediatlie to Henrie king of England with other letters, earnestlie desirring him to cause the earle of March to depart out of his realme, & not to receiue anie rebels out of Scotland into his bounds, whereby the peace might be vniolated, which as yet remained betwixt the two kingdoms.

King Henrie vpon reasonable allegations (as he pretended) refused to satisfie king Roberts petitions in this behalfe, by reason whereof the peace brake betwixt them and their subiects, without anie further tracting of time. For shortly after, Henrie Perrie, surnamed (as is said) Henrie Hotspur, and the earle of March entered into Scotland, and got together a great boote of goods and cattell [in Louthian about Haddington, at what time they did in vaine bessege the castell of Hais or Halis, who being at Lintone were come vpon by the Scots, for to haue returne of the booties taken] Archembald earle of Douglas hauing assembled a power of men, came with the same towards the enemies, immediatlie whereupon they fled to Bertolke, and left all their bootie behind them, which being recovered by the said earle of Douglas and his companie, he returned backe vnto Edinburgh, where he shortly after being taken with an hot feuer, departed out of this life, leauing behind him an honorable memorie of his name, for his high prowesse and noble valiance shewed in manie and sundrie enterprises, by him luckilie achieved for the wealth of his countrey. He was named of his terrible countenance and dreadfull looke, The grim Douglas.

After his deceasse, his second sonne that was called likewise Archembald, was made earle of Douglas; for his eldest sonne William Douglas died in the yere before his father. Shortly after, Henrie king of England came into Scotland with an armie, without doing anie great damage to the people; for he required no more of them that kept anie castles or strengths, but onlie to put forth a banner of his armes as he passed by. At his coming to Haddington, he was lodged in the nurrie there, & shewed much bounteous humanitie toward the nuns, and all other of that house, not suffering anie manner of thing to be done preiudiciall to the same. The like gentlenesse he vsed towards them of the Holie rood house, at his coming to Edinburgh, wherein he likewise lodged. It is thought, that in memorie of the friendlie interteinement, which his father the duke of Lancaster found in these abbeies, at the time of his being in Scotland, when the rebellion chanced in England, through Jacke Straw and his complices, he shewed such fauour towards them at this present. To be brieue, it should appere, that king Henrie came into Scotland, as it were enforced, more thorough counsell of his nobles, than for anie hatred he bare towards the Scots, as he well shewed in returning backe againe, without doing them anie further iniurie.

[In the yere after, or thereabout, died Walter Traille bishop of saint Andrews, and the] Scottish quene Annabell Dowmond, after whose deceasse his sonne David the duke of Rothsaie, that vnder his government had bene well and vertuouslie brought vp, hauing now got once the reine at libertie, fell to all kind of insolent outrage, seeking to defile wiues, virgins, nuns, and all other kind of women, in all places where he came. At length, his father perceiuing his sonnes youthfull nature to rage after that manner in vnbridled lust, beyond the bounds of all measure, to the great reproch of them both, wrote to his brother the duke of Albanie, requiring him to take his sonne, the said duke of Rothsaie into his custody, and to see him so chastised for his wanton behaviour, as he might learne to amend the same. Here is to be noted, that the duke of Albanie had of long time before, desired to see the duke of Rothsair dispatched out of the way, as the person whome he most doubted; & therefore having commission thus from the king to take him, he reioiced not a little, trusting thereby to compasse his purpose without danger.

And hereupon taking the duke of Rothsair betwixt Dundee & saint Andrews, he brought him to Falkerland, where he shut him up in streit prison, and kept him without all manner of meat or drinke, so to famish him to death.

It is said, that a woman understanding the duke of Albantes intention, and taking ruth of the others pitifull case, found meanes to let meale fall downe thorough a rift of the loof of that towre wherein he was inclosed, by meanes whereof his life was certaine daies sustained; but after this was once know-en, incontinentlie was the woman made awaie. On the same manner, an other woman through a long red fed him with milke of hir owne breasts, and was likewise dispatched as soone as hir dowings were perceived. Then after this, the duke destitute of all woolbie sustentance, thorough verie famine was constrained to eat not onelie all such filth as he could find within the towre, but also in the end he gnawed off his owne fingers, and so finally in this miserable state of martyrdom (as I may call it) ended his tormented life, and was buried in Lundoris, where (as the same went) manie faire miracles were done nere to his graue, till time that James the first began to punish the murderers, for since that time such miracles ceased.

About the same time, George earle of March did manie displeasures to the Scots, making sundrie raides into their countrie, greatlie to his profit. The earle of Dowglas that had the gouernement of Louthian in those daies, took order, that certeine capteins of that countrie should euerie one of them for his turne, with a competent number for the time, make a rode into England, to reuenge such displeasures. The first that went, was Thomas Halibur-ton of Dirlington, who returned in safetie with a great preie taken of Englishmens goods. Next unto him was Patricke Hepborne of the Palis the por-ger, appointed to go forth as capteine generall with a certeine number, who entering into England, got a great botie togither; but the Englishmen following thereupon to recouir it, incountered with him at Pelfbet in the Pers, and there not onelie slue him, but also distressed his people. Besides them that were slaine with their capteine, there were also manie that were taken, as John and William Cockborne, Robert Lawder of the Bas, John and Thomas Hal-burton, with manie other. Almost all the squire of Louthian (as Iohn Maior writeth) perished in this battell, which was fought the 22 of June, in the yere 1402.

Archembald earle of Dowglas soze displeased, and wonderfullie wroth in his mind for this ouer-throw, got commission to invade England with an armie of ten thousand men, and hauing the same once readie with all things necessarie for his voiage, he set forward, and entering into England, burnt and harried the countrie, not staing till he came as farre as Newcastell. In this armie there was with the Dowglas, Murdoch eldest sonne to duke Robert earle of Fife, Thomas earle of Murray, George earle of Angus, with manie other lords and nobles of Scotland. At the last, when they were returning homewards with a preie of infinit goods and riches, Henrie Hotspur, and George earle of March, with a great power of men met them, and assailed them so with such incessant shot of arrowes, that where the earle of Dowglas with his armie had the aduantage of an hill, called Homildon, he was constrained to take the same; and coming downe vpon the Englishmen, was neuertheless put to the worse, the most part of his people being either taken or slaine. It is said, that after the Scots were once put to flight, they gathered againe, and renewed the battell by the exhortation of Adham Gordon, & sir John Swinton, but that did little auaille them, for they were still beaten downe and slaine. Among other of those that were slaine, were the same sir John Swinton, and Adham Gordon: also John Leun-ston of Balender, Alexander Ramsay of Dalhousie, with sundrie other gentlemen & nobles of Scotland.

Archembald earle of Dowglas, Murdoch eldest sonne to duke Robert the gouernour, George erle of Angus, Robert Erskine of Salis-way, the lord Saulton, James Dowglas maister of Dalketh, and his two brethren John and William, with the most part of all the barons of Fife and Louthian, were taken prisoners. This battell was fought on the Wednesday in haruest, in the yere 1403, vpon a Tuesday. Henrie Perie berie proud of this victorie, came with the earle of March vnto the castell of Cockclauis in Teuidale, and laied siege to the same, but John Greinelow capteine thereof defended it so manfullie, that they got no great aduan-tage; yet at length he fell to this composition with them, that if he had no rescue within the space of thre moneths (or (as Buchanan saith) fiftie daies) the castell should be then rendered into their hands.
When the gouernour of Scotland was informed what agreement the capteine of Cockclauis had made, he assembled the lords in counsell to haue their advice for the leauing of an armie against the time appointed. Thers were manie of this opinion, that it was better to lose the castell, than to leopord the lines of so manie men as were necessarie to furnish that enterprise for the sauing of it. But the gouernour shewed, that he weied the losse of it so much, that if none of the nobles would passe with him to the rescue thereof, yet he would go himselfe to do that in him might lie to saue it. But in the meane time, such trouble rose in England, that there needed no power to be leauied for the defense of Cockclauis. For by a conspiracie practised against king Henrie, certeine of the English nobilitie were alied togither to haue destroyed him, but amongst the residue, the Percies were as chiefe.

They fought togither at Shrewesburie a verie bloudie battell, where the king got the victorie, and slue the lord Perie, surnamed (as before ye haue heard) Henrie Hotspur. At this battell was also the earle of Dowglas, with a great companie of Scotishmen on the Percies side, for being taken prisoner at the battell of Homildon (as before is said) it was accorded betwixt him and the said Henrie Hotspur, that aiding him & other his complices against king Henrie, if it chanced the said king Henrie to be baniquished and put from the crowne, according to their intent and purpose, then should the said earle Dowglas be released of his ransome, and haue the towne of Berwik rendered vnto him in rewarde of his aid and assistance. He fought (as is reported) with singular manhood, and had the fore ward on the Percies side. He slue that day with his owne hands, thre gentlemen arrayed in the kings cote armour; and fi-nallie when the battell was lost, he was taken in the chafe, and saued aliue, where not one more of all his retinue of Scots escaped with life, but were all slaine out of hand. Neither was this victorie gotten by king Henrie, without great slaughter of those that were on his part, for he lost foure verie valiant knights, as Staluart, Blunt, Maffie, and Portoke, with seuen hundred other souldiers and men of war

(as the Scottish writers haue) but the English authors name a farre greater number, as sixtē hundred at the least.

King Henrie (as the same Scottish writers doe record) vied the counsell & aduise of the earle of Sparch, in the obtaining of this victorie, being fled latelie before from the rebels side to him. The earle of Douglas, in respect of his noble parentage and high valiance, was verie tenderlie cherished by king Henrie, who for that he had sene him do so valiantlie in the day of that battell, reputed him worthy of all honours. The earle of Douglas yet was verie infortunate in most of his enterprises, so farre forth, that he neuer wan battell wherein he chanced to be, and was therefore named Archembald Tinneman; though there were no default to be found at anie time in his owne person, for he euer fought with great manhood. At the battell of Hommildon he lost one of his eyes, and at this battell of Shrewesburie he lost one of his stones. The old earle of Northumberland, hearing that euill successe his sonne and other his kinsmen had found in their rebellious enterprise at Shrewesburie, with one of his nephues (that was his sonnes sonne) and other of his friends and kinsmen, withdrew into Scotland, where he was receiued by Henrie Wardlaw bishop of saint Andrews, and lodged with him at his ease and in good suertie within his castell of saint Andrews aforesaid.

Others write, that his desire was to be set on land there, because he might not awaie with the aire of the sea, being brought far out of quiet in his head & stomach therewith. But how soeuer it was, the truth is, taken he was in the ninth yeare of his age, the 33 day of March, in the yeare of our incarnation 1406, and was kept in captiuitie of the Englishmen by the space of eightē yeares. At his coming to the presence of king Henrie, he deliuered to him the letter directed from his father king Robert, the tenor whereof here insueth, as in the Scottish tongue they be written.

James prince of Scotland taken by the Englishmen, H.B. 1404.

The tenor of the said letter as it is written in the Scottish tongue.

Robert king of Scots to Henrie king of England greeting. Thy great magnificence, humilitie, and iustice, are right patent to vs, by gouernance of thy last armie in Scotland; howbeit like things had bene vncertaine to vs afoze. For though thou seemed as enemy with most aboufull incursions in our realme: sit we found maist humanities and plaifures than damage (by thy coming) to our subdittes. Speciallie to yame that receiuit thy noble fader the duke of Longcastell the tyme of his exill in Scotland. We may not ceis praise, while we are on life, but aye luf and loif thee as maist noble and worthy prince, to ioy thy realme. For yocht realmes and nations contend amang themselfe for conquests of glorie & launds, sit na occasion is amang vs to invade athir realmes or lieges with iniuries, bot erar to contend amang our selfe, quhay fall perserue othir with maist humanite and kindnesse. As to vs we will meis all occasion of battell, quare any occures at thy pleasure. Forther, bycause we haue na lesse sollicitude in preseruing our childzen fra certaine deidlie enemies, than had sometime thy noble fader, we are constrained to seke support at vncouth princes hands. Howbeit, the inuasion of enemies is sa great, that small defense occures against yame without they by preserued by amitie of nobill men. For the world is sa full of peruerse malice, that na crueltie nor offense may be deuist in erd, bot the samure may be wroucht be motion of gold or siluer. Herefoze, because we know thy hynesse full of monie, noble vertues, with like puissance and riches, that na prince in our daies may be compared thairto: we desire thy humanitie and support at this time.

The traist it is not unknowne to thy maiestie, how our eldest sonne David is slaine miserablie in prison be our brother the duke of Albanie, quhome we chesit to be gouernour (quan we were fallen in decrepit age) to our subditte and realme, belaund thy hienes thairfoze to be so fa-uorable, that this bearer James our second and allanerlie sonne may haue targe to liewe vnder thy faith, and iustice, to be some memorie of our posteritie, knawand the vnstable condition of mans life so sodanlie altered: now flourishand, and su-denlie falling to better consumption. For thir beliewe well, quhan kings and princes hes na other beild bot in thair awin folks, thair empire is caduke and fragill. For the minds of common people ar euer flow-aund and mair inconstant than wind. Sit ris, na aduersitie may occurre to elect thaim fra thair dignitie riail. For thir gif thy hienes thinke nocht expedient (as God forbeid) to obtemper to thir owne desires; sit we request ane thing quhilk was ratist in our last trewes & condition of peace, that the supplicatioun made be ony of the two kings of England and Scotland fall stand in manner of fauorand to the bearer. And thus we desire to be obseruat to this our allanerlie sonne, and the gratious God conserue the maist noble prince.

After that king Henrie had caused these letters to be opened and read, he aduised himselfe thereon with great deliberation; but in the end, he determined to saie this James prince of Scotland as his lawfull prisoner, for that he was thus taken in time of warres, and that moreover, there were diuers rebels of England succored within the bounds of his fathers dominion, to the high displeasure of the said king Henrie. But such was the fauour shewed in his bringing vp, that his captiuitie turned more to his honor, profit, and commoditie, than anie other worldlie hap that might by anie means haue othir-wise chanced vnto him. He had such perfect instructors to teach him, as well the vnderstanding of tonges as the sciences, that he became right expert and curning in euerie of them. He was taught also to ride, to run at the tilt, and handle all kind of weapons conuenientlie to be vsed of such a personage, where-vnto he was so apt and readie, that few in anie point of activitie might overmatch him. He had good knowledge in musike, and could plaie on sundrie instruments right perfectlie. To be brieve, it appeered in all his behaviour and maners, in what company so euer he came, that his bringing vp had bene according to his nature, neither of them differ-ring from his birth, and the qualitie of a noble and most vertuous prince.

After it was signified vnto his father king Robert, as he sat at supper, that his sonne was thus arrested in England, he made full great and dolorous mone, sore lamenting that euer he matched himselfe in mariage with a woman of so meane degre (to the disparagement of his blood) as was quene An-nabell, on whome he begat his sonnes, which (as he toke it) was the onelie cause why aswell forraine princes as his owne subiects had him thus in contempt. He toke this matter so fore to hart, that within three daies after the newes came vnto him, he departed this world through force of sicknesse, now increased by melancholie, which had bered him a long time before. He died at Rothsaie in the sixteenth yere of his reigne complet, and from the incarnation 1408. His bodie was buried at Passie, with his wife quene Annabell before rehearsed. He was a man of a mightie stature, verie liberrall and gentle, so that if he had not bene maimed with a horse, and thereby grete lame, that he might trauell about the affaires of the realme himselfe, it was thought the common-wealth should haue prospered vnder his gouernement, as much as euer it did vnder anie of his predecessors.

The gouernor Robert duke of Albanie, after the deceasse of his brother king Robert, was by new election chosen, or rather confirmed in his office of gouernor, which he exercised more vprightly, & with better iustice now after his brothers death, than before. For (as saith Buchanan) take away from him, that he was overmuch blinded with desire to gouerne (wherevnto he cared not by anie means to aspire) there were in him manie other good parts worthie to haue such gouernement: for he was valiant in battell, wise in counsell, he did decide matters of controuersie with great equitie, he toan the nobilitie with his liberalitie, and did not sucke the commons drie by exactions. In the meane time, the earle of Jedburgh (which the Englishmen had held e-uer since the battell of Durham) was taken by Welshmen, and rased downe to the earth. Archem-bald earle of Douglas, as yet remaining captiue in England, after he had knowledge of king Roberts death, made shift to agree for his ransom, and so being set at libertie, returned with all speed now at length into Scotland.

Shortlie after, there was a counsell called, where in was a motion made for the restoring of George earle of March to his countrie, lands, and bloud. After long debating of the matter, and hard hold to and fro both with him and against him, it was in the end concluded, that he should returne into Scotland, and be receiued as a true Scottishman; but vnder this condition, that he should forgo his lands of Annerdale, and Lochmaben, which should for euer re-maine to the Douglasse, and to his heires. All his other lands and possessions, it was accorded, that he should inioy as in his former right & estate. And thus was the earle of March pardoned of all passed offences committed against the crowne of Scotland, and returned home, to the great comfort of his friends.
Perie that before was fled into Scotland to the erle of March his old friend, was courteously recei-ued, interteined, & nourished according to his estate, by the said earle of March: during which time, he sollicited his friends in England to find means for returne into his countrie. And amongst other of his friends, with whom he dealt by secret messengers; he directed letters concerning the same, to an old (and as he deemed a most faithfull) friend of his, called Rafe Roksbie, declaring vnto him that he should not want friends, both Scottish & English (through whose helpe he did not despaire to recouer his patri-monie) if he might haue his aid also therein, for this Rafe was thirffe of Forkehire. This man, after he had intised Perie (vnder the assurance of false hope and trust in him) to come into England, he opened the conspiracie to the king, and secretlie laid waite to intercept the said earle, by which meanes, (getting him into his possession) he cut off his head, and sent it to the king to London. At which time also, there was an Englishman in Scotland, which called himselfe Richard the second: but fallie (as I suppose, saith Buchanan; for when the elder Perrie did often and importunately require to talke with him, he could neuer be perswaded by anie mens words to come, or enter speech to, or with the said earle of Northumberland, fearing (belike) least his deceit would be understood by him, which knew his owne and true king verie well. This counterfeited king yet boasting him to be of the princelie blood, was honozed accordingly; after certeine yeares, and at length (setting himselfe to be far from all desire of gouernement, to the end he might worke his effect the more safelie) he died and was buried in the church of the sister Dominicks in Sterling, with a title of the king of England grauen vpon him.)

About the same time, there rose great trouble in Scotland, by the rebellion of Donald of the Iles, who claiming by right of his wife, a title to the earldome of Koffe, was defeated of the same, by the practise of the gouernor, hauing by subtill conceiance, assured the said earldome vnto his second son the earle of Buchquhane named John. The fore-said Donald, by way of supplication, besought the gouernor to doe him reason; but he receiued nought, except it were forward speech, wherewith he took such displeasure, that raising all the power of the Iles he came into Koffe, and subdued the same at his pleasure. * The which to make the matter more plaine, and to deduce his title out of Lesleus (which he forgetteth not to report for the honoz of his owne house) I will set the same doونه in this manner. 30 Walter Lesle a noble man, after singular prowesse shewed by him (in externall battell) vnder the Romans, returned with honoz into Scotland, where he married the daughter of William earle of Koffe, (slaine at the battell of Halidon) and with hir ob-teined the earldome of that prouince, of which wife he raised one sonne called Alexander, after earle of Koffe; and one daughter giuen in marriage to Donald of the Iles. This Alexander ioined himselfe 40 in marriage with Eufemie the daughter of Robert the gouernor, and had by hir one onelie daughter and heire christened after the name of hir mother, who (after the death of hir father, being yet a tender maid and vnpractised in the course of things) was partlie by the flatteries, and partlie by the threats of the gouernor, induced to giue the earldome of Koffe vnto him, by whose helpe, as it was reported, she shortly after died. Wherevpon, Donald that had to wife the sister of Alexander Lesle (aunt to this Eufemie which sold hir inheritance) demanding the erldome of Koffe by right of inheritance (as is said) 50 by his wife, entered Koffe, and brought it to his subiection.) But not being satisfied with this, he passed through Murray, Boghtuall, and other bounds thereabouts, till he came vnto Carrioch, purposing to burne Aberdeen.

But Alexander Steward earle of Mar, hauing gathered a power with all diligence to resist this Donald, met with him at a village called Harlow, & incontinentlie not staing for more aid that was com-ming towards him, set on the enemies more rash-lie than orderlie, and more fiercelie than discret-lie, not passing for keeping anie accustomed ar-rars of battell, as had bene requist. By reason whereof, great slaughter was made on either part, the victorie in the end being so doubtfull, that both parts were faine to withdraw out of the field, and flee to the next mounteins, as glad to be seuered the one from the other. There was slaine on Donalds part nine hundred men, with Pakelane, and Pa-kinthos. On the earle of Marres side, there died Alerander Agilue thirrist of Angus, with seuen knights of name, and diuers other gentlemen, with commons, to the number of six hundred. This battell was striken on saint James euen, in the yeare 1411. Donald of the Iles, after this bickering wholie granted the victorie to his enemies, in fleeing all the night long after the battell towards Koffe, and from thence with like speed he passed ouer into the Iles.

In the yeere next following, the gouernor prepared to make a iourne into the Iles, to chastise the foresaid Donald; but he through feare of further damage, submitted himselfe, and was sworne neuer to procure anie trouble to the realme in time to come.
Not long after the battell of Harlow, Patrike Dunbar, second sonne to the earle of March, with one hundred of hardie persons, came earlie one morning somewhat before the breake of the day to Fast castell, and wan the same, taking the captaine pris-ner, whose name was Thomas Holdon. At the same time was the brdge of Korburch broken downe, and the towne burnt by William Dowglas of Dumlanerik, Gawen Dunbar another of the erle of Marches sonnes, and diuerse others. In the same yeere (or rather in the yeere before) the vniuersitie of saint Andrews was first founded, which afterwards was furnished with diuerse notable learned men brought in and placed there by James the first, to the end that by their instructions his people might increase in learning, to the further aduancement of vertue, laudable maners, and all sorts of ciuill cu-stomes. Amongest sundrie other expert men in all sciences which he brought into Scotland, there were 18 doctors of diuinitie, & 8 doctors of the canon law.

* From this time by the space of ten yeeres (saith Buchanan) there was almost nothing done worthy of memorie, betwene the Scots and the English, either bicause the truce occasioned it (which yet I find not mentioned of anie man) either for that Henrie the fourth, king of England, being dead, and his sonne Henrie the fifth reigning in his place, and being all the time of his gouernement buffed in the warres of France, the English ceased to offer iniuries to the Scots: or for that the gouernor of the Scots durst not moue anie thing against the English, fearing least the Is. of England would then returne home the right and true heire of Scotland, who (he was most assured should find fauour against him) in the hearts of his owne people, that would tenderlie pitie the misfortune of his imprisonment, and seeke to establish him in the kingdom.
Wherefore if there were anie thing done in that meane time, they were but some few and small excursions within the realme, which more aptlie might be called robberies & spoiles, than anie right wars.
For as Pennure in England was burned by Ar-chembald Dowglas, so (to answer the same) Dun-freis in Scotland was in the like order destroyed by the English. Besides which there was a certeine exchange of prisoners of the one nation with the other: for Morzac the sonne of the gouernor (taken at Ha-lidon) was returned into Scotland, and Perrie (who was brought out of England by his grandfather into Scotland, and left vnder the protection of the gouernor) was deliuered to the English, and after by the new king of England was restored to the title & lands of his ancestors earles of Northumberland.

This man (though by the lawes of armes he was no captiue) yet the vnjust detaining of James the sonne of the king of Scots stopped the mouths of the English, that they could not complaine of anie inurie done in detaining him. The doing thereof so little offended this Perrie, that while he liued, he did (with all kind of courtesie) giue witness of the humanitie shewed vnto him by the Scots. Not much different from this time, came two ambassadores into Scotland, the one from the counsell of Constance (wherof the chiefe was the abbat of Pontineac) and the other was from Peter de Luna, who did studie reitene and defend the papacie, whereof he had once gotten possession, which Peter by the traueill and persuation of Henrie Hardine (an English man, and a franciscane frier) had draue the gouernor of Scotland to follow his faction, which yet succeeded to none effect: because the vniuersall companie of the cleargie stiffelie labored against it, and did subscribe to the deposition of Peter, and to the counsell of Constance for the election of Martine the first to the papacie.

Much what about the same time, John Drummond sene Patricke Graham earle of Strathernie, by traitorous meanes, and thereupon fled into Ireland: but as he was about to haue passed from thence ouer into England, the vessel wherein he sailed, was byrnen on the coast of Scotland, where he was taken, and afterwards lost his head for the said offence. Shortly after also, there rose great warres betwixt England and France, as in the histories of those realmes may more plainlie appeare. There was also a great rebellion raised in Wales, against Henrie the first king of England, which was the son of Henrie the fourth latelie deceased. We find in the Scottish chronicles, that this Henrie the first, at his returning south of France, after his first iourne thither (hauing in the same wone the towne of Harfleur, & discomfited the whole power of France at Agincourt) was constrained to go against the Welshmen, and encountering with the prince of Wales, was discomfited, and lost ten thousand of his men: but after this, he reinforced his power, and came againe into Wales, not ceassing till he had brought the Welshmen subiect at his pleasure: but the English writers make no mention of anie such matter.

Whilist things passed thus in England, William Haliburton toan the castell of Marke, and sene all such as he found within it, howbeit small while indured the ioy of this fortunate successe to the Scots: for sundrie Englishmen that knew all the secrets of the house, found means to enter through a gutter, that serued in maner of a sinke, to auoid all the filth of the kitchen into the riuer of Tweed, breaking downe a pane of an old wall, and so made entrie for the residue of their fellowes; by reason whereof they easilie recovered the castell, and in reuenge of them that were slaine there when the Scots toan it, they likewise sene all those which were then within it, without anie respect of one or other. After this, in the yere 1419, the third day of September, Robert duke of Albanie, that had bene gouernor of Scotland for the space of fifteene yeres, after the death of king Robert the third, departed out of this life, hauing borne himselfe in all his time as a right valiant and noble prince. [His doth Buchanan attribute to the yere 1420, being the sixteenth yere after the death of Robert the third.]

A little before his deceasse, there came from Charles the French king, the earle of Wandosme, and chancelor of France, both to renewe the ancient league betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France, & also to get some power of Scots to passe into France, to support the said Charles against the Englishmen, which as then soze inuaded his realme. Whereupon shortly after by decree of counsell, it was ordeined, that John Stewart earle of Buchquhane, second sonne to duke Robert, and Archembauld Douglas earle of Wigton, should passe into France with seuen thousand armed men. The king of England informed hereof, to cause the Scots to keepe their men at home, menaced to inuade Scotland with a puissant armie, & that in all hast. Which rumoz being spred ouer all the bounds of his realme, caused the Scots for doubt thereof to lie all the next summer on the borders: but in the meane time, king Henrie passed into Normandie, to pursue his wars against France with all diligence.

At length, through the procurement of the duke of Burgonie, under certeine conditions and covenants of agreement, king Henrie toke to wife the ladie Katharine daughter to the French king. And among other articles of the same agreement, it was concluded, that after the deceasse of Charles the French king, the crowne of France should immediately descend vnto king Henrie, as lawfull inheritor vnto that realme, without all contradiction; by reason whereof, Charles the Dolphin, and sonne to the said king Charles, was clearelie excluded from all claime to the same: but this notwithstanding, the Dolphin did not onelie refuse to surrender his title, but also sought to mainteine the war against king Henrie as his aduersarie, and open enimie to the realme. In the meane while also, the earles of Buchquhane and Wigton, with Alexander Lindseie brother to the earle of Crawford, and Thomas Swinton knights, accompanied with seuen thousand well armed men, arrived in France, to the great reioicing of the Dolphin, as he well declared in the thankfull receiuing, and most heartie welcomming of them. Finally, the towne and castell of Chatelon in Touraine was deliuered to them, that they might haue a place at all times to resort vnto, at their owne will and pleasure.

Shortly after they were imployed in the battell of Baugy. For the duke of Clarence brother to the king of England (in whose place he was deputie and generall of the armies in France) after that he had spoiled and ouerrun the countrie of Anjou (which hitherto had remained most stedfast in the obedience of the French) was comming (as it was supposed) to the towne of Baugy, about two daies before Easter: for which cause the Scots (thinking that the duke in that holie feast would, as the maner was, cease from all violence of warre, and attend the church ceremonies appointed for those times; or else as some write, by reason of the truce which was taken for eight daies) did more negligentlie loke vnto their estate than wisdom would they should haue done. The which when Clarence understood (either by Andreu Jregose an Italian, or by the Scottish foragers intercepted by his horsemen) he reioiced that he had so good occasion offered worthilie to performe something. Wherefore rising forthwith from dinner, he commanded his horsemen to arme themselves, with whom he went directly towards his enimies, at what time he was (besides the beautie of his other furniture) richlie adorne with goble diamonds of gold (set with manie pretious stones) and placed vpon a chaplet of iron. At whose sudden approach, those few French which were nere vnto them in a village called little Baugy (amongst whom was John de la Croix) being feared, made their defence in flight; and for safegard entered the steeple of the next church adioining, in the which they were hardlie after besieged.

Whilist these were thus inuironed, the clamor and cries which was now come to the next armie (where in the Scots were assembled) suddenlie caused them with great feare to flee to their weapons. At that time the erle of Buchquhane (whilist the others prepared themselves) sent thirtie archers to possesse the bridge, vnder which the next riuer had his course, and through which they might passe ouer, where (encountering with the English enimie) Hugh Kennedie came vnto them out of the next church (in which he lodged) with a hundred of his companie halfe armed, as it often falleth out in such sudden exploits. These with their arrowes so streitlie kept this streit, that the horsemen could not haue anie passage there, for which cause the duke of Clarence did first forsake his horse (as the rest of the companie did after him) began the battell on foot, and with a strong assault made way for his men, beating from them the Scots, who were for the most part unarmed, and the others not verie well armed.

After this, in the meane time whilst Clarence taketh his horse againe, and some of the rest scatteringlie do passe the bidge, the earle of Buchquhane cometh vpon them, & forthwith (desirous to make triall of his people egerlie seeking after it) there was a bitter battell committed, with like minds of hatred the one against the other: for the Scots did reioise, that they had now obtained cause, time, and place, where they might (after their first arrivall in France) shew some token of their valure, and refuse those talents which the Frenchmen laid vpon them, obiecting that the greedinesse of wine & bettels had brought them ouer into that countrie. With which reproch the Frenchmen are wont to upbraid the English, the Spaniard the French, and the African the Spaniard. But as the Scots were eger in a strange countrie to win honoꝝ, so was the English no lesse desirous of conquest, greatlie disdaining both at home and abroad, to be so infested with that implacable nature of the Scots. In which battell none did fight more valiantlie or egerlie than did the duke of Clarence himselfe. Against whom (so noted for the richnesse of his armor) came John Swinton, which greuouslie wounded him in the face, and whom the earle of Buchquhane (striking on the head with his mace) quite ouerthrew to the ground. Which done, the English fled, and were greuouslie slaine, because the same continued till the night ended the quarrell; which battell was fought on Caffer eue, a little after the equinoctiall spring. In this battell were slaine of the English about 20000, amongst whom were 26 of noble calling, whereof were the duke before said, the earle of Riddelsdale, otherwise called the earle of Angus, & the lord Greie were part: but of the Scots and Frenchmen, there were few missing, and they of the meane sort. All which, as we haue here set it downe, is the common report of the death of the duke of Clarence. But the booke of Pluicart reporteth, that the duke was slaine by Alexander Spacell, a knight of Lenox, which toke from him the cozonet (whereof we spake before) and sold the same to John Steward of Wernill, for a thousand angels, which he after laied to payme to Robert Buthone, to whom he bought five thousand angels: & this saith that booke was the most common report at those daies. The chiefe passe of which victorie remained with the Scots, euen by the testimonie of the enuious aduersaries, as the writer of this storie saith vpon his credit. At this battell also were a great companie of prisoners taken, amongst whom (as principall) were these, the earle of Huntington, & the earle of Summerset, with his brother, both of them being brethren to the ladie Jane, that was after married to king James the first, king of Scotland. For the high valencie of the Scottishmen shewed in this battell, the Dolphin created the earle of Buchquhane high constable of France, and gaue him sundrie townes, castles, and lands, therewith the better to mainteine his estate.

* King Henrie hearing of the death of his brother the duke of Clarence, did substitute for his deputed his other brother the duke of Bedford, promising that he would shortly after come thither himselfe with an armie of foure thousand horse, and a thousand footmen (which he performed accordingly). For with all speed he after came into France with a mightie host, and had with him James the Scottish king, or rather prince of Scotland, for all this while the Scots reputed him not as king, for that he was not as yet crowned: nor set at libertie out of the Englishmens hands, into the which (as before ye haue heard) he chanced to fall by his fathers life time.

The cause why king Henrie did take this James ouer with him at that present into France, was, for that he hoped by his meanes to procure all the Scottishmen that were in seruice with the Dolphin to forsake him, and to returne home into their owne countrie: but when he had broken this matter vnto the said James, and promised, that if he could bring it to passe, he would not onelie remitt his ransom, but also send him into Scotland highlie rewarded with great riches: James answered hereunto, that he marvelled much, why he did not consider how he had no authoritie ouer the Scots so long as he was holden in captiuitie, and as yet had not receiued the crowne, but (saith he) if it were so that I might be set at libertie, and had receiued the crowne according to the accustomed manner, together with the othes and homages of my subiects, I could then in this matter do as should be thought to stand with reason; but in the meane time I shall desire your grace to hold me excused, and not to will me to do that which I may in no wise performe.

King Henrie maruelling at the high wisdom which appeared to be planted in the head of that young prince, left off to trauell with him anie further in this matter. In the meane time, the warres continuing betwixt the king of England and the Dolphin of France, manie townes were besieged, wone, and sacked, and sundrie light bickerings and skirmishes chanced betwixt the parties, as occasion serued. But the Englishmen shewed themselves to beare such hatred toward the Scots, that so manie as fell into their hands neuer needed to streine their friends for their ransomes, which crueltie they put not in practice against their enemies, being of an other nation. [For king Henrie, when he had taken the towne of Speldens, hanged twentie Scots which he found therein, laieng to their charge that they had fought against their owne king.] At length, king Henrie fell into a greuous disease, which in short time made an end of his life, notwithstanding all the helpe that either by physike or other waies might be ministered vnto him. The same yeere, that is to say, 1422, the French king Charles, the first of that name, deceased; after whom succeeded his sonne Charles the seventh, before named the Dolphin, as the custome there is. By the death of these kings, the wars were not altogether so earnestlie followed as before, wherevpon the earles of Buchquhane and Winton returned into Scotland, and shortly after was an armie leuied, and siege laied both to Rocksburch, and to Berwik, but for that they lay long abroad and did no good, returning home without gaine, this iournie in derision was called The durrie rode, or (as the Scots terme it) The dirtie raid.

But now to speake somewhat concerning the order of the common-wealth in Scotland, ye shall understand, that after the death of Robert duke of Albany, his sonne Mordo Steward earle of Fife and Menteith was made gouernour, continuing in that office for the space of foure yeeres, though (to confesse the truth) he was farre vnmet thereto, differing much from the wisdom and manhood of his father, for in him remained sundrie vices, greatlie variable and contrarie one to another. In time of anie aduersitie, he shewed himselfe as a man despairing of all comfort or helpe: in prosperitie so list he in carelesse insolencie, that he had no staie of himselfe, by reason whereof

James was to die in circumstances, beyond all comparison more honorable, and more of his dignity. There was to be no negotiation in obtaining his freedom. James, & Alexander, whether through their own choice or not, as it is evident by their last & private addresses were contented upon that they should have no more negotiation made concerning parties, as the law respecting it is understood. At length, one of their calling advertisements with his father, so that he would not give him a father, the which he had long before previously desired. He got to town, and placing his brother and sister, leaving his mother there, he took a new residence with his three. Whereupon the father immediately conducted with his remaining friends of the house. Alexander said he, for he was his name that had thus remained with him, it is that there and his brother will not be raised by any but and gentle government. A still being that there yet it be long, that shall furnish both you and me after in other manner. And after this, he wrote not to travel till in the company of James the first out of September. All at length he brought him home in bed, to the great mourning, and good joy of all the Scottish nation, as for calling together a parliament of the nobles there in Perth they consisted of seventy-nine persons, where James remained in England, and at length William agreed rather to leave them than to the mental force, as being weary with the labours of the young government, to land in abundance in the city of England, to demand the restitution of living James. Whereupon they dispatched into England to secure that head, George Lockhart bishop of Aberdeen, Archibald Douglas (the first earl of that name), and all of that family the sons of Archibald Douglas, sons of Laurence, William and Peter countess of Scotland. Richard Cardinal archbishop of London, and Alexander Jarrat's Dean, knight.

At the nearest time, the French king, Charles the Fourth, being very desirous with himself the Englishmen, sent to the earle of Buckingham his messenger, requiring him to come againe with all speed to France, and to bring to him some Scottishmen with him, as he convenientlie might. This earle, therefore, found means to persuade Archibold earle of Douglas, father to the fore-said earle of Wylington, to come with him into France, which two earles with an armie of five thousand men, at some time departed for Scotland, took the seas, and arrived with prosperous wind and weather at Rochell, and comming to the French king, were received of him with all joy and gladnesse. With this companye also was sent ambassador, Gilbert Cremona bishop of Hereber, a man of great authority amongst the nobilitie of Scotland, in his singular wisdom, and such respect as with great reverence executed the office of the chancelorship of the realm. The effect of which message was to comfort Charles the fourth, the king of France, and to advertise him, that not merely they which were now allowed in France, but also all the inhabitants of Scotland should remaine thence in his faithfull friendship, that they should spend joyfullnes and goods in the defence of the crowne of France, as the following experiences should well reade. Whereupon the earle of Douglas was by the king to his further advancement, honored with the title of the duke-dome of Touraine. But that glorie of the Scots was soon diminished, as hath before by the infidelian journals which they had amongst the English in the harbor of Alexandria in which notices of the treaty in common language which were all most kind as they were those periodical of the month, so, the first intention of the government, the early of the diplomatic contacts of France, Ambassador Douglas, first of America, in the France has been and since, November 1, under, Thomas Stewart, Robert Stewart and many others as in the strong and English influence more language may appear.

And here's a little to say out of the way, because in this place I have not spoken of the Maggots as he doth in all the parts of his book, but must before I write a little more than the truth I remember to have seen: as well against as general use, as against in many places, as against Crusts, Humors, Leucy, and Rheumatism in many other places thereof. And therefore I have not been so much in doubt to be of him being dead, than he is of others, for although against all humors he do most bitterly with words of heat and flame his sex against Humors, Leucy, he doth the truth and the verities as it appears before he takes the latter terms to hand, rather the overthrowing of his old dogmatism, as I think in his public confession, in his last or his former: yet I will spare him in better sort. And therefore I must write, that he is a man to be learned and feared, would not in his later age, when reason should most rule him, in his pen in small things, say himselfe he should be of their good conditions contrary to all teaching, which Smolus more, ne finis esse possit he would call more impudent, more foolish, but learned, honest, moderate, cautious, industrious, and longed: and that he nevertheless wrote the Examen to be made of dogs and brute beasts, because they be debased of Nature. All which qualities are to be found in his book: for if there were faults in them, there were some cause, because it seems he did not well conceive his mind: could not he either be so good or so in his own mind, but with such little faults, that they did make them their own and selfe, in such a manner that they were, as it is said, for all learned men to doo: Others learned he did challenge, to correct the opinion of men with dogmatism, and lower to deduce that creature, known to the image of God, and lord of all beasts, to be rather made of dogs than of men, and the one of the great persons to make himselfe a whole life.

But Sumner Choudhury puts the note of 'infamy' on his nation (as he supposed) or dispraising Father Boreius who arranges the (false all truth) hath transferr'd to his Scots both nations' persons, and deeds, which never belonged to them. And is this to give a fault in Choudhury himself and Laleus-bhawan of Kothé (perhaps the misliking Boreius) have in Alencas sailon Jucua great many imperfections at the History of Boreius, and placed many other things after in other fits, referring them to other times than Boreius doth. And why should he maligne Choudhury for misrepresenting him, whom himselfe condemnethe, and whom he saith that in descriptions stosicæ medium marium vere credidit—et alios in errorem misit, and whom for many faults (by Boreius escaped) he suffereth both in the later and in his second books, that he will not defend him in such errors, as no reason there is with the should. But if from the abundance of the heart the tongue and hand do speake and write, I can not be without this intemperate speech. Small condemne him of (bare) grudge, not so much in the version of Choudh, as to the whole nation against which the best part of his books (remov'd to sea) do machinate seditions. And yet such as this, they must necessarily follow that intempest of the bitterness of his nation, so will he will exclaim against them (as he doth) in this place of the battell of Veruiole that they maliciously obscure the glorie of the Scots, following the authoritie of the aduersarie, and not the truth of the historie written by him, or the French nation.

And in this place of his booke, rather than he will want occasion to talant and disgrace vs by his choicelike pen, he will seeke a knot in a rush, and make a mountaine of a molehill, in so vehement inuading against the English, that say that the Scots were not able to mainteine such titles of honor as were given them by the French: a simple matter to make such discourse vpon, and to step so much awrie out of the course of the historie. But thinke you Buchanan hath committed no such (nay greater) faults against vs? Yes trulie, and that I suppose will be well proued at another time, in another treatise vpon his booke now iustlie forbidden in England, and (as I heare) more iustlie in Scotland. And here remember I praie the gentle reader, that in one place of his booke he saith that he ment to haue obserued this course from the beginning, that he would not seeke to digresse by bypaths out of the course of the historie. And hath he so soone forgotten that in the first forehead of his booke, almost three leaues together, & also in manie other parts of the same (as well as in this place of the battell of Veruiole) he hath lept manie miles out of the way, with bitter words to talant Humfrie Lhoid, Grafton, Hall, & all the English histories, and by manie whole pages (in manie parts of his worke) with much spence of powder and shot, to batter the credit of the English writers. These trulie were not parts of such a person, as the place (which he had about the prince, whilest he liued) required. But inough of this by me (who am not Honorarius arbiter, and will be no seuerer censurer of other mens writings at this time (whereunto I was occasioned by Buchanans digression in this place) since the same will be more substantiallie touched by others in other works (whereunto I refer my selfe) and so returne to the order of the historie.)

The Scottish chronicles declare, that the losse of this field chanced speciallie through enuie and discord, which reigned amongst the chieftains. For the duke of Alanfon enuieing that the Scots should daillie rise in honor within France, kept himselfe backe, till time the Scots were ouerthrowen and brought to vtter destruction. Againe, euen vpon the ioining, there rose great strife and contention betwixt the constable & the duke of Touraine, who should haue the supreme rule of the Scottish legber, the one disdainning to giue place to the other. Thus ye may perceiue, how the Scots with losse of manie of their liues, and much bloodshed, supported the side of Charles king of France, against the Englishmen. And though there came daillie newes of diuerse great ouerthrowes giuen by the Englishmen to such Scottishmen and other, as serued the said king Charles, yet did not the Scots therefore staie at home, but at sundrie times, and vnder sundrie capteins repaired into France: as amongst other, one Robert Daltillocke of Dundee with a new power of Scots went ouer to king Charles the seuenth as aforesaid, shewing such proue of his singular manhood and valiance in those wars, as in recouerie of the realme of France out of the Englishmens hands, his seruice stood king Charles in notable stead. Chicke his diligence and prowlisse well appeared, in reducing the parties of Gascoigne vnto the French subiection, which had remained a great number of yeeres vnder the dominion of the English kings. And here vpon was he called by the inhabitants euer after, Le petit roy de Gascoigne.

But to returne to the businesse of Scotland and of the Scots, as they passed in the meane time. We say, that the French reioicing of this conquest of Gascoigne, would not seme to be vnthankfull to the Scots therefore: for which cause they erected a statue or image of this Daltillocke, in the hall of the king of France, as a perpetuall memorie of this conquest, and as a singular testimonie of their good will towards the Scots, which they placed there to remaine a monument to all posteritie. Beside which, he confirmed and increased the number of the gard of Scottish archers (which they were wont to vse in peace and warre) first instituted by Charles the king of France, ouer all which he made this Daltillocke chiefe capteine, which office the Scots did then and since so well discharge, that the same continueth yet in our memorie. Besides which (a little before this) Charles the first appointed an other companie of Scottish horsemen to be in wages with him, being commonlie called the trope of the Scottishmen at armes. Of whome the chiefe gouernour was Robert Stewart (borne of the familie of the earle of Lennox) who was honored by the king with the title of the lord de Aubignie, with other lands and great possessions bestowed vpon him. All which (being of long time possessed of the Scots of the same surname, by continuall order of blood & descent, that is, by Bernard the famous capteine of warre, then by Robert, and to conclude, by John Stewart, brother of the earle of Lennox) is at this day also in possession of the worthie young gentleman (the sonne of the said John) who giueth forth a rare hope that he will not degenerat from the nobilitie of his ancestors. The ambassadoers sent (as before is shewed) into England for King James, behaued themselves so sagelie therein, that in the end, they brought it to good conclusion: as thus. First it was agreed, that king James should be set at libertie, and also pay for his ransom the sum of 100000 marks sterling, the one halfe to be paid in hand, and for the other halfe to leaue sufficient pledges behind him, till it were paid. Albeit some writers alledge, that leauing pledges for the payment of the one halfe, he was discharged of the other, in consideration that he toke to wife the ladie Jane, daughter to the earle of Summerset. The said earle and the cardinall of England his brother, conueied him with his queene their niece, vnto the borders of both the realmes. And at their taking leaue each of other, there was presented vnto king James and to the queene his wife, besides a cupbord of massie plate, sundrie faire cloths of rich and costlie arras by his wiues friends, with manie other iewels and things of great price & value.

King James then departed on this wise from his wiues brethren, and other such his dere friends, as his vertue and princelie behauiour had procured him during his abode here by the space of sixteen or eightene yeares in England, entered into Scotland, and came to Edinburgh on Care sendaie, other wise called Passion Sunday in Lent, where he was receiued with all honor, ioy, and triumph that might be deuised. At what time as the nobles came to giue him their dutifull welcome into his native soile and inheritance, there began to be manie complaints by them, who since the death of their last king (partlie by negligence, and partlie by the diuers kinds of iniuries; where vpon, Walter the son of Morzac, Malcolme Fleming, and Thomas Boid being greivouslie accused, were (to pacifie the exclamation of the common people) committed to diuers prisons till the next parlement, which was appointed the first kalends of June following, where is more intreated of this matter, as after shall appeare, Buchanan hauing thus placed it before the kings kings coronation.]

As after that, as some as the solemnitie of the feast of Easter was finished, he came to Perth, and shortly after to Scone, where he was crowned king, and his wife quene, by duke Morzdo the gouernor, and Henrie bishop of saint Andrews, the one and twentieth day of Maie, after the incarnation 1424. There came south of England with this James the first, diuerse English gentlemen, which remaining euer after in seruice with him, were advanced to certeine lands, possessions, and livings in Scotland. Amongest whome (as one of the chiefest) was Andrew Graie, who afterwards by the kings aid and good furtherance, got in mariage the daughter and heire of Henrie Mortimer of Foulis, named Helen, and by that means came the lordship of Foulis unto the hands of the Graies, whose surname and posteritie continueth yet in Scotland, inuested with great lands and dignities, both in Cotwrie and Angus.

King James after his coronation returned from Scone to Edinburgh, where he called before him all those that bare anie authoritie in the administration of the common-wealth, during the time of the gouernors duke Robert and duke Morzdo, namely the chancelor, the treasurer, the clearks of the register, the controller, the auditors, and receivers, with all other that had booke offices, or had anie thing to doe concerning the kings rents. At length, when he perceived by their accounts made, that the most part of all the lands, rents, and reuenues pertaining vnto the crowne, were wasted, bestowed, alienated, and transported by the two foresaid gouernors, vnto their friends and fauours, contrarie to all right or good consideration (the customs of burrowes and good townes onlie excepted) he was not well content herewith, though for the time he passed ouer his displeasure, in the wing outwardlie no semblance, but as if he had liked all things well.

In the meane time, he aduisedly perused all endences, rolls, and charters pertaining to the crowne, and shortly thereupon called a parliament at Edinburgh, in the which, by aduise of the three estates, a generall tax was ordeined and granted, to be raised through the whole realme; as twelue pence of the pound to be paid of all lands within Scotland, both spirituall and temporall; and foure pence for euerie colt, ore, and horse, to be paid for the space of two yeares together. This payment was levied the first yeare without anie trouble, but the second yeare there rose such murmur and grudging amongst the poore commons about the payment thereof, that he remitted the residue that was behind, & took neuer anie tax after of his subjects, vntill he married his daughter with the Dolphin of France. Amongst other bills put by in this parliament, there was diuerse complaints exhibited by the people, for sundrie oppressions used and done by the sons of duke Morzdo, and other great pæres of the realme, before the kings returne into Scotland.

Whereupon Walter Stewart, one of the sons of the said duke Morzdo, was arrested, and sent to a castell situated vpon a rocke within the sea called the Bassie, there to remaine in safe keeping. Also Malcolme Fleming of Cumernald, and Thomas Bold of Kilmarnoke, were committed to ward in Dalkeith, but these two at the intercession of diuerse noble men were pardoned and forgiven of all offences for an easie fine, with condition, that they should satisfie all such persons as they had in anie wise wronged. In the foresaid parliament also, James took a solemne oath, to defend as well the liberties of his realme, as of the church, during the course of his naturall life. The like oath by his example did all the residue of the barons take at the same present time. Not long after, an other parliament was called and holden at Perth, in the which duke Morzdo, with his sonne Alexander, were arrested and committed to ward. So was also Archembald earle of Douglas, with his brother William earle of Angus, George earle of March, Adam Hepborne of Hales, and manie other great barons of Scotland, euerie of them being put in sundrie castles and strengths, to remaine there in safe keeping. Duke Morzdo was sent to Carlaurocke, and his duchesse was put in Temptalloun.

In the yeare following, on the Holie rood daie, called the Invention of the crosse, James Stewart the third sonne of duke Morzdo moued with great ire, for that his father and brethren were holden in prison, came with a great power to the towne of Dunbarton, and burnt it, after he had slaine John Stewart of Dondonald, and two and thirtie other persons, which were found in the same towne; but the king kindled in great displeasure for this attempt, pursued this James so fiercely, that he was faine to flee into Ireland, where he afterwards deceased. [And Finelaw (which was sometime one of the order of the frier Dominicks) which fled with him into Ireland, & was author that the said James committed all these outrages, died there also. Besides which, there fled into Ireland the wife of Walter, his two sonnes, Andrew and Alexander, with Arthur the bassard: who (in the end) returning home, was after by James the third advanced to great honors.] In the next yeare ensuing, James called a parliament at Sterling, in the which he sitting with scepter, sword, and crowne in place of iudgement, Walter Stewart with his brother Alexander were condemned, and incontinentlie were lead forth to a place before the castell, and there beheaded.

On the morrow after, duke Morzdo himselfe, and Duncan Stewart earle of Lennox were convicted of high treason, and beheaded before the castell in semblable manner. [It is a constant fame (saith Buchanan) though I find it not written in any place, that the king sent the heads of the father, husband, & children, to Isabell the wife of his cosine germane, to trie whether she being a fierce woman, would (as it usually happened) by dissemperance of griefe discover the secrets of his mind. But she (notwithstanding all which grieuous and vnlooked for spectacles) did not inordinatlie burst out into anie bitter words, but onlie said; If the faults be true which are laid against them, the king hath done but right and iustice vnto them.] Thus by the attainder of duke Morzdo and his sonnes, the earldome of Fife, Perth, and Lennox came into the kings hands. The residue of the lords and barons remaining as then in prison, and abiding the kings pleasure, were sore afraid, when they heard that rigorous iustice had bene executed on duke Morzdo and his sonnes: notwithstanding, within 12 moneths after they were all set at libertie, and receiued into the kings fauor, on promise of their loiall demeanour & dutifull obedience euer after to be shewed, during their naturall liues.

The parliament being ended, John Mounthgomerie, & Humfreie Cunningham were sent by the king to the castell of Loughleune, which was kept against him by the runagat James Stewart, whom in short time they forced to surrender the said castell. Not long after, John Stewart of Dornie (who was maister of the Scottish garrison of hoistmen in France, the rest of the former captiues being consumed) came into Scotland with the bishop of Meins, as ambassador in the name of Charles, to renew the old league betwene the two nations, and to conclude matrimonie betwene Lewis the sonne of the said Charles the seventh, and Margaret the daughter of R. James, both being yet verie young. Which thing so dispatched, in the next yeare being the (1426) he determined (having pacified all Scotland betwene the mounteins of Granzeben) to subdue the further parts beyond it also. Wherefore to begin the same, he commanded the castell of Inuerness (set in a convenient place in the furthest borders of Murray) to be repaired. Whither when he came two yeares after, to sit in iudgement upon misdemeanors of the inhabitants, and to suppress their robberies, he called before him the chiefe of all the families of that countrie, especiallie such as being accompanied with great traines, were wont to fetch prizes from their next borders, did set tribute on the quieter sort, and did compell the common people to minister sustenance to those idle loiterers; of which captives, some had a thousand, some two thousand, & some far manie more redie at their call to obey their commandement: with which they ceased not to keepe the good in danger unto them for feare of hurt, and made the euill (amongest whom they were assured of refuge & defense) the bolder to commit all kind of wickednesse. Which persons when the king had gotten in, and drawn to come before him, partlie by flatteries, and partlie by threats: he committed about fortye of their leaders to severall prisons: whose euill being thoroughlie knowne, he hanged two notable fellows amongst them, called Alexander Macro; and John Macarcure; at what time also he beheaded James Campbell (for the murder of John of the Isles) a man deerele beloved of his people. The rest which remained (being of the common sort) they likewise dispersed into diuers prisons, whereof some were after executed, and some were permitted frelie to depart to their owne. The captives of the factions thus slaine (or for the most part restrained in prison) the inferior sort durst not attempt anie thing, being destitute of leaders. Whereupon the king calling them before him, did giue them a louing admonition to embrace iustice, because there was no surer or certeine hope of safetie in anie thing, than in the innocencie of life, the which if they would determine to do, they should alwaies find him readie to honor and reward them; if not, they might learne by the examples of others what they should hope to receive themselves.)

Alexander of the Isles cometh to the king and asketh pardon.

In the yeere next following, which was after the incarnation 1427, Alexander lord of the Isles was arrested by the king at Inuerness, for that he was accused to be a succor & maintainer of theues & robbers in the countrie: but forsomuch as he promised in time comming to reforme his former misdemeanors, he was pardoned and set at libertie; whereof ensued great trouble immediatlie after. For shortly by his deliuerance, he gathered a power of wicked scapethifts, and with the same comming into Inuerness, burnt the towne, and besieged the castell, insorcking with all diligence to win the same, till he was aduertised that the king was comming towards him with a great power, whereupon he fled incontinentlie to the Isles. Finally having knowledge that a great number of people lay bailie in wait to take him, that they might present him to the kings hands, he came disguised in poye arate to the holie rood house, and there finding the king on Easter daie deuoutlie in the church at his prayers, he fell downe on his knees before him, and besought him of grace, for his sake that rose as that day from death unto life.

At request of the queene, the king pardoned him of life; but he appointed William Douglas earle of Angus to haue the custodie of him, and that with in the castell of Temptallon, that no trouble should rise by his meanes thereafter. His mother Eufemie daughter to Walter sometime earle of Ross, was also committed to ward in saint Colmes inch; because it was knowne that she solicited hir sonne to rebell (in manner as is afore said) against the king. Not long after, Donald Balloch, brother to the said lord Alexander of the Isles, came with a great power of men into Lochquhaber. The earles of Mar and Cathnes came with such number of their people as they could raise, to defend the countrie against the inuasion of those Ilandmen, and fought with the said Donald at Inuerlochty, where the erle of Cathnes was slaine, and the earle of Mar discomfited. Here with did Donald retorne with victorie, and a great preie of goods and riches into the Isles. The king foremoued with the newes herof, came with a great armie vnto Dunstaffe, purposing with all speed to passe into the Isles. The clans and other chiefe men of the said Isles aduertised herof, came to Dunstaffe, and submitted themselves vnto the king, excusing their offense, for that (as they alledged) the said Donald had constrained them against their willes, to passe with him in the last iourne. All those clans vpon this their excuse, were admitted to the kings fauour, and none to pursue the said Donald vnto death.

Donald Balloch inuadeth Lochquhaber.

Shortly hereupon, this Donald fled into Ireland, where he was slaine, and his head sent by one Mdo a great lord of Ireland (in whose countrie he lurked) as a present to the king that laie as then at Sterling. There were also three hundred of his adherents taken, and by the kings commandement hanged for their offenses within three weekes space, after his first fleeing into Ireland. This trouble being thus quieted, king James passed through all the bounds of his realme, to punish all offenders and misdeed persons, which in anie wise wronged and oppressed the poore people. He allowed no pardon granted afore by the gouernor, alledging the same to be expired by his death. For he thought indeed it stood neither with the pleasure of God, nor wealth of the realme, that so manie slaughters, reiffes, and oppressions, as had bene done afore in the countrie, should remaine unpunished through fault of iustice. It is said that within the first two yeeres of his reigne, there were three thousand persons executed by death, for sundrie old crimes and offenses.

And though such extreme iustice might haue bene thought sufficient to giue example to other to reforme their naughtie vsages, yet one Angus Duffe of Stratherne nothing afraid thereof, came with a companie of theues and robbers, and toke a great preie of goods out of the countrie of Murray and Cathnes: for recouerie whereof, one Angus Murray followed with a great power, and overtaking the said Angus Duffe nere to Strachnauerne, fiercelie assailed him. Who with like manhod made stout resistance, by reason whereof there ensued such a cruell fight betwixt the parties, that there remained in the end but onelie twelue persons aliue, & those so wounded, that they were scarce able to retorne home to their houses, and liued but a few daies after. About the same time, there was also another notable theefe named Spakdonald Ross, which grew with spoiles and robberies to great riches. This wicked oppressor shod a woman with horse shoes, because she said she would go to the king, and reucale his wicked doings. As soone as she was whole, and recovered of hir wounds, she went vnto the king, and declared the cruelties done vnto hir by that vngenerous person Spakdonald. The king (who before had heard the same of others, and had gotten Spakdonald in pison, determining to see due punishment for that wicked fact comforted the sillie woman, promising hir thozlie to behold a iust reuenge thereof. Whereupon Spakdonald being brought out of pison with twelve of his companions, the king commanded that they (by the talion law of Moses that yeldeth an eie for an eie, and a toth for a toth, and by the example of Phalaris, who burnt him first in the bull that was the autho; thereof for others) should likewise be shod with iron hozeshoes, in that sort as they befoze had serued the woman, and then to be caried thre daies togither about the citie for a spectacle to the people, to feare to attempt such extraodinarie wickednesse; making proclamation that euerie one might see this new kind of punishment. After which, at length (doubting if he liued he would not cease to commit the like, or else reuenge the same) he chopped off Spakdonalds head, & caused his twelve fellows and partakers to be hanged in the high waies.)

In the third yere after, which was from the incarnation 1430, on the eleuenth daie of October, Jane the queene of Scots was deliuered of two sonnes at one birth, Alexander and James. The first deceased in his infancie. The other succeeded after his fathers deace in the kingdome, & was named James the second. At the baptisme of these two infants, there were fiftie knights made. Amongst the which, and first of all other, was William the sonne of Archemald Douglas, that succeeded his father in the earldome of Douglas. His father the said Archemald Douglas, somewhat before this time, or (as other autho; say) in the yere next insuing, was arrested by the kings commandement, and put in ward, remaining so a long time, till at length by supplication of the queene, and other peeres of the realme, the king pardoned him (with John Kennedie) of all offenses, and set both them And Alexander earle of Kosse at libertie. King James in this sort did what in him lay to bring the realme of Scotland in such quiet tranquillitie, that (in purging the same of all offenders, and such as liued by reiffe and robbing) passengers by the high waies might trauell without dread of anie euill disposed persons to molest them.

* Having thus with diligence suppressed the robberies (practised through all parts of his realme) he forgot not to looke into small offenses which were felonie done, and of lesse danger; determining to take awaie all euill customes which had continued in the realme. For custome, being an other nature dwtly bing to passe, that a common erro; (by manie ages continued) maketh a perfect law, and therefore (& because the inferio; iudges would the better administer iustice, if they had persons of high authoritie that might punish their false sentences) he chose forth speciall persons of the better sort (commended for their wise dome, grauttie, and holinesse of life) and made them iustices, whome he sent ouer all the realme giuing them full authoritie to heare and determine all quarels and lutes (if anie were brought vnto them) wherof the ordinarie iudges either (for feare) durst not or (for hatred or fauor) would not, or (for strength of others) could not giue anie perfect iudgement.)

He caused also the bailiffes and prouosts of good towines, to see that iust measures were vsed by all manner of buiers and sellers, and none to be occupied, but such as were signed with the note & marke of the said bailiffes or prouosts. Moreover, he repaired and fortified the castles and fortresses of his realme, and stocked them with such ordinance and munition as was thought expedient. He granted also sundrie priuileges and great liberties to the vniuersitie of Saint Andzeus, to the high advancement thereof, and was oftentimes himselfe present at their disputations, taking great pleasure therein. Such as were knotone to be learned men, and were presented to him by the vniuersitie, he preferred to great benefices and other ecclesiasticall livings, till as the same chanced to be vacant. [Having for that cause made a law in the said vniuersitie, that none should intop the roome of a canon in anie cathedrall church, vnles he were a bachelor of diuinitie, or at least of the canon law.] By which meanes all manner of vertue and good learning increased dailie through the realme during his time, and namelie musike was had in great price, which he appointed to be vsed in churches with organs, the which befoze his time were not much knotone amongst the Scottishmen.

Such what about the same time, there was a parliament holden at Perth, in the which Henrie Wardlaw bishop of S. Andzeus, in name of all the the elstates there assembled, made a long and right pitie oration to this effect; that where by the high policie and prudent diligence of the kings maiestie there present, iustice, and all due administration of lawes and god ordinaances were so reuiued, that nothing seemed to be ouerpassed, that might aduance to the profit and commoditie of the common-wealth; yet was there one wicked vsage crept in of late, increasing so fast, that if speedie remedie were not had in time, all those commodites brought into the realme by his comming, should be of small auale, and that was, such superfluous riot in banketting there, and numbers of coslie dishes, as were then taken up and vsed after the English fashion, both to the great hinderance of mans health, and also to the vnprofitable wasting of their goods and substance. If the laudable temperance vsed amongst the Scottishmen in old time were well considered, nothing might appeare moze contrarie and repugnant thereto, than that new kind of gluttonie then vsed, by receiving moze excelle of meats and drinks than sufficeth to the nourishment of nature, through prouocation of such deintie and delicate dishes, confectioned sauces, and deuilled potions, as were now brought in amongst them. As for such gentlemen as the king had brought with him forth of England, they were wrothie in deed to be cherished and had in high fauour; neither was this abuse to be so greatlie imputed vnto them, considering it was appropriate to their nation. But the Scottishmen themselves were chieftie to be blamed, that had so quicklie pelled to so great an inconuenience, the enormitie whereof appeared by the sundrie vices that folloved of the same, as excelle, sensuall lust, sloth, reiffe, and wasting of goods. For if temperance be the nourisher of all vertue, then must the contrarie, that is to say, intemperance, be the bringer forth and prouoker of all vice. If it might therefore please the kings highnesse, to shew his accustomed wisdom and prouidence in repressing this abuse of coslie fare, so much damagable to his people, he should do the thing that was meritorious before God, and no lesse profitable and necessarie for the publike weale of all his subjects.

By these and manie other the like persuasions, bishop Wardlaw vsed to dissuade the king and his people from all superfluous courses of delicate dishes and surfetting banketts. Insomuch that euen then there was order taken, that fewer dishes and moze spare diet should be vsed through the realme, licensing gentlemen onelie, and that on festiual daies, to be serued with pies, the vse of them not being knotone in Scotland till that season. Fewer thelesse, such intemperance is risen in proceffe of time following.

In the same yere the seuenteenth day of June, 10 was a terrible eclipse of the sunne, at three of the clocke at after none, the day being darkened ouer head for the space of one halfe houre together, as though it had bene night, and thereupon it was called the blacke houre. At the next Lammass, the king raised an armie, & came with the same to Roxburgh, besieging the castell for the space of fiftene daies together. He had in this armie (as the report went) the number of two hundred thousand men, accounting cartage men & all other such as followed the campe: yet notwithstanding all this huge multitude, hauing wasted his powder and other munition, before he could doe anye great hurt to his enemies, he was constrained to raise his field, and leaue the castell in the Englishmens hands as he found it. After this king James perceiuing how the knowledge of handicrafts and manuell occupations was decayed in Scotland, through continuall exercise of wars, since the daies of Alexander the third, to the further advancement of the common-wealth, and that his subjects might haue occasion to auoid sloth and idleness (the root of all mischief) he brought a great number of cunning craftsmen out of Germanie, France, and other parties, to instruct his people in their arts and faculties.

Angus with his chancelor William Creighton, and Adam Hepborne of Hales to the castell of Dunbar, deliuering them letters signed with his hand, and directed to the keepers of the said castell, that they should deliuer by the house immediatlie upon sight of those letters unto the bringers of the same. The keepers durst not disobey his commandement, but suffered them to enter according to their commission. Within twelue moneths after, a parlement was held at Perth.
Perth, where the foresaid George earle of March was disherited of all his lands and livings for his fathers offense committed against king Robert the third. Thus the house of the Dunbars lost the earle-dome of March, wherein the same had flourished so manie yeres together, to the great defense and safe-gard of the realme of Scotland on that side, against both ciuill and foieine enemies.

Patrick, the summe of foure hundred marks yere-lie, to be receiued out of a parcell of his owne ancient inheritance of the earldome of March, to enjoy the same till James the second came to full age. In the yere 1435, Alexander Steward earle of Mar-departed out of this life. This Alexander was a bastard sonne of the earle of Buchquhan, that was one of the sonnes of king Robert the second. He was a man of right singular prowesse, and in his youth following the warres, was with Philip duke of Burgognie at the siege of Liege, or Liuke, where he bare himselfe so manfullie, that fewe wan the like honoment, he got in marriage the ladie Iacoba countesse of Holland: notwithstanding, he continued but a while with hir, being forced to forgo hir companie, either for that he had another husband, or else for that the inhabitants would not suffer a stranger to reigne ouer them.

After his returne into Scotland, he sent messengers into Holland, requiring to haue the issues and profits of such lands as were due unto him in right of the said countesse his wife; but receiuing nought saue a froward answer, he provided him of ships, and made soe warres on the Hollanders by sea: first being put to the worse; but at length he toke a number of their ships laden with merchandize, as they were returning homewards from Dantzicke.
The mariners were drowned, and the ships burnt.
Through which losse the Hollanders being soe abashed, fell to a composition with him, and toke truce with the Scots for an hundred yeres. This earle of Mar so long as he liued had the gouernance of the north parts of Scotland vnder king James the first, for he was a right prudent person, as well in warlike enterprises, as in ciuill administration. He brought forth of Hungarie sundrie great horses and mares for generation, that by such means the countrie might be provided of great horses of their owne race, where till that time there was none bred within Scotland, but small nags, more meet to serue for iournieng hacknies, than for anye seruice in the warres.

Not long before this time, there came an ambat-

Ambassadors
out of Den-

Their request

according to the promise and agreement made by Alexander sometime king of Scotland, the third of that name, unto his predecessor Magnus, at that time king of Norwaie. The ambassadoes that came with this message were honorable received, and in like sort intertained by king James, who at their departure gave to them sundrie rich gifts, and appointed Sir William Crichton to go with them into Denmarke, ambassado: frō him, to the king there, who used himselfe so sagelie in this businesse which he thus went about, that renewing the old league betwixt the two realmes of Denmarke and Scotland, fixed fast peace and assured amitie without anie more ado therof ensued. Much about the same time, there came ambassadoes from the French king, Charles the seventh, not onelie desiring to have the old league betwixt France and Scotland to be ratified at that present by a new confirmation, but also to confirme the same with better assurance. Margaret eldest daughter to king James, at request of the said king Charles, was given in marriage unto Lewis the Dolphin, and eldest sonne to the said king Charles.

Anie great lords of Scotland were appointed to have the conveyance of hir into France, and great provision of ships made for that voyage, because the king was advertised that the Englishmen had a fleet abroad on the seas, to take hir if they might meet with hir by the waie. But as the hap fell, it chanced the same time, as the Scottish ships should passe, there appeared on the coast of England, a great fleet of Spaniards, which the Englishmen supposing to be the Scots, they came upon them with foure score vessels of one and other, thinking verelie to have had their wished preie, even according to their expectation: but being received with as hot a storme as they brought, they quicklie understood how they were in a wrong boie, and so thewlie amazed (as Hector Boetius saith) they sustained great losse both in men and ships, and in the meane time the Scottish nanie passed by quietlie without damage, incountering not one ship by the waie that sought to impeach their passage. There went 140 ladies and gentlewomen south of Scotland, to attend this ladie Margaret into France, amongst which number there were five of hir owne sisters.

In the meane time, whilste such things were a doing, Henrie Perrie of Northumberland invaded Scotland with foure thousand men, not being known whether he had commission so to doe from the king of England, or that he made that enterprise of himselfe. William Dowglaſſe earle of Angus, to resist this invasion, gathered a power of chosen men, amongst whom were Adam Hepburne of Hales, Alexander Ramsie of Dalchouſe, and Alexander Elphingston, with others. The earle of Angus being thus associat, met the Perrie at Wiperden, where a fore battell was foughten betwixt them, with great slaughter on both sides; but at length the victorie fell to the Scots, though there were slaine together with Alexander Elphingston, two hundred gentlemen and commons of Scotland: and of the English part there died Henrie of Cliddesdale, John Wgill, and Richard Perrie, with fiftene hundred other of gentle men and commons, of the which gentlemen, fortie were knights. There were taken also and brought home by the Scots as prisoners, to the number of foure hundred.

Hostlie hereupon, king James raised a mightie armie, and besieged the castell of Rockburgh, but when he had almost brought his purpose so nere to passe, that those within began to fall to communication, for the rendering of the place, the quene came to the campe in great haste unto him, signifying that there was a conspiracie begun against him, so that if he toke not the better heed, he was in great danger to fall into the hands of those that sought his life. The king doubting the matter, raised his siege and returned home to provide the better for his owne safety, but that prevailed little: for Walter Steward earle of Atholl, and head of the whole conspiracie, pretending ever a right to the crowne, by reason that he was procreat by king Robert the second on his first wife, procured his nephew Robert Steward, and his cosine Robert Graham, to ſea the king by one meane or other, which finally they accomplished in this wise. This Robert Graham, for diuerse wicked acts before committed, contrarie to the lawes and ordinances of the realme, was bounden to an outlawrie, so that if he were taken, he looked for nothing but present death, and therefore hated the king most deadlie. And though by the quenes diligence both his and other of the conspirators purposes were now disappointed, having continued to dispatch the king at the siege of Rockburgh; yet for so much as these names were not knowne, they hoped still to find occasion to achieve their detestable intention, with they were no more mistrusted than the others.

Whereupon the said Steward and Graham came one evening to the blacke friers of Perth, where the king as then was lodged, and by licence of the porters comming into the house, entered by into the gallerie before the kings chamber doore, minding to have staied there till one of the kings seruants that was p̄luie to their diuelish purpose should come, by whose helpe they were promised to have entrie into the chamber. But before the comming of this Judas-like traitor, an other of the kings seruants named Walter Straiton came forth of the chamber doore to have fetched wine for the king: but being aduised of these two traitors standing there at the doore, either of them hauing a long sword girded to him, he slept backe, and cried, Treason: but per he could get within the doore to have made it fast, they leapt vnto him, and slue him there outright.

Whilste this was a doing, not without great noyse & rumberling, a young virgin named Katharine Dowglaſſe (that was after married to Alexander Louell of Bolumie) got to the doore, and thut it: but because the barre was a waie that should haue made it fast, she thrust hir arme in the place where the bar should haue passed: she was but young, and hir bones not strong, but rather tender as a gristle, and therefore hir arme was sone crafht in sunder, and the doore broken by by force. Here with entering the chamber, they slue such of the seruants as made defense, and then the king himselfe with manie cruell and deadlie wounds [at 28 severall blowes.] The quene was also hurt as she was about to saue hir husband. Patrick Dunbar, brother to George sometime earle of March, was left for dead on the flore, by reason of such wounds as he received in the kings defense, doing most manfullie his uttermost deuoir to haue preserved him from the murthcrers hands. Thus was James the first murdered the 21 day of February, the 44 yere of his age, the 13 of his reigne, and from the incarnation of Christ 1426. His bodie was buried in the house of the Chartarars at Perth which he founded in his life time, but had not as yet thoroughlie finished.

Of this James I find written in his singular commendation, that he was for proportion of bodie of the middle stature, with broad shoulders, having the other parts also answering thereunto, as they neither seemed monstrous big to be wondered at, nor extreme small to be scoffed at; but carried the maiestie of a person, whom Aeneas Syluius (expressing the most excellent conformitie of members in this our king) doth terme to be squared or of euen proportion

tion, as the parts of a quadrangle or iust square do answer each other, so that nature seemeth not to haue framed a creature moze apt or excellent than he, either for shape of bodie, or for kinglie maiestie. He did manie times imbrace iustice moze streictlie and seuerellie, than well became a king, which ought to be called (and so in truth to be) the father and nourisher of the common wealthe. For he seemed so exactlie to measure all things by the rule of iustice, that he is said (within the space of thre yerres) to haue executed thre thousand persons for their committed offences. Although this may rather seeme to be a slander (than otherwise) grounded vpon no foundation, since all things seemed to haue bene performed by him in respect of sincere zeale of iustice, whereof this may be a sufficient argument, that he was of so mild and sweet nature, that was read not of ante of our princes that did moze reuerentlie imbrace peace at home amongst his subiects, or moze willinglie conclude the same abroad with strangers. What shall I say of his wisdom, which in manie and the greatest affaires did so manifestlie appere, that the kings of other nations did ioine in league and friendship with him: Of which wisdom, and of other his vertues (although he obtained part by the benefit of nature) he got the greatest summe by the learning & instruction which he purchased in England, when he was prisoner: at what time he was by the commandement of Henrie the king most diligentlie instructed. For he was there by the kings beneuolence so well trained in all sciences and gentlemanlie actiuitie, with the diligence of good scholemasters, that it is not easie to iudge what science he best vnderstood: for beside that he had skill in all kinds of musike (but most excellent in plaieng on the harpe) he was so good an orator, that nothing might be moze artificall than that which he spake: againe, he was a rare poet, in which he seemed not so much cunning by art, as furthered by nature, which is sufficientlie proued by verses of diuerse kinds (at this day remaining) composed by him (in Scottis méter) with that singular art, as he is thought fullie to equal the sharpenesse, grauitie, and wisdom of the ancient poets.

It is strange that I saie, and far beyond the diligence of the princes of our time, yea and almost beyond the opinion of men: but yet most true and confirmed by the testimonie of them which knew him well: and therefore to be written to his perpetuall praise. He did so exactlie in mind and memorie comprehend the depth of diuinitie and law, that therein he excelled manie, & in his time gaue not place to anie: to conclude, there was nothing wherein the commendation of wit consisted, or wherein anie shew of the liberall arts appeared, that he would not with great diligence applie his indoeur for the knowledge thereof, yea and that sometime to all mechanicall or handie-craft labors which were méet for a free man, which he is said most studiously to haue followed. But in the end, iudging it ouer base for kinglie maiestie to be exercised in these meane & inferior knowledges, he caused artificers of all sorts to be brought out of England, Flanders, and other nations, which should instruct our people therein: for by that means he perswaded himselfe he should in the end calme the rough maners of his nation, and that with these mild arts they would also receiue a mild and sweet condition of life & maners. Wherefore I may well say: A most happy common-wealthe which was gouerned by so worthy a prince: & may iustlie exclaime: O you most fierce and wicked rebels, that would by murder take away such an honor, beaultie, and pillar of the common-wealthe. Now, besides manie other things by him done, I will here (being better late than neuer) set downe this (not touched before) which is, that he was not onlie a beaultie to his countrie, in providing for his people to liue at quiet withyn bowes; but he also fought for the defense of his realme against his enemies without bowes: by artillerie, and other necessaries required for the warres. For the intention of guns hapning about his time, or not much before; he caused certeine pées of artillerie to be made beyond the seas in Flanders, of which there was one most especiall and great peece called the Lion, on the circumference thereof were these verses ingrauen, testifieng the antiquitie in like maner of the same:

Illustri Iacobo Scotorum principi digno, Regi magnifico, dum fulmine castra reduco, Factus sum subito, nuncupor ergo Leo.

John Maior
lib. 6. cap. 13.

The nobles and pées of the realme right sorrowfull for the death of this James, assembled together, and made such earnest & diligent search for the traitors before mentioned, that at the length they were apprehended and brought to Edinburgh, where they were executed on this maner. The earle of Atholl, which was not onelie principall in practise of this treason concerning the kings death, but also in times past was chiefe of counsell with Robert duke of Albanie, in making away of David the kings eldest brother, and after the kings returne forth of England did most earnestlie solicit him to put duke Mordo to death, with all other of his linage, trusting that when they were dispatched, he should find means to rid the king also, and his children out of the way, & so at length attaine to the crowne without anie obstacle. This earle (I say) was first stripped of all his clothes, saue onelie his shirt; and then was an instrument of wood, made like to the bawber of a well, set fast in a cart with a frame: at the end of which instrument, was the earle fastened and bound, and so caried about the towne, sometime hoisted on high, that the people might see him aloft in the aire, and sometime let fall againe with a swate dole upon the pavement.

The search made for the traitors.

The execution of the earle of Atholl.

After this, being brought to an open place, where most resort of people was, they crowned him with an hot iron, for that (as was said) a witch had told him, that before his death he should be crowned openlie in sight of the people. Although whose illusion being deceiued, he liued vnder vaine hope to attaine the crowne, directing all his imaginations to compass the means thereto. Thus was he serued on the first day. On the second day, he was drawn with his complices laid on hurdels, round about the towne at an horse talle. The third day, his bellie was ript, and his bowels were taken forth, and throwne into the fire sickering before his eyes, & then was his heart pulled forth of his bodie, and throwne likewise into the fire: and last of all, his head was cut off, and his bodie diuided into foure quarters.

The prophetic of a witch.

His nephew Robert Steward was not altogether so cruellie executed. But Robert Graham, for that it was knowne that he shew the king with his owne hands, was put into a cart, the hand that did the deed being fastened to a paire of gallows, which were raised by in the said cart; and then were thre persons appointed to thrust him through in all parts of his bodie with hot irons, beginning first in those places where it was thought no haste death would thereof insue, as in the legs, armes, thighes, & shoulders. And thus was he caried through euerie strait of the towne, and tormented in most miserable wise, and at length had his bellie ript, and was bowelled and quartered as the other were before. Christopher Claton also, and other that were of counsell in the conspiracie, were put to most shameful kinds of deaths, as they had iustlie deserued, few or none lamenting their case. the reuenge thereof, it is reported, that Aeneas Syluius (being then ambassadoz in Scotland for pope Eugenius the fourth to the said king James, considering the crueltie of such a wicked fact, with the spedie reuenge, therefore executed by the nobilitie) should say, that he much doubted, whether he ought with greater praise to commend them which reuen-ged the kings death, than by sharper sentence pun-nish those that had committed such parricide.] In the daies of king James the first, sundrie strange and monstrous things chanced in Scotland. At Perth there was a sow that brought forth a litter of pigs with heads like unto dogs. A colt also brought forth a calfe, hauing a head like a colt. In the harvest before the kings death, a blasing star was sene with long streaming beames. And in the winter following, the frost was so vehement, that ale and wine were sold by pound weight, and then melted against the fire. A sword was sene gliding vp and downe in the aire, to the no lesse dread than wonder of the people.

James the first made away through the traitorous practise of the earle of Atholl (as before is specfied) his eldest sonne James the second of that name being as then but six yeares of age succeeded to the croune, as lawfull heire to the same, and by his mother and the nobilitie of the realme was brought to Scone, where, by the vniuersall consent of the three estates he was crowned king of Scotland, being the 102 king of that realme from Fergus the first.
He was surnamed James with the fierie face, by reason of a broad red spot which he had in one of his cheekes. This James at his comming to mans state proued a stout prince, and married the daughter of the duke of Gelderland, as after shall appeare. In the beginning he had some trouble and businesse, by reason of the great authoritie and rule which the high barons of the realme sought to beare & mainteine, as the Dowglas, and other, but in the end he subdued them all.

Shortlie after his coronation, because he was not of himselfe able to gouerne, by reason of his tender age; the nobles and estates of the realme chose sir Alexander Levingston of Calender knight, gouernor of the king and realme, and sir William Creichton knight was confirmed in his office to inioy the same as he before had done, the king being committed to his keeping, together with the castell of Eden-burgh. Archembald earle of Dowglas remained in his countries of Dowglas & Annardale, and would neither obeye gouernor nor chancellor, whereby great trouble was raised within the realme. Within a short time also, the gouernor and chancellor were diuided. The gouernor with the queene remained at Striueling, but the chancellor had the king still with him in the castell of Edinburgh; and what the one commanded to be done, the other forbade: whereby neither of them was obeyed, nor anie execution of iustice put in practise, so that through all the countrie, reiffe, spoiles, and oppression were exercised without feare of punishment. The queene perceiuing such mischiefe to reigne throughout all parts of the realme, deuised a meane to aduance the gouernors side, and hereupon with a small companie repaired to Edinburgh, where she to bring hir purpose to passe, did so much by great dissimulation, that she persuaded the chancellor to suffer hir to enter the castell, and to remaine with the king; but within three daies after, she feigned one morning to go on pilgrimage vnto the White kirke, and caused the king hir sonne to be handsonlie couched in a trunk, as if he had bene some fardell of his apparell, and so packed vp, sent him by one of hir trustie seruants laid vpon a sumpter horse vnto Leth, from whence he was conueied by hote vnto Striueling, where, of the gouernor he was iustlie receiued, commending the queene highlie for hir politike working, in deceiuing so wise a man as the chancellor was. Then raised he a great power of his friends and well-wil-lers, and besieged the chancellor in the castell of Edinburgh.

The bishop perceiuing in what danger he stood through the womans deceit, sent to the earle of Dowglas, desiring his assistance against the queene and gouernor. But the earle refusing either to helpe the one or the other, alledging that they were both ouer ambitious in seeking to haue the whole gouernment of the realme in their hands. The chancellor then perceiuing himselfe desittate of all helpe, made agreement with the gouernor, vnder certaine conditions, that he should reteine still the castell of Eden-burgh vnder his possession, and likewise continue still in his office of chancellor. Shortlie after the earle of Dowglas deceased at Lethelricke, in the yeare 1439, against whom aswell the gouernor as chan-celloz had conceiued great hatred. He left behind him a sonne (begot of the earle of Cratozors daughter) named William, a child of fourtee yeares of age, who succeeded his father in the earldome of Dowglas, appearing at the first to be well inclined of nature, but afterwards by euill companie he waxed wild and insolent.

About this season, James Steward sonne to the lord of Loche, married the queene Dowager, and fauored the earle Dowglas in his vnrule demeanor: whereupon, both the said James and his brother William, with the queene, were committed to prison in the castell of Striueling by the gouernors appointment; but shortlie after they were released by the sute of the lord chancellor, sir William Creichton, and Alexander Seton of Curdon, who became suerties for their good abearing, vnder great seizure of sufficient band. About the same time, or rather somewhat before, Alane Steward lord of Dernlie was slaine at Palmis thorne, by sir Thomas Boid. And in the yeare following, the same sir Thomas was slaine by Alexander Steward of Bolmet and his sonnes; where through there rose great troubles in the west part of Scotland. William earle of Dowglas sent Alcolme Fleming of Cumernald, and Alane of Lowder, vnto Charles the seventh, king of France, to obtaine of him the duchie of Lowzaine, which was giuen to Archem-bald Dowglas at the battell of Wernouill in Perth; and the last earle, father to this earle William, had inioied the same all his life time, whereupon that sute was the sooner obtained: which made the young earle more insolent than before.

He kept such a pozt, and vsed to haue such a traine attending vpon him, speciallie when he came to the court, that it should seme he had the king in small regard; for he thought himselfe safe inough in mainteining the like state and pozt, or rather greater than euer his father at anie time had maintained before him: inso much as he would ride with two thousand horse, of the which number there were diuerse errant thieves and robbers, that were bozne out in their vnlawfull and wicked practises by the same earle.
Certaine captiues of the Isles, as Achlane, Apake-laine, and Murdac Clifton, with a wicked number of the inhabitants of the same Isles, haried, spoiled, and burnt the countrie of Lenox, and slue John Colquhoun lord of Lute vnder assurance. They also slue women and children, without respect of age or sex. In this yeare chanced a great dearth in Scotland, the like was neuer heard of before, and such a death by pestilence, that few escaped that were taken therewith, and so the realme was plagued with reife, oppression, death, and death of people. This yeare also the gouernor took the whole administration upon him, wherewith the chancelor was displeased, and leauing the king and him in Striueling, repaired to Edinburgh, where he deuised the way how to recover the king from the gouernor, and so on a morning took foure and twentie men with him, and rode to the parke of Striueling where the king was then hunting, and the gouernor absent at Perth.

Buchan. lib. 11.

At what time the chancelor with great courtlesie drawing towards the king, did salute him, being in some feare to see such companie come vnto him, hauing so few in his traine. Which when the chancelor perceiued, he praised the king to be of god comfort, and in few words (fit for that time) exhorted him that he should looke to himselfe and the kingdome, and deliuer himselfe from the imprisonment of Alexander the gouernor, liuing free from henceforth after a kinglie manner; that he should not accoustome himselfe to obeye the pleasure and couetousnes of others, that he should vse to command his subiects in all iust and lawfull causes; and that he should deliuer his people from these euils which increased vpon them, by the ambition and couetousnes of the rulers, which he could not now well remedie or resist, except the king would take on him the gouernement, the which to doe, he had without all danger or trouble provided a meane. For he had in a readinesse sufficient number therefore, which should attend vpon the king where so euer he would go, or to be anie other matter as need should require. Which the king taking with a pleasant countenance (either because the matter liked him well, or to dissemble the feare he had of the chancelor) did fullie approve, and went with his small unarmed companie and the chancelor toward Edinburgh.)

The king went with the chancelor to Edinburgh.

The chancelor (as Hector Boetius saith) had caused the number of foure thousand horsemen of his seruants, tenants, and friends, secretly to be ready that morning about the town of Striueling, to resist his aduersaries if they should haue used anie force against him: and now vnderstanding of the kings going thus with the chancelor, they came to him on the way, and attending him, brought him safely and without further trouble vnto Edinburgh, where he was iustly receiued. The gouernor when he was aduertised hereof, was grievously displeased; but because he knew not how to remedie the matter, he went to Edinburgh, and there got John James bishop of Murray, and Henrie Lichton bishop of Aberdene, to labor some agreement betwixt him and the chancelor: which they did in this wise: the king to remaine in the keeping of the chancelor, and the gouernor to continue his office. And so by this accord they were made friends.

The gouernor and chancelor are made friends.

Buchan. lib. 11.

During which tumults, William Dotoglas (that with a certaine pride of mind had highlie borne himselfe, disobeying the rule of the gouernor, & daring to soe in societie of the chancelor) did vnto the dedlie hatred of them both against him; for which cause they sake by all means vtterlie to take him awaie. For the doing wherof (to the end it might be performed without anie tumult) they appoint a parlement to be holden at Edinburgh; whither came not a few (as at other times in such assemblies it alwaies hapneth) but almost the whole countie came flocking thither, to complaine of the injuries which they had receiued: of which sort, there was such a miserable shew, that men could not behold the same without great motion of a pittifull mind: when euerie one for himselfe, the father for the children, the children for the fathers, and the widows for their husbands, did complaine that they were by the robbers spoiled of all their substance. Whereupon (as it happeneth alwaies through pietie of gentle hearts, to rue the afflicted) there arose great enuie against the captains and leaders of the wicked doers of such spoile, whose euils were now growne to such excess, as by no means they might be suffered; whose factions were so largelie spread ouer the realme, that none could defend their life or liuehood: but such as did yield themselves to their actions, and whose riches were so increased, as the weak could not well find anie helpe (in the authoritie of the magistrate) against their violence.

Whereupon it liked the wisser sort (since their force seemed not almost able to be broken, or their parts to be seuered) to sic to policie and leue strength, not daring openlie to call the earle Dotoglas by that name of capteine of them, although they well knew him to be the chiefe author and fantor of those people. Wherefore the gouernor and the chancelor (for a time dissembling the hatred which they harboured against Dotoglas) perswaded the whole parliament, that it were more conuenient with faire speeches to pacifie Dotoglas, than with the use of suspicious and euill words to stirre him to further heat: especiallie considering that he was of that great wealth and power, that he alone, if he stood against them, might hinder all the decrees of the parliament: but if hee joined with the nobilitie, there might be easie remedie found to salue all these present euils. Through which wise and subtil perswasion of Alexander the gouernor, it was decreed amongst them, that there should be honourable letters directed to him in the common & speciall name of all the nobilitie, which should admonish him, that being mindfull of the honorable place which he possessed (and of his worthy ancestors, by whom the common-wealth of Scotland had receiued manie singular benefitts) hee should repaire to the parliament, which well could not, and willingly would not, either keepe or determine any thing in the same without his presence. In which assemble, if hee would complaine of anie wrongs or griefes offered vnto him, hee should be satisfied so fullie as they might lawfully.

And if he or anie of his friends or familie had committed anie disordered part, the nobilitie there met would fullie remit the same, as well for the nobilitie of his, and the worthy memorie of the deeds done by his ancestors; as for that they rather attributed such actions to the inturie of the times, and the frailtie of his age, and the persuation of others, than vnto him, of whom there was conceived a singular hope of great towardnesse, for the aduancement of his name and benefitt of his countie. Therefore if he would come and soine with them, hee should receiue in gouernement what part, place, and office of the common-wealth pleased him, to the end that as in times past, their countie had bene manie waies deliuered out of most beaue dangers by the hand of the Dotoglasses, so at this present, the same might also by his presence and furtherance, be againe aduanced and strengthened from and against those intestine euils wherewithall it now fainted. The young man (by nature and age greedy of glorie) being moued with these flatteries, and the other perswasions of his friends (whereof euerie one was blinded with a certaine hope of god to happen to himselfe) they now deemed it best (forgetting all former dangers) to thinke vpon their priuate commodities, and with that resolution took their iourne to come to the parlement.

The chancelor when he vnderstood they were on their way, rode forth of Edinburgh manie miles to meet the Dotoglas, and courteously invited the earle to his castell of Creichton, which laie in his waie as he should ride, 'at which place he was most honourable intertained by the chancelloz. Where, when they had remained two daies, the chancelloz (after hee had shewed manie tokens of a friendlie mind vnto him) because he would bitterlie banish from the earle all suspicion of him, that he had anie mistike in the said earle) began familiarlie to persuade him, that (remembering the kings dignitie, and the office of him whome the lot of inheritance, their countrie lawes, and the consent of the parliament had aduanced to the gouernement and administration of all things) he should in all humilitie acknowledge him for his chiefe lord and king; that he would permit the large patrimonie obtained by the bloud of his ancessors to descend to posteritie by lineall inheritance as he himselfe receiued it; that he would clearelie deliuer the name and familie of the Dowglasses (no lesse famous for their dutie, than their deeds) not onelic from the filthie spot of treason, but also from all note of suspicion thereof; that he would restraime himselfe and his from offering iniuries to the weake and common people; that he would remoue from him all such as were giuen to robberte and spoile; that he would from henceforth applie himselfe to the defense of iustice, to the end that his former offenses (if there were anie) might rather be attributed to euill counsell of the wicked, than to the naturall disposition of himselfe: for so the repentance of his yong yeres might be taken for proofe of his innocencie in such euils. With these and such like speeches, declaring the faith of a well-willing mind, he allured the earle to come to Edinburgh with Dauid his brother partaker of all his counsels and actions.

This faire tale of the chancelloz, more than in times past or then becomed the place which he possessed, with the manie messengers sent to him from Alexander the gouerno: (to meet him on the way) almost euerie houre, draue a deepe suspicion in the heads of the earles companie riding with him to Edinburgh, of some trecherie to be ment towards him. Whereupon the same began to be blundered from one to another of the traine, and came so fast to the friends of Dowglasse, that some of them did bolde and liberallie admonish him, that he should remaine in that purpose (which once he did) to stae, to returne, and not to go forward with the chancelloz: and at the least (if he would aduenture himselfe) to send home his brother Dauid, to the end that he might not hazard the whole familie vnder the fortune of one stroke, as his father had before admonished him when he died. Whereat the vnadvised youth of this man, being moued to anger against his friends, did by the voices of some of his men (as it were by one that should make proclamation therfore) pacifie the secret murmurings that were amongest the companie; and answered such of his friends as found fault therewith, that he sufficientlie knew, that it was the common plague of all great families, alwaies to haue such men about them, as being impatient of quiet and ease, respect not the danger and miserie of their patrons, so it maie be commoditie vnto them: who because (they would not be restrained within the bounds of peacefull lawes) are authors of sedition, in which (when all things are in turmoile) they may the better wander abroad to satiffie their euill humors: whose speeches he regarded not, since he rather respected and trusted the approued wisdom of the chancelloz and the gouerno:, than the southfull & rash minds of such seditions persons.

After which (to cut awaie occasion from the rest to answer) he set spurres to his horse, and hastened his iourneie more than he did before, with his brother and a few of his other friends, taking his right course into the castell, and (as it were by a certaine destinie) casting himselfe heblong into the snares of his enemies. At such time as he came to the castell, the gouerno: (according to his promise) was readie there to meet him, to the end the matter might seeme to be wrought by common consent, and the weight of so great enuie might not light vpon the head of one man. Dowglasse being honorable and friendlie by the gouerno: receiued into the castell, was for dinner placed at the kings table. But in the midst of this sweet meat (sower sawce being prepared) there was a bulles head set before him, which in those daies was a signe of death. Wherewith the yong man amazed (and greatlie troubled in his mind, inwardlie repenting that he followed not the aduise of his followers) was about to rise from the table: but being apprehended by armed men (appointed to that function) he was caried into the court next to the castell, and was there (in reuenge and punishment of his vnbideled youth) beheaded, with his brother Dauid, and Malcolm Fleming, who (next vnto his brother) was in greatest credit with him. Whose death the king now entring into his adolescencie or yeres (as we tearme it) of discretion, is said heauilie with teares to lament, which the chancelloz (griewing to see) did greatlie rebuke in the king such vntimelie and inordinate mourning, for the death of his and the common-wealths enimie, whose life (said hee) would haue taken awaie all peace and tranquillitie in the realme.)

After the death of the said earle, the state of the realme became more quiet: for his vncle James Dowglasse baron of Abircozne that succeeded him, being a man of great stature, and verie fat, gaue himselfe to quietnesse, and liued but three yeres after. The foresaid William had but one sister, that was called the faire maiden of Callotway, and was married to one William Dowglasse, sonne to this earle James before his deceasse, that the heritage should not be diuided: because the earledome of Dowglasse was intailed vpon the heires male, and the lands of Wigton, Balwanie, Annardale; and Dumont remained to him as heire generall. This earle William, after the deceasse of his father earle James, began to waxe vnrulie, and to follow the vntoward maners of the other William Dowglasse latelie beheaded (as before ye haue heard) so that by support manie disobedient persons would not obeye the gouerno: and chancelloz, wher vpon fundrie great slaughters and oppressions were committed.

Againe (by the mariage of this earle William with his rich kinswoman) he did (besides his vnrulie behauiour) aduance himselfe in pride, wherof grew secret enuie, and of that rose open malice: but he incountering sufficientlie with them, partlie by force, & partlie by subtiltie, maintained his people in those oppressions and robberies, in despite of the proudest: which occasioned the nobilitie to iudge, that the said earle was proude of their misdeemeanors. Amongest which euill disposed companie, there was one John Cozmacke of Atholl, who (when he had infected all the countrie about him with this miserable plague of robberte) did set vpon William Kilmene (thiriffe of Perth, and had almost killed him) because he had led a theefe of Atholl to execution. But at the length (true men being alwaies better than theues) the thiriffe recovered the battell, and killed the capteine Cozmacke, with thirtie of his companie, and put the rest to flight into the mounteins.

In the yere 1443, not manie daies after, the castell of Dumoreton (which is not by strength to be subdued) was twise taken within a few daies: for Robert Semplier that was capteine of the inferior castell, stell, and Patrike Galbith captaine of the higher castell, did so diuide their gouernement of the said castell (being a thing of great circuit) that euerie one had a peculiar and seuered entrance into his owne part without offense of the other. But yet these two (as most part of the realme of Scotland then was, and as it alwaies, or most commonlie happeneth in the minoritye of the prince, when euerie one will be a king) wanted not their factions, whome they did follow: for Patrike was secretlie thought to fauour Dowglass, for which cause semplic, or (as some haue simplie) the other captaine perceiuing the part of the castell wherein Patrike ruled to be more negligentlie kept, than due to the state of the time required, found opportunitie to expell Patrike from thence, and to cause all his furniture to be caried out of the same, conuerting the said castell to his owne vse. In the end (the next day after) Patrike understanding thereof, and comming with foure vnarmed persons (to fetch awaie his furniture and household stuffe) entered into the castell; and first finding the porter alone, turned him awaie, then taking armes, expelled the others out of the higher castell: after which, calling aid out of the towne next adioining, he shut them also out of the inferior castell, and got possession of the whole castell to himselfe.)

The king will rule himselfe.

The king, after he came to the age of fouretene yeres, would not anie longer be vnder the gouernement of others, but toke the rule vpon himselfe. The earle of Dowglass informed thereof, came to him at Striueling, and put himselfe and all he had to remaine at his pleasure: whereupon the king receiued him, pardoned all his passed misdemeanors, and admitted him to be one of his speciall friends and priuie counsellors in all his affaires. By his perswasion shortly after, sir Alexander Leuingston, & William Creichton being discharged of their offices, were also put off from the councill, and all their friends banished the court, and they themselues were summoned to appeere before the king: which because they refused to doe, they were proclaimed rebels, and put to the hozne. The earle Dowglass then for the old grudge he bare them, raised an armie, and harried their lands. In reuenge wherof, sir William Creichton spoiled the earle of Dowglass his lands, so that great trouble was raised through the whole countrie, and the lands of Strabroke, Abircorne, & the towne of Blackneshe were burnt and destroyed.

1445. Lesle.

The earle of Dowglass ruled wholie about the king, & made Archibald his brother earle of Murray, by ioining him in marriage with a ladie of the house of Dunbar inheretrix therof. Forouer, Hugh Dowglass was made earle of Dumont. Thus the earle of Dowglass aduanced his name, and ioined in friendship with the earle of Crawford, with Donal earle of the Isles, and with the earle of Ross, to the end that ech of them should be assistant to others. In this meane time, the earle of Crawford at the request of the earle of Dowglas, toke a great preie of goods out of the bishop of S. Andrews lands in Fife, which bishop was called James Benedie, sisters son to king James the first: where through the earle of Crawford on the one part, and the earle of Huntlie with the Dgillies on the other, met at Arbroth in set battell, where the earle of Crawford was slaine, and diuerse barons on his side, although the victorie and field remained with his sonne, the maister of Crawford, who succeeded his father, and was called earle Weirdie. On the earle of Huntlies side were slaine, John Forbes of Pettlege, Alexander Berkleie of Gartulie, Robert Sparwell of Telne, William Curdun of Burrowfield, sir John Diphant of Aberdacie, and five hundred more on their side, and one hundred of the victors were also slaine, as Hector Boetius saith.

The same writer reporteth that the occasion of this battell did chance, through the variance that fell out betwixt the earle of Crawford eldest sonne Alexander Lindseie, and Alexander Dgillie or Dgillie (as some write him) about the office of the bailliffetwike of Arbroth, the which the maister of Crawford intoring, was displaced and put out by the said Dgillie. Whereupon the maister of Crawford, to recouer his right (as he toke it) got a power togither with helpe of the Hamiltons, and with the same seized vpon the abbacie, and Dgillie with helpe of the earle of Huntlie, came thither with an armie to recouer the place againe out of his aduersaries hands, and so vpon knowledge hereof giuen vnto the earle of Crawford, he himselfe comming from Dundee vnto Arbroth, at the verie instant when the battels were ready to ioine, caused first his sonne to slaine; and after calling forth sir Alexander Dgillie to talke with him, in purpose to haue made peace betwixt him and his sonne, was thrust into the mouth with a speare, by a common souldier that knew nothing what his demand ment, so that he fell downe therewith, and presently died in the place: whereupon togither the parties went incontinentlie without more protracting of time, and so fought with such successe, as before ye haue heard. The earle of Huntlie escaped by flight: but Alexander Dgillie being taken and sore wounded, was led to the castell of Fineluin, where shortly after he died of his hurts. This battell was fought the 24 of Januarie, in the yere of our Lord 1445.

The king thus ruled by the trope of the Dowglasses, the earle Dowglass sent to sir William Creichton knight, to deliuer vp the castell of Edinburgh. But Creichton (saing that the castell was committed to his gouernement by the whole realme, and that the king had not anie thing to doe therewith vntill he came to his full age) had all his goods shortly with confiscat to the kings vse, with his castell of Creichton, which the kings people entered into and possessed. But least they should seme to offer anie manifest wrong to the said Creichton, they gaue out the same edict (as a veile of their malice and ennie) which Creichton had before caused to be established and proclaimed. For he first of all others made a law, that whosoever did denie or resist the king, demanding the deliuerie of anie castell, should be in danger of treason; the breach and execution of which law did first come and fall by and vpon him, by whome that might be worthilie said (which is vsed to be spoken in common proverbe) He is fallen into the snare which he prepared for others. Whereupon the Dowglass (since the castell would not otherwise be deliuered) sharpelie besieged the same by the space of nine moneths, which in the end Creichton surrendered into his hands, on certeine conditions to be performed. At which time also the said Creichton was reinvested with the honor of the chancelorship, although he neuer after intangled himselfe with affaires of the kingdome, hoping that in time to come (when the darke clouds of the wicked men, which had now ouerspread all things, were ouerblown) a better forme of gouernement would be brought in, as a certeine light to giue shine to the common-wealth.

James Stewart a worthie knight (not he that was surnamed The blacke) was slaine at Kirkpatrick, two miles from Dunbreton, by Alexander Leslie, and Robert Boyd, whose crueltie not being satisfied with his blood, they laboured to bring his wife (great with child, & vpon point of deliuerance) with in their danger. For the performance wherof, they sent a priest vnto hir, that (in haste and as it were troubled) should tell hir in what distress she now rested, and that there was no means to relieue hir selfe by anie waie (since euerie place was beset with horse and footmen) vnlesse she escaped by boate to Robert Wold at Dunbretton, who further vpon oth promised hir, that he would safelie bring hir hacke to hir owne house.

The woman being credulous (and ignorant that Robert Wold was present at the death of hir husband) and caried out of Cardrossie, into the Dunbretton castell, might easilie perceiue hir selfe hardlie beset on euerie side by the deceit of hir enimies, who (being so deceiued and overcome with feare & grife) was deliuered of child before hir time, and (together with hir sonne) died there within few houres after. Almost at the same time, Patrike Hepburne (gouernour of Valis) held the castell of Dunbar, where he had Jane Seimer the quene with him, to whome she fled for succour in the times of these tumults. Archibald Dunbar (supposing this to be a iust cause of anger) in the night did set vpon Valis the castell of Hepburne, which he toke at the first assault, by scaling of the watch, who being stroken with a great feare for the same, did (in few daies after) restore the same to earle Dowglas, with couenant that all they which were within, should depart in safetie without anie danger.)

Sir James Stewart surnamed the Blacke knight, husband to the quene the kings mother, was banished the realme for speaking words against the misgouernement of the king and realme, wherewith he offended the earle of Dowglas. As he passed the seas towards Flanders, he was taken by the Flemings, & shortly after departed this life. The quene his wife being aduertised of his death, died also with in a while after, and was buried in the Charterhouse of Perth the fifteenth of Iulie, in the yere 1446. Her name was Jane Summerset, daughter to the earle of Summerset. James the first married hir (as before ye may read) in England. She had by him eight children, two sonnes, and six daughters, which were all honorable married: the first named Margaret, to the Dauphin of France: the second Cleane, to the duke of Britaine: the third, to the lord of Tuerer in Zealand: the fourth, to the duke of Austria: the fifth, to the earle of Huntley: and the sixth, to the earle of Morton. And by James Stewart hir second husband, she had three sonnes: John earle of Atholl, James earle of Buchanane, and Andrew bishop of Murray.

After the death of the quene, Hepburne deliuered the castell of Dunbar (to the king) being empty, and without companie. In August, Alexander earle of Crathor did put to death at Leadune John Leinton, as an ingratefull person to him, since by his fathers helpe he had bene advanced to great riches, and to the kings affinitie and kinned. Some after, sir William Creighton, with the bishop of Dunkeld, and Nicholas Oterburne a canon of Glasgou, were sent in ambassage vnto the duke of Gelderland, for his daughter called Marie, to be ioined in marriage with king James. Their sute was obtained, and the ladie sent into Scotland noble accompanied with diuerse lords both spirituall and temporall. At hir arriual she was receiued by the king with great triumph, and the marriage solemnized by the assistance of all the nobles of Scotland, with great banquetting, iollit mirth, and all pleasant intertainment of those strangers that might be.

In the yere 1447, there was a parlement holden at Edeburgh, in the which sir Alexander Leington of Balendar late gouernour, James Dundas and Robert Dundas knights, at the persute of the earle of Dowglas were forsaken and condemned to perpetuall prison in Dunbretton, and James Leington his eldest sonne, Robert Leington treasuro, and David Leington knights, lost their heads. James before his execution made a verie bolle declaration to the standers by, declaring the instabilitie of fortune, and change of court, exhorting all persons to beware thereof, with enuie euer followed high estate, and wicked malice neuer suffered good men to gouerne long. In the same parlement, sir William Creighton was also forsaken for diuerse causes, but principallie for that his seruants would not deliuer the house of Creighton to the kings herald, who charged them so to do. This forsalture was concluded in parlement by vertue of an act which the said William (when he was chancefor) caused to be made, and so being the first inuentor, was also the first against whome it was practised.

The yere next ensuing were sundrie incursions made betwixt Scots and Englishmen on the borders, Dunfreis was burnt, and liketwise Antwike in England: but shortly after a truce was concluded for seven yeres, great offers of friendship made by the Englishmen for to haue the wars cease on that side, because the warre betwixt them and France was verie hotlie pursued, and ciuill dissention disquieted the state of England, which was raised betwixt the two houses of Lancaster & Yorke. This yere there were manie meetings or parlements of the nobilitie, in which were lawes established for brideling the wicked facts of such as applied themselves to spoiling of other men; wherevpon a long peace followed in Scotland: beside which, there were other lawes made for auoiding of treasons, and chieflie of such as touched the kingly maiestie. This lawe of treason was afterward executed first vpon Dowglas, which was author thereof. In this parlement were manie earles and lords created, whereof the chiefe were Alexander Seton baron of Gordon, who was made earle of Huntley, and George Leslie baron was made earle of Rothsay, both men singularlie famed for their wisdome and valure.)

The English borderers of the west marches fetched a great botie of cattell out of Scotland, notwithstanding the truce, in reuerge wherof the Scots invading England, wasted the countrie, burnt towne and villages, slew the people, & with a great preie of prisoners, goods, and cattell, returned home into Scotland. Wherewith followed daillie robes and forraies made on both sides betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, and that with such rage and crueltie, that a great part of Cumberland was in manner laid wast: for on that side the Scots chieflie made their inuasions, because that from thence the first occasion of all this mischief might seme to haue the beginning. When such things were certified to the king of Englands counsell, an armie was appointed forthwith to invade Scotland, vnder the leading of the earle of Northumberland, and of one Magnus surnamed Redberd, a capteine of great experience, as he that had bene trained up from his youth in the warres of France. The Scots, because of his long red berd, called him in scozne and derision, Magnus with the red mane.

The Scots hearing of the approach of this armie towards their borders, leuied a power: George, or rather Hugh Dowglas earle of Dymont by the kings commission, having the conduction thereof, who vnderstanding that the enimies would enter in to Annardale, went thither with the said armie to resist their attempts. The Englishmen passing ouer the riuer of Sulweie and Annand, came to another riuer called Sarc, & there pitched downe their tents. And on the next day they began to rob and spoile the countrie on eche side: but aduertised that the Scots were at hand with an armie, they that were thus gone forth, were with all speed called backe to the campe campe by sound of trumpet, and forthwith their armie was brought into order of battell. Agnus with the red mane was appointed to lead the right wing, and sir John Penneinton a verie skillfull warriour gouerned the left wing, in the which the Welshmen were placed. The battell or middle ward the earle of Northumberland himselfe ruled.

The earle of Dymont on the other side ordered his battels in this wise. He appointed a verie valiant knight called Wallase of Craggie, with an hardie number of souldiers to encounter with Agnus. And against the Welshmen he placed the lord Maxwell, and lord Johnston, with a chosen companie of lustie Scottishmen, and commanding himselfe in the battell or middle ward, had scarce set his people in array, when the trumpets in the English armie began to sound to the battell. He therefore exhorting his men to doe valiantlie, put them in remembrance that they had put on armor, being thereto prouoked by iniurie which their enemies had first offered them, whereupon they might conceiue good hope of victorie by the fauour of the righteous God, who giueth the vpper hand (for the most part) to that side that hath iust cause to make warre. He willed them then to put all feare out of their hearts; and as they had force enough to vanquish their enemies that came thus to brag and threaten them with viter destruction: so he be sought them to shew no lesse manlike stomachs to deliuer their countrie by hardie fight from iniurie of the same enemies.

He had no sooner made an end of his speech, but that the arrowes came so thicke from the English archers, that the Scots began to looke about them, as it were to see which waie they might best escape by flight. But Wallase perceiuing their faintnesse of courage, with loud voice reprimed their cowardise, and with most pittie words exhorted them to remember their duties, and to follow the example of him their leader, whome they should perceiue to haue folliuowed to spend his life in defense of his countrie. The Scots herewith learned to be so encouraged, that they rushed forward with great egerneesse vpon the right wing of the Englishmen where Agnus stood, and so lated about them with speares, axes, and such like hand weapons, that with great slaughter they drave the Englishmen to breake array and to flee: Agnus herewith being more chafed than afraid, as should appere, pressed forward vpon Wallase with great violence, and seeking to approach vnto him that he might haue woken his griefe vpon him, was inclosed among the Scottish troopes, and slaine with a few other of his friends and seruants that folliuowed him.

The slaughter of this man, in whome consisted no small hope of victorie on the English part, put the residue of their armie in such feare, that they were not able longer to resist the Scottishmens violent impresseion, but turning their backs fled amaine, whom the Scots pursued in chase verie fiercelie, so that manie of the Englishmen died in the battell, but more now in the chase: for the tide being come in, staid manie of them that made their course to haue escaped thorough the riuer, whereby diuerse that ventured into the water were drowned; & other that durst not take the water, were oppressed by the Scots that followed them. There died in this battell of Englishmen, to the number nere hand of three thousand, and amongst other, Agnus (as before ye haue heard) with eleuen other knights of no small account and estimation. Of Scots were lost somewhat aboue six hundred. There were taken prisoners of Englishmen sir John Penneinton, and sir Robert Harington knights, and the lord Persie, sonne to the earle of Northumberland, who holpe his father to horsebacke, whereby he escaped by flight: & beside these, a great number of other were by the Scots taken prisoners, whome the sword and water had spared.

The earle of Dymont hauing got this honorable victorie, conueied the chiefest of the prisoners to the castle of Lochmaben, and after repaired to the court, where he was of the king iustitie receiued, honorable feasted, and highlie rewarded. After this, the Scots that dwelled vpon the borders, liued for a season in better quiet: for though the Englishmen wished to haue bene reuenged for this losse and ouerthrow of their people, yet by reason of ciuill wars that shortly after followed, they were constrained to forbear to make anie further wars against the Scots, till better occasion might serue. And for the avoiding of danger that might insue in time of this intestine trouble by foren enemies, they sued to haue a truce with the Scots, which for the terme of three yeares was granted. In this yeare, William earle of Dowglas, with a great companie of nobles and gentlemen, as the lords Hamilton, Craie, Salton, Seiton, and Miphant; also, Calder, Wighart, Cambell, Fraser, and Lauder, knights, went into Italie, and was at Rome in time of the Jubile which was kept there that yeare. He left behind him to gouerne his lands in Scotland, Hugh earle of Dymont that was his brother: but in his absence (by counsell of such as were about him) the king summoned the erle to appeare before him within 40 daies; & because he came not within that set time, he was put to the horne, & his lands invaded & spoiled.

Whereupon the king sent William Sencclare earle of Orkades at that time chancelor first into Galloway, and then into Dowglas, where he appointed collectors to take vp (to the kings vse) the reuenues of the Dowglas. But when Sencclare was not of sufficient strength to performe what he would, because some & the most part reieted (though others embraced) him, he returned home without doing anie thing. Wherewith the king greatlie moued (because he saw his authoritie contemned) called all the Dowglases into law, and declared them publike enigmies and detractors of his gouernement. And thereupon (prouiding an armie against them) he goeth into Galloway: where, at their first coming (since their captiues were all in prison) a small part of the armie (seeing the enemies dispersed into rougher parts of the countrie to hide themselves) turned backe to the king without anie thing done. Whereat the king highlie offended (in that such wandering theues should so lightly dare to contemne his power) followed them into their starting holes and caues, and with no great labor toke the castell of Lochmaben, reducing the countrie of Dowglas (with extream labor of his souldiers) to his subiection, at what time he leuelled the castell thereof equall with the ground.)

The earle aduertised hereof, with all speed returned home through England, and sent his brother James vnto the king, to know his pleasure: who commanding the earle to see his countries (namelie Annandale) purged of theues and robbers, pardoned him of all offences, and receiued him into fauor againe, so that he was also effionnes proclaimed the kings lieutenant; but shortly after going into England without the kings licence, to common with the king of England about the recouerie of losses suffered by the Englishmen by certeine inrodes (as he alleged) the king toke the matter in verie euill part, for that he should seeme so to be had in contempt of the earle: and withall he mistrusted also, least there were some secret practises in hand to the preiudice of him and his realme: so that he forned not a little towards the earle. Who being thereof aduertised, came

Herewith the quene also and other noble men made lute to the king for the earles pardon, so that in the end he was receiued againe into fauor, but yet discharged of bearing anie publike office, which pinched him so sore (namely for that his aduersaries William Cheynton lord chancellor, and the earle of Kinclie served to beare all the rule about the king) that he sought to dispatch the chancellor, procuring certeine of his seruants and friends to assault him on a morning as he was coming forth of Edenburgh, but yet he escaped to his castell of Cheynton, although wounded in deed right sore, and with in few daies after, gathering a power of his kinsmen, friends, & allies, he returned againe to Edenburgh, and had destroyed (as was thought) the earle of Dowglas at that present, if he had not shifted away the more speedlie, who being thus to his great griefe, and no small dishonor chased out of Edenburgh, deuised which way he might best be reuenged; and for the more easie accomplishment of his purpose, he procured the earles of Crawford and Koss to ioin with him in that quarrell against Cheynton and other his complices, by force of which confederacie they couenanted to assist one another against the malice of the said Cheynton, and all other their aduersaries.

The earle of Dowglas hauing concluded this bond of confederacie, bare himselfe verie high, in presuming further thereof than stood with reason: and this was one great cause of the kings displeasure now passinglie increased againe: the said earle. An other cause was this: a sort of theues and robbers brake into the lands of the lord John Herres, a noble man, and one that had continued euer faithfull to the king, taking with them out of the same lands a great botie of cattell. And whereas the said lord Herres complained vnto the earle of Dowglas of that wrong, because the offenders were inhabiting within his rowme, and yet could haue no redresse; he attempted to fetch out of Annandale some preie, where with to satisfie in part the wrong which had bene offered him by those linniers and robbers. But such was his euill hap, that taken he was with his retinue, and committed to prison, and shortly after by commandement of the earle of Dowglas he was hanged as a felon, notwithstanding that the king by an herald commanded the contrarie.

The king being sore offended herewith (as he had no lesse cause) passed ouer his displeasure with silence, till he saw time and opportunitie to reuenge the same: but in the meane season manie an honest man bought the bargain right dearelie, being spoiled of that he had, and other wise euill intreated, and yet durst not the meaner sort once complaine for feare of further mischief: where the higher powers also sore lamented the great disorders daile increasing, and yet were not able in anie wise to reforme the same, inasmuch as it was greatlie doubted, leaue the earles of Dowglas, Crawford, Koss, Murray, and other of that faction ment to put the king beside his seat. Which doubt being put into the kings head, brought him into no small perplexitie, whereupon by courteous messages he sent for the earle of Dowglas, willing him to repaire to his presence, flourishing then in Strimeling castell, which he refused to do, till he had assurance vnder the kings great seale for his safe coming and going (as some haue said). And then about Shrovetide in the yeare 1451, he came to the court at Strimeling, where the king toke him aside, & in secret talke moued and requested him to forsake the league and bond of friendship betwixt him and the earle of Crawford, and other such his confederats.

There was a secret murmuring amongst a number, that this earle of Dowglas purposed to make a prose on a day to get the garland beside the kings head. In deed by reason of his kinsmen and allies, he was of more puissance in the realme, than (as it was thought) stood with the suertie of the kings estate, unless he were the more faithfull. He had at the same time two brethren that were also earles, as Archibald earle of Murray, and Hugh, or (as other haue) George earle of Dumont, beside the earle of Angus, and the earle of Forthune, that were of his surname and blood, with a great number of other lords, knights, and men of great possessions and linings, all of the same surname, and linked in friendship and alliance with other the chiefe linages of all the realme. Hereto by reason there had bene so manie valiant men and worthy captains of the Dowglases one after another, as it had bene by succession) the people and commons of Scotland bare such good will and fauour towards that name, that they were readie to ride and go with them, they cared not whether, nor against whom. It is said, that the earles of Dowglases might haue raised thirtie or forty thousand warlike persons readie at their commandement, whensoever it had pleased them to call. In deed the Dowglases had euer the gouernement of all matters pertaining vnto the defense of the realme, so that the men of war had them still in all the estimation and honor that might be.

But now to the purpose, touching the conference had betwixt king James the second, and the earle of Dowglas: it chanced in the end (upon what occasion I know not) that the earle answered the king somewhat ouerthwartlie, wherewith the king toke such indignation, that the earle hereupon was slaine by him, and such other as were there about him, on Shrovetide. Then after the earle was thus made auaie, his brethren made open warre against the king, and slew all such of his friends and seruants, as they might incounter with: inasmuch that those which travelled by the high waies, were in doubt to confesse whether they belonged to the king, or to the Dowglases. The Lord of Cadzow being in the towne of Strimeling, with a great companie of the earle of Dowglases friends, in reuenge of his death incontinentlie burnt that towne, and did manie other great displeasures to the king and his subjects, setting forth proclamations against the king and his counsell, for the violating of the assurance granted (as before is said) to the earle of Dowglas.

And that with such despite, as in the 6 halends of Aprill, binding a wooden truncheon to an horses taile, they fasten thereto the safe conduct of the king and the nobles, which they forbore not to traile by and downe the streets (not sparing to reuile the king) with bitter and heauie words of contumelie and exclamation. With which not satisfied, when they were come into the market place, they did with the noise of five hundred hornes, and by the mouth of a crier, proclame the king and all such as were about him, faithbreakers, perjured, and such persons as were to be denounced enemies of all goodnesse and good men. And yet supposing this not a sufficient reuenge to quench the furie of their rebellious minds, they run with like rage, and with like order downe the countreys & possessions of all such as toke part with the king, and stood fast remained in the execution of their obedient dutie. So: they besieged the castell of Dalbeth, binding themselves (as conspired and perjured enemies of all vertue) not to depart from thence, the ice before they had taken and spoiled the same. being grievouslie offended with John the lord of that place, because that he with the earle of Angus had seuered themselves from the opinion & faction of the Dowglasles, whose furie growing still to extreme, found such support (by the inclining multitude) that the king was put to his shifts that he was determined to haue left the realme, and to haue fled by sea into France, had not James Benedic the bishop of saint Andrews caused him to staie, on the hope he had of assistance onelie by the earle of Huntlie, which earle hearing that the Dowglasles had gathered an armie in the south against the king, raised an other armie in the north to aid the king.

On the other side the earle of Crawford, hauing assembled a great power, incountered him at Birtumie, in purpose to stop the earle of Huntlies passage, where betwixt them was fought a sore battell, and the earle of Crawford chased into Forth, so that manie noble men, gentlemen, and commons were slaine, and amongst other the earle of Crawford's brother was one. Hector Boetius witteſſeth, that John Cullace of Bannamwin, whom the earle of Crawford had appointed to lead them that bare the bestell ares, (as I maie terme them) the bilmen, in the left wing of his armie, fled of purpose in the hottest of the fight, & so left the middle ward naked on the one side of the chiefest aid that the said earle had, and so the victorie by that meane onelie inclined to the kings standard, which the earle of Huntlie had there with him. But howsoever it was, the said earle of Huntlie had the honor of the field, who neuertheless lost diuerſe of his men also, though nothing so manie as his aduersaries did. This battell was fought the eighteenth of Maie, being the Ascension day, 1452.

The earle of Huntlie the same day before the battels ioined, gaue lands to the principall men of those surnames that were with him, as to the Forbesses, Leslies, Jonings, Ogilues, Grants, and diuerſe other. Which bountifullnesse of the earle made them to fight more valiantlie. In recompense whereof the king gaue to the said earle the lands of Badzenot & Lochquhaber. In the meane time, Archembald Dowglas earle of Murray burnt the peill of Straboggie, pertaining to the erle of Huntlie, and haried the lands thereabouts. In reuenge whereof, the erle of Huntlie at his returning backe, burnt & haried all the lands of the earldome of Murray. In the meane time, at a parlement holden at Edinburgh, the earle of Crawford was denounced a traitor, and all his lands and goods deemed to be forfeited into the kings hands. James earle of Dowglas, James Lord Hamilton, the earles of Murray, and Dummont, the lord of Baluay, and manie other of that faction, were by publike proclamation made by an herald, commanded to appeare by a day to vnderlie the law. But in the next night that followed the day of this proclamation, certeine of the Dowglasles seruants that were sent priuile to Edinburgh, to vnderstand what was done there, fastened writings vpon the church doores, sealed with the Dowglasles seale in this forme. The earle from henceforth will neither obeie citation, nor other commandement. Beside this, in the same writings, they charged the king with manie heinous crimes, calling him a murderer, perjured, false, and a bloodsucker.

The king therefore assembled an armie, and went forth against them: but because the time of the yere was contrarie to his purpose, he could do no great hurt to his enemies, although he burnt vp their corne, and drove astate their cattell. But the Dowglas seemed to passe little for the kings malice, and the erle himselfe married his brothers wife the countesse Beatrice, & sent to Rome for a licence to haue that mariage made lawfull: but by the kings agents in that court, the earles sute might not be obtained. Feuerthelesse, he kept his still in place of his wife, and continuing in rebellion against the king, the next spring, and for the more part of the tearme of two yeres next ensuing, he haried and spoiled the kings possessions; and the king on the other part wasted Annandale, and all other the lands and possessions that belonged to the said earle of Dowglas or his friends: but shortly after, as the king passed through Angus, to go into the north parts of the realme, the earle of Crawford came and submitted himselfe vnto him, craving mercie in most humble and lamentable wise, and obtained the kings pardon thorough mediation of James Benedic bishop of saint Andrews, and sir William Creighton; but the said earle liued not past six moneths after, departing this life by force of an hot ague in the yere 1454.

The same yere, the king called a parlement at Edinburgh, in the which James earle of Dowglas, and his brothers wife the countesse Beatrice (whome he had taken to him by waie of a pretended & feined mariage) Archembald Dowglas earle of Murray, George Dowglas earle of Dumont, and John Dowglas baron of Baluay, were forfeited & condemned of treason. The earldome of Murray was giuen to sir James Creighton, or rather restored to him from whom it had bene wrongfullie taken by the vniuersall sentence of William earle of Dowglas, who had procured it to be assigned vnto his brother the forsaide Archembald, though the right remained in the said sir James Creighton. But yet when the said sir James Creighton could not keepe that earldome without enuie of diuerſe and sundrie persons, he handled the matter so, that shortly after it returned againe to the kings hands. Whereafter at this parlement, George Creighton was created erle of Cathness, & William Haie constable of Scotland was made earle of Erroll. There were also diuerſe created lords of the parlement, whose titles were as follow: Darlie, Halis, Boid, Lile, and Lorne. After the breaking vp of the parlement, the king made a tourne against his aduersaries into Galloway, and with small adu brought all the castles of that countrie into his possession, and then turning into Dowglasdale, because the inhabitants thereof would not obeie him, he abandoned the spoile thereof vnto his souldiours, who practised no small crueltie against the inhabitants.

Whereupon the Dowglasles being diuen to their shifts, the lord James Hamilton of Cadzow was sent from them into England to sue for aid, but in vaine, for none there would be granted: whereupon returning to his friends, he counselled the earle of Dowglas to trust to his owne forces; and sith the same were farre superio: in number of men to the kings power, he gaue likewise counsell without delaye, to set vpon the king, that the matter might be tried by chance of battell, the onelie meane to assure them of their liues and estates, for otherwise he saw not how anie vnfeined agreement might be concluded, the matter being now passed so farre forth to an extremitie. But the earle of Dowglas vnderlie (as some write) refused to fight against his soueraigne and true liege lord, if any other meane might be found. Whereupon diuerſe great lords which were with him there on his side, being men of great wit, and no lesse experience, aduised him yet to keepe together his host, till by their trauell and assistance a peace were concluded, and pardon obtained for all parts: for if the armie were once broken vp, all hope was then past (as they alledged) for anie indifferent conditions

Here with also, the lord Hammilton being wiser than the residue, had the Dowglas farewell, and so departed, concluding that he should neuer see so faire a day againe, wherein he might haue cast the dice for the whole kingdome. And being thus departed from the Dowglas, he repaired to the king as then lieng at the siege of Abircoyne, who sent him to the castell of Kossleine, there to remaine vnder safe keeping with the earle of Dkenie, to whom the said castell belonged: but at length, the king did not onlie pardon the lord Hammilton of all passed offenses, but also receiued him into such fauor, that he gaue him his eldest daughter in marriage, as after shall appeare. But now vpon the withdrawing thus of the said lord Hammilton from the Dowglas, because the king had set forth an open proclamation of pardon to all those that would forsake the earle of Dowglas, the most part of the same earles compaignie departed from him, by reason whereof he fled into England, together with his brethren. The king lieng at the siege of Abircoyne, lost diuerse of his men, besides manie that were wounded; but yet taking first a strong tower, being one of the chiefest limmes of that fortrese, shortly after hee wane the rest.

The earle of Dowglas being withdrawn (as we haue heard) into England, within a while after got together certeine compaignies of men, and with the same returned againe into Scotland by the west borders, in hope to find friends in those parties: but such as the king had appointed there to defend the countrie, assembling themselves together, and setting vpon him, discomfited his people, slue his brother Archembald, and took the erle of Dymont prisoner, being first sore wounded. The baron of Baluay escaped into a wood, and so got away. The earle himselfe also (as Hector Boetius saith) escaped by flight, and got vnto Dunstaffage, where finding Donald earle of Kossle and lord of the Isles, he procured him (being of nature inclined and ready enough to follow such counsell) to make warre in his fauour against the king. And after he had once set him on worke, he got him backe againe into England. Donald waited not onelie the kings possessions that lay nere to Dunstaffage, but also passing through Argile, did much hurt in all places where he came. He invaded also the Ile of Arrane, and chased the bishop of Lismore, confreining him to take sanctuary. This done, he entered into Lochgabair, & so into Murray land, where he burnt the towne of Inuerness, and wane the castell by a guilefull traine.

In the meane time, the earle of Dymont after he was recovered of his hurts (as the said Boetius writeth) was presented to the king, and after he had remained in prison a certeine time, he was at length beheaded. Whereupon the countesse Beatrice, after she saw no hope left that the earle of Dowglas should recover his former estate, came to the king, and submitted herselfe, lateng all the blame in the earle, who had procured her vnto such vnlawfull marriage with him, being his former husbands brother. The king receiued her right courteously, and gaue to her the baronie of Baluay, to mainteine therewith her estate. Shortly after also the countesse of Kossle fled from her husband, & came to the king for feare of his husbands crueltie, whereof partlie she had already tasted. The king because he had made the marriage betwixt her and her husband, assigned her forth sufficient reuenues also for the maintenance of her estate. About the same time Patrike Thomson one of the kings seruants, but a fauourer of the Dowglas, slue John Sandlands of Calder the kings confine, and Alane Steward at Dunbretton, for that they fauored the contrarie faction: but the king getting the offender into his hands, caused him and his complices to die for their wicked offense committed. The vniuersitie of Glasgowe was founded about this time by one Turnbull, bishop of that see. In the yeare following, died William Haie earle of Erroll, and constable of Scotland: also George Creighton earle of Catnes, and William Creighton chiefe of that familie.

In this meane while, the earle of Dowglas remaining in England, procured the Englishmen diuers times to make rodes into Scotland, whereby he lost (as the Scottish writers affirme) the loue of his owne countrymen, when they saw him thus ioune with the Englishmen, to the damage of his native land. At one time, Henrie earle of Northumberland, and the said earle of Dowglas invaded the Scots, but taking little heed to themselves, and suffering their people to ride abroad to harie the countrie without order; Dowglas earle of Angus with a mightie armie of Scottishmen set vpon them, and put them to flight, slaying diuers, and taking to the number of seven hundred prisoners. Thus (as should appeare) the earle of Dowglas in vaine sought to disquiet his countrie, for all his friends in Scotland continued faithfull to the king, who had granted peace to all other of the Dowglas and their complices: for it was Gods will the matter should be taken by without more bloodshed, that the right line of the Scottish kings might be preferred. [For as it appeareth] he was amongst the English invading Scotland, subdued and taken by the barons John, Sten and Colpull, who presented him vnto the king, whereupon the king after a sort banished him into the monasterie of Lendoze, where he was bound fullie and honorablie receiued (according to his nobilitie) of the religious persons, in which place he liued manie yeeres, and then died.]

And though the almighty God might haue brought that to passe by other meanes, according as it should haue pleased his good will and omnipotent power; yet he chose this way, whereby the effusion of much blood might be auoided, which by ciuill battell had bene spilled, if the parties hauing their hearts filled with rancor & ire, had buckled together in battell. But the king vRING the aduise of his kinsman James Benedie archbishop of St. Andrews, compassed his purpose in the end, dispatching out of the way such as he anie waies forth mistrusted, of which number namelie were the Dowglas, whose puissance and authoritie not without cause he euermore suspected. Many haue reported (as before is said) that in the beginning king James the second, through feare of the great power of these Dowglas, was in mind to haue fled the realme, but being recomfited by the counsell and authoritie of the said bishop James Benedie, he advanced his studie to matters of greater importance.

James Benedie

The said Benedie turned the earle of Angus, being of the surname of the Dowglas, and brother to him by his mother, to take part with the king. He procured also diuers other of the same blood and surname, to reuolt from the other confederats, and to submit themselves vpon promise of pardon vnto the kings mercie; and so infexibling the forces of such as were aduersaries to the king, in the end he had them all at his pleasure. It was thought, that so much as the Dowglas had their lands lieng so vpon the west and middle marches of the realme, (that no man might beare anie rule in those parts, but onelie they themselves) if they had happlie joined with the Englishmen, considering the great intelligence beside, which they had in all other parts of the realme, that by kindred and alliance, the realme might might haue fallen into great perill: for trulie it is a dangerous thing (as lo. Maior saith) for the estate of a realme to haue men of great power and authoritie inhabiting on the borders and uttermost parts thereof. For if they chance (vpon anie occasion giuen) to renounce their obedience to their naturall prince & supreme gouernor, the pzelubice may be great and irrecoverable, that oftentimes theyreof insueth; as well appeareth in the earles of Sparch, and other before mentioned in this historie: and likewise in France by the duke of Burgognie, Britaine, and Normandie: for till those countries were incorporated and annexed vnto the crowne of France, the kings of that realme were oftentimes put to great hinderance through rebellion by them, whome they accounted for their subiects.

But now to returne where I left. After the Dowglasses were once dispatched, and things quieted, King James the second began then to reigne and rule reallie, not doubting the controulment of anie other person. For then he ordeined lawes for his people as seemed best to his liking, commanding the same to be kept vnder great penalties and forfeitures. And being counselled chieslie by the bishop of saint Andrews, James Benedic that was his vnckle, and the earle of Dykenie, he passed through all the parts of his realme, granting a generall pardon of all offenses passed. And so he ruled and gouerned his subiects in great quietnesse, and caused iustice to duilie to be ministred on all sides, that it was said in his daies, how he caused the rash bully to keepe the cow.

In the yere 1455, the king held a parlement, in which were manie god lawes made and established for the weale of all the realme, as in the booke of the acts of parlement is contained. He bled the matter also in such wise with the principall capitaine of the Isles, and of the hie lands, that the same were as quietlie gouerned, as anie part of the low lands, shewing all obedience as well in paceng such duties as they owed to the king for their lands, as also in readinesse to serue in the warres with great companies of men, as became them to do: Ipeciallie Donald lord of the Isles and earle of Ross, who had before ioined himselfe in confederacie with the earles of Douglas and Crawford against the king, and had taken into his hands the kings house, and castell of Inuerness (as before ye haue heard) naming himselfe king of the Isles.

After theselle, he was now at length reconciled to the king, and gaue pledges for his good demeanour, and afterwards brought to the king three thousand men in aid at the siege of Roxburgh, whose reconciliation was after this maner. When this Donald perceiued aduerser fortune to bessege him on euertie side, he sent messengers to the king, crauing peace and pardon for himselfe and for his offenses. Who comming before the king (and with manie humble speeches, remembering the manie parts of clemencie which the king had vied to the earle of Crawford, and such as followed his faction) they did so purge the fault of Donald (by transferring the same to the fatal rage and iniurie of the present times, and by promising in his behalfe that hereafter he should liue most quietlie in dutifull obedience) that they moued the kings mind to haue compassion vpon him.

But yet the king answered in a meane sort betwene both, not vterlie pardoning, nor flatlie reiecting him: for (saith he) there be yet manie thynges extant of his wickednesse, and he hath not giuen forth anie one token of a changed mind. Wherefore, to the end that we may beleue the same to be true (which you haue promised in his behalfe) hereafter to become a dutifull subiect and loving neighbour to vs, and to those which are about him, he must with repentance (proceeding from an brisened tong) craue pardon from vs whome he hath greuously offended, and (with sufficient restitution) recompense those whome (by spoiling) he had iniured: besides which also, he must with some worthy exploit wipe auaite the memoire and blot of all his former committed wickednes. And although I well know that no vertue doth moze besmeare a kinglie maiestie than clemencie, yet we ought so to prouide, that (measuring all things by the line of reason) the wicked war not so proud and rebellious (by ouer much lenitie and loose gouernement) as the god may be excited to the honest performance of their dutie by fauour and iustice. Wherefore I will inioine a time to Donald, and the rest of his associates, wherein they may openlie shew some deeds of an altered disposition, and from henceforth we will so account of him, as his works and not his words shall iustifie him to be. But in the meane time, I will him to rest in quiet, leaning it in the power of him and his, whether I, he, and they, will hereafter be accounted (by due deserts) happie or miserable. Which said, the messengers departed, and Donald rested satisfied.)

In the meane while great dissention rose in England betwene the two houses of Lancaster & Yorke; the king being principall of the house of Lancaster, was taken himselfe at the battell of saint Albons. But the queene with hir sonne the prince, and Henrie the yong duke of Summerset, with diuers other fled into the north parts of England, and sent to the king of Scotland to desire him of aid, who vpon good aduise taken with his counsell, for that king Henrie had euer kept well the peace with the realme of Scotland, and also for reuenge of his vnckle the duke of Summerset his death, prepared an armie of twentie thousand men to passe into England: and in the meane time all the north parts of England, hearing that king James was readie to support the queene of England, ioined with hir, and passed forward into the south parts, constraining the duke of Yorke to flee the realme, and so king Henrie inioined the gouernement of his realme againe, and for that time concluded an agreement with the duke of Yorke his aduersarie, which lasted not long.

The duke of Yorke remembering how readie king James was to prepare an armie in support of his aduersarie king Henrie, procured the borderers to make incursions vpon the Scottish subiects, & would suffer no redresse to be had, nor daies of truce to be kept on the borders, as in time of peace the custome was. Whereupon king James raised a power, and in person entered with the same into England, doing great hurt by destroing diuers towne, castles and pells in Northumberland, the bishoprike and other parts, till at length vpon faire promises made by the Englishmen, he returned into his owne countrie. [At this time, the art of printing was first inuented in the citie of Mentz in Germanie, but whether to great commoditie or discommoditie of learning, I leaue to the iudgement of others, saith Lellius.]

After this, king Henrie of England, percelating that the duke of Yorke by the counsell of the earle of Marlowe, ceased not to practise conspiracies against him, sent effsones to king James, requiring him of aid against them, and promised therefore to restore vnto the king of Scotland the lands in Northumberland, Cumberland, the bishoprike of Durham, and such like, which the kings of Scotland had held before. This offer was accepted, and by treaties and contracts accorded, sealed, and interchanged betwixt the two princes (as the Scottishmen alleadge.) desire to support him against the house of York, king James with a great armie entered England, but after that the queene in the meane time had slaine the duke of York, & got the upper hand of his enemies, at the same queenes request, he retired into Scotland againe. Peruerthelesse shortly after, when the earles of March and Warwicke sought still to mainteine their quarrell against the queene of England, he was constrained to withdraw into the north parts, and to desire king James to approach with his armie unto the borders: which he did, meaning to win the castles of Roxburgh and Tharke, which were amongst other things promised to be deliuered unto him by king Henrie, and so comming to Roxburgh, laied his armie round about that castle, and planted his siege in full warlike manner.

Where the king hauing great experience in knowledge of shooting great artillerie, departed from his campe, accompanied with the earle of Angus, and others, and came to the trenches where the great ordnance was planted, which he caused to be shot off. And here by great misfortune, this worthy prince James the second, was slaine by the slice of a great peece of artillerie, which by ouercharging chanced to breake, and slue not onelie the king standing somewhat nere it, but also hurt the earle of Angus, with other: being a notable president from henceforth, how such great princes approach so nere within danger of such peeces of ordnance, when they are shot off. He was thus killed the third day of August, in the yere of his life 29. of his reigne 24. and after the incarnation 1460. His bodie was buried with all funerall obsequies according to his estate, within the monastrie of Holie rood house at Edinburgh, the people generallie lamenting his death with no lesse sorow and dolefull mone, than as is sene in a priuat house for the deceasse of the welbeloued master and owner thereof.

In time of warre, amongst his subjects in the campe, he behaved himselfe so gentlie towards all men, that they seemed not to feare him as their king, but to reuerence & loue him like a father. He would ride by and downe amongst them, and eat & drinke with them, even as he had bene fellowlike with the meanest. He had issue by his wife queene Marie three sonnes, and two daughters. His eldest sonne named James, succeeded him in the kingdome; the second named Alexander, was created duke of Albanie; and his third sonne called John, was made earle of Mar. The eldest of his daughters the Hamilton had in marriage (as before is said) and also after shall be mentioned.

* All the time of the reigne of this king, christian religion did greatlie flourish amongst the Scots: for there were amongst them twelue notable and famous bishops, whereof the chiefest were James Kennedie bishop of saint Andrews, Turnebull bishop of Glasgowe, Thomas Spenser bishop of Aberdeen, and Henrie Lichon bishop of Murray. At what time likewise there were manie religious abbats that kept such great houses, as both the nobilitie and communalitie traouelling through out the kingdome, did neuer almost lodge in anie publike hosterie, but in the monasteries: which were neuer vered or spoiled, during the time of the ciuill warres of the kingdome. Beside these men of eminent learning, there flourished also Nicholas Desdone, and John Eldmaire, singular diuines, with manie other doctors laudable sene in all kind of learning. In the reigne of which king also, Charles the 7. king of France, for singular seruice done unto him by the Scots, in the warres (betwene the English and the French) did honorable indowment of the Scots (for recompense thereof) with manie rich possessions in Aquitaine, who by that meanes (setting themselves in that countrie) were the originall of manie wealthy families of that prouince, amongst which is that famous kinned of Caldell de la Campana in Colouise, at this time greatlie flourishing, which had his beginning from Caldell a thane (or baron) being knight in the north parts of Scotland: for the grands father of him which is now liuing, head of that house did intoe the place of magistrat or ruler of the Capitoline in that citie, hauing that title confirmed to his posteritie. This mans sonne Peter Caldell being a senator in the high court of Colouise (commonlie called the parlement) was for his singular learning and wisdom had in great hono: of all men during his life, which stretched to extreme age. In whose place came John (the eldest sonne of the said Peter) who doth at this day possesse the roine of his father, as a senator of the said court of Colouise. And his other children with great hono: are indued with other offices of gouernement in the said citie.)

Some strange sights there appeared before the death of this king James the second: for the day before he was slaine, a blazing star was plainly sene, which signified (as was thought) the death of the said king. In the yere before the siege, there was in Dundee an hermaphrodite, that is, a person with both shapes, but esteemed for a woman onelie, till it was proued, that lieng with his maisters daughter nightlie where she dwelt, she had got the young damsell with child: for the which act, because she had counterfeited hir selfe a woman, and yet had wrought the part of a man, she was condemned to be buried quickie, and suffered according to that indgement. At the same time, there was a certeine theefe, that with his familie liued apart from the companie of men, remaining secretlie within a den in Angus called Fensiden, who bled to kill young persons, and to feed on their flesh, for the which abominable offense, being apprehended with his wife and all his familie, they were burnt to death. One of his daughters that was scarce twelue moneths of age, onelie excepted, the which being preserved and brought vp in Dundee, before she came to the age of twelue yeres, she was taken in the like crime for the which her father died, whereupon she was iudged to be buried quickie: and going to execution, when the people in great multitudes followed hir, in wondering at so horrible an offense committed by one of hir age and sexe, she turned to them that thus detested hir wicked doing, and with a countenance representing hir cruell inclination, said to them: What need you thus to raike vpon me, as if I had done an heinous act contrarie to the nature of man? I tell you, that if you knew how pleasant mans flesh is in taste, there would none of you all forbear to eat it. And thus with an impitent and stubborn mind she suffered the appointed execution.

After the death of James the second, his sonne James the third a child of seven yeres of age succeeded, and shortly was sent for to the siege of Roxburgh, whither he was conueied by the queene, a woman of a stout stomach, representing the manlike race of his countrie Gelderland, of the which she was descended. For comming with hir sonne thus to the siege, she spent not time in lamenting and womanly bewailing the irrecoverable losse of hir husband, but rather in comforting the lords, whose part had bin to haue comforted hir: and aboue all things she exhorted them with all diligence to imploy their whole indouers and forces to the winning of that castle. Whose words so encouraged the capitains and whole armie, that the siege was continued till the castle was wonne, rased, and beater downe flat to the ground: and the young king was crowned at at Kelso, with the vniuersall consent and great re-loising of all the noble men, and other being there present in the armie.

This done, they besieged the castell of Marke, which likewise they toke, and threw downe, and afterwards the king with the nobles of his realme came to Edinburgh, to take order for the quiet gouernement of the realme. And because the king was young, there were chosen seuen regents to gouerne both king & realme, as these, the quene his mother, James Benedie bishop of S. Andrews, that was sisters sonne to James the first, the bishop of Glas-cow, the earles of Angus, Huntley, Argyle, and Mkenzie. These, so long as James Benedie liued, agreed well together about the gouernement of the realme; but within a while after his decesse, they fell at square, or rather before, as appeareth by Hector Boetius, who saith, that in the second yere of this kings reigne, there was discord in bzeuwing betwixt the quene and the archbishop Benedie, who perceluing that the woman sought to vsurpe wholie the gouernement vnto hir selfe, withstod hir in that behalse, in so much that it was doubted least the matter would haue broken forth into some ciuill warre, if the bishops of Glascow, Dunkeld, and Aberden, and certeine abbats had not taken in hand to trauell betwixt the parties for an attonement, who did so much in the matter, that they compounded the variance in this wise.

The quene mother was appointed to haue the charge of the kings person, and of his brethren, Alexander duke of Albanie, and John earle of Mar, and likewise of his two sisters: but as for the administration and gouernance of the realme, the should leaue it vnto the pæres. There were therefore elected by common consent as rulers, the bishops of Glascow and Dunkeld, the earle of Mkenzie, the lord Graham, Thomas Boid, and the chancelor. About the same time, one Alane Beir, in hope to get the heritage of his brother, John lord of Lozne toke him, and kept him in prison. But Colen Campbell earle of Argyle, taking great indignation with so presumptuous a part, gathered a power, and coming against Beir, toke him, and set his brother at liber-tie, and brought the offendor vnto Edinburgh, where he died in prison. Afterward, hostlie after Donald lord of the Ales and earle of Ross, who had serued obedientlie in the armie at Korburch, and was (as outwardlie appeared) well reconciled, began aneto to vse his old manners, spoiling & harrieng the whole countrie of Atholl, and toke the earle thereof, and the countesse his wife captiues with him into the Ales.

To repress his inturious attempts, the regents together were preparing an armie; but therewith came true aduertisements, that the said lord of the Ales, and other the principall offendors of his com-panie, were stricken through the hand of God with a certeine frensie or madnesse, and had lost all their ships and spoiles in the sea, so that the earle of Atholl and his ladie were restozed, and those frantike persons were brought vnto saint Brides church in Atholl, for the reconerie of their health, but it would not be. Donald himselfe was afterward slaine in the castell of Inuernes by an Irishman that was a minstrell. In the yere 1461, Henrie the first king of England being vanquished by his aduersarie Edward the fourth, purchased of king James the third a safe conduct for himselfe and a thousand horse to enter into Scotland; and hereupon he came to Edinburgh, and was lodged in the house of the fir-ers preachers, with his wife quene Margaret, and his sonne prince Edward. There was also with him the duke of Excester, and the duke of Sum-merset, with manie other of the English nobilitie.

And to the end this firme amitie thus begun, might more increase, and be further strengthened: the two quenes Margaret (of England) and Marie (of Scotland) both French (by birth and nature) began to intreat of a marriage (hoping by amitie to establissh that perfect amitie) to be solemnized be-twene the daughter of James the second king of Scots, and the sonne of Henrie (king of England) being called prince of Wales, although none of them as yet was above seuen yeares old. Which marriage, Philip duke of Burgognie (uncle to the quene of Scots, and deadlie enimie to the quene of England) labored by all means to hinder, by his ambassador Cruthusius, a noble man and of great iudgement; for this Philip did vse such bitter enmi-tie against Reinold, grandfather to the son of king Henrie by the mothers side, that he did depelle enuie anie good successe to happen to anie of that race, whereby it might increase or flourish; and therefore sought occasion by all deuile to hinder it: for whose cause, and at whose request, the said marriage was at that time rather deferred, than utterly broken off.
But the end thereof (which was greatlie feared by this Philip to be the consummation of the marriage) was by the aduerse fortune of king Henrie utterly disappointed. For (as after shall appear) this Henrie being incouraged (by the benenolence of the Scots towards him) and thoughtlie confirmed (by the letters of his friend sent vnto him) dispatched his wife into France to Reinold hir father, to procure that aid the could of hir friends beyond the seas, to helpe to restore him to the kingdome: which iourne succeeded not to hir in vaine, obtaining succor from thence.)

The same time, king Henrie deliuered the towne & castell of Berwolke into the Scottishmens hands, whether by couenant thereby to haue the foresaid safe conduct granted, or of his own voluntarie will, to the end he might haue the more support and fauor amongest them, it is vncertaine by the variable report of writers. Neuerthelesse, shortly after a truce was taken betwixt king James and king Edward, for the terme of fiftene yeares, vpon what conditions or promises made on king Edwards part I find not. This truce was concluded in the moneth of Maie, in the yere 1462, at the citie of Poitie, whither had bin sent the bishop of Glascow, the earle of Argyle, keeper of the priute seale, the abbat of Wor-le rod house, sir Alexander Boid, and sir William Crawton knights, ambassadors and commissioners for king James.

All things in this season were ordered in Scotland by the aduise and counsell of James Benedie bishop of saint Andrews, a man of great wisedome and policie, as well appeared in his prudent & sage gouernement of the realme, as well during the mi-noritie of this James the third, as also in the daies of his father king James the second. Pierre de Bezeie, otherwisse called le Seigneur de la Marrenne, great seneschall of Normandie, was sent by the French king Letwes the eleventh, with two thousand fighting men, to aid the part of king Henrie against king Edward. This Bezeie was one most in fauour with king Charles the seventh, father vnto the said king Letwes, and therefore (as manie did suppose) he was appointed by k. Letwes (who greatlie loued him not) to be chiefe in this iourneie, to the end his life might be put in hazard and aduenture; notwithstanding, after some danger both of tempest on the sea, and also of the enimies hands, he wan the castels of Hamburg and Dunstanburgh, which he cast to the ground, and after toke in hand to kepe the castell of Antwike, and being besieged therein the most able ho[m]emen in all his armie, and com-the day, took the Frenchmen away with him into Scotland: the English armie that lay there at siege beholding the maner, and not once making p[ro]fer that would faine have fought with the Scots; but other (whose counsell was followed) were otherwise minded, alleging that better it were to let them passe without encounter, sith they left the castell void, than to leopord upon the doubtfull chance of battell, for though their number were not great, yet were they picked and chosen men, able to atchieve a great enter-

After this, the sixteenth of November, in the yeare 1463, the queene of Scots, mother to James the third, died at Edinburgh, and was buried in the college of the Trinitie, which the hir selfe had founded. This woman, after the deceasse of hir husband James the second, lived somewhat dissolute, procurring Adam Hepburne of Wales a married man to keepe hir such familiar companie, as sounded great-lie to hir dishonour: for that she could not withyn the whole realme find some single man amongst all the nobilitie, with whom she might have married, & in some sort to have avoided the greater open slander & infamie. In the same yeare, Alexander duke of Al-banie, and brother to the king, was taken on the sea by the Englishmen in the moneth of June, as he was returning from his grandfather the duke of Gilder: but the bishop of saint Andrews James Benedicte, caused both the said duke and also the ship, with all the goods there in being, at the time of the taking of it, to be released; for otherwise (as he flat-lie protested) he would not keepe the truce anie longer concluded betwixt the two realmes.

The duke of Summerfet, in hope of great fauor which he should find in England, perswaded king Henrie to passe thither, and with a great companie of Scottishmen he entered England, and manie of the north parts resorted unto him: but at length, at his comming to Exam, the lord Pontacute with a great plover was readie to give him battell, and there discomfited him and his whole armie. The duke of Summerfet and the lords Hungerford and Kosse were taken and put to death; the duke at Exam, and the lords at Melkessell. King Henrie escaped verie hardlie into Scotland againe, and there remained a certain space after, till at length he thought to returne into England in such secret wise, as he should not have bene once knowen, till he might have got amongest his friends, which would have supported him: but such diligent watch was laid for him all alongst the borders, that he was espied, taken, and delivered to king Edward his aduersarie, who shut him up in the tower of London till he was at length there made away, as in the historie of England ye may see more at large.

In the yeare 1466, that famous bishop James Benedicte departed this life, and was buried in the college of saint Sauour, founded by him within the towne of saint Andrews in most sumptuous wise. This prelat in prudent policie excelled all other Scottish bishops, of whome anie writer maketh mention. He kept the realme in good quiet, and observed the truce concluded with the Englishmen, to the great weale and commoditie of the poore commons. He was verie rich, as appeared by sundrie buildings and works which he left behind him, as a memorie of his name. [Whereof the three especiall things for rarenesse and magnificence, were his college of saint Sauour (wherein youth might be trained to learning and religion) the other his sepulchre, wherein he was buried (being a stately piece of work, such as before had not bene accustomed for bishops of Scotland) & the third was a ship of won-derfull burden: all which three, the common people affirmed were of one price, and stood him in like charge.] Besides his bishopricke, he held in his hands the commandarie of the abbey of Pettinewme, which was worth unto him eight hundred crowns by yeare. [Afterward, at the parlement holden in October and Januarie, there were manie edicts made for the benefit of the commonwealth, & chief-lie for the estate of the merchants; at what time also there was a proclamation made, that none of the Englishmen should beare anie office, nor receiue anie benefice or benefit in Scotland.]

In the yeare 1469, on the tenth day of Julie, king James the third, being as then about twentie yeares of age, married in the abbey of Holierood house nere Edinburgh, the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Denmarke and Polande, which ladie was at the same time not past twelue yeares of age, some saie sixtene. Hir father the king of Denmarke and Polande, in name of hir dowry, transported and resigned to B. James all his right, title, and interest which he pretended to the out Isles.
The ambassadoys that were sent into Denmarke to conclude this mariage, and to conueie the bride into Scotland, were these: Andrew Budest bishop of Glasgow, the bishop of Dykne, the lord Anandale chancellor of Scotland, and Thomas Boid earle of Arrane, who had married the kings sister, and was now in his absence run into the kings displeasure; whereof his wife hauing intelligence, hearing of hir husbands arrivall with the other in the Forth, got out of Edinburgh, & comming on shipboard to him, gaue him to vnderstand what displeasure the king had conceiued against him: who perceiving himselfe in what danger he stood if he took land, returned backe into Denmarke, taking his wife with him.

The king herewith was so offended, that he cauof high treason, and sent for his sister backe into Scotland, causing a divorce in absence of hir husband to be sued & gotten forth against them, marrying hir afterwards to James lord Hamilton, to whome he gaue the earldome of Arrane, which hir former husband had in gift before. Of this mariage, those of the house of Hamiltons are descended, & are nearest of blood to the crowne of Scotland, as they pretend.

[For as saith Lelleus, lib.8. pag.316] if the line of the Stewards faile, the crowne is to come to them.] But now to shew further what we find written concerning the maner and cause of the banishment of the afore remembred Thomas Boid, Giouan Ferre-rio, in his appendix of the Scottish historie annexed unto Hector Boetius lastlie printed at Paris in the yeare 1574, agreeth not with that which ye haue red before. For as he telleth the tale, the said lord Boid being one of the gouernors of the realme, elected thereto (as before ye haue heard) within short time grew so far in fauor with the king, that he might do all things with him at his pleasure, although his as-sociats in authoritie did neuer so much go about to hinder his deuises: by reason whereof, he seemed to vsurpe the whole rule & administration of the realme into his owne hands, soze to the griefe of those his said associats being ioined with him in like office.

the dissention thus bred among the gouernors, was brought into a miserable plight; for justice in most places wanted his due course, so as thieves and robbers taking boldness thereof, not onely upon the borders, but also elsewhere, began to exercise great outrage, to the breach of publike peace, and namelie the inhabitants of the out Isles fell to their wonted trade of pilfering, so that passing over in their long boats or barges, and landing here & there on the shore, they took prizes of cattell and other goods, greatlie to their profit, and no lesse damage of the people that inhabited on the coasts over against them. In the north parts also, seditious tumults amongst the nobles, gentlemen, and people were raised, to the great disquieting of the whole countrie. Such disorders continued no small time, and because the said Thomas lord Boid bare greatest rule about the king, the blame (as it commonlie happeneth) was imputed to him.

At length, when the king was grown to ripe yeares, and able to see to the administration of the common-wealth himselfe, he was admonished by certaine graine personages to have some regard, that such misorders as disquieted the whole state of the realme, might be reformed. Hereupon he called a parlement, in the which, whether through envie that the lords had conceived against the lord Boid, or for that his doings no lesse deserved such complaint, was exhibited by generall voices of the states against him, that it was decreed by authority of the whole assemblie, that he should come to answer in judgement such crimes wherewith he was charged; but when he refused so to do, and in contempt of the kings authority got together a power of armed men to defend him from iniurie, that might seeme (as he pretended) to be offered him: at length, the king was driven of necessity to make preparation for the sending of an armie to apprehend him by force. Whereof Boid being advertised, fled into England, because he perceived himselfe not able to resist the kings power. The king assured that he was thus avoided out of his realme, banished him for ever, and seized upon his lands and goods as forfeited.

bishop of Glasgowe, William bishop of Dkeneie, Andrew lord of Anandale chancelor of the realme, Martine Wane the great almoner, & the kings confessor, Gilbert de Kericke archdeacon of Glasgowe, David Creighton of Craufon, & John Shato of Hali. These ambassadors being dispatched into Denmarke in Julie, in the yeare aforesaid, came at length to Haffnen, where B. Christierne then remained, and were of him sofullie received, & well heard concerning their sute, in so much at length, after he had proponed the matter to his counsell about the eight of September, it was agreed in this sort, that the ladie Margaret, daughter to the said king Christierne, should be given in mariage unto B. James of Scotland, and that the Isles of Dkeneie, being in number 28, and likewise the Isles of Shetland, of which there are eightene, should remaine in possession of the kings of Scotland, till either the said king Christierne or his successors in name of the mariage should pay unto king James, or to his successors, the summe of fiftie thousand dozens of the Rheine. This mariage was thought, by reason of this ingaging of those Isles, right profitable unto the realme of Scotland, because of the controuersie and variance which had continued long before those daies betwixt the kings of Scotland and Denmarke, about the right of possessing those Isles.

In the moneth of November next ensuing, after the mariage had bene consummate in Julie before, within the abbacie church of Holie rood house (as before ye haue heard) or in saint Giles church in Edinburgh (as other write) the three estates were called to assemble in Edinburgh, where the quene was crowned, and the parlement holden, the most part of the lords remaining still in Edinburgh all the next winter: and in the summer following, the king and quene made their progresse into the north parts, and were honozable received in the principall cities and towne where they came, and likewise by the nobles of the countrie, to the great reioicing of the whole realme. After their returning to Edinburgh, the king called a parlement in the moneth of Maie 1471, in the which among other things it was ordeined, that the lords, barons, and burroughs of the realme, should build ships and boats, and provide nets for fishing. Also it was ordeined that none should weare silks in dublet, gowne, or cloake, except knights, minstrels, & heralds; except they might dispend one hundred pounds in lands by yeare: and that the football and other unlafulfull games should be debarred, and the exercise of shooting mainteined. James eldest sonne to king James the third, was borne the tenth day of March, in the yeare 1472, who afterwards succeeded his father, and was called James the fourth. Christierne B. of Denmarke, to congratulate the happie birth of this young prince being his nephue by his daughter, released all the right, title & claime which he or his successors might haue to the Isles of Dkeneie and Shetland.

A strange comet or blasing starre (as we call it) appeared in the south, from the seventeenth day of Januarie, unto the eighteenth of Februarie, and was placed betwixt the pole and the pletades, that is to say, the seven starres. A great ship built by B. nedie the late archbishop of saint Andrews, called the bishops barge, broke and was lost beside Banburgh, being fraught with merchandize, the twelfth of March. Many merchantmens servants and other passengers were drowned with it, some escaped by boat, and were taken by the Englishmen, among whom was the abbat of saint Colme, who was constrained to pay unto his taker one James Iar four score pounds for his ransome per he could be suffered to depart. vacant, the count chose one of their owne monks called Alexander Thomson, and the king promoted Henrie Treichton abbat of Dalley therunto, whom the pope admitted, & Robert Schaw parson of Spintock was preferred by the king vnto the abbacie of Dalley, and then in such wise began promotings of secular priests to abbasies at the princes request, and the laudable elections ancientlie vsed, made void: because the court of Rome admitted such as the princes made sute for and named, getting great rewards and notable summes of monie thereby, so that neither the bishops durst admit such as the counts elected, nor such as were elected durst pursue their right, and so the abbasies were bestowed vpon such as followed the court, and liued courtlie, secularlie, and voluptuouslie, to the great slander of religious men, which by the naughty examples of their gouernors fell to the works of wickednesse, where vpon daily much euill increased, and vertue in all estates decayed.

1477. An inquisitor sent from the pope.

This yere in September, the indulgence of the see of saint Andrews was published by Patrike Graham bishop thereof, and the same see erected into the dignitie of an archbishops see, at the sute of the said Patrike, who gaue information to the pope, that because the archbishop of Forke was metropolitan of Scotland, and that there was oftentimes warre betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland, the Scottishmen could not haue access to their metropolitan, spe ciallie in cases of appellation. And therefore the pope (as some write) thought it reason to make saint Andrews primate and metropolitan of Scotland, and ordeined that the twelue other bishops of Scotland should be vnder his primasie, who would not agree thereto, but promised the king by way of a taxation eleuen thousand marks for his maintenance against the said archbishop: and the prelates sent to Rome about this matter. This yere was a great death in the realme of Scotland, so that where a parliament was called in September, it was proroged untill the twelue day after Christmas. In Januarie the parlement was holden at Edinburgh, in which John lord of the Isles and earle of Ross was attainted, partie for his owne euill deeds, but most speciallie for the defaults of his father Donald lord of the Isles.

In Maie, in the yere 1477, the king raised a puissant armie of the most able men vpon the north side of the water of Forth, to pursue the lord of the Isles both by sea and land. The earle of Crawford was made admerall of the armie by sea, and the erle of Atholl the kings vnckle by his father was lieutenant of the armie by land. But such meanes was used by the earle of Atholl, that the lord of the Isles humbled himselfe to the kings pleasure, vpon certeine conditions; and therevpon in the beginning of Iulie next ensuing, the said lord of the Isles came to the parlement vnto Edinburgh, and there was the agreement made and confirmed betwixt the king and him: he resigned into the kings hands all the right he had to the earledome of Ross, the lands of Cantire and Innapden, which earledome the king annetherd to the crowne, and pardoned him and his seruants of all offenses and transgressions before that day committed, and inuested him anew in the lordship and seigniorie of the Isles, and other his lands not released, to hold the same of the king by the seruice of ward and reliefe. The king also gaue vnto the earle of Atholl for his diligence shewed, in reducing the said lord of the Isles vnto order, the lands and forrest of Clouie.

There was an inquisitor called Husman this yere sent by pope Sixtus into Scotland, to examine by vertue of his commission Patrike Graham archbishop of saint Andrews, whose examination and profess being sent vnto the pope, he pronounced him an heretike, schismaticke, and simoniacke, and declared him accursed, condemning him to perpetual prison: and so he was degraded from all orders, cure, and dignitie of ecclesiasticall office, and William Schewes archdeacon of the same see was promoted in his place, to whome he was also committed to see him safely kept in prison. He was first sent vnto saint Colmes inch, and from thence to Dunfermling, and lastlie to Lochleuin, where he died, and was buried in saint Sarcas Isle in Lochleuin. The said William Schewes was consecrated archbishop of saint Andrews on passion Sunday in Lent, within holie rood house, the king being present, and manie of the nobles of the realme. And there the said archbishop receiued the pall, as a signe of his archbishops dignitie, and so was confirmed primate and legat of the realme, notwithstanding the impediment made against Graham before by the bishops about the same.

This yere also Alexander duke of Albanie was committed to prison by the king his brother, within the castell of Edinburgh, through euill counsell; but he brake out and escaped to Dunbar, where he caused the castell to be furnished with all necessaries: and leaving his seruants within it, passed himselfe into France, and was there of the king honorablie receiued, and longlie intreated. In the beginning of Maie following, the king besieged that castell by his lieutenant the earle of Arundale, who lost at that siege thre god knights, the lord of Lute, sir John Schaw of Auch, & the lord of Craigwallase, with the shot of a gun, & John Ramsie was slaine with a stone cast by hand. When they within saw they could not long indure, they left the castell and fled a waie by sea, and the earle of Arundale entered, and found it void of all things thereof anie account was to be made.

Doctor Ireland being graduat in diuinitie at Paris, was sent from the French king vnto the king of Scots, to persuaue him to make war vpon England, to the end that king Edward should not aid the duke of Burgognie. And moreover, he had in charge to moue for the pardon of the duke of Albanie, and shortly after returned with answer. The erle of Mar called John Stewart the kings yonger brother, this yere in the moneth of December, was taken in the night within his owne house, and conueied vnto Cragmiller, where he was kept as prisoner by the kings commandement, and after was conuict of conspiracie for witchcraft which he should practise against the king: and herevpon in Cannogate beside Edinburgh, his veines were cut, and so he bled to death. There were manie and diuerse witches and sorcerers, as well men as women conuict of that crime, and burnt for the same at Edinburgh. The king sent ambassadors into England to make sute to haue the ladie Cicill, daughter to king Edward, ioined in marriage with his sonne James the prince, which was granted, and the marriage concluded to be solemnized, when the prince of Scotland should come to perfect age: as in the English historie it more plainlie appeareth. Doctor Ireland, with a knight, and another religious man, came againe to king James from the French king, to persuaue him to make warres against England: and at length, king James and his nobles condescended to breake the peace, therewith Thomas Spenser bishop of Abirdeen (that was full tenderlie beloued of king Edward, and had bene euer a mediator for peace betwixt the kings of England, France, and Scotland, & the duke of Burgognie) when he heard that warre would follow, he died through griefe of mind mind and melancholie at Edinburgh, in the moneth of Aprill. The king sent two heralds into king Edward, requesting him not to aid the duke of Burgonie, nor any other against the king of France: for if he did, he must needs support the Frenchmen, by reason of the league betwixt France and Scotland: but king Edward would not admit those heralds to his presence, but kept them still without answer, till he had sent forth a naue of ships into the Forth before Leith, Kingorne, and Westtown, and then were the heralds licenced to returne. The English fleet entering the Forth, took eight great ships which they found in that river, and landing at Blackness, burnt the towne, and a great barge that late there at rode, and so returned.

The king assembled an armie from all parts of the realme, and amongst other, the lord of the Isles came with a great companie: and now the king being readie to enter into England, there came to him a messenger of king Edward, sent from a cardinal legat that was resident as then in England, commanding king James by authoritie apostolike, not to proceed any further in his purposed iourne, to the end that peace being obserued, all christian princes might bend their powers against the Turke & Infidels. This commandement did king James obey, and so discharged his armie, notwithstanding that king Edward sent forth his naue againe into the Forth, to the Ile of Jns Keith, but they did no hurt: for the countrie men kept them off. The Scottish borderers invaded the English marches, destroyed townes, and led manie prisoners awaie with them into Scotland. The king of England caused Berwikke to be assaged both by sea and land all the winter season, and overthrew a wall that was newlie made about it for defense thereof: but the Scots within it defended the towne for that time so stoutlie, that the enemies might not win it from them.

The duke of Albanie, after his wife was dead, whom he had married in France, perceiving himselfe not so well intreated as before, came over into England, where king Edward received him verie honorablie, promising (as some have written) to make him king of Scotland: and thereupon assembled an armie of thirtie thousand men, with a great naue by sea to invade Scotland, and appointed capteins and leaders of the armie by land, his owne brother the duke of Gloucester, the duke of Albanie, and others. The king of Scots hearing of their approach to invade his realme, raised a puissant armie to resist them, and came forward with the same unto the towne of Alowder, where being incamped, the principall nobles of his realme, as Archembald earle of Angus, George earle of Huntley, John earle of Lennox, James earle of Buchanane, Andrew lord Greie, Robert lord Lile, and diuerse other being armed, entered the kings lodging, where they accused him of diuerse things done and practised by him contrary to his honor and the common-weale of his realme; and speciallie, because he used young counsell of lewd persons, untoward and base of birth, such as Thomas Cochran, whom of a mason he had made earle of Spar, through whose deuise and counsell he had caused to be coined certaine monie of copper, not conuenient to be current in any realme, which the people refused, and so great dearth and hunger was raised through the countrie. Moreover, that he would not suffer the noble men to come nere his presence, nor to take their counsell in governing the realme, but gaue himselfe to voluptuous pleasure, setting naught by the quene his lawfull wife, & keeping a naughty harlot called the Daisie in his place.

Also they laied to his charge, that he had put his brother the earle of Spar to death, and banished his other brother the duke of Albanie, and therefore they could not suffer him and the whole realme to be longer misled by such naughty persons. And hereupon they took Thomas Cochran earle of Spar, William Roger, and James Bonimill tailor, who with others being convicted, were hanged over the bridge at Alowder. Onelie John Ramsie a young man of eightene yeeres of age, for whom the king made great instance, was pardoned of life. This done, they returned to Edinburgh, and appointed the king himselfe to be kept in the castell by the earle of Artholl, and in the meane time, the second of August, they sent Andrew Stewart elect bishop of Murray, & John lord Darneleie to the English armie, lieng then at Tuder, to take truce for thre moneths: but the dukes of Gloucester and Albanie came forward unto Kestralrig, where they incamped without any resistance. The English naue lieng also in the Forth was readie to assist their fellowes by land.

Whereupon, certaine noble men of Scotland, as the archbishop of saint Andrews, the bishop of Dunkeld, Colin earle of Argile, and Andrew Stewart lord Auendale, great chancelor of Scotland, went to the English campe, & treating with the two dukes, agreed upon certaine articles, whereby the duke of Albanie was receiued into his countrie againe in peaceable wise, and had giuen to him the castell of Dunbar with the earldoms of Spar and Spar. He was proclaimed also generall lieutenant to the king. And so the Englishmen returned homewards, and came unto Berwikke, where they hauing woone the towne as they passed that waies into Scotland, had left the lord Stanleie, and sir John Clouston, with foure thousand men, to keepe a siege before the castell, and now they enforced the same: but the lord Hales then capteine within that castell, defended it verie manfullie, sending to the duke of Albanie and other, the lords of the counsell, for reliefe to raise the siege. The duke in deed raised an armie, and came to Lamer more, but when they within perceived that through dissention betwixt the king and the nobles of the realme, they were not like to be rescued, they yielded the castell into the Englishmens hands, the 24 of August, in that yeere 1482, after it had remained now at this time in the Scottishmens hands the space of 21 yeeres.

The king remaining as prisoner in Edinburgh castell, all things were ordered by the duke of Albanie, Andrew Stewart lord of Auendale, chancelor, and others, till the said duke, the archbishop of saint Andrews, the chancelor, the earle of Argile, and diuerse others, went to Striueling to visit the quene and prince, where the duke was perswaded by the quene, without knowledge thereof giuen to the other, to go unto Edinburgh, and to restore the king unto libertie. The duke accordingly to the quenes pleasure comming to Edinburgh, besieged the castell and won it, removed the earle of Artholl, and set the king and all his seruants at libertie, for the which god turne, the king shewed great tokens of loue to his brother the duke, although it lasted not long. The earle of Argile, the bishop of saint Andrews, the chancelor, and others, which remained at Striueling, when they heard those newes, fled into their owne countries: and shortly after, the bishop of saint Andrews, at request of the king, resigned his bishoprike in fauor of maister Andrew Stewart prior of Cleuelowden, and was content in recompense thereof, with the bishoprike of Murray. This yeere there was great thirst, reisse, and slaughter in diuerse parts of the realme, by occasion of the variance betwixt the king and his nobles.

teine ambassadoꝝ, which were Berold or Bernard Steward, lord of Aubignie, marshall of France, and Peter Gallart doctor of both lawes, to renewe the old league betwene this James the third, and the king of France: for which cause the king of Scots and the nobles assembled at Edinburgh, where (with the French ambassadoꝝ) saking all the rols of all the ancient leagues, they reconfirmed the same, with the seales of both parts set therevnto; which done, the Frenchmen (with whome were sent into France diuerse Scots) returned home. Amongest the Scots, one Robertson was the chiefe, a man famous for the feates of battell, and hauing imployed his seruice on the parts of the French in the Italian warres, which being ended, the said chosen soldieꝝ following the conduct of Berold Steward, went into England with Henrie earle of Richmond, after king, whose part they toke against Richard at that time vsurper vpon the English, for which cause the earle of Richmond (when he was after king) did derelie loue the Scots.

The seditions also, which a long time did burne in France, caused deadlie wars to grow betwene the king of France and the duke of Burgognie. Wherevnto, when the death of Charles (the last duke of Burgognie, slaine at Pans by the duke of Loiraine) did set end: Charles the eight of that name, king of France (assembling a great armie) did applye all his force and deuile to expell Alphonse out of the kingdom of Naples, which at that time succeeded happlie vnto him, by reason that Alphonse was then easilie remoued. But after, when the Neapolitane people did revolt (from the French faction) to Ferdinand the son of Alphonse, there arose great flames of warre and sedition through Italie, each part struing to support the strength of his owne. The administration of which warre against Ferdinand, was chieslie performed by the Scots, as principall capteins of that armie, or at the least equall with the best. Of which Scots the chiefe were Alexander duke of Albanie, son to James the second king of Scots, John also duke of Albanie sonne of this Alexander, George Montgomerie lord of Lozges, Bernard Steward (who was after made viceroy of Naples, which office he wiselie manie yeres did execute) Robert Steward marshall of France, Nicholas Scot, and others, wherof manie (for their worthie exploits) were by the French honozable rewarded with great possessions. Who also (as manie of the Scots befoze had done) planting themselves in Subzia, became the authoꝝ of manie ancient families. For though by the euill custome of common spech, they reteinie the name of Scot (as taken of their countrie) yet by the ensignes, and tokens which they had and bled, it may easilie be knowne of what families the Scots their ancestoꝝ did descend.

Wherefoze it followeth by most certeine coniecture, that the ancient familie of the earles (to whome vse of spech hath long obtained the surname of Scots) flourishing in Placentia, had their originall from the stocke of the Douglasse, as the armes of them both do well witnesse: which kindred (besides manie other earles thereof) is at this day notable beautified by Christopher Scot, who (with singular pietie and learning) doth gouerne the church of Canallion. Again, there is another familie of Scots, commonly called the Scoties in Subzia, wherof Bernard Scotia and Horace his brother (the one a senator of Mantua, and the other a prelat) are both famous, as well for their vertue, as nobilitie; also Francis Scotia, lord of Vaine and Mondone, and other nobles of the marquedome of Saluce, are descended from the Scots, with the large familie of the Schitties (descended of James Orlando Scot, which we haue heard confirmed by the armes of that familie) are well advanced about Cremona, Mantua, and Verona, as are also the Paparons in Rome (so called for their armes and ensignes) whose ancestoꝝ to be of the Scottish nobilitie, is witnessed by a worthie monument thereof in the church of saint Marie the great, in which the father and the son called Paparons, being there buried, are both adorned with the ensignes of knight hood out of Scotland.)

The duke of Albanie, for that he understood there was poison giuen to him in drinke in the kings chamber, and therefore stood in feare of his life, fled from the court vnto the castell of Dunbar, whereby insued great discord. The king fearing the displeasure of his nobles, got him also into the castell of Edinburgh. The earles of Angus, Buchquhane, and others, left the king, and assisted the duke of Albanie. And the king through counsell of certeine meane persons whome he had againe taken vnto him, summoned the duke and other his assistants, to come to answer for such treason as he had to lay against them, & withall prepared an armie to besiege Dunbar, wherof the duke being aduertised, fled into England, and afterwards being accompanied with the earle of Dowglas, and a great number of Englishmen, invaded Scotland vpon the west marches, where manie Englishmen were slaine and taken by the resistance of the lords Cokpall, Johnston, and others, the duke was put to flight, and the earle Dowglas taken and brought to the king, who because he was an aged man, and had bene long banished his countrie, was sent to the abbey of Lundoꝝ, where he remained the rest of his daies, and at length, departing this life, was buried there.

The duke of Albanie for the losse of that armie, was blamed of the king of England, and therevpon taking a milking, secretly departed our into France by the helpe of John Liddell, sonne to sir James Liddell knight, who afterwards lost his life for the same. The duke was well interteined in France by the king there: and finally running at tilt with Lewis duke of Mleance, was hurt with the splint of a speare, and thereof died. He left behind him two sonnes, John duke of Albanie, that was after gouernour and tutor to king James the first, and Alexander that was after bishop of Murray, and abbat of Scone. His yere the lord Hume, Corellis, Dillphant, and Drummond, were made lords of the parliament. In the yere 1484, the king sent the archbishop of saint Andzeus vnto Rome, for certeine priuileges which he obtained. And the same yere, pope Innocent the eight of that name, sent the bishop of Imola to treat of peace, betwixt Richard king of England, & James king of Scotland. James king of Scots, hauing not long befoze made diuerse incursions and rodes into England, and that to his profit, he sued therevpon for a truce, which came to passe euen as king Richard wished, so that condescending to haue a communication, commissioners were appointed for both parts to meet at Nottingham, the twentieth day of September next ensuing.

For the king of Scots there appeared Colin earle of Argile, the lord Campbell, the lord chancelloꝝ of Scotland, William bishop of Aberdeen, Robert lord Lile, Laurence lord Dillphant, John Drummond of Stubhall, Archembald Quitelaw archdeacon of Lawden, and secretarie to king James, Lion king of armes, and Duncan Dundas. For king Richard, there came Richard bishop of saint Asaph, John duke of Norfolk, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thomas lord Stanleie, George Stanleie lord Strange, John Greie lord Botwe, Richard lord Fitzthugh, John Cuthoꝝpe keeper of the kings priuie seale, Thomas Barrow maister of the rols, sir Thomas

Thomas B:ian chiefe iustice of the common p:ces, sir Richard Katcliffe knight, William Catesbie, & Richard Salheld esquires. These counsellors in the later end of September, after sundrie meetings and communications had togither, concluded (as followeth) a peace to be had betwixt both the realmes for the space of thre yeres, the same to begin at the rising of the sunne, on the 29 of September in the yere 1484, and to continue unto the setting of the sunne on the 29 of September in the yere 1487.

During which terme, it was agreed, that not one, lie all hostilitie and warre should cease betwixt the two realmes, but that also all aid and abatement of enimites should be avoided, & by no colorable means or waie in anie case used. The towne and castell of Berwick to remaine in the Englishmens hands, for the space of the said terme, with the same bounds as the Englishmen possessed it at that season, when it was deliuered to the Scottishmen by king Henrie the first. It was likewise condescended, that all other castels, holds, and fortresses, during the tearme of the said thre yeres, should abide in the hands of those that held them at that present, the castell of Dunbar onelie excepted. This castell of Dunbar was deliuered unto the Englishmen by the duke of Albanie, when he fled into France, and so remained in their hands at that time of concluding this truce.

Whereupon (by reason the Scottish commissioners had not authoritie to conclude anie full agreement for that castell, unless the same might be restored unto the king their maisters hands) it was accorded, that if the king of Scots, within the space of fortye daies next ensuing, did intimate his resolute refusal to be agreeable, that the said castell should remaine in the Englishmens hands about the space of six moneths, that then during that terme of six moneths, those that kept the castell for the Englishmen should remaine in quiet, and not be troubled nor molested by anie kind of means by the said king of Scots, or anie other by his procurement, so that they within the castell likewise abstaining from making anie issues or reissues upon the Scottish people. And if after that the said terme of six moneths were once expired, it should chance that anie warre arose for defending or recovering the said castell, yet the truce should endure for all other rights and possessions, notwithstanding that it might be lawfull to do what lay in anie of their powers, either for winning or defending the foresaid castell, as though no truce had bene concluded.

It was further agreed, that no traitor of either realme should be receiued by the prince of either realme; and if anie traitor or rebell chanced to arrive in either realme, the prince thereof to deliuer him upon demand made. Scots already abiding in England & swayne to the king there, may remaine still, so their names be certified to the Scottish king within fortye daies. If anie warden of either realme should invade the others subiects, he to whome such warden is subiect, shall within six daies proclaime him traitor, and certifie the other prince thereof within 12 daies. And in euerie safe conduct this clause should be contained; Whomsoever alwaies that the observer of this safe conduct be no traitor. If anie of the subiects of either prince do presume to aid, helpe, mainteine, or serue anie other prince against anie of the contradors of this truce, then it shall be lawfull for him, to whome he shewed himselfe enemie, to apprehend and attach the said subiect, going, coming, or tarrieng within anie of his dominions.

Colleagues comprised in this truce (if they would assent thereto) on the English part were these: the king of Castile and Leon, the king of Arragon, the king of Portugale, the archduke of Austria & Burgognie, and the duke of Britaine. On the Scottish part, Charles the French king, John king of Denmarke and Portugale, the duke of Gelderland, and the duke of Britaine. The lordship of Lorne in the realme of Scotland, and the Island of Lundaie lieng in the river of Seurne, in the realme of England, were not comprehended in this agreement. This concord, peace, and amitie thus concluded, was appointed to be published the first day of October, in the most notable cities and townes of both the realmes.

For the sure obseruation, keeping, & performance of this truce & league, there were appointed for conservatozs on the Scottish side, David earle of Crawford and lord Lindseie, George earle of Huntleie lord Gordon and Badzenath, John lord Darneleie, John lord Benedie, Robert lord Lile, Patrick lord Halcene, Laurence lord Diphant, William lord Bothwike, sir John Kofse of Halkheid, sir Gilbert Johnston of Elphinston, sir John Lundie, sir John Ogilvie of Arlie, sir Robert Hammliton of Fingalton, sir William Balke of Lamington, sir John Benedie of Blarbone, sir John Wemes, sir William Kochwen; Edward Stockton of Kirke patie, John Dundas, John Kofse of Mountgrenan, esquires.

It was further agreed, that commissioners should meet at Loughmaben on the eighteenth day of November, as well for redress of certeine offences done on the west marches, as also for declaring and publishing the peace. On the English part, the lord Dacres, the lord Fitzhugh, sir Richard Katcliffe, sir Christopher Poresbie, sir Richard Salheld, or thre of them. For the Scots, the lord Benedie, the lord Mountgomerie, the lord Lile, John Partwell steward of Annandale, Robert Creighton of Sanquhar, or thre of them. Also, there were assigned commissioners to meet at Roibenbozne for the east marches, the first day of December; and at Haldanbozne, for the middle marches, on the fourth day of the same moneth. At which two places for Scotland, there were assigned to appere the earle of Huntleie, the earle of Angus, the earle of Argile chancelor of Scotland, the lord Anandale, the lord Seton, the lord Diphant, the lord Stubbhall, with others.

For England, the earle of Northumberland, the lord Greyhocke, the lord Scrope of Passan, sir William Calcoigne, sir Robert Constable, and other. The same commissioners had authoritie to assigne certeine persons, to view and declare the bounds and limits appertaining to Berwick, according to the true meaning of the league. For the battell ground it was accorded, that the same should remaine without sowing, earing, building, or inhabiting, as it had done before. Shortlie after the concluding of this truce, king Richard intreated for a marriage to be had betwixt the prince of Northsate, eldest sonne to king James & ladie Anne de la Poole, daughter to John duke of Suffolke and to the ladie Anne his wife, that was sister to the said king Richard. For the concluding of this marriage, both the kings sent their ambassadozs againe unto Bottingham, where their treatie had such successe for that time, that the marriage was agreed upon, and writings thereof drawn, ingrossed, and sealed, and affiances made and taken by protozs and deputies on both parts. The foresaid young ladie was immediately called princeesse of Northsate, but by the short life of king Richard his uncle she shortlie after lost that name.

A parlement.

No pardon to be granted to offenders for the space of seven yeares.

during the tearme of the whole truce in the Englishmens possessions, he wrote unto king Richard a loving letter, signifieng unto him, that he was not minded to seeke the recoverie of the said castell by force of armes, but rather to leaue it in his hand, during the whole terme of the truce. Nevertheless, he instantlie required him for the bond of that loue and familiaritie, which now by treatie and alliance was sprung up betwixt them, that he would redeliver the said castell into his hands, according as reason might moue him thereto; considering the Englishmen had no right to it, being onelie deliuered to them by traitors of their native countrie, without anie reasonable cause, or commission lawfullie authorized.

King Richard dailie in this matter with pleasant letters and faire words feeding forth king James, without minding to gratifie him in that sute, so that as long as king Richard liued, king James could neuer get it for anie thing he might do. In the yeare 1486, Henrie earle of Richmond comming out of France with a power of men, of the which Bernard Stewart a Scottishman was chiefe capteine, landed in Wales, and passing through the countrie into England, at length incountried king Richard, and due him, so obtaining the crowne of that realme. And after he was somewhat quietlie established in the same, he came into the north parts, where he remained the most part of the next summer, and regarding nothing more than to haue the loue and friendship of his neighbors, & to be confederat with the kings and princes ioining next unto him, he sent from Newcastle one of his counsellors Richard For bishop of Cresset, and sir Richard Cogcombe knight, ambassadors unto king James, to treat a contract, and renew the bond of peace and truce betwixt the said kings and their realmes.

These ambassadors were gladlie receiued of king James, who declared unto them, that he bare great fauor and loue unto their maister, and would be glad to please him in all he might: howbeit, that his subiects were not of so good a mind towards the English nation as he himselfe wished, and therefore he willed them to be contented with a truce for seven yeares, sith further he could not do, for doubt to offend his nobilitie and subiects. But he promised secretly, that when those seven yeares were expired, he would renew the same for the tearme of other seven yeares, and so from seven yeares to seven yeares so long as he liued. This he did, because he perceived that his people had him in such hatred, that they would not consent to anie bond that he should make. The ambassadors perceiuing his good meaning toward king Henrie, confirmed the truce for those seven yeares, and so returned home to king Henrie, who was glad of that they had done.

In the meane time died the queene, a woman of singular beautie and godnesse, who was supposed greatlie to mitigate the unbribled force of hir husband. At what time also in France died Alexander the kings brother, leauing behind him two sonnes, which were Alexander boine of his first wife (daughter to the earle of Dikeneie) and John (boine of his second wife) being after made gouernor of Scotland. Immediately after that this truce was thus concluded betwixt the two realmes, king James caused the three estates to assemble in parlement at Edinburgh the first of October in the yeare 1487, in the which order was taken, that iustice shoulde be holden through all the parts of the realme, & that no pardons shoulde be granted for anie great crime that shoulde be committed for the space of seven yeares to come, so that the king began to use sharpe execution of iustice in all parts, which was right dis-pleasant to manie.

At the same time was an ambassadoz sent to the king of Romans, for the calling in of a letter of marque, which had bene granted against Scottish merchants, at the sute and instance of certeine Hollanders and Burgognions, and was shortly after hereupon reuoked. After the parlement was ended, the king remoued unto Striueling, leauing his wife the queene, and hir sonne the prince at Edinburgh castell, whilst he keeping persons about him of meane calling, gaue himselfe to take his pleasure with women, & to gather up gold and siluer, greatlie to the offense of his subiects. Yet in the meane time, now after the death of king Richard, whether it was by treason or appointment, the castell of Dunbar was deliuered to the hands of king James, and that to his great ioy and high contentation; for he that ruled his kingdome more with rigor than with anie tractable meane of sauorable iustice, stood euer in feare of some troublesome tumult that might be raised by his owne people, if occasion were ministred either through hope of forren aid or otherwise.

So long therefore as the castell was in the Englishmens hands, he doubted least through practise, some conspiracie shoulde be contriued betwixt his owne subiects and the English nation, greatlie to the annoiance of his estate, & thereupon he was the more desirous to reduce the same castell into his possession. But the onelie meane to haue assured himselfe from the hands of such as sought his life, had bene to haue changed his wilfull manner of government, & to haue leaned vnto such counsell as would haue aduised him for the wealth of his whole realme, and not vpon desire to please, haue maintained his vndiscreet opinions, to the wzonging aswell of his commons as of the nobles and peeres of his realme; for the nobilitie of Scotland, namelie the earles of Angus, Argile, and Lenox, the lords Halls, Hume, Drummond, Greie, and others, perceiuing themselves oppressed by such as from base birth had risen (without worthie deserting) to the degree of counsellors, and therewith aduanced to so high authoritie, as all things were ordered at their appointment, conspired together, & determined by force of armes to see a reformation in such a disordered manner of gouernement.

But yet because it shoulde not be thought that they minded the destruction of their countrie, but rather the aduancement thereof, they made the lord James duke of Rothsaie sonne to the king (a child boine to godnesse and vertue) the chiefe capteine in this their enterprize, and that in maner against his will; hereby openlie protesting, that they minded and purposed the suppressing and confusion of an euill king, and not the subuersion of their native countrie. By which their craftie imagined inuention, they thought to remoue all suspicion of their purposed vntruth and shamefull disloyaltie. They had sent to the earle of Douglas, who remained prisoner (as ye haue heard) in the abbey of Lundois, and required him to assist them in their begun enterprize, promising that they would restore him againe to his lands and former dignitie, and honor him as principall of their faction. But that noble, wise, and ancient earle, being already schooled with troubles, and hauing learned by experience (to his great griefe) what such matter meant, refused to breake his ward, or to assist them in anie wise, dissuading them from their enterprize, because it seemed to him neither godlie nor honorable, sithens both himselfe and his friends had tassed for the like, great hinderance, which might be an example to him and others to beware in time to come.

and conspiracie against him, was sore disquieted in his mind, and to meet their mischievous attempts, gathered an armie. Yet before the using of anie force, he sent messengers to his sonne, and to the nobles with him, to trie if he might come to some agreement with them. He sent also letters to the king of England, & to the French king, requiring them to take some paines in the matter, to procure an attonement betwixt him and his nobles. And besides this, he wrote to pope Innocent about the same purpose, praiering him to intermeddle his authoritie by sending some legate into Scotland, to appease the troubles thereof. But the Scottish nobilitie, and such of the people as were vp in armes against him, were so desperatlie set, and wholie bent on reuenge, that no wholesome counsell nor medicinable aduise might appease their furious rage, so that for answer to his messengers, they sent him word, that if he would resigne the title of his crowne and realme, & depose himselfe of his whole regall dignitie, then they would come to some communication with him or else not. The like answer was giuen to the ambassadors of England and France, that were sent vnto them from the kings of both those realmes, which sore lamented the fortune of their friend and alie the Scottish king.

But Adrian the bishop of Romes legat came too late, as who should say, a day after the faire: for when their groundred malice and spitefull hatred conceived against him might not be qualified by anie manner of means, but that they were now comming forward with all their puissance to Striueling where he then remained, he would not staie till the eyles of Huntleie, Gerroll, Atholl, Cratoford, Rothus, Sutherland, Cathnesse, & Marthall; the barons, Forbes, Ogilvie, Granth, Fraister, and others, were arrived with their powers, amounting to the number of fortie thousand men, with the which they were comming forth of the north parts to his aid: but rashlie and without good aduise he issued out of the towne, accompanied with the earles of Glencarne & Pontreos, the lords Graham, Ruthuen, Marthwell, and certaine others, and forthwith ioined battell with his aduersaries at Banockbozne, within two miles of Striueling.

Now when nothing might quiet them, at length they met thus in a pitched field, where after great slaughter & murder made of an huge multitude of people, the king being put to the worse, fled into a mill, whither being fiercelie followed and found therein, he was cruellie slaine, and vnrueerentlie left stark naked. A notable mirrour to all princes, that calling to remembrance such a miserable and most dolorous sight, they may take heed by what manner of persons they suffer themselves to be led and abused. For if this prince king James the third had not followed vpon a wilfull pretense, and obstinate mind, the counsell and aduise of vantage, and such as (being aduanced from base degree vnto high authoritie) studied more to keepe themselves in fauor, than to giue true aduertisements, and faithfull aduise vnto their prince, he might haue reigned longer by manie daies & yeeres, in great and high felicitie. [In which conflict was on the kings part slaine (as faith Buchanan) Alexander Coningham earle of Glencarne.] He was thus slaine nere Striueling, on the seventh day of June, the yeere after the incarnation 1488, being also the 29 of his reigne.

Now then, after that the barons of Scotland had thus slaine their soueraigne lord and liege king James, the third of that name: his eldest son James the fourth was crowned king of Scotland, and began his reigne the 24 of June, in the yeere 1488, being not past sixteen yeeres of age, who notwithstanding that he had bene in the field with the nobles of the realme against his father, that contrarie to his mind was slaine; yet neuertheless afterwards, he became a right noble prince, & seemed to take great repentance for that his offense, and in token thereof, he wore continually an iron chaine about his middle all the daies of his life. He was greatlie giuen to deuotion and praier, visiting religious houses, and bestowing on them sundrie gifts. He gouerned his realme in great rest, peace, iustice, and quietnesse, ruling him selfe in proper person diuerse daies and nights, to suppress and take thence, robbers, and oppressors of his subjects in all parts of his realme, till he had brought the countrie to great quietnesse. He was learned and liberall, and indued with manie other good vertues and qualities.

Anon after his coronation, the earle of Lennox, and the lord Ille, with diuers other their assistants, notwithstanding that they had bene with him at the slaughter of his father, seeing that things went not as they wished, raised an armie, and caused the dead kings bloudie shirt to be borne afore them for a banner: and comming forwards toward Striueling against the young king, were ouerthrowne at Tollymole, where the Lennox men, and sundrie other of the barons side were slaine, as the lord of Kilbricht, and other taken and hanged for their offenses. The king called a parlement at Edinburgh, which was holden the first of October, where he being moued by clemencie, granted a generall pardon to all those that came in field at Striueling with his father against him, and appointed euerie one to haue speciall pardons there vpon vnder his seales. He likewise dispensed with the heires of them that were slaine with his father there in field, appointing them their particular dispensations vnder his seales, after the same manner. Further it was ordeined, that all iustices, shiriffes, stewards, balliffes, lieutenants, and other which had offices in heritage, and had bene with his father at the field, should be suspended from the same offices for the tearme of three yeeres: and those which had offices for life, or for terme of yeeres, should be vtterlie excluded from the same.

Afterward, he toke order that all such goods as had bene taken from landed men and burghesses, should be restored to them againe, except that which was taken from such landed men and burghesses as were in the field against him; for that was deemed a lawfull preie. It was also iudged that the death of his father came vpon him through his owne default, and that king James the fourth then reigning, and all his adherents and partakers in that field, were innocent and guiltlesse of all slaughter made there at that time, and clearlie acquit of all pursute and occasion thereof: the three estates granting to giue their seales to testifie the same, with the kings great seale of the realme, to be shewed vnto the pope, the kings of France, Spaine, Denmarke, and other princes their confederats. And for the ceasing of the selfe, rest, & such other great enormities, the king was appointed to ride in person once euerie yeere through all parts of the realme. And certaine noble men were ordeined to exercise iustice in euerie shire next adioining to the places where they had their chiefe residence: and herevnto they gaue their othes to be diligent in the administration of iustice. These ordinances were right well obserued all the daies of King James the fourth his life time, so that the realme was reduced to great tranquillitie, and gouerned in god peace and iustice. Furthermore, all gifts made by his father in preiudice of the crowne, were reuoked, from the second day of february immediatlie preceeding his death, to the day in which he was slaine.

* About this time was a monster borne of a strange forme, hauing from the nauill botoneward the perfect parts of one man; not different from the right proportion of a man: but from the nauill toward, it was double bodied, hauing all perfect parts answering euerie of those bodies, sundered to all actions and shew. This monster the king commanded to be diligentlie nourished and instructed, but chieflie in musike (wherein it profited verie much.) Further also learning diuers sorts of languages, whose severall wits and natures manifestlie appeared by diuers dispositions of their minds. For sometime they would fall out one with another, and when any thing displeased them, they would most bitterly contend the one with the other: contrarie, when any thing happened to their liking or desire, they would consult and agree together as friends. In which this was worthy remembrance, that if the legges or loines had bene hurt below, they both together felt the paine; but if they were pinched or grieved in any part above severed from the other, then that bodie onelie felt the same which had that hurt done unto it. Which different sense did more plainelie appeare in the death of the one of them: for when the one bodie died manie daies before the other, that which liued, did after by little and little consume, by the putrefaction of the other bodie then dead; which monster liued 28 yeres, and in the time of John the gouernor: of which thing we doubt not to write (more boldlie) sith there are men yet living of honest fame which saw these things.)

This king in the beginning of his reigne, to make his estate the surer, and more faithfull to reconcile the harts of such as had mainteined factions against him, determined to marie the daughters of his aunt by two husbands, to two of those noble men: for which cause he married Erecina Boid to Alexander Forbois, and Margaret Hammliton to Matthew Steward, by which in time there followed a most singular peace in the kingdome. Also anesquier, and an herald were sent into France, Spaine, and other places, to learne where the king might be a suter for some great ladie to ioine with him in marriage. Moreover beside these, there were sent honorable ambassadoys into France, Spaine, and Denmarke, to renew the old amities & leagues betwixt those realmes and Scotland, as had bene used in the daies of this kings progenitors. His two brethren, the duke of Rothlie, and the earle of Mar, he caused to be brought up in good nourture and vertuous exercise, appointing to them such livings for maintenance of their estates, as his father had assigned them.

For his counsell he chose a certeine number of the prelates, noble men, and barons of his realme, such as were thought most meet, taking this order, that six of them at the least should continually remaine about him, by whose aduise he should doe all things that touched the affaires of the realme: and in case any thing was done without their aduise, the same should be iudged void, & not to be obeyed, & this was inuoluable kept all his daies. When the esquier and herald were returned againe into Scotland, which had bene to visit strange countries, and made report of that they had sene, there was a parlement holden, in which it was ordeined, that the bishop of Glascow, the earle Bothwell, and others, should go as ambassadoys to sue for the kings marriage in place where it should be most expedient, and most to the kings liking. Great variance rose betwixt the archbishop of Saint Andrews, and the bishop of Glascow, touching the preheminance of their iurisdiction, which drew the noble men into factions, till the king commanded the same to cease, and that they should trie it by laie before competent iudges.

* James Ogilvie knight of Aire, was sent ambassadoy to the king of Denmarke, to whom the king gaue in charge, that he should labor to renew the old league that was betwixt the Danes and the Scots, which he wisely executed and obtained, with certeine priuileges for the benefit of the merchants. By means whereof at his returne, he purchased such fauour of the king, as that he was aduanced to the title of a lord, in which the name of the Ogilvies was first increased with anie honorable title. The king about the same time took order for increase of some number of ships to be had in his realme, and that euerie haven towne should build some, as well for fishing, as to transport merchandize from place to place.

The lords and barons, and such other as would, were commanded to helpe the merchants toward the building of such ships: and for good example, the king caused to make certeine ships at his owne charges, which might be the trade of fishing. Moreover, the king considering the ignorance that was amongst the landed men of his realme, when they should passe upon inquests, he ordeined that euerie landed man should put his eldest sonne to schole, that he might learne perfectlie the lawes of the realme, and that upon great forfeiture. Thus in the beginning of his reigne, diuers good lawes and constitutions were made, for the advancement of the common-wealth, which he caused to be duly obserued and kept during his time. The pope sent a protonotarie called Forman into Scotland, with a rose and a scepter of gold, to be presented unto the king, desiring him to perseuere in godliness, honor, and vertue, as he had begun. The most part of this yere the king spent in riding abroad through all parts of his realme to see iustice ministered, speciallie in the north parts, where the people are commonlie disturbed out of order.

There was hostlie after some appearance of warres betwixt England and France, whereupon king Charles sent unto king James, requiring him of assistance, if it came to passe that the Englishmen did invade France: and further declared, that he had one with him called Richard duke of Poike, second sonne to king Edward the fourth, who had bene preferred now manie yeres secretlie by his aunt Margaret duchesse of Burgognie, and therefore was iust inheritor to the realme of England, whom he would send into Scotland, praiering the king to assist him to recover his rightfull heritage, the said realme of England. And hostlie after hereupon, the said feined duke (whose right name was Perkin Warbecke, as in the English historie it appeareth) arrived in Scotland well and honorable accompanied, to trie what purchase he might make there for succors to attaine his pretended right to the crowne of England.

* After whose arrivall he was brought to the presence of king James, before whom he did lamentable bewaile (as he well could) the fall of the house of Poike, and his owne calamities; most humble and vehementlie beseeching him, to ransom the kingly blood from that contumelie. For answer whereunto at that present time, the king bid him be of good heart, for he would so worke, that he should find his sute not defrauded of all due effect, in obtaining succor in his distresse. Few daies after, the king assembling together his counsell, commanded this (counterfeited) duke of Poike to be brought unto him, who now (more than before) did in this assembly bitterlie complaine of his misfortune, shewing, that being borne to great hope of a kingdome (as the sonne of the noblest king of that age) he was left bold of all helpe by the death of his father, & had like to have fallen into the tyrannie of his uncle Richard duke of Gloucester, before he could understand what calamitie or misfortune might signifie.

But aided by diuine assistance, he (when his elder brother was murdered by his uncle) was preserved by the helpe of his fathers friends, and conueied away from the bloudie hands of the blurring king Richard, who (not able in that kingdome, whose heire by right he was) to lead a bare and begged life, did so liue in forrein countries, as he counted the condition of his brother (taken from those miseries by sudden death) to be hapie in respect of his owne troubles and extremitie: for he was referued aliuie to the scoene of fortune, not daring at the first to betwaille his calamitie amongst strangers, whereby he might moue their pitie towards him: yea (and after) when by little and little he came to open what person hee was, how noble borne, whose heire, and to whom allied, he was (to increase all his former miseries) more gretionlie assaulted by the malice of fortune than before. For then he could not almost liue in safety in anie place, because of the subtiltie of his enemies, who would haue bought his life (of those with whom he remained) ymagine soliciting them to discover his secrets, and (vnder the colour of feined amitie) to corrupt his true friends, to search out and discover his hidden friends, and to defame him amongst the common people.

Wherewithall not yet satisfied, they reuile (said he) the ladie Margaret his aunt, and imprison the nobles of England that seemed to fauor his cause; notwithstanding all which (he vising the truth of his owne conscience against the slanders of hir and his enemies, and moued with pitie for the distresse of his kinsman) did with hir abillitie relieue his necessitie. But at length, when he saw no sure defense in a woman and widow (whose authoritie could not stretch to the command of hir people in that liberall sort as the would) he was diuine to seeke the aid of other princes, and to request them to looke in to the misfortunes that might light vpon such great estates, and that they would not suffer kinglie blood (oppressed by tyrants) to lament in such extremitie. For yet he was not so base minded (although hee were in manie great miseries) that he would not hope at one time or other to be restored to his kingdome, by the helpe of such friends as he had in Ireland and England; adding therunto the helpe which he should haue out of France, whereof he had already made some triall by the singular beneuolence of the same king, hauing liberallie imparted manie benefitts vnto him.

Besides which, not supposing this to allure the kings mind to his fauor, he began by flatterie to extoll him, not doubting but he (whose fauor had bene liberallie shewed to the distressed) would now diminish the same to him; but that he hoped that he would (for his singular humanitie to all banished persons, for pitie towards a miserable creature, for loue towards his kinsman, for necessities cause towards his friend, and for the nerenesse of league that ought to be among princes) succor and relieue him with men and monie, thereby to helpe him to the recouerie of his kingdome. Wherefore againe he importunately requiereth the king of aid in this extremitie, since the same was honorable to himselfe, acceptable to God, beneficiall for his realme, and a singular fame among other princes in joining with them determined to restore him. Which if he might obtaine (and that the rather by his furtherance) he did liberallie promise alwayes to stand a most firme friend to the Scots, for whose cause he would spend his crowne and life.)

Thus Perkin Warbecke did vse the matter in such subtill tosse, that king James either granting, or seeming to giue credit to his wordes, after aduise and deliberation had and taken with his counsell, receiued him in honorable wise, naming and reputing him duke of Porke, and therefore promised him to aid him in all that he might. And shortly after, he married him to his nere kinswoman the ladie Katharine, daughter to the earle of Huntley, and moreover raised a great armie, spectallie of the borderers, and with the same hauing this pretended duke in companie with him, inuaded England, burnt towne spoiled houses, and toke great booties and rich preies both of goods and prisoners, & allured with the sweetnesse of such spoile and gaine, waisted all the countrie of Northumberland, and had gone further, but that he could perceiue no aid comming in vnto this new found duke, contrarie to such golden promises as he had made, that as soone as they were entered into England, there would flocke vnto him both of the nobilitie and commons, and that in great numbers.

King James perceiuing no such matter, thought it better to returne with assured gaine, than to tarie this new pryncing dukes doubtful and vn certaine victorie. And so hauing his people laden and pestered with spoile and prisoners, he drew backe into Scotland. The king of England aduertised hereof, made preparation for the raising of an armie, meaning to send the same against the Scots: but the rebellion of the Cornishmen, which chanced the same time about a tere lentied then of the people, constrained him to imploye that armie to repressle the enterprise of those rebels. Yet neuerthelesse he sent the earle of Surreie to the borders, that with the power of the countrie adioining, he might defend the same from the inuasions of the Scots, if they attempted to breake in; and so the earle laie on the borders all that yere.

King James then perceiuing that no maine armie came against him, inuaded eestones the borders of England, and laid siege to the castell of Roxham, sending his light horsemen abroad into Northumberland, and the bishopricke of Durham, where they burned and spoiled all about in the countrie: but hearing that the earle of Surreie had raised an armie, and was comming towards them, they returned to the host lieng before Roxham, where king James perceiuing he could not win the castell, notwithstanding he had done great hurt and damage thereto, he raised his siege, retired into his countrie, and left great companies on the borders for defense thereof. And so before the comming of the English armie, king James was returned. The earle of Surreie yet (as the English writers affirme) followed into Scotland, and toke diuerse castles and towres, remaining within the countrie the space of six or seven daies, and then came backe without battell or anie notable skirmish offered.

About the same time was one Peter Dyalas sent ambassadoe from Ferdinando king of Spaine, to treat as a mediator for the concluding of peace betwixt the kings of England and Scotland, which Dyalas travelled so earnestlie in the matter, that at length it was agreed, that certaine commissioners of both the realmes should meet at Melrosse, where for the king of England, doctor For, then bishop of Durham, with this Dyalas, and other graue personages, met the Scottish commissioners. After long conference and much talke had, for the conclusion of a generall peace, finally nothing but a truce might be accorded for certaine yeres, though Dyalas did what he possiblie might, to haue agreed them for all manner of matters, quarrels, demands, and causes, whatsoeuer the same had bene, that a perpetuall peace might haue bene concluded, because he was thiestie sent

The king of England required to haue the counterfeit duke of Yorke (otherwise named Perkin Warbecke) deliuered to him: but king James (es-teeming his honor more than anie earthlie thing) would in no wise seeme to betraie him that fled to him for succour, and with whome he had coupled one of his owne kinswomen in mariage: but he was contented to couenant, that the same Perkin should be constrained to depart out of Scotland, and not to be further aided by him, or by anie other through his meanes or procurement. The king of Scots to keepe promise made in the said treatie of peace, and knowing himselfe to be abused by the said Richard, whom he had reputed to be herlie duke of Yorke (although he was not so) called him before his presence, and declared to him the great fauour and good will which he had borne towards him, putting him in remembrance that for his sake he had taken warre in hand against England, and invaded the countrie in hope of assistance by his friends within the land, where not one resorted to him.

And albeit he had married his nære kinswoman, yet might he not keepe longer warre with England for his sake onelie; except he might be sure of some aid through his meanes, whereof he could see no appearance. He desired him therefore to withdraue forth of his realme, either into Flanders to his fathers sister the ladie Margaret; or into some other place where it pleased him to abide, and expect some better time more conuenient for his purpose. The said Richard gaue the king thanks, and obeyed his pleasure, departing thortlie after out of Scotland, and sailed into Ireland, from thence to transport into Flanders. But finallie making an attempt into England, he was taken prisoner in the abbey of Beaulien, togither with his wife, whose beautie was such, as king Henrie thought hit a more meet prize for an emperor, than for souldiours, and therefore vied hit be-rie honorable, appointing hit to remaine in the court with the quene his wife, where she continued so long as the said king liued.

This yere, the peace being well kept betwixt England and Scotland, the same was nere at point to haue bene broken; by reason that the Englishmen which laie in garrison within the castell of Portham, did make a frate with certeine Scottishmen that came riding nere to the castell, as it had bene to haue viewed it. But although they ment no euill, yet diuers of the Scottishmen were slain, and manie wounded and fore hurt; so that king James hauing information thereof, was sore displeased therewith, thinking and saing, that there was no more uncertaine thing, than to haue peace with England.
And hereupon he sent his herald Perchmount with harpe and beehement letters vnto the king of England, making great complaint for this iniurie and wrong done to his subiects, by those within the castell of Portham. But receiuing most reasonable letters for excuse of that which was done, as well from the king of England himselfe, as from the bishop of Durham owner of the castell, he was indifferentlie well appeased & satisficed, so that he required to haue the bishop to come into Scotland vpon safe conduct to common with him, as well for the full quieting of this matter, as for other things which he had to talke with him of.

The bishop by licence of the king his master, accomplished the Scottish kings request; so that com-ming into Scotland, he was receiued by him berie honorable at Melrose, where (after certeine talke had betwixt them for the appealing of this last displeasure) the king brake with the bishop for the hauing of the ladie Margaret, eldest daughter to Henrie the seuenth, as then king of England, to be giuen him in mariage: and further declared that he was minded to send his orators vnto his father the said king Henrie, about the same matter. And forsomuch as he knew that the bishop was one that might do much with king Henrie, who highlie fauoured him for his singular wisdom and learning, he desired him to be a meane to further his sute, which if it were obtained, he trusted it should highlie redound to the honor & wealth of both the realmes. The bishop considering hereinto as much as the king was able to tell him, did not onelie promise to do all that in him lay, but also encouraged him to send his orators with all speed, trusting that they should receiue a berie fa-uorable answer.

King James following the bishops aduise, anon after his returne into England, sent certeine persons ambassadoys vnto king Henrie, to moue him to the effect aboue mentioned. These ambassadoys were highlie welcomed, and berie well heard, so that to be briefe, their request seemed so agreeable to king Henries mind, that the mariage was thortlie thereupon concluded (but not consummate betwixt the foresaid James king of Scotland, and the said ladie Margaret daughter to king Henrie) in the seuen-teenth yere of the said king Henries reigne. At the same time, when this mariage was so agreed vpon, a peace was also concluded betwixt the kings of England and Scotland, for the terme of their two liues. And to auoid that none of either of the said kings subiects that had offended the lawes, should be receiued into anie of their dominions; it was accorded, that no Englishman should come within Scotland, without his princes letters supplicatorie vnto the king of Scots, nor anie Scottishman to come within England, without the like letters from his prince, desiring safe conduct and passeport.

In the yere next ensuing, Robert Blakater the bishop of Glascow, Adam Hepborne the earle Boswell, and other noble men of Scotland, were sent in ambassage from king James vnto the king of England, for the perfecting of the foresaid mariage betwixt king James, and the ladie Margaret, eldest daughter to king Henrie, which earle by letters of procuracie and mandat, in the name of his master king James, affied and handfasted the foresaid ladie Margaret in all solemne wise, according to the maner: which assurance and contract thus made, was published at Pauls crosse in London, on the day of the conuersion of saint Paule, in reioysing whereof Te Deum was song, and fier made, with great sca-ffing & banquetting throughout that cite. This done, the ambassadoys returned into Scotland, and then afterwards was great preparation made in England for the conueieng of the said ladie into Scotland, and likewise great purueiance there for the receiuing of hir.

On the firste of June, king Henrie took his iournie from Richmond, with his daughter the said ladie Margaret, and came to Colchester, where his mother the countesse of Richmond then laie. And after he had remained there certeine daies in pastime and great solace, he took leaue of his daughter, gi-uing hir his blessing with a fatherlie exhortation, and committed the conueieng of hir into Scotland vnto the earle of Surreie, and others. The earle of Northumberland, as then warden of the marches, was appointed to deliuer hir vpon the borders vnto the king of Scotland. And so this faire ladie was conueied with a great companie of lords, ladies, knights, esquires, and gentlemen, untill she came to the towne of Berwik, and from thence vnto Lan-bert church in Lamer more within Scotland, where she was receiued by the king and all the nobles of Margaret.

And verelie the English lords (as the earle of Surreie and others) which gaue their attendance on the said ladie till the mariage and feast were ended) at their returne home, gaue great praise not onelie to the manhood of the Scots, but also to their maners and heartie intertainment. For aswell the noble men as the ladies and gentlewomen of Scotland at that present, were nothing behind the English lords & ladies in costlie apparell, massie chaines, and other furniture, as well for themselves as their horses, and made great bankets to the English men, and shewed them such iastes and other pleasant pastimes in honor of the mariage, so well, as after the maner of the countrie could be deuised. By reason of this mariage and aliance, men were in great god hope that perfect peace and sincere amitie should continue betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland a long time after: and verelie during the life of king Henrie the seventh, no cause of breach was ministred betwixt him and his sonne in law, but that they liued in great loue and amitie.

The king of
commeth into Scotland.

About this time, the king of Denmarke, through diuision that did rise betwixt him & his lords, was constrained to forsake his countrie, and to come for aid into Scotland, where the king receiued him louingly, and vpon his earnest sute, for that he was both his cosine and confederat, and also the rather, at the contemplation of the French kings request and perswasion, he prepared an armie of ten thousand men, the which vnder the conduct of the earle of Arrane, he sent with the said king of Denmarke to assist him against his aduersaries. The earle of Arrane according to his commission, attending the Danish king into his countrie, restored him to his kingdome and former gouernement, and so leauing him in peaceable possession thereof, returned with his armie againe into Scotland, with great honor both to himselfe, the king, and realme.

He is restored to his kingdome by the earle of Arrane lieutenant to king James.

Shortlie after was a parlement called, during the which the queene was crowned, and manie good acts and constitutions made, especiallie touching the limiting of places where iustice should be ministred in the Isles and hie lands: whereby it came to passe, that the king was aswell obeyed, & his lawes were as duellie obserued and kept by the hie land men, as by those that dwelled in anie part of the low land. The king then being at peace with England, and iustice so ministred amongst his owne subiects, that they liued in great rest and quietnesse, certeine of his counsell [as William Glinskone bishop of Aberdeen] deuised waies to win the king great profit and gaines, by calling his barons & all those that held anie lands within his realme, to shew their euidences by way of recognition: and if they had not writings to shew, according to the ancient instruments and lawes of the realme sufficient for their warrant, the lands should remaine at the kings pleasure.

But when the king perceiued his people to grudge herewith, and not without cause, as with a thing deuised to disquiet his people and the whole countrie, of his owne courteous & gentle nature he easilie agreed with the possessors of such lands: for the which he purchased great loue amongst his people, & the deuisers of that ordinance wan passing great hatred and malice. This yeare in Maie the king held his court of iustice at Lodowder, and removing it to Edinburgh, there continued the same, where the lord of Thorne-ton was conuicted for killing his wiffe, and therefore

This yeare also, the king caused a mightie ship to be made, the which was put forth into the rode the seventh of Iulie, and the king sailed himselfe into the Maie, an Island in the Forth, and was driuen in againe with tempest: but the same ship was after appointed forth, and sent to the sea with sundrie valiant gentlemen in hir, to meet with the Hollanders which had taken and spoiled diuerse Scottish ships, and thowne the merchants and other that were in the same ouer board. For reuenge wherof, Andzeu Barton toke manie ships of the Hollanders and filled certeine pipes with their heads, which he sent vnto the king for a witnesse how he had sped. A Frenchman named sir Anthonie Darcie knight, called afterward Le sir de la Balotie, came through England into Scotland to seeke feats of arms. And comming to the king the foure and twentieth of September, the lord Hamilton fought with him right valiantlie, and so as neither of them lost anie peece of honor. This yeare James prince of Scotland and of the Isles was borne in the abbey of the Holie rod house, the one and twentieth of Iannarie; and on the thre and twentieth of the same moneth, he was baptised in the said abbey church. His godfathers were these, Robert bishop of Glasgow, and Patrike earle Bothwell; and the countesse of Huntclie was his godmother. The queene, after she was brought to bed, was verie weake and troubled with great sickenesse, so that she lay in great danger: for reuerie of whose helth the king went on foot vnto saint Pinitians in pilgrimage; and afterwards in Iulie, both the king and the queene went thither to visit the same saint.

Pope Julius the second sent an ambassadoz vnto king James, declaring him protector and defendoz of the faith, and in signe thereof sent vnto him a pure diadem or crowne wrought with flowers of gold, together with a sword, hauing the hilts and skabbert of gold set with pretious stones, which were presented vnto him by the said ambassadoz, and the abbat of Dunfermling, within the abbey church of Holie rod house. At that time the peace contracted betwixt the two kings of Scotland and England was there confirmed. The lord of Arceuer or Camfrie in Zealand (whose ancestors not long ago came forth of Scotland) sent his messenger the balliffe of Arceuer to the king, who presented vnto him certeine great horses and other rich presents, in remembrance that he came of the Scottish race; and the king in recompense thereof, sent vnto the said lord his order, and made his ambassadoz knight, rewarding him at his departing (which was in August) with right honorable gifts.

prince of Scotland departed this life at Striueling, and the bishop of Galloway also, who was appointed to be his gouernor.

* About this time, the B. (to tell you here, as saith Lefleus, a matter that to this day is remembred amongest the Romane people with great laughter) created a certeine Italian (with whole wit and pleasant speech he was delighted) abbat of Tungland. This man (being a noble framer of deceipt, & boaster of his wit) did on a time persuade the king, that he was so conuerfant in all hidden knowledge of naturall things, and in the secret science of Alchymie, that he could turne all other mettals into pure gold, if anie would beare the charge thereof. But after much time spent thereabout (with long looking of the king, and the nobilitie, to see the effect hereof) there was nothing done, but that their purses were emptied, and the vaine man was defamed by the breach of his promise. At length when he was fallen into the hatred and offense of all men, he did (partly to gather againe an opinion & report of his vaine glorie, and partly to recouer the kings fauor) giue out a rumor, that he would (by flying) be in France before the ambassadozs (which were sent thither, and had losed from thore to take their iournie) should come thither. For the performance whereof, he appointed a day for them to meet at Striueling, from whence he would take his flight, and begin his iournie. At what time, and to what place, manie resorted together, desirous to see this new bird; amongest whome (for recreations cause) came the king also.

What need manie words. This man fastening (which he had caused to be made of the fethers of diuerse foules) vnto both his sides, lifted by himselfe from the castell of Striueling, into the aire to take his iournie: but this deceiver suddenlie fell headlong to the ground, not able to be holpen by the force of his wings: wherewith the people (vncerteine whether they should rebuke the follie of the man, or pittie his misfortune) flocked about him, demanding this winged abbat how he did: to whome he answered, that he had broken the bone of his thigh, and was out of hope to stie anie more hereafter. To conclude, they all were like to die with laughing, to see him, which before would stie like Icarus, did now lie like Simon Pagus, with all his bodie almost broken in peces. At length when euerie one had laughed their fill, this wozthie abbat, to salue all the matter, referred the default of his flying wholie to his wings, because they were not made of eagles fethers and such like, but onelie of pullens fethers, not meet or accustomed to cut the aire with flight; and which by a certeine inward vertue (wozking according to the nature of those foules) did draw the fethers downe toward the donghill (whereupon those birds lue) as the adamant draweth iron.]

answer.

The 9 of Maie in the yeare after, the lord D'obigne, and the president of Tholous, came from Letwes the French king as ambassadozs to declare vnto king James, that he ment to match his eldest daughter in marriage with Francis de Wallois of Gien, and duke of Angouleme; notwithstanding that Charles king of Castile that was after empero, made sute for hir. Because therefore he ment not to conclude anie thing in such a weightie matter without consent of his confederats, of which he esteemed king James as chiefe, he required him of his aduise and counsell therein; who after aduise ment taken, made answer, that albeit the king of France had sufficient counsell about him, yet sith he had desired his aduise, he would friendlie giue the same: which was that he should rather marie his daughter within his owne realme, vnto such as should succeed him, than to bestow hir vpon anie forren prince, sith other wise some claime might be made in time comming vnto the crowne by such as should match with hir. And so with this answer, the president of Tholous departed, reporting the same at his comming home vnto the French king, who thereupon followed his owne determination therein, confirmed and allowed thus by his confederat the king of Scotland.

The lord D'obigne took a sickness and died thereof at Corfoplin, in the moneth of Iune, and caused his heart to be sent vnto saint Minians in Galloway; because he had botwed a pilgrimage thither whilst he remained the French kings lieutenant in Naples, where he had atchiued manie high enterprises against his enemies. His name was Bernard Steward, lieutenant of those men of warre which Charles the eight of that name king of France did send with Henrie earle of Richmond into England, when the same earle came against king Richard, whome he banquished, and thereby got the crowne. And so after manie noble victozies and valiant acts atchiued, this lord D'obigne ended his life in his owne countrie of Scotland, where he was borne. This yeare also in Maie and Iune, there were kept great iusts and tourneies in Edinburgh, by one calling himselfe the wild knight, who counterfeited the round table.

There were diuerse ambassadozs sent forth this yeare also, as the archdeacon of saint Andrews, and sir Anthonie Darcie into France, and the bishop of Murray into England. The fifteenth of Iulie, the quene was deliuered of a daughter, which shortly after she had receiued baptisme, deceased, and the quene in that childbed was againe in great perill of death. The bishop of Glascow died this yeare in his iournie to Jerusalem, the nine and twentieth of Iulie; James Beton succeeded him in that see. The thirtieth of Iulie, there was a great fraie betwixt the lord Marwell, and the lord Creighton of Sanchar, where the lord Creighton was chased with his companye from Dunfreis, & the lord of Dalzell and the young lord of Crauthlate with diuerse other were slaine. The nineteenth of September was a great earthquake in manie places both of England and Scotland, namelie, the same was percelued in churches.

The king of England sent a gentleman with hostles trimlie trapped with bards of Steele to be presented to king James, who thankfullie receiued them, and right honorablie rewarded the messenger. The archdeacon of saint Andrews returned forth of France in a great ship called the tresuroz, which ship was cast away on the coast of England, and the archdeacon, and foure hundred persons that were in hir, were brought to the king of England: but the archdeacon in Nouember following returned home and came to Edinburgh. Adam earle of Bothwell and lord Hales departed this life at Edinburgh the seuententh day of October, and earle Patrike succeeded him. Henrie the seuenth king of England, passed out of this world the two and twentieth of April, in the yeare 1509, and his sonne Henrie the eight succeeded him, after whose coronation king James sent an honorable ambassage of certeine lords and a bishop to congratulat him at his first entrie into the rule of his kingdome, as to the manner in such cases apperteineth.

* At this time, John and Andzew Barton (obteining letters of marque from the king against the Portugals) preieng on the borderers of Portugale did take manie of their ships (landed with rich merchandise) which they brought into Scotland. Which kind of pilles being often made by the Bartons vnto the Portugals, gaue them cause grauouslie to complaine to their king, of the wicked pirasie of the Scots.

Scots: but neither the king of Portingale with his council, nor his people with their force, could at any time suppress the Bartons (defended with the Scottish letters of marque) but that he would invade, spoile, & carie awaie the Portingale ships, if he happened upon any of them. Touching which, because it shall not seeme to be a manifest iniurie by the Bartons to the other (and not rather a iust cause given by the Portingals) we haue here inserted the letters of our king James the fifth (as they be found amongst the records) written to Immanuel king of Portingale for this matter. In which it shall manifestly appeare, whether the fault were not mostlie in the Portingals or no.

James the fifth, king of Scotland, to Immanuel the moorthie king of Portingale.

Worthie king, friend, and deere cousin, certeine yeares past, a Scottish ship laden with merchandize, & loking from the port of Sluis in Flanders, was invaded by two armed ships, governed by Portingals; whereof, the one was called John Wasque, and the other John Pret. Which ship (after certeine of hir merchants slaine, manie wounded, manie taken prisoners, and the rest cast into a fisher-bote to be set on land at the next shore) was by them caried into Portingale: all which was done in the sight of the rest of the Lusitan ships, which at the same time did also loose out of that haven to passe into Portingale. The full truth whereof, Charles the duke of Burgonie, and earle of Flanders, vnderstanding (and moued not so much for the singular iniurie done to the Scots, as by the breach of the priuilege, & right of his harborowes) did signifie the same (knowne, and found by order of iudgement) to the king of Portingale, admonishing him, that himselfe he tooke order for such wicked deeds, and for the restitution of the hurt and losse: that he would indeuor, that all the Portingals (which frequented the marts of Flanders) should by sentence of iudgement, satisfie all the damages which the Scots had sustained. But the vntimelie death (of that iust and valiant man) did frustrat all his determination.

The king also our grandfather (when he had by his letters complained of that iniurie to the king of Portingale, and had not much profited) gaue forth letters of marque, that is, he gaue authoritie to John & Robert Barton, brothers & heires to that John, which was maister of that ship so caried away, to recouer so much of the Lusitans. Before the execution whereof, my grandfather died: after which (my father being yet verie yong) the whole state of the realme did suppose it best to alter nothing in forren causes, vntill he came to full age. At time (being of sufficient yeares) he did forbear to grant the vse of the said letter of marque, till he had first consulted with the king of Portingale thereabouts. Whereupon (dispatching an ambassadoz vnto him) our father also died (before we could againe heare any answer from thence) leauing me a child not past thre yeeres old. For which cause, the gouernor of the kingdome iudged it best (during our minortie) to defer these letters of marque, vntill we came to riper yeares; which was done, not without great griefe and complaint of those miserable and poore men.

Whereupon, we also for these last two yeares (being now growen to riper age) are moued aswell to prouide, that other merchants which in that ship of Julian, haue lost their goods and kinred, as also to permit the heires of the said John Barton (by way of letter of marque before granted) to haue power given them, onelie to take so much recompense of the Portingals. Whereof yet, we thought it meet, that they should not vse any of them, vntill we had first (by this Snadone our esquier) laid before your maiestie the whole order of the matter, which is the iudiciall knowledge of the pirasie, the value of the losse, and the cause of our long silence, assuredlie hoping that you will not do any thing, in respect of your humanitie and brightness, but that which shall be good and iust. The which, if you see me is yet to be deferred; we require your worthinesse to consider, that we cannot forsake our subiects, afflicted with so great iniuries, whome hereafter we refer to the law of all nations, for recouerie of their goods taken away, which thing ought not to seeme to any man (by any meanes) to be the violating of friendship, league, or consanguinitie, wherewith we haue bene linked. Wherefore, when that same shall happen, we desire your excellencie to take the same in good part (most worthie cousin and conederat king) to whom I wish long and happy life. From Edinburgh, the day before the Ides of April, in the yeare, 1540.

The king about this time gaue liberrall possessions to Robert Worthwike, a notable artificer for making of field peeces and other guns; for the which liberalitie, he should make certeine great peeces in the castell of Edinburgh, whereof there are manie yet to be seene in Scotland, with this superscription:

Machina sum Scoto Borthuik fabricata Roberto.

This summer the king went in pilgrimage vnto saint Duthois in Kosse, and the quene remaining at Holie rood house, was brought to bed of a prince, the twentieth day of October, the which the third day after was baptisid and named Arthur. Two great ships came south of France to the king, fraught with guns, speares, and all other kind of munition for warre. Alexander, ballard sonne to the king, newlie made archbishop of saint Andrews, who had bene long in Germanie student there in the scholes with that famous clearkie Erasmus Roterdams, and had profited verie well, came from Flanders by sea into Scotland, and was iofullie receiued, because he had bestowed his time so well in vertues and learning.

The lord of Fast castell came ouer with him, who had trauelled through a great part of chylendome: and mozeouer passing into Turkie, came to the emperorour perour of Turkie at the citie of Caïre, who reteined him in seruice, and gaue him god interteinement, so that he remained with him, till he heard that the lining of Jfall castell was fallen to him by lawfull succession; notwithstanding that when he departed out of Scotland, there were eight severall persons before him to succed one after another, which in the meane time were all deceased. The 14 of Julie, Arthur prince of Scotland and the Isles, departed this life in the castell of Edinburgh. Two scorpions were found, the one quicke, and the other dead, in the orchard of the castell of Cragmiller, which thing was reputed for a marvellous great wonder, that anie should be seene within the Ile of Britaine. In the moneth of September, an vniuersall sickness reigned through all Scotland, whereof manie died. It was verie contagious, and they called it Stowe gallant.

There came also a passing faire woman into Scotland about the same time, naming hir selfe Katharine Gordon, wife to Perkin Warbecke, that had named himselfe duke of York, but at length being brought to the king, the confessed what she was, and so auoided the realme. In which meane while, the ladie Katharine Gordon hir selfe remained in England, and had right good maintenance, so that she liued there verie well and honorable manie yeres after. Furthermoze, the king vpon the eighth day of Nouember comming from Edinburgh to the water of Kile, took diuers misgouerned persons, & brought them to Jedworth, where the principall of the Trumbils, with naked swords in their hands, and withs about their necks met him, putting themselves in the kings mercie, which were sent to sundrie places to be kept in ward, with diuers other of those countreimen, whereby the marches were moze quiet after wards: and from thence the king passed to saint Johns towne, where iustice were holden the residue of the winter.

The next yere in the beginning of Auaie, the quene went from Dunfermling toward saint Dunthois in Kosse, and was all the way right honozable used and interteined. About the tenth of Julie, she returned to Edinburgh, where she found the lord Dacres, and sir Robert Duri knight come thither as ambassadors from the king of England hir brother, who were honozable receiued. In the yere next ensuing, in June, Andzew Barton being on the seas to meet the Portugals (against whom he had a letter of marque) sir Edmund Howard lord admerall of England, and the lord Thomas Howard, sonne and heire vnto the earle of Surrey, were appointed by the king of England to go likewise to sea with certeine ships, and met with the said Andzew as he returned homewards nere to the Dowones, hauing with him onelie one ship and one barke.

The Englishmen at the first made signe vnto the Scots as though they ment none euill, saue onelie to sauite them as friends; but getting withyn them, they set vpon their right fiercelie, and the Scots for a while did as valiantlie defend themselves, so that manie were slaine on both sides: but in the end the Englishmen got the vpper hand, wounded Andzew Barton the chiefe captaine of the Scots, that he died of the hurts that he there receiued, and the ship called the Unicorn, and the barke called Jennie Peruine, were both taken, with all the Scottishmen that remained alieue in the same, which were had to London, and staied as prisoners in the bishop of York his house for a time, and after sent home into Scotland. King James was sore offended with this matter, and thereupon sent an herald with letters, requiring redress for the slaughter of his people, and restitution of his ships, sith otherwise it might seme to giue occasion of breath of the peace. But the king of England denied, that the slaughter of a pirat (as he toke Andzew Barton to be) ought to breake anie bond of peace, yet neuerthelesse he promised to send commissioners to the borders, that should intreat of that matter, and other enozmities chanced betwene the two realmes.

* About this time was Alexander Hume the onlie gouernor of all the marches of Scotland (which parts) derelie beloued to king James, being a man of a fiercer disposition than was conuenient for the profit of the common-wealth. This man promised to the king (troubled with the cares of warre, and carefull to wipe auaie the reproch of late receiued by the English) that shortly he and his folowers with their kindred and alliances, would so bring the matter about, that the English should as greatlie lament for their losses, as they had now conceiued loies of their victozies. To the performance whereof, he gathered three thousand souldiers, wherewith he entered England, and there spoiled seven towne before anie succour might come to rescue them: but as he returned backe laden with booties of all kinds, his men (being accustomed to pilfries and robberies) impatient of delate, presentlie diuided the preie in the host, euerie one departing home to his owne as it was nearest vnto him. Yet Alexander did not disperse such as he might keepe together: but assembling as manie of them as would tarte, with a small companie abode the end of all things, alwaies hauing an eye to see if anie pursute were made after them. But when he perceiued no bodie to follow, and that there was no doubt of danger (passing the time moze careles than before) he fell vnto waies into the hands of three hundred English laid in wait for him, who (taking the opportunitie of the time) did set vpon him and his, and (driving them into extreme feare) they killed and put to flight all such as they encountered. In which tumult diuers of the Scots were slaine, and two hundred taken, of whome George Hume, brother of the said Alexander (exchanged for Comarch, Heron, and Ford, taken prisoners, and long reteined in Scotland for reuenge of the death of Robert Car) was one, and the chiefe, whereby he departed quietlie into Scotland.)

The French king and the duke of Gelderland, perceiving that the king of England was minded through procurement of the pope & others, to make them warres, either of them sent ambassadors into Scotland vnto king James, requiring his assistance against England: but king James minding to mainteine peace and concord betwixt the parties, sent an ambador vnto the king of England, desiring him in brotherlie and most louing wise to liue in peace and quietnesse, and not to make anie wars against his confederat friends, offering himselfe to agree and compound anie difference that was fallen betwixt the king of England and the said princes. The king of England, who had already sent aid vnto the ladie regent of the low countries against the duke of Gelderland, made such faire answer hereunto as he thought good with reason, and so dispatched the ambadour backe againe to his maister, without anie moze addo in that matter, about the which he came for that time.

* Much about these daies, there was called a prouinciall synod of bishops, abbats, and other religious persons at Edinburgh, in the monastrie of the Dominicke friers, Basomanie the popes legat being present. In which by the common voice of them all (although against the will of manie of them) it was ordeined that benefices or priests livings (whose reuenues did partly exceed the value of 40 pounds) should pay Shortlie after came the bishop of Murrey home, hauing bene at Rome, in France, and England, bringing with him from the pope, and the kings of France and England, manie god and pleasant letters: and with him came a cleare of Spaine in ambassage unto the king. This yere the eleuenth day of Aprill, the quene was deliuered of a yong prince in the palace of Luthgo, who was shortlie after baptised, and named James the first prince of Scotland, and of the Isles, that after succeeded his father in the kingdom. The lord Dacres, and doctor West came in ambassage from the king of England, and Monsieur de la Mot came with letters also from the French king, to persuaue king James to make warre against England, promising him monie, munition, and all other necessarie prouisions of warre. In his waie as he passed the seas towards Scotland, he had drowned three English ships, & brought seven awaie with him unto Lieth for prizes, in the which were but three Englishmen left alieue. Shortlie after, maister James Ogilvie abbat of Dyrburgh came south of France with letters of the like effect. After this Robert Barton went to the sea, and in Julie brought into Scotland 14 prizes of Englishmen which he had taken.

About this season, the lord of Dumfries was slaine in Edinburgh by two persons, which toke sanctuary in Holie rood house, and so escaped. John erle of Atholl deceased the nineteenth of September, & Lion Harold king of armes deceased the first of October. Great mistule was exercised on the borders in this season, and therefore the king assembled the lords in Edinburgh for reformation thereof; and while they were there, the quene was brought to bed of a child, which died shortlie after it was christened. There came a great ship into Scotland, which the king of France had sent unto the king, laden with artillerie, powder, and wines, & then was the league and band renewed betwixt Scotland and France. The same ship landed at Blacknells the nineteenth of November. King James sent a pursuant called Unicorn into France, and another into England called Flaie, which Flaie required a safe conduct for an ambassador to be sent from the king his maister unto the king of England: but this would not be granted.

Upon the said Flaies returne, Monsieur de la Mot was sent backe into France, and with him sir Walter Ogilvie, and a messenger whome the pope had sent into Scotland. On the sixteenth of March next ensuing, doctor West came as ambassador into Scotland from the king of England, appointing that certeine commissioners should meet on the borders for redress of all quarrels betwixt the two realmes, in the moneth of June next ensuing. And this appointment was kept, but no good could be done, as after shall appere. The king sent Foznian bishop of Murrey into France, to signify unto the French king the message of the said doctor West, and other things. In the moneth of Maie, there came certeine ships out of Denmark laden with guns, powder, armes, & other kind of munition. Also Monsieur de la Mot landed in the west part of Scotland the sixteenth of Maie, with foure ships fraught with wine and flower, and returned againe the nineteenth of the same moneth.

The great Odonell of Ireland came to king James at Edinburgh, the first of June, offering his friendship and seruice to him before all other princes, and speciallie against the king of England; whereupon he was thankfullie receiued, honorable intertained, & rightlie rewarded. And so the band of friendship being with him concluded, he returned into his countrie. The king prepared a great naue of ships, the principall whereof were the Michaele, Margaret, and James. They made saile towards the sea the twentieth seventh of Julie; and the king sailed in the Michaele himselfe, till they were past the Island of Gaie, James Gordon son to George earle of Huntlie being one of the capteins of the same ship.

The commissioners met on the borders in June, according to the appointment: but because the Englishmen would not consent to make anie redress of restitution, till the fifteenth of October next, thinking by that delate and continuance of time, they should understand the state of their kings proceedings in France, and in the meane time retaine in their hands the Scottishmens goods which they had taken both by sea and land (as the Scottish writers asserme) the king of Scots being thereof aduertised, sent Lion king of armes unto king Henrie then lieng at siege before Teruine, with letters of complaint, commanding him that if king Henrie refused to accomplish the contents of his said letters, he should denounce warre unto him. Whereupon Lion arriving in the English armie with his cote of arms on his backe, about the middell of August, desired to speake with the king, and was within a short space by Carter chiefe king at arms of England brought to the kings presence, hauing his nobles and counsellors about him, where, with due reuerence, & some good words first vitered, he deliuered his letters, the tenor whereof insueth.

The tenor of the king of Scots letters.

Right excellent, right high, and mightie prince, our dearest brother and cosine, we commaund vs unto you in our maiestie hartie manner, and receiued fra Rast Heralde your letters, quhar vntill ye approue and allowe the doings of your commissioners latelie being with ours at the borders of bathe the realmes, for making of redress quhilk is thought to you and your counsell should be continuat and delat to the sixteenth day of October. Als ye write slaars by se aught not compere personallie, but by their attourneys. And in your letters with our herald Flaie ye ascertaine vs ye will naught enter in the treux taken betwixt the maiestie christian king and your father of Aragon, because ye and others of the hale liege nether should nor may take peace, treux, nor abstinence of warre with your common enemie, without consent of all the confederats. And that the emperour, king of Aragon, yea and euery of you be bound to make actuall warre this instant sommer against your common enemy. And that so to do is concluded and openlie swozne in Paules kirke at London, vpon S. Markes day last by past. And farther haue denied safe conduct vpon our request that a seruitor of ours might haue relosted

to

to your presence (as our herauld Flaie reports).

Right excellent, right high, and mightie prince, our dearest brother and cousing, the said meeting of our and your commissioners at the borders, was peremptorily appointed betwixt you and vs after diuerse diets, for reformatioun befoze continuet to the commissioners meeting, to effect that due redresse suld haue bene made at the said meeting, like as for our part our commissioners offered to haue made that time. And for your part, no malefactor was then arrested to the said diet. And to close the same, ye now write that slaars by sex need not compere personallie, but by their attournes, quhilk is again law of God and man. And gif in criminall action all slaars suld naught compere personallie, na putitioun suld follow for slaughter, and then hane it were to seke farther meetings or redresse. And hereby apperes (as the deed shewes) that ye will nouthir keepe gud waies of iustice and equitie nor kindnes with vs.

The great wrongs and unkindnes done befoze to vs and our lieges we ponderate, quhilk we haue suffred this long time in bybearing, mainfowering, noundrelling of attemptes, so as the bill of the taken of inhalding of bastard Heron and his complices in your contrie, quha slue our wardan vnder trust of daies of meeting for iustice, & thereof was filat & ordeint to be deliuerd, in slaying our liege noblemen, vnder color by your folks, in taking of others out of our realme prilonet and chanet by the crags in your contrie, withhalding of our wiues legacie promitt in your diuerse letters for despite of vs, slaughter of Andzow Barton by your awn command, quha than had naught offended to you nor your lieges vnredrest, and breaking of the amity in that behalfe by your deed, and withhalding of our ships and artillarie to your vse.

Quharbyon, eft our diuerse requisitions at your wardens, commissioners, ambassadors, & your selfe, ye wzate and als shew by others vnto vs, that full redresse suld be made at the said meeting of commissioners, and sa were in hope of reformatioun, or at the lest ye for our sake wald haue desist fra inuasioun of our friendes and couings within their awne countreies that haue naught offended at you, as we first required you, in fauour of our tender couing the duke of Gelder, quham to destroy and disinherit ye sent your folks, and did what was in them. And right sa we lately desired for our brother & couing the maist christen king of France, quham ye haue caused to tme his countreie of Millaine, and now inuades his selfe, quha is with vs in second degree of blude, and hase bene vnto you kind without offense, and moze kindar than to vs.

Notwithstanding, in defense of his person we mon take part, and thereto ye be cause of others, haue giuen occasion to vs and to our lieges in time by past, nouthir doing iustlie nor kindlie toward vs, proceeding alwaies to the utter destruction of our nearest friendes, quha mon do for vs quhan it shall be necessarie; in euill example that ye will hereafter be better vnto vs, quham ye lightlie fauour, manifestlie wzanged your sister for our sake in contrarie our wits: and saieng to our herauld that we giue you faire wordes, and thinke the contrarie. Indeed such it is, we gaue you wordes as ye dud vs, trusting that ye suld haue emended to vs, or wzorhin kinder to our friendes for our sakes, and suld naught haue stopped our seruitors passage to labour pear, that they mought as the papes halines exhorted vs by his breuites to do. And therebpon we were contented to haue ouersene our harmes, and to haue remitted the same, though bther informatioun was made to our halie father pape Julie, by the cardinall of Porke, your ambassador.

And sen you haue now put vs fra our gude beleue through the pzemisses, and speciallie in denieng of safe conduct to our seruants, to resort to your presence, as your ambassador doctor West instantlie desired we suld sende one of our counsell vnto you vpon great matters, and appointing of differences debatable betwixt you and vs, furthering of pear if we might, betwixt the most christen king & you, we neuer hard to this purpose safe conduct denied betwixt Infidels. Herefoze we write to you this time at length plainesse of our mind, that we require and desire you to desist fra farther inuasioun and utter destruction of our brother and couing the maist christen king, to quham by all confederatioun, blude and alie, and also by new band quhilk you haue compelled vs latelie to take through your iniuries & harmes with out remedie done dailie vnto vs, our lieges and subiects, we are bounden and oblig for mutuall defense ilk of others, like as ye & your confederates be oblig for mutuall inuasiouns and actuall warre.

Certifieng you, we will take part in defense of our brother and couing the maist christen king, and will do what thing we trust may cause you to desist fra pursute of him, and for deuit and postponit iustice to our lieges we mon giue letters of marque according to the amitie betwixt you and vs, quhar to ye haue had little regard in time by past, as we haue ordaint our herauld the bearer hereof to say, gif it like you to heare him and gif him credence. Right excellent, right hie & mightie prince our dearest brother and couing, the Crumtie haue you in keeping. Geuen vnder our signet at Edinburgh the twentieth first day of Julie.

King Henrie hauing read the letter, and considered thereof with aduise of his counsell, sent for the herauld againe, and told him that he had read and well perceiued the contents of the letters which he had deliuered to him, and would make him answer with condition, condition, that he would promise to declare the same to his maister. Whereunto Lion made this answer: Sir, I am his naturall subiect, and he is my naturall lord, and what he commandeth me to say, I may boldly say with fauour; but the commandements of others I may not, nor dare say vnto my soueraigne lord. But your letters sent by me, may declare your maisters pleasure, albeit your answer requireth doings and not sayings, that is, that you immediately should returne home. Then said the king: I will returne at my pleasure to your damage, and not at thy maisters summons. And herewith he caused an answer to be writtten to the king of Scots, in forme as followeth.

King Henrie his answer.

Right excellent, right high & mightie prince, &c. We haue receiued your writing dated at Edinburgh the twentieth day of Iulie, by your herald Lion this bearer, wherein after rehearfall and accumulation of manie furnished iniuries, griefs and dangers down by vs and our subiects to you and your lieges, the specialties whereof were superfluous to rehearse, remembreing that to them and euery of them in effect reasonable answer founded vpon law and conscience, hath tofore bene made to you & your counsell; ye not onelie require vs to desist from further inuasion and vtter destruction of your brother and cosine the French king, but also certifie vs that you will take part in defense of the said king, and that thing which ye trust may rather cause vs to desist from pursute of him, with manie contriued occasions and communications by you causelesse sought & imagined, founding to the breach of the perpetuall peace passed, concluded, and sworn betwixt you and vs, of which your imagined quarrels causelesse deuiled to breake to vs, contrarie to your oth promised, all honoz & kindness, we can not maruell; considering the ancient accustomed manners of your progenitozs, which neuer kept longer faith & promise than pleased them.

Howbeit, if the loue and dread of God, mightinesse of bloud, honoz of the world, law and reason had bound you, we suppose ye would neuer haue so farre proceeded, spectallie in our absence. Wherin the pope and all princes christened may well note in you dishonozable demeanour, when ye lieng in wait, seeke the waies to do that in our said absence, which ye would haue bene well aduised to attempt, we being within our realme and present. And for euident approbation hereof, we need none other proofes nor witneses, but your owne writings heretofore to vs sent, we being within our realme, wherein ye neuer made mention of taking part with our enimie the French king, but passed the time with vs till after our departure from our said realme. And now percase ye supposing vs so farre from our said realme, to be destitute of defense against your inuasions, haue vttered the old rancour of your mind, which in couert manner ye haue long kept secret.

Neuerthelesse, we remembreing the brittleness of your promise, & suspecting though not wholie beleuing so much bittredfallnesse, thought it berie expedient and necessarie to put our said realme in a readines for resisting of your said enterpises, hauing firme trust in our Lord God, and the righteounesse of our cause, with the assistance of our confederats & allies, we shall be able to resist the malice of schismatiks and their adherents, being by the generall counsell expresse excommunicate and interdicted; trusting also in time conuenient to remember our friends, and requite you and our enimies, which by such vnaturall demeanoz haue giuen sufficient cause to the disherison of you and your posteritie for euer, from the possibilitie that ye thinke to haue to the realme, which ye now attempt to inuade.

And if the example of the king of Nauarre, being excluded from his realme for assistance giuen to the French king, can not restraine you from this vnaturall dealing; we suppose ye shall haue like assistance of the French king, as the king of Nauarre hath now, who is a king without a realme, & so the French king peaceably suffereth him to continue, whereunto good regard would be taken. And like as we heretofore touched in this our writing, we need not to make anie further answer to the manifold griefs by you furnished in your letter: forsomuch as if anie law or reason could haue remoued you from your sensuall opinions, ye haue bene manie and oftentimes sufficientlie answered to the same: except onelie to the pretended griefs touching the denieng of our safe conduct to your ambassadoz last sent vnto vs.

Whereunto we make this answer, that we had granted the said safe conduct; and if your herald would haue taken the same with him, like as he hath bene accustomed to solicit safe conducts for merchants and others heretofore, ye might as sone haue had that, as anie other: for we neuer denied safe conduct to anie your lieges to come vnto vs and no further to passe, but we see well, like as your said herald had heretofore made sinister report contrarie to truth, so hath he done now in this case, as it is manifest and open. Finallie, as touching your requisition to desist from further attempting against our enimie the French king, we know you for no competent iudge of so high authoritie to require vs in that behalfe. Wherefore (God willing) we purpose with the aid and assistance of our confederats and allies to prosecute the same; and as ye do to vs and our realme, so it shall be remembreed and acquitted hereafter by the helpe of our Lord & our patrone saint George, who right excellent, right high and mightie prince, &c. The king of Posham.

The Wzaies.

This letter being deliuered vnto the Scottish herald, he departed with the same into Flanders, there to haue taken ship; but for want of readie passage he staied, and returned not into Scotland till Flodden field was fought, and the king slaine. For king James perceiuing all the Englishmens doings to tend vnto war rather than to peace, hauing taken order for the assembling of his people, immediately after he had sent forth his herald with commandement to denounce the warre, he determined to inuade the English confines, and first before his maine force was come together, the lord Humes that was lord chamberlaine and warden of Scotland, the thirtieth day of August, hearing that the Englishmen had fetched a bootie within the Scottish ground, assembled a power, & followed them into Northumberland, but yet he could returne he was forelaid [in Wyome house, or Wyome field] by the Englishmen, which breaking out of their ambushes, put the Scottishmen to the worke, and of them toke and slue manie.

These wars thus begun, the king determined to go to his armie (as it seemeth) not yet fullie assembled. Whereupon comming to Lincolne, he went to the church to heare euensong; as the maner was. To whom, after he had entered the chappell, there came an old man, whose heare was somewhat yellowish red, hanging downe vpon his shoulders, his forehead high with baldnesse, bare headed, hauing his bodie covered with a blewish garment, girded with white, and verie reuerent in his countenance. This man seeing the king, passed through the company standing there, and drew nere to the king. Who being now come vnto him (and with a certeine rude behauiour, leaning vpon the seat wherein the king was placed) in homelie sort saied vnto him: King James sent vnto thee, to giue thee admonishment that thou hasten not forward to the place which thou hast determined: which warning if thou dost despise, it shall succeed ill with thee, and with all such as shall attend vpon thee. Further I am commanded to giue thee intelligence before hand, that thou eschue the familiaritie, custome, or counsell of women, and if thou dost otherwise, it shall succeed to thy hurt and reproch. After which thus spoken, he mingled himselfe with the other company, neither could after be found (the euensong being ended) when he was sought for by the king: for he was neuer scene after that he had thus deliuered his message. Which seemed the more strange, because that manie which stood nere him (marking all his order, and desirous to haue heard more things from him) could not perceiue his departure; amongst which persons (of those that meant to haue asked him further questions) Dauid Lindsay (a man of approved credit and vertue, verie well learned, and whose life was far estranged from lieng and falsehood) was one, who told this same to me (saith Buchanan) as a thing most certeine; or else I would haue ouerpast it as a fable caried about by common report.]

In the meane time was the whole power of Scotland assembled, with the which king James approching to the borders, and nothing abashed with the euill lucke thus at the beginning chanced to his people, purposed with greater aduantage of victorie to recover that detriment; and hereupon he made such hast, that he would not staie for the whole power of his realme, which was in preparing to come forward vnto him; but comming to the borders, he passed ouer the water of Tweed the two and twentieth of August, and entered into England, lodging that night at Wilsallham nere to the riuer of Tuisell, and the next day laid siege vnto the castell of Posham, and within short space wan the Wzaies, ouerthrowe the Barnekin, & slue diuerse within the castell, so that the capteine and such as had charge within it, desired the king to delate the siege, while they might send to the earle of Surreie alreadie come with an armie into the north parts, couenanting if they were not rescued by the nineteenth day of that moneth, they should deliuer the castell vnto the king. This was granted: and because none came within the time to the rescue, the castell was deliuered at the appointed day; a great part of it was ouerthrowne and beaten downe. After this he wan the castles of Ffourd and Etell, & diuerse other places of strength, of which, part were ouerthrowne. He also toke manie prisoners, and sent them away into Scotland, and diuerse he assured: and thus he abode an eighte daies within England, till two parts of his armie were scaled & departed home from him, which they did vpon this occasion.

The king was determined & persuaded to haue besieged Werwicke (beyond which he was now passed) since the same alone was more honor (than all the other places besides) if they wan it; the taking whereof they supposed not to be verie hard, because they were sure that the towne and castell were furnished of all things for the defense thereof. Whereupon, the king (deeming nothing too hard for his armie, especiallie, since the English were set on worke as much as they might in the French wars) being nourished in that vanitie (by his flattering courtiers) did leaue the same vndone at this time, meaning in his returne easilie to haue obtained it. But as they were yet at Ffourd, a herald of the English came vnto them, requiring that they would appoint a day and place, where and when both the armies might foine in battell. Whereupon, there was a counsell called amongst the Scots, in which it was agreed by the greater part, that the Scots should returne home into their countrie, leaue with so small a company they might hazard the state of the whole countrie; especiallie, since that they had alreadie sufficientlie obtained fame, glorie and riches, and to the uttermost satisfied the band of amitie with the French; for there was no iust cause, why they for number (so few) and for trauell (in ouerthrowing so manie forts) so much weakened, should now againe be laid open to so great a multitude of the English daile increasing with succors. For it was said at that time; that Thomas Halward brought into the field (besides the rest of his armie) 6000 of chosen and valiant souldiers from the English campe (in France) before Turweine.

To which persuation (to make the matter more strange) it was further added, that if the king did depart; the English host of necessitie must be dissolved, and could not that yeare againe be repaired, because their souldiers were set from the furthest parts of the realme; and that if the king would needs fight, that he then should do it in his owne realme, keeping the time & place in his power alwaies to be appointed. But when the French ambassado (and certeine other, fed with the French pensions) labored to the contrarie; the king being by nature fierce, and greedy of warre, was easilie persuaded to abide his enemie in that place. In the meane time, when the English came not forth (at the day appointed to them by the herald, which before had bene with the Scots) the noblemen of Scotland, taking occasion thereof, did afresh go to the king, declaring that their not comming to battell was onelie a traine and deceit, deferring the matter from day to day, to the end that their force might be increased, and the Scots diminished.

Wherefore said they, we should vse the like policie against them. For since they haue not attended the time time prescribed vnto them, it is no shame to the Scots to retorne into their countrie without battell, or to fight within their owne limits. Of both which, the surer counsell were to follow the first; which if it be not liked, then is there good occasion offered to execute the other. For since the riuer of Till (hauing his banks) is not passable, but at certeine miles hence (except it be by a bidge) some few may there resist a great multitude. Besides which, when a part of the English armie is passed the bidge, the same bidge made easilie (by engins placed therfore) be cut in sunder; so that there shall not be passage for anie more: by means whereof, the one part of them shall be subdued on the one side of this riuer, before that anie aid can come vnto them from the other banke. The king liked neither of these deuises and persuasions; but answered, that he would not suffer the English to depart (vnsoughten with) although there were an 100000 against him. At which rash answer, the whole nobilitie was grievously offended.

Whereupon Archembald Dowglas earle of Angus (which farre excelled all the others both in peeres and authoritie) laboured to turne the kings mind with all gentle persuasions, and began to make a more ample discourse vpon the two former counsels giuen by the nobilitie. For he shewed that the king had fullie satisfied the request of the French, in that he had now turned the greatest part of the English armie before bent against the French, against himselfe and his owne people; and had so wrought, that those great armies should neither hurt France nor doe anie iniurie vnto the Scots, sith they were not able long to remaine in campe in those cold places, and in a barren countrie unfurnished of all things (by the calamities of the last warres) and in which there was no corne; and if there were, it could not be ripened (the winter comming on so fall) in those northerne parts of the realme.

And where the French ambassadoz doth so much bidge vs vnto the battell, I suppose that the same should not seeme either new or strange vnto vs, that a strange man (which doth not respect the common euill of the realme, but the priuat commoditie of his owne nation) be ouer laushy in poloring out the blood of other men. Besides which, his request is ouer impudent, to demand of the Scots that which the French king (a man of singular experience and wisdom) doth not iudge conuenient for his owne kingdome or dignitie, if we be ouerthrowne. Yetther should the losse of his host seeme more light vnto him (although we are few in number) because that all they of Scotland (which excell in force, authoritie or counsell) are assembled here together, who being slaine, the rest of the realme would some be a preie to the victor. What? Is it more safe for vs, and more profitable to the eschewing of all danger, for him to fight at this present? No trulie. For if Lewes doe suppose, that the English (by imagined meanes) may be either made needie of monie, or else worried by de laie; what can be done more necessarie for the present state of things, than to compell the entire to diuide his armie, to the end that we may ease the weight of warre against the French by one part of the host to be sent against vs, and still to hold them plaie as it were alwaies to keepe them readie to set vpon vs, & by removing to giue them cause to folow vs? For so I suppose shall the glorie and thew (which these men I feare rather valiant in words than deeds, doe with their rashnesse so much pretend) be fullie answered. For what can happen more honorable to the king, than that we (by the ouerthrow of so manie castles, by the spoile of so manie countries with sword and fire, and by the drining home of so great booties and preies) haue done that iniurie to them, as that their countrie shall not by the peace of manie yeeres recouer his former estate? What greater profit may we looke for by warre, than in so great tumult of warres, with great praise and honor to vs, and with shame and reproch to our enimies, to obtaine quiet, ioined with gaine and glorie for the refreshing of our selues? Which kind of victorie (that is gotten more by words than by swords) chieflie belongeth to men, and of men speciallie to the leaders and capteins, as such a glorie whereof the common souldiours may not challenge anie part.

Which being thus spoken by earle Dowglas, although all they which were present seemed (by their countenance) to giue consent thereto: yet the king (who had with other bound himselfe to fight with the English) receiued these counsels with contrarie eares; and in heat commanded Dowglas to depart home, if he were afraid of the enimie. Whereupon he (concelting some unkindnesse, and inwardlie beholding wherevnto all these things would come by the kings rashnesse) forthwith burst out in teares. After which (as soone as he could settle himselfe thereto) he spake these few words. If (said he) my former life did not cleare me from the reproch of a coward, I know not with what reason or persuasion I might cleare or defend my selfe. For trulie so long as this my bodie was able to susteine anie laboz, I neuer spared to spend the same in the defence of my countries helpe, and my soueraignes honor. But since I see their eares to exclude my counsell (which is the onelie thing wherewith I can now be profitable) I here leaue my two somes (who next vnto my countrie are most deare to me) and the rest of my kinned (of whom I greatlie account) as a certeine pledge of the truth and loue of my mind towards thee, and the common helpe of my countrie. And I pray God that he make this feare of mine to be false, and that I may rather be counted a lieng prophet, than behold those things which I feare will happen vnto vs. Which words when the Dowglas had said to the king, he departed thence with his companie. The rest of the nobilitie (because they saw they could not draw the king to their mind) took that place for battell which was next vnto them, to the end (seeing they were much inferior in number to their enimies, for there were 26000 fighting men in the English armie, as it was knowne by the scouts) to defend themselves with the benefit of the place, and thereupon got the hill next vnto their campe.)

In which meane time, the earle of Surrie, lieutenant to the king of England, hauing raised all the power of the north parts of England, came with the same towards the place where he heard that king James was incamped, and approaching within three miles of the Scottish campe in full sight of the Scottishmen, pitched downe his tents, and incamped with his whole armie. Although king James had great desire to fight with his enimies thus lodged in full view of his campe; yet because he was incamped in a place of great aduantage, so as the enimies could not approach to fight with him, but with great losse and danger to cast themselves away, he thought good to keepe his ground, speciallie because all those of the nobilitie, who were knowne to be of experience, did not hold with their aduise that counselled him to giue battell.

At that time the earle of Surrie had sent an officer at armes vnto him, requiring him to come forth of his strength vnto some indifferent ground, where he would be readie to encounter him, & name the earle of Huntleie, a man for his high valiantie ioined with wisdom and policie, had in most reputation of all the residue, affirmed in plaine words [besides that which Dowglas had before said] that nothing nothing could be either more fond or foolish, than to fight at pleasure of the enimie, and to set all on a maine chance at his will and appointment, and therefore it should be good for them to remaine there in place of advantage, and with prolonging the time to trifle with the enimie, in whose campe there was already great scarcitie of vittells, neither was it possible that they should be vittelled from the inner parts of the realme, by reason of the cumbersome waies for cariage to passe now after such abundance of continuall raine as of late was fallen, and not like as yet to ceasse, so that in sitting still and attempting nothing rashlie without aduise, the king should haue his enimies at his pleasure, as vanquished without stroke striken through disadvantage of the place, and lacke of vittells to susteine their languishing bodie.

Howe he ther.

And suerlie beside the want of vittells, the foule and euill weather fore annoied both parties; for there had not bene one faire day, no scarce one houre of faire weather of all the time the Scottish armie had lien within England, but great cold, wind & raine, which had not onelie caused manie of the Scots to returne home, but also fore boded the Englishmen, as well in their iourne thitherwards, as also while they lay in campe against the Scottish armie. There was sending of messengers betwixt them to and fro, and the king had sent his quarell in writing vnto the earle of Surrie by his herald Flaie the night before the battell, containing as followeth.

King James his quarell vnto the earle of Surrie.

Where it is alledged that we are come into England against our bond and promise, thereto we answer: that our brother was bound as farre to vs as we were to him, and when we swore last before his ambassadors in presence of our counsell, we expressed speciallie in our oath, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else. We swear that our brother brake first to vs, and of his breach we required him diuers times of amends: and latelie we warned him, as he did not vs per we brake. And this we take for our quarell, and by Gods grace shall defend the same at your assised time, which with Gods helpe we shall abide. Thus was the king verie desirous to trie the matter by battell, although the wisest sort of his nobles wished not that he should doe any thing ouer rashlie.

chances.

There chanced also manie things taken (as we would say) for warnings of some great mischance to follow, which though some reputed but as vaine and casuall haps; yet the impression of them bred a certaine religious feare and new terror in his heart. For as he was in counsell with his lords, to vnderstand their opinions touching the order of his battell, there was an hars start amongst them, which hauing a thousand arrowes, daggers, and other kind of things bestowed at him, with great noise and shouting, yet he escaped from them all safe and without hurt. The same night also, misse had gnawne in under the buckle and leather of his helmet where with he should fasten the same to his head. And moreover, the cloth of velle of his inner tent (as is said) about the brake of the day, appeared as though the deawie moisture thereof had bene of a blondie colour.

Hereupon the king keeping himselfe within his tent, the earle of Surrie constrained by necessitie to seeke all waies whereby to traine the king downe from the hill where he was lodged, removed his campe towards the hills of Floddon, where the king of Scots laie incamped: and on the ninth day of September passed the water of Till at Twissell bridge; the reuerward going ouer at Millford, putting themselves as nere as they could betwixt the Scottish campe and Scotland. King James perceiving the Englishmen to passe the water, iudged that they had ment to win an hill that laie betwixt them and his campe, and therefore to preuent them, he caused his field to be raised, and fier to be set on the litter & cabins which they had made of boughs, and so with all speed removed to the other hill, being gotten thither per the Englishmen could perceiue him to be removed out of his former lodgings, because the smoke of the fiers which the Scots had made, couered all the countrie betwixt the two armies.

In the meane while were the Englishmen aduanced to the foot of Floddon hill, hauing thereby gotten double aduantage: for the Scottish ordinance could not much annoie them in marching upwards vnder the leuill thereof, and they againe might gall the Scots in shooting off at them, as they came downewards vpon them. For king James hauing disappointed the Englishmen of the hill, thought to relie it should be an easie matter for him to overthrow them, which being put beside the place where they intended (as he thought) to haue camped, would neuer abide the countenance of his puissant armie, if he might attaine to ioine with them. Therefore the Scottish armie [after they had appointed the same into three wards, whereof (as saith Lelcus) the earle of Huntlee and the lord Hume led the right wing, the left had the earle of Cratford and Montrose; and the king himselfe kept the middle ward, with the earles of Argile and Lennox] making downewards, encountered with the English host nere to the foot of the mountaine called Brannton, and first Sir Edmund Haward leading one of the out wings of the English armie, hauing with him three thousand men, being fiercelie assailed by the Scots on foot, hauing speares and long weapons, and also by certeine horsemen, was in the end discomfited, and his people beaten downe and put to flight, so that being of them forsaken, he was constrained to follow. But yet he and diuerse other which escaped, ioined themselves to the next battell as well as they might. This so prosperous a beginning, who would thinke should haue turned to the losse of the Scots part, and aduancement of the English side. But so it came to passe, for king James no sooner saw that wing of the English host overthrowne and discomfited, but that he deemed how all the whole power of the Englishmen had bene fleeing away: and therefore alighting beside his horse, and commanding those that were about him to follow, prepared himselfe to pursue the chase.

The king nothing moued with these exhortations, breaking his array of battell, with a companie of noble men, rushed forward into the fore ward, where accomplishing the office of a footman, he found the Englishmen not fleeing, but manfullie standing at resistance,

At length sir Edward Stanlie with the reregard of the Englishmen came fiercelie downe from the hill of Banrton, vpon the backe of the kings armie, wherein they fought cruelle on both parts for a long space; but at length the victorie inclined to the Englishmen. For the king himselfe was there beaten downe and slaine, with all that whole battell which first entered the fight. The other part of the Scottish host, whereof Alexander Hume lord chamberlaine had the gouernance, although he saw where the other Scottishmen were in danger, and closed in on euerie side, yet would he not once remoue one foot forward out of the place (where he stood) to aid them. Where- uer, the lacke of discretion in the king, which would needs run vpon his owne death, amazed the minds of all men, and brought them into such perplexitie, that they knew not what to do; but looked one vpon another without stirring to or fro, as those that were in despaire now after the death of their king to reco- uer the victorie, which by so strange a chance seemed as it were slipped out of their hands.

Howbeit, the lord chamberlaine bare the most blame, for that he did not cause a new onset to be gi- uen. But it happened well for the Englishmen: for if king James had ordered himselfe wiselie in this battell, or that after he was slaine, a new furie had moued the Scots to haue renewed the fight in re- uenge of the kings death, as had bene expedient, the victorie vndoubtedlie had bene theirs (as was thought by men of great vnderstanding.) Where- vpon the Englishmen rememyng how manifest- lie Gods goodnesse appeared towards them in this battell, confessed themselves long after bound to God for their safetie and deliuerance out of that pre- sent danger. The fight began about foure of the clocke in the after noone, and continued thre houres, in the which sixtene thousand men were slaine on both parts: and of that number a third part at the least was of Englishmen (as was crediblie repo- ted) but (as our English writers affirme) there died of Englishmen not past sixtene hundred.

But yet the Scottishmen hold, that there died more of the Englishmen than of their nation at this field, and that manie thought it was not the bodie of king James which the Englishmen found in the field, and toke it for his; but rather an other Scottish mans corpes, called the lard of Bonehard, who was also slaine there. And it was affirmed by sundrie, that the king was seene the same night aliue at Kel- so: and so it was commonlie thought that he was liuing long after, and that he passed the seas into o- ther countries, namelie to Ierusalem to visit the ho- lie sepulchre, and so to dye forth the residue of his daies, in doing penance for his former passed offen- ses: but he appeared not in Scotland after as king, no more than Charles duke of Burgognie did ap- peare in his countries after the battell of Pance, although his people had the like vaine opinion that he escaped from that discomfiture aliue.

But now to returne to the truth of the matter where we left. In the night folowing after this terri- ble battell, the residue of the Scottish armie retur- ned homewards the same way they came, waisting and spoiling the English borders as they passed. At their comming home, euerie man spake euill of them, for that as cowards and naughtie persons, they neither fought to reuenge the death of their no- ble king, nor yet to succour their fellowes that were beaten downe and slaine before their faces. But namelie Alexander Hume lord chamberlaine was re- powned, as cause of all that mischiefe, which behaued himselfe not as a captetne, but as a traitor or enemie to his countrie. * Upon the honoz of this victorie, Thomas Howard earle of Surrie (as a note of the conquest) gave to his seruants this cog- nifance (to weare on their left arme) which was a white lion (the beast which he before bare as the pro- per ensigne of that house) standing ouer a red lion (the peculiar note of the kingdome of Scotland) and tearing the same red lion with his pawes.]

Thus haue you heard how through rashnesse and lacke of skilfull order, the Scottish armie was ouer- come, and that woorthie prince king James the fourth brought to his fatall end, on the ninth day of September, in the twentie and fift yere of his reigne, and thirtie and ninth of his age, which was in the yere from the incarnation 1513. For his poli- tike gouernment and due administration of iustice, which he exercised during the time of his reigne, he deserued to be numbred amongst the best princes that euer reigned ouer the Scottish nation. All theft, reiffe, murder, and robbrie ceased in his daies, by such rigorous execution of lawes penall as he cau- sed to be exercised through all the bounds of Scot- land: insomuch that the sauage people of the out- Isles sorted themselves through terroze and dread of due punishment to liue after the order of lawes and iustice, where otherwise of themselves they are na- turalie inclined to sedition, & disquieting of each o- ther. To conclude, men were in great hope, that if it had pleased the hie determinate power of almightie God to haue lent to him longer life, he should haue brought the realme of Scotland to such a flouri- shing estate, as the like in none of his predecessozs times was yet euer heard of.

There died with him in that infortunate battell, of noble men (beside others of the meaner sort) the archbishop of saint Andewes his bassard sonne, the bishop of the Isles: the abbats of Inchaffreie and Kiltwennie: the earles of Montrose, Crawford, Ar- gyle, Lennor, Glencar, Cathnes, Castelles, Both- well, Arrell high constable of Scotland, Adell, A- tholl, and Morison: the lords Louet, Forbois, Clue- ston, Ross, Anderbie, Saintcleare, Marwell, and his thre brethren, Daunlie, Sempill, Bothcliffe, Wogo- nte, Arskill, Blackater, and Colwin: knights and gentlemen of name, sir John Dowglas, Cuthbert Hume of Fass castle, sir Alexander Seton, sir Da- uie, maister John Grant, sir Dunkin Caldwell, sir Sander Lowder, sir George Lowder, maister Mar- shall, maister Key, maister Elliot, maister Catwell clerke of the chancerie, the deane of Clesster, Spache bene, Spache Cleue, with manie others.

* This James the fourth was of a firme bodie, of iust stature, of most comelie countenance, and of sharpe wit, but altogether vnlearned, as the fault of that age was. But he did diligentlie applie himselfe to an old custome of the countrie, cunninglie to cure wounds, the knowledge whereof in times past was a thing common to all the nobilitie, being alwaies bled to the warres. He was easilie to be spoken vn- to, gentle in his answers, iust in his iudgements, and so moderat in punishments, that all men might easi- lie see he was vnwillinglye drawn vnto them. A- gainst the detraction of the euill, and admonishment of the good, there was such woorthinesse of mind in him (confirmed by the quiet of a good conscience, and the hope of his innocencie) that he would not onelie not be angrie, but not so much as bte a sharpe word vnto them. Amongest which vertues, there were cer- teine vices crept in by the ouermuch desire to please the people, for whilste he labored to auoid the note of countenelie (obedient to his father) and sought to win the fauour of the common sort (with sumptuous feasts, gorgeous shewes, and large gifts) he fell into James the first.

In September the 20th day.

The king arrived at the castle of Edinburgh.

After the death of that famous prince king James the fourth, James at Hamilton as before we have heard his sonne James the first succeeded him: for after the returne of those that escaped from the last field, the quene assembled the lords and estates of the realme together at Struthling, where the 20 day of September 1542. her sonne the first James the first, a child of one yeare, five monethes, & ten daies of age, by universall advice and consent was crowned king, and his mother the quene appointed regent of the realme, being the counsell of the crown, and father James Beton archbishop of Glasgow, the earles of Huntly, Angus, and Arrane. This government the quene obtained by reason of her husbandes testament, who making his last will before that he went to the warres, did appoint the rebe that the whole administration of all things should remaine with her, so long as she continued a widow: the which though it were against the custome of the countrey being the first example of a womans government amongst the Scots, yet it seemed tolerable to most men, given to peace, especially since there were not men sufficient at that time for honour and experience to take that charge in hand, by occasion of the great slaughter of the nobles at Flodden field, which government she did not long enjoy.

In September the 20th day.

The great indignities wrought in Scotland during the minority of James the first.

In June.

For shortly after they fell at variance amongst themselves, about the bestowing of those benefices which were vacant by the deaths of those persons which had borne name at the field: by reason whereof, some of them sent letters forth into France to John duke of Albany, bidding him to come into Scotland to be tutor to the king, and governor of the realme, as he that was next of blood to the king, and nearest to the crowne, in case the kings children deceased without issue. He therefore sent monseigneur de la Beane into Scotland, who in company of the earle of Arrane, the lord Fleming, and Lion the herald which long had borne in France landed on the west coast the third of November. And shortly after, the said monseigneur de la Beane delivered his letters to the quene and lords, who thereupon met at saint Johns house, and there by universall consent it was accorded, that the duke of Albany should be admitted tutor and governor to the king's realme, and that the same should be confirmed in parliament by the three estates which should be kept at Edinburgh, the thirtieth day of March next, for the same intent.

To rehearse the troubles and great inquietudes that chanced, during the minority of this king, the rough lacke of due administration of justice, and by which a variance daily rising amongst the lords & peers of the realme, a man might have well cause grievous to wonder thereat, and in viewing the same throughout, he will lament the oppression done to the poore commons in that wicked and most miserable time, when justice seemed to sleepe, and rapine with all the other sorts and rabble of uncharitable violence invaded her temple seat, triumphing over all as a conqueror. During the times of which disorder, there was amongst those which were and spoken others a great captaine of the same faction, called Sparrowhart Struan, who (overturning Ashed and the adjoining places) was accompanied by the most part with eight hundred followers, and sometime more. Which Struan was at length (which he spake) a wicked man at his owne pleasure, and at that time remaining with his uncle John Creighton taken by most laide for him, and induced to depart with his life.

The quene sent loving letters unto the king of England his brother, requesting him of peace. Whereupon a truce was taken betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, for the space of one yeare and a day. In the beginning of February, the king of England hearing that a parliament should be holden in Scotland, for the bringing in of the duke of Albany to be tutor, wrote to his sister that she should in some wise impeach and stay his coming thither, declaring how dangerous it was, not onely for her, but also for her sonne to have him governor, which was to succeed, if her son were once out of the way. But the chiefest cause that moved the king of England to labour, that the duke should have nothing to do in Scotland, was as many thought for that he knewe how to be done in favour of the king of France, would shew himselfe an enemy against England, both all the power he might make to procure.

Shortly after that the peace was concluded betwixt him and the king of France, he sent a letter also, requesting him not to suffer the duke to passe into Scotland, for the reason first alleged. But notwithstanding the labour that king James made to the contrary, it was concluded by the states in parliament assembled in Edinburgh, at the time prefixed, that sir Patrick Hamilton, and Lion king of armes should be sent into France, to procure the duke to come into Scotland, being now confirmed tutor and governor, according to the lawes of the realme in such cases provided. Whereupon, in April then next following they took the seas, and passed into France, according as by the states had bene decided.

This peace came a legat into Scotland from the pope, with certaine privileges granted to the king and realme. The thirtieth of April was the quene delivered of a prince in the castle of Struthling, which was baptised by the popular of Dunfermling, and the archbishop of saint Andrews, and instantly confirmed by the bishop of Cashmire, by the name of Alexander. During the time that the quene lay in childbed, great discord fell out betwixt the lords of the best parts, and the other lords of the realme: but shortly after the quene called an assembly at Edinburgh the twentieth of June, where they were all well agreed, and herewith two of the charges were sent into England for peace. And the 21 of the same moneth, master James Ogilvie abbot of Dunburgh, and sir Patrick Hamilton, and Lion the herald came south of France with articles of treating from the king there, and the duke of Albany, by the which the dukes coming was refused, because the king could not want him, till some time were had touching the matters betwixt him and the king of England, which was concluded in October next following.

This peace, the first of August, the quene married Archibald Douglas earle of Angus, and manye shortly after in saint Johns house toke the great lease from the bishop of Glasgow, that was chamberlan of the realme. Whereupon the said bishop got him to Edinburgh, where manye lords assisted him, and kept out the quene and her new husband, so that they might not enter there: whereof great discord fell betwixt the realme amongst the nobles and peers of the same. In the peace concluded betwixt France the twelfth of that name, king of France, and Henry the eight king of England, no mention was made of the realme of Scotland: for the which the Scotsmen thought great loss in the French king, loving that for his cause the warres had bene attempted betwixt them and England. about the twentieth fift of October. William Elphing-ston bishop of Aberdeen, and lord keeper of the priuie seale departed this life at Edinburgh. He had bene a faithfull counsellor to James the third & to James the fourth, by whose helpe he founded and indow-ed the college in the old towne of Aberdeen, for the increase of learning & vertue, which hath flourishid with good wits of students ever since, till these our dates.
The 20 of Nouember, Le sire de la Sautie receiued the castell of Dunbar in the name of the duke of Al-banie, at the hands of the deane of Glasgou brother to the bishop of Murray, called Forman. Shortly after, John Hepburne the prior of saint Andrews then elect archbishop of that see, besieged the castell of saint Andrews, and wan it by force from the keepers of it, which were appointed to defend it in the name of Galwin Dowglas, wherewith the quene and the earle of Angus were highly offended. The twelfth of Januarie, being a verie darke & windie night, the earle of Lennor, and the master of Glencarne undermined the nether groundsoile of the castell gate of Dunbarton, & entered thereby into the castell, & so toke it, putting out thereof the lord Erskin. Shortly after (that is to say) the fiftenth of that moneth, a great assemble was made betwixt the earles of Angus and Arrane, the one to haue fought with the other, which was the cause and beginning of great trouble that ensued.

The same day in Edinburgh were the bulls published, which Forman the bishop of Murray had purchased at Rome, for the obtaining of the archbishop-ricke of saint Andrews, the abbasies of Dunfermeling, and Arbroth, through supplication of the quene and duke of Albanie. From which bulls the prior of saint Andrews appealed, pretending title to the archbishops see by election and generall gift of the lords of the realme; and herupon got together his friends in Edinburgh, as the master of Hales and others.
And on the other part, the lord chamberleine, and di-uerse of the bishop of Murreis friends got the kings letters, by vertue whereof they proclaimed the said master of Hales, and the prior of saint Andrews rebels, with all their assistants, putting them to the horne: whereupon they were constrained to depart out of Edinburgh. And in Maie following, the prior went vnto Rome, there to iustifie his appeale.

The foure and twentieth of Februarie, a parlement was assembled at Striueling; but because the lords could not agree amongst themselves, it was proposed till the coming of the duke of Albanie, which was looked for to be in Scotland, in April; or at the furthest in Maie next ensuing, as he had sent word by sir John Striueling of the Reir, that was latelie come from him with letters vnto the lords and peeres of the realme. The fiftenth of Maie, truce was proclaimed betwixt England and Scotland, to indure for three yeares, or three moneths (as saith Lefleus) but the same day at six of the clocke in the afternone, the Englishmen entered the borders of Scotland vpon the water of Rule, and forraged the countrie, doing great hurt therein, notwithstanding the truce. The seuententh day of Maie, John duke of Albanie, tutor and gouernor of Scotland, arrived at the towne of Aire, with eight ships well appointed, and furnished with men and all kind of necessarie prouision for his estate.

From thence taking the sea againe, he sailed alongst the coast till he came to Dunbarton, and there came on land, & on the next day passed forth to Glasgou, where all the twelf and lords receiued him with great semblance of reioysing for his arrivall. The six and twentieth day of Maie, he was receiued into Edinburgh, a great number of lords meeting him on the way. The quene also came from hir owne lodging and met him, to do him honoz. Sundrie cor-cepts, pageants, & plates were shewed by the burgeses, to honoz his entrie in the best manner they could denise. Shortly after his coming to Edinburgh, there came thither forth of all parts of the realme, the lords and barons, where they being assembled in counsell, he toke vpon him the gouernement of the realme, which he promised to vse by their aduise, so that they would assist him in setting forth of iustice and good orders, which they undertooke to do.

Hereupon was the parlement, which had bene proposed till his coming, summoned to be kept at Edinburgh the twelfth of Iulie, in the which diuerse acts were concluded and made; and the lord Dummond was adiudged in the dukes mercie, for striking Lion king of armes. The duke pardoned him of life and honoz, but his lands and goods remained in the kings hands: notwithstanding, he was afterwards restored to the same againe. In this parlement also, the duke of Albanie was confirmed by the three estates of the realme tutor and gouernor to the king, the scepter and sword being deliuered to him: his oth also was taken by the lords, and theirs giuen to him, that each of them should be faithfull to others, and namelie to their king and gouerneigne lord, and also should mainteine iustice to the utter-most of their powers, for the aduancement of his honoz, and suertie of the realme.

In the meane time, whilest this parlement was in hand, the gouernor was aduertised that the king should haue bene conueied forth of the realme secretlie into England: whereupon he suddenlie departed in the night time from Edinburgh, with his men of warre in good order, & came to Striueling, where the king, with his brother Alexander, laie with the quene; which castell, together with the kings person, and the other within it, were deliuered to him the third day of August: whereupon he committed them and the castell to the keeping of foure lords of the realme, whereof the earles of Eglington and Montrose were two. The lord Hume, because he had assisted the earle of Angus and the quene against the gouernor, was denounced a rebell; and the earles of Lennor & Arrane, with manie others, were sent to his houses to seize the same into the kings hands. In the castell of Hume was laid gunpowder by a traine, whereby diuerse of them that entered first into the castell were burned.

The lord Hume himselfe got him into England, and soze disquieted the marches, so that no day of truce was holden, neither on the east nor middle marches. The twelfth of August, the quene, the earle of Angus, and his brother George Dowglas, went from Temptallon vnto Berwik, and from thence passed to the nurrie of Caudream; whereupon aduertisement being giuen to the k. of England, and his pleasure therein knowne, the six and twentieth of that moneth she was receiued by the lord Wacres, & conueied to Harbottell castell, where she remained till she was deliuered of a daughter, called Margaret Dowglas, afterwards married to the earle of Lennor, as in place conuenient it shall further appeare. There was no Scottishman at this time receiued into England with hir. The gouernor, perceiuing the rebellion of the lord Hume, passed to the borders with his Frenchmen, where the first of October, the said lord Hume came & submitted himselfe to the gouernors pleasure, and his brother Alexander shortly after did the same, and they were both deliuered to the earle of Arrane, who was appointed to keepe them in safetie within the towne of Eden-burgh.

But the twelfth of October next ensuing, the said earle of Arrane departed from thence in the night

Whereupon, the gouernour causing the parlement to be holden that was summoned to begin the foure and twentieth of October, the said lord Hume, maister William Hume, and David Hume, were conuict of treason by all the states, to lose their liues, lands, and goods. This parlement was proroged till fiftene daies after, within which time the earle of Arrane was appointed to make appearance, or else it was agreed that they should proceed against him in like manner. And in that meane space, the gouernour went to bessege the castell of Hamilton, where that noble aged ladie, the old countesse of Arrane, daughter to king James the second, & mother to the earle of Arrane, and aunt to the duke by his fathers side, caused not onelie the castell to be surrendered at the dukes pleasure, but procured also the earle of Arrans peace, which earle, the twelfth of Nouember next ensuing, came with the bishop of Glasgou vnto Edinburgh, and there submitted himselfe to the dukes will.

About the same time, certeine lords toke part with the earle of Arrane the kings bastard brother, and the earle of Erroll, against the earle of Huntlee, and raised a commotion; so that being got into Edinburgh, there was much adoe, & the towne greatly disquieted. The gouernour lieng in the abbey, came into the towne, and toke the earles of Huntlee, Erroll, Arrane, and others; and committed them to ward within the castell, while he tried the cause: and finding that maister William Haie being with the earle of Arrane had raised that sturre, he sent the same Haie into France, there to remaine during his pleasure, and forthwith the said earles were set at libertie. Lion king of armes appointed to go into England with letters to king Henrie, was stopped at Caldcreame by the lord Hume, who toke his letters from him, and kept him prisoner, till Alexander Humes mother, that remained prisoner in Dunbar, was exchanged for him. The eighteenth day of December, Alexander duke of Rossie the kings brother departed this life at Strathkelving.

The seventeenth day of Januarie, a truce was taken betwixt England and Scotland, till the feast of Pentecost next. This truce was agreed vpon at Coldingham, by certeine commissioners, appointed on either part there, to treat for peace. For the realme of Scotland were these: Monsieur de Plaines the french ambassador, archdeacon of saint Andrews, maister Gavin de Dunbar, and sir William Scot of Baluerie knights. The Englishmen comprised for their part, the earle of Angus and the lord Hume within the compasse of this truce. In the meane time, the earle of Arrane departed from the gouernour againe, and repaired to the west parts, where he confederated himselfe with certeine lords, notwithstanding that sir James Hamilton, and the lord of Cander remained pledges for his good demeanour within the castell of Edinburgh. The earles of Lennox, Glencarne, and other caused the castell of Dunbarton and diuerse other to be furnished, and toke the castell of Glasgou with the kings great artillerie that laie within it, and spoiled the same.

The gouernour aduertised thereof, raised an armie & went to Glasgou, where, by the labor of the bishop of that place, an appointment was taken, so that the castell was deliuered into the bishops hands. The earle of Lennox came in to the gouernour, and toke a new respite, and about the beginning of March next following, the earle of Arrane and the lord Hume did the like. Forman the archbishop of saint Andrews, against whome the prior of saint Andrews did stand (as ye haue heard) for that same benefice, to the great disquieting of the realme, by such partakers as chanced thereabout among the lords, came now to the towne of Edinburgh, and resigned all the three benefices, whereof he had purchased bulls of the pope, that is to say, the archbishopricke of saint Andrews, the abbasies of Arbroth and Dunfermling in the gouernours hands, to bestow the same at his pleasure: who by the counsell of certeine lords, to satisfie such as claimed interest to the same, and pacifying of all debates, bestowed them as followeth.

First, the said archbishopricke he gaue to the said Forman with the abbasies of Dunfermling, and to maister James Hepburne he gaue the bishopricke of Arrere, and benefices worth a thousand marks by the yeare vnto the prior of saint Andrews for a recompense; the abbasie of Dunburgh he gaue vnto maister James Ogilvie, and the bishopricke of Aberdeen (then vacant) vnto Alexander Gordon, and to the archbishop of Glasgou called Beton he gaue the abbasie of Arbroth, assigning to the earle of Arrere a large pension out thereof. One of the Hamiltons was made abbat of Kilwinning and George Dundasle was made prior of the knights of the roads. And thus he bestowed the benefices which had bene vacant euer since Flodden field, vnto diuerse lords, or to their kinmen, that by such liberalitie vsed towards them, all debates and discords might cease, which had happened amongst them, speciallie about the bestowing of the same benefices. This was done in the moneth of February.

Shortlie after, the gouernour, by counsell of the lords, to the end the realme might come to a perfect quietnesse, and the noble men vnited together, received into fauor the earle of Angus, & maister Patrick Pantoun secretarie, who for his cause had bene kept as prisoner in Inche gailie. He likewise receiued the lord Hume, and his brother, pardoning them all their offenses past. And in parlement holden the first of Maie, they were restored to all their lands, heritages, fees, and honors. About that time, the lord of Strathven in Atholl committed diuerse great offenses and crimes, for the which he was taken by the earle of Atholl, and beheaded at Logierath by the gouernours commission.

All this while, the parlement was not dissolved but vpon prorogation, and so the same began againe the first day of Iulie, at what time the king of England, at request of his sister the queene of Scotland, wrote letters to the lords now assembled in parlement, requesting them to expell the gouernour forth of the realme. But all the lords and states with vniuersall consent sent Albanie the herald with letters to the said king, excusing them, that they might not in anie wise satisfie his desire therein, the same being against reason and the lawes of their countrie.

In the moneth of September, the gouernour commanded the lord Hume, with his brother maister William Hume, and David Iar of Fernhurst, to be arrested and bestowed in seuerall places, that better rule might be kept vpon the borders: but they lieng now in ward, sundrie informations were giuen vp against them: and thereupon, the eighth of October, the said lord Hume and his brother were conuict of treason, for assisting and mainteining of the theues vpon the borders, and other crimes; for the which he was beheaded: and on the morrow after, his brother the foresaid William Hume was likewise beheaded, and their heads were set vpon the Tolbuth in Edinburgh: David Iar was spared.

Alexander lord Hume left yet three brethren in life, who were all by the iniuries of those times grievously afflicted with diuerse misfortunes. For George, being banished for the slaughter of a man, remained remained in England amongst his friends. John abbat of Jedburgh was banished beyond Taie. David the younger brother, which was prior of Colvingham two yeares after the death of his brethren, was (by James Hepburne, the husband of his sister) slaine by a traine, under color of a meeting and parlie, whereunto he was called; whome all men did pittie, because he was a harmelesse yong gentle man, of a singular wit, and folowie betrayed by those of whom he ought not so to haue bin intrapped.

The duke of Albanie distressed the borders. Another parliament. The duke of Albanie second person of the realme.

Hostilie after, the duke rode to Jedburgh with a great companie of men, & staied the great robbing & reaving which had bene used on the borders, & left there good wardens to keepe good rule in those parts, and so returned to Edinburgh. The third of November, another parliament was holden, in which it was decreed, that the gouernor should be deemed and reputed for second person of the realme, notwithstanding the claime made by his elder brother Alexander Steuard, that was begotten on the daughter of the earle of Mkeneie, which was alleged to haue bene first married to their father the duke of Albanie, before he was married to the earle of Bullognes daughter, on whome he begot the gouernor. Whereupon this Alexander made protestation to be heire to his father; but they were afterward agreed, and Alexander renounced his title in his brothers sauor, and was made bishop of Purreie, and abbat of Scone. At this parliament, the gouernor required licence to go into France, and to be absent there six moneths; but this sute was not granted till Aprill following.

At the same time was the earle of Lennox put in ward within the castell of Edinburgh, till he had caused the castell of Dunbretton to be deliuered vnto one Alane Steuard in the constables name, & then he was set at libertie. In the moneth of December, Monsieur de la Bantie was made warden of the east marches in stead of the lord Hume, and kept daies of truce: which procured such hatred, that it cost him afterwards his life. In the moneth of Ianuarie, the gouernor went to saint Johns towne, and there held his seat of iustice, where the lord Fleming for the time was made great chamberlaine of Scotland, with all the fees thereof. In the yeare 1517, there came ambassadors from Francis the new French king, to desire, that the ancient league might be renewed betwixt him and the king of Scotland, their realmes, dominions, and subiects.

For this cause, all the lords of the realme were assembled at Edinburgh, where, by them it was concluded, that the gouernor himselfe should passe the seas into France; and also that the bishop of Dunkeild, the secretarie, and the maister of Glencarne as ambassadors should go thither: the which the thirtenth of Maie, went a shipboard, and by the east seas sailed thither, and the gouernor took ship at Newmarke beside Dunbretton the seuenth of June, taking his course by the west seas, and so passed into France, where it was agreed, that he should haue remained but onelie foure moneths, he hauing appointed the bishops of saint Andrews and Glasgow, the earles of Huntleie, Argile, Angus, and Arrane, to gouerne in his place, whilest he was absent. Also he ordeined Anthonie Darcie, or Monsieur de la Bantie lieutenant of the borders.

He also had caused the king to be brought into Edinburgh castell, within the which he should remaine in the keeping of the earle Marhall, the lords Crutkin, Roxburgh, Kithuch; of the which, two at least should be alwaies present. The queene that remained as then in England, after the vnderstand that the gouernor was departed towards France, returned to Edinburgh the seuententh of June, but he was not suffered to see the king till August following: at what time, for feare of the pestilence to be crept into the castell, he was removed to Cragmiller, where the queene oftentimes came vnto him; but at length, through some suspicion conceived, least the queene might conueie him away from thence into England, he was edsones brought vnto the castell of Edinburgh, in which he was kept after, according to the order taken in that behalfe.

The king removed.

The doubt which the Scots had in the queene.

Such about this time in the which these things were done, John Gordon (the eldest sonne of that Alexander earle of Huntleie, which for the praise of his singular godnesse obtained the surname of good) returning out of France (whither a little before he had sailed with the gouernor) was singularly welcomed and interteined of all men, who going vnto his owne people (in the north parts) was vied with such grienous sicknesse that he died therewith, and by his father (to whom he should by course of nature erreute the same office) hostilie after buried in the abbey of Kilrosse, with a goodlie towe erected on him by his said father. The death of which John gaue (for manie causes) manie griefes vnto manie persons: but amongst other the chiefest to his father, who liued not long after his sonne. Which Alexander when he died, left the said earledome to his nephew, sonne of his sonne John; who because he was but ten yeeres old, was committed to the earle of Angus, to be instructed in all godnesse of maners answering to the excellencie of that wit therewith he was indued.

Fr. Thin. Lellesus lib. 9. pag. 386.

This earle Huntleie adozned with excellent sweetness of maners and pleasantnesse of wit, the earle of Angus would neuer or verie hardlie suffer to depart out of his companie. For which cause when the erle of Angus, for certeine suspicions of treson was banished Scotland into England, he attempted by all deuises and persuasions to intise the child to haue gone with him: but the yong boie could not be allowed with anie flatteries or persuasions to submit himselfe to the least note of reproch, in forsaking his king and countrie. Wherefore when the earle of Angus was departed into England, the child lifting vp his crawing hands to the king, did grant himselfe and all he had to the king and his countrie, whome the king receiued with all kind of humanitie; and provided that he should be instructed in euerie sort of vertue and learning, that was to be desired in such a prince; because the said child was bozne of his sisters marriage.

The lords and other nobles highlie offended (as well for the death of the lord Hume, as for that they saw Anthonie Darcie lord Bantie the French advanced to greater credit than themselves, and not onelie to be made warden of the marches, but also capteine of Dunbretton, the strongest fort of Scotland) began to raise tumults in the land. For William Cockburne (uncle of Comarck Langton) who (repelling the gardians of the pupill) did keepe the castell of Langton, assisted with the helpe of David Hume lord of Woodburne (whose sister the said Cockburne had married) first began a commotion in those parts. For when they saw that all means were taken from them openlie to reuenge the same, and to set vpon Bantie, they determined to performe the same (with some secret deuise) by lieng in wait for him.

For the castell of Langton or Langton, being kept in the possession of Woodburne (and such as took his part against the king) he the said Woodburne appointed subtil fellows secretlie to enter the castell, and to reteine it in the kings name. After which, this Woodburne feining a counterfeited anger (for he was a man full of all subtiltie) that this castell was so iniuriously taken from him, and kept to the kings kings behofe, he laid siege to the castell (as though he went about to recouer the same with all the power he could) to the intent that Bautie might be intited to come thither to raise the siege. For which cause Bautie (supposing in truth that the castell had bene kept to the use of the king) hastening the rescue thereof, came forth of the castell of Dunbar to assemble the men of the countrie to raise the siege, as lieutenant of the borders, he was chased by the said lord of Woodburne and other so fiercelie, that in the end he was slaine, and foure Frenchmen with him: his head was cut from the shoulders, and set vp in the towne of Duns [upon the castell of Hume] the nineteenth of Januarie.

The lords regents were herewith meruelouslie offended, & chose the earle of Arrane to be warden of the borders in de la Bauties place, who was also chosen to be prouost of Edenburgh: therewith the earle of Angus was highlie displeased. But the erle of Arrane, not seeming to passe much thereof, toke George Dologlas the said earle of Angus his brother, and Marke Ikar, committing them to ward within the castell of Edenburgh, because of the fauor he bare vnto the said lord of Woodburne & his complices. Whereouer, for due punishment of the murder of the foresaid de la Bautie, there was a parlement called the nineteenth of Februarie next, in the which, David Hume lord of Woodburne, and his three brethren, William Cockbozne & John Hume, with diuers other their partakers, were indicted for the besieging of the castell of Langton, the daughter of monsieur de la Bautie, and for the setting vp of his head, intercommuning with the Englishmen, and diuers other misdoings.

Immediatlie after the end of this parlement, the earle of Arrane came into the Hers, with a great armie, and hauing with him the kings great artillerie, ment to haue besieged such places as would haue resisted him. But at his being in Lowder, the keyes of the castell of Hume were brought vnto him, which on the next morrow he receiued, and put men within it to keepe it, as he did in Langton and Woodburne, which he receiued at the same time. The maister of Hales was also sought for at that time, that he might haue bene apprehended to answer the slaughter of David Hume, prior of Colbingham, whom he had slaine traitorously. A little before this parlement, the bishop of Dunkeld was returned from the french king with a bond of the league renewed betwixt Scotland and France. And at that same time was one capteine Houers a frenchman sent forth of France, with a certeine number of men, to recouie the castell of Dunbar into his keeping, which accordingly he did, the same being deliuered vnto him.

The earle of Lennor, who had bene with the gouernor in France, returned home into Scotland, & with him came a french herald from the king with letters, and maister Walter Steward abbat of Glenluce came likewise from the gouernor. And about that time, because the quene and lords were aduertised that the french king had contracted new bonds of peace and amitie with the king of England, without making mention of Scotland, they thought themselves euill bled, being his confederat friends, and therupon sent sharpe letters to the king of France, and to the gouernor, by Albanie the herald. In the moneth of June, maister Calven Dunbar, archdeane of saint Andrews, and cleark of the register, was preferred to the bishops see of Aberdeen that was vacant by the death of Alexander Gourdon.

This Calven founded an hospitall in Aberdeen, and indowed the same with lands for sustentance of twelue poore men, with a prouost to haue care ouer them. He also builded a faire bridge, with seuen arches ouer the water of Dee beside Aberdeen, and purchased lands for the perpetuall upholding thereof. He also builded two steeples in the cathedrall church, with halfe of the crosse church, and a faire palace for the small prebendaries, called the chapleins. Whereouer, he bestowed manie rich & pretious ornaments vpon the same church of Aberdeen, as copes, chalices, and other such like things, which remained there long after. His right commendable works were accomplished by this diligent prelat, greatlie to his praise and high renoume; for he spent not the fruits of his benefice in vaine, but on such maner of buildings.

The seuententh of June, there rose great stir in Edenburgh, by the falling out of the earle of Rothes, and the lord Lindsay, about the intoling of the striffetwike of Fife, by reason whereof, they were put in ward, the one in Dunbar, and the other in Dunbretton. About the beginning of August, the quene remaining in Edenburgh, understood that the earle of Angus hir husband, as then sojourning in Dologlas dale, had taken a faire gentlewoman in those parts, and kept hir as his concubine; for the which act the concealed such hatred against him, that there was neuer no perfect loue betwixt them afterwards. In the beginning of Februarie, there came a cleark as ambassado; from the french king with letters, concerning the concluding of the truce betwixt Scotland and England, which message the lords made small account of, because the king had omitted to comprehend Scotland in the league which he lastlie made with England. The seuenth of June, a mad man in Dundee due in his mad fit a ladie of inheritance, a nun, with two other women, the one of them being great with child, and also two men.

The king of England wrote letters vnto the french king, desiring him to staie the duke of Albany, that he might not come into Scotland; and furthermore, he laid ships of warre in the pale vpon the seas to watch for his coming, and to take him by the waie as he should passe. In September the king was removed forth of the castell of Edenburgh vnto Dalkith, for doubt of the pestilence, which was suspected to be in the castell of Edenburgh. And from Dalkith the erle of Arrane rode to Edenburgh to haue bin efflones elected regent & prouost of that towne: but he missed his purpols, for the towne men would not suffer him to enter, but repelled him backe, so that diuers were hurt on both sides.

Hereupon, great dissention rose betwixt the said earle of Arrane, and the earle of Angus, because of his repulse in that sute: whereby the whole realme was diuided into partakings, so that sundrie slaughters thereof ensued, as of the prior of Colbingham, and six of his men murdered, by the lord of Woodburne at Lamerton, the first of October. About the same time, the king returned to the castell of Edenburgh, and in the towne there were remaining at the same time the earles of Angus, Erroll, and Crawford; the lord Glames, and other; the bishops of saint Andrews, Aberdeen, Dykeneie, and Doblane, with diuers abbats and other prelates. And in the towne of Glasco was the bishop of Glascois chancellor, with the earles of Arrane, Lennor, Eglington, and Cassels; the lords Rolfe, Sempill, the abbat of Dalkeith, the bishop of Galloway, and other noble men of the west. Thus the lords were diuided, and would not take any order for the good government of the common-wealth.

In December, monsieur de la Fatot, and a french cleark called Cordell, with an english herald called Clarencieur, came from the kings of France and

and England, with an ambassadoꝝ also from the gouernoz, with a conclusion of peace taken for one yeere, betwixt Scotland and England: who coming to Edinburgh, were receiued by the earle of Angus, and the other lordz there with him, the which sent for the chancelloꝝ & the earle of Arrane to come thither; but they would not come anie neerer than to Hinkithgo. The ambassadoꝝ therefore toke in hand to perswade, that an assemblie might be had in Striueling: but the earle of Angus would not come there. 10 Neuerthelesse, the said ambassadoꝝ went thither, where the earle of Arrane and his partakers, as the chancelloꝝ and others, receiued them thankfullie, and proclaimed the peace, according to the treatie which they had brought, and so with courteous answer and great rewards licenced them to depart. But in their returne toward England, the earle of Angus with a great number of men met them at Carlawerok, reproouing them sharpelie for their demeanoz, and for taking their answer of the chancelloꝝ, so that they were not a little afraid, least the earle in his displeasure would haue vsed some outrage towards them, which otherwise than in words it should appere he did not.

Variance betwixt the earle of Angus and the lord of Fernihurst.

In Januarie, about the keeping of a court at Jedworth, there was raising of people betwixt the earle of Angus on the one part, and Andrew Bar the lord of Fernihurst; in whose aid, James Hamilton came with foure hundred Mers men: but the lord of Selsford then warden, assisting the earle of Angus his part, met Hamilton at Helso with a great companie, and when they were lighted on foot, and should haue foughten, the Mers men left sir James Hamilton, the bastard of the earle of Arrane, in all the danger, with a few of his owne men about him, so that with much paine he was horsed, and escaped in great danger vnto Hume, with losse of foure of his seruants which were slaine: and on the other part, there was an Englishman slaine called Kase Bar, that came in aid of the warden. On the morrow after, the lord of Fernihurst, as baliffe to the earle of Arrane, of that regallitie, held his court at the principall place of the forrest of Jedburgh, and the earle himselfe held his court likewise in an other part of the same land, thre miles distant from the other.

The thirtieth day of Aprill, the lord of Woodburne, and maister William Dowglas, newlie made prior of Coldingham, with their partakers in great numbers, came to Edinburgh to aid the earle of Angus, who was within the towne, against the earle of Arrane, and James Beton the chancelloꝝ, who were also there. But now by the coming of these succoz, which entered by force at the neather bolue, and slue the maister of Spontgomerie, sonne of the earle Eglenton, and sir Patrike Hamilton knight; the earle of Arrane, and the chancelloꝝ, were constrained to forsake the towne, & to passe through the north loch. [To reuenge this contumelie, the Hamiltons besieged the cell of Sparnocke (which is the castell of Cuninghame) but they shortly returned backe without doing anie thing against them.]

Fr. Thin.

The one and twentieth of Iulie, the earle of Angus being in the towne of Edinburgh, George Hume, brother to the late lord Hume beheaded, came thither with the abbat of Coldingham, brother to the earle of Angus, and David Hume of Woodburne, and a great companie of gentlemen, and others, and passed to the Tolbuith, where they remained, till the heads of the lord Hume, and of his brother William were taken downe beside the place where they were fastened on a iawill, and this was done in presence of the prouost for the time being. The next day they went to Hinkithgo, and from thence to Striueling, in hope to haue found the chancelloꝝ, and some other of that faction there. But mis-ting of their purpose, they returned to Edinburgh againe, and causing solempne funerall obsequies to be kept in the blacke friers, for them that ought those heads, with offerings and bankets, they afterwards returned home to their owne dwellings, without attempting anie other thing for that present.

In Nouember, the duke of Albanie arrived in Scotland on the west parts, at an haue called Crauach, the nineteenth of the same moneth; and on the thre and twentieth he came to Edinburgh, accompanied with the quene, the archbishop of Glasgow chancelloꝝ, the earle of Huntlee, and manie other lordz, knights, barons, and gentlemen; and within sir daies after their coming thither, the prouost and bailiffes were deposed, because they had bene chosen in fauour of the earle of Angus, and other appointed in their romes. Then was there a parlement summoned to be kept at Edinburgh, the six and twentieth of Januarie next following; and on the ninth of Januarie, a generall summons of forfaiture was proclaimed at the market crosse in Edinburgh, where in were summoned the earle of Angus and his brother, the prior of Coldingham, the lord of Woodburne, the lord of Dalehouse, John Summerwell of Catwastre, and William Cockburne of Langton, with their complices, to make their apperance in the said parlement, to be tried for sundrie great offences by them committed.

Maister Gawin Dowglas, bishop of Dunkeld, hearing of this proclamation, fled into England, and remained in London at the Sauoie, where he departed this life, and is buried in the church there. He was a cunning cleark, and a verie good poet: he translated the twelue booke of the Aeneidos of Virgil in Scottish meter, and compiled also The palace of honor, with diuerse other treatises in the Scottish language, which are yet extant. The earle of Angus fearing the sentence of forfaiture to be laied against him at the parlement, procured his wife (although there was small liking betwixt them) to labor for his pardon to the gouernoz. Whereupon it was agreed, that the earle, and his brother George Dowglas should passe out of the realme into France, and there to remaine during the gouernozs pleasure: and so they departed into France, and remained there all the next yeere following.

The king of England, hearing that the duke of Albanie was arrived in Scotland, and had taken the rule vpon him, doubting least he should perswade the Scottishmen to assist the French king, against whome, by perswasion of the emperor, he ment shortly to make warre, sent his herald Clarencieux into Scotland, to require the duke to depart from thence, alledging, that it was promised by the king of France at the last enteruiew betwixt them, which chanced the summer before, that he should not come into Scotland. And moreover, whereas the king of England was uncle vnto the king of Scots, he considered with himselfe that by nature he was bound to defend his nephew, as he ment to do; and therefore he thought it not reason, that the duke being next to the crowne to succeed, if ought came to the young king, should haue the gouernement of him, least he might be made awaie, as other young kings had bene. He farther complained, that the earle of Angus should be sent out of the realme, so that he could not inioy the companie of his wife, sister vnto the same king of England.

touching the king, who was as yet young in years, he loved him as his sovereign lord, and would have him, and defend both him and his realm against all other that would attempt to invade the same, according to his conscience, honour, and duty. And as to-ching the earl of Angus, he had tried towards him all civilities and mercies, notwithstanding his cruel humours, and that principally for the queens cause, whom he would have as mother to his sovereign lord. This answer being reported unto the king of The tenth of April there came seven great ships into the firth, with Archbishops, to have spoiled the ships, and invade the coast there: but they were so strongly resisted and kept off, that they were not suffered to do any great exploit, and so they returned without more or less. In this season, Andrew For-max bishop of Saint Andrews deceased, and bishop James Beaton archbishop of Glasgow, chancellor of Scotland, was removed to Saint Andrews, a more proper abode of Prelates, and the archbishopric of Glasgow was given a young man our Countryman, that was the kings schoolmaster. In the moment of April, there was great also in Edinburgh, in the taking out of the banners of the earls of Argyll, by order whereof, the whole nation fell to parading: but the duke coming indubitably from the north of Holm rod house, struck the market, and conquered the said earls into ward within the coast.

The common came into England, and persuaded the king there to make warres against the French king, and so not onely the Frenchmen but also the Scots were commanded to invade out of England, their goods confiscated, and they conveyed forth of the land, with a thousand horse upon their uppermost garment. In June, the earl of Strathmore was sent by the king of England unto the borders, with commission to take the power of the north part to invade Scotland, and upon the borders entered and came to Kelso, where he burnt one part of the town: but the borders of the Scots and English, not being halfe so many in number as the other, let him them, live, and took many prisoners, and he conveyed them to returne into England with small honour.

The governour after this, when he saw the English overran all the borders of Scotland, called a parliament at Edinburgh, the 5 kalends of August, to cure the same wound. Before this, the French feeding their soldiers because of starvation and well furnished many of the English which did everie man courage and have the best sent many and their will and of excellent knowledge, under the governour to request him that he would either by counsel persuade or by authority induce his Scots to take arms against the English. After which the matter being with great consultation and many reasons tolled in argument to and fro, it was decreed by common consent of the parliament, that a chosen number of soldiers should be prepared, to defend the borders from the invasion of the enemy, & the more strong to be well the English force, it was concluded, that the number of such as were slain in that execution, should be freed from all charges or troubles that might light on them during their minority: and further, that the wives of all such which had any lands during their lives, felt in that conflict, should after the death of their husbands have the same in the tenure of four parties.

The duke of Albany, hearing of the great preparation that the earl of Strathmore made, to raise an army of four thousand men, to invade Scotland, he likewise as it was before decreed, sent unto all the earls, lords, and nobles of the realm, bidding them to raise all such power as they could make in defence of their country, which they did, but so being assembled, the duke with a mighty army of Scottishmen and certain Frenchmen, with great artillery, marched forward, till he came to the river of Clee over against Cardick: and perceiving that the English army came not then forward, he did what he could to persuade the noblemen to enter into England: but as they were in council together about that earnest motion made to them by the duke, a certaine great personage said to them in this maner.

of the council.

My lords, rather let us come by the commandement of my lord governour duke of Albany, and abide it we be ready to defend our shore, rather than contract the invasion of our lands enemies of England, yet nevertheless it seemeth not good, to make the made of our realm of Scotland, to pass into England with our army to invade the same at this time. And he earnestly perswaded him the governour makes to us to do the same, proceeds authority for the honour of France. It appears to be insufficient enough for us to long as the king our soveraign lord is within age to defend our shore, realm, and not to invade: otherwise, we may put the whole country and nobility thereof in hazard of civil warre: for king James the fourth brought the realm of Scotland to the best that it ever was, and by the war it was brought to the worst almost that might be: for by that warre, was he and his nobility time, quilted Scotland's factions. Therefore by more advise let us go to the governour, and know of him the cause why he would persuade us to invade England.

Then they all came to the governour, and the earl of Argyll, an ancient wise man spake to them all, and said: My lord governour, by your will and commandment, here is assembled the mass of the nobility of Scotland with their power, to on a motion to enter into England. My lords have made know the cause and quarrell why this warre is begun, yet it might please your goodnesse, it should well satisfy their minds. The duke desired a little space, and said: This question would have demanded yet more for well you know, that I for-der into I bear to the realm of Scotland, of the quilt I have my name, honour, and lineage, hath passed the seas from the noble realm of France, to this realm of Scotland. And great cause there was for me to do, to bring you to a unitie, where ye were in division, by reason whereof, your realm was like to have bin conquered and destruyed. And also the king of France, by my suit and intercession, will come with you in all against the English nation: and when this warre was determined in the parliament, you made me capitaine, by showing me to invade England with banner of warre. When was no demand made of the cause of quarrell, and that I have done, is by your assent and agreement, and that I will suffice. But to answer your demand, we think you have not cause to invade England with fire, sword, and blood, yet ye be not forgetfull, and without you will bear witness and reproach for ever, for ye know that this realm of Scotland is our inheritance, as a portion of the world allotted to our nation and ancestors whom we succeed. Then there may there be better warre than to mainteine this our naturall inheritance? Is it not daillie sene, the great inuasions that the Englishmen on vs make, the great manslaughter and murders, with thefts and spoiles that they do daillie? Is not this one cause of warre? To defend the countrie is the office of a king, the honor of noble men, and the verie seruice of chualtrie, and the dutie naturall of the communitie: for I thinke it a full quarrell, gif we might conquer the realme of Englaund, and anner it to our owne realme, for the great iniuries and wrongs done by that nation to vs and our predecessors. For sene the beginning of our habitation in this Ile of Britaine, the Englishmen and we haue euer bin enemies, and vs haif they euer hated, and yet haue we euer withstand them. Suppose, we at the last battell of Floddoun field by chaunce lost our soueraine lard, & diuerse noble men, quiblk was rather by treason of the lard chamberlaine, than otherwise, who would not relieue the kings armie when he might. And yet I thinke we wan the field, quiblk murder all we noble men ought to reuenge. Therefore I would that you suld couragiously aduance your selues in this quarrell to get honor, and to be reuenged.

Then one wise man that was president of the counsell, answered the gouernor, sayeng: My lard, fortune of weir is led by him that all leides, and he striks the stroke, we can warke na meracles, & heare are the lards of Englaund readie to incounter vs. And gif we innade their realme, suerlie they will fight, for their power sall increase daillie, and ours will diminish. And gif God graunt vs the victorie (as I trust he sall) yet haue we not won the field, for readie comming is the earle of Shetwelsburie samikell deead in Fraunce (as ye knaw well) with an great puissant armie, and there is na doubt, but the king of Englaund will send or bring another armie gif we suld chance to get the first battell. And gif we get the secound field, that will not be without great losse of manie nobles, by reason whereof, the realme shall be weaker. And gif we be ouercommen how manie suld be slaine, God knawes. They that flie are woxthie to be reputed as traitors to the king, and so by wilfulnesse and fule hardinesse, the realme may be in icopardie to be vndone. I say, while the king is within age, we ought to moue na weir, least by weir we may bring him to destruction.

The gouernors words

dents reprie.

Then said the valiant gouernor: Here is an puissant armie of Scotland, gif we returne, we sall incourage our enemies. Therefore sene you thinke it not gude to innade, my counsell is that we campe still on the borders, while we see what the Englishmen pretends to do against our realme. To the which the nobles consented, and laie still there in campe certeine daies after. After this conference had betwixt the nobles and the gouernor, the quene as then being not with them, but aduertised of all the proceedings and determinations, sent word to the gouernor, and desired him that there might be a treatie of peace had, and she promised to get the warden of the English marches to come to the gouernors campe, upon pledges, wherunto the gouernor condescended. Hereupon, the lord Dacres, warden of the west marches of England [with Thomas Pultraue] came vnto the gouernors campe, and thither also at that time was the quene hir selfe come, and so vpon the eleuenth of September, an abstinence of war was taken and couenanted, that in the meane time the duke and quene should send ambassadoys into Englaund, to treat and conclude a resolute peace.

In the moneth of October next insuing, there were thre ambassadoys sent into England, accord-ding to the agreement in the last treatie, but there were so hard and extreame conditions proponed on the king of Englands behalfe, that the same could not be accepted, as being contrarie to the honor and weale of the realme of Scotland, as the Scottishmen took the matter. And so those ambassadoys returned without agreement or conclusion of peace; wherevpon followed great trouble betwixt them of the borders of both realmes. The earle of Northumberland was made warden of the whole marches, but shortly after, he began to make sute to be discharged of that office, & ceased not till he obtained it: and then was the earle of Surreie made generall warden, and the lord marquisse Dorset warden of the east & middle marches; the lord Dacres continuing still in his office of wardenship ouer the west marches.

About the first day of March, the said lords came to the borders, about which time, the duke of Albanie considering that the warres betwixt Scotland and England were irksome to the nobles of the realme, because the same wars were taken in hand chieflie to serue the French kings turne, therefore he passed by the west seas into France. And in the beginning of March, where he was verie hartlie and glablie receiued of the king, his request was onlie to haue fine thousand horsemen, and ten thousand footmen of Almaines, to be transported into Scotland: and doubted not, if he might haue this granted, but that with that power, and the assistance of the Scots, he should be able to ouerthrow the king of England in battell, or else to driue him out of his realme. But the French king neither belaued this baine brag, nor yet might spare anie such power, hauing warre at that time both against England, and the emperor: neuertheless, he promised him some aid, wherevpon the duke abode and waited for the same a long season. In the meane while, the lords of Scotland caused certeine noble men to lie vpon the borders mo[n]ethlie, in defense of the same against the Englishmen, daillie looking for support from France. Euerie companie remained their moneths, and then departed home as the custome is, and thus they continued still till September following. Much hurt was done on either part, and diuerse houses were overthrowne and destroyed both in England and Scotland.

But the king of England, to catch him by the way, had laid a great naue of ships in the pale on the seas, as he should make his course. But the duke imbarquing himselfe with his people at Brest in Britaine, sailed by the west parts of Scotland: and the one and twentieth day of September landed at Kirkcubrie in the west part of Scotland; he brought with him (beside a good number of Frenchmen) Richard de la Pole, a man of great parentage, borne in England, and banished his countrie. Whilest the duke was on the sea making saile toward Scotland, the earle of Surreie, with an armie of twentie thousand men, entered into Scotland, and coming to Edinburgh, burned the towne and the abbacie. Buchanan.

* In this place, Buchanan (before he commeth to the parlement assembled by the duke of Albanie after his returne out of France) writeth in this sort. We haue shewed (saith he) how miserable the state of Scotland was the last summer (through the dissension which was amongst the nobilitie) by the English (with all kind of slaughter) spoiling the places bordering nere vnto them, and besetting the the sea on euerie side, whereby we might be out of hope of all forren aid. For the deuise of the enimie tended to compell the fierce minds of the Scots (abated with such euils) to conclude a league with him; wherewith the Scots were not behind (by reason of the French faction) that by the means of the quene there might be a perpetuall truce taken betwene them. For when the lord Hume was (by death) taken away, the Dowglaſſe banished, and all the rest of the nobilitie rather met for companions than leaders in battels; such as had withdrawen their mind from the French, applied themselves to the quenes faction.

Whereupon the (to gratifie his brother, and to wrest all the gouernement into his owne hands) did (dissembling his greedy desire to rule) persuaade them, to deliuer their sonne (almost now past childish yeares) out of the hands of strangers, and themselves from the yoke of other mens bondage. For the quene did well foresee, that preparation and succor was made, and did come against his husband, whome before she had begun to hate extreamlie. The king of England also did commend and prefer to the Scots the counsell of his sister, by manie letters sent, and with faire promises offered; because he had none other mind, but that a perpetuall friendship might alwaies remaine betwene the adioined kingdoms; the which, as he had at other times desired; so now he mostlie wished it, not for anie commoditie to himselfe, but to the end that all men might well perceiue that he would embrace, defend, and almuch as rested within his abilitie, seeke the commoditie of his sisters sonne by all the means he might. And if the Scots would persuaade themselves to breake the league with the French, and loine in amitie with the English; they should shortly well vnderstand, that the king of England did not seeke after soueraintie, glorie, power, or honor; but onelie studied for a concord amongst themselves, & a league betwene their nations. For which cause, he would bestow his onelie daughter Marie vpon James the king of Scotland; by which marriage, the Scots should not be subiect to the gouernement of England; but contrarie, the English vnder the rule of the Scots. For by that means, besides the quenching of great hatred betwene the nations (and intercourse of merchandise, exchange of mutuall courtesies and ioinings in affinitie) there should be an indissoluble knot made for the honor of the whole Island.

And with this, they (for England) remembered the profit and disadvantage that might rise to the one from other, by the friendship or hatred of either kingdom, and the benefit that they might looke for from their English neighbours, more than by anie possibilitie they might obtaine from their French confederats. For on the one side, the English and they were borne in one continent, brought by vnder the same influence of the heauen, and so like in all things, in tong, in manners, in lawes, in decrees, in countenance, in color, and in lineaments of bodie, as that they rather seeme one than two nations. On the other side, the French are not onelie different from them, by naturall soile and clemencie of the heauens; but more seuered from them in order and forme of liuing, being further such a people, as if they were enimies vnto them, they could not greaue hurt them; and if they be their friends they can not greaue helpe them. But the English are at hand with men, munition, and monie; when the French, being so far off, are onelie with allurements, inforcements, and for their owne commoditie drawen to take their part. Besides which, there can be no succor from France but by sea, which the enimie may easilie stop; and so the Scots not able to be succored by them. But from the English they may haue aid by land with speed, and no man can hinder them thereof. Wherefore they should consider how discommodious (for the dispatch of their affairs) and how vnapt (for the defense of themselves) it should be, to hang all the hope of their succor vpon the fauor of the wind, and to place the most suertie of their estate in the vnconstant friendship of the vn-certaine elements. For (if neuer before) yet at this time the Scots might not onlie perceiue in thought but see in deed that helpe is to be hoped (in present dangers) from absent friends, when that the English can not onelie helpe you now, but at this instant doe also keepe away your promised and long expected aid, which they haue so besieged vpon the sea, that you can receiue no benefit or helpe from them.

After that these things were thus laid abroad for the knitting of the English league, as there were not a few which gaue consent to that motion, so were there manie that stidie argued to the contrarie. For in that assemblie, there were manie pensioners of the French faction, who (increasing their priuat commoditie by the publike detriment) did vtterlie abhor from all peace; besides whome, there were also some, which suspected the facilitie of promise in the English; especiallie, since the whole estate of England did then chieflie hang vpon the backe of Thomas Wolſeie the cardinall, an euill and ambitious person, and who referred all counsels and consultations to the amplifying of his owne priuat authoritie and dignitie; and for that cause, applied that and all other things to euerie blast of fortune. All our men although they were moued by diuerse reasons (as the varietie of diuerse wits bred diuerse minds) did yet with like endeuor tend vnto one end, which was alwaies to defend the French league; for they denied, that the same sudden liberalitie of the enimie, could anie way sort to their benefit; since this was not the first time that the English had used that policie to intrap vntwaine men: as did Edward the first, who (swearing and binding himselfe with all bonds of law, when he was chosen an arbitrator to cease the strife of the kingdom of Scotland) did with great iniurie make a king of Scots at his pleasure; and of late also, Edward the fourth king of England (when he had promised his daughter Cecillie to the sonne of James the third) did (the maid being readie for the marriage) dissolve the same, by taking occasion of warre through our ciuill dissensions. According to which, the English doe now also seeke none other matter, than casting a vaine hope before vs to gouerne them, to bring vs into right seruitude; and (when we are destitute of all forren helpe) to oppresse vs with all the power of their kingdom.

Neither is that true also (wherein the chiefeſt strength of their speech consisteth) that the aid of our neighbors nere at hand, is better or surer to vs than further friendship. For how may we looke for anie good from those our neighbors, since commonlie amongst neighbors there neuer want occasions of dissention; which oftentimes chance bringeth forth, and the stronger (hauing small or no occasion) will manie times seeke to offer: at what time, he which is greatest in armes, must & will appoint lawes of agreement as seemes best to his liking. Besides, there was neuer yet so sacred or firme a bond of amitie betwene adioining kingdoms, which was not oftentimes broken, either by offered or sought occasions of displeasure & breach: neither is it to be hoped, that the English will abstaine from offering violence vnto vs; that haue not spared the blood of so manie of their owne kings. For the sanctitie of leagues, & the religion of an oth, and the faith of compacts

and covenants, are in truth firme bonds of amitie amongst the good: but amongst the wicked, they are nets to intrap others, if occasion of commoditie be offered for breach of them. All which benefits and injuries, doe dwell in people, whose nearnesse of bounds, conversation of language, and not unlike manner of life hath ioined together.

And if all these things should be far othertwise, yet there be two things which we ought speciallie to foresee and provide for; whereof, the one is, that we spend not our time in vaine by chiding and disagreement, as persons drawn into diuerse factions; the other, that we respect not our old friends (for this new alliance) before we haue heard what they can say; especiallie in such a cause (as this) which may not be determined, but by the consent of the parliament. Upon which, the French followers did earnestlie stand, that there should not anie thing be done therein; and therefore sent certaine of the French aid as ambassadors about the cause. This thus ended, and the coming of the gouernour spread abroad, the same made manie glad, confirmed the doubtfull thereof, and with other (that were inclined to the English part) from the same opinion they were of.]

The duke immediatlie after his arrivall came to Edinburgh, where he caused all the lords of the realme to assemble in that towne, where he declared the great loue and affection that the king of France bare to the realme of Scotland, inso much as hearing of the slaughters, murders and burnings, practised by the Englishmen, he thought that he felt the same done vnto him, reputing himselfe one of their members. And for reuenging thereof, he would be partner with them as their member: for more credit whereof, he shewed the kings letter, confirming his declaration. He therefore exhorted them to assemble an armie, in reuenge of injuries & wrongs done to them and their countrie; for he had brought with him monie, men, and artillerie to the furtherance thereof. Hereupon it was concluded, that the armie should assemble at Dologlas dale the eighteenth of October: the which conclusion they kept, and from thence they marched to Caldreame vpon Tweed, and sent ouer the water certaine of their great artillerie, with a companie of Frenchmen and Scots, by the guiding of David Car; and being got ouer, they lay siege to the castell of Marke, which was kept by sir William Little captaine thereof, hauing with him a strong garrison of English souldiers, and great provision of artillerie, and all things necessarie: yet at the first assault, the better barnekin was wone, and the said companie of Scottishmen and Frenchmen lay within the same, indamaging the castell in all they might.

The earle of Surrie and diuerse others of the English nobilitie, with an armie of fortie thousand men, were at Antwike, not far distant from Marke, and the marquess Dorset was sent with a great companie to keepe the towne of Berwik, for doubt least the same should haue bene besieged. Also in the meane time, a new assault was made to the inner barnekin of Marke, and the same wone likewise as the other had bene before. After this was the castell assailed, and part of it beaten downe with the artillerie lieng on the Scottish side of the water of Tweed. At which breach, the assault was giuen, and the same continued, till that through darknesse and lacke of light, the assailants were driuen to retire. Great slaughter was made at that assault on both sides, but especiallie of them within the house. The assailants went to haue giuen a fresh assault the next day, being the fourth of Nouember: but a fore and vehement storme and tempest of raine chanced that night, so that they were constrained to leaue off that enterprize, and to get themselves ouer the riuer againe vnto the armie, least by the rising of the water of Tweed, they might haue bene cut off by their enemies, before they could haue bene succoured.

In the meane time, whilst this siege continued, a number of Scottishmen made a road into the countrie of Glendale within the English marches, and burnt and spoiled diuerse townes, east downe sundrie piles, and returned without anie resistance: for the earle of Surrie would suffer none of his people to depart from the armie, nor break order, for feare of more inconuenience. The duke of Albanie lieng on the Scottish side of Tweed, sent an herald vnto the earle of Surrie, willing him to call to remembrance, how in his absence he had invaded Scotland with fire and sword: for the which cruell dealing, he required him vpon his honor to come forward, and he would meet him in the confines of both the realmes, and giue him battell. To the which message the earle answered, that he had no commission to invade Scotland at that time, but it onlie to defend. And (as some haue reported) he caused a secret messenger to passe to the quene, as then lieng a good way distant from the armie, to moue for some abstinence and truce, and further to persuaide the duke to retire home; which he did, so that by his labor, a truce was taken for that instant, and afterward confirmed for a longer time: and thus the duke returned with honor (as the Scottishmen report.) This truce was well kept all the next winter following, and no invasion made, till the moneth of Aprill: and then was the earle of Surrie sent againe to the English borders, and the lords of Scotland on the other part monethlie laie on their borders by quarters, for defense of their countrie, as the vse is.

On Trinitie sabbate, being the one and twentieth of Aprill, foue hundred Scots entered England, to surprize the English merchants, and others, going that day vnto Berwik, where pærelie on that day the faire is kept; and so by reason thereof, they met with diuerse of them that went to this faire, and toke to the number of two hundred prisoners, whom they led with them into Scotland. But Hall saith, that by the coming of the young lord of Fulbertie to the succors of the Englishmen, the Scots were chased, and lost two hundred of their numbers. On the sixt of Iulie, sir William Fenwike, Leonard Pulgrau, & Bassard Heron, with diuers other, to the number of nine hundred Englishmen, entred into the shires, and began to spoile and rob the countrie: but they were shortly compassed about with Scottishmen, & so hardlie assailed, that although they fought valiantlie a good while, yet by fine force they were compelled to giue ground, and seeke to saue themselves by flight, in which two hundred of them were taken prisoners, and Bassard Heron with diuerse other slaine. Amongest the prisoners, were sir Rafe Fenwike, Leonard Pulgrau, and diuers other gentlemen of good calling.

On the seuententh of Iulie, the lord Marwell, and sir Alexander Fordein, with diuerse other Scottishmen in great numbers, entred England at the west marches by Caerleill, with displayed banners, and began to harrie the countrie, and burne diuers places. The Englishmen assembled on euerie side, so that they were farre more in number than the Scottishmen, and thereupon set fiercelie vpon their enemies, inso much that for the space of an houre, there was a fore fight continued betwixt them. But the lord Marwell like a right politike captaine (as of all that knew him he was no lesse reputed) ceased not to encourage his people: & after that, by the taking of

of the lords.

After this iourneie, there was an assemblie of the lords in Edinburgh, with the duke of Albanie, where some of the lords were of mind that the warre should continue: other thought it not reason, that for the pleasure onelie of France, the realme should suffer such damage, as it had done by those three last yeres wars now passed, and therefore they persuaded peace. Moreover, there was also much debating of the matter, touching the age and gouernement of the king; some of the lords holding that he was now of age to take the rule vpon himselfe, and that the guardianship or tutorie of a king expired sooner than of another private person. The duke of Albanie perceiving how the lords were diuided amongst themselves, and neither content with his gouernement, nor willing to mainteine the warres which he had so earnestlie perswaded for the pleasure of France, he declared to them that he wold returne into France, and so taking his leaue of the nobilitie, went to Striueling where the king was, of whome he took leaue, also giuing vnto him such louing and faithfull counsell, as to his knowledge seemed expedient, and so went into the west countrie, where he took the seas in September, and sailed forth into France, [neuer to returne into Scotland.]

The king of England [before the rumour of the departure of the duke of Albanie] hauing in the moneth of June sent ouer into France, vnto Archembald earle of Angus, that remained there vpon the commandement of the duke of Albanie, perswaded him to come from thence secretly into England, which accordingly he did; and being safely arriued in England, king Henrie procured him to passe into Scotland, that with the assistance of such lords as would be ready to take his part, he might raise war against the duke of Albanie, which sought by all meanes (as the king of England was informed) to destroy him & his: but per the earle could come into Scotland, the duke was departed toward France. On the first and twentieth of Iulie, the king by the aduise of his mother, and certeine young lords, came from Striueling vnto Edinburgh; and three daies after, the queene took the whole gouernment of the king vpon hir, and entered into the castell of Edinburgh with the king, where they sojourned the most part of the next winter. The prouost of Edinburgh was discharged, whom the towne had chosen, and the lord Sparwell was appointed by the queene, prouost in his place. For the performance wherof, there was a parlement also summoned to be holden at Edinburgh the third day of Februarie next ensuing [and the bishop of saint Andrews and Aberdeen (as faith Buchanan li. 14.) were cast into prison, who after gathering armes (and cursing all others) within the space of a moneth following were reconciled to the king.]

The king of England glad to heare that the duke of Albanie was departed into France, sent into Scotland in ambassage one maister John Spagnus, and Roger Katcliffe esquier, to declare vnto the queene and lords, that he would be content that a truce might be accorded betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, now that the duke of Albanie was returned into France, who had bene the onlie procurer of the warres. Herevpon they agreed to take truce to indure for one yere, and in the meane time they appointed to send ambassadors into England to treat vpon a continuall peace, all ance, and amitie to be had betwixt both the realmes. In this meane while, the earle of Angus came into Scotland: and because of the displeasure which the queene bare him, there ensued occasions of great diuisions within the realme. Notwithstanding the queene by aduise of certeine lords, sent the lord Gilbert earle of Castels, Robert Cockeborne bishop of Dunkeld, and doctor Mille abbat of Cambuskenneth, ambassadors into England, in the moneth of December; the which were receiued at Grenewich by the king of England the foure and twentieth of the same moneth: where the bishop of Dunkeld made an eloquent oration in Latine, declaring the cause of their coming, the which in effect was for intreatment of peace, loue, and amitie betwixt the two realmes: and for the more sure establishment thereof, they required that a marriage might be concluded betwixt their king & the ladie Marie, daughter to the king of England.

Ambassadors
into England

This request was well heard by the king, who therevpon appointed commissioners to common thereof with the said ambassadors. Diuerse articles were proponed by the said commissioners on the king of England his behalfe, and in especiall one; which was, that the king of Scotland should renounce the league with the king of France; and that further he should come into England, and remaine there till he came to perfect age to be married. Because the ambassadors had not commission to conclude so farre, the earle of Castels returned into Scotland, to vnderstand the minds of the lords and counsell in these points, the other remaining at London till his returne to them againe. * Upon All saints day there was a great motion of wind, with such stormes and tempests of thunder and lightning which suddenly arose, that the same (ouerthrowing manie private houses in Edinburgh, and the pinnacle of the tower of David in the same castell) entered into the queenes lodging with a great flame, which burnt so vehementlie, and went so farre, that it had almost consumed the same; which storme (ouerthrowing the buildings about the chamber of the bishop of Whitchurch) the bishops lodging did yet remaine safe not touched with the violence of the flame.)

When the day of the parlement appointed to be holden in the Tolbuth of Edinburgh was come, the king, queene, and lords, fearing some tumult in the towne to be raised by the earle of Angus, would not passe forth of the castell, but kept the parlement within the same. Archembald Dologlas earle of Angus, and John Stewart earle of Lennox, with diuerse others, to the number of two thousand men, came in the night season vnto Edinburgh, because they durst not enter the towne in the day time, for feare of the gunnes that late in the castell. The next day, being the fourteenth day of Februarie, the said earles with the archbishop of saint Andrews, the bishop of Aberdeen, that by the queenes appointment had bene kept before in ward, the bishop of Dublane, Calene Campbell, the earle of Argile, and diuerse other lords and barons being in the towne, sent to the castell, alledging that the king was kept as prisoner by the queene, and iustice suppressed, with great damage of the common wealth; and therefore he desired, that the king might be deliuered vnto them, to be gouerned by the aduise of the three states, and if they refused to deliuer him, they would besiege the castell, and if they wan it, all their lines within should rest at their pleasures, the kings onelie excepted.

The queene, by the counsell of the earles of Arrene and Murray, refused not onelie to deliuer the king, but sent them word, that except they did depart the towne, they would shortly discharge all the artillerie artillerie of the castell against them. Hereupon, great feare rose in the towne, speciallie among the burgeses, but by the diligence of certeine persons that trauelled betwene the parties, an assurance was taken on either side for certeine daies. In the meane time, the earle of Angus caused the castell to be forset, that neither meat nor other thing might be suffered to be conueied into it, except so much as might serue for the sustentation of the kings owne person. At length, all the parties were agreed, so that the foure and twentieth day of Februarie, the king came vnto the parlement holden in the Colbuth in most honorable wise, with the assistance of all the estates, hauing the crowne, scepter, and sword bozne before him, and from thence he was brought to the abbey, where he remained.

In this parlement, there were eight lords chosen to be of the kings priuie counsell, the which toke the gouernement of the king and realme vpon them, as these: the archbishops of saint Andrews and Glasgow, the bishops of Aberdeen and Dunblane: the earles of Angus, Argile, Arrane, and Lennor: the quene was adioined to them as principall, without whose aduise nothing should be done. From this parlement also was the earle of Castels sent, with answer to the king of England; who came to London the nineteenth of March. But because the king had knowledge that the French king was taken at the battell of Pavia, he would not proceed in the treatie of marriage betwixt the king of Scotland and his daughter, till he had the emperors aduise, whome he affirmed to be his confederat friend: and so renewing the truce for three yers and six moneths, the ambassadors returned into Scotland about the beginning of Aprill next ensuing, without anie contract of marriage at that time. The agreement betwixt the quene and lords continued not long, for anon after died the bishop of Dunblane or Dunkeld (as saith Lesleus) whose benefice the earle of Angus obtained of the king for his brother William Douglas, without the aduise of the quene and other lords. Whereupon the quene departed and went vnto Striueling, leaving the king with the earle of Angus, who toke the whole rule and gouernment of the realme and king vpon him, and made his uncle Archibald Douglas treasurer of the realme, and bestowed benefices, offices, and all other things, by the aduise of his brother George Douglas, and the earle of Lennor, who assisted him.

In this meane time, the archbishop of saint Andrews, and the earles of Arrane, Argile, and Murray, remaining with the quene at Striueling, alleged that the king was withholden from them by the earle of Angus sore against his will: and therefore they sent vnto the earle, requiring him to deliuer him. But the earle caused the king to giue the answer himselfe, that he would not come from the erle of Angus, albeit he would gladlie haue bene out of his hands if he might; as by secret messages sent to sundrie of the lords, and likewise at that time it appeared, for he willed them by priuie meanes to assemble an armie, and to come & fetch him out of their hands that thus detained him. Hereupon shortly after, they raised a power, and comming therewith to Linlithgow, purposing to passe into Edenburgh, that they might get the king out of the earle of Angus his hands: the said earle, with the earle of Lennor and other his assistants being thereof aduertised, came to the field with the kings banner displayed, and brought the king with him, although partly against his will.

The quene and such lords as were with her there in the armie, for the reuerence they bare vnto the kings person, and also fearing the danger that might chance to them if they buckled together in a fough-ten field, they withdrew themselves to Striueling, and from thence the quene went into Murray land with the earle of Murray, and there remained a long time after. The earles of Arrane and Argile went into the west countrie, and the bishop of saint Andrews to Dunelm: and then the earle of Angus took vpon him more boldlie the gouernment of the king and realme, and sent to the bishop of saint Andrews (who was chancelor) for the great seale, which was deliuered to them that were so sent for it. The nobles of the realme remaining thus at variance, and diuided among themselves, there was small obedience of lawes & iustice. Diuerse slaughters in sundrie parts were committed, great thefts & robberies made by the borderers vpon the inland countries. Moreover, a diuorcie this yere (as some haue said) was sued before the archbishop of saint Andrews, betwixt the quene, and the earle of Angus her husband, and then afterwards she toke to husband one Henrie Stewart, sonne to the lord of Arundale, the which Henrie was after created by the king lord of Methuen.

On the foure and twentieth of Iulie, the king being accompanied with the earle of Angus, the lord Hume, the Harres & others, rode vnto Jedburgh, in purpose to haue reformed the misgouernance of the borderers; but after that they had remained there three daies with little obedience shewed towards them, they all returned. And vpon the 29 day of Iulie, at the bridge of Speltroffe, the lord of Wocclough, accompanied with a thousand horsemen, began to shew himselfe in sight, whose principall purpose was to haue taken the king from the earle of Angus and his assistants, being requested and commanded by the king himselfe so to do. The earle of Angus incontinentlie sent an herald vnto the lord of Wocclough, to know what his intention was to do; who answered, that he came to do the king honor and seruice, and to shew his friends and power as the use is of the borderers.

The earle of Angus, with the lord Hume, and the rest, not being content with this answer, because of the great feud betwixt him and the Humes, and the Harres, sent vnto him a commandement in the kings name to depart, and not to approach nere to the kings presence, vnder paine of high treason. Wherevnto he answered, that he knew the kings mind well enough & would not spare for this commandement to come to his graces presence. Which answer receiued from him, incontinentlie the earle of Angus, the lords Flemming and Hume, the Harres, the lord of Slesford, with their friends, alighted on foot; the king remaining on horsebacke, accompanied with the earle of Lennor, the lord Spaldwell, George Douglas, and Iohn Crichton, tutor of Hainquhar.

The lord of Wocclough lighted also on foot, but because the most part of his men were of the theues and outlawes of the borders, commonlie called byoken men, vpon their first comming to ioining with their speares, they fled, leaving the lord of Wocclough with a small number of his owne seruants about him in all the danger: yet they defended themselves verie manfully, and slue the lord of Slesford and diuerse other, on the earle of Angus his side: but finally, oppressed with multitude, they were put to flight, and foure score of Woccloughes men slaine in the chase. After this, the king returned to Jedburgh, and remained there the space of foure daies, and then returned to Edenburgh.

might, yet perceiving two enterprises to have qualled that had bene attempted for his deliuerance, he thought to assaie the third; and hereupon, procured the earle of Lennor to assemble an armie, with assistance of the quene and his friends, to helpe to de-liuer him from the hands of his enemies. The earle of Lennor did so, and came with such power as he could raise from the west parts unto Linlithgo. The earle of Angus being aduertised, that the earle of Lennor was gathering men, sent to the earle of Ar-rane for aid, requirring him to come with such power as he could make, and to meet him at Linlithgo. The earle of Arrane immediatlie hereunto gathered a power, and with the same came to Linlithgo before the earle of Lennor came thither, who shortly after comming with his people, approached that towne, unto whom the earle of Arrane sent a messenger, re-quirring him to turne and saue his enterprise, assuring him, that albeit he was his sisters sonne, he would not spare him, if he held forthward upon his fournie. The earle of Lennor hereunto answered in a great rage, that he would not state, till he came to Edenburgh, or else die for it by the waie. The earle of Arrane therefore not stateng for the earle of Angus his comming from Edenburgh, issued forth of Linlithgo at the west end of the towne, and incountered the earle of Lennor and his companie, where there was a cruell onset given on both sides, but sud-denlie the earle of Lennor his companie fled, and he himselfe with the lord of Hunsdon and diuerse other gentlemen were slaine.

* The death of which Dowglas the king did great-lie lament, and hearing the clamor and noise that was made in that conflict, did send forth (but all too late) Andrew Wood (his familiar) to haue succored the Lennor, if by any means he could. After this victorie, the faction of the Dowglasles (to the end that striking a feare in those that were enuious against them, they might make them alwaies to be in danger to them) began to moue questions and sutes in law, against such as had borne armor against the king: for feare whereof some bought their peace with monie, some took part with the Dowglasles, some followed the Hamiltons, and some stille standing in the matter, were followed and called into the law. Of which number Gilbert earle of Castles (when he was earnestlie pressed by James Hamilton the bastard, to yeld himselfe to the part of the Hamiltons) being a man of great stomach, gaue this answer, that the old league of friendship, which was betwene their grandfathers (in which his grandfather was alwaies the more honorable and first named) should not make him now so forgetfull of the honor of his familie, that he would seeme to degenerate from his ancestors, and willinglie grant to be under defense (which is the next degree of seruitude) of them, whose head in making an equall league and couenant was contented with the second place of honor.

Wherefore, when the said Gilbert appeared in the law at the day appointed, for the deciding of his cause: Hugh Kennedie his kinsman answered for him, that he was present in that battell, as sent thirther by the king, and not as enemy to the king, and he would (if need required) bring forth the kings letters therfore, notwithstanding the Hamiltons frowning and fretting against his boldnesse: for the king had writtten as well to Gilbert (going home) as to manie others, to ioin with John Steward earle of Lennor, who seeing the battell at hand, and that he had not time left to call together his friends and followers, did with his present companie (taking his fournie out of the waie) turne to Striveling. Wherefore (the power of the Hamiltons in that cause somewhat suppressed) James Hamilton the bastard stirred with great hatred against Kennedie, did procure Hugh Campbell thirrist of Aire to dispatch him out of the waie, which he shortly after did in his returne home. Afterward this Hugh, to the end he might dissemble his conscience or knowledge of this euill (the execution whereof he had committed to his fellows) was remaining at the day and time of the same murder, with John Arskine, whose sister was the wife of Gilbert Kennedie.

But the (as soone as she heard of that deed) did with manie bitter words lay the fault vnto him, because by that fact the noble house of the Kennedies had almost bene brought to utter subuersion, had he not left a yong sonne behind him. This yong earle, after the death of his father, fled to his kinsman Ar-chembald Dowglasle then the kings treasurer, to whome he committed the defense of himselfe and his familie. This done, Hugh Campbell was called into law for the said deed, who being manifestlie conuicted thereof, was banished into an other place. Yet-ther did the Dowglasles with lesse bitternesse exercise their anger against James Beton, for bringing their power to saint Andrews, which they spoiled, as after appeared.)

In the meane time, the earle of Angus bringing the king with him, arrived, and had come to the battell, but that the king was not willing to come forth of Edenburgh in that quarrell (as some haue written) and therefore made excuses, as he did also by the waie, feining himselfe sicke: but George Dowglas droue and called vpon his horse verie sharpelie, and constrained him to ride forth with faster pace than he would haue done, giuing him manie inturuous words, which he remembred afterwards, and would not forget them. They went that night to Striveling, and shortly after passed through Fiffe, searching for the quene, and the bishop of saint Andrews; and because they were kept secretlie in their friends houses, so that they could not be heard of, they spoiled the abbie of Dundremeling, and the castell of saint Andrewes, taking awaie all the moueables which the archbishop had within the same.

* In the north parts also, the two families of the Lesles and the Forboises, intangled with mutuall hatred, raised great flames of tumults and parts faking: which enimities did after grow to be the greater, because there were daile manie slaughters of the nobles & other people committed in Spar, War-roth, and Aberdeen, whilse each faction labored to defend it selfe against the others. For which cause (when the common-wealth was much deformed thereby, and all iustice seemed almost utterlie ouerthrowne in those parts) the earle of Angus and other of the nobilitie (which were of the kings priuite counsell) did not cease, until they had made tritie betwene those two families. But in the end (the heire of the For-boises, & the lord Lenterke, hauing by wait killed the noble baron Speldurme, which fauored the Lesles) those buried contentions began againe to be raised from the dead; whose enimities being once againe knowne to the nobilitie (and what hurt might issue thereof to the common state) they attempted all possible means once more to quench that deadlie flame, and afresh to ioinc their minds together in amitie, with this prouiso, that the murderers of Speldurme should (for punishment of their offense) be banished into France, where the greatest part of them died, after manie miseries and reproches suffered in their pitifull life. Which last league so sincerelie united be-twene the Forboises and the Lesles, was imbraced with such faith each to other, by renewing thereof with continual mariages & other courttesies, that it continueth most firme euen vnto this day.

In which north parts also, the inhabitants (partlie following their naturall disposition, and partlie excited by the example of the former times long suffered so to be used) did in like sort overrun and spoile all things, by reason of ouermuch libertie. But of all other furs raised in those parts, that was the greatest and most troublesome, which was raised by the Spakintofches. Of which unrulie people, the one familie was called the Glenchattens, and the other was surnamed Spakintofches after the head of that kindred; in which, the chiefe was called Lachlane Spakintofche a man of great possessions, and of such excellencie in singularity of wisdom, that with great commendation he did containe all his followers within the limits of their duties, more than others did. Which constraints (when they could hardly beare (as loth to live in order) having so long passed their time licentiouslie) did withdraw the hearts of manie men from him. Amongest whome was James Spalcolmeson his kinsman (who thirsting after the desire to rule) took occasion (by the unturie of the time) traitorouslie with deceit to kill this Spakintofche; after which (fearing further trouble to insue towards him) he fled to the Ile (at the lake Roithmarcosse) as a sanctuarie or defense for him. But the rest of the familie of the Spakintofches did pursue him with such eager minds, that by force taking him in the Ile, they worthilie killed him, and manie of his confederats, guiltie of that wickednesse. After which (because the sonne of Spakintofche, for his tender yeares, was not sufficient with feare & punishment to brydle the minds of his fierce subjects) by common consent they chose the basfiard brother of the slaine man (called Hecto Spakintofche) to be head and leader of that familie, untill this young nephew might grow to yeeres, and might wield the gouvernement of his owne tribe.

Now when the earle of Spurreie perceived that if the sonne of Spakintofche were committed to the rashnesse of a people somewhat fierce and cruel, that he should (on euerie side) be oppressed with manie troubles, he did most goodlie (for the care he had of him his nephew being his sisters sonne) provide, that he should be caried to an other place, to the Wgiluies, the childs kin on the mothers side, where he should be well instructed and imbued with the precepts of all learning and vertue. Whereat Hecto was greatlie offended, to see that the child should so subtilie be taken from him. Wherefore (affirming that much of his authoritie was thereby diminished) he attempted (euerie way he might) to get the child againe into his possession, that thereby he might salue and recouer his credit and authoritie. But some there were, which supposed that the great care and labor which he so much employed (for getting the child into his hands) was to none other intent, but that he might make him awaite, and prepare a path whereby to lead his owne sonne to the gouernement of that familie. Which conceipt being deeplie grauen in the mind of the earle of Spurreie, caused him to seeke the preservation of the child, that by no means he might fall into the hands of Hecto.

Wherewith Hecto being highlie incensed (and determining to spue out his choler, seeking reuenge by anie kind of means) he did cause his brother William & other of his kindred, that joining their force, they might stronglie vex the earle of Spurreie, and spoile his possessions: which they did with so great furie, that overthrowing the fort of Dikes, and besseging the castell of Dozneuait, they executed manie cruelties, slaughters, spoiles, burnings, and other mischiefes vpon all sorts of people, men, women, and children, and all such as fauored them. For their hatred not limited against the earle of Spurreie, extended further against the familie of the Wgiluies, amongest whome the child was left in custodie for educations cause. With which mind this Hecto and his complices placing their campe at the castell of Bettens, which belonged to the lord of Durnens (one of the familie of the Wgiluies) they did so furiously besiege the same, as the people of the same were in the end forced to yield the fort: which when they had entred, they killed foure and twentie of the Wgiluies, whom they found therein. Whereupon (their minds being now aduanced with spoiles and happie successes) they became so proud, as (trusting ouermuch to prosperous euent in all their actions) they neuer set end to their wicked crueltie, untill the erle of Spurreie did with force execute iust iudgement vpon them. For when the erle beheld them immoderatlie reioicing, in spoiling his lands, and committing other excessiue euils; he obtained of the king and his counsell, that he might be made the kings deputie and gouernor in that battell, to brydle the rage and boldnesse of those in that order spoiling the common-wealth.

Wherefore the earle assembling an armie, did with such speedie valure come vpon them and their countrie, that at the first he took almost two hundred of their capteins, and committed them to the gallowes. All whose faith was so true to their capteine, as (when life was scuerallie promised to euerie one man as he was alone lead to the gallowes) there would not anie one of them confesse where their capteine Hecto had hidden himselfe. For euerie one answered (with bold spirit) that they knew not where he was become; and if so be they did, that yet they would not (by anie paine or terror of death) be induced to breake their faith and to betraye their maister. But hanging not being thought a sufficient reuenge (for such capteins as the earle had taken) there were more grauous punishments laid vpon William Spakintofche (brother to Hecto) because in the beginning he nourished those coles of choler for his brothers cause. For after that this William was hanged, his head was chopped off and fastened vpon a pole at Dikes, and the other foure parts of his bodie were sent to the towne of Elgin, Forresse, Inuernesse, and Alderne, there to be set vpon publikelie to the reproch of them, and the example of others.

Now, after all these furs, Hecto (seeing his men were thus dispersed and executed, and that himselfe was excluded from anie other succor) fled to the faithfull helpe of Alexander Dunbar deane of Spurreie, by whose aduise he goeth humble and secretlie to the king, beseeching his mercie and fauor to be extended vnto him: for he supposed it better, rather to craue the doubtfull mercie of his lord, than to make triall of the earle of Spurreies certeine reuenge. Whereupon the king (seeing his humble submission) receiued him into his fauor; and did with all his heart louinglie after embrace him, because he was valiant and wise in warre, and in counsell. But God, whose iustice is alwaies shewed in punishing of wickednesse, would not suffer this filthinesse of crueltie, theft, murder, & spoile (where Hecto did wickedlie defile his life) to go unreuenged with most grauous paine vpon the said Hecto. For in the citie of Saint Andrews, sudden death (than which there can be no greater punishment) was laid vpon him by one James Spense a priest, who was himselfe afterwards beheaded.

When the earle of Spurreie had shewed such reuenge vpon the friends of Hecto and their companions; the people of the prouince of Glencatten did from thenceforth keepe themselves within the limits of their dutie: untill that the sonne of Lachlane

Which yong man was in his first peares imbued with such learnings and policie of life conformed thereunto, that when he was imploied about the common-wealth; all the capteins of them (who naturally speake Irish in the furthest part of Scotland) did embrace him as a perfect paterne of all vertue, and an excellent workemaister to frame a well ordered state. Wherefore certeine (not able to susteine the brightnesse of his vertue) did ioine in counsell with such as were nearest of blood unto him, and had before laid violent hands on his father, to take his life away by forceable means. Sir James Hamilton hurt by a desperat person.

This yeare the king by counsell of the earle of Angus, Arrane, and others, went with eight thousand men unto Ibburgh, to set some order amongst the borderers, for the keeping of better rule: and so on the eighth of June, the principals of all the surnames of the clans on the borders, came to the king, binding themselves, and deliuering pledges for their good demeanors. The seventeenth of Iulie, there was a great assemble of the lords at Holie rood house, at what time, there came a simple fellow (to looke upon) servant and housekeeper sometime to the earle of Ardenor, who in the midst of a great companie of people in the abbete close, strake sir James Hamilton knight verie desperatlie with a short page or dagger in the bellie three severall stripes up to the hilt, and yet the said sir James died not of those hurts.

The man being taken, by & by confessed the deed without repentance, saieing; Why on the scoble hand quike wald not do that thing the heart thought, and was determinat to do. And being inquired what he was, and who caused him to do the same; he answered that he was a servant of God, sent by him to do that deed. And albeit he was put to great torture and paines daillie by the space of a moneth, yet would he neuer give other answer, and so he was hanged, and his head set ouer one of the gates of Edenburgh towne. About the same time, there came out of Germanie maister Patrike Hamilton, abbat of Ferne, brothers sonne to the earle of Arrane, who had bene scholer to Martin Luther, & others there. This man being conuicted and examined vpon certeine articles, as of iustificacion, predestination, of free will, and such like, contrarie to the doctrine taught by the church in that time, because he did as firme, and constantlie defend them, he was declared an heretike and burned.

Edenburgh
castell besieged.
1528 Lesle.

The king being seventene peares of age, refuseth to be longer vnder gouernement.

The eighteenth of March, the king besieged the castell of Edenburgh, the queene and hir husband Henrie Steward, with James his brother being within it. But as soone as the queene understood, that hir sonne the king was there in person, she caused the gates to be set open, and vpon hir knees besought him of grace for hir husband and his brother, and would not rest, till she had obtained the same; but yet they were kept in ward within the castell, till the king afterwards released them. In the yeare following, the king being now come to the age of seventene peares, and of god discretion and wit for his time, would not longer remaine vnder the gouernement of the earle of Angus and his companie. Whereupon he assembled diuerse noble men of Striueling, & by their counsell sent an herald vnto the earle of Angus & his assistants resident as then in Edenburgh, commanding them on paine of high treason, that they should depart forth of that towne, & that none of them should come within foure miles of the court, where soener the same chanced to lie.

Shortlie after, the king himselfe with two thousand men, followed the herald: whereupon the earle of Angus, both being charged by the herald, and ad-

uertised of the kings continuing toward the towne, departed thence immediatlie. And shortlie after, the same herald was sent vnto him againe with commandment from the king, that he should remaine prisoner within ward in the countrie of Purter, till the kings pleasure were further knowen: which he would not obeye; wherefore both he and his adherents were summoned to appeare in parlement to be holden at Edenburgh, in September next following. In this parlement begun at Edenburgh the first of September in this yeare 1528, the earle of Angus, with his brother George Dowglas, his uncle by his father Archibald Dowglas, Alexander Mommond of Carnocke, and diuerse other, were by decre of parlement atteinted, and forsailed for diuerse offences, and speciallie, for assembling the kings people to haue assailed the kings person: and because he had detained the king against his will with him the space of two peares and more, all which time he stood in feare of his life.

In this parlement Henrie Steward the queenes husband was created lord of Methuen, and made maister of the ordinance. Besides which, in place of earle Dowglas was Gavin Dunbar, the kings scholemaister made chancelor, a good and a learned man, and one in whome manie did desire more ciuill policie; and in the place of Archibald Dowglas the treasurer was admitted Robert Carnicruce, more famous for his monie than his vertue. In this parlement there was onelie one found, called John Bannatine, who fauoring the Dowglas, did boldly there protest, that what soeuer was therein don, ought by no meanes to be hurtfull to the earle Dowglas; since iust feare of his appearance there, was a iust cause to force him to be absent from thence. With in a few daies after, a brother of the earles called William, abbat of the monastierie of Holirood died, partlie by sicknesse, and partlie by griefe of mind, being wearied with the present state of things; whose place Robert Carnicruce, a man of base birth, but well monied, did obtaine of the king: who had granted vnto him the auoidance of the next spirituall liuing. At length, the Dowglas out of hope of all good successe, burnt the townes of Constaundie and Cranfoune, and so fled to the castell of Tantallon.]

In October following, the king assembled a great companie of men, with artillerie, and diuerse kinds of munition, to besiege the castell of Tantallon, which the earle of Angus did hold, who aduertised of the preparation made for the same siege, furnished the castell with men and all kind of necessaries, and went himselfe into England. When the siege then was laid about the castell, it was so strong and so well provided, that it might not be wone for all that could be done at that season: in somuch that after David Fauconer, principall gunner of the kings side was slaine, the king caused the siege to be raised; yet at length (though not till a long time after this) it was deliuered to the king by appointment. & Before the deliuerie thereof, the king despoile sware that he would not leaue one aliue to succeed in the inheritance and name of the Dowglases, so long as he liued and was king.

Whereupon he came to Edenburgh, where (to the end he might displease them the more) he determined by the aduise of his counsell to send a daillie companie (though no great number) to Colidingham, which should defend the husbandmen from the spoile. Which office appointed to Bothwell chiefe of Louthane, he did bitterlie refuse; either fearing the power of the Dowglas (whereunto all the other strength of Scotland did of late not seme to be equal) or that he would not (being then yong) imbrue his hands with the destruction of so famous a familie. Whereupon, since the king durst not trust the Hamiltons (as friends to his enemies, & being offended with them for the death of John Stewart earle of Lennox, nor durst commit the matter to anie of the adjoining nobilitie) at length the same came so about, that Calene Campbell (dwelling on the furthest borders of the kingdome, being a man of good estimation for his wisdom, and approved experience in feats of warre, and for his iustice & delicate loved of the people) was sent by the king (with great authoritie) to the rebels. Whereby the Dowglasses (being forsaken of the Hamiltons and their other friends) were brought to those extremities, that they were enforced to depart into England to R. Henrie the eight, who honorable and liberrallie received and intertained them. After this, the king (as is said) getting the castell of Tantillone by composition, did scarce keepe all the covenants of his grant thereof in writing; although he performed this, that Alexander Drumman at the request of Robert Bretton, had licence to returne home into his countrie, a little before which (as it seemeth) when James Colville and Robert Carnicruse were removed from the court (as persons suspected to favor the Dowglasses) their offices were bestowed upon Robert Bretton, then in great favor with the king and courtiers, and advanced to the government of manie places.)

The eighteenth of Maie, in the yere 1529, the earle of Cathness and the lord of Sinclair, with a great armie by sea passed into Dykenie, to haue taken that Ile into possession; but the people of the countrie assembled at the commandement of James Sinclair of Kirkwall their capteine, who gaue battell to the earle and his armie with such courage, that he discomfited the enemies: the earle with five hundred of his men was slaine, and drowned in the sea, unto the which they were driven. The lord Sinclair and all the residue were taken. The Dykenie men held opinion, that their patrone saint Agnys was seene that day to fight in the field on their side against their enemies. In the same moneth on the fiftenth day, there was a great assemblie of the lords in Edenburgh, where the king himselfe sate in iudgement. The lord of Hinderland called Cockburne, and one Adam Scot of Tushlaw, who was named king of theues, were accused of theft, and of receiuing and maintaining of theues, slaughters, and other crimes; of the which being convicted, they lost their heads, which were set ouer the Tolbuith of Edenburgh.

On the same day, the earle of Bothwell was also convicted, for maintaining them and their crimes, and his life, lands, and goods, were in the kings hands. He was therefore kept in ward within Edenburgh castell, and after sent into Murray land, & lastlie banished the realme during the kings daies [and remained at Venice.] Also, the lord Partwell, the lord Hume, the lords of Balguthy, Fernhurst, Polloit, Johnson, Marke Har [with the earle Bothwell] and other principall men of the borders, were convicted by iustice, and put in ward: by reason whereof, the borders kept better rule ever after, during the kings reigne. [Few moneths after, the king commanded the noble men (before imprisoned, and then to be banished) to be restored to libertie, taking pledges for their allegiance. Of which companie, one Walter Scot (killing Robert Johnstone a thefe of noted crueltie, therewith to gratifie the king) began deadly enimitie with that familie, to the great hurt of both those kindreds.]

About this season, a landed man named John Scot, that had travelled abroad in the world [ouer England, France, Italie and the holie land, as saith Lellous] who now being returned into Scotland, (because it was byted in other countries that he had fasted 40 daies without either meat or drinke) was for trial therof put in Dawids tower in Edenburgh castell, and diligent watch set upon him to see that he had no sustenance to relieue him withall, and so kept for fortie daies, he fasted all that time without anie kind of nourishment, to the great wonder of the people. In the summer of this yere 1529, Archembald Dowglas, that had bene forsaken (as we haue heard) came alone to the king while he was on hunting in Striueling parke, & besought his grace of pardon, which he had obtained fullie at his hands, because he favoured him more than anie of that surname, if he had not bene (as he was indeed) altogether determined that none of them should remaine within the land at that time, and so he banished him into France, where shortly after through griefe of mind he departed this life.

In the moneth of June, the king with an armie went to the borders to set order there for better rule to be kept, and to punish such as were knowne to be most culpable. And hereupon he caused fortie and eight of the most notable theues, with their capteine John Armstrong to be apprehended; the which being convicted of murder, theft, & treason, were all hanged on growing trees, to the example of other. There was one cruell thefe amongst the rest, which had burned a house with a woman and hir childzen within it: he was burned to death. George Armstrong, brother to John, was pardoned, to the end he should appeach the residue, which he did; so that they were apprehended by the kings commandement, and punished for their misdoings, according as they had deserved. In August following, manie meruellous sights were seene about Striueling, as candels burning on the tops of hills in the nights, and in the morning afore sunne rising. Diuerse armed men appeared fighting upon the ground, which was taken to be a foretoken of some trouble to insue in those parties. The fiftenth day of August, a great number of people being assembled at the market in Campscenneth, fiftie & two persons were drowned in the ferrie bote; amongst the which were diuerse honest men and worthie men of the countrie.

The first of March, in the yere 1530, the abbat of Calrose called James Inglis, was cruelly murdered by the lord of Tulliallan and his servants, amongst whom there was a priest called sir William Louthien, for the which they were apprehended, and the said sir William the twentieth and seventh of the same moneth, upon a publike scaffold in Edenburgh was degraded (the king, quene, and a great companie of people being present) and after his degradation, he was deliuered to the earle of Argile high iustice, and the next day the said Tulliallan and the same priest were beheaded. This yere the college court of iustice called the sessions was instituted in Edenburgh by the king, with consent of the three estates in parliament assembled, and after confirmed in Rome; in the which are fiftene counsellors ordinarie, eight of them being spirituall persons, of the which the most ancient is president, and seven temporall men, but so as by this number the chancellor of the realme is above the president, when he is present. There are also foure counsellors extraordinary, removable at the princes pleasure. In the yere 1531, I find little done to make account of, for the erle of Angus remaining in England, could not perswade the king of England in his favor to breake the peace with Scotland, though the same earle earnestlie laboured to bring that to passe.

The earle of Bothwell, for that he went priuily into England (being supposed to haue had secret conference with the earle of Northumberland) he was the 16 kalends of February committed to the castell castell of Edenburgh, & sir John Sandland knight was sent with authoritie to the hermitage (a castell in A. Ideldale) to represse the spoiles and robberies committed there. When of ancient time there had bene no certeine daies and place appointed for the deciding of monie, contentions, or debts amongst the citizens and people of Scotland, John duke of Albanie obtained from the bishop of Rome, that a pærelle summe of monie (as much as should be sufficient to paie the stipend of a few iudges that should be appointed thereto) should be leuied of the cleargie, of euerie one according to his estate and substance. Whereupon Calvin Dunbar bishop of Aberdeen for himselfe in the name of the cleargie, appealed to the said bishop of Rome. Which controuersie continued from the first Ides of March, untill the tenth kalends of Maie, at which day the college of the iudges of Edenburgh was established, of whom in the beginning there were many profitable things done, and law was equallie ministred; but yet the same end did not follow which was then hoped amongst them. For since in Scotland there be almost no lawes but such as are decreed by parliament, which are not commonlie perpetuall, but made for a time; and that the iudges as much as in them lieth do hinder the making of such lawes: the goods of all men were committed to the arbitrement of fiftene men, which haue perpetuall power therfore, being in truth but tyrannicall gouernment, since their one lie arbitrements must stand for law. Thus much Buchanan.

But because Lesleus treateth in more ample and other sort of that matter; and for that I will not deprive the reader of the severall writings of them both touching one thing: I will also set downe Lesleus words, writing in this order. In this parliament (saith he) by the consent of the states, it seemed good that the forme of iudgement used by our ancestors should be taken away. For where certeine of the cleargie, of the barons, and of the citizens, were chosen euerie yeere to trauell ouer the foure parts of the realme, to giue iudgement of ciuill causes (as they terme it) and of other things intangled with the controuersie of law: and that then it oftentimes happened, either by the ignorance of the iudge that did not attaine to the perfection of the law, or by the malice of them which were corrupted with bribes, that the weaker part had vniustlie the upper hand against the righter; to which discommoditie this was also ioined, that no cause could be well examined to the uttermost by one man at one time, because the iudges were so often changed; whereby it must needs follow, that severall iudges (having severall minds and wits) must for one matter giue inconstant & contrarie iudgements. Wherefore to take awaie this varietie of iudgements and other discommodities, wherewith the common-wealth was afflicted; it pleased the parliament by the persuation of the king, that a certeine defined number of senators (being persons of the greatest knowledge in law) should haue a permanent place at Edenburgh, to decide all matters of controuersie, the manner & order whereof we haue set downe in our former booke, saith Lesleus. And I for my part thinke not vnnæet for the more explaining thereof, to set it downe in this place out of the same Lesleus.

The companie (saith he) of these men (whom we call the senat of the publike wealth) receiue none but such, whose praise of vertue and sharpnesse of wit (especiallie in matters of law) doth aduance them to that place. This court is so apted of the cleargie and secular nobilitie (as a man may feareme them) that the one part of the laitie doth answer the other number of the cleargie, which we thinke to be done by the great benefit of God, that the religion and simplicitie of the cleargie may temper the singular wilddome of the tempozaltie, obtained by the experience of wooldie causes; and againe, the iudgement of the laitie may further and moderate the pure religion and ancient simplicitie of the cleargie.ouer all these is one chiefe and head (which is a spirituall man) who hath the highest place in sentence and pronouncing of iudgement; except the iudgement of the chancelloz of the kingdome happen to come in place; for then thereunto the Scots giue the chiefeest preheminance in all the affaires of the common-wealth. Thus much he.)

In the yeere 1532, sir Arthur Darcie was sent to the borders, who being at Berwikke, by the counsell of the earle of Angus then being there, they made a rode into Scotland, and burned certeine places; whereupon the Scots assembling themselves to defend their countie, made towards the Englishmen, who retired themselves to Berwikke againe. After this were diuerse inuasions made on euerie side upon the borders, and ships likewise taken by sea, and yet no warre was proclaimed. In September, in the yeere 1533, certeine commissioners of either realme were at Newcastell, to intreat for a redresse and recompense to be made for burning of towne and villages, taking of goods, casting downe of pyles, taking of ships, slaughters of men, and diuerse other spoiles and iniuries done, as well by the sea as by the land, from the 23 day of Aprill in the yeere 1532, unto the day of the meeting of the same commissioners; which doings were little lesse in effect than had bene used in time of open warre, although the same was not proclaimed. Because therefore that the catches & iniuries fell out to be so great on both sides, that particular redresse could not be had, the order thereof was referred to the pleasure of both the princes.

Further it was agreed, that for a perpetuall peace to be concluded, certeine commissioners should be appointed to treat therof at London, as afterwards they did. For the king of Scotland there were sent as commissioners about this treatie, William Stewart bishop of Aberdeen, Robert Reid the abbat of Binlos, and sir Adam Sterburie knight (as saith Lesleus li. 9. pa. 439.) Adam Otterburne (the which accompanied with diuerse other knights, barons, and gentlemen, came to London, and were there right honozable receiued the 25 of March. After they had bene before the kings presence, there were certeine commissioners appointed by him to treat with them of peace, the which agreed upon certeine conditions and articles for a peace to continue betwixt both kings during their naturall liues, and one yeere after the decease of that prince which first chanced to depart this world: and so the commissioners returned into Scotland in the moneth of Maie next ensuing.

About the same time were sent into France, William Beton abbat of Arbroth, and James Erskine secretary, as ambassadoz to requite the duke of Handolmes sister in marriage for the king: with which motion the ladie and hir friends were verie well contented. Neuertheless (as afterwards shall appere) the king himselfe passing secretlie into France in proper person, when he had once sene the ladie, he liked hir not; & so became a sutoz to the French king his eldest daughter Magdalen, whome he obtained: wherefore the duke of Handolmes sister would neuer after match hir selfe with any other in marriage, but professed hir selfe in a house of religion, where she remained the residue of hir life time. The king of England sent ambassadoz into Scotland, the bishop of Duresme, sir Thomas Cliffoz, the prior of Duresme, resine, and one doctor Agamus, who were honorable received in the moneth of Julie: and then was the peace before concluded by the ambassadors at London, confirmed by the king himselfe, and the charter thereof interchangable sealed, with the great seales of both the realmes, during the liues of both the princes (as before ye haue heard.)

* The king in those daies did shew such hope of honorable vertue in him, that the wisest and the most valiant princes of the world did honor him with the ornaments of their orders: for first Henrie king of England adopted him into the order of the garter; the emperor made him a fellow of the golden fleece, and shortly after the French king clothed him with the order of saint Michael. In remembrance of all which (for a note to be left to posteritie) he caused the armes of Scotland, honored with these three orders, to be set by ouer the gate of his palace of Lithquoe, with the ornaments of the honor of saint Andrew, which are proper to the kingdome of Scotland.)

The same yere, the king passed through the north parts of his realme, and caused iustice done to be ministered in places where he came, against offenders. For example, in Edinburgh was great inquisition made, and punishment exercised against such as were detected to hold opinions against the religion then used, the king himselfe assistant thereto. Master Rozman Coxleie that was abjured before, and Andrew Stratton that would not renounce his opinion, were burned. The shiriffe of Linlithgow, and diuerse other, that were fled for feare of punishment, were conuict of heresie. Diuerse Englishmen that held against the diuorce betwixt king Henrie, and the ladie Katharine Dowager, fled this yere into Scotland, and were receiued.

* About this time (to conclude a league with Charles the first, emperor) this Charles sent Godescall Errike (to the end the matter might be handled more secretly) from Toledo (by Ireland) into Scotland, who when he had declared his message to him from the emperor [concerning the iniuries done to his aunt Katharine queene of England, & to his daughter by Henrie the eight, king of England: the calling of a generall counsell: the ouerthrow of the Lutherian heresie (to vse Buchanans word) and for contracting of marriage] the said ambassador did deliuer to the king the emperors letter, wherein was set downe the offer and choise of which of those three parties the king would take to wife: which were Marie (the sister of Charles) a widow by Lodowike of Hungarie, his husband slaine by the Turke: Marie of Portugale his nece by his sister Leonara: or Marie of England his cousine germane by his aunt Katharine. Whereunto the king answered, that the marriage with England should be most profitable, but the same was a thing of vncertaine hope, of greater danger & labour, & of longer delaie than his carefulnesse (being the onelie man left of that line) might well indure. Wherefore of all the emperors kinred, that marriage by manie reasons should be most beneficiall for him, to take to wife the daughter of Christern, king of Denmark, begotten vpon Isabel sister to the emperor. Whereunto for deniall thereof, Charles did shortly make answer (at Madrid) that he was affianced to another.)

In the yere 1535, the pope sent a messenger into Scotland, requiring king James to assist him against the king of England, whome he had decreed an heretike, a schismaticke, a wedlocke breaker, a publicke murderer, and a sacrileger; and therefore he had declared him to be deposed of the said kingdome, the which he would bestow vpon him, and other catholicke princes. In the yere 1536, the king took the sea with five ships, without knowledge of the most part of the lords of his realme, and sailed about the Isles of Shetland and Lewis, and the other Isles, and by Forne was driven to take land at saint Jans in Galloway, & so returned to Strueling, from whence he passed on foot in pilgrimage vnto our ladie chappell of Lauret beside Spuskelburgh, and afterwarde sent for diuerse of his lords, and by their counsell took his voiage againe by sea with five ships, to passe into France, as he was minded to haue done the first time: but what caused him to alter his purpose then, we find not. This second time he embarked at Kirkcaldie the last of August, and with good and prosperous wind he shortly after arrived in France, there being with him in companie the earles of Argile, and Arrane, the lords Bots and Fleming, with diuerse other barons, knights, and gentlemen; and before him there were in France the earles of Burrough, Lennox, and Castles, the lord Erskin, the abbat of Arbroth, and others.

Immediately after his arrivall, he rode in secret manner disguised vnto Wandolmes in Picardie, taking with him but one seruant named John Lennox, whome he caused to take vpon him as he had bene maister; and so comming to the duke of Wandolmes his place, got sight of the ladie who should haue bene his wife; but not liking hir, he returned againe without talking either with hir or hir friends: and comming to Rouen where his companie were abiding for him, he passed from thence towards Paris, where the Dolphin of France was appointed by the king his father to meet him seuen leagues from the citie, who brought him to the king, who receiued him in such hartie manner, as if he had bene his owne sonne, and with as much honor as might haue bene shewed to the greatest prince in earth. There were iustes, tourneys, and other princelie pastimes practised and set forth; in which iustes and other exercises of warlike feates, he shewed himselfe as hardie, cunning and valiant, as anie other person within all the realme of France, for the which he was passing great praise.

In the meane time, he caused his ambassadors and the noble men that were with him, to declare vnto the king of France, that the cause of his comming was for marriage to be had betwixt him and the ladie Agadalen, eldest daughter to the king, whome he loued & favoured above all other within his realme. The French king was glad hereof, that the ancient band betwixt Scotland and France might thus with new alliance be confirmed, and therefore declared that he would willingly giue him his daughter in marriage. But herewith he let him vnderstand, that his daughter was much subiect to sicknesse, and therefore he referred that vnto the king of Scotland his owne pleasure, whether he would haue hir, or his yongest daughter the ladie Margaret, who was after married to the duke of Sauoy. This offer of choise being reported to the king of Scotland, he continued in his former purpose, which was, to match with the ladie Agadalen, who was in deed a pleasant yong ladie, beautifull, of good fauour, lowelie countenance, and comelie manners, above all others within that realme.

Whereupon the marriage was contracted betwixt them, and an hundred thousand crownes of the sun promised with hir in dowrie, with thirtie thousand franks of pension, during the life of king James: which monie was deliuered vnto him at his returne homewards, besides manie rich hangings, cupboards of plate, sumptuous apparell, and rich iewels giuen to him and his wife, farre above the summe of an other hundred thousand crownes, with two great ships (the one called the Salamander) and great plenty of artillerie, powder, and other munition. uer, all his charges and expenses were borne by the French king, during his being within the realme of France. At the same time also, was the ancient league and bond of amitie betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France renewed, and the day of the solemnization of the mariage appointed to be holden the first of Ianuarie.

In the meane time, great preparation for the same was made, and all the nobles of France sent for to be there at that day. On the which within the church of Notre dame in the cite of Paris, the king of Scotland openlie married the said ladie Magdalen, in presence of the king hir father, the king of Nauarre, seuen cardinals, and diuerse great dukes, marquesses, earles, lords, barons, bishops, & others. After the solemnization of the mariage, king James remained in France, till the moneth of Maie, passing the time with all kind of pleasure and disport that might be deuised for his honorable interteinement. Finally, the king and his wife quene Magdalen toke their leaue of the king of France their father at Paris, about the latter end of Aprill, and so rode to Rouen, where they were receiued with great triumph, and from thence they passed downe the riuer to Pethouen where they embarked, being accompanied by the admirall of France, and manie other noble men of the realme, appointed by the French king to attend vpon them into Scotland, & so they sailed forth with pleasant wind and prosperous weather, through the seas, till they came into the Forth, and there landed at the peare of Liethauen, the 29 of Maie, in the yeere 1537, where a great number of earles, bishops, barons, & other noble men & gentlemen of Scotland were readie to receiue them with passing ioy and gladnesse, & from thence with great triumph they were conueied to the abbey of Holie rood house.

This noble ladie with hir louelie countenance and seemlefe demeanor, at hir first arrivall wonne the loues and hartie good wilis of all the nobles & people of the realme, and withall contented so highlie the mind and fantasie of the king hir husband, that there was neuer more hope of wealth and prosperitie to succeed within the realme, than at that present. But fortune enuieing so great felicitie, would not suffer them to continue anie longer time together: for about the end of June she fell sicke of a vehement feuer, whereof she departed this life the tenth of Julie next ensuing, and was buried in the church of Holie rood house, for whose death the king was verie sorrowfull, & stirred not abroad of a long time after: [whose death (saith Buchanan) was so lamented of all men, that then (as he supposeth) began the first vse of mourning garments amongst the Scots, which yet at this day, not being past fortie yeeres, is not verie common, though publike orders and manners doe uerie day grow worse and worse.]

Quene Magdalen departeth this life.

In the summer of this yeere, Jone Dowglas the ladie of Glames, sister to the earle of Angus, was apprehended, and likewise hir husband David Lion, and both of them brought to Edinburgh, where they were accused and conuict by an assise, for conspiracie of the kings death: the said ladie was burned, and hir husband hanged. Hir son the lord Glames was also conuict for misprision and concealment of that crime, and therefore forsaithing all his lands, was condemned to die: but because he was yong and of tender yeeres, the king pardoned him of life, and commanded him to perpetuall prison, in the which he remained so long as the king liued. [This yeere was Boshwell, for that he was ouer familiar with the English, banished into France (as saith Buchanan).] Shortly after, John maister of the Forbois, and eldest sonne to the lord Forbois, who had married a sister of the said ladie Glames, was at Edinburgh likewise indicted and conuict by an assise, by procurement of the earle Huntley, for the like conspiracie of the kings death, for the which he was beheaded and quartered, and his head and quarters set aloft vpon the gates of Edinburgh. His father the lord Forbois, vpon suspicion of the same conspiracie, was long after kept in prison within the castell of Edinburgh; but at length when nothing might be proued against him, he was released and set at libertie.

This yeere, the king in September caused iustices to sit in the north parts of the realme, and likewise in October; and in the winter following he caused the like to be done in the south and west parts. The king himselfe was often times present, assisting the lords whome he had appointed his commissioners for the furtherance of iustice, and maintenance thereof thorough all parts of his realme. * The king appointed an assemblee of the nobles, by whose consent an edit was made to confirme the former law, in which all his grants made at Roane in his minority were voided and of no authoritie. At what time also by the said persons it was brought to passe by great labor, that the kings patrimonie should be augmented with manie possessions. Wherefore when they perceived that the kings charge and dignitie could not be maintained with so small reuenues, they aduanced his foure sonnes (borne of diuerse women) to the rich abbeies & priories of Abertolfe, Kelso, Colidingham, Holie rood, and of saint Andrewes, whose reuenues they transferred to the kings coffers so long as he liued: by which (perhaps) there came no lesse monie (saith Lesleus) vnto his coffers, than did arise of his kingle inheritance.)

The king by the aduise of these noble men of his realme, thinking it necessarie for him to match againe in mariage with some noble princeesse, sent into France vnto the earle of Murray, and David Beaton abbat of Arbroth [whome (as saith Lesleus lib. 9. p. 447) Paule the third had made a cardinal, & they of France had made bishop of Aprozence] his ambassadors there resident, willing them by the aduise of the French king to treat for a mariage to be had betwixt him and the ladie Marie de Lorraine, daughter of Longuile, widow, daughter to the duke of Guise. And being aduertised from his said ambassadors, that the king of France, the ladie hir selfe, and hir friends, were well contented therewith, he sent in the beginning of Maie the lord Robert Sparwell, and the maister of Glencarne, well accompanied into France, to loine with his other ambassadors for the contracting of that mariage, the which according to their commission treated thereof, and concluded vpon resolute articles, and so espoused hir by procurators, as the vse is amongst such estates, with great triumph in the cite of Paris, whereat the king and manie noble men were present.

After this she was conueied to Pethouen, and there taking the seas, passed through the same till she came to Carrell in Fife, where she landed the tenth of June; and from thence she was conueied to the new palace in the abbey of saint Andrewes, being honorablelie prepared for the receiuing of hir. And there the king accompanied with manie noble men, openlie solemnized and confirmed the foresaid mariage with the said ladie in the abbey church, with great ioy and triumph. The king with his quene remained there the most part of that summer. And within a few moneths after the mariage, she conceived with child, to the great comfort of the king and the whole realme, for the hope of succession thereby; and therefore general processions and publike praiers were made thorough all parts of the realme, for the prosperous success of the same. After that the king had pacified the borders borders and all other parts of his realme, by exercising of iustice, and traueilling about the same in his owne person through all places (where need required) so that there was as great quietnesse, rest, and politic besed in Scotland, as euer was in anie kings daies before him: yet neuertheless there were certaine disobedient persons in the Iles.

The king therefore, to bring them to order, caused to prepare a good naue of ships, and in the moneth of Maie went aboard the same in the robe of Lieft, having with him the earles of Arrane, Huntley, Argyle, and diuerse other earles, lords, and barons, with whome he sailed forth by the coasts of Fife, Angus, Aberdeen, Murray, Argyll, Southerland, and Cath-ness, till he came to Orkney, where he landing and all his companie with him, were receiued verie honorable by the bishop Robert Sparwell. Where they furnished themselves with fresh vittells, and other such things as were necessarie; and taking the seas again, sailed to the Iles of Skie and Lewes, where Mac Cleud of the Lewes, a principall clan of his kin, was brought vnto the king, who sent forth also a companie to Mac Cleud Haugh, who came likewise out of his Ile, and presented himselfe to the king.

From thence the king sailed by the coast of Koss & Kintail, to the Ile of Trantermes, where diuerse of the Macconiles, such as the lord Magarrie, John Spohart, and others (who alledged themselves to be of the principall blood, and lords of the Iles) were brought also to the kings presence. From thence tra-uelling through the residue of the Iles, Macclane and James Macconile of Kintail, being the two principall captains of the small Iles, came likewise to the king who at length landed at Dunbretton, and sent the captains and ships with prisoners to passe the same waite he came round about the coast, so to come to Edenburgh, where the same prisoners being arri-ued, the chiefe heads of them were kept in ward as pledges for good rule in their countries, and were not suffered to depart so long as the king lived, whereby there followed great quietnesse, and as god obedience to the lawes throughout all the Iles, as there was in anie part of the realme; and as god account and payment made to the kings controller in his exchequer for the lands of the same Iles pertaining to the crowne, as for anie part of the revenues belonging thereto within the maine land. [In this yeere (saith Buchanan lib. 4.) were manie taken for Lutheranisme, wherof some were burnt; nine recanted, and manie were banished: amongst whom, George Buchanan was one, who escaped by a rope out of a window of a chamber.]

Whilest the king was in this boiage, the quene was deliuered of a sonne at saint Andzeles, where of the king being aduertised at his landing, hastned with all possible diligence to the quene, and shortly after was the child baptised, and called James. The archbishop of saint Andzeles, and the earle of Ar-rane were godfathers, and the quene the kings mother was godmother. For the birth of this prince, there were bounties made through all parts of the realme, with great triumph and giuing of thanks to God for the same. After this the quene, mother to the king, returned vnto Methuen, where after she had remained a certeine time, a sicknesse took hir, of the which shortly after she departed this life, and was buried in the Charterhouse church of saint Johns towne, by the toime of king James the first. The king himselfe and manie nobles of the realme were present at the funerals, which were kept in most solemne and pompous manner.

The same yeare were burnt at Edenburgh for heresie (as it was then taken) a regular canon, two blacke friers, and a secular man. Also two priests were degraded, and condemned to perpetuall prison.

The same time there was a graie frier in the citie of Glasgow burnt for the like cause, and manie other summoned; and because they would not appeare, they were denounced heretikes. About the same time, James Beton archbishop of saint Andzeles, a man of great age departed this life, and was buried in saint Andzeles. Before his departure, he had provided successors to all his benefices, first to his archbishops see, and to the abbeie of Arbroth, maister David Beton, afterwards cardinal; and to the abbeie of Dunfermling maister George Durie that was archdeacon of saint Andzeles. These men, without anie gainesaying of the king, entered with his good will into the same benefices, immediatlie after his decess. This James Beton builded a great part of the new college of saint Andzeles, and left great summes of monie and treasure to go through to make an end of the same worke.

This yeare in the moneth of August sir James Hamilton of Finhart knight, remaining as then in the towne of Edenburgh, was arrested by Da-uid Wood controller to the king, who charged him in the kings name to go to ward within the castell of Edenburgh. Which commandement he wollingly obeyed, thinking himselfe sure inough, as well by reason of the god seruice he had done to the king, specially in repairing the palaces of Strineking and Linletgaw; as also for that the king had him in so high fauor, that he stood in no feare of himselfe at all. Neuertheless, shortly after he was brought forth to iudgement, and conuict in the Tol-buth of Edenburgh, of certeine points of treason laid against him, which he would neuer confesse; but that notwithstanding, he was beheaded in the mo-neth of September next ensuing [after that he had liberallie confessed at the place of execution, that he had neuer in anie sort offended the kings maiestie, and that this death was yet worthilie inflicted vpon him by the diuine iustice; because he had often offended the law of God to please the prince, thereby to obtaine greater countenance with him. Wherefore he admonished all persons, that (moued by his example) they should rather follow the diuine pleasure, than vniustlie seeke the kings fauor, since it is better to please God than man.]

This summer the quene remaining at Strineking, was deliuered of an other prince, which was baptised in the chappell of Striueling, and called Arthur; but within eight daies after, the said prince deceased at Striueling aforesaid. On the verie same daie, prince James the kings eldest sonne being at saint Andzeles departed this life also, in such wise, that there was but onlie six houres betwixt the time of their departures out of this world; which caused no lesse lamentation through the whole realme, than there was ioy at their births. After this, the quene inwent vnto saint Johns towne, where she was honorable receiued with great triumph made by the towne. She was accompanied with the principall men of the countrie, and from thence the roade to Aberdeen, the king then being come vnto hir, where, by the towne and vniuersitie they were receiued with great ioy, triumph, pageants, verses, & plaies, set forth in the best maner for their pastime. They remained there the space of fiftene daies, and were highlie intertained by the bishop of that place.

There were exercises and disputations held in all kind of sciences in the colleges and scholes, with diuerse orations made in Greke, Latine, and other languages, to the high praise and commendation of the maisters & students in that vniuersitie. From thence the king with the quene returned to Dundee,

der, where a costlie entrie was prepared for them also, and after they had bene right princelie intertained there, they came to falkeland. In the moneth of Maie, sir John Worthwike, commonlie called captaine Worthwike, (suspected, befam'd, and accused of heresie, was summoned to appeare in saint Andrews before the cardinall, and diuerse other bishops and prelates there present, where (notwithstanding his absence) the same being proued by sufficient witnessse against him (as was thought) he was conuicted and declared an heretike. An image was made to resemble him, and at the market crosse of the said citie, as a signe and memorall of his condemnation, it was burned, to the feare of others, but he himselfe escaped their hands and got into England, where he was receiued.

¶ The king of Scots (hearing of the manner of the king of England, and how he honored himselfe) toke in euill part, that the king of England in all generall assemblies of the States of Ireland did call himselfe king of Ireland, when all his predecessors before were onelie intituled by the names of lords of Ireland. For by that new title, king James his authoritie did seeme to be diminished, when the king of England did write himselfe king of all Ireland: whereof a portion by manie ages was under the rule of the king of Scots. Yet at length K. James did yield thereto; and that the rather, because the king of England vnder this title and authoritie, did not dispossesse the heires of the Scot Spakeconell; and other his Scots of those lands which they there inioined in that countrie.]

This yeare the king of England advertised of the meeting of the emperor, the French king, and pope, at the citie of Pise, doubting some practise to be devised there against him, sent to the king of Scotland the bishop of saint Andrews, & the lord William Howard, desiring him as his most tender kinsman and nephew, to mate him at the citie of York in England, where he would communicate such things with him, as should be for the weale of both the realmes. And therewith the king of England, trusting that the king of Scotland would haue fulfilled his desire, caused great preparation to be made at York for the receiuing of him. But albeit the king of Scotland was willing of himselfe to haue passed into England, to haue met and sene his uncle; yet after long reasoning and deliberation of his council and prelates (especiallie James Beton bishop of saint Andrews, and George Crichtoune bishop of Aberdeen (as saith Buchanan. lib. 14.) assembled for that purpose, casting in their minds (as they toke it) what danger might fall to him and his realme, if he should passe into England, in case he should be straid and holden there, contrarie to his will, as king James his predecesso; was, hauing no succession of his bodie.

And againe, for that it was certeinlie knowne, that the principall cause, why the king of England required this meeting or interuiew, was to perswade the king of Scotland to be the like order in Scotland, as he had done within his realme of England, in abolishing the popes authoritie, making himselfe supreme head of the church, expelling religious persons out of their houses, and seizing the iewels of their houses, their lands and rents, and such like information. And if it chanced the king should attempt the like, they should lose the friendship which was betwixt him, the pope, the emperour, and french king, that were his great friends and confederats. Whereupon they perswaded him to staie, and by their aduise sent pleasant letters & messages vnto the said king of England, desiring him to haue him excused, for that he could not come into England at that time.

having such lets and causes of abiding at home, as thoſtly he ſhould underſtand by his ambaffadoꝝ whom he ment to ſend to him, as well foꝝ this matter as other cauſes. And thoſtly after ſir James Leirmouth was appointed to go as ambaffadoꝝ into England, as well to make the kings excuſe foꝝ his not comming to meet the king of England at Yorke; as alſo to make complaint vpon certeine inuaſions made by the borderers of England into Scotland, and alſo foꝝ the vſing of the debatable ground betwixt the two realmes.

But the king of England fore offended that the king of Scots would not satisfie his request, to meet him at Porke (as before is recited), would admit no excuse, but determined to make warre into Scotland, albeit as the Scottishmen allege, he would not suffer the same to be understood, till he had prepared all things in a readinesse. In the meane time he sent commissioners to meet with the Scots commissioners vpon the debatable ground, to talke for redresse to be made of harmes done vpon the borders, but no good conclusion could be agreed vpon by the commissioners, neither touching the debatable land, nor yet for repairing of wrongs done by the inuasions. ¶ But that the truth concerning the causes of this war, moued at this present by that noble prince king Henrie the eight, may the better appeare; I haue thought good here to set downe the same, as they were drawn forth and published in print to the whole world by the said king in a little pamphlet, under this title.

A declaration containing the iust causes and considerations of this present warre with the Scots, wherein also appeareth the true and right title that the kings most roiall maiestie hath to his souereigntie of Scotland, and thus it beginneth.

Being now enforced to the war which we haue alwaies hitherto so much abhorred & fled, by our neighbour & nephew the k. of Scots, one who aboute all other for our manifold benefitts toward him, hath most iust cause to loue vs, and to reioise in our quietnesse; we haue thought good to notifie vnto the world his doings and behauiour in the pꝛouocation of this war, & likewise the meanes & waies by vs to eschew & auoid it, & the iust & true occasions wherby we be now pꝛouoked to prosecute the same, and by vtterance and disburging of that matter, to disburden some part of our inward displeasure and griefe: and the circumstances knownen, to lauent openlie with the world the infidelitie of this tunc, & the thinges of such enormitie do burst out and appeare.

the king of Scots our nephew & neighbor, whome we in his youth and tender age preserved and mainteined from the great danger of others, and by our authoritie and power conducted him safelie to the rotall possession of his estate, he now compelleth & enforcech vs. for preservation of our hono: & right to be our puissance & power against him. The like unkindnesse hath bene heretofore meted by other in femblable cases against Gods law, mans law, & all humanitie; but the offender it chanceth, the more it is to be abhorred, and yet in the persons of princes, for the raritie of them, can so happen but seldome as it hath now come to passe. It hath bene verie rarelie & seldome saine tofore, that a king of Scots hath had in marriage a daughter of England. We cannot no: will not reprehend the king our fathers at therein, but lament and be sorie that it toke no better effect.

amicie, and perpetuall friendship betwene the posteritie of both: which how soone it failed, the death of the king of Scots, as a due punishment of God, for his uniuersall inuasion into this our realme, is and shall be a perpetuall testimonie of their reproch for euer. And yet in that present time could not the unkindnesse of the father ertinguish in vs the naturall loue of our nephue his sonne, being then in the miserable age of tender youth. But we then forgetting the displeasure that should haue wroughte prouoked vs to inuade that realme, nourished and brought by our nephue, to attaine his fathers possession and gouernement, wherein he now so unkindlie vseth and behaueh himselfe towards vs, he compelleth vs to take armes and warre against him.

It is speciallie to be noted, vpon what grounds, and by what means we be compelled to this warre, wherein among other is our chiefe grieffe and displeasure, that vnder a colour of faire speach and flattering words, we be indeed so injured, contemned and despised, as we ought not with sufferance to permit and passe ouer. Words, writings, letters, messages, ambassages, excuses, allegations, could not more pleasantlie, more gentlie, nor more reuerentlie be deuised and sent, than hath bene made on the king of Scots behalfe vnto vs: and euer we trusted the tree would bring forth good fruit, that was of the one part of so good a stocke, and continuallie in appearance put forth so faire buds: and therefore would hardlie beleene or giue care to other, that euer acknowledged the deeds of the contrarie, being neuertheless the same deeds so manifest, as we must needs haue regarded them, had not we bin so loth to thinke euill of our nephue, whome we had so manie waies bound to be of the best sort toward vs.

And therefore hauing a message sent vnto the yere past, from our said nephue, and a promise made for the repairing of the said king of Scots vnto vs to Porke, and after great preparation on our part made therefore, the same meeting was not onelie disappointed, but also at our being at Porke in the lieu thereof, an inuasion made by our said nephue his subiects into our land, declaring an euident contempt and despite of vs. We were yet glad to impute the default of the meeting to the aduise of his counsell, and the inuasion to the lewdnesse of his subiects, and according thereto gaue as benigne and gentle audience to such ambassadoys as repaired hither at Christmas afterward, as if no such cause of displeasure had occurred, speciallie considering the good words, sweet words, pleasant words, excuses propped by the said ambassadoys, not onelie to excuse that was past, but also to perswade kindnesse and perfect amitie to insue.

And albeit the king of Scots hauing (contrarie to the article of the league of amitie) receiued and entertained such rebels as were of the chiefe and principall, in stirring the insurrection in the north against vs, with refusall before time, vpon request made to restore the same; yet neuertheless, vpon offer made, the said ambassadoys to send commission to the borderers, to determine debates of the confines in the same, with so great a pretense of amitie, and so faire words as could be in speech desired, we were content for the time to forbear to presse them ouer extreamlie in the matter of rebels. Albeit we neuer remitted the same, but desiring to make triall of our said nephue in some correspondence of deeds, condescended to the sending of commissioners to the borderers, which to our great charge we did, and the king of Scots our said nephue the semblable.

Where after great trauell made by our commissioners, this fruit insued, that being for our part challenged, a peece of our ground plainlie vsurped by the Scots, and of no great value, being also for the same shewed such euidence, as more substantiall, more authenticke, plaine and euident, cannot be brought forth for anie part of ground within our realme: the same was neuertheless by them denied, refused, and the euidence onelie for this cause reiected, that it was made (as they alledged) by Englishmen: and yet it was so ancient, as it could not be counterfeited now, and the value of the ground so little, and of so small weight, as no man would haue attempted to falsifie for such a matter. And yet this deniall being in this wise made vnto our commissioners, they neuertheless by our commandement departed as friends from the commissioners of Scotland, taking order as hath bene accustomed, for good rule vpon the borders in the meane time.

After which their recess, the lord Harwell wardden of the west marches of Scotland, made proclamation for good rule; but yet added therewith, that the borderers of Scotland should withstand their goods from the borderers of England; and incontinent the Scottishmen borderers, the fourth of Iulie entered into our realme suddenlie, and spoiled our subiects contrarie to our leagues, euen after such extremite as it had bene in the time of open warre, whereat we much marvelled, and were compelled therefore to furnish our borders with a garrison for defense of the same. Whereupon the king of Scots sent vnto vs James Leirmouth maister of his household, with letters deuised in the most pleasant manner, offering redresse & reformation of all attempts. And yet neuertheless, at the entrie of the said Leirmouth into England, a great number of the Scots then not looked for, made a forraie into our borders, to the great annoiance of our subiects, & to their extream detriment. Wherewith, and with that unkinde simulation, we were not a little moued, as reason would we should; and yet did we not finallie so extreamlie prosecute and continue our said displeasure, but that we gaue benigne audience to the said Leirmouth, and suffered our selfe to be somewhat altered by his words and faire promises, tending to the perswasion that we euer desired, to find the king of Scots such a nephue vnto vs, as our proximity of blood (with our gratuitie vnto him) did require.

In the meane time of these faire words, the deeds of the borderers were as extream as might be, and our subiects spoiled: and in a roade made by sir Robert Solmes for a reuenge thereof, the same sir Robert Solmes, with manie other were taken prisoners, and yet detained in Scotland without putting them to fine or ranfome, as hath bene euer accustomed. And being at the same time a surlesance made on both sides, at the sute of the said Leirmouth for a season; the Scots ceased not to make sundry inuasions into our realme, in such wise as we were compelled to forget faire words, and onelie to consider the king of Scots deeds, which appeared vnto vs of that sort, as they ought not for our dutie in defense of our subiects, ne could not in respect of our hono, be passed ouer vnrformed: and therefore put in a readinesse our armie, as a due meane whereby we might attaine such a peace, as for the safeguard of our subiects we be bound to procure.

After which preparation made, and knowledge had thereof, the king of Scots ceased not to vse his accustomed meane of faire words, which in our naturall inclination wrought effsones their accustomed effect, euermore desirous to find in the king of Scots such regard & respect to be declared in deeds, as the correspondence of naturall loue in the nephue to such an uncle, as we haue shewed our selfe toward him, doth require. Wherefore vpon new request and sute made vnto vs, we determined to staie our armie at Bozke, appointing the duke of Roosfolke our lieutenant, the Lord priue seale, the bishop of Durham, and the maister of our hostes, there to comen, treat, and conclude with the ambassadoys of Scotland, for an amitie and peace, vpon such condicions, as by reason and equitie were indifferent, whereby the warre might be eschewed, being by sundrie inuasions of the Scots then opened & manifest.

In this communication betwene our and their commissioners, after diuerse degrees of commission shewed by the Scots, and finallie one that was by our commissioners allowed, matters were proposed for conclusion of amitie, nothing difficult or hard of our part, but so agréable to reason, as the commissioners of Scotland said they doubted not, but if it might be brought to passe that the king of Scots our nephew might haue a meeting with vs, all matters should easilie be compounded and determined: whereupon they left speaking of anie articles of amitie, and the ambassadoys of Scotland made much outward ioy in communication of meeting. They shewed themselves in wordes, fashion, and behauior much to delight in it, to reioise in it, and therewith thought it easie and facile to be concluded and accomplished, and for their part they toke it then for a thing passed, a thing concluded, and most certeine to take effect, and onelie desired six daies to obtaine answer from their maister, and our armie, from that time to staie and go no further: wherevnto our commissioners then agréed.

After these six daies was sent a commission out of Scotland, with power to conclude a meeting precisely at such a place, as they knew well we should not, nor could not in winter obserue & keepe. Where with when our commissioners were discontent, the ambassadoys of Scotland to relieue that displeasure, and to temper the matter whereby to win more time, shewed forth their instructions, wherein libertie was giuen to the ambassadoys to exceed their commission in the appointment of the place, and to consent to anie other that by our commissioners should be thought conuenient. Which manner of proceeding when our commissioners refused, alledging that they would not conclude a meeting with men hauing no commission therevnto: the ambassadoys of Scotland vpon pretense to send for a more ample and large commission, agréable to their instructions for appointment of the place, obtained a delate of other six daies, to send for the ample commission without restraint of place.

Now after these six daies they brought forth a new commission, made in a good forme, and without exception: but therewith also they shewed new instructions, containing such a restraint as the former commission did containe, so as the libertie giuen to the commissioners in the commission was now at the last removed and taken auaie by the instructions, with addition of a speciall charge to the ambassadoys, not to exceed the same. And thus, first the ambassadoys of Scotland seemed to haue a will and desire to conclude on a place semelie and conuenient, which for want of commission they might not do, and at the last might haue concluded a meeting by vertue of their commission; and then for feare of the commandement in their second instructions they durst not. And so they shewed their first instructions partlie to excuse their king, who should seme secretlie to will more than in the commission he did openlie professe.

Then with an ample commission from the king, they shewed their secret instructions for defense of themselves, why they proceeded not according to their commission, not caring how much they charged therein the king, whose fault they disclosed to discharge themselves, trusting that by the benefit of the winter appoehing, and the time lost in their communication, their maister should be defended against our power for this yere, without doing for their part that by honor, right, law, and leagues they be obliged and bound to do. And in this meane time our subiects being taken prisoners in Scotland, could not be deliuered vpon any rancome, contrarie to all custome and vsage of the borderers in the time of peace and warre: and in this meane time staid a great part of our armie already pressed, and in our wages to go forward.

In this time ambassadoys (as ye haue heard) assembled to talke of an amitie, but concluded none. The treating of amitie was put ouer by communication of a meeting. The communication of meeting was so handled by alteration of commission and instructions on their behalfe, as it appeareth a plaine deuise onelie inuented for a delate, which hath giuen vs light, whereupon more certeinly to iudge the king of Scots inward affection toward vs: whose deeds and wordes well weied and considered, do vs plainlie to vnderstand, how he hath continuallie labored to abuse vs with sweet and pleasant wordes, and to satisfie the appetites of other at home and abroad with his unkind and displeasing deeds. In his wordes he professeth an indissoluble amitie, he allegeth kinred, he acknowledgeth benefitts, onlie the fault is, that he speaketh another language to all the world in deeds, and thereby so toucheth vs in honor and denegation of iustice, as we be enforced and compelled to vse the sword, which God hath put in our hands as an extreme remedie, whereby to obtaine both quietnesse for our subiects, and also that is due to vs by right, pacts, and leagues.

We haue patientlie suffered manie delussions, and notablie the last yere, when we made preparation at Bozke for his repaire to vs. But should we suffer our people and subiects to be so oft spoiled without remedie? This is done by the Scots, whatsoever their wordes be. Should we suffer our rebels to be detained contrarie to the leagues without remedie? This is also done by them, whatsoever their wordes be. Should we suffer our land to be vnterped contrarie to our most plaine euidence, onelie vpon a will, pride and arrogancie of the other partie? This is done by them whatsoever their wordes be. All these be ouer presumptuouslie done against vs, and giue such signification of their arrogancie, as it is necessarie for vs to oppresse it in the beginning, least they should gather further courage, to the greater displeasure of vs and our posteritie hereafter. And yet in the intreating of this matter, if we had not euidentlie perceived the lacke of such affection as proximity of blood should requite; we would rather haue remitted these iniuries in respect of proximity of blood, to our nephew, than we did to fore his fathers inuasion.

But weeing that we be so fuerlie ascertained of the lacke thereof, and that our blood is there frozen with the cold aire of Scotland, there was neuer prince more violentlie compelled to war, than we be by the unkind dealing, vntuist behauior, & unprincelie demeanour of him, that yet in nature is our nephew, & in his acts and deeds declareth himselfe not to be moued therewith, nor to haue such earnest regard to the obseruation of his pacts & leagues, nor such respect to the intertainment of the administration of iustice, as naturall equitie bindeth, & conseruation of equitie requireth. Which we much lament & be sorie for, & vse now our force and puillance against him, not for reuengement of our priuate displeasure (being so often deliuered as we haue bene) but for recouerie of our right, the preservation of our subiects from iniuries, and the obseruation of such leagues as as haue passed betwene vs, firmelie trusting, that almightie God, vnder whome we reigne, will assist & aid our iust proceedings herein, to the furtherance & aduancement of the right, which we doubt not shall euer preuaile against wrong, falshood, deceit, and dissimulation.

Whither to appeareth how this present warre hath not proceeded of anie demand of our right of our superiortie, which the kings of Scots haue alwaies knowledged by homage and fealtie to our progenitors euen from the beginning: but this warre hath bene provoked and occasioned vpon present matter of displeasure, present iniurie, present wrong mistred by the nephue to the vncle most vnnatural, and supposed contrarie to the desires of our benefits most vnkindlie, if we had minded the possession of Scotland, and by the motion of warre to attaine the same, there was neuer king of this realme had more opportunitie in the minority of our nephue, nor in anie other realme a prince that hath more iust title, more euident title, more certaine title, to any realme that he can claime, than we haue to Scotland.

This title is not deuised by pretense of marriage, nor imagined by couenant, nor contriued by inuention of argument, but lineallie descended from the beginning of that estate established by our progenitors, and recognised successiuelie of the kings of Scotland, by deeds, wordes, acts, and writings continually almost without interruption, or at the least intermission, till the reigne of our progenitor king Henrie the first, in whose time the Scots abused the ciuill warre of this realme, to their licence and boldnesse, in omitting of their dutie: which for the proritie of blood betwene vs, we haue bene slacke to require of them, being also of our selfe inclined to peace, as we haue euer bene alwaies glad, rather without prejudice to omit to demand our right if it might conferre peace, than by demanding thereof to be sene to moue warre, speciallie against our neighbour, against our nephue, against him whome we haue preserved from danger, and in such a time as it were expedient for all christendome to be in unitie and peace, whereby to be more able to resist the common enimie the Turke.

But for what considerations we haue omitted to speake hitherto of the matter, it is neuertheless true, that the kings of Scots haue alwaies acknowledged the kings of England superior lords of the realme of Scotland, & haue done homage and fealtie for the same. This appeareth first in histories written by such, as for confirmation of the truth in matters more haue trulie noted and signified the same. Secondly, it appeareth by instruments of homage made by the kings of Scots, and diuerse notable personages of Scotland, at diuerse & sundrie times sealed with their seales, and remaining in our treasure. Thirdlie, it appeareth by registers and records iudicialle and autenticallie made, yet preferred for confirmation of the same. So as the matter of title being most plaine, is furnished also with all manner of euidences for declaration thereof.

First, as concerning histories, which be called witness of times, the light of truth, and the life of memorie, and finally the conuenient way & meane whereby the things of antiquitie may be brought to mens knowledge, they shew as plainlie this matter as could be wished or required, with such a consent of writers as could not disagree vpon an vntruth, containing a declaration of such matter as hath most euident probabilitie and apparance. For as it is probable and likelie, that for the better administration of iustice amongst rude people, two or more of one estate might be rulers in one countrie, vnted as this Ile is: so it is probable and likelie, that in the beginning it was so ordered for auoiding dissension, that there should be one superior, in right of whom the said estates should depend.

According thereto we read, how Brute, of whome the realme then called Britaine toke first that name (being before that time inhabited with giants, a people without order or ciuillie) had thre sonnes, Locrine, Albanact, and Camber, who determining to haue the whole Ile within the ocean sea to be after gouerned by them thre, appointed Albanact to rule that now is called Scotland, Camber the parties of Wales, and Locrine that now is called England: vnto whom (as being the eldest sonne) the other two brethren should doe homage, recognising and knowledging him as their superior. Now consider, if Brute conquered all this Ile, as the historie saith he did, and then in his owne time made this order of superiortie as aforesaid: how can there be a title deuised of a more plaine beginning, a more iust beginning, a more conuenient beginning, for the order of this Ile, at that time speciallie, when the people were rude: which cannot without continually strife and variance containe two or thre rulers in all points equall without any manner of superiortie, the inward conscience and remorse of which superiortie should in some part dull and diminish the peruerse courage of resistance and rebellion.

The first diuision of this Ile, we find written after this sort, without cause of suspicion why they should write amisse. And according herunto we find also in historie set forth by diuerse, how for transgression against this superiortie, our predecessors haue chastised the kings of Scots, and some deposed, and put other in their places. We will here omit to speake of the rudenesse of the antiquitie in particularitie, which they cared not dissimilie to commit to writing. But some authors, as Antonius Sabellicus, amongst other, diligently searching what he might trulie write of all Europe and the Ilands adioining, ouer and besides that which he writeth of the natures, manners, and conditions of the Scots, which who so list to read, shall find to haue bene the verie same in times past, that we find them now at this present: he calleth Scotland, part of England, which is agreeable to the diuision aforesaid, being in deed as in the land continually without separation of the sea, so also by homage and fealtie vnted vnto the same, as by particular declarations shall most manifestlie appeare, by the testimonie of such as haue left writing for profe and confirmation thereof.

In which matter, passing the death of king Humber, the acts of Dunwald king of this realme of England, the diuision of Welfe and Ben two brethren, the victories of king Arthur: we shall begin at the yeere of our Lord, nine hundred, which is six hundred forty two yeeres past, a time of sufficient antiquitie, from which we shall make speciall declaration and euident profe of the execution of our right and title of superiortie euermore continued and preserved hitherto. Edward the first, before the conquest, sonne to Alured king of England, had vnder his dominion and obedience the king of Scots. And here is to be noted, that this matter was so notorious and manifest, as Marian a Scot, writing that storie in those daies, granteth, confesseth, & testifieth the same: and this dominion continued in that state thre and twentie yeeres.

At which time Athelfane succeeded in the crowne of England, and hauing by battell conquered Scotland, he made one Constantine king of that partie, to rule and gouerne the countie of Scotland vnder him, adding this princelie word, that it was more

h. f. honorable

honorable to him to make a king, than to be a king. Twentie foure yeeres after that, which was the yeere of our Lord 947, king Edward our progenitor Athelstanes brother, took homage of Aile then king of Scots. Thirtie yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 977, king Edgar our predecessor took homage of Iamald king of Scots. There was a little trouble in England by the death of saint Edward king and martyr, destroyed by the deceit of his mother in law. But yet within twentie foure yeeres after the homage done by Iamald to king Edgar, that is to say, in the yeere of our Lord 1018, Malcolme king of Scots did homage to Iamald our predecessor.

After this homage done, the Scots offered some piece of their naturall disposition: whereupon, by treaty made by our progenitor saint Edward the confessor, twentie nine yeeres after homage done, that is to say, the yeere of our Lord 1056, Malcolme king of Scots was vanquished, and the realme given to Malcolme his sonne, by our said progenitor saint Edward: to whom the said Malcolme made homage and fealty, within eleven yeeres after that William Conqueror entered this realme, whereof he accounted no perfect conquest, untill he had likewise subdued the Scots. And therefore in the said yeere, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1068, the said Malcolme king of Scots did homage to the said William Conqueror, as his superior by conquest king of England. Twentie five yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1092, the said Malcolme did homage and fealty to William Rufus sonne to the said William Conqueror: and yet after that was for his offences and demerits deposed, and his sonne substituted in his place, who likewise failed of his dutie: and therefore was condemned in that estate by the said William Rufus: Edgar, brother to the last Malcolme, and sonne to the first, who did homage and fealty accordingly.

Seven yeeres after, that was in the yeere of our Lord 1100, the said Edgar sonne of Scots did homage unto Henrie the first our progenitor. Thirtie seven yeeres after that, David king of Scots did homage to Matilda the emperesse, as daughter and heire to Henrie the first. Wherefore, being after required by Stephen, then obtaining possession of the realme, to make his homage: he refused to do, because he had before made it to the said Matilda, and thereupon fought. After which Davids death, which ensued shortly after, the sonne of the said David made homage to the said king Stephen. Fourtyene yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord, a thousand one hundred and fiftie, William king of Scots, and David his brother, with all the nobles of Scotland, made homage to Henrie the seconds sonne, with a reservation of their dutie to Henrie the second his father. Twentie five yeeres after, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1175, William king of Scotland, after much rebellion & resistance, according to their naturall inclination, king Henrie the second then being in Normandie, William then king of Scots knowledge his error, and made his peace and composition, confirmed with his great seale, and the seales of the nobilitie of Scotland, making therewith his homage and fealty.

Within fiftene yeeres after that, which was the yeere of our Lord 1190, the said William king of Scots came to our citie of Canturburie, and there did homage to our noble progenitor king Richard the first. Fourtyene yeeres after that, the said William did homage to our progenitor king John, upon a hill besides Lincolne, making his oath upon the crosse of Hubert then archbishop of Canturburie, being there present, a marvellous multitude assembled for that purpose. Twentie six yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1216, Alexander king of Scots married Margaret, the daughter of our progenitor Henrie the third, at our citie of York, in the feast of Christmass, at which time the said Alexander did his homage to our said progenitor, who reigned in this realme fiftie six yeeres. And therefore betweene the homage made by the said Alexander king of Scots, and the homage done by Alexander, sonne to the said king of Scots, to Edward the first at his coronation at Westminster, there was above fiftie yeeres: at which time the said Alexander king of Scots repaired to the said feast of coronation, and there did his dutie, as is aforesaid. Within twentie eight yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1282, John Balliol king of Scots made his homage and fealty to the said king Edward the first our progenitor.

After this began Robert Bruce to dispute the crowne of Scotland, and to move sedition therefor against them of the house of Balliol, which made for a season some interruption in the said homage; but yet no intermission without the termes of memorie: for within foure foure yeeres after, which was the yeere of our Lord 1286, Edward Balliol after a great victory had in Scotland against the other faction, and intioing the crowne of Scotland, made homage to our progenitor Edward the third. And twentie yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1306, David Bruce, who was elder in the contrarie faction, did nevertheless in the title of the crowne of Scotland, whereof he was then in possession, make homage to our said progenitor Edward the third.

Within nine yeeres after this, Edward the third, to chastise the insolence of the Scots, made warre against them: when after great victory, Edward Balliol, having the full and right title to the realme of Scotland, surrendered clearely the same to our said progenitor, at the towne of Norburgh in Scotland, where our said progenitor accepted the same, and then caused himselfe to be crowned king of Scotland, and for a time intermeddled, and moved it, as verie proprietarie and owner of the realme: as of the one part by confiscation acquired, and on the other part by free will surrendered unto him. And after the death of our said progenitor Edward the third, began seditions and insurrections in this our realme, in the time of our progenitor Richard the second, which was augmented by the alteration of the state of the said Richard, and the devolution of the same to Henrie the fourth: so as the Scots had some leasure to plaie their bagues, and follow their accustomed manner. And yet Henrie the fifth, for recovery of his right in France, commanded the king of Scots to attend upon him in that towne.

In this time, the realme of Scotland being descended to the house of the Stewards, of which our noble dieritie cometh: James Steward king of Scots, in the yeere of our Lord 1407, made homage to Henrie the first at Windsor, which homage was distant from the time of the other homage made by David Bruce, thre score yeeres and more, but yet within the fresh memorie of man: all which homages and fealties as they appear by story to have been made and done at times and seasons as aforesaid, so do there remaine instruments made thereupon, and sealed with the seales of the kings of Scotland, testifying the same. And yet doth it appeare by story, both the Scots practised to steale out of our treasurie divers of these instruments, which nevertheless were afterward recovered againe.

And to the intent ye may knowe of what forme and tenure the said instruments be, here is inserted the the effect in word and sentence as they be made, which we do, to meet with the cavillation and contrived evasion of the Scots, alleging the homage to have bene made for the earldome of Huntington, which is as true as the allegation of him that is burnt in the hand, to say he was cut with a sickle. And therefore the tenure of the homage is this.

The forme of the homage.

I John R. king of Scots shall be true and faithfull unto you lord Edward by the grace of God R. of England, the noble & superiour lord of the kingdome of Scotland, as unto you I make my fidelitie of the same kingdome of Scotland, the which I hold & claime to hold of you. And I shall beare to you my faith and fidelitie of life and lim, and worldlie honoz, against all men; and faithfullie I shall knowledge, and shall do to you service due to you of the kingdome of Scotland aforesaid: as God so helpe and thesē holie euangelists.

Now for the third part, touching records and registers, we haue them so for small, so autenticall, so seriouslie handled, and with such circumstances declaring the matters, as they be and ought to be a great corroboration of that hath bene in stories written & reported in this matter. For among other things we haue the soleinne act and iudiciall processe of our progenitor Edward the first, in discussion of the title of Scotland, when the same was challenged by competitors (that is to saie) Florentius comes Holandie, Patricius de Dunbat comes de Perthia, Willielmus de Melci, Willielmus de Rosse, Robertus de Pinkent, Nicholans de Soules, Patricius Galighillie, Rogerus de Mundenille, Joannes de Comin, W. Joannes de Hastings, Joannes de Balliolo, Robertus de Bzule, Riccius rex Norwiche.

Finallie, after a great consultation and mature deliberation, with discussion of the allegations proponed on all parts, sentence was giuen for the title of Ballioll, according whereunto he inioined the realme. But for confirmation of the dutie of the homage before that time obserued by the R. of Scots, it appeareth in those records, how when those competitors of the realme of Scotland repaired to our progenitor, as to the chiefe lord for discussion of the same, inso much as the authoritie of the iudgement to be giuen depended thereupon; it was then ordered that the whole parlement of Scotland, spirituall & temporall, & of all degrees assembled for that purpose, and considering upon what ground & foundation the kings of Scotland had in times past made the said homages and recognition of superiourtie, the said parlement finding the same good & true, should (if they so deemed it) yeeld and giue place, and by expresse consent recognisse the same.

At which parlement was alleged unto them, as appeareth in the same records, not onelie these acts of the princes before those daies, and before rehearsed: but also besides the testimonie of stories, the writings and letters of forren princes at that time reciting and rehearsing the same. Whereupon the said parlement did there agree to this our superiourtie, and insuing their determination did particularlie and severallie make homage & fealtie with proclamation, that whosoever witholdeth himselfe from doing his dutie therein, should be reputed as a rebell. And so all made homage and fealtie to our progenitor Edward the first, And the realme of Scotland was in the time of the discussion of the title ruled by gardians deputed by him. All castles and holds were surrendred to him, as to the superiour lord in the time of vacation, Benefices, offices, fees, promotions passed in that time from the mere gift of our said progenitor, as in the right of this crowne of England. Sherriffes named and appointed, lawes, and precepts made, obeyed, and executed.

Finallie, all that we do now in the bodie of Lancaster, the same did our progenitor for the time of the contention for that title in the realme of Scotland, by the consent of an agreement of all estates of the realme assembled and consulted with for that purpose. At which time the bishops of saint Andrews and Glasgow were not (as they now be) archbishops; but recognised the archbishop of York, which extended ouer all that countrie. Now if the Scots will take exception to the homage of their princes as made in warre, and by force, which is not true; what will they say, or can they for shame allege against their owne parlement, not of some but of all confirmed, & testified by their writings and seales; whereunto nothing inforced them but right and reason, being passed in peace and quiet without armor & compulsion: If they say they did it not, they speake like themselves; if they say they did it, then do they now like themselves, to withold their dutie, not so much to be blamed, as to be amended.

Thus appeareth unto you the beginning of the right of superiourtie, with a perpetuall continuance, without intermission within memorie. Certaine commissions and forbearings upon the grounds and occasions before specified we denie not, whereby they haue manie times fought and taken their opportunities to withold the doing of their dutie in knowledge of our superiourtie ouer them; which to auoid, they haue not cared what they said or alleged, though it were neuer so vntrue, lieng alwaies in wait when they might annoie this realme, not without their owne great danger & perill, & also extreame detriment. But as they detracted the doing of their dutie, so God granted unto this realme force to compell them thereto within memorie, and notwithstanding antie their interruption by resistance, which unto the time of our progenitor Henrie the first neuer endured so long as it made intermission within time of mind, whereby the possession might seeme to be empaiued. From the time of Henrie the first, unto the seventh yeare of our reigne, our realme hath bene for a season lacerat and tozned by diuersitie of titles, till our time; and since also by warre outwardlie bered and troubled. The storie is so lamentable for some part therof, as were too tedious to rehearse.

Since the death of our progenitor Henrie the first, our grandfather Edward the fourth reigned, who after great trauels to attaine quietnes in his realme, finallie in the time of preparation of warre against Scotland died. Richard the third, then usurped for a small time in yeares, whome the king our father by the strength of Gods hand ouerthrew in battell, and most iustlie attained the possession of this realme, who neuertheless, after the great tempestuous stormes, finding all matters not yet brought to perfect quiet and rest, ceased and forbore to require of the Scots to do their dutie; thinking it policie rather for that time to assaie to tame their nature by pleasant conuention & conuersation of amicitie, than to charge them with their fault, & require dutie of them, when oportunitie serued not by force & feare to constrain and compell them. And thus passed ouer the reigne of our father without demand of this homage. And being our reigne now foure and thirtie yeares, we were one and thientie yeares letted by our nephew his minoritie, being then moze careful how to bring him out of danger, to the place of a king, than to recelue of him homage, when he had full possession of the same.

Wherefore being now passed, since the last homage made by the king of Scots, to our progenitor Henric the first, 122 yeares, at which time the homage was done at Windsor by James Steward, then king of Scots, as before 56 of these yeares the croune of this realme was in contention, the trouble therof ingendred also some businesse in the time of the king our father; which was three and thirtie yeares: and in our time one and twentie yeares hath passed in the minoritye of our nephew. So as final-lie, the Scots resorting to their onelie defense of discontinuance of possession, can onelie allege iustitie but 13 yeares of silence in the time of our reigne, being all the other times since the homage done by James Steward, such as the silence in them (had they bene neuer so long) could not haue ingendred presidice to the losse of anie right that may yet be declared and proued due. For what can be imputed to king Edward for not demanding homage being in strife for that estate, whereunto the homage was due? What should Richard the third search for homage in Scotland, that had neither right ne leasure to haue homage done vnto him in England? Who can blame our father, knowing the Scots nature neuer to do their dutie but for feare; if he demanded not that of them, which they would eschew if they might, seeing his realme not clearelie then purged from ill seed of sedition, sparkled and scattered in the cruell ciuill warres before.

Law and reason serueth, that the passing ouer of time not commodious, that the purpose is not allege-able in prescription for the losse of anie right. And the minoritie of the king of Scots hath indured twentie one yeeres of our reigne, which being an impediment on their part, the whole prescription of the Scots, if the matter were prescriptible, is thus deduced euidentlie to thirtene yeere, which thirtene yeere without excuse we haue ceased and forborne to demand our dutie, like as the Scots haue likewise ceased to offer and render the same: for which cause ne-uertheless we do not enter this warre, ne minded to demand anie such matter now, being rather desirous to reioise and take comfort in the friendship of our nephew as our neighbour, than to moue matter vnto him of displeasure, whereby to alienate such naturall inclination of loue as he should haue towards vs: but such be the works of God superior ouer all, to suffer occasions to be ministred, whereby due superioritie may be knowne, demanded, and required, to the intent that according thereto all things gouerned in due order here, we may to his pleasure passe ouer this life to his honoz and glorie, which he grant vs to do in such rest, peace, and tranquillitie, as shall be meet and conuenient for vs.

When therefore the king of England had set forth this declaration of the causes that moued him to make warre against Scotland, he prepared to prosecute the same both by sea and land, and hauing rigged and furnished diuerse ships of warre, he sent the same forth to the sea, that they might take such Sco-tish ships as were to returne from their voiaiges made into France, Flanders, Denmarke, and other countreies, whether they were gone for trade of merchandize, with which the English ships incountried, toke 28 of the principall ships of all Scotland, fraught with all kind of merchandize and rich wares, which they brought with them into the English ports.

The king of Scotland aduertised therof, sent with all speed an herald, desiring restitution of his ships, as he thought good with reason, seeing no war was proclaimed: but the king of England thought it no reason to depart with them so soone, till other articles of agreement might be concluded, and therefore refused not onelie to deliuer their ships, but also sent Sir Robert Bowes with men to the borders, giuing him in charge to inuade Scotland, who according to his commission, with three thousand men rode into Scotland, and began to burne and to spoile certeine small townes: whereupon the fraite being raised in the countrie, George Gordon the earle of Huntleie, who was appointed to remaine as lieutenant vpon the borders, for doubt of such sudden inuasions, im-mediatlie gathered a number of borderers, and set vpon the Englishmen, and put them all to flight; Sir Robert Bowes, and his brother Richard Bowes, with diuers other, to the number of six hundred, were taken prisoners; and the said Sir Robert Bowes and other the principall landed men were kept still in Scotland till after the kings death. This victorie chanced to the Scots, at a place called Walden Rig in the Mers, vpon saint Bartholomewes day, which is the twentie fourth of August.

After this, the king of England sent the duke of Borfolke with the earles of Shrewesburie, Warbie, Cumberland, Surreie, Hertford, Angus, Rutland, and the lordes of the north parts of England, with an armie of fortie thousand men, as the Scots esteemed them, though they were not manie aboue twentie thousand, who entered into Scotland the one and twentieth of October, and burnt certeine townes vpon the side of the water of Tweed: but the earle of Huntleie, hauing with him ten thousand of the borderers and other, so waited vpon them, giuing them now and then skirmishes and alarms, that they came not past two miles from the water of Tweed within the Scottish bounds at that season.

In the meane time, the king of Scotland being aduertised hereof, gathered a great armie through all the parts of his realme, and came to Solutraie hedge, where they mustered, and were numbred to be thirtie six thousand men, with the which he came to Falla Spure, and there incamped, determining to giue battell to the Englishmen, as he pretended: howbeit, if the duke had taried longer, as it was thought he would haue done, if the time of the yeere and prouision of vittels had serued, the Scots would yet haue bene better aduised, before they had ioined with him in a pight field. But true it is, that after the duke had remained there so long as vittels might be had and recovered from anie part, he retired with his armie backe into England, not without some losse of men, horses, and spoiles, which the Scots vnder the earle of Huntleie and others toke from the Englishmen in that their retire, speciallie as they passed ouer the riuer of Tweed.

After the Englishmen were thus departed and withdrawne home forth of Scotland, king James being of an high and manlie courage, in reuenge of harmes done by the Englishmen within his coun-trie, thought good that his whole armie should passe forward and inuade England, himselfe to go there with in proper person. And herein he requested the consent of his nobilitie, who after long reasoning, and good aduise ment taken in the matter, gaue answer [by the earle of Spurre] to the king in this sort, that they could not thinke it good that they should passe within England, and to seeke battell, the king himselfe being with them, considering that his two sons were latelie deceased, so that he had no succession of his bodie: for in case that they lost the field, as in chance of battell is most uncerteine, then the king of England hauing great substance, might therewith follow the victorie, and put the realme of Scotland in great hazard.

Therefore

The earle of Scotish ships taken.

Therefore they thought it sufficient to defend their owne bounds, and to confine the enimie for feare to leaue the inuasion thereof, as presentlie they had done; and declared that they were determined to haue giuen battell to their enimies, if they had continued within the realme, and doubted not by the helpe of God, they hauing so iust a cause, and being inuaded in their countrie, but that they should haue obtained the victorie. The king hearing their determination, albeit his high courage pressed him to inuade; yet the approued wit of his nobles and counsellors caused him to follow their aduise, and so returned with his armie backe againe, the first of Nouember, the armie of England being first discharged, and the duke of Suffolke in his returne towards London.

Shortlie after, the king of Scotland went himselfe in person to the west marches of his realme, where the lord Marwell was warden, whome together with the earles of Castles, and Glencarne [the lord Fleming] and certeine other lords there with him, the king appointed to inuade the English marches on that side, taking with them the power of the borders, and sent also with them Oliuer Sinclair [the brother of Rosseline Comarch] and the residue of the gentlemen of his household. These earles and lords entering into England on saint Katharines euen, being the foure and twentieth of Nouember, began to burne certeine towne upon the water of Esk. But as sone as the scie was raised in the countrie, the lord Wharton warden of the west marches of England, suddenly raised the power of the countrie, and came to a little hill, where they shewed themselves in sight vnto the Scottish armie.

The Scottish lords perceiuing the Englishmen gathered, assembled themselves together, and inquired who was lieutenant generall there by the kings appointment; and incontinentlie Oliuer Sinclair was holden vp on two mens shoulders, where he sheweth forth the kings commission, instituting him lieutenant to the king of that armie. But howsoeuer that was read, the earles and lords there present, thought themselves imbaled too much, to haue such a meane gentleman advanced in authoritie aboue them all, and therefore determined not to fight vnder such a capteine, but willingly suffered themselves to be overcome, and so were taken by the Englishmen, not shewing anie countenance of defense to the contrary, and without slaughter of anie one person on either side.

This rode was called Solowate Holle, at the which were taken prisoners men of name, these persons following: the earle of Castles and Glencarne, the lord Marwell, the lord Fleming, the lord Somerville, the lord Mithant, Oliuer Sinclair, the lord of Traggie, and sundrie other gentlemen, the which were led prisoners to London, where they remained till after the king was dead. The king being in Carlawerocke vpon the borders not farre from Solowate Holle, when this misfortune fell vpon his men: after he heard thereof, he was meruelouslie amazed, the more, in calling to remembrance the refusal made by his nobles, assembled with him in campe at Falla vpon his request to inuade England. Where with such an impression entered his mind, that he thought with himselfe that all his whole nobilitie had conspired against him, and therevpon took such a vehement and high displeasure, increased with a melancholious thought, that he departed suddenly from thence to Edinburgh, and after remoued to Falkland, where he remained as a man desolate of comfort, being soe bered in spirit and bodie, and would not permit anie manner of person to haue access to him, his secret & familiar seruants onelie excepted. Now, as he was thus disquieted, newes were brought him that the quene his wife was brought to bed of a faire young princesse the seventh day of December, the which newes he liked verie euill; and added the griefe thereof to his former displeasure, insomuch that he perceiued the end of his life to appoach, and withall said, that he foresaw great trouble to come vpon the realme of Scotland, for the pursuit which the king of England was like to make therevpon against the same, to the end he might bring it vnder his subiection, either by marriage, or by some other meane. It was reported that he was disquieted with some unkindlie medicine: but howsoeuer the matter was, he yielded by his spirit to almightie God, and departed this world the foureteenth of December, in the yere of our redemption, 1542, the thirtieth yere of his age, and thirtie two of his reigne.

Shortlie after his departure, his bodie was conueied into Falkland vnto Edinburgh in most honorable wise; the cardinall, the earles of Arrane, Argyle, Mothes, Marshall, and diuerse other noblemen being present, and with all funerall pompe (as was requisite) it was buried in the abbeye church of Holyrood house, beside the bodie of quene Agadalen, daughter to the king of France, his first wife. There was great lamentation and mone made for his death throughout all parts of his realme, for he was verie well beloued among his subiects. He was of sweet countenance and courteous speech, grauely eied, hauing a diuine mind in all whatsoever, neither certeine in doubtfull things, nor doubtfull in things of certieintie, auoiding dangers with graue counsels, performing hard matters with great nobilitie of mind, and foresaking what might follow with an incredible iudgement: in such sort that he neuer was enuoyded against the danger of anie thing, or was drawne from it by the difficultie thereof, or was hindered by the obscuritie therein: where by he might incur the note either of a rash, fearefull, or slow person.

All which singular commendations seemed to flow out of this spring, that he did not by heat of youth (rashlie) but with great deliberation (soundlie) manage the whole affaires of the common-wealth, for as he did chieflie labor that his table might not exceed for gluttonie, nor be ouersparing for miserie: so if his apparell were decent, he esteemed not the shew of womanish attire after the courtlie fashion. He was so farre from pride, that he alwaies shewed himselfe offended with the vles thereof. He was an obseruer of iustice, a defender of the law, and a sharpe shield for the innocent and poore: for which cause he was of the nobilitie called the king of the commoners. For he set at libertie the poore oppressed with the tyrannie of the rich, and repressed the rich from spoiling of the poore: all which he did with a certeine severity, but yet such, as in the same there appeared a wonderfull gentleness of his naturall disposition, because he seldom put anie of them to death, but did either by prison or milder punishment the offense. For he was wont to say, that he would neuer take life from anie, but onelie to keepe the law sound, and for the example of others: and to keepe downe the boldnesse of such as dwelt about the borders. With these conditions he left the realme plentifully furnished with riches, and his owne treasure not empty, but abundantly stored with gold, siluer and other furniture: for which cause it should not seeme strange, that his death was greatly lamented of his subiects, to whom he was a perfect patrone, and a loving father.

Of whome also Buchanan lib. 14 testifieth, that his vices did almost equall all his great vertues; but that they were rather to be imputed to the iniquitie of the time than the inclination of his nature, 13. h. li. for for the libertie of althings had then dissolved the publicke discipline, which could not be staied but by great severitie of correction. And this made him more covetous of monie, because that he was kept extreame hard when he was under the government of others. Whereby, when he came to be at libertie, he was a new to furnish all his courts with household stuffe, finding his houses empty, and all things conuied away: for his tutors had consumed the kinglie patrimonie upon those whome he willingly would not to haue receiued it. Besides, for his excess of women the fault grew to such as were his tutors, who gaue him libertie thereto, supposing thereby to keepe him the longer in their danger. The nobilitie did not greatly take his death grieuoullie, because he had fined manie, imprisoned more, and caused no small feare (for avoiding his displeasure) to flee into England, and rather to commit themselves to the enimie than to his anger.)

The eternall God calling to his mercie James king of Scotland, the first of that name, Marie his onelie daughter and heire began hir reigne ouer the realme of Scotland, the eighteenth day of December, in the yere of our Lord 1542, Francis the first of that name then reigning in France, & Henrie the eight ouer the Englishmen. She was not passing seuen daies old when hir father departing this life, left vnto hir his kingdome, hir mother lieng in childbed in the castell of Lithquo, of which place the lord Levingston being capteine, had the charge committed to him, both of the daughter & mother, with the mothers good agreement and free consent.

Moreouer, immediatlie after the kings death (because he deceased without making anie will, or taking anie direction for the gouernement either of the realme, or custodie of the yong queene his daughter) David Beton, cardinall and archbishop of S. Andrews, the speciall minister & factor of the French causes, to the aduancement and continuance thereof, inuented and forged (by Henrie Balfoure) a will and testament of the late king now departed, in which (amongst other things) he established himselfe chiefe regent, adioining with him the earles of Murray, base brother to the king deceased, Huntlye and Argyle, not once mentioning the earle of Lennox then absent in France, nor yet James Hamilton earle of Arrane his cousine, being there present in Scotland.

Those that professed the reformed religion, being then called protestants, to whome the said cardinall was ever a cruell enimie and sharpe scourge, espied forth his vnjust dealing in this behalfe, and trusting by the gentle nature and good inclination of the said earle of Arrane, to haue some libertie to embrace the gospell, set him against the cardinall: so that by the helpe of his owne and their friends, he remoued the cardinall and his adherents from the vsurped come and authoritie, and therewith was the said earle of Arrane proclaimed gouernour and protector of the realme. [And thereupon shewing his authoritie, he entereth the kings palaces, as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 464. and vseth the kings treasure, and calleth the officers of the treasure to account, whereof he retelneeth some, and changeth others at his pleasure.]

This earle of Arrane made a title to haue and inioie that office and rone, as next in blood to the yong queene, as descended from a sister of h. James the third, married to his grandfather lord Hamilton, in the yere 1475, by reason of which marriage he was created earle of Arrane, as by act of parlement holden the same yere at Edenburgh, it was agræd and ordeined. The king of England that noble prince Henrie the eight, aduertised of the death of the king of Scots, considered with good aduise, that now there was offered a most readie meane and iust occasion, whereby the two realmes of England and Scotland might be brought into one entier monarchie, without warre or bloodshed, by the marriage of his sonne prince Edward, being then little past six yeres of age, with the yong queene of Scotland.

He therefore being resoluèd fullie to bring the same to passe, either by quiet meanes or by force, and sending for the earles of Castles, and Glencarne, the lords Sparwell, and Fleming, and other prisoners that had bene taken at Soloway mosse, caused them to be conueied vnto Hampton court, where the seuen and twentieth of December they being right courteoullie interteined, he made vnto them an offer of his purpose and whole intent, proponing the whole matter vnto them, requesting them for their parts, to helpe (with their consents) that a contract of mariage might be made betwene his sonne the prince, and their yong queene, promising to them libertie without rancome, besides other pleasures and benefits, if they would do their indeno; to persuade the gouernour, and other the nobilitie of Scotland to be agræable herevnto.

The Scottissh earles and lords accepted the kings offer, and withall promised to do their diligence to perswade the rest of the nobilitie in Scotland at their comming home: whereupon they were licenced to depart, and so comming to Newcastle, remained there with the duke of Suffolke, then the kings lieutenant of the north parts, till he had receiued forth of Scotland certeine pledges of the chieffest of these lords, for performance of their promises. Likewise the king of England sent with them the earle of Angus, and his brother sir George Dologlas with his letters to the gouernour, requesting effectiue, that they might be restored to their homes, lands and possessions in that realme.

These lords arriuing at Edenburgh, about the midst of Januarie, declared to the gouernour their message and proposition made by the king of England, with such efficacie, that the gouernour being persuaded thereto by their wordes, sent for the lords and nobilitie of the realme to come to Edenburgh, to a conuention there, to be holden the seuen and twentieth of that present moneth: where they concluded that a parlement should be kept in March next ensuing. And doubting lest the cardinall (being there present) should go about to perswade the nobilitie not to consent to their desires, they caused him to be put in ward within the castell of Warketh: the lord Beton being appointed to haue the custodie of him. About the same time, sir Robert Botwes, and all other the Englishmen that were prisoners, and had bene taken at Halding rig on saint Bartholomewes day (as before ye haue heard) were sent home by the gouernour into England, and sir Rafe Sadler was sent ambassadour from king Henrie vnto the said gouernour, and other the lords of Scotland, and came thither before the said parlement, to persuade the lords to agræe vnto the king his masters motions, travelling so diligentlie in the matters whereabout he was thus sent, that it was concluded by act of parlement, to send ambassadors into England, for the better satisfaction of king Henries desires.

And so the earle of Glencarne, sir George Dologlas, sir William Hamilton, sir James Leirmouth, and the secretarie being named and appointed thereto, departed in the moneth of March, and comming into England vnto the king, remained there till the latter end of Iulie. In which meane time, such conuents, contracts, and promises were had and concluded, passed and sealed interchangeablie, as stood with the pleasure and good liking of king Henrie, so as the mariage marriage was fullie contracted, and a peace concluded for ten yeeres, by authoritie of the aforesaid parliament. Wherewith also the lord gouernour shewed himselfe to embrace the reformed religion, causing one frer Guiliam to preach against images, and fruitlesse ceremonies, and gaue libertie that the bible called The new and old testament, should be had in English, & vntuersallie published through the realme of Scotland.

Also he commanded not onelie the cardinall (as before ye haue heard) but also ordeined that the quene mother should remaine in Liffgow with the yong quene hir daughter, vnder some manner of safe custodie, and the cardinall to be removed vnto his owne castell of saint Andreyes, with warders about him to see him safelie kept. * Not long after, the cardinall was restored to vn hoped libertie, and the earle of Angus, George Dowglaste, and the lord Clames, the heire of James Hamilton, with manie others, by the consent of the three estates, were wholie restored to all their goods, and deliuered from the sentence of banishment.

John Hamilton abbat of Passelew, brother of the gouernour, returning out of France (where he had imployed himselfe to studie) did (with certeine learned men, as David Paniter, and others, whom he had in his compantie) visit the king of England, of whome they were most courtesilie interteined. After which this Hamilton returning into Scotland, was made treasurer of the kingdome, which office he discharged with great commendation, so long as his brother kept the gouernement, whom he did not onelie helpe in counsell for ordering of the kingdome, but also shewed him selfe a balliant and industrious man in the warres against the English, for defense of the kingdome of Scotland. About this time, the earle Bothwell, which was banished, and had remained long at Venice, did returne into Scotland, whither he was honozable welcommed, as a person much desired of his friends and kindred.)

The French king misliketh of the match with England. Mattheu earle of Lennox.

The realme being thus brought in quiet, and vnder god gouernement, the French king soze misliking this new coniunction of the Scots with England, and doubting least the old former bond of alliance betwixt France and Scotland might thereby be bitterlie dissolued and shaken off, he sent for Mattheu Steward earle of Lennox, then abroad in his seruice in the wars of Italie, and vpon his coming backe from thence to the court, he declared to him the decrease of the late king of Scots, the intrusion of Arrane, and the attempts in that realme begun, with all the circumstances from point to point as he knew; and further discoursed with him what wrong he had to be set aside, and displaced from his right of gouernement; and therefore exhorted him to repaire home to recover the same, offering not onelie to assist him with men, monie, and munition, but also to ioint his friends in Scotland with him in aid to attaine the place of regiment, and to remove Arrane and others from it.

Fr. Thin.
Buchan. lib. 15.

The earle of Lennox herevpon with commission and instructions deliuered to him by the French king, had also letters from him directed to the lords that were of the French faction, wherein the said king requested them to remaine and continue in their former good meanings towards him, and to assist the earle of Lennox in all things, as should be thought expedient. * Now, before the earle of Lennox returned out of France, the cardinall had vsed manie persuaasions against the English, as well that the Scots set at libertie by the king, should breake their faith with him, as also to draw them to the French faction, and rather to suffer their pledges to receiue what king Henrie would doe vnto them, than by keep-ping promise to the English, to conueie the yong quene vnto them.

Wherevpon, when the greater part of those nobles (whome the matter touched, could easilie find anie color for the excuse of their fault) had consented to the cardinals persuaasion, onelie one amongst the rest would not yeld thereto, which was Gilbert Kennedy earle of Castles, who could not be drawn from that constancie (in obseruing his faith) either by bribes, flatteries, or threats. For he (having two brothers pledges for him in England) did openlie protest, that he would returne to prison, and by no feare laid before him commit such a fault, as that he would redeme his life with the blood of his two brothers: for which cause he went forthwith to London, although euerie man spake against it. Wherevpon, the king of England did singularlie commend the constancie of the yong man, and further (to the end that his vertue might be knowne to all men) did set him at libertie with his two brethren, and sent him home honozable rewarded.

Now the realme of Scotland being thus in great bypazes by means of the quenes and cardinals factions, whereof the last drew all (such as he could) to support the French league, they sent ambassadozs into France, to request the French king to send home Mattheu Steward earle of Lennox, as one that was not onelie emulous against Hamilton, but also his deadlie enimie for the slaughter of his father at Linnuch: which yong Steward (beside his beantie and comeliness of bodie, in the vertie flower of his youth; the memoire, carefulnesse, and dangers of his father, a vertie popular man, and beloued of the people; the worthinesse of that familie brought almost to an end, and that the same was of great power, and linked in marriage with manie nobles) did win and draw the minds of manie men, desirous to helpe him, for the great fauor they bare vnto him.

To the which further procurement of the peoples loue also, there might be ioined, that he was next heire to the crowne by the kings appointment, if he died without issue male; the which king James, if he had liued, would haue established by parlement: besides which likewise, there wanted not flatterers, which did not onelie stirre by his noble mind (now gaping after great things, and vndefended against deceits) to the hope of gouerning of the kingdome for these one and twentie yeeres and moze, during the quenes minority, and to the rule and power ouer his enimies, whereby he might see reuenge vpon them: but also they promised him to marrie the quene Dowager: and in the meane time (if anie thing happened otherwise than well to the yong quene) that he should obtaine the crowne, whereby he should both be king, and the next lawfull heire of James Hamilton latelie deceased, since the gouernor was a bassard, and could not onelie by law not looke or hope for the kingdome, but also not so much as hope to be heire to his owne familie. To all which were added the persuaasions of the French before mentioned. Wherevpon, the yong man (whose mind was credulous, being tickled and intised with these hopes) determined to go into Scotland.)

The earle therefore fullie instructed by the French king, how to deale and proceed, took his leaue, and with all speed taking the sea, directed his course into Scotland, where (after his arriual) he came to Edinburgh, in which towne all the lords being assembled together with the gouernour, he declared to them the effect of his commission from the French king, his request to them, & god affection to mainteine them against England, if in case they would continue the old league with him, and not seeke to make anie new alliance with the king of England.

The earle of Lennox passeth into Scotland,

But perceiuing that the gouernor and his friends were minded to satisfie the king of Englands desires, he would not farrie for a resolute answer, but by the counsell of the earle of Argyle, William earle of Glencarne, and others of the French faction, he suddenly departed forth of Edinburgh toward the west countrie, highlie displeased (as should seme) with the gouernor, and taking Lthgowl in his way, he conferred with the quene Dowager (as they termed hir) dealing how to assemble the noble men of the French side, to bring hir and hir daughter to libertie, out of the danger of the lord gouernor: because it was supposed that he ment to conueie hir into England.

The earle of Lennor conferreth with the quene Dowager.

1543. Lessle. The castell of Edinburgh recovered to the gouernors ble.

The yong quene conueied to Striueling.

About the same time, through practise of the abbat of Hallesie, brother to the gouernor, and others, the castell of Edinburgh was got out of the hands of sir Peter Creighton, and the keeping thereof committed by the gouernors appointment vnto James Hamilton lord of Stanehouse. But the erle of Lennor, with the assistance of the earles of Huntley, Montrose, Pentife, Argyle, and others of the French faction in August following, conueied the yong quene with hir mother from Lthgowl vnto Striueling. The cardinall also was there with them latelie before, hauing corrupted his keepers, & gotten aboad at libertie. Here with was a day appointed and proclaimed for the coronation of the yong quene. The earle of Arrane then gouernor, with the earles of Angus, Castles, the lords Harwell, Somerville, and diuerse others, called the English lords, remaining still at Edinburgh, aduertised the king of England of all the drifts of Lennor, and other of that faction, requiring his aduise and counsell how to deale for disappointing of their purposes, that sought to continue the amitie still with France, to the prejudice of peace with England.

The king of Englands doubt.

The king of England aduertised hereof, as well thus from the gouernor, and other the Scottish lords, as also from sir Rafe Sadler, his maiesties ambassador there, doubted greatlie least these lords, in whose hands the quene then was, in respect of the fauour which they bare to the French king, should conueie hir ouer into France: whereupon he requested the gouernor, and the other lords that fauoured his side, so to deale, that she might be sent into England, there to remaine, till the marriage might be consummate betwixt hir and his sonne prince Edward: hauing in the meane time such lords of hir countrie about hir to attend vpon hir, and to see to hir bringing vp, as should be thought expedient. To conclude, his maiestie not onelie sent his princelie comfort by waie of counsell and good aduise, but also according to their desire, and as by the duke of Suffolke (his highnes lieutenant then in the north) it was thought expedient.

The lord wharton. The lord Cuers.

Thomas lord Wharton, with two thousand men from the west marches, and the lord Cuers with other two thousand from the east borders, were appointed to enter Scotland, and to ioine themselves with the gouernor, and his friends, to assist them against their aduersaries. But as they were in a readinesse to march, through the secret labors of the cardinall, wishing the aduancement of the earle of Arrane his kinsman (whome he thought he should well enough frame to be at his appointment) rather than Lennor that was knowne to be of a greater stomach, the matter was so handled, that by the cardinall and the earle of Huntley of the one part, and the quene Dowager on the other, that the earle of Arrane reuolting from the king of England, came in to the Dowager, and ioined himselfe with the cardinall, and other the lords of the French faction: by reason whereof, they all concluded to mainteine him in the estate of lord gouernor, and not to place Lennor, as their purpose was to haue done, if Arrane had continued faithfull to the king of England.

The earle of Arrane a faith breaker.

Shortlie after, the yong quene was crowned at Striueling, the cardinall taking vpon him to order things as he thought good, appointing the gouernor to beare the crowne as chiefe person, & next in blood to the quene, and the earle of Lennor to beare the scepter. After the coronation, a parlement was called and holden at Edinburgh, at the which, in presence of the patriarch of Apuleia the popes agent, and of the French kings ambassadozs, monsieur la Brosse, and monsieur Penage, latelie before come into the realme, the earle of Arrane was netulie confirmed gouernor. And for the sure preservation (as they pretended) of the yong quene, it was agreed by the gouernor and the estates, that she should remaine with the old quene hir mother in Sterling castell, during hir minority, and certeine rents of that seigniozie were assigned for maintenance of such traine as was thought expedient to be attendant about hir: and further, the lords Levingston, Erskin, and Fleming (as saith Buchanan) the lord Grams, John Arskine, John Lindseie, & William Leutson were appointed to abide continually with hir, for the better safegard of hir person.

The earle of Lennor his displeasure.

Thus was euerie thing ordered as seemed to stand with the pleasure of the cardinall. Whereupon the earle of Lennor, perceiuing how vncourteouslie he was vsed, to haue his aduersarie thus confirmed in authoritie by the French side, and himselfe relected, he first sent to the French king, informing him the roughlie of the injuries to him done, putting him in remembrance of the promises made to him when he departed from him; also the constantnesse of his seruice, the hazard he had put himselfe in for his sake: and notwithstanding how he was yet unkindlie dealt with, that through trust of his promised aid and assistance, he was brought out of credit in his countrie, and subiected vnder the commandement and authoritie of his enemy, and wrongfullie disappointed of his right, which he looked to haue recovered, and to haue bene mainteined therein by his support.

He renounceth his seruice to the French king.

In consideration whereof, he renounced his seruice, willing him from thenceforth not to looke for the same anie more at his hands. Here with Lennor ioining himselfe with the earles of Angus, Castles, and Glencarne, the lords Harwell, and Somerville, the shiriffe of Aue, the lord of Dumlanrig, and other of that side, called the English lords, set himselfe against the gouernor, the cardinall, and others of that faction, so that the residue of this yere was spent in ciuill dissention betwene them. And here is to be noted, that a little before that the earle of Arrane reuolted to the French part, there was arrived in the mouth of the riuer of Cloide on the west coast, five ships, which the French king had sent to the aid of his friends in Scotland, vnder the conduction of James Stewart of Cardonoh, and of the forenamed monsieur de la Brosse, & monsieur Penage, the French kings ambassadozs.

Ciuilt dissention in Scotland.

French ships arriving in the riuer of Cloide.

There came with them also the patriarch of Apuleia, of whome ye haue likewise heard before. They had brought aboard in these ships fiftie thousand crownes, and munition to the value of ten thousand crownes. The earle of Lennor therfore, when he first resolved to turne to the English part, with the aduise of his confederats, seized vpon those ships, got the fiftie thousand crownes, and the most part of the munition into his hands, and brought it to the castell of Dunbarton, retaining it to his owne vse, where it was sent to haue bene imploied to the maintenance of the French faction, against the king of England, and the lords that leened to his side.

The earle of Lennor therefore, raising a power of men of warre with the assistance of the lords of his faction, came with them vnto Leith against the gouernor: that was then in Edinburgh: but through the diligent trauell of the cardinall, the earles of Huncleie, Murray, and Argile, the matter was taken vp, and an appointment accorded: so that sir George Dowglas was deliuered as a pledge for his brother the earle of Angus, the maister of Glencarne for his father the earle of Glencarne, the abbat Cullaghole for his brother the earle of Castles, to remaine in safe keeping where it pleased the gouernor to appoint. The earle of Lennor came vnto Edinburgh to the gouernor, but within six daies after, they went both to Litchuho, from whence the earle of Lennor secretly departed from the gouernor without bidding him farewell, and comming to Glasgowe, fortified the castell.

When the gouernor had receiued true intelligence that the earle had taken Glasgowe, he assembling such power as he could make, as well of his friends and followers, as of others, especially of the lord Boid went vnto Glasgowe, in which place the earle of Glencarne had before placed his armie, to the end there to trie the matter with his enemies. But before the battell, the earle of Lennor had withdrawn himselfe vnto Dunbretton, to gather a greater assemblie. Shortly after to returne to Glasgowe. The earle of Glencarne, with Tilbarne, Houstone, Buchanan, Macfarlane, Drumquhassile, and other barons and nobles of the Lennor, Hamfrie, and other places adioining, with the citizens, ecclesiasticall persons of all orders, and the other sort of common people, departed out of the towne to the plaine thereof (being a mile from the towne) there to trie theuent of battell (before the comming of the earle of Lennor) more in haste than good speed. Whereupon the gouernor (perceiuing himselfe to be drawne forward to battell) commanded the trumpets to sound to the alarmes. Whereupon the battels ioined, the hostes began to fight violently, and the conflict grew to be extreme on both parts: in which (with great slaughter) they long time fought with vncertaine victorie.

But in the end (what with the force of his armie, and the encouragement of the capteine) the full conquest fell to the gouernor, who put his enemies to flight. At what time, of the fauourers of the Lennor there were manie slain, partly of the nobles (as the sonne of the earle of Glencarne, and Moniepenne capteine of the footmen) and partly of the common sort (as the citizens of Glasgowe, and manie ecclesiasticall persons.) Besides all which, there had manie more perished, if the gouernor (through his naturall clemencie) had not (when the victorie began to leane towards him) giuen a signe of retreat, & with much speed saued manie of them. On the gouernors part were few missing, except Cambusketh (the head of that familie) and the baron of Argentine. The gouernor pursuing this victorie, entered the towne of Glasgowe, where he vsed (by the perswasion of the lord Boid) wonderfull fauour towards the citizens, (farre beyond their deserts) although that he depriued some (of the chiefest condition amongst them) from all the vse and benefit of their goods.

The earle of Lennor remaining at Dunbar, receiued into the castell the earle of Glencarne, and others, which had escaped the battell, who sometime after did rest (being feared with the ouerthrow) from any further turmoiles or troubles. But in the end, they which fauoured the Lennor, doo a fresh stirre him to take weapon against the gouernor: whereupon he doth restrengthen the towne and steeple of Glasgowe, determining to gather a new supplie, and once more to cast the dice of war. But the gouernor (minding to prevent all his inuasions by wise counsell) did (being accompanied with the cardinall) call to him about Glasgowe, all the nobilitie of the south parts, and (bringing forth the hired souldiours) commanded the great peeces to be planted against the enimie. Whereupon (entering the towne) he besieged the castell and steeple of the church (in which place were both Scots and Frenchmen) and in the end (after a slaughter of some of them) enforced the other to yield their forts. After that the castell was thus come into the gouernors hands, he hanged eightene of the chiefest and best loued vnto Lennor, and permitted the rest to depart at libertie. The earle of Lennor (vnderstanding that his affaires began to wauer, and to obtaine such euill successe) doth send the earle of Angus and the lord Sparwell to the gouernor, to treat of peace betwene him and the earle of Lennor, the which they laboured with great diligence, according to the trust reposed in them.]

But the gouernor caused them both to be secretly conueied from the counsell by the backside of the blacke friers of Glasgowe, vnto the castell of Hamilton, and from thence the earle was sent to Blackenelle. The lord Sparwell was kept still in hold at Hamilton, and George Douglas, and the maister of Glencarne in Edinburgh castell. These persons thus imprisoned stood in great doubt of their liues (as some supposed:) but as diuerse other did suspect, they were rather committed for a colour, than for any euill that was meant towards them. Howsoeuer it was with them, the earle of Lennor by the abuse of his friends sent the earle of Glencarne, and a gentleman called Thomas Bishop, vnto the king of England with offer of his seruice, and request to haue in marriage the ladie Margaret Dowglas daughter to the Earle of Angus, and niece to the said king.

Herevnto the king granted. For the performance whereof (and the dispatch of other things) he sent the lord Wharton and diuerse others. And on the earles part, the bishop of Cashnes his brother and the earle of Glencarne were appointed, who met at Carleill to performe the agreement. The quene, the cardinall, and the other of the French faction, did helpe the gouernor all they might, with counsell, power, and monie; because they perceiued that he repented such friendship with England as he had taken in hand by the counsell of Angus and of others. In the meane time there was a parlement assembled at Striueling, in which by common consent, the earle of Lennor was condemned of treason; wherefore the sentence of banishment was executed against him, and all his goods with his patrimonie were confiscat to the quene. Whilest the French king was ascertained that Lennor had forsaken his faction, & committed himselfe to the king of England, he suddenly committed to prison John Stewart lord of Aubigne baron in France, brother to the earle of Lennor, and depriued the said John Stewart of all such honours and offices as he possessed in France. For he was generall capteine of all the Scottish lands in France, being either such as had gard of the kings bodie, or bowmen, or men at armes: for the king of France hath Scots in wages of all the orders.

But let vs now returne to the Patriarch, who was honozable receiued by the cardinall and the bishop of Scotland into the citie of Glasgowe: during whose abode there, great contention arose betwene the cardinall and the archbishop of Glasgowe, who should in that citie be of greatest authoritie and honoz. Which in the end came to this issue, that both families fell together by the eares, which of them should go before foze with his crosse bozne by right. For the cardinall archbishop of saint Andrews and pimat of the kingdome, did affirme that the archbishop of Glasgowe should not haue his crosse bozne in his owne church, so long as the cardinall was present. Which the seruants of the archbishop of Glasgowe take in such disdain, that they plucked downe the cardinals crosse and threw it to the ground. Whereupon, the gouernor (vnderstanding the whole matter, and that it was now come from words to swords) made hast to appease this factious commotion, & caused the Patriarch therewith to be brought to Edinburgh accompanied with the clergie, where he remained all the winter following. In which towne he was honozable entertained and feasted of the quene, the gouernor, and other of the nobles, whome he requited with the like courtesie.

Amongest these of the nobilitie, the earle of Murray had the Patriarch on a day to a banquet, in which this Murray did shew an honozable thing not accustomed amongest others. For where he abounded in store of silver vessels, yet he commanded his seruants to furnish a great cupbord with chissall glasses brought from Venice, & that in the midst of dinner he should ouerturne the cupbord as it were unwillinglie. Which the servant at the time appointed did performe. The noise of breaking of which glasses did suddenly fill the eares of all the companie: and the Patriarch seeing the hurt, was somewhat moued. But the earle making no account of this thing, commanded his man afresh to furnish the same cupbord with as manie and fairer vessels of glasse than the former were, to the Patriarchs great admiration. For the Patriarch affirmed that the glasses of Muranoe and Venice did not anie way excell these. Cruelle this earle of Murray was honozable, wise, iust, and famous amongest manie princes for his manifold vertues, & manie ambassages most happilie performed amongest them. Who shortly after this, departing the court, died of the stone at his castle in Turnwaite.

This Patriarch shewed to the gouernor (besides other priuileges that he had from the see of Rome) his great authoritie, in that he was legat from the popes see, amongest the Scots, as long as he remained there. Which office, when he departed to Rome, he procured to be transferred to the cardinall; at what time the Patriarch also in the name of the pope, did promise much helpe, and monie to be sent to Scotland against England. For he studied by all means he could, to hinder the marriage of those two kingdoms: because he suspected thereby, that some alteration might be made in Scotland touching the religion; with the ouerthrow of churches and monasteries. Now, after that the Patriarch had remained all the winter in Scotland, he departed from thence in March, who as he was honozable entertained in all places, so he spared not to recount to the French king and other princes (whome he visited in his iournete) the humanitie he found in Scotland, which he also imparted to the bishop of Rome, to the other cardinals, & to the senat of Venice; not without singular praise and honoz to the Scottissh nation.]

They that were sent, so solicited the earles cause, that in the end the king was persuaded that Lennor ought of right to haue the gouernement of the realme of Scotland, and to be second person in the same. And herewith, in consideration how vniustlie not onelie his maiestie had bene dealt with, but also how vniustlie and discourteouslie Lennor had bene vsed, both at the hands of the French king, and also of his adherents in Scotland, by the cardinall & others: he both thankfullie receiued his gentle offer of seruice, & also promised to aid him in his title and all other lawfull causes: and herewith prepared an armie to passe into Scotland by sea, appointing the earle of Hertford, and the lord Lisle to haue the conduction of the same, who shipping at Cinnmouth with their people, arriued in the fozth vnder Wierdie castell, a mile & a halfe aboue Leith the third of Maie, the whole naue containing aboue the number of two hundred ships. Here at Newhauen, a quarter of a mile from the said castell, they landed their armie of ten thousand men of warre, with great artillerie, and all kind of munition.

The lord gouernor being at that present within the towne of Edinburgh, hearing of their arriuall, went forth of the towne accompanied with the cardinall, the earles of Huntley, Argyle, Bothwell, and others, purposing to stop their landing: but perceiving the puissance of the aduersaries to be such, as they could not resist the same, they returned to Edinburgh againe, and sent maister Adam Otterborne prouost of Edinburgh, and two of the balliffs to the earle of Hertford, to vnderstand the cause of his coming; and withall offered, that if there were anie injuries or wrongs done by anie of the Scots nation, he would appoint commissioners to talke with such as by him should be authorized thereto, for the full answering thereof, & to that effect he would gladlie receiue them into the towne of Edinburgh.

The earle of Hertford answered that he had no commission to talke of anie such matter; but rather to take reuenge of the vniust dealing and breach of promise on those that had falsified their faith. And therefore minding to burne the towne of Edinburgh, as well as other within that realme, he willed the inhabitants and all all those that were within the same to come forth, and submit themselves before him the kings lieutenant, to stand vnto the kings will and pleasure, or else he would not faile to proceed in execution thereof. The prouost answered that he would rather abide all extremities, than accomplish his request and desire in that behalfe; and thereupon returned to the towne.

After the gouernor had heard what answer was made to the prouost, he caused the castell to be furnished with all things necessarie for defense, and departed straightwaies to Strimeling. The English armie lodging that night in Leith, marched the next day toward Edinburgh, passing by the Cannogat street to enter at the nether bow, where they found some resistance made by the Scots, so that diuerse were slaine on both parts. Towards night, the Englishmen, after they had continued long in skirmishing that day with the Scottisshmen, retired to Leith. The next day the whole armie with the great artillerie came forward towards the towne, and breaking open the Cannogat, they entered the towne by the same, bringing their ordnance within sight of the castell, purposing to plant the same in batterie against it; but the captaine of the castell caused the artillerie within to shoot off at them in so great abundance, & so good measure, that they slue diuerse Englishmen, and dismounted one of their peeces, so that in the end they were constrained to draw backe their ordnance & retired; but yet in the meane time they set fire on the towne, and burnt the most part of all the houses in the same. They burnt also the Cannogat street, and the abbete of Holie rood house. The gouernor at that present released out of prison the earle of Angus, the lord Sparwell, the maister of Glencarne, sir George Douglas, and others.

In this meane time also there came from the borders by land foure thousand of English horsemen, vnder the conduction of the lord William Criers, and his sonne sir Rafe Criers; who joining with the armie at Leith, scowped the countrie on euer ford, the lord admirall, and others, returned by land through the countrie vnto Berwik, as in the Eng-

English armie was thus occupied in that part of Scotland, the erle of Lennor with an armie of men which he had raised, was readie to come on the backs of the gouernour and his adherents, if they had assembled their forces and come forward to haue giuen contentions still continued, and sundrie conflicts and skirmishes chanced betwixt the parties.

* The Scots which inhabit the mountains, and the fies, did now in these turmoiles begin to shew some tokens of their inconstancie. For they (which paied pærelie tribute in the time of James the first, kept the peace, liued within the bounds of law, and well obeyed the gouernour) did now (after they saw all things on a flame) begin againe to spoile and de-stroye their neighbors, in the same vttering the humour of their naturall disposition. Whereupon the go-uernour (to restraine their boldnesse) called vnto him George Gordon earle of Huntley, and the earle of Argyle, whereof he made the one gouernour of the north parts of Scotland, of the Orkades, and Shetland; and to the other, he committed the rule of Argyle, and the fies Hebrides. Whereupon Huntley with all speed gathered an armie from the north parts, and determined to bysie the Glencamerons, the Gencronelles, the Mudiardes, & the Bindiardes, with force and authoritie. The capitaine or heads of which families, were Ewin Allanston, Ronald Mac-koneilglas, and John Mudiard, who did possesse the lands of the lords Grant, and Louet, hauing expelled them by force from the same.

But when they first vnderstood that Huntley had incamped nere vnto them, they fled euerie one home to their owne possessions: which being defended partly by the west sea, and partly included about with the mounteins, stopped Huntley, so that he might not haue anye passage vnto them: by meanes whereof (these disseisours being banished) the lords Grant and Louet were restorred to their right inheritance. But it fell out contrarie for Louet, who going to take his owne into his hands, fell into danger of his enemies. For at that time both the companies were disposed into such order, that neither par-tie could abstaine from fight. Whereupon they first discharge their bodies one against another, and their arrowes spent, they after sie to their swords, with which they fought so egerlie, that the night cutting off the battell, it could not be well knowne to which part the victorie gaue place. In which there was so great slaughter on both parts, that till the next morning in viewing the dead bodies, the victors were not knowne. Amongest whome of the part of the Glencamerons and Mudiardes there were manie slaine.

But by reason of the death of the lord Louet, and of his sonne and heire (a youth of singular hope, and brought vp in France) with three hundred of the blood and surname of the Fraisers (for Louet was the head and leader of that familie) the hurt seemed to be the greater on their part. For there was a rumour spread, that there was not one of the familie of the Fraisers left aliuie that was of mans state. But it happened by the singular benefit of God, that they left their wiues with child when they went to the fight, by which meanes the familie was after raised and restorred. Huntley (greatlie grieved that the Fraisers had receiued this grieuous wound) gathered a power together, and with armes so pursued those factious people, that he toke and beheaded E-win Allanston, and Ronald, with diuerse others, and put the rest in prison. The earle of Argyle discharged the office committed to him as well as Huntley did and with more happie success, for all the Island men humblelie submitted themselves vnto him, and deli-uered pledges to liue quietlie hereafter.)

About this time the earle of Lennor, accompanied with Alexander the maister of Glencarne, otherwise called lord of Kilmaluise, Walter Graham brother to the earle of Montrose, sir John Borthwick knight, and sundrie other gentlemen, toke the sea to passe into England, and arrived at Westchester about Midsummer: & passing from thence to the court, he was iustlie receiued. And immediatlie thereupon was the marriage celebrated betwixt him and the ladie Margaret Douglas, daughter & heire to the earle of Angus, and to Margaret his wife queene of Scots, sister to king Henrie the eight, at that time there was assured to him by way of inheritance, lands to the value of seven hundred marks of pærelie rent of assise, in consideration of this ma-riage with the kings nere, and in recompense of lands lost by him in France, to the which he was inheritour after the deceasse of Robert Stewart lord Dbenic, one of the foure marshals of France.

Afterward, king Henrie being now vpon his iourne towards Bullongne, as well for the anoysance of his highnesse enemies in Scotland, as for recourie of the said earles right in that realme, appointed the said erle to enter Scotland in the moneth of August, accompanied with sir Rafe Spaulfield, sir Dester Hewtas knights, maister Thomas Audleie, master Thomas Bokes, old maister Winter comptroller of the kings ships, and his sonne sir William Winter that now is, and sundrie other capitaine, hauing vnder their charge two hundred backbitters, two hundred archers with long bowes, and two hundred armed pikers, beside the mariners belonging to those ships that were appointed to go forth on this iourne, being in number about twelue or fourtene saile, belonging to Bristow, and other of the west parts.

Vpon their arrivall on the coast of Scotland, they burnt the Ile of Arrane, and rased the gouernours castell there to the ground. And afterwards arriuing at the Ile of Bute, they entered the same, and toke the castell of Koseie standing therein (from whence the Stewartes kings of Scotland had their origi-nall) the captaine they had awaie prisoner with them into England. Here also they toke two French ships laden with wines, and this done they entered the Firth of Clyde, thinking to find none but their friends in the castell of Dunbretton. But true it is, that in this meane time the earle of Glencarne with sundrie gentlemen being left in that castell, with the captaine thereof called Honsion, to kepe it in the name and to the behoofe of the erle of Lennor, were in his absence perswaded thorough practise of the queene Dowager, not only to renounce their promised faith to him, in defrauding him of that castell; but also to intrap and wind him within their danger to take him prisoner.

For this purpose they so dissembled the matter, that they had got him on land onelie with three hundred men: and so farre forth they were growne in talke, that the erle of Lennor being entered into the castell with a few other with him, the monie was laid downe on the board, to be paid to the captaine for his satisfaction. But in the meane time, the earle of Lennor, & such as were with him, perceiving some treasonable practise in hand, got forth of the house againe unto their companie below, leaving the men behind them, and after made thist to get to their ships, and not before it was high time.

For if they had staied that night, they had bene intrapped by George Dowglas, who with foure thousand men was secretlie drawne thitherwards, and entered the towne of Dunbarton, thortlie after that the earle of Lennor was thus departed, and got to his ships lieng there at hand in the riuer of Clyde, downe the which he retired to the sea, not without danger to haue lost the same ships, by reason of the narrownesse of the water: for the erle of Argile being gotten betwixt him and the sea with a great power of men, with banners displayed, hailed the ships with shot of ordinance from the castell of Dinnune, annoyng the earle of Lennor his passage as much as he could. But he escaping with the English gentlemen, and the ships out of danger, took advantage together at the Ile of Bute what they were best to do.

The earle soe moued to haue bene thus repelled from Dunbarton, and stomaching the matter soe, to be so discountenanced by his enimie the earle of Argile, with the aduise of the English gentlemen, he returned with them, and with great shew of manhood took land beside the castell and towne of Dinnune, where the earle of Argile with seuen hundred men was ready to encounter him, & to keepe him off from landing: but by the helpe of the shot out of the ships, and great store of botes, the Englishmen landed, slue foure score of the enimies, most part gentlemen, and put the residue to flight, with the losse of thre men onelie on the English side.

This done, the towne of Dinnune was burnt, and the church spoiled, that was full of goods and ornaments. When the night approched, by reason the Englishmen had no powder, nor other prouision on land, the earle with his people returned to shipboard in safetie, howbeit not without offer of skirmish made by the enimies though to their losse, namelie of those that advanced themselves most forward. About foure or fve daies after, the earle of Lennor with fve hundred men landed in another part of Argile, and remaining on land a whole day together, burnt, spoiled, and wasted the countrie: the earle of Argile with two thousand men giuing the looking on, and not once offering the skirmish, so that the earle of Lennor with his soldiers retired to his ships without encounter.

After this they invaded the Ile of Bute, where James Mackonell dwelled, burnt manie places in that countrie, toke and caried awaie great boties of cattell and other goods. All the coasts of Bile, Carrick, & Coningham, and likewise of Calloway remained in continuall feare, so that oftentimes their beacons were fired, and manie of the noble men constrained to come to the earle of Lennor, suing to him for assurance. In these exploitcs the earle had with him Walter Macferlane of Tirbat, and seuen score men of the head of Lennor, that spake both Irish, English, & the Scottish tonges, light footmen, well armed in shirts of male, with bowes, and two handed woods, and being ioined with the English archers and shot, did much available seruice in the streits, the marshes, and mountaine countreies.

* During these things, they which had gouernment of Scottish affairs (as the quene Dowager, the cardinall, and the gouernor) called a counsell, in which they decreed that all such of the nobilitie as had force and armes, should be ready to follow the gouernor whither soeuer he went, and there to remaine with him for the space of eight daies, shor-lie after there assembled eight thousand men, and in the sharpe winter battered the church of Colbingham, standing in armes a whole day and night to the great toile and wearinesse of the men and horses. The next day the gouernor, either to accuse his tenderness sustained in the last daies labors of warre, or else fearing the inuasion of the enimie (for he was certified of an armie of men that should come from Bertouke) suddenlye (unknowne to the other nobilitie) did flie to Dunbar with a few of his owne traine. They which went about to excuse the desame of this flight, reported how he feared that he should haue bene betrayed to the English by his host, for hatred which they had conceiued against him for manie of his offenses.

This departure of the gouernor brought great trouble to the armie, & so much the more, because the secreter it was (and the reason unknowne) the more cause it gaue to the rest to feare some further euill. Wherefore the greater part remained in this obstinate mind, that euerie one should returne the next way home, and leaue the artillerie at random. But others (who were more careful, and would seeme lesse fearefull) did agree to stusse the peeces full of powder, and to breake them, rather than they should fall in the hands & helpe of the enimie. To the which deuise onelie Archembald Dowglas did resist, least he should ad a wicked deed to a wicked flight. Who when he could not staie any man, either by threat, or treatie, or authoritie, he exclaimed with a loud voice (for euerie one to heare him) that for his owne part he had rather die an honest death, than to haue a secure and rich life with such dishonor. Wherefore you my friends consider what you will do, for either I will bring awaie this artillerie, or I will not returne home with life; wherefore I meane to make this the last end both of my life and glorie. When he had spoken this, a few (whose honor was deare unto them) were moued therewith, but the rest (despairing by reason of the shamefull flight of the gouernor) did scatteringly depart, wandring whither they thought god, without anie order. The Dowglas with such companie as he had (placed in god order) followed the artillerie, and brought the same to Dunbar, the horsemen of his enimies in vaine hasting after them behind at their backs. This expedition by the gouernor rashly begun, and shamefullie performed, brake the hearts of the Scots, and advanced the minds of the English, who gloriouly applied the dauidnesse of the gouernor to their owne glorie.)

To conclude, after the earle of Lennor and his companie had atchiued these enterprises afore mentioned, he returned towards England, and sent sir Peter Petotas knight, & Thomas Bishop a Scottish gentleman, to aduertise the king of England of his proceedings, who found him at the siege of Bullongne, where they declared to him the whole circumstance of euerie thing, as the same had passed in the earles toynie, which the king toke in verie good part. And upon his returne into England, after the conquest of Bullongne, the earle of Lennor was also called home to the court by letters to him directed, he being then at Biffow.

About the middell of februarye, sir Rafe Cure commonlie called Cuers, lord warden of the English middle marches, entered Scotland with a power of foure thousand Englishmen, Irishmen, and assured Scots; and coming first unto Jedworth, lodged there that night. And therewithall understanding that the gouernor and the earle of Angus were at the abbey of Melros, about eight miles distant from thence, the next morning he was got forth so earlie, that he was almost vpon the enimies in such wise on the sudden, that they fled out of their lodgings, and and left their beds and all their household furniture which they had in those there with them, not having time to conuie it awaie at their departure, at their warning was so short. Sir Rafe Cuers at his coming thither, finding them fled and gone, spoiled the towne and abbeie, vtterlie defacing the tomes and monuments of the earles of Dowglas, greatlie to the displeasure of the earle of Angus, and those of his linage.

*After this (the coming of the English being looked for the next yere) the minds of the borderers were greatlie troubled, because they were hopelesse to attaine anie succor from the gouernour, which vied the aduise of the clergie, but chieflie of the cardinall. Whereupon Archembald Dowglas earle of Angus (greatlie moued partlie with his priuat losses, for he had great possessions in the marches, and in Tulof, and partlie to see his ancessors monuments defaced) came to the gouernour, and fullie laid before him the greatnesse of the danger wherein the realme did stand, perswading him to incounter and resist the same. At what time also (after the gouernour had opened vnto him, that he was forsaken of the nobilitie, and now left alone) the Dowglas shewed that the same happened vnto him by his owne fault, and not by the nobilitie, which would imploie their liues, linings, and goods, for the defense of the common-wealth. For he contemning their counsell, onlie leaned to the spiritualtie, who were towards in warre, and seditious in peace.

Out of this founteine (saith he) a suspicion (that you dare not trust one another) is growne betwene you and them, which is the onelie cause why things are no better performed. But if you determine (in great affaires) to take the aduise of them (who will not refuse to spend their blood therein) I doubt not but that we shall be able to execute as great matters as euer our ancessors did: but if we shall (by our slouth) permit the enimie to take all things from vs, then of necessitie will follow, that either they shall shortly banish vs, or bying vs into perpetuall seruitude: the inconueniencies of anie of which cannot well be spoken. As touching our selues I know that thou art suspected to be a coward, and I a traitor, which reproch if thou thinke to purge (for thou canst not auoid it) prepare to cleare the same, not with painted speeches, but with bloudie weapons.)

Whereupon the gouernour and the said earle (soe agreed to be thus soiled at the Englishmens hands) assembled together [under the leading of Doorman Lefle son of the earle of Rochelle] all such forces as they might recouer, so that they had quicklie got them about fiftene hundred men, therof eight hundred at the least were gentlemen. Who hearing that the Englishmen were retiring towards Jedworth, they met them at a place called Darnier hugh, or Dymchouse, where both the parties alighting on foot, went to trie the quarell by plaine force of hand. But as they were redy to loine, the assured Scots, to the number of seuen or eight hundred reuolted vnto the part of their countreimen, by reason whereof, after a right sharpe and fierce conflict, the Englishmen in the end were constrained to flee, whome the Scots right egerlie pursued, slue sir Rafe Cuers, the lord Ogile, sir Brian Leiton, and other gentlemen & souldiours to the number of eight hundred. They took also about two thousand prisoners, with certeine peces of artillerie and other munition.

This victorie fell to the Scots the seventeenth day of Februarie, the report whereof was right displeasing to the English nation, but speciallie the losse of that worthy gentleman sir Rafe Cuers was greatlie bemoaned, and that euen of the king himselfe, for the noble prowesse and great lotallie which at all times had bene found in him. His seruice had bene such in these wars against Scotland, that he had brought the more part of the Scots with in twentie miles space of the English borders, vnto the obedience of the king of England, although at length they holpe to worke his confusion, as before ye haue heard. ¶ Of this gentleman & his singular seruice in the field, I omit here to speake, because he was imploied otherwise, besides Scotland: where, soe I remit the readers to the twentieth yere of king Henrie the eight, where to his high commendation this gentleman is recorded.]

*The occasion of the English ouerthrow (as saith Lefleus) and the Scots victorie, were chieflie by these meanes. First they fought vpon equal ground, and with vnequall helpes. For the Scots with the sunne on their backs (being declined toward setting) came forth of a narrow & marshy place, and set vpon the English (at the side of an hill which was betwene them) hauing the sun in their faces, by which meanes they could neither well perceiue what number the Scots had, nor with their gunnes hurt anie of the Scots. But those that fought in the first battell, wherevnto was ioined (a feare not in vaine) which they had conceiued of the Scottish march-men, who in great number hauing red crosses (the note of the English) ran vp and downe hither and thither to see the euent thereof.)

About the same time that the victorie before mentioned chanced to the Scots, Robert Corncoise bishop of Ross departed this life, to whome succeeded David Pantane, secretarie to the gouernour, and priuor of saint Marie Ile. In April, William Stewart bishop of Aberdeen likewise deceased, and maister William Gordon chancelor of Spurrete, uncle to George erle of Huntlie, was by the cardinals sute promoted to that see, greatlie to the displeasure of the earle of Angus, that labored to haue preferred another thereto. For this and other causes, the cardinall was greatlie in hatred of the Dowglas.

*About that time, the king of England by priue & pries perswaded the Flemings to take sirtene of our ships harborred in the haven, and to conuert the commoditties (wherewith they were fraught, being verie costlie) to their owne commoditie. By means whereof at one time we had warres with two nations, England and Flanders. But sith the Flemings did not the same maliciously for hatred to the Scots, but carefulle for the loine vnto the English, as the Scots did certeinlie know, they shewed none other token of enimitie to the Flemings, but that they forbade them to fish on their coasts, and did sometime intercept their ships, without further iniurie done vnto them.)

This yere also, Montgomerie, otherwise called monsieur de Aozes, knight of the order of saint Michael, was sent by the French king with foure thousand Frenchmen into Scotland to assist the Scots against England. He landed at Dunbretton, & came in good order to Edinburgh the thirtieth of May: he brought with him from the French king the order of saint Michael, to inuest therewith the lord gouernour, the earles of Angus, Huntlie, and Argile. Therewith also was an armie of Scots raised, and ioining with the Frenchmen, they approached the borders, where they laie for a season: but the earle of Hertford lieutenant generall of the north parts comming downe, took such direction for the safe keeping of the English borders, that after the Scots had laine there in campe a certeine space, without attaining anie great enterpryse, though some notable exploit was looked for to haue bene attempted by them at that present, they brake vp their armie & went home.

* This castell of Dunbreton was at that time so carefullie kept by the captein thereof, that he determined neither to deliver it to the gouernor, nor to anie Englishman, nor to anie Scot. Whereupon, the gouernor fearing least it should fall into the hands of the English, prepared to besiege the same; the newes thereof comming to Glencarne, he signified the same vnto Lennor, affirming, that if he would come thither, he should shortly obtaine the castell. The king of England reioicing of that newes, prepared two ships, and in the meane time sent the bishop of Cathnessie into Scotland, which should forthwith be received into the castell. Wherefore the gouernor making the more hast, commeth to Dunbreton together with the cardinall, and the earles Huntley, and Argyle, laing present siege to the same, which was stronglie done, and the castilains pressed to great extremity by the slaughter of manie people. But at length by the policie of the earle Huntley, it was so agreed, that the castell (which was by nature impregnable) should be delivered. Which the gouernor received (with certeine conditions) and honorablie intreated the captein for the singular discharge of the trust committed to him: and therewithall he restored the bishop of Cathnessie, brother to the earle of Lennor to his bishoprike, which before he had lost by his going into England.)

The lord
Marwell son taken prisoner

The sixteenth of September, thre or foure hundred Scots, with Marwell, Lochindart, and Johnstone, aided with the Frenchmen, attempted to enter into England on the east borders: but the Englishmen perceiuing where they were about to passe by a certeine street, they set vpon them with their archers, discomfited them, slaing, & taking to the number of seven score of them. Among other that were taken, one of the sonnes to the lord Huntley, with a French captein, and George Elphinston archer of the corps to the French king, were accounted chiefe. Also on the west borders, Robert Marwell eldest son to the lord Marwell, was taken in a rode made by him and others, into the English confines on that side, although at an other time certeine Englishmen making a rode into Scotland were distressed, the more part of them being taken or slaime. At a parliament holden at Linlithgow, begun there the twentieth eight of September, and continued till the first of October, at the earle of Lennor, and Thomas bishop of Athelrae, were forsailed, and all their lands and goods giuen awaie and annered to the crowne.

The earle of Lennor pro-cureth them of the Isles to serue the king of England.

In this meane time, the king of England desirous to haue the seruice of the Isles of Scotland for sundrie great causes and respects, moued the earle Lennor to deale with them to that end: which he did. And his trauell took such effect, that the Island men were contented to rest at the king of England his deuotion, partly for that they were in a manner sworne enemies to the earle of Argyle, and his familie; and partly for that they doubted the king of Englands puissance, if he should attempt to inuade those parties: and againe, bearing an old speciall fauour to the earle of Lennor and his house, hauing an ancient bond of alliance and amitie with the same, they were the more readie to satisfie his motion. Whereupon, they elected amongst them a lord of the Isles, the next of blood: a title long since verie odious to the state of Scotland, and by the inducement of the earle of Lennor, he was contented as the king of Englands pensioner, to receiue two thousand crownes of him yearly, with certeine rich apparell of cloth of gold and silver from the said earle.

The first prowe he attempted to shew of his seruice in the king of Englands behalfe, was this. Hauing instructions thereto from the earle of Lennor, bader colour of conference for matters touching the estate of the countrie, he had suborned one of his aliance and seruants, called the clane Reginald, to intrap the earles of Argyle and Huntley. And although they escaped verie narrowlie, the lord Louet an ancient baron, & great friend to those two earles, was slaime by the said clane, together with seven hundred of his kinsmen and friends: insomuch that there remained not but one yong boy of that linage to succed in that lords lands [which is before moze fullie handeled out of Lefleus.]

After this, the lord of the Isles, with six thousand men imbarcked in certeine vessels, passed ouer into Carrlike, harried and burnt the lands of the earle of Camiles, then a great enimie to the king of England. In this voiage he got great spoiles, and slue manie of the enimies. After which enterprize so achieved, he came with his power by sea, and landed in Ireland, where the earles of Lennor and Desmond were, with twelue hundred Irishmen, appointed to soine with him, that with their whole power they might inuade the earle of Argiles countries, & consequently the maine land of Scotland at the broad side. But before the preparation could be made ready for that toine, the new lord of the Isles decaiesed, whose buriall in Ireland to honor the earle of Lennor, stood the king of England in four hundred pounds sterling.

But now to retorne vnto the doings on the borders betwixt England and Scotland in this season. We shall vnderstand, that after the armie of Scotland was broken vp, the earle of Hertford by vertue of his commission, raised an armie in the countries of the further side of Trent northwards; so that when the same was assembled together, with such strangers as were then in the kings wages, they were in all of horsemen and footmen twelue thousand fighting men. With this armie garded with great store of artillerie, munition, and all manner of furniture necessarie, the earle of Hertford entered Scotland, and marching to Colbingham, pass by by the water of Tweed, and burnt a great part of the Perses, and Tuidale, the abbetes of Kelso, Melrose, Dryborne, and Jedworth, with townes & villages, to the number of siue score.

Howbeit, he entered not farre within the said countrie beyond the said water, but kept alongest nere to the same, and returned backe without anie encounter: for after the Scottish armie was broken vp, it was not like they would assemble againe, and so the earle of Hertford taking the time that serued his purpose, soze indamaged the Scottish borders at that present. Manie other small inuasions were made, as well by the one part as the other, and some skirmishes fell out betwixt them, sometime to the losse of the Scottish, and sometime of the English, according to the course of warre.

Buchan. lib. 15.

* Much about this time, or rather before, Robert Marwell the sonne of Robert (a yong man of singular vertue) was taken by the English. Besides which there was nothing done worthy the memorie, but that in the beginning of the next winter Montgomerie returned into France. After this, the cardinall leadeth the gouernor about the nere countries, vnder colour to reconcile such parts as were at dissention: then they came first to Perth, where foure men were punished for eating fleshy on forbidden daies: from thence they went to Dundee called Loathune (to vnderstand the name of the place, as Buchanan hath) to punish (as they said) such as vied the late new testament of Luthers translation. Thither came also Patrick Greie (the head of a noble familie in those parts) accompanied with a good traine, together with the erle of Rothes, being before that commanded to be there by the gouernor, after the pacifying of the

ther tumults. But the cardinall (supposing it small safetie to receiue at one time two such noble and factions persons addicted to the restored religion, into the towne) wrought with the gouernoz that he and they might go backe to Perth.

The next morning, when those two noblemen (redie for the iourneie) understood that the gouernoz was on his waie towards Perth, they presentlie folloved him. Who being come in sight, did strike such feare into the cardinall, that the gouernoz commanded them to sunder themselves, and severallie to enter the citie: which they did. Whereupon the next day they were both committed to prison. But Rothseie being shortly deliuered, Greie (whome they hated more, and feared most) was kept longer in that restraint. But before they parted thence, it seemed good to the cardinall to abate the strength of Ruthwen capteine of the towne. For which cause, the gouernoz taketh his office from him, and bestoweth the same vpon Kinsane Comarch, neighbor and kinsman to Greie. For this Ruthwen was a great enimie to the cardinall, and much fauored the restored religion: as likewise was Greie, who after the same sort did not beare a friendlie mind to the cardinall, nor to his religion.

By reason whereof, the cardinall supposed, that if he might set them (by this meanes) together by the eares (with manie of both parts would ioin for defense of the chiefe of their families) and that if anie side had the worse (as both must be diminished) that then he had by so much abated the power of one of his enimies. Upon which occasion the gouernement of Perth (which had by manie descents remained in the familie of the Ruthwens) might be thus translated to Kinsane. Thus the new capteine was sent with a power to subdue the citizens by force, if they would not willingly obeye: as it seemed that they would not; because they take it with some grieue, to haue (in this new capteine) the old libertie of voices (in choosing of their gouernoz) taken from them. The besieging of the towne being therefore diuided into parts, Greie (which had whole taken the matter on him) attempted the overthrow thereof, from the bridge of Tait. The other band (hauing laid their artillerie along by the riuer ouer against the towne) did invade the open side of the said Perth.

But because the swelling of the sea did not answer their deuise, they came not in time to do anie thing therein. Greie assailing it by the bridge (which Ruthwen hauing receiued, and conueied the aid into the next houses, would seeme to leaue vngarded) when he saw no armed men stirring, did (without all feare) enter further into the towne, where he was so sharplie set vpon by Ruthwen, and his companie (suddenlie and vnlooked for) breaking out of the houses vpon them that euerie one hastened to spie some place by which he might flee awaie. But the multitude confused and driuen into a streit, did let one an other thereof. For they behind, thinking to breake in amongst the other, did hinder the first that they could not flee: in which vnorderlie multitude, manie were troden vnder foot, and three score were killed with the sword.

The cardinall (although against his mind) hauing heard of the victorie of Ruthwen; yet he did not greatlie lament the slaughter made of his aduersaries. After this, the cardinall hauing thus sufficientlie progressed to Angus: he led the gouernoz after the fourteenth of December to saint Andzeus, to the end (if it were possible) to bind the gouernoz more firmelie vnto him. For although before he had the gouernozs sonne as pledge with him; yet (as often as he remembred the eagernesse of the Scottish nobilitie, the strength of his enimies, and the inconstancie of the gouernoz) he greatlie feared, least the said gouernoz should with like lightnesse be drawn to assist his enimies, as he had bene led to take his part. During the time next, lest they were at saint Andzeus, the cardinall caused in the Lent season all the bishops & prelates of the realme to assemble at the towne of saint Andzeus, where a learned man, named master George Wilschart, that had bene in the scholes of Germanie, was accused of heresie, which he had (as was alleged against him) publikelie preached, and priuatlie taught in Dundee, Brechin, and diuerse other parts of Scotland, since his returne home. This matter was so bzged against him, that he was conuict, and burnt there in the towne of saint Andzeus during the time of that conuention or assemble.

George Wilschart a learned man burnt.

When these things were thus done, the cardinall, although he greatlie trusted to his riches; yet because he was not ignorant that were the minds of men, & that speeches the common people had of him) determined to increase his power with new deuises. Wherefore he goeth into Angus, and marieth his eldest daughter (as saith Buchanan) to the earle of Crawford's sonne. Which marriage was solemnized with great preparation, almost answerable to kinglie magnificence. During which time, the cardinall vnderstanding by his spies, that the English did prepare to invade the Scottish borders on the sea (and speciallie did threaten those of Fife therewith) returned to saint Andzeus, and appointed a day to the nobilitie, and such as dwelled about the sea coasts, to assemble together to prouide in common for the defense thereof, and to prepare remedie for that hastened euill. For the easier and better performance whereof, he had determined, together with the lords of that countrie, to haue sailed himselfe about the coasts, and to haue defended such places as were most conuenient.

Buchanan, lib. 15.

Amongest others that came vnto him, there was a noble young gentleman called Rozman Leslie, sonne to the earle of Rothseie, whereof we haue spoken before manie times. This man (after that he had manie times employed his valiant and faithfull diligence in the behalfe of the cardinall) grew to some contention with the said cardinall for a priuat cause, which for a time did estrange both their minds the one from the other. This same contention did Rozman (being thereto induced with manie faire promises) afterwards let fall. But certeine moneths following (when he returned to demand the performance of such liberall promises) they began to grow from common speech to bzallings, and from thence to bitter taunts & reproches, not fit to be vsed by anie of them both. Whereupon they departed with the græued minds of euerie of them. For the cardinall being intreated more vnreuerentlie than he would or looked for; and the other threatening that being ouertaken by deceit, he would reuenge it: they both returned discontented to their owne people. Whereupon Rozman, declaring to his partakers the intollerable arrogancie of the cardinall, they asslie agreed all to conspire his death. Wherefore, to the end that the same might be lesse suspected, they departed in sinder afterward. This Rozman accompanied onelie with fine of his owne traine, entred the towne of saint Andzeus, and went into his accustomed Inne and lodging; trusting that by such small traine he might cunninglie dissemble the determination of the cardinals death. But there were in that towne, ten of those which had consented to this conspracie; which closed in secret corners, some in one place, and some in an other, did onelie expect the signe which was to be giuen vnto

31. ii.

to them to execute this deuisse. With which small companie this Lordman feared not to adventure the death of the cardinall in the same towne, furnished in euerie place with the seruants and friends of the cardinall.]

Whereupon the thirteenth of Maie, the cardinall being within his castell of saint Andzeus, certeine of his owne friends (as he took them) that is to say, the said Lordman, lord Leslie, William Kirkmichell, die, the young lord of Grange, and Kirkmichell with fiftene chosen men, entered the castell verie secretly in the morning, took the porter, and all the cardinalls seruants, thrusting them out of the place by a posterne gate. And that done, passing to his chamber where he late in bed, as he got vp, and was opening his chamber dore, they slew him, and seized upon the artillerie and munition, wherewith that fortress was plentifully furnished, and likewise with rich hangings, household stuffe of all sorts, apparell, copes, iewels, ornaments of churches, great store of gold and siluer plate, beside no small quantitie of treasure in readie coine.

Sir James Lettymouth, prouost of saint Andzeus, assembled all the people of that towne for the rescue of the cardinall, after he heard that the conspirators were entered the castell; but they shewed the dead bodie of the cardinall ouer the wals, as a spectacle to the people, and so they made no further attempt, sith they saw no meane how to remedie or reuenge the matter at that present. The cause that moued the conspirators thus to kill the cardinall, was thought to be partie in reuenge of the burning of maister George Wishart, fearing to be serued with the same fate, and in the end to be made to drinke of the same cup. Partlie it was thought they attempted it through counsell of some great men of the realme, that had conceived some deadly hatred against him.

* But Lesleus also, writing of the causes of his death saith, that they were diuerse: as the severall tormentors severallie framed euerie one a part for his owne excuse. For Lordman & John did complaine, that they were wronged by him with no small iniurie, because that the cardinall had not recompensed him for the losse he sustained; when the cardinall had restored to Colwine lord thereof (before through the cardinals counsell banished by the king) the castell and possessions of Easter Twemes; which the king had after given to the said Lordman. The lord Grange affirmed that he reuenged himselfe, because he was removed by the cardinals aduise from the office of the tresorership; which (being granted by the king to him) he had discharged with great profit to the realme, & honor to himselfe. And Kirkmichell did also say that he was dispossessed by the cardinall of some other (I cannot tell what) possessions. All which causes were but veiles which they spread against the wind and report of so wicked and shamefull a deed. For upon the fact, Lordman being vered with remorse of conscience, did not onelie labor to pacifie the anger of such, that (either by blend or benefit) were tied to the cardinall with all kind of duties; but did also, to shun the danger thereof, passe into France, and there by valour (in the seruice of Henrie the second king of France) endeavored to wipe away that note of infamie, which he had cast upon his familie. All which notwithstanding, both he and others (some after one sort, and some after another) were worthilie punished for their wickednes.]

The same evening that the cardinall was slaine, the old lord of Grange, maister Henrie Walnauts, one of the counsell of the realme, and sundrie gentlemen of the surname of the Peluins, John Knods and others, to the number of seven score persons, entred the castell to their support, taking vpon them to keepe it against the gouernor and his partakers. Not long after, the gouernor, considering that his deere couline the cardinall was thus made awate, assembled the great lords of the realme, as the earle of Angus, Huntleie, Argile, and others, by whose aduise he called a parlement, and forsailed them that had slaine the cardinall, and kept the castell of saint Andzeus.

Whereupon also he raised a power, and besieged the same castell, planting diuerse peeces of great artillerie against it. But it was so strongly furnished with all manner of artillerie & munition by the cardinall in his life time, that they within cared little for all the inforcements that their aduersaries without could aduance against them. Whereupon, after that the siege had continued the space of thre moneths, the gouernor was glad to take an appointment with them within, to the end he might get out of their hands his eldest sonne, who was remaining with the cardinall at the time when he was murdered, and so kept by them that did the murder, till now they agreed to deliuer him to his father, with condition that he should raise his siege.

They deliuered also the dead bodie of the cardinall, after it had laine buried in a dunghill within the castell, euer since the day in which they slew him. [The gouernor did name the abbat of Passleu his brother to the bishoprike of saint Andzeus, and gaue the abbacie of Arbuth (being before granted to James Beton kinsman to the slaine cardinall) to George Doboglasse bassard sonne to the earle of Angus: which things were afterwards occasions of great troubles in the realme.] In the yeare next insuing, king Henrie the eight departed this life, after whome succeeded his sonne Edward, the first of that name, king of England, France, and Ireland. Shortly after, that is to say, the last of March, Francis the French king deceased, and his sonne Henrie, the second of that name succeeded him; who at the desire of the gouernor of Scotland, appointed Leone Strozzi prior of Capoa, a knight of the order of Malta, with a nauie of 16 gallies, fraught with men of warre, and munition, to passe into Scotland, to helpe to win the castell of saint Andzeus.

The gouernor in the meane time with an armie passed to the west borders to besiege the castell of Langham, the which was kept at that present by Michaell Wharton, hauing then with him but fiftene Englishmen, who neuertheless abid thre or foure daies siege, and seven canon shots, and so yielded the house to the gouernor: and hereby was the peace broken, first by the Scots, euen as the Englishmen could haue wished. Moreover, at the same time, the erle of Mothous then returned out of Denmark was acquit by an assise (as they call it) of earles and lords, of an accusation wherewith he was charged, as confederat and partie with them that had murdered the cardinall.

Whilost the gouernor was thus passed with his armie to the west borders, he was aduertised that the prior of Capoa was arriued, and (against the wils of such as were against it) entred into the towne of saint Andzeus: whereupon the gouernor, with all the nobilitie that were then about him, hastened thither to assise the prior, and so the siege was strongly laid about the castell there. The prior caused certeine peeces of artillerie to be dratzen vp, and mounted on the top of a church, which was higher than the castell; so that those peeces shot plump into the castell, that none durst shew themselves on the wals, or abroad in the yard within the castell. He caused also certeine canons to be dratzen with engines, gins, néere to the berie toals of the castell, which battered the same in such sort, as the ditches were néere hand filled with the rubbish and stones of the toals that fell downe.

Howeuer, the gallies at an high water approached on the riuer side so néere to the castell, that with shot of canons and other artillerie, they soze annoied them within, and shue diuerse. The defendants perceiving themselves thus besieged on all sides, & not able long to hold out, put forth a token upon a speares point, to signifie that they desired parlee, which was granted, and certeine of them coming forth, were admitted to talke with the gouernor, the quene, and the prior of Capoa. They offered to render the castell, so they might depart, and haue their liues saued with bag and baggage.

The castell of S. Andrewe was paided.

But this would not be granted, the gouernor utterly refusing it; at length he was content to pardon them of their liues, if the french king should thinke it good, else to stand to his pleasure. The spoile of the castell was giuen to the frenchmen, who upon the surrender entering the same, left nothing behind him that might serue them to anie vse in taking it away. All the principall men within it were led to the gallies, and conueied awaie into France prisoners at the french kings discretion. Diuerse of them were committed to sundrie prisons on the coast of Britaine, and others were appointed to row in the gallies till the yeare 1550, in which the prisoners were set at libertie, and the others that were in the gallies were redeemed by their friends for certeine summes of monie.

The prior of Capoa.

Thus was the castell of saint Andrewe rendered the nine and twentieth of Julie, fourtē daies after the arriuall there of the prior of Capoa, whereby his great valiancie, well known afore that time, was so renewed, as his praise for his speedie dispatch and good successe therein was much aduanced. Shortly after, the duke of Summerfet, heretofore in this booke named earle of Hertford, vncle by the mother vnto the yong king of England, and admitted gouernor of his person, and protector of all his realms, dominions, and subiects, minding the aduancement of the yong king his nephue, thought good with all speed to procure the consummation of the marriage, betwixt him, and the yong quene of Scots.

The duke of Summerfet protector of England.

But perceiving that the same could not be brought to passe without force, he seemed loth to let passe the opportunitie of time then offered (as he took it) to serue his purpose; and thereupon by aduise of counsell leuied an armie with all expedition, and came to Berwik, about the latter end of August, and in the beginning of September entred Scotland with the same armie, containing seauenteene or eightēne thousand men, which was diuided into three principall wards, the vant-gard led by the valiant earle of Warlike, the battell by the duke of Summerfet himselfe, and the rere-ward by the lord Dacres of the north.

The entred Scotland with an armie

The order of the English armie.

There were certeine wings and tropes of men of armes, demilances, and light horsemen, and also of harquebussiers, that attended upon these three wards, garded with diuerse peeces of great artillerie. The lord Greie of Wilton high marshall of the armie had the generall conduction of the men of armes and demilances. Sir Francis Bzian, lieutenant of the light horsemen, with eight hundred of them was appointed to the vant-gard. Sir Peter Hewtas capitaine of five hundred hagbutters, and sir Francis Fleming maister of the ordinance, with a thousand light horsemen, were appointed to the battell. And sir Richard Spanners, with six hundred light horsemen, attended upon the rere-ward.

In this order marching through the spers, and Louthian, they came at length vnto a place called Buckling Braies, néere to the forth side, in which riuer the English fleet was arriued, and laie before the towne of Leith, but now by order giuen came backe from thence, and lay néerer to the armie. The gouernor of Scotland aduertised of the coming of this armie of England thus to invade Scotland, with all diligence sent abroad solemne summons for the leuening of a new armie forth of all parts of the realme; supposing thereby to be sufficientlie furnished and enabled for the encounter; happen when it should; the contrarie part (no doubt) being likewise opinioned, and both hoping, or greedilie gaping after the glorie of victorie.

The English fleet.

The gouernor raiseth an armie.

For the gouernor did attempt at this time that which is accustomed to be vsed in the greatest dangers of the countrie: which was, that he sent out messengers through all the realme, who carieng a fierie crosse in their hands, should make signe (and declare) aswell to the laitie, as to the churchmen; that all they which were aboue sixtē yeares old, and vnder sixtie, should presentlie (with their armes) repaire to Mussilborow, and there be readie to defend the libertie of the countrie; who accordingly came to Mussilborow (within lesse than two miles of the place where the English armie came to incampe, lieng at Preston) & placed themselves at Inuernesse ouer against their enemies.

Fr. Thin. Lesclous lib. 10. pag. 485.

Here we haue to vnderstand, that the Scots light horsemen oftentimes would come picking almost within their haues length of the Englishmen as they marched, whooping and shouting, to the end they might traine them forth from their strength, and with railing words would still be in hand to provoke them thereto. But the duke of Summerfet, doubting the goodnesse of the Scottish pickers, gaue secret commandement, that no offer of skirmish by the Scottish horsemen should be taken. But at length the lord Greie of Wilton, not able to beare such bold presumption in the Scots, aduenturing (as he took it) ouer rashlie, and more than stood with their owne suertie, made sute to the duke of Summerfet, that if they continued in such brauerie, it might be lawfull for him to set them further off.

The goodnes of the Scottish horsemen feared of the Englishmen. The lord Greie desireth to encounter the Scottish horsemen.

The duke at the first by no meanes would assent thereto, telling the lord Greie, that his desire proceeded more of a solitie of courage, than of anie knowledge of the enimie, and seemed to defend the goodnesse of the Scottish horsemen; but when the lord Greie persisted in his sute, and the earle of Warlike assisted his request, the duke in the end yielded thereto. Hereupon when the lord Hume with the Scots the next time (which was on the Fridaie the ninth of September) came forth to offer the skirmish after their wonted manner, the lord Greie taking with him certeine bands of horsemen, both men of armes, demilances, and also light horsemen, diuided them in tropes, appointing the Spanish and Italian hagbutters on horsebacke to keepe on a wing, and to gard the hindermost trope of the English horsemen.

He also gaue order to the leaders of euerie trope, that to which soeuer the enimie should once offer, in anie wise, that no answer by skirmish were made them, but after they had drawne them to their accustomed plaie and proffer of charge, that trope that it was offered vnto, presentlie upon the enimies wheeling about should thoroughlie giue it them; and that so giuen, the next trope presentlie to giue it in the face: and so (as occasion required) both those tropes whole together to helpe other without breakeing. The Scots coming forward, picking and whooping after their old wont, the Englishmen for bare a great while, till at the last, foure or five hundred

Buchan lib. 15.

These thinking them to haue wheeled about, mas- ter Nicholas Gainefford, the leader of that trope, and lieutenant of the lord Greies band of his men of armes of Bullongne, cried: A charge, which as spee- dily on the English part as vnlooked for of the Scots being giuen, from charging at that time in sport, the Scots were diuen to gallop awaie so fast as their horsemen might beare them, losing of their companies that were taken and slaine, to the number of eight hundred and more (as some haue written) [at what time the lord Hume (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 486) falling from his horse, was grievously wounded, and caried to Edinburgh, and his eldest sonne was taken prisoner] but yet, as diuerse of the English- men aduentured so farre in following the chase, they were distressed, and sundrie of them taken prisoners, among the which were some of their captains, as sir Rafe Bulmer, Thomas Colver, & Robert Crouch, each of them hauing in charge the leading of seuerall bands of light horsemen. ¶ Thus much for this Fridayes skirmish, wherein the chiefe force of the Scottish horsemen was defeated, to the great discouragement of the rest.

¶ The English armie remaining still at Pee- thon, did from a hill behold the number of the Scots, who (supposing that they saw a greater number than in truth there was) assembled in the meane time to consult of the estate of their affaires. And thereupon sent letters to the Scots, desiring that if they might obtaine anie thing by iustice, that they should rather end the warre with couenants than with canons. The effect of which letters tended to this end. That the English did greatlie intreat the Scots, first to remember that both armies were christian men, to and of whome (vnlesse they vtterlie forget their pro- fession) there should nothing be more welcome nor desired than peace & tranquillitie, and nothing more detestable than warre and vnjust force. Besides this, that the cause of this present warre did not growe of couetousnesse, hatred or enuie, but from the desire of perpetuall peace, which could not be better or more firmelie established by any means, but by the league of matrimonie (being promised and confirmed by the publike consent and pledge of the nobilitie) with those conditions which were more beneficiall for the Scots than the English, being such as did not call them into seruitude, but into a fellowship and liberall imparting of all their fortunes each to other. For so much more should that marriage be commodious to the Scots than to the English, by how much the hope of profit, and the feare of injuries should bee greater from the stronger to the weaker.

Wherefore they should chieflie consider (and in this kind) this to be their greatest reason, that since that their quene was of necessitie to be giuen in marriage by the Scots, and that the same necessitie was not to be auoided; and the moderation therein verie hard: that the onelie power to chose hir a husband was left vnto the publike councill or parlement. And if they would chose (to their quene) a husband for the publike profit and dignitie: of whome could they better take choise, than of a king their neigh- bor, bozne in the same land, nere of blood, instruc- ted in the same lawes, brought vp in the same ma- ners and language; not their superiour onelie in ri- ches, but almost also in all commodities and orna- ments of externall things, and such a person which did bring with him peace, concord, amitie, and the for- getting of all old injuries: But if they call to them anie other (differing from them in language, ma- ners, and lawes) to take the kingdome: let them thinke with themselves, what and how manie dis- commodities will grow thereby, and to what euill counsels they shall indanger themselves: the which they may learne by the example of other nations, be- ing farre better to be taught it by the misfortunes of others, than to feele the smart thereof by their owne experience.

Wherefore (as touching themselves) if they shall not perceiue the Scottish nation to be estranged from this amitie and concord, they would mitigate somewhat of their former promises (which by law they might chalenge) and be contented that the maiden quene should be brought vp amongst them, and be alwaies in their power, vntill the time that nature should inable hir fit for marriage, and vntill such time as she might chose hir a husband by the aduise of the nobilitie. And that in the meane time (vntill the same might be perfozmed) that both the nations should ab- steine from warre: and that also the quene (during that time) should neither be conueied into anie strange nation: nor that they should conclude anie pact or couenant with the French, or anie other for- reigne prince touching hir marriage. The which if the Scots would most holilie and handfastlie promise, the English would forthwith depart with a quiet armie. And further, that if the English had commit- ted anie hurt or spoile (since they came into the coun- trie) they would recompense the same by the iudge- ment of good men.

These letters thus sent, the gouernor did impart vnto a few, and of those especiallie to John his bro- ther bishop of saint Andrews (taken vnto him in place & authoritie of the slaine cardinall.) These two aduanced with great hope of victorie, were the cause that these letters were suppressed, bicause they feared that if the equall conditions of peace were knowne abroad, the most part would willinglie incline to the same quiet aduise. Wherefore they procured a false rumoz to be spread through the host, that the English men were come thither with determination to take awaie the quene by force, and by strength of armes to bring the whole kingdome into their subiection. For the gouernor being saint spirited by nature, had chosen vnto him foure such other counsellors (like vnto himselfe) in the affairs of warre, by whose com- mand & becke all things were perfozmed. Of which number were his thre kinsmen, John archbishop of saint Andrews, the abbat of Dunfermling, George Durie, with Archembald Weton; and the fourth was Hugh Wigs, a lawier, rather famous for his grosse bodie and foolish conditions, than anie know- ledge in militarie affaires. These foure had so passed by the gouernor (inconstant by his owne nature, and changing his counsell by the wind of euerie rumoz) that he would with stopped eares heare all other mens opinions. In the meane time, his friends ha- uing spread a feigned tale (through the Scottish host) by him deuised, the Scots ran in all hast to their weapons, whose vnadvised speed was in the end the cause of their vnfortunate proceedings, as after shall appeare.)

For being true (as the Scots haue repozted) that the gouernor, and the nobilitie of Scotland meant not to hazard battell within their owne realme, but rather to lie still and defend their ground, if the Eng- lishmen should come forthward to giue them battell there. The Englishmen aduertised thereof, the mor- row after this great skirmish, raised their field ve- rie earlie, purposing to take an hill called Pinkhill, where they might place their ordinance, and to shot into the Scottish campe, whereby they should force the Scots to dislodge from their ground of aduan- tage. The gouernor and the Scottish lords, beholding their enemies thus marching forthward, thought best to

to staie their enterpryse, and therefore suddenlie, notwithstanding their former determination, rushing forth of their campe, passed forward to encounter their enimies.

They were divided into three battels; Archemald Dowglas earle of Angus, with certeine lords with him, led the vant-gard; George Gordon earle of Huntleie, and his friends the rere-ward; and the gouernor accompanied with the earle of Argile and the rest of the noble men, were in the maine battell. The Englishmen hauing got the hill, and perceiuing the Scots to come forward with great hast, staied for their comming: but the Scots were so rash and hastie, passing first through the water in their armour, and so vp towards the hill, that continuing their march with such speed, as they seemed rather to trot, than to keepe anie ordinarie marching pace, before they could come to ioine with the Englishmen, they were almost out of breath.

Howbeit, the earle of Angus, and the other in the vant-gard, boldlie abid the charge of all the English hopsmen, and so rigorously reincountred them, that slaieng and beating downe no small number both of men and horses, they put the rest to flight; so that no small part of them retired backe in such disorder, that they ran thorough the rankes of the footmen in the fore-ward, wherewith such feare entered among the Englishmen, that (as hath bene reported) they had vndoubtedlie fled, if the manfull courage of the earle of Marwick had not bene shewed at that present, according to the wonted valure of his often approued prowesse, wherby he caused them to staie, and relie themselves againe.

In the meane time, the battell and the rere-ward of the Scots advanced forward with great courage. But there was a gallie & two pinellesses of the English fleet, which from the sea shot so terrible at the Scottish armie, that the same was not onelie sore galled and indamaged thereby, but also staied, that they could not come easilie forward. And herewith the English vant-gard incouraged with the comfortable words and behauior of the earle of Marwick, and other the captains, made towards the Scottish vant-gard againe: the which not able of it selfe to resist, retired in good order to the great battell of Scotland. Whereupon, the multitude fearing, by reason they saw them in the fore-ward thus retire (albeit in good order) that all had bene lost, gaue backe, and toke them to flight; whome the Englishmen followed amaine, slaieng the Scottishmen downe on heaps in passing great numbers. Many were also drowned in the water of Andereske, through the which they toke their flight.

The earle of Huntleie and the rere-gard stood still with their ensignes and banners, till the chase was past by them: but at length were diuinen to make a waite as well as the rest, and the earle himselfe in the retire being taken on foot, well clad in gilt armour inameled, was led prisoner to the lord protector. Diuerse other men of name, barons, and knights, were taken prisoners. There were slaine no small number of personages of good account. Among other, the lord Fleming, the maister of Erskin, the maister of Ogilvie, the maister of Hestine, the maister of Ogilvie, the maister of Leuingston, the maister of Koss [the maister of Argendale and Hestane] the lord of Lochinwar, the lord of Glencarnocke, & others. The next day, the English armie remoued to Leith, where the prisoners were put into a church, diuerse of them being sore wounded. But the earle of Huntleie, entering bond for them that they should well and trulie paie their ransomes, agreed upon betwixt them and their takers, or else to come and present themselves prisoners in England by a certeine day, they were suffered to depart. * The calamitie of which bloudie day, there were not a few which did impute iustlie to happen to the Scots, because they did arrogantly reied such honorable and beneficiall peace, and did hope (if they obtained the victorie) to haue used more crueltie to their owne people than vnto the English, either because they would (as I my selfe coniecture) reuenge old quarels, or else haue used extremitie against such as secretlie misliked this conflict with the English.)

The gouernor escaping from the battell, came to Striueling, where the quene regent was, together with hir daughter the yong quene. Here, by the counsell and aduise of the earle of Angus [Argile, Kotesen, and Cassiles] and diuerse other lords that were also with him, thither after the battell, they were conueied to the countrie of Spenteith, where they remained in the abbeie of Inch Mahome [deliuering the yong quene to hir mother, Erskine and Leuingstone to be kept there] till the English armie was departed out of the realme, and then they remoued againe, and came to Striueling. [After that the gouernor had deliuered the earle out of prison at Edinburgh] the English nauie wan the Ile of saint Colmes Inch [in the meane time] and did sundrie other exploits by sea, as in the English historie it may appere.

Moreover, the earle of Bothwell, whome the gouernor had before kept in prison, and was the night after the battell set at libertie, repared to the duke of Summerfet, with diuerse other lords and gentlemen of Northan, whilst he laie at Leith, offering themselves to be at the king of Englands commandement, and so were assured from receiuing hurt or damage by the English powder. The duke of Summer-set hauing remained at Leith eight daies, burnt a peece of it, and demanding the castell of Edinburgh, but could not obtaine it, departed thence the eightteenth of December homewards the next waie, ouer the mounteins of Soutreie, comming the third day before the castell of Hume, where they did so much by countenancing to win that fortreffe, that within three or foure daies after their comming thither, it was surrendered.

This castell being woone, & a garrison left there, in to keepe it, they remoued to Rockesburgh, where within the compasse of the ruinous walls of an old castell, they built a fort; & after returning into England, left a conuenient garrison to keepe it. They got also about the same time a strong fortreffe, called Fast castell, standing nere to the sea side, and placed a garrison within it. And moreover, in this meane time, their fleet by sea wan the castell of Broughtie crag, and put in like manner a garrison within it to keepe the same (as in the English historie it may further appere) and in that fort also all the chieffest lords and gentlemen of the Shers and Muidale came in, and submitted themselves to the duke of Summer-set, vpon assurance had and giuen.

Furthermore, whilst the duke of Summerfet with his armie did thus invade Scotland on the east part, it was ordeined by the said duke, and other of the counsell to the king of England, that Matthew earle of Lennox, and Thomas lord Wharton, then warden of the west marches of England, should with a powder invade Scotland on the west side, to the end that there should not anie of the west borders nor countries come to assist the gouernor against the duke of Summerfets armie, but be diuinc to re-maine at home to defend their owne countrie. Here-five thousand footmen, and eight hundred light horsemen, with which power the earle of Lennox and the lord Wharton entering Scotland the eight of September, encamped the first night upon the water of Clack, and marched the next day through the nether part of Annandale, till they came to the castle of Widdie, a fortress of good strength, the walls being fourscore foot thick.

Captaine of this castle was one John Scrymgeour, brother to the lady thereof, who upon the approach of the earle of Lennox, yielded the house to him, without any shew of resistance. Whereupon, Jergule Craigmyle, brother to Ritchie Craigmyle of Criske, was appointed with a garrison of hundred to keepe that castle to the use of the young king of England, and was afterwards confirmed captaine there with five or eight hundred men, by appointment of the duke of Summerlee, & the counsellors. But during the wars, he remained there to the great annoyance of the Scots, enemies to England, and preservation of the countrie thereabouts to the king of England's use.

So then

On the twentieth of September, the earle of Lennox, and the lord Wharton, encamped nere to the castle of Annandale, and on the morrow after approaching nere to the same, gave summons unto the captaine thereof, called Lion, of the house of Clams, who with an hundred Scots, whereof Sparrowell and Dunbarre, and Crispall, as with Lausell, &c. &c. being armed kept the church and kirk of Annandale, being walled with themselves verie strong and mightie, with earth: they within themselves wanted to yield, and valiantly defended themselves. The greatest pieces of artillery, which the Englishmen had there at that time, were certaine double and single siccons, wherewith they beat one, as the other, till they might with certaine engines approach nere to the walls, and undermine the same, as the side of the church was shaken doone, and a great number of them within the church slaine and crushed to death. Such as escaped fled into the kirk.

Two of the Englishmen that wrought about the mines, were slaine: but at length, the captaine moved by persuasion of the earle of Lennox, to whom he was bound to be of aid, rendered the kirk to him, with himselfe, and so Scots hundred, with condition to have their lives made free, and the captaine to remaine prisoner, and to go into England. Immediately upon their coming forth of the kirk, he was given unto the mines of powder in the mines, and as both the church & kirk were blown up into the air, & rased doone to the ground. This done, they burnt the towne after they had sacked it, and left not one stone standing upon another, for that the same towne had ever bene a verie noisome neighbour to England.

that came to aid them.

The Englishmen had conceived such spite towards this towne, that if they saw but a piece of timber remaining unburnt, they would cut the same in pieces with their bills. The countrie herewith was streken in twaine, that the next day all the Kilpatrick, Clackmure, the lards of Kirkcudbright, Ayrshire, Clackmure, Galloway, Pubie, and the shewings, the Seis, the Kils, the Burrows, and all the clanes and hermines of the nether part of Summerlee came in, and received an oath of obedience, as subjects to the king of England, delivering hostages for their assured loyalty. The residue that would not come in and submit themselves, had their houses burnt, their goods and cattell rased away by the English light horsemen, that were sent abroad into the countrie for that purpose.

These things thus executed, the earle of Lennox, and the lord Wharton, returned backe into England with their prisoners, booties, and spoiles, receiving great thanks and commendations by gentle letters on the five & twentieth of September, from the duke of Summerlee, then lying at Rochefort, about fortifying of that place. The governor perceiving thus that without the assistance of France he should not be able to resist the Englishmen, having now got such fast hold within the realme of Scotland, required the queene Dowager, and monsieur Dodel, her ambassador for the French king, to persuade with him by letters, to send an armie into Scotland, to the aid of his friends there.

The queene and monsieur Dodel, perceiving a ready waie prepared to bring that to passe which they most desired (which was, to have the queene of Scotland ordered in all things by the French kings advice) they undertooke to procure an armie out of France, according to the governors desire, if he with the states of the realme would agree that the queene might be sent into France, and a contract made for his bestowing in marriage, as had with the French kings pleasure. The governor consenting hereto, assembled the states, and by their advices, passed certaine covenants to the effect aforesaid: & sent the same in writing by certaine messengers into France.

The French king gladiie accepting this message, prepared a name of ships and galleys to transport an armie into Scotland the next summer. In the meane time, the governor lated legs to Edinburgh, and the duke of Summerlee, as well for advice to cause the Scots to resist that siege, as also for the annoyance of Clackmure, appertaining to the governor, and the earle of Angus, and other Scots that would not come in to the obedience of the king of England, appointed the earle of Lennox to make a new invasion into Scotland, and to be for avall of their fidelities the helpe of two thousand Scottish light horsemen, that were already assured & bound to serve the king of England in all such exploits in which they should be imployed.

The earle of Lennox desirous to advance the king of England's affaires, and having received letters from William earle of Glencarne, with promise of his assistance, and likewise of his father in law the earle of Angus, the lord of Dunbarton, and other lords and gentlemen of the countie of Aile, Cunningham, Kenten, and Lennox, entered Scotland about the twelfth of December, accompanied with Gentle Wharton, second son to the lord Wharton, with two hundred light horsemen, of the garrisons in Scotland, and coming first to Dundee, where the generall assembly was appointed of the two thousand assured Scottish light horsemen, when the matters should be taken, as found scarce these hundred, and those for the more part of the broken countie of Annandale, Widdie, Clackmure, and Clackmure.

The earle of Glencarne came thither in due, but under a counterfet shew of good meaning, where in truth he meant nothing but craft to discover all the earle of Lennox his purposes: who perceiving his double dealing, and finding no such forces ready to assist him as he looked for, and moreover, mistrusting the loyalty of the master of Sparrowell, & the gentlemen of Clackmure, meaning (as he took it) to betray him, and deliver him to the queene Dowager, and the lord governor, stood in some perplexitie what way should be the best for him to follow, thinking it not to stand with his honor to returne, without achieving some enterprise.

onelic with Scottishmen, he would both serue him and honor him in the best wise he might: but if he brought those Englishmen in his companie, he would not onelic refuse to aid him, but also raise all the power he might make, either by his friends or otherwise, to resist him, and proffer him a repulse. The earle thus perceiuing that he was in danger to be betrayed among them, and that there were all the deuises practised that might be to staie those that should come to the deuotion of the king of England,

The earle of Lennor dissembleth with dissemblers.

1547. Buch.

But in the meane time he got togither the English captains that were appointed to attend him, and also such Scottishmen as he knew he might trust. And meaning to scourge Drumlanrig, & to cut him short, for that he was the chiefe instrument to staie all the Scottishmen in those parties from entering friendship with the Englishmen: he gaue secret warning to all the captains & leaders about nine of the clocke at night, that they should be readie with their men to mount on horsebacke at the sound of the trumpet, and keepe with them the earle of Glencarne, the maister of Sparwell, the lards of Clofburne, Kirkmichell, and others the gentlemen of Pidedale and Annandale.

Hossemen sent forth to scourge Drumlanrig.

They harrie the countrie about Drumlanrig.

He sent forth six hundred chosen hossemen vpon sound of the trumpet, at twelue of the clocke at night, vnder the leading of Henrie Wharton, and other the captains of the garrisons, who in the dawning of the next morrow, arrived nere the place of Drumlanrig, where they appointed foure hundred of their hossemen to passe to the forraie, who raised fire, and burnt two miles in length, both towne and villages on each side, even hard to the gates of Drumlanrig, spoiling the houses of goods and riches, worth to the value of two thousand marks, got three thousand sheepe, two thousand herd of great cattell, beside nine score horses and mares.

Drumlanrig pursueth the Englishmen.

The Annandalers laden with spoile and cattell, being in number foure hundred men, departed with their preie homewards. The lard of Drumlanrig, lieng all this while in ambush with seuen hundred men, forbore to breake out to giue anie charge vpon his enemies, doubting least the earle of Lennor had kept a scale behind: but now after he perceiued that the most part of the enemies were departed, and that the residue of the gentlemen & captains of the English hossemen were withdrawing towards Dunfreis, being not past six score men, he fiercelie followed after them with his power, in hope not onelic to ouerthrow and distress them, but also to take the earle of Lennor at Dunfreis.

Hets put to flight.

Maister Henrie Wharton and those six score hossemen, retiring beyond the water of Rith, and perceiuing that Drumlanrig and his men entered the water rashlie to pursue them, returned, and gaue such a desperate charge vpon them, that Drumlanrig and his companie were scattered and put to flight: yet Drumlanrig himselfe, although there were some speares broken vpon him, through the goodnesse of his horse escaped. Two gentlemen of his surname and traine, that were in no small estimation with him, were slaine, and six score prisoners taken, and led to Dunfreis. The terror of this overthrow, and the hute of the earle of Lennor his entrie thus made into Scotland, caused the gouernour to leue his siege from Broughtie crag, and with speed to come from thence, the better to defend his countreies of Clidedale, and Douglasdale. so that the Scots certes lost diuerse hardie personages: and among other, Caluen Hamilton, the gouernours kinsman, was slaine at the same siege.

Howeuer, the prior of Whiterne by his letters and messengers, offered himselfe to obieie the king of England: and the inhabitants of the burrough and haueu townes of Wigton and Kirkcubright, the knights of Loghinwar and Carleis, the lard and tutor of Bombie, the lard of Cardines, & all the gentlemen of Annandale, Pidedale, and Galloway, euen to Whiterne, being foure score miles in length from Caerleill, through the inducement of the foresaid prior, and of the knights of Loghinwar and Carleis, (for the fauour they bare to the earle of Lennor) within two daies after the discomfiture of Drumlanrig, came vnto Dunfreis, and there receiued an oth to be true to the king of England, and afterwards went with the earle to Caerleill, leauing the countrie in good quiet, and the king of England acknowledged for lord of Galloway, Pidedale, and Annandale, by the inhabitants thereof.

The prior of Whiterne.

And after that the foresaid persons had remained for a space at Caerleill, they deliuered pledges, but especiallie for John Sparwell, & returned home to their countrie, as assured men & subiects to the king of England. In this meane while, the gouernour having held siege before the castell of Broughtie crag, by the space of thirtie daies, and now retiring from thence (as before ye haue heard) by the aduise of the principall lords about him, he caused maister James Haliburton, tutor of those parties, to raise certeine companies of hossemen, and appointed him with capitaine Leirmouth (whome he left in Dundee with certeine footmen) to defend the countrie against the Englishmen, if they issued forth of Broughtie crag, to atchieue anie enterpryse anie where nere thereabouts.

The Scots deliuer pledges.

James Haliburton, Capitaine Leirmouth.

The duke of Summerset by aduise of the residue of the councell in England, minding to bide the Scots that refused to come in & submit themselves to the king of England, toke order with the lord of Wiltton, who (as saith Lelless. lib. 10. pag. 491.) remained in Scotland from the fourth Ides of Aprill, vntill the tenth kalends of June for the building of one fort at Lauder, and an other at Haddington, as in the English historie it may appeare. And further it was appointed also, that about the end of Februarie, the earle of Lennor and the lord Wharton, with seuen hundred English hossemen, beside the assured Scots hossemen, and about foure or five thousand English footmen, should by the west borders invade Scotland: they according to their commission set forward, and the first night came to Louchmaiben, and there lodged.

1548.

The next day they marched to Dunfreis, and whildest they remained there, the earle of Angus being come to Drumlanrig, by messengers entred some talke with his sonne in law the earle of Lennor. But sith it was perceiued that this was done, rather to intrap the earle of Lennor, or rather at the least to bide time, vpon consultation had with the maister of Sparwell, the lard of Clofburne, and others the gentlemen assured of Pidedale and Annandale, it was concluded, that the townes of Spar-ton, Dundee, and others, nere adioining togither in those parts, should be burnt; so the end that the earle of Angus might so be drawen to the field, and caught by some one meane or other.

The earle of Lennor and the L. Wharton invade Scotland.

The dissimulation of the earle of Angus.

About midnight therefore, the forraie being set forth, vnder the leading of maister Henrie Wharton, to the number of twelue hundred light hossemen, the maister of Sparwell, now lord Herries, and the residue of the assured men being amongst them kept forward, and in the morning the earle of Lennor, Lennox, and the lord Wharton marched forth with the footmen, till they came ten miles beyond Dunfreis. And where the earle of Angus was drawn to the castell of Dumlanrig, under pretense to commune with his sonne the earle of Lennox (but meaning to intrap him) if it were possible, he was so environed by the English footmen per he could haue sufficient warning, that he was forced to flee onelie with five persons in his companie. But now the English horsemen being come to Dundere, eight & 10 fortie miles within the realme of Scotland, hauing passed sundrie great rivers, they set that towne on fire.

But the maister of Sparwell, with the other Scottish gentlemen and light horsemen borderers, to the number of foure hundred, being in companie of the English horsemen (as before ye haue heard) had contriued the destruction of the Englishmen afore hand. And the better to worke their feat, they had procured (as ye haue heard) the earle of Angus to come vnto Dumlanrig with a chosen power of men for that purpose. There were also vpon euerie hill about, great numbers of Scottish footmen, with speares and lancehaues to assist the earle of Angus and his complices against the Englishmen. The lord of Dumlanrig with a number of chosen horsemen was advanced forward in sight of the Englishmen, as they were busie in firing the towne of Dundere.

The assured Scots therefore, thinking the enterprise to be surerlie enough conueid for their contriued purpose, openlie vpon the field nere to Dundere, holing vp a blacke pennill vpon a speares point for a token, renouled wholie, and ioined themselves to the lord of Dumlanrig and other their countrie men, & thrust in betwixt the English horsemen & footmen, to the great perill of distressing aswell the one as the other. For making toward the place where the earle of Lennox, and the lord Wharton were comming forward with their footmen, nere to the old castell of Dauswinton, sometime the house of the Cumins, they bruted it abroad, that the English horsemen were quite ouerthrowen.

The earle of Lennox, beholding the maner of his aduerfaries, lighted on foot from his horse, willing the lord Wharton to do the like; for this day (said he) I will die a true Englishman. At length the English horsemen fetching a compasse in retiring backe from Dundere, came nere to the place where the earle and the lord Wharton were ranged in order of battell: and thinking no lesse but that their horsemen had bene ouerthrowen, were ready to march backe towards Dunfreis. But their horsemen thus comming in, and perceiving how the matter stood, gaue a right valiant charge vpon the Scots, that stood countenancing the footmen, and ready to take the aduantage, if they might haue dyuen them through thinking backe into anie disorder.

But such was the violence of the shooke giuen at that instant, with great manhood (vndoubtedly) by the English horsemen, that the Scots were there with put out of arraie, scattered, & quite put to flight; the lord of Dumlanrig being taken prisoner, corrupted his taker, and so got away. The maister of Sparwell escaped in great danger of life, for he had sundrie speares broken on him in the chase as he fled awaie. There were yet taken that day of the Scots to the number of foure hundred, beside sundrie that were drowned in the water of Firth. Amongest the prisoners were these men of name; the abbat of new abbeie, Christie Freewing of Bonhallow, a brother of the lord of Hempsfield, & manie other gentlemen of name. Dunfreis was rifled and spoiled, as the earle of Lennox and the Englishmen returned thither, and a martiall court appointed there for execution of pledges; but yet suspended and staied, till the counells pleasure might be knowen in that behalf.

ther, and a martiall court appointed there for execution of pledges; but yet suspended and staied, till the counells pleasure might be knowen in that behalf.

There were at the first euill news spread abroad, and certified to the court of England of this toynie, how the earle of Lennox and the English armie was ouerthrowen, so that it was by order appointed, that the earle of Derby, the Lord Scrope, and Coniers, with their powers should repaire to the west borders to garnish the same for defense against the enemies: but vpon the true report how the matter had passed, made by maister Henrie Wharton, and one Bishop a Scottishman, sent in post for that purpose, that appointment was staied; and maister Wharton was at that time made knight, and the said Bishop richlie rewarded for bringing so good news. Here with were letters directed downe from the counsell to the lord Wharton, for the execution of certeine pledges, that is to saie, the maister of Sparwells pledge, being one of his nearest kinsmen of the house of the Herries, also the warden of the Greie friers in Dunfreis, the vicar of Carlawerocke, and diuerse other which were executed at Carlill. In this meane time were the forts at Lawder and Haddington built, the castels of Pether and Dalwhith towne, all the mills burnt within foure miles of each hand of Edinburgh, and other exploits atchieued by the Englishmen, as in the historie of England is more at large expessed.

But now the French king, hauing prepared an armie ready to come into Scotland, caused the same to draw downe to West in Britaine, where the ships and gallies were rigged and made ready to passe therewith into Scotland. The chiefe leaders of which armie were these, which had charge chiefe to command in the same: monsieur de Delle lieutenant generall, monsieur Dandelot coronell of the French footmen, the counte Keingraue coronell of the Almans, monsieur de Galleraie, monsieur Dossell, Pietro Strozzi coronell of the Italians, monsieur Etanges capteine of the horsemen, sir Nicholas de Willegaignon a knight of the Rhodes (or rather Spalta) capteine of the gallies, and monsieur Duno commissarie of the artillerie: with diuerse other worthy personages, and men of approved valiance. These capteins with their powers being imbarked at West, sailed alongst by the east seas, and at length about the middell of June came into the rode before Leith, where they landed their people and ordinance. [A little before whose arrivall into France (as saith Lelless, libro 10. pag. 491.) Chapelle Bironne landed in Scotland, accompanied with other nobilitie of France, to giue good counsell to the Scots answerable to the time, which was (to please their eares therewith) that there should a greater armie shortly come out of France, to succor their extremities.]

Afterwards, with the aduise of the gouernor, and other of the Scottish lords, the French power went to besiege Haddington, and comming thither, incamped themselves in places of aduantage about the towne, cast trenches, planted their ordinance, battered the rampires, and kept them within streidlie besieged on each hand, vsing all the waies they could deuise to constraene the Englishmen to yield. They forbore yet to giue a generall assault, because they would not hazard (as they haue reported) the losse of so manie men as might haue bene slaine and maintained thereby, to the great weakening of their power there, hauing not meanes to supplie it when they would.

And yet they had a great armie of Scots with them for a season, and had made the breaches so reasonable, sonable, that with small paine they might haue entered by the same, if the force of the defendants had not sufficed with handblowes to haue beaten them backe, as no doubt there was no want of good wilis in them so to haue done, if the Frenchmen had put the matter in triall: yet during this siege, they with in stood in great necessitie of things becoueull for the defense of the towne. Whereupon sir Henrie Wharton with a band of light horsemen of the west borders, and others, came and put into the towne a certaine number of men with powder, and other necessities, greatlie to the reliefe of the besieged, & no lesse displeasure of the Frenchmen and Scots, that were not aware of this enterprise till it was done in the night season, by the good and fortunate conducti-on of them that had the conuenance thereof.

But after this, there came a power of English horsemen to the number of little lesse than two thousand demitances, light horsemen, & harquebussiers on horsebacke, under the leading of sir Robert Bowes, sir Thomas Palmer, sir Henrie Wharton, capteine Gambo a Spaniard, and others; the which aduenturing ouer rashlie within danger of the whole French power, were ouerthwone and chased: sir Robert Bowes, & sir Thomas Palmer, with a great number of other capteins, gentlemen and souldiers being taken prisoners, besides those that were slaine. Yet after this ouerthrow of those horsemen, the French remoued their siege from the places where they had first planted it, and lodged further off from the towne, continuing there; till at length by an armie sent forth of England under the conduct of the erle of Shrewsburie, the lord Greie, and others, they were constrained to retire from thence, as in the English historie ye may find more largelie expresse, to the which for the further report of the euents chancing during that siege, I referre the reader.

But this is to be remembred, that whilst the siege remained at Haddington, by a conuention or assemble of the lords it was decreed, that the queene should be sent into France. And thereupon monsieur de Willagaillon, with foure gallees departing from Leith, made semblance as though he would haue sailed into France: but hauing passed the mouth of the Forth, he turned his course on the left hand to passe alongst the shore northward by the Germane seas, that compassing the land on the east side, he might passe about by the Isles of Orkney, and so by the west Isles, till he came to Dunbretton where the young queene laie. This iourne he fortunatelie achieved, the same neuer before (to mans remembrance) being made or attempted with gallees.

At his arrivall & convenient landing at Dunbretton, he found all things readie provided, necessarie for the imbarcking of the queene, that he might conuey hir into France, for the accomplishment wherof he had taken that iourne in hand. Whereupon the being brought aboard into the kings owne gallie, where in monsieur de Breze was also appointed to be aboard with hir, as he that had bene sent with expresse commandement to see hir conueied into France; [with the lords (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. 494) of Arskine, and Levingston, the ladie Flemming, with certaine noble maidens named after the young queene, as Marie Levingston, Marie Flemming, Marie Seton, and Marie Beton] who together with Willagaillon shewed such diligence in achieving that enterprise, that finally they arrived with prosperous wind and weather in the haven of Brest in Britaine with that young queene, being as then betwixt five and six yeeres of age.

* From thence being accompanied with the noble litle of that prouince, she kept hir right course to the kings palace of St. Germins in the towne of Lal-on, where she was receiued with great preparation, & there taried the comming thither of the king, at that time pacifying the seditions and turmoiles in the inward parts of France. When the king was come, hee gladded all men with his presence, and provided that there was a large household, as well of the noble men and women of Scotland, as of others appointed to the young queene, which he still increased (as the queene grew more in yeeres) untill such time as she might be married.)

But now to returne to the dwings in Scotland concerning the warres there. After that the siege of Haddington was raised by the English armie (as before ye haue heard) the Frenchmen thereupon retired themselves into Hushelburgh; and choosing forth a plot of ground for their aduantage, kept themselves within the same. And herewith there came to them sixtine thousand Scottishmen to assist them, so that when the Englishmen came forwarde to assaile them, they found them so strongly imbattelled, that (whether their commission did not so farre extend, or whether they had no liking of the match) they forbore to set upon them in that ground of so great disaduantage for the assailants, and so returned backe to Haddington, and after homewards, hauing furnished the towne with new supplies of men, munition, and vittels sufficient.

Here is to be noted, that the English fleet entering into the Forth, was readie to haue aided the armie by land, as occasions might haue bene offered. But the lord admerall perceiuing no likelihood of battell by land, toke upon him to achieve some other enterprises, and first comming to Bzent Island, set certaine ships on fire there, of the chiefest in the river; and saluting the towne of Leith as he passed by with canon shot, he determined to land some of his men on the north side of the Forth, to make some spoile within the countrie of Fife. But John Erskine lord of Dun, as then somewhat diseased, and returned home from the campe, caused such daile and nightlie watch and ward to be kept, that this enterprise could not be so secretlie conueied by the Englishmen, but that the same was perceiued, and so prevented, that upon their landing they were forced to retire with losse: and hapie was he that might first get againe to shipboard.

* For James Stewart, brother to the queene (hearing of this tumult) came thither in hast with the common people of saint Andrews, and some other few citizens which were remaining in the towne, to whom the neighbors about did also ioine themselves, understanding the cause of that assemble. The English being now come on land, about twelue hundred, stood in warlike sort readie for the battell, and with the feare of the artillerie (which they discharged out of their ships) did easilie cause the rude multitude to flie ahaie. But this James Stewart (by litle and litle suppressing the feare of such as fled) did (with such violence) rush upon his enemies, that forthwith he ouerthrew them, put them to flight, compelled them to returne to the sea with great slaughter, when also manie of them (as they fled to their ships) were drowned, besides three hundred that were slaine, and one hundred taken.)

Fr. Thin.
Buchan. lib. 15.

The erle of Shrewsburie being come backe from Haddington unto Dunglas, order was giuen for the building of a fort there, as in the English historie further may appeare. And in the meane time monsieur de Delle, remaining in campe at Hushelburgh, hearing that the English armie was remoued homewards, & how diuerse new bands of horsemen and footmen being left in Haddington, were readie to come forth to skirmish abroad upon sight of the enimie; he toke aduise, to trie if he might draw them forth to their losse, and thereupon was monsieur Dandelot, and the Keingraue appointed to chose forth a thousand of their lustiest footmen, the which with three hundred horsemen were conueied and laid close in ambush, behind a little hill not farre from the towne.

This done, a few horsemen were drawn forth to draw the Englishmen out of the towne to skirmish with them. The Englishmen were no sooner aduised that the enemies were there at hand in the field, but that all their horsemen issued out of the towne backe with certeine footmen, and straight had the French in chase; who retiring, maintained the skirmish, of purpose to make the Englishmen more earnest to come forthward. But immediatlie as monsieur de Delle saw his time, he gaue signe by sound of trumpet to the footmen to breake forth, who together with the horsemen gaue so fierce an onset vpon the entrees, that they were incontinentlie discomfited: and fleeing toward the towne, were followed by the French euen hard to the walles; diuers were slaine, and about an hundred taken prisoners.

After this, monsieur de Delle raised from Hukelburgh, and comming to Leith set in hand to fortifie that towne. The marshall Strozzi, and monsieur Dandelot, with diuerse other capitains imbarcking themselves in the gallie that yet remained, toke their course to returne to France. One of the same gallies (they being eight in number, beside a foist and a brigandine) was taken by an English ship called the falcon, as she passed through the narrow seas at a place named the Southfurlong, she being alone, and as it chanced hindermost of all the companies.

After the departure of monsieur Dandelot, monsieur de la Chapelle de Byron remained colonell of the French footmen in Scotland. As for the furnitures on the water, there remained now but foure gallies vnder the guiding of one capteine Bach an Italian, a man of great experience and approued skill. For ye must vnderstand, that before the arrivall of the English naue & armie to the succors of them in Haddington, monsieur de Gallerie viceadmirall of France returned home with the fleet of ships that had brought the French armie into Scotland. In what sort the lord Greie of Wilton assisted the countries of Amdale and Lidetsdale, after the returne of the earle of Shrewsburie, is partly touched in the historie of England.

About the same time, there chanced a mutinie to rise betwixt the Scots and the Frenchmen in Edinburgh, by reason that a French souldier fell a quarrelling with two of these Scottishmen; and falling together by the eares, diuerse Scots that came to depart the frate, would haue had the Frenchman to prison; but other Frenchmen being there also present, would not suffer the Scots to take him awaie. Whereupon arose a great tumult and stirre among them, insomuch that there were diuerse slaine on both parts, namely James Hamilton lord of Stanboule, knight, capteine of the castell, and prouost of the towne of Edinburgh, with his sonne; and master William Steward one of the quens seruants, besides sundrie other. For the Frenchmen doubting some contriued commotion against them, assembled together in order of battell in the streets; so that before the matter might be appeased by the capitains that shewed their diligent endeouors therein, they had inough to bring it to passe as they wished.

The beginner of this businesse was hanged the same day in the market place of Edinburgh, where he began first to pike the quarell. Monsieur de Delle, to shew that this variance had not proceeded so farre as the bute thereof gaue forth (for it was rather increased ye may be sure than diminished) undertooke an enterprize in hand to win the towne of Haddington by a canissado, but in what sort they missed their purpose, and how they were well beaten backe, and sent away by the valiant manhood of the English capitains and souldiers then within the towne, ye may read further thereof in the English historie. There were seven score (some say three hundred) slaine in the bace court.

But now, so much as I haue said nothing of Broughtie crag, since the lord gouernour raised his siege from thence, ye shall vnderstand, that (as some haue written) shortly after the earle of Argile came thither with an armie of his Irish Scots, and besieged it. But when he saw he could not preuaile, he toke truce with them within for a time, and before the same was expired, there came new succors to the Englishmen: so that the earle of Argile (by reason his people had remained there the full terme 20 of their bounden & ordinarie seruice) was constrained to leaue his siege, and suffer the Englishmen to become maisters of a little hill, where afterwards they builded a fort. And now in the latter end of this yeere, they purposed also to haue fortified Dundee, and to haue kept the same with a garrison of souldiers; but hearing that monsieur de Delle with his Frenchmen was comming thitherwards, they abandoned the towne of their owne accord, having first spoiled the houses, and after set them on fire.

The Keingraue with two bands of his Almains, and monsieur de Etanges with his companie of horsemen were sent before, who comming to Dundee, and finding the Englishmen gone, incamped there, staid till monsieur de Delle was come, that followed at hand with the French footmen. Within two daies after, they going forth to view the fort, were in danger to haue bene caught yet they could get backe againe. For the Englishmen and Lance-knights that were there with them (part of Conrad Hennings bands) issued forth, and drew them to retire, not without danger to haue bene distressed, if the Keingraue had not used the greater policie in retiring the troope. To be short, monsieur de Delle, to stop the Englishmen from entering anie further into the countrie on that side, left seven ensignes of Frenchmen, & two ensignes of Scots within Dundee, with artillerie and pioners to fortifie the towne, & to keepe it in safetie from the Englishmen. This done, he returned to Edinburgh, and sent the residue of his people abroad into the countrie, to lodge in townes and villages here & there, as was thought most expedient, for the better refreshing of them after their long trauell.

While these things were in doing, the gouernour of Scotland sent the lord Carnegie knight (and senator) ambassado; to the protector of England, which should for ransome (as the custome is) demand deliverie of the earle of Huntley being prisoner: which if he could not obtaine, that then he should request his libertie, that his wife and children might come into him into England. Wherevnto the protector answered, that he would not let the earle free, untill the warres were ended: but for the companie of his wife, he was content to grant it for certeine daies; with this promise, that he should not withdraw himselfe by anie means from the custodie of Mafe Wane (corruptlie by Lesleus called Wane) who had taken him in the warres. Wherefore, when the ambassado; was returned into Scotland, Huntley was committed to certeine keepers, who should carie him from London to Norwich, distant twentie and foure miles from the borders of Scotland. Now whilest the earle both there looke for his wiues comming to him, he thinketh vpon escape, and to come to hir. For he had agreed with George Har, that he should one night pishie bying to him thither, two of the swiftest horses that he could get to sle awaie upon them. According whereunto Har was readie out of the borders of Scotland with such horses as he knew would serue the turne, wherof one was for the earle, and the other was for his man.

The earle prepareth a supper for his keepers, whereunto they were solemnlie invited, and to plaie at cards with him to passe awaie the tediousnes of the night. At length (as though he had plaid inough at cards) he left off, but earnestlie desired his keepers that they should continue on their game. During which, the earle going vnto the window, and looking out) did by a secret signe (for he could not well discern anie thing, it was so extreame darke ouer all the element) easilie vnderstand that all things were readie for his iournie. The earle then doubtfull (being sometime in god hope, and sometime in feare) thought vpon manie things, which he muttered to himselfe: and at length vnadvisedlie (as doubtfull men are wont to do) burst out in these speeches; Wh¹⁰ soeuer, all these things be a hinderance vnto me, the sharpenesse of the winter night, the doubt of my weake force and helpe, the let of an vnkowne way, and the want of a faithfull guide: God prosper the iournie. His keepers hearing him speake to himselfe, asked him what those secret speeches might signifie: to whom the earle (knowing that he was guilty of his fault) answered, that those words were v²⁰sed as a prouerbe amongst the Scots: and first had their beginning by the old earle Spozton, uttering the same in the middle of the night when he lay in dieng. Whereupon (to the end that his keepers should not haue anie suspicion of his determined flight) he sitteth downe againe to cards.

After which suddenlie he rose from them, as v³⁰ged by losenesse of his bellie to vnburden nature, by which occasion he forthwith (accompanied onelie with his seruant) leape forth, found the horses readie furnished for himselfe and his man, got on them, & with speedie iournie did sle to the borders of Scotland. When he was passed ouer the riuer of Tweed, and had a little refreshed himselfe from the labor of his iournie in the house of Har, he went the same night (being Christmas eue) to Cdenburgh, where he was ioufullie & honozable receiued of the queene, the gouernor, his wife, and his other friends, with an vniuersall gladnesse of the whole multitude of the towne. As some as his keepers perceiued that he was gone, they speedilie run to horse, and (doubtfull which way to follow) they seeke him here, and there, and euerie where, but all in vaine, for the diligence of the earle put them out of all doubt for obtaining him. Whose flight was not onelie a freedom to himselfe, but also to manie other noble prisoners, who (vpon the assurance of his faith and word) were permitted to depart into Scotland. The gouernor therefore, to congratulate with the earle for his returne, restored vnto him the chancelorship, and the rule of manie o⁴⁰ther prouinces which he had before his captiuitie. For which cause when he had remained a while at Cdenburgh, he returned to the north parts of Scotland, where speedilie and easilie he appeased all the tumults of those people.)

On saint Stephens day at night, the castell of Hume was scaled, and wone out of the Englishmens hands. One of the surname of the Humes, a man of thescole yers of age, was the first that entered on the wall, sleing one of the watchmen that kept his walke on that side. * Not long after, when the capteine of Falkcaskell had commanded the busbandmen adioining, to bying thither (at a certeine day) great store of vittels, the young men there a bouts hauing that occasion, assembled thither at the day appointed, who taking their burdens from the horses, and laing them on their shoulders, were receiued (after they had passed the bridge, which was made ouer two high rocks) into the castle, where (laing downe that which they brought) they suddenlie (by a signe giuen) set vpon the keepers of the gates, slue them, and (before the other Englishmen could be assembled) possessed the other places, weapons, and artillerie of the castell, and then receiuing the rest of their companie into the same (through the great and open gate) they wholie kept and inioied the castell for their countremen.)

About the same time, the Keinsgrau returned into France, leaving his fine enignes of Almaines behind him, vnder the charge of capteine Ketonze, a good man of warre and of great experience. Also monsieur de Etanges was taken in a skirmish at Broughtie crag, as I haue noted in the English history: & about the same time, there landed at Dun²⁰beton foure bands of souldiers, Pouancois and Galcoignes, bringing monie with them to paie the souldiers their wages, behind as then for the space of thre moneths. Sir James Willford also was taken about the same time by the Frenchmen, in a skirmish at Dunbar (as I haue also noted in the historie of England.) Not long after, monsieur de Wesse was appointed by the queene Dowager, to go vnto Jedworth, to preuent that the Englishmen should not fortifie there, whereof she stood in some doubt.

Immediatlie vpon his coming thither, the lord of Fernihurst requested him to helpe to recouer his castell of Fernihurst out of the Englishmens hands, which they had taken from him and kept, greatlie to the annoiance of all the countrie thereabouts. Monsieur de Wesse taking with him monsieur de Wiffell, and monsieur de la Chapelle de Witon, hasted thither with the chiefest part of his armie, sending before certeine capteins with their bands to surueie the house, who at their coming thither, v³⁰sed such diligence in following the offered occasion, that they both repelled their enimies that came forth to giue them the skirmish; and pursuing them with great rigor, wane the lims of the house vpon them, forcing the capteine and souldiers to retire within the dungeon, and kept them so thort therein, that they had opportunitie to mine an hole through the wall, of such largenes, as a man might easilie enter by the same.

Herewith a great number of Scots hauing broken open the gate of the base court, where the Frenchmen were busie to assault the dungeon, burst in on beapes, vpon desire to be reuenged vpon the Englishmen, and namelie of their capteine, who (as they said) had done them manie great displeasures. The capteine perceiuing this, and doubting if he fell into the Scottishmens hands he should die for it, he presented himselfe at the hole which the Frenchmen had made, and yelded himselfe to monsieur de Dus⁴⁰fac, and la Pouthie Rouge, who minding to vse him as became men of warre, would haue led him out of the prese: but suddenlie a Scot coming behind him, whose wife (as was reported) he had rauished, smote off his head so iust from the shoulders, that it leapt foure or fve yards quite from the bodie. Manie other cruell parts the Scots seemed to shew against other Englishmen, taken here at Fernihurst: but they excused the matter by the euill dealings of the Englishmen towards them before that time.

Monsieur de Wesse returning to Jedworth, aided by the furtherance and counsell of the Scots, ceased not in occasions of advantage to attempt new enterprises against the Englishmen, as time and opportunitie serued: and among other exploits, the castell of Cornetwall (an old house built after the ancient manner

Also capteine Cobios a Frenchman, hauing a band of fiftie light horsemen Scots seruing vnder him, on a night had a faire hand against a number of English horsemen, whome he charged so on the sudden, as he saw them out of order, that he easilie discomfited them, and toke more prisoners (whome he brought to Jedworth) than he had persons in his companie to assaile them.

Road made by monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron.

Monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron, was sent forth by monsieur de Desse, with the companie of horsemen that belonged to monsieur de Stauges then prisoner, and five hundred footmen beside Scots, to make a road into England: which enterprise he achieved in burning towne and villages, and returned without anie great losse sustained at that time. Within two daies after his returne to Jedworth, monsieur de Desse dislodged from thence, & taking with him foure field peeces, and all his men of war, entered into England, toke the castell of Ffourd and burnt it, with ten small villages in the countrie thereabouts, situate within halfe a mile ech of other. There was one tower yet parcell of that castell of Ffourd, which was kept by Thomas Ear, so that the Frenchmen could not win it, for they had no time to staie long about it, removing that night ouer the water, & incamped there within the Scottish ground.

Another made by monsieur de Desse. Ffourd castell waine.

As the Scots and Frenchmen executed these enterprises, they were coasted by certaine light horsemen; but neuerthelesse the Frenchmen returned in safetie to Jedworth, hauing soe indamaged the English borderers by that road: insomuch as it was thought, the Scots (which were with them at that road) gained at that time, by pillage and botties to the value of nine thousand crownes. The Englishmen soe grieved, that the Frenchmen lieng thus in Jedworth, should in such wise addresse one enterprise after another against them, so greatlie to their annoiance, assembled a power together at Roxburgh, purposing to haue assailed the Frenchmen in their campe at Jedworth.

Scots gaine by spoile.

Monsieur de Desse fleeth out of Jedworth for feare of the Englishmen.

But monsieur de Desse hauing warning thereof, departed from thence first to Melrose, and after further off within the countrie, fearing to be constrained to giue battell. Which he could not haue done without manifest losse of his feeble armie, hauing not past fiftene hundred footmen, and five hundred horsemen able to haue done seruice: for such was the miserie, which they had in manner continuallie sustained through want of vittels, and other necessarie helps during the time of their incamping at Jedworth, that what through sickenelle and hurts received in assaults and skirmishes, no small number of them were dead, and manie other so feeble, that they were not able to aid themselves; insomuch that now being got out of danger, they thought themselves happlie escaped.

The miserable state of the Frenchmen in Scotland.

Shortlie after, in the beginning of the summer, the Englishmen armed five and twentie saile of men of warre, the which arriving at the Bassie, nere to the mouth of the Forth, assailed by faire and pleasant words to haue persuaded the keepers of the castell, there standing on the height of a great rocke, to haue yielded the place into their hands. But perceiving their persuasions would not be regarded, they toke their course by into the Forth, and finding in their waie foure ships of Frenchmen and Scots, seized vpon them as a withed preie: and the morrow next ensuing, at the verie break of day, they came before Leith, and saluting the towne with canon shot, remained there at anchor ten or twelue daies, in which meane while they landed their people at Inskith, and began to fortifie with all diligence. But before the place could be put in anie strength, the ships departed from thence backe towards the sea, and left in the Island foure ensignes of Englishmen, and one ensigne of Italians, to defend the pionsers and the Island against the Scots and Frenchmen, if they should attempt to assaile them.

After the English naute was thus departed, monsieur de Desse, and the queene mother being at Edinburgh, determined with all diligence to imploy all such forces as they might make about the recovering of the Ile, before the fortifications begun by the Englishmen should be brought to anie perfection. Wherevpon, monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron, imbarked in the gallie of monsieur de Tillegaignon, resolved forth to view the manner of the Englishmens dealing within the Ile, which he did in such effectuall wise, that approaching within harquebuse shot, he brought knowledge with him not onelie of the state and whole circumstances of their buildings, but also of the perfect number of their ensignes, and the qualitie of the men of warre that serued vnder the same.

La Chapelle de Biron.

At that present also, monsieur de Thermes latelie before arrived at Dunbretton with an hundred men of armes, and two hundred light horsemen after the manner of France, and one thousand footmen, was come to the queene, busie now to further this enterprise. She had got together within Leith haue all the botes that belonged to all the crèches & hauens of the Forth: so that on thursdaie after Trinitie Sunday, euerie thing being prepared readie for the purpose, in the morning by the break of day the queene was come to Leith, to see the imbarcking of the men of warre appointed that day to trie what successe fortune would send them. There was no diligence wanting, neither among the Scots nor Frenchmen, to bestow themselves abroad, & the comfortable words of the queene greatlie encouraged them thereto, be- holding them, and deuising with monsieur de Desse and the other capteins, till they were all set forward.

The diligence of the Scottish queene.

The forwardnesse of the souldiers.

Tillegaignon with his gallies passed on before to keepe the Englishmen occupied, so as they should not perceiue the Frenchmens meaning: but they discovering the vessels at their setting forth, concealed straightwaies what was intended: and therevpon prepared to keepe the enemies off from landing, so that vpon the Frenchmens approach, they saluted them with arrowes and harquebuse shot verie hotlie: yet at length by fine force the Scots and Frenchmen got on land, and drove the Englishmen and Italians backe from the sea strond vp to the higher ground, where they stood at defense on a plumpe together, doing their best to defend the place against the assailants.

Inskith assaulted by the Frenchmen.

But finally, their generall named Cotton, being slaine with George Applebie esquire, a capteine of an ensigne of footmen sent forth of Derbyshire, and one Gaspar Bizoni, that was capteine of the Italians, beside diuers other gentlemen, and the most principall men of warre and souldiers among them: the residue were constrained to retire vnto a corner or point of the Island, where they were taken without further resistance, although before they had made verie stout defense, hurt and slaine diuerse Scots and Frenchmen, both at their landing, and also after they were entered on land. Among other, monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron was stricken through the hand with an harquebuse shot, and his burguenet beaten so into his head, that his friends that were about him, were faine to conueie him into one of the gallies to be dressed of his hurts by a surgian. Also a gentleman named Desboies, which bare the said monsieur de la Chapelle his coronell ensigne, was slaine with a pike by the hands of the sozenamed Cotton the English generall.

Inlish recovered by the Frenchmen.

Monsieur de Wesse returned into France.

Monsieur de Thermes succeeded in his place.

A fort builded at Aberlady.

The earle of Rutland.

The Frenchmen in danger to have bene distressed.

Thus was Inlish recovered out of the Englishmens hands, after it had bene in their possession by the space of sixtē daies, the more to the high contentation of monsieur de Wesse, for that at the same time he stood upon his discharge and returne into France, being appointed to surrender up his place to monsieur de Thermes, latelie before arrived (as ye have heard) with commission to receive the same. So that monsieur de Wesse, to end his charge with the glorie of this achieved enterprize, esteemed it much to stand with his honoz: and no doubt with the swelling humoz of the glorie thence rebounding he was blowne up; as in cases of victorie it cometh to passe in them that make a god hand; whereas the vanquished (God wot) are contrarie qualified.

Shortlie after, he returned into France with the gallies, and monsieur de Thermes succeeded in his place for the generall conduct of the French armie in Scotland. Who by the advise of the gouernoz, and other of the Scottish lordz, determined with a siege volant to keepe the Englishmen in Haddington from vittels and all other reliefe. First therefore, after that Wesse was departed towards France, monsieur de Thermes with his Frenchmen and some Scots incamped at Aberlady, where they began the foundation of a fort, so to impeach the Englishmen from setting on land anie vittels there, to be conveyed from thence to Haddington, as before they had done.

In this meane time, the Englishmen had increased their numbers of Almaines, and other strangers, and not onelie furnished their forts with new supplies of men; but also had an armie in the fields which lay most an end at Dunglas, and one while besieged Hume castell. But after they saw themselves disappointed of the meane, whereby they supposed to have recovered it, they raised from thence, and spoiled the most part of Linlithgow and other the marches thereabout; in reuenge (as they alleged) of the disloyaltie and breach of promise proued in the assured Scots. Generall of this armie was the earle of Rutland, lieutenant at that present of the north parts, a noble man, right valiant, wise, well aduised, and skiled in his dealings, verie honozable and courteous in all his demeanoz.

He was accompanied with capitaines of good estimation and approved prowesse, as sir Richard Spaners, sir Francis Leake, sir John Sanage, sir Thomas Wolcrosse, sir Oswald Wulstrop, & others. He so behaved himselfe in that dangerous time of the byproz and rebellions of the commons, through the more part of the realme of England; that although the appointed forces against Scotland were staied, and turned to the suppression of the rebels, to the encouragement (no doubt) both of Scots and Frenchmen in Scotland, yet they were so fronted and kept in awe by that armie under the earle of Rutland, that they rather lost than gained in this season at the Englishmens hands.

At one time the same armie, under the conduct of the said earle, passing forth with a conueie of vittels into Haddington, came so suddenlie upon the Frenchmen where they laie in campe, that whether through default of their scouts, or other negligence bled by them, or through the great diligence and prouident forwardnesse shewed by the Englishmen, the Frenchmen were in such hazard to have bene utterly distressed, that if the Englishmen had not doubted more, than by anie was thought needfull, they might have overthrowen, taken, & slaine the Frenchmen handmaith (as was supposed) at their pleasure. But the Englishmen even at their first coming in sight of them (as it stood with the reason of warre, sith by the aduenturing rashlie oftentimes in such cases to late repentance easilie inueth) staied, the better to conceiue of that which they had to doe. Whereby the Frenchmen had leasure to march their waies a maine pace, till they were got out of danger: for after they once beheld all the troops of the English hozsmen almost at their elbows, and herewith the battell of the Almaines suddenlie appearing on the hill top readie to come downe upon them, it was no need to bid them packe awaie.

The Frenchmen retire.

The Scottish light hozsmen coming on the backe of the English armie, perceived where the Almaines (to make them readie to giue battell) had throwen off their clokes, and left the same (with all their baggage and stuffe which they had about them) in keeping of none but of their women and boies: whereupon those Scottish hozsmen, not minding to suffer such a preie to escape their hands, came galloping in, and toke all the best stuffe they could lay hold upon, and returned in safetie, before anie enemy could come backe to the rescue. The Almaines were in no small chafe for the losse of their garments and other necessaries; but there was no helpe then to seeke remedie in that behalfe: for the Scots were withdravne and got quite out of danger.

The baggage of the English Almaines spoiled by the Scottish hozsmen.

The English armie, after that the Frenchmen were thus fled and gone, passed forth to Haddington, with their cariages laden with vittels, to the great comfort of them within that fortreffe, standing in great necessitie before this conueie came. This summer also, and a little before the vittelling thens of Haddington, vpon knowledge had that Julian Romero with his band of Spaniards, whereof he was capteine, serving the king of England, was lodged in Coldingham, six miles distant from Wervike: certeine bands of Almaines and Frenchmen came thither vpon the sudden, and surpriuing the Spaniards before they were aware of their approach, set vpon them in their lodgings, toke, and slue in maner the whole number of them.

Haddington bittelled.

Julian Romero distressed.

Things passing in this wise in Scotland in the summer of this yeare 1549, the Englishmen were not onelie in the meane time sore troubled with commotions raised by the commons of that realme; but also with the warres which the French king made against them, within the countrie of Bullognois, so that they had not meanes to imploye their forces against Scotland as they had determined to have done; as partlie before, and more largelie in the historie of England is mentioned. By reason whereof, anon after Michaelmas they gaue ouer the keeping of Haddington, and raising their fortifications there, they returned into England to the great reioysing of Louthian, to whome that towne had giuen occasion of great troubles and calamities. Upon the giuing ouer thus of Haddington, the gouernoz and the quene Dowager were aduanced, in hope to recover againe all that the Englishmen held within the bounds of Scotland.

Haddington rased and left by the Englishmen.

But first it was thought good to assaie the winning of Broughtie crag; for it founded (as was thought) greatlie to the diminishing of the estimation, aswell of the Scots as Frenchmen, that the English should keepe so far within the realme, in despiight of their whole puissance. Hereupon monsieur de Thermes about Candlemasse, hauing all things in a readinesse for the siege, came thither, and did so much, what with shot of canon to make batterie, and other meanes of inforcements, that giuing the assault both with Scots and Frenchmen, they entred the fort the twentieth of Februarie by fine force, so that all those within were either taken or slaine. Whereupon those English also that kept the castell, rendered up the same without further resistance, amongst other prisoners: sir John Luttrell the capteine was one.

In this meane time there were certeine commissioners appointed betwixt the two kings of England and France to commune of a peace: but because they continued long in their treatie per they could agree, the Scots and Frenchmen surceased not in occasions of advantage to pursue the warre, so that coming before Lodowick they besieged that fortresse, & skirmishing with the Englishmen that issued forth, to encounter them, drove them in at the gates with some losse on either part. And this done, the French held them within so straitlie besieged, that if peace had not bene the sooner concluded, sir Hugh Willoughbie captaine of that fort must needs haue yielded through lacke of shot, & other necessarie things serving for defense; which were spent, so that they were constrained to ble their powder vessel in stead of bullets. But as it fortun'd, a peace was accorded, passed, and confirmed, that verie selfe time betwixt the two kings of England and France, through the diligent and orderlie trauell of the commissioners appointed to deale therein, whose names insue.

First for the king of England, the right honorable John earle of Bedford, knight of the garter, and lord priuie seale; William Paget lord of Beav-desert, knight also of the garter; sir William Peter knight, chiefe secretarie to the said king; & sir John Malon knight, secretarie to him for the French tong. For the French king were appointed Francis de Montmorence, lord of Rochpot, knight of the order of saint Michael, and lieutenant for the same king of Picardie, in absence of monsieur de Wandoline; Gasper de Colignie, lord of Chastillon, knight also of the order, and captaine generall of the footmen of France, and the said kings lieutenant generall in the countie of Bullogne; Andreu Guillard lord Noxtier, knight also of the order, and one of the same kings priuie counsell; and Guillaume Bouchettell lord of Saille, knight likewise of the order, & secretarie of the estate of the finances. [And for the Scots (as saith Lesleus, lib. 10. pag. 506.) D. Painter bishop of Ross.]

Among other articles comprised in this peace, it was covenanted, that all such forts, castels, and places as the Englishmen held in anie part within the Scottish dominions, should be deliuered and restored to the Scots; and that the forts of Dunglas, Rorburgh, and Alimouth, which the Englishmen had built and raised out of the ground, should be rased and throwen downe, to avoid all occasions of new contentiues that might grow by reason of keeping or defending the same: so as the peace now concluded, might in all points be firmelie and truelie kept and obserued, aswell betwixt England and Scotland, as England and France, and betwixt all and euerie the subiects of the same realmes, both by sea and land. Monsieur de Hourret was sent into Scotland with the copie of this peace, by whose means it was proclaimed anon after Easter about the beginning of Aprill, and euerie thing used and ordered according to the articles of the agreement concluded.

In Maie the Frenchmen and Almaines were imbarked at Leith in sixtene French ships, and certaine Scottish ships, and departed from thence into France. A few there were, as Pigropeilice and Saint Jalcise, captaines of light horsemen, with others that passed through England, and so home into their countrie. Moreover the marquess de Maine, after duke Daumals comming ouer into England about the same time for an hostage, passed afterwards through the realme into Scotland, to visit his sister queene Dowager, and shortly after returned.
They mourned both for the death of their father Cland de Lorraine, the first duke of Guise, who deceased the eighteenth of Aprill this present yeare 1550.

How then the French departed out of Scotland, there were manie Scots appointed vnto them; partlie, to defend them from pirats, if they should offer them anie iniurie in the streit of the British sea, and partlie for honors cause to bring them on their iourne into France. By whose departure Scotland was free deliuered from all forren souldiers, except certeine Frenchmen, who remained still in the countrie; because they had the Ile of Inkeh and the castell of Dunbar committed to their charge, which afterwards they did most faithfullie discharge. Monsieur de Hermes, Chappellie, and diuerse other captaines of France, remained also in Scotland (after that the others were imbarcked to be gone into France) for pleasures cause, and to see the countrie; who (trauelling ouer Scotland, and beholding the cities, searching the castels, and marking the bulwarks of defense) did constantlie affirme, that in the whole world they neuer saw forts and townes more pleasantlie placed, or more naturallie defended. In seeing whereof they consumed the time with great pleasure, vntill the moneth of December, in which they all went into France with the queene Dowager.

Thus, as there was peace (by the departing of the French) with forren nations, which continued three yeares: so was there within the wals and kingdome warre and dissention amongst the Scots; which was most perillous and troublesome. For they which were the chiefe rulers (as the gouernor and his brother the archbishop of saint Andrews and others) did vse all things with extreme cruel-tie & couetousnesse. For the archbishop, being giuen to all libertie, followed by late his pleasures in all things, as though it had bene permitted vnto him.
For first, as a presage of his following tyrannie, he permitted the slaughter of William Chzeighton to go unpunished, the same William being slaine in the gouernors house (if not within his owne sight) by Robert Semple: next followed the death of John Maluill an old man of fife; who next vnto the gouernor was most accounted of by him, as chiefest of his familiars. This John had his letters (which he wrote to an Englishman, to whom he did commend a captaine his friend) intercepted. In which, although there were not anie suspicion of anie faulst, yet was the author of them punished with the losse of his head. Whose patrimonie made his death seeme the more vile; because the same was giuen to the younger sonne of the gouernor. The hurts of these wicked parts did pertaine to few, the enemie thereof to manie, and the example vniuersallie to all. For by reason of this vnskillfull gouernement of the kingdome, and the slooth of his life, which offended the common people; the gouernor began to be had in contempt almost of all men.]

In September following, the queene Dowager accompanied with the earls of Huntley, Camils, Marshall, Southerland, and diuerse other of the Scottish nobilitie toke the sea, and sailing to France landed at Diepe: she was conueied thither by the pilot of Capoa, & Leon Strozze, sent and appointed with six gallies to haue the conduction of hir.
From Diepe she remoued to Rone, where the king then late, of whom she was right courteously recei-ued, and had such attendance and seruice done vnto hir, during the time of hir tarlance there, as stood with the dignitie of hir person, and was answerable to the minds and expectations of hir traine; to the high praise likewise of the king and his court in that behalf.

France were, that now having disposed all things at home in Scotland, the might renew the old league in France, the might see his daughter and his other friends; and procure the government of the realm to his selfe. For the ambitious and subtil woman did thinke in his mind, that the gouernor by his euill demeanour would soon be put out of his office, and that she might easilie find means to be substituted in his place. But before his shipping into France, and whilst they were preparing, the earle of Huntley 10 commanded William Makintosh (chiefe of the familie of the Glenchattens, and his followers) to be apprehended (for a conspiracie secretlie begun against him, whilst he was the kings deputie in those north parts) and from thence (being first deprived of all his goods) caried him to Strachbolgie, where he was beheaded. Which fact (greatlie offending the minds of the earle of Castles, and others that fauored the Makintosh) did so stir them against Huntley, that a commotion and tumult had bene raised by them, vnlesse the wisdom of the queene had appeased the furie of their minds.

1551. Lefleus.
lib. 10 pag. 508

For although the queene certeine yeares after, had vndone the sentence of proscription for the gods of Makintosh (restoring the same with the possessions and inheritances vnto the sonne of Makintosh) and thereby had seemed to cut awaie the cause of dissention betwene Huntley and them: yet the kindred and friends of the Glenchattens (not suffering so great an inturie to their familie to go vnreueged) did secretlie (but eagerlie) pursue the same with great contention of mind. Wherefore entring the castell of Pet by deceit, they apprehended 30 Lanchlane Makintosh, and (condemning all his followers to banishment) did cruellie kill him (as the betrayer of the head of his owne familie) because they supposed, that he ministred and blew the cole that fired Huntley, to make the said William Makintosh out of the waie.

Lefleus lib. 10.

A little before which, the master of Cresskine, and Henrie Senclere deane of Glasgow were sent into England; who at London did anew confirme the peace concluded before with the English; from whence they passed into Flanders, to make the like league with the low countries, which they did renew, to the great reioicing of both nations; although in the beginning of the treatie there grew great and contentious questions for the restitution of the ships of Flanders and Holland (whereof the Scots had taken manie in the warres) notwithstanding that the Scots had alleged, that they did not offer any violence to those of the low countries, before that they (by the perswasion of the English) had offered wrong to the Scots, in detaining their ships and merchandise.

Thus much digressed from the queene Dowagers going into France, wherevnto afresh to direct our pen, we say; that being at Rome, the king did there openlie make shew of his welcome vnto him by diuerse arguments. Amongst which, this was not the least: that (besides other shewes, honorable triumphs, & manie courtesies shewed to the Scots) calling a chapter of the knights of the order of Saint Michaell, he admitted the earle of Huntley and other chiefe lords of Scotland there to the queene and fauored by him, into the said order. Which honours and pleasures seemed the more augmented, in that the young queene of Scots was there present, adorned with such singular beautie, as was not easilie to be spoken, by the iudgement of Lefleus. After that they had thus spent some time in delights of courtesie, to feed the mind and eye, the king of France, the two queens of Scotland, and the other nobles, departed from thence to Paris; where they were with great triumph of the citizens most iollie receiued. At what time againe, the French king shewed such humanitie to Huntley, and the other Scots; that he seemed for euer most firmelie to bind them vnto him. After that they spent some daies there at Paris, the king with that companie remoued to Blesles; where he remained all the winter.

Now the queene Dowager, thinking the time and place fit for the executing of the cause of his coming into France, and vising therein the aduise of the duke of Guise, and the cardinal of Lozeine (his brethren) openeth the same vnto the French king, shewing that amongst others, the chiefe cause to take that iourne, was to require his opinion, touching the government of the kingdom of Scotland: and to know, if it pleased him that the helme of the same kingdom should be committed to his rule. Which if he misliked, or deemed the contrarie; that yet he would wholie rest on his determination. 20 The which matter pleased well the king, but yet with this promise; if the gouernor without any tumult or raising of quarrels would giue it ouer.

Lefleus lib. 10.
pag. 510.

Whereupon the queene, to bring euerie thing about as she desired, did perswade the king to confirme the dukedome of Chateaufault in France, vnto the gouernor, before granted to him and to his heires; & to make his eldest sonne erle of Arraine chiefe capteine of the bands of Scots in France. And further, to giue the earledome of Arraine to the earle of Huntley (kinsman to the gouernor) and to his heires; the earledome of Rothlie to his sonne, which had married the kinsman of the said gouernor; the whole earledome of Angus, to the earle thereof; and the earledome of Moray, to the sonne of George Dowglaste. All which he should procure likewise to be confirmed by such, as should be gouernors of the young queene. These things now done, the French king carefullie receiued the young queene of Scots into his protection; vntill she should come vnto more sufficient yeares, able to confirme all these gifts; the which if she refused then to do, the French king would then bestow as large possessions on them in France.

Buchanan.
lib. 16.
Lefleus lib. 10.
pag. 510.

In the meane time the gouernor had sent Carnegie knight and senator into France, who should in the name of the Scots giue great thanks to the king for the aid which they receiued out of France, against the Englishmen. After this the French king did liberallie open the determination of the queene mother of Scotland to the bishop of Roisse (then ambassador for the Scots in France) to Robert Carnegie, and to Calvin Hamilton (to whom, as was said, the abbeie of Kilnin was giuen in commendam) to the end that the same which was at the first secretlie consulted betwene the king of France & the queene Dowager, might now openlie be considered among the Scots which were in France: declaring further, that he desired nothing more, than that the queene mother should susteine the parts and place of the queene his daughter, in the administration and government of Scotland, with the same mostlie stood with reason and equitie; and that he (the better to win the gouernor to yield therevnto) had giuen the gouernor the dukedome of Chateaufault, to his sonne the capteinship of all the Scots in France, and manie other liberall benefits to manie other of his kinsmen.

And to the end that no deceit might be supposed to be hidden vnder this liberalitie, the French king willed the ambassadour to take possession of all these things in the dukes name. Robert Carnegie hauing his errand, returned into Scotland; & shortly after, the bishop of Roisse was appointed ambassador, who at length with much adoe did wyng from the gouernor a consent to part from his authoritie, & k. ij. and

and to applie himselfe to the will of the French king: which thus in the end obtained, the bishop of Roſe goeth againe into France, to aduertise the king what he had done. Whereupon the king considering his painfull & faithfull seruice, did reward him with the abbey of Labete in France.

Lesleus lib. 10.

2 Blois.

Whilest these things were in doing, Edward the first, king of England, did send the marquisse of Northampton, & other of the nobler sort of ambassadoys to Henrie the second, king of France, then sojourning at Blois, to moue him to giue his daughter in marriage to the king of England. At what time there were manie martiall games and pastimes shewed before the king, in which the English ioining the Scots with them as companions of their sports, did beare a part, and won the garland (from the others) to their singular commendation. The summer next following, the French king accompanied with the quene mother of Scotland and other of the nobilitie, did with great pompe enter Turon, Aniois, Paris, and other cities of Britaine, which he had not before seene since he attained the crowne. After certaine moneths consumed in those iournies, he returned to founteinbleu.

Lesleus lib. 10.
pag. 512.

But the quene Dowager of Scotland, taking hir courtious leaue and farewell of the French king, hir daughter, & of other the nobilitie, departed from the court, and with easie iournies came to Jamislie: where remaining a certaine time, she had the pleasant companie of hir mother the duchesse of Guise, and hir other friends to their great ioy: but that she shewed a certaine griefe (for hir father lately deceased) which somewhat diminished the sweet pleasure of that meeting. Now when the quene Dowager had remained almost 12 moneths or more in France, honorable interteined, bountifullie feasted, louinglie saluted by hir friends and kinred, and hauing obtained a willing grant of the effects of hir request, the Scots did vige hir to haſſen hir returne into Scotland, preparing at Paris all things necessarie thereunto.

Lesleus lib. 10.
pag. 512.

Wherefore departing thence, and comming againe to Roſe, the quene mother moued and perswaded the nobilitie about the taking of hir iourne through England into Scotland. By occasion whereof, losing their ships from Newport, they passe the seas, and happily landed at Portsmouth, a famous port of England. The knowledge of which arrivall comming to king Edward the first, he presentlie sent thither the earle of Southampton, and the lord William Howard to interteine hir: who receiued hir with singular ioy and courtesie, and conueied hir through Hampshire, Sussex, and Surreie (three provinces of England) to Hampton court, where the king as then remained; from whence (after that she had bene there most honorable receiued) she came along the riuer of Thames to London, and landed at Poules wharfe in the after none, and from thence rode to the bishop of Londons palace by Poules, and there lodged.

Hir receiuing at the court.

The fourth of Nouember, she rode in hir chariot to the kings palace of the Whitehall, accompanied with the ladie Margaret Douglas, the three dutchesses, of Suffolke, Richmund, and Northumberland, and diuerſe other great ladies and gentlewomen, both Scottish and English. At the court gate the dukes of Northumberland, and Suffolke, and the lord treasurer were readie to receiue hir. And at hir entering into the hall, the king stood in the upper end thereof, and the earle of Marthwicke holding the sword before him. She at hir approaching to him, kneeled downe, and he courteously took hir vp, and kissed hir; and taking hir by the hand, led hir vp into his owne chamber of presence, & after into the quenes chamber of presence, where he kissed all the ladies of Scotland, and so departed for a while.

She dined on the quenes side that day with the king, his seruice and hirs comming both together; the kings being placed on the right hand of the table, and hirs on the left. What plentie of all manner of costlie meates and drinks there was, and what rich furniture of plate and all other things was shewed to set forth the feast, it were superfluous to write. All the ladies both of England and Scotland dined in the quenes great chamber. After dinner the king shewed hir his gallerie and gardens, with all other commodities of the place. And about foure of the clocke, he brought hir downe againe by the hand into the hall, where he first receiued hir, and there kissing hir, she took hir leaue, & returned to the bishops palace from whence she came.

* And here I must not forget what Lesleus hath set downe in this place for the defense of his people, in not deliuering the yong quene of Scots to the English, to haue entered the marriage bed of king Edward the first. Whose reasons although they may (the first ground of the warre considered, with the consent of the Scots parlement to that marriage, and the willingness of the English to haue caused them to performe their promise without battell) be well answered, as matters that not verie greatlie defend the cause: yet I will not anie way say anie thing of him (being a man estranged from vs in religion, but learned, wise, of great experience, a faithfull seruant to his mistresse, and a graue bishop of Roſe) but set them downe plainelie as he writeth them, leaving the same to the iudgement of others, sith I meane not in anie thing to derogate from them, or arrogate vnto our selues more than is due. Thus therefore he writeth.

Fr. Thin.

When the quene (saith he) of Scots was come to London, the king of England sheweth vnto hir his treasure, openeth the monuments, latest abroad the antiquities of the kingdome, and laboured by manie other such kind of means, that he might prepare himselfe a passage (with the open notes of courtesie) to obtaine the good will of the quene. For he after perswaded hir with manie speeches, that she should giue hir daughter vnto him, as it was before decreed by the Scottish nobilitie: which he proueth by manie arguments to be most beneficiall vnto both nations. When on the contrarie part (if she were giuen vnto the French kings sonne) it should not be profitable either to the Scots, which should giue; or the French, which should receiue hir to wife. Therewithall adding this vnto it, that there should alwaies be continuall hatred, and deablie enimitie betwene him and that person which should marrie hir.

Lesleus lib. 10.
pag. 513.

Wherevnto the quene both presentlie and wisely answered, that the cause of hir daughters marriage to be solemnized with the French, was onlie by reason of the protector of England, which so bitterlie pursued the Scots with such earnest warre as then was made against them. For it was vnadvisedlie done of him, to seeke to compell by force of battell a woman, which is to be allured to the marriage bed with faire promises and flattering speeches. Wherevnto she ioined, that the Scots were so vehementlie pressed by him, that they were enforced to craue aid from the French: for the more speedie & easie obtaining whereof, they were vged to leaue the yong quene of Scots in France for a pledge. Wherefore she greatly grieved that the matter was so fast knit vp by the necessitie of time, otherwise than the Englishmen would haue had it. But yet, she would laboꝝ the French king by hir letters and messengers, with all the diligence that she might, to see if hir travail and furtherance could doe anie thing with him therein.

therein. Thus much Lesleus, and so againe to the matter.)

The first of Nouember, the quene Dowager departed from London toward Scotland, riding from Poules through the citie, passing forth at Bishops gate. The duke of Northumberland, the erle of Denbroke, and the lord treasurer brought hir to Schozich church, and there toke their leaue of hir. The duke of Northumberland had an hundred men after him with iavelins, whereof fourtie were gentlemen clad in blacke velvet cotes garded with white, & hats of blacke velvet with white feathers, and chains of gold about their necks. The earle of Denbroke had six score men well appointed also, with blacke iavelins and hats with feathers, and the lord treasurer had an hundred gentlemen and yeomen with iavelins in like manner, well apparelled: which three companies of horsemen furnished the streets on either side, from the crosse in Cheape, to Birchen lane end, as the passed that waie.

The thirffes of London had the conduction of hir to Waltham towne end, where she lodged that night: and in euery shire through which she passed, the thiriffe, with the gentlemen of the same shire, receiued hir, and gaue their attendance on hir, till she came to enter into the next shire, where the thiriffe and gentle men there receiued hir: and that order was obserued till she came to the borders of Scotland, and all hir charges for meat and drinke, as well for hir selfe, and whole traine, as also the provision for their horses, was bozne and allowed by the king. [Besides which, (as saith the same Lesleus) Richard Shelleie, now master of the knights of Malta in England, and Edward Dudleie baron, were appointed to attend on hir all the waie through England, from London to Edinburgh, where she was honozable receiued by the earle Bothwell, and the lord Hume.] The earle of Huntlee, and diuerse other of the Scottish lords returned home by sea, the said earle landing at Pontroffe, about the latter end of December.

After that the quene was arriued in Scotland, she labored euery waie to stop all occasion of dissention; and that these bzalles which were risen amongst the nobilitie in the time of the warres, and were not yet fullie quenched, might grow no further, to bring the common wealth (alreadie much impaired) into new troubles. Wherefore, by the aduise of the gouernor, of the earles of Huntlee, Angus, and Argile, and by the quenes trauell, the controuersies moued about the archbishopricks of saint Andrews and Glasgowe, the bishopricks of Dunkeld and Brechin, the abbeies of Aberbrothie, Inchmaherie, and other benefices, were ended: by bestowing some of them vpon noble mens children, and some vpon such persons as worthilie deserued them.)

Doctor Wanshop, whome Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 514. calleth Robert Warhope, a Scottishman bozne, archbishop of Armachane, so nominated by pope Paule the third, and after created Legatus à latere by Julius the third, deceased this yeere in Paris, the tenth of Nouember. This man was blind from his infancie, but yet gaue himselfe so to studie, that he was first made doctor of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Paris, and after attained to such estimation in the court of Rome, that he was by the foresaid popes aduanced (as before ye haue heard.) So that it is to be presumed, that the sufficiencie of his learning, (whereunto he must needs aspire altogether by the eare) (sith he was quite deprived of the benefit of sight) coupled with other good qualities of mind, were means to preferre him first into the popes fauour, and then to promotion of his bestowing.

This yeere in the moneth of Iune, the quene Dowager, and the gouernor, went into the north parts of Scotland; and at Inuerne, Elgin, Banf, Aberdeen, and Perth, the gouernor sat in iustice for redresse of wrongs, and administration of righteous lawes and orders. And afterwards they repaired to the west parts, and sat likewise in iustice at Dunfreis, Glasgowe, Lanricke, and in other places of that countrie, where diuerse were put to their fines for transgressing the lawes, but few or none touched by corporal punishment. Which was but a slender course taken in reforming enormities, and little better than impunitie; though in leuieng of the fines (perhaps) a proportion were vsed: for by that meanes manie an offense was redeemed by monie, and iustice was little better than bought and sold, as at a publike mart.

After this, they returned to Edinburgh, where all things requisite for the establishing of iustice were confirmed by the counsell of the nobilitie, and of the wise senators. Whereupon, when nothing seemed to want for the setting of a perfect peace through all the realme, but this, that certeine of the inhabitants of the east limits (accustomed to spoiles) did by dzing booties of cattell from the borders of England, seeme to offer new occasion of warre. At this time, the gouernor goeth to Jedworth, and remoued such magistrats as had negligentlie gouerned their owne prouince, or dispatched the generall affaires of the kingdome: where taking pledges of euery familie, he made them after that time in better quiet. Whereupon a long time following, there was a mutuall peace betwene England and Scotland. About which time also, the protestants religion making breach into the doctrine of the Romans, there was a prouinciall counsell kept at Withquoe, where the Calvinists with their doctrine were condemned and accursed; and all things decreed in the counsell of Trent vnder Paule the third, were established, with manie other needfull lawes made to purge the corrupt manners of the clergie.

In which meane time, David Panter or Painter (for I find both written) being a man of great learning, and famous by great experience, hauing faithfully consumed seven yeres in France, in the seruice of an ambassadoz legier, came out of France to Jedworth: where, when he had declared to the gouernor (in the assemblie of the nobilitie) the reason, order, and meane which he vsed in accomplishing of his office; he was greatlie commended of all men. And for that he had so diligentlie, wisely, & trustilie performed that great charge, he was with great solemnitie consecrated bishop of Ross, in the presence of that assemblie. At which time also, the gouernor did dub into the order of knight hood certeine bozders, who had deserued well of the common-wealth, to the end that their vertue adorned with such honorable recompense, might be moze enlarged toward the care of their countrie. Amongest which persons so aduanced, these were the chiefe: Cessford and Fferniburk, Andrew Ear of Littleden, Conduinknols, Greinherdie, Balclenche, with manie other ballant men.)

In this sortie (wherein the gouernor was thus the iustice) the quene secretlie trauelled with the lords, both spirituall and temporall, to haue their consents to be regent of Scotland, immediatlie after hir daughter the quene came to sufficient yeeres, and that the time of hir tutorship were accomplished, or sooner; if the lawes of the realme would so permit. And to assure hir selfe of their good wils in this behalfe, she contracted sundrie priue bands with them, making large promises of great rewards vnto euery of them. To conclude, this matter was so handled by hir and others, to whome she committed the doings therein, that in the yeere following, the gouernor agreed to surrender by the gouernance into hir hands, hir daughter the yong quene being not yet full twelue yeres of age.

The gouernour was promised not onelie a full discharge and a quietus est of all his doings, as well for receipt of monie, iewels, & other things, during the time of his gouernement, but also a confirmation of the heritable gift of the dukedome of Chateherault: likewise an other confirmation of all gifts and restitutions by him made, during the time he had exercised the office of gouernour. And forthwith the quene Dowager sent into France, to get all these things dispatched, with such assurances of writings under hands and seales, as was expedient, and to be sent home into Scotland for his securitie in all things.

* But before the gouernour had consented to the quenes demand, there was great contention about the matter: for the well vnderstood that he would not depart with his office, before the time that the yong quene had attained to the age prescribed for hir full yeres. For it is ordeined by the law of the kingdom, that the king shall not remaine anie longer vnder tutors, than to the age of foureteene; & the quene (as it is in other women) at the yeres of 12, at which times they may appoint procurators, which shall haue the gouernement of the kingdom vntill their full age. For which cause, the yong quene chose amongst other (as after shall more appere) the quene Dowager to be one: whereupon, the quene Dowager challenged the gouernement vnto hir selfe, for that hir daughter was certeine moneths aboue those yeres of twelue. Against which the gouernour did stillie contend, constantlie affirming that the yong quene did not exceed the age of eleuen yeres.

Whereupon the quene, to take from the gouernour all starting-holes and other shifts, doth vize the custome of that kingdom, and the obseruation of those lawes to be, that they must reckon the yere in which the Scottish king or quene is yet vnborne in their mothers bellie, to be part of that number of twelue or foureteene; in which they may appoint gouernours to rule vnder them. Which the gouernour perhaps did seeme to confesse for the king, but that the same was true for a quene it did not appere; sith it seemeth to be wrought by Gods high providence, that the kingdom of Scotland was alwaies heretofore by manie ages gouerned by kings, and that a woman did neuer before this time (especiallie one within age) challenge that kingdom vnto them, although the male line (as appered from the Buses to the Stewards) descended from the women, haue sometime

But in the end, saie or do what he could, the gouernour did surrender his place (as after shall more plainelie appere) vntill which time we will pursue the orderlie course of things done in this place: which is, that whilste the gouernour & the quene mother were in this discord for the regentship of the realme, manie seditious persons (taking occasion thereby with hope to scape unpunished) did renew the memorie of old iniuries. For hereupon it happened, that manie of the familie of the Burs did (at Edinburgh) with great boldnesse vtterlie slay Balcluche the knight. Besides which, the yonger sonne of the lord Ruthven or Kethven, did publikelie thrust through and slea John Chartrusse a noble and a valiant yong man, for deadlie hatred (as was thought) betwene those two families. Yet it was spred abroad, that the chief cause why Ruthven did kill Chartrusse, was for that Ruthven (being called into sute of law by the other) distrusting his cause, and supposing that it would passe against him by iudgement, had none other remedie to relieue the matter, than that verie day to kill Chartrusse. Which matter was the occasion of making this law, that whosoener with force or armes did either pursue or abate, recouer or lose in anie action, should not onelie be punished for the rashnesse of the fact, but also should haue the matter forthwith (euen in that moment of time) iudged against him.]

This yere, the first of Iulie, Edward the first of that name, king of England, departed this life, after whom succeeded his sister Marie, eldest daughter to R. Henrie the eight. [Touching whose regiments, sith this historie requireth matter appropriate vnto it selfe, we will saie little in this place, remitting the readers to the conuenient course of time wherein they flourished and vaded. Onelie this is worthe the noting, that the realme of England was not so much in hir time afflicted with exquisite troubles of barbarous persecutors, to the diminishing of Gods seruants, and the increasing of Satans synagog, as it was like to haue triumphed vnder the glorious title of the victorious gospel, if God had not, for the vntimortheinesse of the English people) taken the yong king auaie. For the prosperous beginning of his gouernement foretold an happie proceeding, and a blessed ending. But to returne to Scotland.]

* About this time, Norman Leslie, who (as you heard before) had died for the death of the cardinal Beton bishop of saint Andrews into France where he then was imprisoned) being now set at libertie, did priuilie conueie himselfe into Scotland. Which vnderstood of the gouernour, he fined all those that had rescued him into their house, & compelled Norman to flee to Denmarke, for feare that (if he were taken) he should suffer extreme punishment. But when he knew that there was no place of safetie for him in that countrie, wandering ouer manie provinces, he came at last into England, in the reigne of Edward the first; of whom, with the rest of his companions, he was most courteously receiued, with yerele pensions out of the exchequer or common tresurie assigned vnto them for their maintenance, according to their estates.

But after that king Edward was departed the world, they all were also commanded to depart the realme, to whom earnestlie vizing that their pensions might be paid to them in an other place where they should remaine: the duke of Norfolkke did publikele say in the counsell, that it seemed not iustice, that a catholike prince should paie anie pensions to such as had murdered a catholike cardinall. With which answer the said Norman was almost stricken dead, and being then wearied with the griefe of his exile, went againe into France, and there by king Henrie (by the meanes of the baron Bunsfong, whom this Leslie had sent before to request the same) he was made capteine of the Scottish light horsemen in France. This man did so valiantlie, worthilie, and honorablie behaue himselfe in warres, which the French king had (with Charles the fifth then emperor) on the borders of Flanders, that he was alwaies foremost in the front of the battell, to assault the enimie; hoping by that meanes to wipe auaie the blot of the cardinals slaughter, and more firmitie to bind the French king vnto him.

But after certeine light skirmishes (which he happily performed against the enimie) following the battell at Kenton (a towne in Picardie) most hotlie, and drawing nere within danger of the enimie, he was so wounded with a shot, that he could hardlie returne to his companie: but being relieved by his owne souldiers from the hands of the enimie, he was caried to Montrouille, where he shortly after died, greatlie repenting him of his former wicked fact, and greatlie abhorring the other authors thereof, as furtherers of him therein. Towards whom (after his death) the French king was yet so louing (for the singular singular fortitude of mind that was in him) that he procured all such of his Scots (as returned from the warres with Bunkstone) to be receiued into their owne countrie, and restored to all their goods and possessions.]

In lent all the lordes of the realme of Scotland assembled at Striueling, where all the covenants and articles of agreement betwixt the quene and the gouernor, were perfectlie and fullie concluded, and thereupon a parlement appointed to be holden in Edenburgh, the tenth of Aprill next ensuing: and in the meane time the gouernor deliuered the castell of Edenburgh vnto the lord Erskin to keepe, as it were by waie of assurance for his part, that all things at that parlement should be accomplished, according to the points of the agreement made by full consent. The lordes then assembling in parlement at Edenburgh, on the said twelfth day of Aprill; all the covenants of agreement had & made betwixt the quene Dowager and the gouernor were presented & read, touching the dimission and giuing ouer of the gouernors authoritie, confirmed by the quene hir selfe in France, with consent of the king of France hir husband, the duke of Guise, and the cardinall of Lozrain hir curators, with a gift of the dukedome of Chatelaunt vnto the gouernor, vnder the great seales of France, and others, to whome it appertained.

After this, there was read a confirmation of the three estates of Scotland, touching the premisses, in which they bound themselves to warrant the quenes discharge made to him, & to establish him as second person of the realme (& to haue the gouernement of the castell of Dunbarton (as saith Buchanan) with other things contained in the contract: to the which there in open parlement all the estates subscribed, and put there vnto their seales. Which done, the gouernor gaue vp his office of tutorship, in presence of the said estates, the quene mother, & monsieur Dorsell being there present, who receiued the same in the quenes name, at that time remaining in France. And herewith presentlie was a commission thewed, giuen by the quene of Scotland in France, with consent of hir curators, making the quene Dowager hir mother, regent of hir realme: which office she toke vpon hir, and was thereto admitted by the estates of the realme. Then was the parlement newlie authorisied in the quenes name, with consent of hir curators, and in name of the quene regent.

Where is to be noted, that as at the first they which had the administration of the common-wealth vnder the king of Scotland in his minoztie, were first called gardians, and then gouernors: so now began they to haue a new title for the same, to be called regents of Scotland, not before accustomed among the Scots, which name hath euer since remained to all such as execute that place (euen in our age) during the minoztie of Charles James the first, now ruling the scepter of Scotland. In which declination of things (as before you heard) to the gouernement of the French, the Scots could neuer be persuaded that the castell of Edenburgh should be deliuered to the rule of strangers: fearing that if the quene should die without issue, that then the French would there by tyrannic settle themselves. Wherefore the same was committed to the defense of John Arskine, which he should not deliuer to anie, but to one of the order, and of the nobilitie and parlement.

About this time, the quene regent sent George Gordon earle of Huntley to apprehend John Mordaunt (or Mordaunt, as saith Buchanan) chiefe of the familie of the Reginaldins, a notable thefe, & one that was fraught with most wicked dedes: which iourne it is supposed that Gordon did not verie faithfullie discharge. Wherefore, when he returned without the dispatch thereof, in not taking of that man, he was committed to prison vntill the day appointed, where in he should answer the cause. Whose friends in the meane time (to mitigate the enuie against him for the same) did spread false rumors thereof, laiesing all the fault in the familie of the Cathans: for they said that the same was hindered by them for the malice that they bare vnto the Gordons: which speeches did one lie rise almost vpon this occasion.

Whilest the quene prepared for hir iourne into Scotland, Gordon did cast into prison William (the head of the familie of the Cathans) a yong man liberallie brought vp with the earle of Purreie for kinreds sake, being sisters son to the said earle: for none other cause but for that he would not yeld him selfe to the protection of him. Gordon therefore grieued at this man, did not thinke it safetie to leaue him free and at libertie behind him, when he should go into France with the quene, although he could find no fault to laie to his charge worthe anie punishment. Wherefore (by his friends) he perswaded the yong man (ignorant of all deceit) that he should yeld him selfe into his protection and tutorship: for so by that one meanes, both the fame of the one and safetie of the other might be prouided for, which the yong man did accordingly.

Wherefore Gordon being now lord ouer the life and death of this William, did (dissembling his hatred to him) breake with his owne wife to execute the yong and gilliesse man in his absence, supposing thereby to transference all the malice which should rise thereof vnto the fact of his wife, as not done by his consent. Which fell out quite contrarie: for when euerie one knew the subtil wit of Gordon the earle of Huntley, and that his wife (a chaste and rare woman) had passed all the rest of hir life within the bounds of womanlie modestie; they were all easilie perswaded, that he alone was author vnto hir of that wicked counsell. Wherevpon, Gordon being now cast in prison for that fact, there was (in a counsell holden by the regent) great contention and varietie of opinions, touching the punishment which he should haue. For some would haue him banished into France for certeine yeares, & some would onelie haue an excessiue mule to be laied vpon him.

Both which opinions were reiectid by the chiefe of his enemies, Gilbert earle of Caillies. For he, perceiving by the present state of things, that peace would not long continue betwene Scotland and France; did bitterlie wish and his banishment into that countrie. For he would not haue that man (being so subtille and vnconstantlie witted, proud, and desirous of reuenge, of and vpon such as were envious, or backbiters against him) to be a freyhand and capteine to those French, who (he was assured, for their insolent pride) would haue warre with the Scots. For although he thought, that of right he ought to be punished, yet he did not iudge, that anie domesticall euill was so much, or the punishment thereof should be thought so great, that they should accustome the French to shed the Scottish blood. Wherefore at length his punishment was agreed vpon (as after shall appeare) in renouncing of all his right to the earldome of Purreie, & other things.

The quene hauing the disposition of all things, did at hir pleasure change all the officers, and made the earle of Caillies treasurer, & Wellmoit a Frenchman controller; also an other Frenchman called monsieur Rubie, keeper of the great seale, as vicegerent in place of the earle of Huntley, who was chancelor; and then in ward; and James Machill register, and the abbat of Couper keeper of the priuie seale, as saith Lesleus, lib. 10. pag. 521. Heur Doffels the bled principallie in all things. The earle of Huntieie being to be deliuered out of ward, did for his punishment renounce his title to the earldome of Murreie; whereof he had a gift in heritage. Also he renounced his interest unto the farmes of Mkenzie and Sheatland, and to the earldome of Mar, and of the quenes lands of Straits Die: and further was contented to go ouer into France, there to remaine for the space of five yeares. But yet afterwards the quene was contented, that he should still remaine within the realme, for the which he gaue to hir five thousand pounds in monie.

* About the same time Marie the quene of England, and the regent of Scotland, thought good to haue a peace betwene both nations, and that their commissioners should meet to determine all controuersies. At what time for the Scots, were Robert of Minwardie, and John Bellenden of Achknowle knights: and for the English, were Thomas Cornwallesse, and Robert Bowes knights. At what time there were lawes made touching fishing, aswell in the sea, as in certeine other limited riuers; by which all occasions of contention was taken awaie from both nations. Richard Foxton, a man of great counsell in prosperitie, and of great stomach in aduersitie, being captaine of Porham castell in England, was at that time cause of the making of this law for the commons; That if anie Englishman from a Scot, or a Scot from an Englishman, did by force take away anie fish that was taken; that he should paie the mult of twentie shillings for the same: beside other punishments of the common law.

Further it was agreed, that whosoever by force of tempest, or for anie other cause, were driuen into Scotland or England, he should not by anie present be staied; but he might fraile by land or sea, either on horsebacke or on foot returne home. Provided, that he had the testimonie of the next maister of the port, or of the next towne, to witnes the cause of his arriual; and that during the time of his abode in such a countrie, he attempted nothing against the lawes of the kingdome. Not manie daies after this, Henrie Shiclere deane of Glasgow, senator, and vicepresident of the high court, did returne into Scotland out of France; being a man greatlie familiar with James the first, aswell for the singulartie of his wit, as the excellencie of his learning.

But in the time of the gouernor, the courtiers (not greatlie esteeming such wisdome & learning) made no account of him, although the quene Dowager, and diuerse of the nobilitie held him in great honor; aswell for his deepe studie in the best arts, as for his rare knowledge of the publike lawes and antiquities of Scotland. This man, upon his first returne, was forthwith both author and persuader to and of the bishop of the Orkades chiefe president, and to the other senators; that there should be new lawes made for the short ending of lutes in law; for the obseruation of a right course of iudgments, and for the taking awaie of all euill customs. In the making & tempering whereof, he was of so great iustice; that such things as were set downe in the law, were more holie and perfectlie brought to their ancient forme than they had bene before.

The reason is readie; to wit, aswell for that in equall deliuering law to all men: as in pleading, there was by his meanes more diligence used by the magistrats, aduocats, scribes, and officers; in cutting awaie vaine and superfluous formes and orders: which ministred occasion, that their lutes did long hang in court, before they could be determined. At this time also the marquesse of Spaine (being after made duke of Almaine) who in the meane time with manie other nobles of France, had remained pledges in England, did (hauing licence thereunto) come into Scotland to see his sister, accompanied with sir Thomas Stewkleie of England now knight; who after he had remained some daies with his sister in pleasure & delight, discharged his faith, and returned againe into England.]

In Iulie was a parlement held at Edinburgh, in the which manie acts and statutes were made, right profitable (as was then thought) for the common-weale of the realme. Amongest which, to passe ouer the rest, these same two shold to remaine promiscled to posteritie. First, that none of the citizens (in the feasts of Whitson tide, or anie such times, in which their hirelings are accustomed to go forth) shold assemble armed, to cast forth the husbandmen after the old maner. Secondlie, that the inhabitants meeting together, shold no more assemble vnder a certeine colour of game, which for exercise of the bodie (as it was supposed) was holden after the example of one (I can not tell who) Robert Hood a wild or vplandish man. Thirdlie, that there shold be no priuat leagues contracted betwene subiects. Which lawes did after bring great peace, ease, and quiet to the publike state.

In the verie same yeare 1555, in the eight hundred and August, fell the mariage of Marie quene of England with Philip king of Spaine in the citie of Winchester. Wherefore ambassadors were sent from the quene regent to Philip and Marie, to congratulate their mariage. Besides which, these ambassadors did requite a renewing of the league, and that commissioners shold be appointed to meet the next summer in the borders, to end all controuersies. In the meane time, whilist the quene regent did administer the affaires of south Scotland, John Stewart earle of Atholl was sent into the north parts with a chosen compaignie, to breake the force of John Mubard or Muderace. At what time this earle bled such courtesie and counsell in pacifieng, and such celeritie and wisdome in executing of things; that he brought the seditious Mubard (impatient to haue anie gouernor) to the quene, to whom the said Mubard did willinglie yeld himselfe, his children, and his kindred.

To which man, the quene (in respect of singular clemencie, and pietie to all men, according to the disposition of his nature) did wholie remit all his offenses, with this condition; that he shold faithfully remaine prisoner in the castell of Speffens, and in the towne of Perth. But as the for (as the proverbe is amongest vs) cannot liue without his starting holes; so this Mubard and his companions, imbued with more than forlike conditions, did (deceiuing their keepers) returne to their owne causes, and afresh trouble all the north Scotland with their raised seditions and spoiles. Which things enforced the quene, that she did go into those parts, to hold iustice of oces: in which she might bridle the euils of wicked men, and purge those prouinces from all the roots of sedition.

Whereupon, in the moneth of Iulie, the quene accompanied with the earles of Huntieie, Argile, Rothes, Camille, and Marthall, the bishop of Aberdeen and Koffe, D. Doffell, Rubie, and others, went to the towne of Inuernesse, in which citie (the faults known by publike accusation) there was iust punishment taken upon the offenders. And because there were manie hidden in the higher and mounteine countries, which by their absence fled the punishment; the commanded the heads of the mounteine families, that they shold bring their guiltie countermen and kindred to iudgement, according to the law established by James the first; with a great paine paine set vpon the chiefe of those families ; if the other did stidie resist, & would not come into iudgement.

Whereupon it followed, that sundrie of diuerse families, that were by contempt departed auaite, did come to publike iudgement. Where manie, and those not of the meanest sort, paid the punishment for troubling the peace; amongst which, one Grant a baron being commanded to bring James Grant and diuerse other wicked persons before the iudges, did prouide to bring their dead heads, when they could not take their liue bodies. The earle of Cathness also, because that being warned therunto, he did not bring his people before the iudges; was first committed to prison in Inuerness, then at Aberdeen, and lastlie at Edinburgh, from whence he purchased his libertie with a great masse of monie.

Macchie in like sort, head and chiefe of the tribe of Strathnauerne & of Glencone, being called to iudgement (for that he had often wasted the countrie of Southerland next adioining) did contemne the precept. Whereupon the quene prouided a great armie, which vnder the erle of Southerland brake into Strathnauerne, where he possessed all the places of doubt, least anie hole might be left for the thienes to passe auaite from thence. Whereupon Macchie, when he saw himselfe so beset (as that no place of flight was left him) yelded himselfe to Hugh Kenedie, who led him to the quene, by whom he was committed to prison at Edinburgh a long time, but they of Glencone put in pledges, & (being committed to safe and strong prisons) were reserued to the iudgement of the quenes pleasure.

After this, the quene leauing Inuerness, and progressing the prouince of Koss, she came to Elgine, Bamf, Aberdeen, and the chiefe places thereabouts, diligentlie to inquire of the misdemeanors of those people. At what time she did temper the rigor of law with such courtesie, that she punished the offenders by fine, and not by death. From thence she came to Dundee, and to saint Johns towne, obseruing the same cause and course of hir coming. When she had thus passed ouer the summer in bringing the mountaine people to their dutie, she sent the earle of Huntlie to ioine with the bishop of Koss and Kenedie, and to Hugh Kenedie; to whom she did substitute a better and more commodious forme of dispatch of their affaires by others: who should receiue the libels and accusations of priuate persons, and diligentlie to inquire of them, in the townes of Inuerness, Elgine, and other places. By whose diligence it came to passe, that all those countreies (being reduced to the rule of iustice) were made the more quiet.

Here I will not (saith Lesleus) now declare how honourable & sumptuouslie the quene in all hir progress was receiued (without anie charge to hir) of the peeres, bishops, and other nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, with the Frenchmen (which were then present with hir) haue opened to other nations as well as to their owne people (with singular commendations to the Scots) the gorgeous shew of this Scotland, being a most wondrous signe of the fauour they bare to the quene. In the meane time there were sent commissioners to the borders, as the bishop of Dunblane, the lord of Lethington, & maister James Macgill: where doctor Tunstall bishop of Durham, & certeine others for England met them at Duns, and remained there till the quenes coming backe forth of the north in September next following.

This yeere was a parlement holden, in which the lords Bymston, Dymilton, and Grange, with maister Henrie Walnaues, and others, which were for salted in the gouernors time, were restored. At the same time the quene, by the counsell of monsieur Doissell, and Rubie, and certeine of the nobilitie of Scotland, requested that a new order might be made, whereby euerie mans substance should be put in an inuentarie, and according to the rate thereof to paie a perrelie taxation, to be put and kept in the treasure-houise till warres began, and that then men of warre might be waged, therewith to lie vpon the borders, and none in that case to be charged to come from their owne houses, but when anie great armie came forth of England to inuade Scotland.

Diuerse of the great lords were agreed to this ordinance: but the most part of the barons hearing thereof, assembled together in Edinburgh, to the number of two hundred & above, and sent the lords James Sandlandie of Calder in Louthian, and John of Wlemis in Fife, to the quene and lords, beseeching them not to set such new taxations vpon them, for they could not beare such burdens; but would defend the realme, as before time their elders had done, not meaning to put their goods in inuentarie, as if they should already make their last will and testaments: and be past all hope of inticing their temporall goods, as persons not to liue longer in the world, but to take their farewell, and giue ouer all that they had by law of fatall necessitie not to be auoided. Adding further, that their elders did not onelie defend themselves, and their goods against the English, when they were of farre greater power than they now be; but did also manie times make further inuasion vpon them into their owne countrie. For which cause, they being not anie lot now so degenerat from their ancestors, that they would not, when need required, bestow their substance and life in defense of their countrie.

And as touching the hired souldiers, it was a thing full of danger, to commit the state of Scotland to men without substance, or without hope of advancement, and to such as for monie will dare to do anie thing, being a thing apt to kindle their deepe couetousnesse, and to minister occasion to them to attempt other matters. But to the end all other things may the better be looked vnto, let them more remember the deuities of their countrie, than their owne estate or condition. For will anie man beleue, that hired souldiers will more valiantlie fight for strangers, than the owners will fight for the defense of their owne? That a little hire or wages readie to be abated in peace, will greatlier incense the minds of the common people; than gods, children, wiues, and temples, will moue the hearts of the nobilitie?

Whereunto may be ioined, that this matter perticeth to the highest god of the kingdom of Scotland, and that the same is of farre more importance than that it should be communed of at this time, and in the tender age of our young quene. Besides which the greater part of men do suspect and feare, that the same new order for warre is vnprofitable, and such as cannot be perfozmed without some commotion of the Scottish nation, especiallie with so great sums of monie can hardlie be wozong out by tribute imposed on the same Scots; as may suffice to nourish a hired armie to defend the borders. Wherefore it is to be feared, least the end of persuation grow to this point, that it do not rather open a gap to let in the enimie, than to be a barre to keepe them backe. For if the English, after this example, being a farre richer nation, shall gather a much greater summe: who doubteth, but that they may with lesse trouble to the comon people, susseine an armie twise as great as that of the Scots, & such as shall not onelie enter the borders, but rush euery into the very bowels of the king, kingdome of Scotland.

For the other part of the oration, I cannot tell whether it be better to suppress it in silence, or to deliver it (saith Buchanan) to common eyes & eares. For I do heare (writeth he) manie which do murmur and aske who shall gather this monie? How much thereof shall be necessarie to and for the hired soldiers, and how much to be left in the hands of the treasurer? There be manie things which put vs in great hope, that no such thing shall be established for the especiall godnesse and temperancie of that worthy princeesse (in whose hand the whole government now resteth) doth encourage vs, that we shall not be so taxed. But yet when we remember the outward deeds of others, and our owne at home, which haue before time bene done; we cannot so gouerne our selues, but that we must feare the same hereafter to fall vpon vs, which we haue already felt.

But letting these things passe, which perchance we bainele feare, let vs come to those things in which our ancestors did place their chiefe helpe (for maintenance of their libertie) against the weapons of their aduersaries. Robert the first of that name (in comparison of whome none of the Scottish kings were counted more wise, and without all doubt none more valiant, as we all confesse) did not onelie profit his subjects whilst he liued, but also after his death: for when he laid at point to surrender his life, he gaue this admonition, that we should neuer make continuall peace, nor long truce with the English. For that man (by nature and by vse of long time exercised in both fortunes) did well perceiue, that such as liued in idleness and sloth, had their stomacks and minds abated, and their bodies weakened with delights of pleasures, and that couetousnesse and lecherie did spring vp as it were in untilled ground, when severe discipline and sparing was quenched, which made them also to be impatient of labor, and to hate battell, whereby their strength being diminished, they should easilie giue place to their enemies.

After that these two noble men had said thus much, the regent fearing tumultuous insurrections if he persevered in this exaction, left off anie further to pursue this far, and is (in often acknowledging his error) said to haue vsed this speech; That some of the best of the Scots, and not the worst, were authors and workers of the same. By which words manie supposed that he ment the earle Huntley, a man of a sharpe wit, lately deliuered out of prison, and rather readie to reuenge the iniurie receiued by restraint of his libertie, than mindfull of anie benefit shewed vnto him in his deliuerance. Wherefore when he saw the regent bent to this one thing to inure the Scots with taxes and payments of monie: and fearing least his power being ouermuch increased, that he would abate the strength of the nobilitie, diminish their authoritie, and call the whole government of Scotland into the hands of his people, it was supposed that he gaue his counsell answerable to his disposition for the gathering of monie which he had then in hand, being in deed the part of an enemy to him, because he knew that the Scots would not paie anie tribute, nor be so obedient vnto him as they had bene before. There were also some that supposed this deuise to grow from David Painter bishop of Ross; for he being a man of rare wit, and no lesse learning, was with manie benefits tied to the Hamiltons, and was not anie waie estranged from their counsels and kinreds.

In this yeere, an ambassadoe of Muscouie going into England with a great ship, & another bote, was cast on land by sudden tempest of the sea in the coast of Buchquane, a prouince in the north part of Scotland; who hauing lost all his goods by shipwacke, was saued himselfe, and some of his companie, because they lighted on a rocke, where he & they might saue their liues. The inhabitants did liberallie intertaine this strange man, and brought him to Edinburgh to the quene, who would not permit this new guest to want anie thing so long as he remained with hir: and further, commanded and procured, that his goods lost by sea, and come into the hands of the people, should be faithfullie restored to him againe, appointing moreouer the lord Hume for honors sake to accompanie him to Berwike.

This yeere also in the moneth of Iulie was Peter Traberne sent ambassadoe (from Anna duke of Wendenberge, and Delmensoze, and earle of Emden) out of east Frisia into Scotland, to require that the ancient covenant of an hundred yeeres made betwene the Scots and the people of Emden (which by course of some yeeres past, was now of no force) might now againe be renewed. Which being granted & solemnlie established, both those nations from that day did liue togither in mutual & perfect friendship. After this, warres arising betwene England and France, quene Marie of England, fearing least the Scots would be stirred at the motion of the French to attempt something against England, sent ambassadoes to the regent, to require that some of the Scots might with his people meet on the borders, to treat of matters belonging vnto them both.

Wherevpon in the moneth of Iulie, the procurators for both the kingdomes met at Caerleill, whither for the Scots came Robert Reid bishop of Dornie, Henrie Heintclere deane of Glasgow, Robert Carnegie knight, senators, and the lord Harries, at that time president of the west borders. For the English did come Tunstall bishop of Durham, the lords Dacres, and Wharton; amongst whom there was talke for peace, and recompense of such iniuries as were committed by both the nations. In the meane time a certaine Frenchman landed at the west part on Scotland, and declared to the quene the warres betwene England and France, desiring him to make warre vpon the English. Wherevpon the quene sent for the lords to commune with them at Newbottell, where she opened to them diuerse wrongs done on the borders by Englishmen, and how no redress could be got: wherefore she required that warres might be moued against England in reuenge of those iniuries, although the bishop of Dornie was the same time at Caerleill in talke with Cutbert Tunstall bishop of Durham and others, commissioners for England. The principall cause that moued the quene regent to seeke to make war against England, was for that the Englishmen aided the Emperour in fauor of his sonne king Philip against the French king, because their quene had taken to husband the same king Philip, and sent the earle of Penbrooke ouer with an armie to ioine with king Philips power.

It was thought therefore, that if the Scots invaded the English borders, it might cause them to call backe their power south of France to defend their owne countrie. But the Scottish lords would not consent in anie wise to begin anie warres: which their dealing when monseigneur Dossell perceiued, he speedily went to Walsmouth beside Berwike, and fortified the same with all diligence, making inuasions into England. Wherevpon the Scottishmen in their owne defense were constrained to make warre, and the earle of Huntley was made lieutenant vpon the borders, who came thither; and remaining there by the assistance of the Frenchmen, made sundrie inuasions and rodes into England, burnt diuers townes and villages, and cast downe manie stone houses, piles

Foster.

In this meane tyme were the Scottish commissioners at Caerleill; and the maister of Sparwell warden of the west borders, being there with them, with much adoe got away and came home into Scotland.
The quene assembled a great armie out of all parts of the realme, the which came forthward to Kello in the moneth of October, where the quene & French men perswaded them to enter by invasion into England. But they meaning to take further advise, passed ouer Tweed to Sparwell hugh, where they incam-ped, and afterward approached the castell of Marke, invironing the same with a siege for the space of two or thre daies. Capteine Read at that present had charge of that castell, with thre or foure hundred souldiers, and one hundred horsemen, seeming to care little for the Scottish mens forces.

The earle of Westmerland, being then lieutenant of the north parts, gathered such power together as he might make, and came to Lowike, accompanied with the lord Talbot, sir James Crofts, and others, to succor where most need should appeare. The Scottish armie, perceiuing the Englishmen thus in a readinesse to resist their attempts, took advise to gether, and concluded that it was not for the weale of the realme, at that time to hazard battell forth of the bounds of their owne land, their princeesse being absent, and as yet in hir minority; considering also that the war was not taken in hand for their owne quarrell, but for the pleasure of France. These and other the like reasons, being alleged by the earles of Arrane, Huntley, Argyle, Castles, and others, to the quene and French capteins, they were nothing satisfied therewith; but the Scottish lordes would attempt no further, but retired backe and scaled their armie.

In removing from Marke, they were pursued by certeine bands of the borders, and others, which were repelled, and stood in danger to haue bene distressed, if capteine Read had not with noble corage issued forth, and in time relieved them that were retiring: whereby they staid and gaue a new charge, inasmuch as the Scots were beaten backe againe, and chased ouer the water to their maine armie that was alreadye passed ouer. The quene and monsieur Doisell, perceiuing that they could not get the Sco-tish lordes to make anie further exploit at that present, they retired home; but Doisell with his French men were appointed to remaine still in Halmouth, to countergarrison the Englishmen within Ber-wikke.

There were diuerse sot bands of Scots waged by the French king, which were appointed to lie in places about the borders, as at Kello, Rockesburgh, and such like for defense of the countrie, and the annoyance of the Englishmen, as occasions might serue. After this, sir Andrew Har, and diuerse other entered England with a power of men about Spar-tinnasse. Neuerthelesse, the earle of Northumberland, being then lieutenant of the north parts of England, and lieng on the borders, assembled his forces together, & comming to incounter the Scots on the very borders side nere to Cheuio, at the first the Englishmen were put to the worke, but yet at length the Scots were ouerthrowne and chased: sir Andrew Har, and manie other being taken prisoners.

Sir John Foster bare himselfe verie valiantlie at this incounter, so that his seruice might not well haue bene spared. He was thrust through the mouth into the necke, and also through the thigh; moreover, his horse was slaine vnder him. The conflict was sharpe, for both the horsemen and souldiers came to make proue of their forces. The warre thus being begun and folloved, the Scots kept their quarter, rage, and euerie noble man (as he was appointed) laie on the borders with a thousand horsemen, during his ordinarie tearme. And on the other side, the English borders were furnished with new supplies of men of warre, so that there were daillie robes and incursions made by the parties, to the great damage and spoile of the towne and villages situate nere to the confines of both the realmes.

In December the quene assembled a parlement at Edinburgh, where shee (highlie fauouring the French) shewed forth the letters of Henrie king of France, to be read by the whole assemblee, touching the solemnization of the mariage betwene the yong quene of Scots, and the French kings sonne, which I haue here set downe.

A parlement.

The substance of the letter of the French king, concerning the ma- riage of his sonne to the queene of Scots.

Enrie by the grace of God, king of the French, to his worthie cosines & princes of Scotland, and to the rest of the orders, being our deere friends, greeting. It is most plainlie knowen to all nations, how fast a bond hath alwaies hitherto remained betwene Scotland & France. Neither can it be hidden what these signs of amitie were, being for number manie, for great-nesse large, and for dutie of friendship mutuall ech to other; by which the kings our ancestors haue seemed to confirme, and as it were, to increate this amitie, to the end it might remaine whole and sound for euer: yea and so farre the shew thereof hath appeared, that all the benefites of either realme haue seemed to be common to ech other. Which bond of friendship we also haue (for the time in which we first receiued the ensignes of our kingdome) labored firmelie to re-teine, to the end the same should not anie waie be decaied or broken. The which in like sort we well understand, that you haue likewise abundantly perfozmed vnto vs.

Lesleus lib. 10.
pag. 333.

Wherefore (more strongly to knit the same) we will not suffer this oportunitie (which the diuine godnesse hath laied before vs, as we verelie suppose) of mariage to be solemnized betwene our son the Dolphin, and your quene our deere and sweet sister and daughter. Which thing (after that it began to be intreated) was so bzged by all parts, as the yong quene was vpon that condition left with vs, when she was caried into France, by the consent of our sister the Dowager, and the gouernor of Scotland, to the great reioysing of all you that yelded therevnto; where now she hath attained such beautie and number of vertues, partlie by the liberalitie of nature (which she receiued from the kinglie blood of hir parents) and partlie by the instruction of my wife, that I can hardlye anie longer suffer (in respect of the age of my sonne) that this mariage (which we haue so much desired) should anie longer be deferred. And sith at Christmasse next my son shall come to those peeres, in which he may promise all things that shall be necessarie for the knitting vp of the mariage; and sith also we haue determined (if it so seme good to the quene hir mother, and to the rest of the parlement of Scotland, which we earnestly request at your hands) that the mariage shall publikelie at Paris (on the day consecrated to the thre kings) with such ceremonies as is requisite, be fullie consummate with the speech of my sonne and of your quene:

We do by these letters request you, that by common consent you forthwith send some of your chiefe nobilitie,

A. I.

nobilitie, that maie honoꝝ the mariage with their presence, and that (hauing publike authoritie therfore) may frelie and according to law, dispose of those things which are accustomed to fall in such matters and affaires.

The which if you shall do, I promise that hereafter they shall liberallie vnderstand how acceptable they shall be to me: and how that you shall receiue all the fruit and benefit which shall arise of my sons marriage (foꝝ the performance whereof, by reason of his sufficient age, we will shortly prouide) which said commodity shall not onelie now remaine to you that be present, but also most abundantlie with great pleasure shall continue to your posteritie. Foꝝ sith both our and your people of France and Scotland shall be so firmelie conioined (as we hope) by this mutuall knot of mariage, and our affaires with yours, and yours with ours, shall hang the one vpon the other, as it were by a certeine mutuall linke and knot, that both we (being out of the danger of such as would diminish and ouerthrow our states) maie foꝝ euer enjoy such quiet as we did neuer hope to haue before this. From our castell of saint Germans, the fourth kalends of Nouember. 1557.

Subscription, By the king, Henric:
A little below: De Laubespinc.

Upon the reading of which letters in the parliament, by the consent of the whole estates, there were elected and chosen James Beton archbishop of Glasgow, Robert Keab bishop of Dikeneie, George Leslie earle of Rothes, Gilbert Kennedy earle of Cassilis, James Stewart prior of saint Andrewes [the quenes bastard brother] George lord Seton [capitaine of Edinburgh] James Fleming, and John Erskine lord of Dun [gouernor of Montrose] ambassadors and commissioners to go into France, and there to contract mariage betwixt Marie quene of Scotland, and Francis Dolphin of France, and to solemnize the same mariage. Whereupon, sufficient commissions and instruments were made to them by the estates of the parlement, and they accepting the same, made preparation foꝝ that iourne, and departed in the moneth of Februarie forth of the roode of Leith, and with great winds & boisterous stormes came into France, losing in their iourne one of their ships, with men and horses before saint Ebbes head, in the Forth of Scotland, and an other with great riches & manie gentlemen, with the capitaine called Waterton in the roode of Bullongne.

The ambassadors themselves neuertheless escaped, and comming safe vnto the French court in the moneth of March, were honorablie receiued of the king at Paris, where the contract of mariage was made, and thre score thousand franks assigned in dowrie to the quene of Scotland, & thirtie thousand franks of pærelie pension, with manie rich iewels. There was also a perpetuall bond of league concluded betwixt France and Scotland, and great preparation made foꝝ the mariage, which was solemnized in Paris with great triumph and assistance of all the cardinals, dukes, earles, barons, lords, and bishops of the realme, in the church of Noſtre dame, the 24 of Aprill in that present yeere, 1558.

After the solemnitie of this mariage, the legats of Scotland were called into the counsell-house of the French king: at what time the chancellor of France deliuered to them, that they should represent the crowne and scepter, and other ornaments of the kingdome, to the end the husband of the pong quene might be crowned king also of Scotland. Wherevnto the ambassadors did shortly make answer, that they had no such thing giuen in charge to them. After which, the cardinall said: We desire nothing moꝝe at your hands at this time, but that which lieth in your power to performe: which is, here now to confirme by writing that you will hereafter, foꝝward, approue & woꝝke that this honoꝝ (which now we iustlie demand) maie be granted to the Dolphin, when the same shall be talked of in the parlement of Scotland. Which request (when it seemed full of impudencie) they supposed best moꝝe constantlie and sharpelie to reiect.

Wherefoꝝ they answered, that their ambassage was restrained within certeine bounds, which they neither could nor would exceed. But and if they had bene sent with free libertie of their ambassage, that yet it were not the part of faithfull friends (as the French professed to be) to require that which could not be granted without certeine and assured danger and infamie of treason, though danger of life were absent from it. All which notwithstanding, in all honest things which might well be granted they would yield vnto the French, ioined vnto them by so manie necessarie occasions. Wherefoꝝ they requested the French that they would not in their demands exceed the limits of modestie.

Whereupon the ambassadors being dismissed from the court, foure of the chiefe of them (before they departed home) which were these, Gilbert Kennedy, George Leslie, Robert Keab, and also James Fleming, all men of singular vertue and loue to their countrie, besides manie other of the companie, died there, not without mistrust of poison. It was also beleued, that James the quenes brother had receiued the same draught: foꝝ (although he were of a better composition of bodie, stronger constitution of complexion, and of moꝝe youthfull strength, whereby he escaped death) he had alwaies after a continuall and dangerous infirmitie of his bellie whilest he liued, of the death of all which shall be somewhat moꝝe said hereafter. Thus leauing the Scottish lords ambassadors there in France foꝝ a time, we will returne to shew what happened betwixt the Scots and Englishmen at home, where the warres were pursued, to the losse oꝝ little gaine of both parts.]

About Whitfuntide, sir Henric Perrie with diuerse bands of the countrie garrisons, & sir George Woives then marshall of Berwik, with sundrie bands of the garrison of that towne, passed forth into Scotland, they being in all about seven oꝝ eight hundred horsemen, and two thousand footmen. They burnt the townes of Duns and Langton; and hauing got together a great number of cattell, returned homewards. The Scots that laie in Kelso, and other places, keeping their quarterage on their borders (foꝝ the realme, as ye haue heard, was quartered, euery part keeping their turne, as the manner is) assembled together to the number of two thousand horsemen (oꝝ few lesse) and thre bands of footmen, halting forth to defend the countrie. And perceiving where the Englishmen were, followed and coasted them as they returned with their bootie, till they came to Swinton, where they overtake them, and skirmished with them sharplie as they were passing through the towne.

The Scottish footmen beat backe part of the Englishmen shot into their battell, and pressed befie foꝝward in hope to be assisted by their horsemen, the which (as ye haue heard) overmatched greatlie the English horsemen in number: but the fight grew somewhat hot, and the moꝝe vnto the disadvantage of the Englishmen, foꝝ so much as their shot & powder began to faile them, by reason the mistie morning had made much of their powder bankish, so that they could haue no vse thereof. But herewith sir Henric Le, capitaine Keab, and others, being in the battell, behaued themselves verie stoutlie, causing the the footmen to state, and boldlie to abide the enimie : & herewith procured the horsemen to giue a charge in such conuenient time, as if the same had bene protracted, it might haue turned verie euill to the English side.

The Scots horsemen fled.

But now as well the horsemen as footmen playing their parts, the Scottish horsemen abiding with out the towne in troope (while their footmen were in skirmish) fled awaie, leaving their footmen to be slaine and spoiled of the Englishmen, and yet those footmen fought it out right manfullie : so that if the Scots horsemen had done their parts so well as the footmen, it was like to haue gone harder on the English side than it did. But now the Scottish horsemen not entring the fight, their footmen were inclosed by the Englishmen : for those that were in the foreward, and were passed by, returned, and coming behind their enimies, holpe to beat them downe, so that few or none of the Scots or Frenchmen (whereof there were some few amongst them) escaped, but were either taken or slaine.

The Scots footmen slaine.

The lord of Keith with others taken prisoners.

Amongest others, capteine Cullane, and capteine Benedie, two chiefe leaders of the footmen were taken : diuerse of their horsemen also in the retire were taken, amongst whome William lord Keith, sonne to the earle Marhall of Scotland was the chiefe. But this victorie was not atchieued without losse of diuerse Englishmen. Amongest other one Bell, ensigne-bearer to sir John Parkhams band of footmen was slaine. Also master Edzington a capteine of light horsemen was taken prisoner by the lord of Edmonstoun, at the first charge giuen vpon the Scottish horsemen, and led awaie without rescue. Beside the manfull prowesse of sir Henrie Persie, and the other English capteins before mentioned, the forward valiantie shewed that day of sir William Bereton, and Thomas Parkham, that led his father sir John Parkhams band of footmen, also of Rafe Ellerkar a capteine of horsemen, are not to be forgotten, who with diuerse other capteins & souldiers behaued themselves in such wise at that present seruice, as their dealings therein deserue speciall memorie.

Mr. Edzington taken.

Sir William Bereton.

Afterouer, at an other time the Scots & Frenchmen entring into England, the Scottish horsemen, to the number of a thousand or thereabouts, passed forth to burne and forraie the countrie: but the earle of Northumberland, & his brother sir Henrie Persie, assembled together a power of horsemen: and sir Henrie Persie meeting with them at Grendon, set vpon the Scots and chased them ouer the water of Twissell, vnto the foot battell of the Frenchmen: who retiring to the riuer of Tweed, passed ouer the same at Chapell Ffourd, where they were assailed both by certeine foot bands of the garrison of Berwick, that were come forth to aid the earle, and also by the horsemen: so as diuerse were drowned in the riuer before they could get ouer.

The Scots put to flight at Grendon.

But after they were once got to the further side, they put themselves in order of battell againe, and retired in a squadron verie stronglie, sustaining little or no hurt at all, notwithstanding that the earle of Northumberland (being then come) and his brother sir Henrie Persie, with the rest of the capteins and gentlemen of the countrie, pursued them ouer the water for the space of two miles, skirmishing with them still as they marched awaie, but could doe them no harme, because they kept themselves in so good order, & the English footmen were not able to reach them. Wherevpon the English horsemen suffering the Frenchmen to depart, left them, and passing into the countrie, burnt long Ednam, and diuerse other hamlets and villages, and so returned. their horsemen were taken prisoners, as the lord Crete, and others.

And after this, the Englishmen won the strong pile of Catwills, wherein were sixtene Frenchmen that defended it for the time verie stoutlie, so that it cost the liues of diuerse Englishmen, before they could take it. Shortly after, there was a fore skirmish at Halidon hill, for whereas the most part of summer it was ordeined, that euerie baie certeine bands of souldiers should ward on the same hill, to giue libertie to the inhabitants of Berwick, to mow and carie in their baie; they continued for a time without anie trouble offered by the Scots or French, so that the warders standing in no doubt of the enimies, vied out of their armor to shoot, bowle, quaff, & exercise such like games of pleasure. Whereof the Scots & Frenchmen being aduertised, came one day from Alnouth in so secret wise, that they were drawn verie nere to the Englishmen, yet they had anie warning of their approach.

This approach as it was private, so was it likewise sudden, inso much that before they could be got into order, the Scots and Frenchmen were almost at their elbowes; and falling in skirmish with them, handled them verie roughlie: although sir William Bereton, sir John Parkham, master William Dzelozie, Cutbert Maughan, and other the capteins of the Englishmen did behaue themselves right manfullie, bringing their men in order, incouraging them, and doing what appertained vnto hardie and skillfull warriors. But yet three times that day the Scots and Frenchmen put them from the high of the hill, till at length sir James Cross coming from Berwick, vied such diligence and policie in the matter, that the Scots and Frenchmen were repelled and constrained to retire, withdrawing backe into Alnouth, after they had continued in skirmish from one of the clocke till it was past foure with no small losse on both parts.

After this, the earle of Northwell, lieng on the borders as lieutenant, according to the order for the time of his quarterage, entred on a day into England, and sent his forraie to burne Fenton towne, keeping himselfe in ambush at Halthwell Sweire. Sir Henrie Persie aduertised that the Scots were thus entred, got together a thousand horse, and making forth to defend the countrie, set vpon the earle at the aforesaid place of Halthwell Sweire; but some feare entring into the hearts of the Englishmen, by reason of certeine shot which the Scots had there with them, fled, and were pursued by the Scots ouer the water of Till. There were taken aboute sir scoze Englishmen, amongst whom capteine Crington, and capteine Kar, that had the leading of light horsemen, were two: beside diuerse other men of good account in seruice, as one Maughan a gentleman and such like.

About this time, whilest the lord Cure commonlie called Cuers, remained capteine of Berwick, one Kirkhandie couline to sir William Kirkhandie lord of Grange, chanced to be taken prisoner into Berwick; and after wards being ransomed, at his coming home to Alnouth, he made report that he had bene two frendlie vied, during the time that he remained prisoner, at the hands of the said lord Cure. By reason whereof, vpon challenge made by Grange to fight a combat with the lord Cure, the matter grew to this issue; that where their degrees were not equall, Rafe Cure brother to the lord Cure undertooke (in his brothers behalfe) to breake a staffe with the lord of Grange vpon the side of Halidon hill at a day appointed: where they met, either of them bringing twelue gentlemen with them, to see the trial of this challenge performed.

The death of Suffer burnt the Isle of Orkney.

But when they came to have their armor & weapons divided, the truth is so, that Orange was armed in a coat of plate, and a curace aloft upon it: whereunto some fault was found, because master Cure was clad onlie in a single coat of plate, without any other pieces of armor for defense of his body. But yet such was the great courage of the said master Cure, that he would not refuse the challenge, notwithstanding his adversaries advantage of armor. Whereupon they ran together, and brake both their spears, and as it fastened master Cure was hurt in the flank. The warre being thus pursued betwixt England and Scotland, beside the encounters and roads which are before mentioned, there were three great roads made into Scotland: the one by the earle of Northumberland, and the other by the earle of Northumberland: the lord Talbot being there, & having the leading of certaine demulances.

Whereupon it was thought good by the Englishmen, not onlie to annoy the Scots by land, but also by sea. Whereupon Sir John Clerk with certaine ships of warre sailed south alongest the coast, till at length he arrived at the Isles of Orkney; where going on land about an enterprize, & staying longer than was requisite, he was encountered by his adversaries, and slaine with manie of his people, which were there on land with him. But though the Scots had good successe in that part, they sustained great damage on the west side of the realme, by a tourment which the earle of Suffer then lord deputie of Ire and attempted against them. For the better understanding whereof ye shall note, that after the lord Clinton high admirall of England had burnt the towne of Conque in Britaine, there were seven ships of warre appointed to passe into Ireland, as the Marie Walsingham, the Stern barke, the Sacree, the Gerseholon, and three other that were merchants, and appointed that yeate to serve the quene of England in her warres.

There were also beside these seven ships of warre, two hirtollers appointed to attend upon them. Sir Thomas Cotton was choise their admirall, and one Southwicks of Dover was assigned to be their viceadmirall. Some upon their arrivall in Ireland, the earle of Suffer having also prepared three other ships, with sufficient and necessarie provision for his journey, embarked with so manie souldiers as convenient might be bestowed aboard in that fleet, containing twelve saile in the whole; and departing toward the west of Scotland, landed not in a part of the countie called Kentire, with as manie souldiers and mariners as might be spared out of the ships, leaving them furnished with competent numbers for their safeguard; and being got to land, he passed south into the countie, & burnt five houses that belonged to James Macdonnell chiefe governor of those parts, & a great crueltie to the Englishmen.

He burnt also diverse townes, villages, and hamlets belonging unto the said Macdonnell, with great store of corne and other things which came in their way. The Scots oftentimes skirmished with the Englishmen, but durst not adventure to joine with them in battell, they kept so good order by the earle of Suffer his politike and valiant conduction. There were a few of Scots gotten into a boate meaning to have fled, but being apprehended by the Englishmen, they were executed. Finally, after the earle had remained there on land, in burning and spoiling the countie for the space of three daies, he returned to his ships, and in safetie went aboard againe with his men, and making saile to the Ile of Arrane, entered the haven called Amalaich, and landing at that place, burnt the countie, and after went to Cumber, where he likewise burnt and barried that Ile.

This done, he meant to have gone into two other Islands, Isla and Jurric: but the winds grew so terrible with tempests and foule weather, that they lost one of their ships; and some of the rest were so rent & spoiled of their tackle and furniture, as they escaped in great hazard of being cast away also. There were six and twentie mariners drowned, the which perceiving the ship to be in danger of sinking, fled into the boate, and so perished: the other that remained in the ship were saved, as master Francis Kandoll, and others. By reason therefore of such foule weather, the earle of Suffer was constrained to returne into Ireland, arriving in Cragfergus, where he landed with his souldiers: and appointing the ships to returne into England, he passed by land unto Dublin, spoiling the enemies countie by the way, and taking from them a great peece and boote of cattell; notwithstanding the painfull passage that he had to make through the cumbersome wayes, bogs, and woods, without reliefe of all necessarie things in that so troublesome a journey.

Thus far for those yeares warre in the deare of Marie quene of England, betwixt the Englishmen and Scots: whereof sith I have found none that hath written any thing at all, I have yet set downe these old notes, as I have learned the same of such as had good cause to know the truth thereof, being witnesses themselves of such enterprizes and exploits as chanced in the same warres: namelie capitaine Head, capitaine Wood, capitaine Crington, capitaine Currier, and capitaine Parkham: with others, which of their countie have willingly imparted to me the report of diverse such things, as I might be resolved in. Which accordingly so far as my remembrance hath served, I have here delivered, to the end the same may give occasion to others (that may haply light upon more full instructions) to impart to posteritie a more perfect discourse, where otherwise the matter might peradventure whole passe in forgetfulness.

And now to returne unto the Scottish ambassadors that were sent into France, for the conclusion of the marriage betwixt their quene & the Dolphin. After that the same marriage was consummat, and every thing ordered and brought to passe according to the effect of their commission: in the month of August they took their leave of the French king, the quene, and nobilitie there, to returne homewards into Scotland: albeit some of them came home, for the bishop of Orkney departed this transitorie life in Diepe, the fifteenth of September; the earle of Rosse deceased there the ninth of November; the earle of Cassilis lord treasurer departed in the same place the fourteenth of November; and the lord Fleming deceased in Paris the eighteenth of December. And so onlie the archbishop of Glasgow, the prior of saint Andrews, and the lord of Dun returned into Scotland in October. After whose coming, there was a parliament summoned by the quene, to be holden in December next.

In August Archibald Campbell erle of Argyle, whose will was singular in dispatch of the affaires above of peace as of warre, was made high justice of Scotland; and in France was advanced to the title of a knight of the order of saint Michael. Few daies betwixt these things departed this life the bishop of Exeter, and Andrew Duncie bishop of Whithchurch. To the one did succeed the abbat of Couper, in place of the other came Alexander Gordon archbishop of Athens by the quenes benefit. David Paniter & Paniter bishop of Ross, & James Stewart, whom James the six being illegitimate father father vnto him) had made abbat of Melrose and long after which followed also the death of the ab-digious sights (which I will not here recite, being touched by Lellcus) did appeare by a marker of such ominous things, whereof these verses were made:

In September there was a parlement holden at Edenburgh, in which the acts of the former legats in France (about the mariage of the quene of Scots to the Dolphin) were confirmed. At what time the Dolphin of France by his ambassadozs did be-mentlie request, that the crowne (which they terme matrimoniall) should be giuen vnto him by the decree of the states, whereby he might be called king of Scotland as long as the quene liued. The quene also iudging it a point of honoz, to heape all title of glorie which she could vpon hir husband, as one that by a certeine inclination of mind did ver-troullie fauor him; gaue in charge also to the ambasdors, that they should earnestlie followe the same cause amongst the Scots. And to the end to make them the more easilie into hir opinion; he deuoted the matter into certeine articles, deliuered to the ambassadozs with more ample instructions touching the same: the summe of all which was this.

First, diligentlie to beat into the Scots with what disposition of mind the Dolphin was affected toward them, as well as his father, who held the Scots in that account as he did his owne people, and so alwaies would haue them: which good mind of the French towards the Scots to be plaine without anie dissimulation, it maie well appeere as well by the covenants establisshed for the mariage, as also by the benefits which he hath not onelie bestowed vpon the Scots and Scotland in generalitie, but also in par-ticularitie vpon certeine especiall Scots, of his owne free will, almost without the request of anie bodie. And that they should also further laie abroad, what helpe the quene and Scots haue had of the two; the cardinall of Lozaine, & the duke of Gulse the quenes vnckle. All which the ambassadozs themselues (as they haue fullie proued) did well understand.

Secondlie, where the quene doth thinke that she is greatlie benefited with manie honozs by so great a king, but especiallie in this, that so mightie a prince hath taken hir into the fellowship of the holie bed, by which there can not anie other commoditie grow to the king than the reuenues of the kingdome which he hath purchased with his great charge and labor: and that the quene considering all this (with great griefe of mind) doth seeke by what meanes she might at least expresse some small token of a thank-full mind for so manie benefits (because if she should not do some thing, no small blot would seeme to be imputed to the quene and the Scots) it came into hir mind to thinke by what meanes she could requite some part thereof, which she could do (as she thought) if at the least she did but honoz hir husband with the kinglie title, & giue vnto him the mariage crowne of Scotland.

This thing therefore the quene hir selfe doth ear-nestlie desire, and doth courtouslie request all the estates of Scotland, that the same maie be establisshed by the voices of the full parlement, and that they will command some three or foure of the chiefe nobilitie honozable to carie the ensignes of the kingdome to him, that at the least by this token of loue, the king & the best of the court maie well perceiue, with what reuerence and with what dutie they fauour the king hir husband.

And to the end that this request of the quene, for the rarenesse of the example, should not breed anie doubt in the mind of the nobilitie, and to hold them as it were in suspense, it was giuen in charge also to the ambassadozs, that they should in manner point with their finger, that manie ages past, the quene of spaynes did not onelie for loue she did beare vnto him, adorne the duke of Antou hir husband, with the bare name of a king; but did also by the consent of the nobilitie, giue him rule and gouernement ouer the same kingdome. The like thereof was also done in our memoire by the quene of Spaine to hir husband the archduke of Austrich, & by the quene of spaurre to the duke of Wandosme.

But if that the Scots be moued by the example of the English, who haue excluded Phillip king of Spaine, that then the ambassadozs should easilie wipe awaie that doubt, if they admonish the Scots that the English are not tied to the Spaniards with that firme and needfull band as the Scots are to the French, both which nations haue one priuilege, ma-gisstrats to gouerne, and one fellowship and participation of the administration of all the things in either kingdome. Wherevnto they must further adde that it was so far off, that the English should reape anie fruit or commoditie by the Spaniards, that the king of Spaine himselfe did (as it were) buying from the English all the commoditie he could, to performe his affaires out of the realme. And further, that the English being out of all hope for their quene to haue anie issue by the same mariage, they would not grant vnto it, when there is a certeine and full hope left to the Scots, that issue may come of this marriage.

Besides all this, let it be opened vnto the Scots, what great benefit maie rebound vnto them by this signe of a thankfull mind. For it maie so hapen, that if the king Dolphin shall seile himselfe increased with this title of honoz by the Scots, as a note of their good fauour to him, that he maie raise by his father the king of France, that he will not by anie meanes permit the quene of Scots his wife to be excluded from the kingdome of England, after the death of quene Marie, who was not like to liue long being soe troubled with the dropsie.

These things and manie others were giuen in charge to the ambassadozs (comen out of France) to declare to the parlement of Scotland. Which being thus declared to the states and the quene regent, with might and maine seeking the furthering thereof; at length it was granted that he should be king during the life of the quene. For which cause Wil-lesper Campbell earle of Argile, and James Steward, bassard brother to the yong quene, being pri-uie of S. Andrews, were named to execute their consent vnto the Dolphin, to declare him king, and to inuest him with the ornaments thereto belonging, and farther to shew the readie minds of the Scots toward him, not onlie in this but in all other things: by which anie honoz or profit might anie waie rise vnto him.

But whilest these men doe prepare all things for such a iournie, certeine factious persons did beat into their eares, how heauie a iournie that would be vnto them. For it would hapen, that whilest they were busie in prouiding for small things abroad, they should by delate corrupt, or by absence cleane ouer-turne matters of greater importance at home. For they did know how the subtil wit of James, and the great power and strength of the earle of Argile would be missing in those new things which were in hand amongst these of the religion: for which they neuer left off intreating and perswading, untill they had had wholie staied them from that iournie.

During these affaires, Marie quene of England died, and that worthy ladie Elizabeth succeeded in hir place. Immediatlie whereupon, the yong quene of Scots bare hir selfe as heire to that kingdome, and caused all hir hangings, bedding, vessels, and o- ther household stuffe to be stamped and marked with the title and armes of the kings of England. And although France were then miserable afflicted in chalenging the dominion and gouernment of Flilane, Naples, and Flanders; yet they would needs heape euill vpon euill, and adde therevnto the title of England, as being vnto them a verie score and mocherie (as Buchanan termeth it). Neither did the wiser sort of the French loke into that matter: for the Couises, who at that time gouerned all things, did consent to this error of the Scottish quene, because they would thereby seeme to haue gotten to themselves a singular hono: in adding the title of England to the French name.

The regent hauing now gotten a consent (as before you haue heard) of the matrimoniall crowne to be bestowed vpon the husband of the yong quene of Scots, began after a sort to put on a new mind: for by little and little she conuerted that old and accepted courtlesse, into commanding arrogancie; and the gentle answers wherewith she was wont to appease all parts, were turned contrarie. Which before she durst not do by reason of the present state, which then was such, as she feared not to promise what she would not haue to be performed, because she had not then obtayned the grant of the matrimoniall crowne: but now hauing all things after hir owne mind, the blessed other conditions, and other speeches. There was also a parliament appointed at Striueling in the first Iyes of Maie.

And because she was heard oftentimes to saie, that she would not suffer the maiestie of the chiefe gouernement to be cast downe from the seat thereof, but would restore it to the former place. By which sayings manie were admonished of some troublesome tempest to follow. Whereupon diuerse came to intreat hir for the protestants, amongst which for the dignitie of his name, to make the matter to be more easilie obtained, there were sent Alexander Cuningame earle of Glenearne, and Hugh Campbell thiriffe of Aine, a worthy knight, before whom the regent could not refraine hirselfe, but burst forth into these wordes.

These men (saith she) sith they haue preached not verie sincerelie, shall be banished, though you and your ministers resist against it. And when they replied, beseeching hir that she would remember what she had often promised: she answered, that the performance of promise is to be chalenged of princes, so farre as it serueth commodious for them to performe it. Wherevnto they replied, that they therefore renounced all dutie and obedience vnto hir, and did further forswearne hir of the great mischies that would flow out of this fountaine: with which answer she being stroken more than she looked for, said in the end, that she would both thinke on it and them.)

In Iulie and August, there was a conuention of all the prelates and cleargie holden at Edenburgh, in the which certeine men & women of Edenburgh were accused of heresie, and abjured at the tolone crosse with faggots on their backs: [wherevpon (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 558.) were great tumults raised at Edenburgh, for the appeasing whereof, the lord Scitoun was made gouernor there.] In this assembly it was required, that the common prayers might be read in the Scottish tongue in churches, with certeine other articles of reformation, whereof the answer was deferred till March, in which moneth a prouinciall council was appointed to be holden at Edenburgh. The second of March, the said prouinciall council of all the prelates and cleargie of Scotland began, wherein diuerse articles were proponed by the temporaltie; as to haue the prayers and administration of the sacraments in the Scottish language, the election of bishops and all beneficed men to passe by the voices of the temporall lordes & people of their diocesses and parishes, with diuerse other re- formations: all the which the bishops refused to grant, where through there arose shortly after great trouble in Scotland.

The quene regent caused summones to be giuen to John Inor, John Mullocke, John Dowglas, and Daule Spessane, to appeare at Striueling the tenth day of Maie: and for lacke of appearance they were denounced rebels, and put to the horne. Wherevpon the said John Inor being in Perth, perswaded the master of Lindseie, the lords of Tulibardin, Dun, Bettarrow, and diuerse other being there assembled, with the burgessees of the towne of saint Johns towne and Dundee, to pull downe the images and altars in all churches, and to suppress the houses of friers, & other religious places. Who after a sermon made by him to that effect, the same tenth of Maie they began in saint Johns towne, and cast downe the abbey of the Charterhouse, the Blacke and Carmelite friers, called the Collesum [and so cleane, that (as saith Buchanan) within two daies there was left no signe thereof almost to be seene] and reformed all other churches thereabouts, breaking downe the images and altars in Jfife, Angus, Sperris, and other parts there next adioining.

The quene regent being aduertised thereof, sent for the duke of Chatelerault, and diuerse other of the nobilitie, as the earles of Atholl, Argile, Sparshall, and others, who came with hir to Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, hauing with them two thousand Frenchmen [to whom also repaired (as saith Lesleus lib. 10. pag. 548) the archbishop of saint Andrez and Glasgow, the bishops of Dunkeld, and Dunblane, James prior of saint Andrez, the abbat of Coloper and Dunfermeling, with manie other chiefe of the cleargie] who entered the towne vpon appointment of the lord Ruthen capteine thereof, and so receiuing it, gaue it in keeping to capteine James Stewart, and capteine Cullane, with the ir bands of men of warre. In the meane time the erle of Argile, and the prior of saint Andrez, left the quene in Perth, and went to saint Andrez, ioining themselves with the other, and made reformation of the churches, casting downe altars, images, houses of friers, and abbeies in that towne, and in Coloper, and other places thereabout: and assembling a great companie of countrie men, came to Londros, Balneate, & Coloper, to make resistance against the Frenchmen that were in Falkland with the quene [come thither from Perth, after that she had left in Perth six hundred men under the charge of James Stewart cardinall, & James Cullane.] But when they should haue met on Coloper more in battell, the duke of Chatelerault, the earle Sparshall, and others, laboured betwixt them, so that the battell was staied, & the quene with the Frenchmen returned vnto Edenburgh.

The earle of Argile, the prior of saint Andrez, and their assiders came to saint Johns towne and besieged it, till it was to them surrendered. The erle of Huntlie was sent to them from the quene to treat with them of some accord, but he profited not. At the same time a certeine number of persons of the towne of Dundee & Perth, came to the abbey of Scone, and spoiling the church, burnt it with the most

most part of the house, the earle of Argile, and the prior of saint Andrewes being with them in companie. After this they went to Striueling, and to Lithquo, where they caused the houses of the blacke friers and graie friers to be throtone downe. From thence they passed to Edeburgh, where the quene hearing of their comming, departed with the Frenchmen vnto Dunbar, the duke of Chatelerault, and the erle of Huntleie being with hir in companie.

The earle of Argile and his companie, called the lords of the congregation, were receiued into Edeburgh by the bailiffes of the towne, where the places of the blacke and graie friers were suddenly ouerthowne, & the Church a field, and Trinitie college, and saint Giles church were reformed, and the images and altars pulled downe. The lords remaining thus in Edeburgh [apprehended Robert Richarson (as saith Lesleus) that was gouernor of the publicke treasure, take the keis by force from him, entered the abbey] the coining house, take the coining icons, seized vpon the quenes moueables, which they found in the palace, and kept the same. * Whilest these things were thus done at Edeburgh, Sparwell lord Harries gouernor of the west marches, which at that time was detained prisoner in Edeburgh castrell, did priuile get out of the same by a rope hanged to the wall, and hauing speedie horses, departed to his owne companie, shortly after joining himselfe to the lords of the religion.]

Monsieur Dossell and the Frenchmen came from Dunbar to the links of Leith, accompanied with the duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Huntleie, Bothwell, Pourton, and others. And the lords of the congregation came forth of the towne of Edeburgh of purpose to haue giuen battell to the Frenchmen, albeit they were not sufficient partie to resist them. But the erle of Huntleie trauelled betwixt them, by whose meanes there met tielue on euerie side, who agreed vpon certeine articles, and so the quene and Frenchmen entered into Leith, and forthwith began to fortifie it.

sons, or hinder them from quiet gathering and inioyng their rents, tithes, and profits, vntill the fourth Ides of Januarie.

7 Seuenthlie, that they should not from henceforth violate or deface churches, religious houses, or anye other holie places.

8 Eighthlie, that euerie man might at Edeburgh professe and vse what religion he would, which they commonlie called the libertie of conscience.

9 Ninthlie, that the quene regent should faithfully provide, that the preachers of the reformed religion should not be molested or hurt, either by hir, or by anye of the catholike gouernours. Both parties being thus satisfied with these conditions, the French entered Leith.]

Shortly after this, the duke of Chatelerault, partlie through persuation of the earle of Argile his sisters sonne, and the Westland lords, and partlie because he vnderstood that his son the earle of Arrane was fled forth of France to Geneva for the religion, he took part with the lords from that time forth against the aduise of the bishop of saint Andrewes, and diuerse other his friends. This yere in June, Henrie the king of France, at the triumph of the marriages betwixt the king of Spaine and his daughter, and duke of Sanoie and his sister, was wounded in iusts at the tourneillis in Paris by the count Montgomerie, and died of the hurts the tenth of Iulie next ensuing, being the eleuenth day after he was wounded. Then Francis his sonne, that had married the quene of Scotland, was crowned king at saint Denis, and annointed at Reimes in September following.

* In the moneth of September, Croke a noble man of France was sent to the regent, to comfort hir in the kings name; declaring vnto hir that an armie was preparing to come into Scotland, vnder the leading of the marquesse of Albese or Elbuse (as saith Buchanan) and that in the meane time with all speed some troopes of men should shortly be there with monie, and other defenses of warre. And to the end that nothing should want to further hir, the king would shortly send certeine noble men into Scotland, which should counsell hir in these troublesome affaires. Besides which, he brought letters out of France from the king and the quene, to the prior of saint Andrewes, in which they rather sought to incline his mind by courtesie to obedience, before that they would enforce him thereto by warre. Which letters being by Lesleus turned out of French into Latine, are by me thus deliuered in English, with the answer of the prior to the same.

Francis king of France to Iames prior of the monasterie of saint Andrewes.

After that I vnderstood by certeine letters, & by the common report of all (my cosine) that Scotland did flame in euery part with tumults and seditions, it is strange to see how greatlie I was affonied thereof. But when I heard that you (to whome my dead father, my deere wife, and my selfe, haue giuen so manie large benefitts) should be forgetfull of them all liberallie bestowed, and become the author, head, and nourisher of this fire of contention and byalles; I could not be perswaded that you would so farre digresse from that office and dutie of pietie, which you haue alwaies made shew to beare vnto the quene.

But if the thing were so, as the common fame doth report of you, I did verelie thinke that the promises and flattering words of others had intised you to this deceit, onelie to take the fault vpon you; for

The articles of agreement betweene the regent and the lords of the reformed religion.

1 First, that all the souldiers of the religion, and such as did belong to them, should depart from Edeburgh, and leaue the same to the gouernement of the quene: with this prouiso, that the citizens should either remaine, or depart at their pleasure.

2 Item, that those of the religion should restore vnto the magistrats whole and trulie all such summs of monie, or other pretious things, which they had either priuatie taken, or by open force spoiled from the magistrats.

3 Thirdlie, that the quenes palace, which they of the religion did possesse, with all the furniture and ornaments thereof, should be deliuered by againe to such as should be appointed therfore.

4 Fourthlie, that they of the religion should not depart, before they had committed the lord Ruthwen and Bettarroto (whome they promised to put in pledges for their credit and good dealing) to the keeping of such as were on the quenes part.

5 Fifthlie, that all men should acknowledge the gouernement of the king and the quene to be lawfull, which before they had gainesaid by the pretense of religion: and that they should faithfully obeye the regent, and the old lawes of the kingdome, except such decrees as pertained not to religion.

6 Sixtylie, that they should not by anye meanes trouble the catholike priests and ecclesiasticall per-those cause (when they had discharged themselves thereof) the offense would seeme to be either none, or verie small, after that you had taken it vpon you. Which my opinion of you, if it be true, it shall be as tofull to me, as that which should be most tofull: for by this meanes I wish that some part of my displeasure (into which I would haue you thinke that you are worthilie fallen) were quenched, in that you haue (as I heare) but onelie deceiued the god hope which we conceiued of your pietie towards God, and your faithfull seruice towards me.

Wherefore, sith nothing is more deere or acceptable vnto me, than that (controuerfies appeased) all things without anie tumult maie be knit together by the law of god order: and sith the same (as it seemeth to me) maie best be done by your trauell, I do admonish you by these letters, and (for the god will I beare you) do earnestlie request you, that you will returne to your owne profit and fidelitie, from which you haue most shamefullie fallen, to the end that I maie by the same more plainlie vnderstand that you carie an other mind than that which I can gather out of your foolish doings, the which shall then fullie appere to me, if at length you so bend all your force, that all things disordered in those parts, maie by your diligence be called backe to the commonwealths ancient, sound, and holie forme of obedience, which you know is due to God and me.

Otherwise I would haue you be persuaded that I will shortly subdue you, and all those which shall cleaue or minister helpe vnto you, in taking iust punishment vpon you, which I will bitterlie execute. The charge of declaration thereof, and the further large exprelling of my mind, I haue committed to this bearer, whome I would haue you credit as much as my selfe. With which letters also the quene of Scots directed other letters in this forme, as here followeth.

Marie queene of Scots, and Dowager of France, to James the prior of the monasterie of saint Andrewes.

I can not see why Lesleus should call hie Dowager, sith by hie letter it appeareth hie husband was yet liuing, in that she talketh of hirs and hie husbands displeasure.

Can not (cosine) but greatlie wonder, that you which are not onelie nearest to vs by blood, but are also (as you know) greatlie benefitted by vs with manie liberalities, should be either of that malice or boldnes, that you would with one fault overthrow the maiestie of God, and violate the authoritie of me and the king my husband. For it is a thing worthie of great admiration, to consider how it might happen that you who being present, did open to me the names of the duke of Chateleault, and of manie others, which seemed to you to diminish my authoritie, should now being absent (as a leader and head of all other seditious persons) hurt my dignitie, and that in matters of greatest weight, in which the honoz of God is lessened, and my authoritie clearelie taken awaie: all which I should more easilie haue beleued of anie other my subjects, than of you.

Trulie most grieuouslie (as I ought) I beare this, that you haue falsified that faith to me, which had a speciall hope of your fidelitie: though as yet I can scarce be persuaded to thinke you to be so farre from truth and reason, that you would be caried awaie in to such blind erroz. All which I desire to fall out to be as true, as true maie be, requesting also of God so to giue to you his light, that returning into the right waie, you maie shew your selfe a god man, and obedient to our lawes, by doing contrarie things to that which you haue already performed. Wherefore, by these letters I admonish, and wish intreatie as earnestlie as I can, desire you to recompense your former enill with following god dedes, and that the anger (which I and the king my husband haue bitterlie conceiued against you) maie by that meanes be pacified. Otherwise trulie I would haue you vnderstand, we will execute such punishment vpon you, that you shall for euer be mindfull thereof. The which doubtlesse if you compell vs by your dedes to performe, it shall be to you a most greivous thing. I praye God keepe you from all danger. Paris the 9 kalends of August.

James Steward the prior of saint Andrewes (whome prosperous successes had before advanced) did in reading these letters of the king and quene so frie in anger and hatred, that he could not forbear but must needs returne answer, exprelling the same (after confirmed by his dedes) though now somewhat smothered with god words. The effect of which letters were in this sort: That he was griened in his mind as much as he might, because he was so farre fallen into the mislike and displeasure of those princes, whome he reuerenced with great dutie, that they should bitterlie obiect vnto him in their letters that he was a seditious person, noted of ingratitude, fraught with malice, and defiled with heresie.

Touching which notes of these wickednes, sith they were imputed to him by the nobilitie of Scotland (meaning such as stood against the reformed religion) he with faire speeches requested the princes, that they would not attribute more to the malice of his enemies in accusing him, than to his vprightnes in purging himselfe: and that they should not thinke anie thing to be spoken by his enemies, but that which fauoured of malice, enuie, and hatred, especiallie sith they did not onelie go about to diminish his fame abroad amongst the princes, but also at home did openlie late wait for his life and liuing.

But he would so labor, that all men should well perceiue his good mind (towards the princes) fullie laied abroad without anie veile of dissimulation, whereby his aduersaries should be ashamed to haue laied such open reproch against him, and the king & quene should mislike that they had so easilie credited his enemies. Wherefore he desired that hereafter they should rather beleue anie thing of him, than that he would be noted for an vnthankfull man, as they had obiected vnto him. From the detestable spot thereof (being of all the verie worst, sith nature abhorreth the same) he would keepe himselfe, and rather die by anie kind of torment, than to suffer the least spot of such a vice to dwell in his name, especiallie in the affaires of that king and quene, whereof he had found the first most courteous, and the second most bountifull.

And therefore, as he had with all dutie hitherto prosecuted their fauour, so he (would during his life) contend, that his trauell, diligence, and faith, should neuer want in performing or defending their affaires, so that they would not burthen him with that which might be a detriment to the cause of God and religion: for if either of them were in hand, neither the fraudulent counsels of his striding aduersaries, neither the bitter words of the sharpe threats of the king or quene, should make him leaue off, or represse the

cc their towne this force in taking upon him the defense of those things.

cc Therefore he would not have the king or quene to thinke that their authoritie is touched, when he labored to pull awaie the deuiles of the papists. From which onelie thing (sith he supposed the honor of God, the glorie of the king and quene, and the helpe and health of his countrie to be contained therein) he will not be withdraue by the force of anie man, nor be in quiet for all the threats of the king and quene, vntill he haue wholie cut awaie the branches of superfluous, and vtterlie pulled by the roots thereof.

Crookes had scarce performed his ambassage for which he came (as before you haue heard) in deliuering these letters: but forthwith almed at Leith Detavian a Frenchman, with foure troops of souldiers, with a great masse of monie, & other furniture needfull for the warres: whome after a few daies the regent sent backe againe into France, to requite of the king, that foure other companies of souldiers might be sent ouer, which might with those (alreadie now in Scotland) supplie the number of twentie companies: to whome also it were expedient to soine a hundred horsemen, which number he affirmed would suffice to pacifie all the tumults in Scotland, so that foure ships well appointed might alwaies lie in the haues of Leith, to watch the port. Of all which if the Scots were provided (by the benefit of the king) and that the comming of his brother the marquisse of Albuse were hastened, the promised then to bring all things to an end.

Besides which, the did also signifie vnto the king, that the Scots of the reformed religion, for the increase of their faction, had secretlie growen in league with some of the nobilitie of France, who did daillie send letters and messengers to the Scots, to encourage them not to leaue off from their attempts; promising also vnto them that they would hinder (by all the means they could) that no great armie should be made out of France against them: and moreover, in that the Scots had sent ambassadors to Germanie, and into Denmarke, for religious cause, to requite aid from thence, but their chieffest and principall hope did rest (as saith Lelcus) in England.]

1559.

Leith besieged

The Scottish men are banquished.

The quene came to Edinburgh.

New men sent into Scotland.

During these things, the duke of Chateaufault and the lords of the congregation sent to the quene (whereof we will speake more hereafter) beseeching hir to leaue off from making of forts within the realme. But she would not grant so to do: wherefore they assembled their whole forces in Edinburgh, and besieged the towne of Leith in October: the quene and Frenchmen, with the bishops of saint Andrews, Glasgow, Dunfreis, the lord of Seton, and diuerse other Scottishmen being within it. But the Frenchmen of warre issued forth of Leith, and met nere to the abbey of Holie rood house, with the Scottish lords and their companie, where manie Scottishmen were slaine, & the rest chased into Edinburgh: the Frenchmen also following them vnto the gates of Edinburgh, had entred, if those within the castell had not shot off the arillerie at them, to staine the slaughter and pursute.

In the time of this siege, the pong lord of Leithington, secretarie to the quene, being with hir in Leith, left the towne, & secretlie departing, got him to the lords, and holpe greatlie afterwards to obtaine aid out of England. After this, the quene and Frenchmen came to Edinburgh, which was peaceablie rendred to them, where they remained all that winter. About the same time, Nicholas Pelue the bishop of Amiens, monsieur de la Brosse, & two doctors of Orlins, came to Scotland in September, and la Brosse was made lieutenant of the French armie, monsieur Partiguens colonell of the footment.

And with them came a great companie of French souldiers vnto the quene regent, so that then the French power was thirtie five hundred good men of warre, besides two bands of Scottish souldiers, under the leading of capteine Anthonie Kenedie, and James Steward of Cardonald.

* The Frenchmen being thus entered France, twelve of the chieffest of the nobilitie were assembled at Edinburgh, of whome there was a day required of hearing to be giuen to la Brosse, and to the bishop, affirming that they were sent thither as ambassadors. To whome it was answered, that they did not seeke peace (as they did dissemble) but threaten war: for otherwile to what end were it to bring armed souldiers to dispute thereof? For the Scots were not so ignorant of the state of things, that they would commit them selues to that deciding of matters, in which they might be compelled to accept conditions answerable to the mind of the aduersarie. But if amongst weapons it pleased them to make peace, they would also promise, that they would not rather seeme to be done thereunto by compulsion, than quietlie led by reason. For if they did trulie & from their heart require that in deed which they seeme in words, they would discharge those strange souldiers, and met (as they haue often done in other places) vnarmed, as to a thing that by words and reason is to be decided, and not by swords the strength to be compassed. And thus much for the ambassadors.

Now you haue heard before of the battell of Leith, the besieging and the regaining of Edinburgh; touching which, because it is omitted before in the recting of the things done in those places, I thinke it not amisse (though it come a little out of course) to set it downe (as Buchanan hath placed the same) next after the speeches vsed to those ambassadors. Thus therefore he writeth touching the defense of Leith. These noble men (meaning those at Edinburgh) did write to the quene much after this manner; That they did greatlie maruell, that the regent pronounced with no iniuries, did so sone depart from the former covenants; and expelling the ancient inhabitants of Leith, and placing there a colonie of strangers, the would in that place build a castle to the destruction of the lawes and liberties of the realme, and to the danger of the liues of them all. Wherefore they did earnestlie intreat hir, that she would desist from this thing rashlie attempted (against the faith of hir promise, the publike commoditie, and the lawes and liberties of the kingdome) least she inforce them by necessitie to prae in aid of the whole people.

Besides which also, they which were assembled at Edinburgh, did write to the same effect, about a moneth after that they had dispatched the other letters, adding these petitions to the same last letters; That ouerthrowing the new fortresses, she would command all the strangers and hired people to depart out of the towne, to the end that it might be free for all men (according to iustice) there to traffike and vse their mutuall trade of buying & selling one with an other. The which if she refused to do, they would take it for a sure token, that she ment to bring this kingdome into seruitude; against which euill they would prouide all that soeuer remedie that they could. Within three daies after, the quene sent Robert Forman chiefe herald to answer the matter, with instructions and commandements deliuered to him in these words.

First of all, you shall thew vnto them, that nothing could happen vnto vs more contrarie to our opinion, than that there should be anie other hauing authoritie here, besides my daughter and hir husband my sonne in law, vpon whome all our authoritie doth depend; that the former acts of the nobilitie,

"tie, and this present request, or rather commandement doth well declare, that they acknowledge no other superiortie; and that their demands (or rather threatnings) with what shew of words soever they be cloaked, are sufficientlie enough knowen unto vs, as no new things. Again, you shall require of the duke of Chastelerault, that he call to mind what he hath promised to vs by his words, and to the king by his letters. Which was, that he would not onelie hearken to the kings commandement; but also worke, that his sonne the earle of Arrane should not at all soine with those tumults of the countrie, and whether the things which he now doth, are the performance of his promises.

"To their letters also you shall answer; that we have openlie shewed our indeuor to bring things to quiet; that we will grant to anie thing, which maie not resist the pietie due to God, and doth not fight with their dueitie towards their king and quene, and that I did neuer so much as once thinke of the ouer-throw of their lawes and libertie; and much lesse, so much as dreame of conquering the kingdome by violence. For to whome, or for whome should I seeke the kingdome, when my daughter doth already possesse it? Touching the defense and fortifying of Leith, you shall aske them this; whether that we at anie time haue attempted anie thing that waie, before that they with manie assemblies, and at length with conspiracie among themselves, did openlie shew that they would shake off the lawfull gouerne-ment, and before that they at their pleasure troubled the whole publike state (unknowledge to vs, who held the place and authoritie of the chiefeest gouernor) strengthened their factions with strong cities, and made league and couenants with our ancient enimies?

"And to omit other things, what cause can they (in the end) bring forth, whie it was lawfull for them to retaine an armie at Edinburgh, to invade the go-uernors of those affaires? And that it is not lawfull for vs at Leith for our owne defense and safetie, to haue anie other gard about vs? Cruelle they seeke this therein, that we should labor to shun their furie (as hitherto we haue done) by continuall and daile change of places. Is there anie thing in their letters that mentioned their dueitie to the right magistrate? Doth there lie open anie waie for the restoring of concord? Or do they shew anie token that they would haue these seditions pacified, and that they would all things should be reduced to their former state?

"Let them cloke this with what colour they will of publike commoditie; yet it is manifest that they thinke and seeke nothing lesse. For if they had on-lie staied vpon a concord, we haue often shewed them a waie thereunto. Neither are they ignorant that these French had (by the commandement of their king) bene long before dispatched out of Scotland, unless their dowings had bene the cause of their state. Wherefore, if they will yet now offer anie honest conditions which may induce vs to hope; and that (the maiestie of the gouernement alwaies saued sound) maie declare that they will modestlie and obedientlie obeie their superiours: we will refuse no means to restore a concord & quiet amongst them and vs, nor omit anie thing that maie tend to the publike commoditie.

"Neither are we alone so affected towards them, but also their king and quene; who hath sent vnto them a worthy knight of the order of the scallop shell, and one of the chiefe of the ecclesiasticall order, with letters and commandements touching the same: whome they did so contemne, as that they would not bouchsafe them answer; no not so much as hearing. Wherefore, you shall demand, and command the duke, the nobilitie, and all others of what condition soever, that they depart in sunder; or otherwise, that they shall not be kept together, vntlesse it be by strength of armes. To all this the next day, which was the thre and twentieth of October, the nobilitie answered after this order.

"We easilie vnderstand by your letters and com-mandements sent by the herald, how obstinatlie you be enillie minded against pietie towards God, the publike commoditie of the realme, and the common libertie of vs all: all which things we must & do defend, as of right we ought. Wherefore, from henceforth we do suspend and forbid your gouerne-ment, in the name of the king and quene, or by what other name or title you do usurpe the publike administration of the kingdome; as persons certeinlie knowing, that those things which are now done by you, do with the mind of those princes fight against the publike safetie of this realme.

"And as you do not esteeme vs lawfull subiects of those princes & of this kingdome, to make a publike senate or councill: so we do not acknowledge you for a regent to execute supreme authoritie; speciallie with the gouernement (if you haue anie such committed vnto you by the princes) is for most iust & weigh-tie causes forbidden you: and that in the name of the same princes, whose counsellors we are borne to be, chiefe in matters which pertaine to the safetie of all the people. And although we haue determined not to see anie danger, in deliuering of that towne, in which you haue placed strange and hired souldiers against vs: yet for the reuerence which we beare vnto you, as vnto our quene mother; we earnestlie with all faithfull intreatie beseech you, that you depart from thence; whilist the cause of publike commoditie doth inforce vs to recouer that towne by weapons.

"Besides which, we further request, that you will leade them out of the towne with you, within foure and twentieth houres; if there be anie which challenge vnto themselves the names of ambassadoers, either to decide controuersies, or to gouerne the affaires. For it is but equitie that we prouide for the safetie, and willinglie spare the blood of all those hired souldiers, as well for the ancient amitie which hath bene betwene the French and the Scots, as for the mariage of our quene with their king: which friendship we would rather should be increased than diminished. The same day also, the said herald declared at his returne to the regent, that the day before it was persuaded in an assembled coun-cell of the nobles and the other commons; that all the deeds and sayings of the regent did onelie tend to verie tyrannie.

"Hereupon, there was a decre made to take the gouernement from hir: so that the whole compantie subscribed, as to a most iust matter: and that there they did forbid ante ambassage, giuen or sent to hir by hir sonne in law and hir daughter: further, commanding hir to execute no gouerne-ment, until the generall assemblee of a parlement to be appointed by them in such place as they should lan to Elizabeth the queene of England for assistance, to expell the Frenchmen. Which the queene of England granted, not onelie for to serue the Scottishmens turne; but speciallie for the suertie of his owne realme and state, which as then was thought to stand in danger of trouble, in case the Frenchmen were suffered to remaine in Scotland: considering the euill dealing of the French king and his counsell in some points already shewed. The queene of England therefore sent the duke of Norfolk to Berwick, whither came to him the earle of Argile, the prior of saint Andrews, Harris the maister of Parwell, Robert Dowglas, brother to the prior of S. Andrews, and the lord of Lochleuin, and a sonne of the lord Ruthuen. About the same time, James Hamilton earle of Arrane, eldest sonne to the duke of Chateherault, and capteine of the Scottish companies of men of armes and archers in France, being fled for religion secretlie to Geneva, from thence came by the conuoy of maister Randall Englishman into England: which at his coming into Scotland he performed, and joined himselfe with the earle of Argile, and other lords in the cause aforesaid.

And for sure keeping hereof, the Scottish lords deliuered pledges into England, there to remaine during the life of the king of France, and one yeere after his decesse. The pledges were these: David Hamilton, sonne to the duke of Chateherault; another called Colme Campbell, coufine to the earle of Argile; Robert Dowglas, brother to the prior of S. Andrews; and the lord of Lochleuin, and a sonne of the lord Ruthuen. About the same time, James Hamilton earle of Arrane, eldest sonne to the duke of Chateherault, and capteine of the Scottish companies of men of armes and archers in France, being fled for religion secretlie to Geneva, from thence came by the conuoy of maister Randall Englishman into England: which at his coming into Scotland he performed, and joined himselfe with the earle of Argile, and other lords in the cause aforesaid.

The duke of Chateherault, the earles of Argile, Arrane, and others, came to the towne of Glasgou, and caused the images & altars to be taken downe, seizing the bishops living into their hands, and toke the castell of Glasgou pertaining to the bishop, and put certaine gentlemen into it to keepe it. Whereof the Frenchmen being aduertised, marched forward to Glasgou, to the number of foure thousand men: the bishop of Glasgou, the lords Sempill, Seiton, Ross, and diuerse others with them, toke the castell againe, and staid one night of the towne, returned on the next morrow to Kirkintulloch, and from thence to Lithgow and Cumbergh.

After their returne from Glasgou, a certaine number of Frenchmen went to Striueling, and passing by the bridge over the water of Firth, came into Fife, in purpose to haue gone vnto saint Andrews, and to haue fortified the towne. But they being in Kingcorme, there assembled together in Fife the earles of Arrane, and Ross, the prior of saint Andrews, the lord Ruthuen, the maister of Lindie, and diuerse other, hauing with them no great number: but yet they daillie skirmished with the Frenchmen, and would not suffer them to come from the sea side; where diuerse Frenchmen were slaine, and one of their capteins, with thirtie of his souldiers, and few Scottishmen, in manner none: except that the earle of Southerland, who chanced to be with them at the picking, was fore hurt and maimed in the arme with the brydge of a calauer shot.

As the Frenchmen were in their progresse, at the mouth of the water of Leuin in Fife, there arrived in their sight a nauie of ships: which at the first knowing they toke to be French ships, but shortly after perceiving them to be the English nauie, they returned with great diligence to Burnt Island, where they passed the ferrie of Kingcorme in botes and craicrs to Leith, and instantlie began to fortifie that towne, casting great trenches about it, and making great blockehouses for their defence, as preventing such perils as otherwise might haue befallen them, and using remedies in due time, by warlike pollicie of present deuise, to prouide against afterclaps. The English ships came to the rode of Leith, where they cast anchors, the fourth Ides of Januarie.

* In the meane time, whilst those of the religion had almost destroyed all monasteries, certaine barons of Perne, partlie for hatred to the catholike religion (as the Romish cleargie feareth it) and partlie blinded with desire of prairie (as in all assemblies of battell there will be some) ouerthrew the monasterie of the Carmelite friers in Aberdeen. Who going about also to haue spoiled the monasteries of the Trinitie, and of the friers Spinors, were hindered thereof by the lord Lelle, and the baron of Buchquhane, at the commandement of the earle of Huntlee. Notwithstanding which, they could not be so sufficientlie repressed, but that they went to old Aberdeen (for so they call that place in that towne, which is beautified with the bishops palace, the canonrie, and the vniuersitie) and would haue assaulted the magnificent and statelie church thereof. But to keepe them from the same, the bishop, & John Lelle (the official of that place, the one by counsell, the other by preaching, and both by the aid of the earle of Huntlee) did their endeavour, at what time the Lelles put them besides their purpose.]

The queene regent hearing of the arrivall of the English, sent vnto the viceadmirall of that fleet, named maister Winter, requiring to know of him, for what cause he was come into those waters. This gentleman addressing himselfe to accomplish the commandement imposed and laid upon him, came face to face to the said viceadmirall, and with countenance, wherein appeared tokens of inward courage, put forth his demand as he was inioined. The viceadmirall answered, that he had bene abroad on the seas seeking after pirats, and in case anie of them came thither, he was arrived there in the forth to wait on them: where as the principall cause in deed was to impeach, that no Frenchman should land there, in case anie came forth of France, and also to keepe them that late in Finsbury from vitels, and that no Frenchman should passe by sea forth of Leith.

* Whereupon the queene regent did send poynalle the king of Frances orator in that realme, to request the queene of England, that she would call his ships home againe, and that she would not send aiding souldiers to the lords of the religion (whome Lesleus neuer feareth by anie other name than sectaries and seditious persons) whereby the peace might be broken with the French, and so occasion of warre giuen. Wherevnto his maiestie answered (with no lesse care of his kingdome than became the maiestie of so good a mother to haue of his children) that she had no such mind as to make warre. But because that she certainlie vnderstood, that great troops of Frenchmen did daillie land and increase in Scotland, for what cause she knew not: she could doe no lesse than place souldiers in diuerse forts and hauens, which might defend the English from the malice or hurt of such strangers, if they should attempt anie thing. Neither would she suffer that his people should set foot in Scotland, vnlesse that they were prouoked thereto by iniuries offered them.]

About the same time, the queene regent, hearing that the duke of Norfolk was come to Newcastle as generall lieutenant of the north, sent an herald with a letter to him, in which letter it was signified that the herald had credit to declare further matter than was contained in the same letter. But when he was demanded what he had to say, he denied to haue anie credit at all. Wherefore William Flower, then Chester herald, and now poore king of armes, was was sent unto the quene, who comming to Holie rood house nere to Edinburgh, was receiued by sunoxie heralds, & so was had to one of their houses, and there kept for that night. The next day after he had dined, he was brought to the court, and at his entering within the gates, there were a number of harquebussiers readie with their peeces that discharged and shot off the same.

At his comming to the presence of the quene, he with outfull obeisance deliuered his letters, and after the same had bene read, he was demanded what credit he had to utter. Whereupon he declared, that the duke of Norfolk, being the quenes maiesties lieutenant in the north parts of England, marvelled greatlie that she would send an herald with letters, and write therein how she had giuen credit to him; and yet when he was demanded to utter his credit, he should confesse that he had none. The quene herewith called for the herald, to vnderstand whether he had credit or not: who denied to haue anie at all. Wherewith the quene seemed to be somewhat abashed, but neuertheless she brake forth and said, that she marvelled greatlie that the quene of England should send hir ships into hir riuer, without giuing hir knowledge aforesaid.

Chester answered thereto, that where it was certeinly knowen, that the French king had prepared to send a power of men of warre into Scotland, without aduertising hir thereof; she could not but thinke that dealing verie strange, and therefore had in verie deed sent certein of hir ships, with vittels for provision to be laid within hir towne and castels on the frontiers. Which ships by tempest being dispersed, might happilie be driven into the riuer there, albeit he had not spoke with anie of them since there comming forth. But yet (as he had heard by others) they had bene verie discourteouslie vsed: for comming in after that maner for succor, the canon had bene bent against them. Herewithall the count Martignes standing by, began to speake verie stout words vnto Chester, alleging that where it was perceined well inough, that the quene of England ment to make war against his master the French king, he trusted she should gaine as little thereby, as his sister had done in breaking with hir father Henry the late French king. Chester herunto answered, that he thought to haue found but one regent in Scotland, to whome he should need to make answer: whereupon Martignes was commanded to silence.

All this while the quene had talked with Chester in the Scottish tong. And because he did not so well vnderstand hir, he began to speake in the French language: whereat the quene seemed greatlie to reioice, & so began againe to discourse with him of hir griefs; and he on the other part made hir answer as fell best to purpose. And at length, when he was demanded what further credit he had; he declared, that where she had requested a safe conduct for monsieur la Brosse to passe through England into France, if he would see him safelie conueied to Berwick, he durst assure hir of a sufficient safe conduct for his safe passage through the quene his mistresse realme: but at length, there was another gentleman commended to him, in lieu for la Brosse, that was his cousin. And now when Chester shuld take his leaue, he declared that he had not bene courteouslie dealt with: for since his comming thither, he could not be suffered to passe anie where abroad out of his chamber, but at meale times. And therefore if anie of hir messengers should come into the quene his mistresse dominions, he would procure (if he might) that they should tast of the like intertainment. But the quene seemed not to vnderstand that he had bin in anie wise so hardlie dealt with, shewing that she was not well contented therewith; and so Chester toke his leaue, and returned backe into England, without anie reward for his paines taken in that iourne, at the hands of the Scottish quene: how so euer she liked of his message.

In the meane time, there was an armie prepared in England, of seven or eight thousand men, who were sent into Scotland; the lord Greie of England being appointed generall, who came to the linkes, beside the towne of Leith, on saturday the first of Aprill. Before they pitcht downe their field on the said linkes, monsieur Partigues, colonell of the French armie, issued forth of Leith with nine hundred harquebussiers of Frenchmen, to a little knoll called the Yalke hill, where a fore, continuall, and hot skirmish was begun betwixt the Englishmen and Frenchmen, with bagbuts, caléuers, and pistolets, which skirmish continued five or six houres, in the which there were manie slaine on both parties, and diuerse hurt. At length Partigues was forced with his companie to retire backe to the towne of Leith, and the Englishmen pitched downe their campe, and planted their ordinance beside the said hill.

The lord Greie being in Dunkelburgh, sent to the quene regent, that late as then in the castell at Edinburgh, desiring an abstinence of warre for foure and twentie hours, that in the meane time he might send some of his counsell to declare to hir the cause of his comming with that armie, and to commune of such things as might stanch the shedding of blood. The quene granted herewith, and sent an herald to Leith, to cause the said assurance to be taken: but yer he came to the towne, the skirmish aforesaid was begun with forwardnesse inough of both sides.

In this meane time, the lord Greie sent sir George Howard, and sir James Cross to the castell of Edinburgh, to speake with the quene to that effect: who had long conference with hir vpon the blocke house at the bitter gate of the castell, during the time of the skirmish; where they declared, that the occasion of the comming of the armie, was for the cause aboue mentioned, desiring the quene to procure the Frenchmen to depart the realme of Scotland: and they promised in that case to returne againe into their owne realme, and neither to disquiet Frenchmen nor Scots. Wherupon the quene toke time to be aduised till the next day, that she might consult with the principall personages within the towne of Leith, requiring that it might be lawfull for hir to send to them to that effect, which was granted.

The next day she sent one Drummond a trumpet, or herald (as saith Lelieus) with a letter to monsieur de la Brosse, to the effect aforesaid, directing him to passe to the English campe, and to get a guide with him to go to the towne of Leith, as was agreed: and there was one appointed to go with him. But immediatly after his departing from the English campe, he was suddenlie called backe againe, and his letters taken from him, was commanded to repaire to the castell of Edinburgh to the quene, and to declare to hir that they would not haue anie talke, but would be reuenged on the Frenchmen, for the slaughter of their men the night before. Thus the parole ceasing, the siege was enforced with right sharpe pursute, and strong defending on either part.

The Englishmen cast trenches vpon the south-east side of the towne, and raised a little mount which they called mount Bellam after the capitains name, and placed their ordinance aloft thereon: but because it was so farre from the towne, they did not so much scath thereto as they intended. The lord Greie, lieutenant of the English armie, lodged (during this siege) siege) within the towne of Lethalrike, in the deames house, and the most part of their demilances and other hostmen laie in the same towne. The footmen with their capteins lodged in haies, tents, and pavilions, upon the south and southeast side of the towne of Leith, and diuerse Scottish lords incamped with them in the fields, as the earles of Argile, Arrane, Forston, and Glencarne; the lords Boid, Ogiltrie, the prior of saint Andrews, the maister of Marston, and others. The duke of Chateleault, and diuerse with him remained in Holierood house: and with the quene in the castell, the bishop of S. Andrews, the bishop of Dunkeld, the earle Marthall, the lord Erskin capteine of the castell, maister James Spargill clearke of the register, the prouost of Dunglas, called maister Abraham Chrichton, and diuerse others.

On Easter euen, capteine Wood, and capteine Dethicke, seruing on the sea vnder maister Winter the English admerall there, were appointed by him to passe by the river to Blackenelle, who with their bands going aboard into a barke prepared for that purpose, sailed forward: and on Easter day in the morning, presenting themselves before the castell, it was yelded to them by certeine Frenchmen that were within, and thereupon it was deliuered to the keeping of James Hamilton, an ancient gentleman; and capteine Wood, being set on shore, came to the campe before Leith by land. On blacke Monday, the Frenchmen, issuing forth of Leith, set upon the Englishmen in their trenches, and did much harme: as in the English historie it further appeareth. During the siege thus afoze Leith, the quene regent was soze vexed with sicknesse, but neuertheless, she continued to labor for agrément, not ceasing to send to the lords for to haue the matter taken vp. And for the better accomplishing of hir desire, she procured the earle of Huntly to come forth of the north, who toke by his lodging in Edinburgh, and toke great paines to treat betwixt the quene and lords for some agrément: but when he perceiued his travell to be in vaine, he returned into the north againe, and left the siege lieng still as he found it.

In this meane while, the Englishmen, lodging on the south side of the towne beside mount Pellam, battered with their great artillerie at the parish church of Leith, and at saint Anthones chapele, in which the Frenchmen had laid certeine peces of artillerie, and at length beat it downe: but perceiuing they could not do anie great hurt to the walles on that side, they cast new trenches upon the south and south west side of the towne, and raised a mount there, naming it mount Summerfet, & placed thereon certeine peces in batterie, and so beat the wals, that a great part thereof was overthrowne, and a breach made. Whereupon the Englishmen & Scots on a morning came with their ladders, and presenting themselves to the assault, found the breach nothing reasonable: so that although they egerlie pressed forward to enter the towne, yet they were fiercely beaten backe with great slaughter and bloudshed on both parts, but namelie of the assailants.

The Englishmen, perceiuing that they were too rash in assaulting the towne, being not assailable, deuised other shifts to obtaine their purpose, raising an other mount of earth on the west side of the water of Leith, and named it mount Falcon. Alost on this mount, when it was brought vp vnto a great height, they planted their great artillerie, which continually beat into the towne, soze annoieng them within, but speciallie beating the houses and places by the shore side, so that none might go by nor downe the towne on that part, without danger to be slaine with shot from that mount. The Frenchmen, during the time of the siege, manie times issued forth towards the sands, and sometimes towards the trenches, so that sundrie soze skirmishes chanced betwixt the Englishmen and them, with the slaughter of diuerse, both of the one part and the other. Amongest other of them within, there were slaine two Scottish men of name, to wit, capteine Benetie, and young Henrie Drummond: and of them without, there was slaine a Scottish gentleman, called the lord of Cleish.

The English armie was thoroughlie furnished with vittels forth of all parts of the realme, and that vpon reasonable prices: but the French within the towne could get none, more than they had prouided before the comming of the English armie, which when it began to faile them, they were constrained to eat their owne horses, whose flesh seemed to them in that necessitie more delicious, than before that time anie manner of venison. Those within Insketh also were in great necessitie of vittels: but yet neither they within the one place, nor they within the other, would render their strength, looking still for aid forth of France. * Whilste these things were done in Scotland, the French king, to shew how he fauoured the pope, and how farre he maligned the reformed lords of Scotland, sent his ambassadors John Baborie a Burdseie knight, and that eloquent man Anthonte Muret of France to pope Pius the fourth of that name, to yeld all the dominions of France & Scotland at the popes commandement.

In the meane time, the quene regent, perceiuing hir sicknesse so to increase, that she looked for present death, sent for the duke of Chateleault, and all the lords of Scotland that were in the towne of Edinburgh, and in the campe: who came vnto hir altogether into the castell of Edinburgh, where she made vnto them a graue and pithie exhortation, persuaading them to vnitie and concord with their ancient friends of France; and now more stedfast to them than at anie time before, by reason of the marriage of the quene their good soueraigne, with the king of France. And herewith she brake out into certeine words, to dissuade them from the amitie contracted with the Englishmen, declaring that the Englishmen aided them not for anie other respect, than for their owne turne and commoditie. Whereupon, for hir owne part she said, that she fauoured the weale of the realme of Scotland, as much as France; considering she had the honor to be quene and regent thereof, and hir daughter heritable quene of the same.

Furthermore she said, that if she had attempted anie thing that seemed or appeared to the noble men contrarie thereto; the same came to passe rather for lacke of wise dome and iudgement, than for want of anie good will: and if it pleased God to prolong hir daies, she would be glad to amend that had bene done amisse: and if he called hir to his mercie, she praised them most hartlie to acknowledge their dutie vnto the quene their soueraigne, and to mainteine their ancient amitie with the king and realme of France, & to make some good accord with the French that were within the towne of Leith, who would gladly accept the same, to the end that as well they as the Englishmen should depart this realme. For she feared greatlie (as she said) least if the Frenchmen departed, the Englishmen would still remaine, and subdue the land to their obedience: and therefore she besought all good Scottishmen to haue respect to the libertie and weale of their countrie.

After she had talked thus a good while with manie teares, she desired the lords to forgive hir in anie thing wherein she had offended anie of them, during the time of hir being in Scotland, which they gladly seemed to doe: and on the other part, the forgaue them with all hir hart (as it appeared) all offenses which they had committed against hir: and thus diuerse of them weeping, the took euerie of them by the hand, and so they taking leaue of hir, departed, and returned into Edenburgh, and to their campe. Whilste the siege thus laie before the towne of Leith, diuerse great troubles rose in sundrie parts of the realme, and speciallie betwixt the earle of Huntleie, and the earle of Atholl, so that there was taking of prisoners, and ouerthrowing of houses on either part, and great preparation made, and armies put in a readinesse to invade either others countries.

But this businesse was pacified by the trauell and good mediation of maister Alexander Gordon, then postulat of Gallowaie, maister John Lesle official of Aberdeen, and William Lesle the yong lord of Buchquhan, who agreed them for all matters in controuersie, & caused them to go to either others house.

[During which siege of Leith also, the earle Bothwell, and Sarlause, then capteine of the soldiers, and gouernor of the castell of Dunbar, did at Dunbar with manie light excursions intercept manie of the English and Scots going to Leith, whome they ransomed for a great summe.]

At the same time, one maister Donald Fraser, archdeacon of Kosse, took the bishops castell of the canonrie of Kosse, and kept the same against maister Henrie Sinclair, then bishop there, and the chiefest men of authoritie in that diocesse, as Spachenzee, Balnagoun, Foulis, and the shiriffe Tramerchie, who assembled about the same, and besieged the castell, where great force was vsed, both by them without to win it, and of them within to defend it. The bishop being then resident in Cromerchie castell, hearing that the house would not be gotten without great slaughter, thought it against his conscience, his profit, and honor, to win it in that manner: and therefore sending for maister John Lesle, official of Aberdeen, and maister Alexander Dunbar, subchantor of Pur-terie, by their labour and diligent treating in the matter, the bishop by reasonable appointment recovered his castell of them that held it against him. The French king, vnderstanding in what distresse his men remained that were besieged within Leith, and perceiuing himselfe not able to send an armie to succour them within the time that their necessitie required, thought good to trie if the matter might be taken vp: and to that effect sent two ambassadors, the earle of Haddon, and monsieur Dionuc bishop of Valence, who declared to the queenes maiestie of England, the cause of their coming; which was, to desire hir to retire hir armie south of Scotland, vpon some such reasonable conditions as might be agreed vpon. And herewith they declared that they were sent to the queene, and not unto the subjects of Scotland: for it was not meet that the king should send to his owne subjects (as they were by the marriage of their queene) to require peace, or to condition with them for agreement.

The queenes maiestie of England therefore sent sir William Cecil knight, hir principall secretarie, and doctor Cotton deane of Canturburie and of Pothe, one of the priuie counsell, with the French ambassadors into Scotland. Whilste they were yet vpon their iournie, the queene regent (whome they thought to haue found aliue, and to haue vsed hir helpe as an instrument to haue furthered the treatie to some good end) consumed partlie through melancholie, thought, and grievous displeasure, and partlie with long and incurable sicknesse, departed this life in the castell of Edenburgh the tenth of June, in the yere of our Lord 1560. Her bodie was first conueied into France, to the monastrie of Feschampe, which is in Normandie, from whence it was caried to the abbey of S. Peter at Rhemes in Champaigrie (whereof hir sister was then abbess) in which it was after most honorable buried. She was a wise and vertie prudent princeesse, and in hir time had learned good experience of the nature and inclination of the nobilitie and people of Scotland.

During the time that she was regent, she kept good iustice, and was well obeyed in all parts of the realme in Dikeneie, and the westerne Isles. And if she had to hir owne experience joined the counsell of the nobles and wise men of the realme of Scotland, without following the aduise of strangers, there had bene neuer question nor debate betwixt hir and the nobilitie, as some deemed. But because that others, and namelie, monsieur Dolfell, and Kube, were adioined to hir by the estates of Scotland, who daile pressed hir to deuise new alterations of lawes, impositions, taxation, and such things as were not in vse in Scotland: therefore the estates and people of the land did grudge, although not for anie mistaking they had of hir, who suerlie decessed, to the great griefe and lamentation of the whole number of the estates and people of the realme.

The death of that noble princeesse made the French men within Leith, and also the ambassadors more discouraged than otherwise they would haue bene. But neuertheless these foure ambassadors of England and France coming to Edenburgh, entered in conference among themselves, vpon articles proposed as well for reliefe of the Scottishmen, as for the weale and suretie of the queene of England and hir subjects. Wherevpon certaine lordes of Scotland were admitted to talke with them also: and after long treatie, a peace was concluded the tenth of Iulie, in the yere of God 1560, with certaine articles touching as well Scots and French, as Englishmen. The effect whereof here insueth.

Articles of the peace.

First, it was agreed, that all the Frenchmen should depart south of the realme of Scotland by sea into France, & to that effect should imbarke and make saile within the space of twentie daies next following: and because the Frenchmen had no ships, the Englishmen should lend them ships, and certaine of the Frenchmen remaine as pledges in England, till the same ships were returned.

2 Item, that they should render the towne of Leith, and the Frenchmen to haue their munition, bag, and baggage, to conueie awaie with them at their pleasure, and that the walls of the towne should be thowne downe and demolished.

3 Item, they should cause monsieur Charlebois captaine of Dunbar, to demolish and race the fort which they had built before the castell there.

4 Item, that the Englishmen should raise their siege and depart south of Scotland: after the departure from thence of the Frenchmen, and racing of the walls of Leith and Dunbar.

5 Item, that there should be made an act of obliuion, in which the queene of Scotland, with consent of the French king hir husband, should forget and burie in obliuion all attempts made by the lordes of Scotland against their authoritie, from the tenth day of March 1558, to the first day of August in the yere of Grace 1560. And for confirming thereof, a parlement should be holden in Edenburgh, in the moneth of August next ensuing, in which parlement the same should be ratified and allowed by the aduise of the estates of the realme of Scotland.

6 Also it was agreed, that there should be a commission mission sent from the French king and the quene of Scotland, to hold the same parlement to the effect aforesaid.

7 Item, that the quene of Scotland and king of France should cause to blot out and put a waie the bearing of the armes of England out of their scatchens.

8 Item, it was agreed, that there should remaine still in the Ile of Inskith thre scoze Frenchmen, and as manie in the castell of Dunbar, to keepe (as it were) possession to the quenes vfe.

The whole number of the Frenchmen (a few excepted that passed through England) went aboard the English ships in Iulie, and sailed into France, and in companie with them went the bishop of Glasco and the lord Seton. The Englishmen departed also, and in their way caused the fort of Dunbar to be rased, as by the agreement of the peace it was appointed. A parlement was holden in August, and the act of obliuion ratified by the states, & a confession of faith published in the same: it was concluded also to send ambassadors into England, which was done. And shortly after, the lords summoned the principall learned men of the realme forth of the vniuersities of saint Andzeus, Aberdeen, Glasco, and other parts, to giue a reason of their faith.

And amongst other of Aberdeen that toke vpon them to dispute with John Knox, John Wullocke, and master Goodman [were John Leslie (doctor of both lawes, chiefe iudge of the diocesse of Aberdeen called officiall; who shortly after was senator of the high court, and of counsell to the quene of Scots, and lastlie made bishop of Ross) Patrike Spirton the treasurer, James Strachline canon, and Alexander Anderson a verie graue diuine. At that time these Roman prelats behaued themselves so well, that they were commanded not to depart the towne; but to be present at the sermons of the ministers.]

In the winter, the lords of the counsell gaue faculties of benefices to diuerse of their friends, who put forth the prelats, and receiued the fruits. The earle of Argile disposed Dunkeild and Dunblan. The earle of Arcan had the ordering of the bishopricks of saint Andzeus, also of the abbasies of Dunfermling, and spelloffe, and other small benefices. The like was vsed by other noble men, through all parts of the realme. Shortly after, Francis the French king, husband to the quene of Scotland, departed this life in December, and Charles his brother was crowned in his place. The quene being then widow, and Dowager of France, departed from Orleans (where the court lay when hir husband deceased) and went to the towne of Melmes in Champagne, where she remained till the fifteenth daie of Aprill following.

And then purposing to returne into Scotland, she toke hir iourne towards Januille, and so into Lorraine, there to take leaue of hir kinsfolke by hir mothers side. The bishop of Glasco, and the abbat of Dunfermling Scottishmen, were still attendant on hir in this iourne. There were with hir also the cardinals of Lorraine and Gasse, the duke Daumale, and the marquesse Walbeuf hir vnclies. Amongst whom there had bene great disputation touching the quene of Scotlands returning into hir owne realme, whereunto hir vnclies were verie willing; although some did seeme to state the iourne, whose speeches tended to this effect as followeth.

That the iourne was dangerous, especiallie because the quene of England did not greatlie fauor it; then that she should come to men by nature barbarous & seditious, which would not easilie obey the gouernement of a man. Whereof she had fresh examples before hir eyes, of hir father, and of hir mother, whom (when they either could not or durst not openlie oppresse) they forced to a desperation of things with their manie deuices, with they daily liued by them in danger of honor or of life.

On the contrarie part, they which would haue the Dowager of France returne to hir naturall countrie, and were skillfull of the affaires of Scotland, did allege that those seditions were rather occasioned by the default of the kings & gouernors, than of the subiects; whilst they strived to reduce that kingdom (which from the beginning had alwaies bene free) to infinit bondage, and to the free power of the lawes: which that nation (being more warlike than welthie) could not indure. When contrarilie, they did not onelie defend all their gouernors (which did not attempt the ouerthrow of their liberties) from the outward enemie, and from the inward tumults of the people: but they also made them (though loue and dutie towards their kings) inuincible ouer their enimies, and famous amongst strange nations.

And that the chiefe meane at this time to pacifie all those troubles in Scotland, was not to make alteration of anie thing in Scotland, from the state wherein euen now it standeth. Whereupon she resolved to come speedilie into Scotland, whereof more shall be said hereafter; vntill which, we will intreat of other matters done in Scotland. The quene of Scots hauing hir mind still settled vpon hir returne into Scotland; Poaluis a senator of Burdeaux lawed before this in Scotland (whither he was sent) a little after the end of the publike parlement, for which cause he was stated and turned ouer to the next assemblie of parlement, which was appointed the twelue kalends of Iune.

But when at that time also the nobilitie assembled did not sit in counsell, because they were yet vncertaine of the quenes mind; in the meane time James Steward returned out of France, and brought with him a commission, which gaue them authoritie to hold a parlement, therein to treat and conclude of matters touching the common wealth. Whereupon in the end there was audience giuen to the ambassador, the effect of whose legacie was, to renewe the old league with France, to vndo the league with England, and that priests should be restored to their livings, out of which they had bene thrust by violence.

To these things it was answered, that concerning the league of France, they were not anie waie guiltie of the breach thereof; and contrarilie that the French had manifoldlie neglected the same; but speciallie of late, in seeking the authoritie of their publike libertie, in that they would haue brought the people (their friends and gittles of anie euill) vnto miserable seruitude. For the league with England, they could not by anie meanes dissolue that, except they should be counted most vnthankfull, recompense so great a benefit with great wickednes, & conspire against the defendours of their liberties. And as touching restitution for such as they called priests, they did acknowledge that they had not anie office, vfe, or authoritie in the church.

In this counsell also it was decreed, to ouerthrow all the monasteries of monks, for which cause diuerse were sent out into all places of the realme to execute the same. By occasion whereof, the quene being in France, and desirous to haue peacefull landing in Scotland; would not for this present meddle with religion, but dissembled the same: although Dureus abbat of Ferline, and John Sinclair latelie appointed bishop of Exedine, did vehementlie perswade and labor hir to the contrarie.

Am. ii. In

In this yeare also on the ninth of March, was the election of superintendents at Edinburgh, which was published to serue for the election of all other ministers in this forme following (John Knox being the minister thereof.) First was made a sermon, in which these parts were intreated; principally the necessitie of ministers and superintendents. Secondly the crimes & vices that might vnable them of the ministerie. Thirdlie the vertues required in them. Fourthlie & lastlie, whether such as by publike consent of the church were called to such office, might refuse the same.

The sermon finished, it was declared by the same minister John Knox (the maker of that speech or sermon) that the lords of the secret councill had giuen charge and power to the churches of Louthian, to chuse maister John Spotswood superintendent, & that sufficient warning was made by publike edict to the churches of Edinburgh, Louthian, Strueling, Trenten, Haddington, & Dunbar, as also to earles, lords, barons, gentlemen and others, which haue or might claime to haue voice in the election to be present that daie at the same houre. And therefore inquisition was made, who were present, and who were absent.

After this was called the said maister John Spotswood, who answering to his name, the minister Knox demanded, if anie man knew anie crimes or offenses of the said Spotswood, that might disable him to be called to that office. Which thing thise demanded, there was after question moued to the whole multitude; if there were anie other whome they would put in election with the said Spotswood. Then the people were asked whether (if they admitted the said Spotswood for their superintendent) they would honor and obey him as Christs minister in euerie thing pertaining to his charge.

Whereunto the people answered that they would, which thus granted, there were further questions and matters touching the articles of the apostles creed, and concerning the state of religion propounded to the superintendent, intended to be created. Whereunto, when he had answered affirmatiuelie, the people were againe demanded for his allowance; which they easilie granted with the consent of the nobilitie. These things thus performed, and a certeine praier (to obtaine the spirit of God to be powred into this new elect vessel) finished, the rest of the ministers (if there be anie) and elders of the church present, in signe of their full consent, shall take the elected by the hand.

And so the chiefe minister giuing an expectall benediction (the forme whereof is there set downe, with the exhortation which they must also vse to the elected) this election is wholie finished (without anie imposition of hands on his head) and he sufficientlie created a superintendent minister; of whose election of elders, deacons, excommunications, and other ecclesiasticall regiment, I meane not to speake anie more (as matter impertinent to my discourse, though not to the nature of an ecclesiasticall historie) sith I haue onlie here in hand the politick and temporall gouernement, and not the discourse of religion and essentiall forme thereof.]

Before this, in the beginning of the winter this yeare, the lords sent the earle of Dorset and Clerborne, and the young lard of Leidington secretarie, ambassadors into England; to giue thanks to the queens maiestie of England, for the aid which they had receiued of hir, to expell the Frenchmen. The earle of Spurreie passed through England into France. He departed from Edinburgh the eighteenth of March, and in Aprill came to Vitrie, as hereafter shall appeare; where he found the quene, meaning to submit himselfe. But the day before he came, maister John Leslie officiall of Aberdeen was come thither, who was sent from the earle of Huntley, and other the lords spirituall and temporall of the north parts; he took ship in the roade of Aberdeen, and landing at Bule in Holand, passed through the lowe countries in post till he came to Paris, and from thence unto Vitrie aforesaid [the eighteenth kalends of March] where he found the quene, whom he most dutifullie saluted.

After which (being most courteously received of hir) he opened vnto hir the effect of his ambassage, which consisted speciallie vpon these parts; to admonish the quene that she should not suffer hir selfe to be blinded or deceined with the flattering words of James the prioz of Saint Andrews (hir bassard brother) for his onelie drift was, that he (hauing no French aid with him into Scotland) might obtaine of the quene the whole gouernement of the kingdom, vnder the colour whereof he might more easilie teare & cleane ouerthrow the catholike religion; which he did assault by all meanes possible.

Wherefore Leslie did with all the firmest aduise and counsell which he might, vze the quene not to yeeld to his cloked words. For the obtaining of which demand from the quene, he did sitlie ad to his persuasions, that James did rather aspire to the kingdom, than that he fired his mind and eye vpon the ouerthrow of religion. Wherefore, if she had anie care of hir owne and the realms affaires; she must prouide that this James should remaine in France, vntill she were arrived in Scotland, & had pacified all the tumults there.

But if she would not do so, that yet at least she should take order, that she with hir nauie should land in the north parts of Scotland, & first go to Aberdeen: for by that meanes she might prouide, that the settled lords of the religion might sone be pacified, and the rest which were yet waivering, might more easilie and willingly be brought againe to the catholike religion. For there was an other order to be vsed in Scotland, than that which the French obserued, whilist they gouerned there; at which time vndoubtedly the Scots were hopelesse euer to haue inioied the presence of the quene.

But now, sith that the Scots do vnderstand, that their quene (contrarie to their hope) will returne vnto them, hir presence will (like the rising sun) so cause the clouds of all tumults to vanish out of the minds of all hir subiects, that they will easilie incline to the mind of the quene, whatsoeuer she shall thinke, attempt, set downe, or decreae, in restoring of religion. For the Scots are of that mind towards their princes, as they will in all things obey their vpright gouernors; and are accustomed with no lesse mind to resist tyrants, if they vsurpe vpon them in exaction of authoritie.

Wherefore Leslie did earnestlie persuaide the quene in the name of the earle of Huntley, and the other nobilitie, that she should not giue hir selfe (as vanquished) into the hands of the enemies, and especiallie of James Steward hir brother, from whome (as from a founteine) all their seditions haue had beginning. For James Cullen (kinsman to the erle of Huntley, an expert seruitor in the warres by sea and land) was sent forth with Leslie (as capitaine of that iournee) to bring hir safe to Aberdeen. For all the nobles of the north prouinces will sone be ready with twentie thousand men to gard hir to Edinburgh, and to defend hir against all the counsels, decreits, and forces of all men.

Which message being thus ended from the mouth of Leslie, the quene commanded him not to depart from hir, vntill she returned into Scotland; and further

Euerie nation is to haue his peculiar gouernement in religion, as is best liking to the godlie disposers of the religion of that countrie, sith vulgus monstrum multorum capitulum.

Ambassadors sent into England.

farther gaue in charge, that letters should be written to the pères and nobilitie of Scotland, to let them vnderstand of hir comming into Scotland, & to be a witnesse of hir good will vnto them. The next day after came to the quene at Ustrie, in Champagne, James Stewart (which is toucht a little before) the prioz of S. Andzeius. Who after he had in re-uerence done his dutie, bound himselte with all fi-delitie, trauell, and diligence, most religiouslie vnto to hir; faithfullie further promising, that he would prouide that the Scots should willingly obeie hir, without anie foren powers to be brought by hir into Scotland.

For it was thought that he went into France for that purpose, to dissuade the quene that she should not bring any power of the French with hir. But in the end, bitering his mind more fullie, and putting alwaie all suspicion of deceit, he did with more fami-liaritie request the quene to honor him with the erldome of Murrete. Wherevnto the quene did courteouslie answer, that she would satisfie his request when she came into Scotland. Wherefore, when this James perceiued that the quene was somewhat well bent towards him, and that she credited his words, he attended on hir vnto Jancuile, and there remaining with hir a certeine space, did after go into Scotland (as is before said) to prepare the minds of the people, that they might receive the quene comming into the realme, with good consent and bu-tiful honor; who passing through England, came into Scotland in the halends of Maie.]

The duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Hunt-leie, Atholl, Marthall, and all other the noble men of the realme, aduertised of the quens comming, assembled at Edenburgh with all possible diligence.
In the meane time, whill the quene was preparing to take hir iournie, and to come into Scotland, the quene of England set forth some of hir great ships to the seas, to watch & gard the coasts of hir realme.
Whereof they being aduertised in France, sent the abbat of saint Colmes Inch to the quene of England, to desire of hir a safe conduct, in case by wind or tempest she chanced to land in England. But before he was returned to Calis therewith, as he was appointed; the quene and hir retinue were safelie landed in Scotland; neuertheless, the English ships toke some of the Scottish lords, as the earle of Glenton his ship, and others, which were brought into England, and staied for a time; but were after released, and sent home into Scotland.

The quene also, by the aduise of the k. of France, sent monsieur Doissell into England, to passe through the same into Scotland before hir coming, there to haue receiued the forts of Dunbar and In-keith, of monsieur Charlebois, and to haue kept the same till hir comming. But he was staied, and passed no further than to London: for it was thought that his going into Scotland would turne to no great benefit of that realme: because that he & monsieur Kudele were the principall authors of all the troubles in Scotland, betwixt the quene regent, and the nobilitie there. She was attended on from Paris vnto Calis with manie noble men; namelie hir six vnckles, the dukes of Guise, and Daumall, the cardinall of Lorraine and Guise, the grand prioz, and the marquesse Dalbeuf, also the duke de pemeurs, and other of hir friends and kinsmen.

There were two gallies prepared, and certeine other ships to go with hir into Scotland, and there went with hir three of hir said vnckles, the duke Dan-mall, the grand prioz, and the marquesse Dalbeuf; also monsieur Danuile the constables sonne, and diuerse other. She arrived at Leith the twentieth day of August, in the peare of our Lord 1561, where she was honorablie receiued by the earle of Argile, the lord Erskine, the prioz of saint Andzeius, and of the burgesses of Edenburgh, and conueied to the abbie of Holie rood house. For (as faith Buchanan) Fr.Thin. when some had spread abroad hir landing in Scotland, the nobilitie and others assembled out of all parts of the realme, as it were to a common spectacle. Buchanan, lib. 77.

This did they, partlie to congratulat hir returne, & partlie to shew the dute which they alwaies bare vnto hir (when she was absent) either to haue thanks therefore, or to preuent the dangers of their enemies; whereof not a few by these beginnings of hir reigne did gesse what would follow; although in those so variable motions of the minds of the people, euerie one was verie desirous to see their quene offered vnto them (vnto her) after so manie haps of both fortunes as had fallen vnto hir. For when she was but six daies old, she lost hir father among the cruell tempests of battell, and was by great diligence brought vp by hir mother (being a cholen and worthy person) but yet lest as a prete to others, by reason of ciuill seditions in Scotland, and of outward warres with other nations, being further laid abroad to all the dangers of frowning fortune, before she could know what euill did meane.

For leauing hir owne countrie, she was nourshed as a banished person, and hardlie preferred in life from the weapons of hir enemies, & violence of the seas. After which, fortune began to flatter hir, in that she honored hir with a worthy marriage, which in truth was to this quene rather a shadow of ioie, than anie comfort at all. For shortly after the same, all things were turned to sorrow, by the death of hir new yong husband, and of hir old and greued mother; by losse of hir new kingdome, and by the doubt-full possession of hir old inheritable realme. But as for these things she was both pitied and praised; so was she also for gifts of nature as much loued and fauored; in that, beneficiall nature (or rather good God) had indued hir with a beautifull face, a well composed bodie, an excellent wit, a mild nature, and good behauior; which she had artificiallie furthered by courtlie education and affable demeanour.
Whereby at the first sight, she won vnto hir the hearts of most people, and confirmed the loue of hir faithfull subiects.]

Being thus come out of France, she brought into Scotland manie rich and costlie iewels of gold work, pretious stones, orient pearls, & suchlike, as excellent and faire as were to be found within Europe, with rich furniture of houshold, as hangings, carpets, counterpoints, and all other necessaries for the furnishing of hir princelie houses. The chiefest part of the hangings and other furniture of household, was shipped at Rone, and arrived at Leith in the moneth of October next following. After the quene of Scots had remained the space of foure or fue daies at Holie rood house, the duke of Chatel-rault, the earle of Argile, and diuerse other of the nobilitie being present, there was an act made by the lords of the counsell (in which none of the cleargie (as faith Lesleus lib. 10. pa. 580) were present) with consent of the quene, that to remoue all causes of trouble in time to come for the matter of religion, it was ordeined, that no alteration of the estate of religion publikelie standing within the realme, at hir actuall in the same, should be made; & that nothing should be attempted, either publikelie or priuatelie to the contrarie, vpon great paine, which was put forth and published through all parts of the realme with great diligence.

After this, there were eleuen temporall lords, and one bishop chosen to be of the quenes secret counsell, by whose aduise the should rule and gouerne things; six of them to remaine continuallie with hir in some of officers, as the secretarie, comptroller, and others. The lords of the priuie counsell were these, the duke of Chateleraul, the earle of Huntlie chancelor, the earle of Argile, the earle of Atholl, the earle Sparthall, the earle of Glencarne, the earle of Morton, the earle of Montrose, the earle of Erroll, master Henrie Sinclair bishop of Rosse, and the lord Erskin, with the prior of S. Andrew. * But among these reioysings of the quenes interteinment into hir kingdome, there happened a light fault, but such as did deepe lie enter into the minds of both the factions, of the catholikes (for soth) and of the reformed religion.

For where it was agreed by the quene and the nobilitie, that no alteration should be had of religion in the publike state, yet was masse permitted to hir and to hir familie priuile to be used. For the preparation wherof whilist the vestments and other things were carried through the hall into the chapell, one of the companie snatched awaie the war candels and brake them: by occasion wherof (if some of the household had not come betwene to helpe in that action, and ended the same) all the other furniture had bene thowne downe. Which matter was taken of people diuerslie, some blaming it as a most saucie part; others interpreting it, that it was onelie done to trie the patience of the priest; and some iudged and said that the priest was worthy to be punished with that paine which the scripture appointeth to idolaters.

Which matter in the berie beginning was appeased by James the quenes bastard brother, not yet created, but in expectation earle of Murray. For which cause he would not offend the quene, as I suppose, though afterward he not onelie offended hir, but deposed hir, and set vp hir sonne; as more plainlie shall hereafter appeare. At the quieting of this matter (saith Buchanan) George Gordon was greatlie grieved, being a man bent to all occasions of troubles, who thinking now to win fauor to him thereby, did say to the quenes vnckles that were present, that he would reduce the countrie beyond Callidon vnto the old religion. The which being indeed suspected of manie, and feared by such as had heard manie other things of his wit; they caried the same to the quenes brother, by meanes wherof this little sparke in the beginning was the occasion of all the long ciuill dissention in Scotland, as I am led to iudge by manie reasons.

Leslie lib. 10.
pag. 587.

But now although the gouernment (as before is touched) was appointed to ruelue before named, or at lest to six, which by turnes should be assistant to the quene: yet the whole deed of ruling did in effect depend vpon hir bastard brother James, by reason of the fauor that the quene especiallie did beare vnto him. Wherefore this James, vsing the quenes authoritie at his pleasure, did bestow manie liberall gifts vpon his felowes. Which the nobles so much disliked, that in the end manie of them began egerlie to beare his authoritie, as hereafter shall be more touched.]

of triumphs.

The duke Daumal, after he had remained with the quene a certeine time, toke his leaue of hir, and with the gallies returned into France. The grand prior and monsieur Danuile taried somewhat longer, and passed through England into France. The marquesse Daubeneuf taried in Scotland all the next winter, till the spring of the yere, and then returned into France through England. The towne of Edinburgh prepared great and costlie triumphs for the quenes entering, which she made into that towne in the moneth of September. After this,

she passed vnto Strueling, and from thence to Perth, and then to Dundee, and also to Saint Andrews, into which townes she was received with great honor and triumph. From Saint Andrews she returned vnto Edinburgh, whers she remained all the next winter. In December there was a great assemble of all the principall lords, spiritual and tempozall of the realme; where it was demanded of the prelats, to grant the third part of the fruits of their benefices to the quene, towards the bearing of hir charges for the maintenance of hir traine, and to susteine the ministers, till some order were taken to mainteine hir household, and a gard to tend on hir, by the aduise of the estates.

The quene

townes.

An assemble

An act for the cleargie.

The prelats agreed for the quenes pleasure to support hir with the fourth part of the fruits of their benefices, for one yeres space onelie, to helpe to beare hir charges, and to susteine hir gard; and in the meane time order might be taken by the aduise of the whole estates for the same. But notwithstanding the refusall of the prelats to paie the third part, the lords of the priuie counsell made an act, and set forth letters, that all the prelats and beneficed men should be charged to paie yere lie to the quenes comptroller and his collector, the whole thirds of all fruits of their benefices: and that it should be lawfull to the comptroller and his deputies, to take the third of what part of euerie benefice where he best pleased, and to deale therewith at his pleasure: also to haue to do with the rents of brotherhoods of common churches, and such like. This order hath bene obserued euer since, not without great grudge of the prelats, and other beneficed men of the realme, and their friends, as well those that professed the reformed religion, as others.

* Whilist these things were in doing, William Pettellan the younger was sent ambassadoz into England, to salute the quene of that realme (as the maner is) & to declare the good mind that the quene of Scots bare vnto hir, & the desire that his mistresse had to haue peace and vnitie preserved betwene them. Besides all which, and manie other demands touching Scotland (which I suppress for manie reasons, bicause (as Salomon saith) Corregis infirmabile, & the mysteries of princes gouernment are not to be laid open to common eyes and eares) this ambassadoz deliuered letters to the quene of England from the nobilitie of Scotland. In which there was a courteous remembrance of hir former fauor and of their good will. Requesting further that the quene of England would shew a publike and priuat liking and friendship to their quene, to the end that the quene of Scots prouoked by hir benefits, might not onelie remaine stedfast in the amitie already began: but might also (if it were possible) be dallie more and more fast bound vnto hir: and they for their parts would not omit anie occasion with all god will and diligence to continue this amitie.

Fr.Thin.
Buchan. lib. 17.

To which ambassadoz the quene of England made no lesse honorable than wise answer: the effect whereof, because it concerneth matter of great importance, & is long and largelie already set downe by Buchanan, in hir maiesties singular commendation to the whole world in the Latine tong, I thinke it not necessarie here to repeat: and therefore I do purposely omit the same, least I might seeme by flatterie to intrude my pen into the eloquent speech of hir maiestie: and not being able to deliuer it with such grace as both she spake it, and Buchanan peneth it, I might dishonor hir, & ouerthrow my selfe, like vnto Phaeton. For as he, taking vpon him to rule the chariot of the sunne, was by his insufficiency therefore consumed with the heat and glorie thereof; so should I in presuming with unskill to pen the tale tale of such a twoſhye prince, conſtains my credit, in miſordering or defacing the maielte, grautie, wiſe, dome, and life of hir ſingular wit and eloquence. For whych cauſe, leauing the ſame, we do in this ſort bring backe our pen to the continuance of the hiltorie of Scotland.

The quene of Scots had a brother called John, a man deſirous of anthozitie, but yet not ſo ſeuere in mind as was James the other brother. This John eaſilie perſuading himſelfe to obeie the quene in all things, was the moze dære vnto hir, and moſt fit for hir, deſirous (as ſaith Buchanan, but how trulie I know not) to conſound all things. With this John (in abſence of the other brother James) ſhe did conſult to hie a companie of ſouldiers to be about hir, the cauſe whereof was this. In the night there was a tumult or ſtur, as though the earle of Arran would, in the ſence of the nobilitie, ſecretlie ſet vpon the quene, and by ſtrength haue labored to carie hir to his caſtell, which was ſouretene miles from thence. All which ſeemeth likely to be but a tale, either for the quenes mind that was eſtranged from him, or for the ſimmoberat loue which he bare vnto hir: both which were ſufficientlie knowne to the common people. Which tumult being ſpzed abroad, theſe ſouldiers after they had all night ſcolyzed the fields, riding vp and downe hiſther & thither, they thewed themſelues the next day befoze the court gates, to the offence of ſome, and the iſt of others.]

The ſunday befoze Shouetueſdaie, being the eight day of Februarye (as ſome write) James ſteward then prior of ſaint Andzewes, and earle of Mar, baſe brother to the quene, was made earle of Murrie, [in place (as ſaith Buchanan) of the earledome of Mar, which belonged to John Arſkin] by the quens ſpeciall giſt, and was married the ſame day vnto Agnis Keith, daughter to the erle Marſhall, with great feaſts and triumphs, laſting thre daies. * In which marriage he did ſo much exced, that he greatlie offended the minds of his friends, and miniſtered matter to his enimies to ſpeake euill of him; and that the moze vehementlie, becauſe he had befoze time in all his life behaued himſelfe far moze temperatlie than he did at this time.]

The quene of England deſirous to haue a meeting betwixt hir and the quene of Scots hir coſine, ſent diuerſe meſſengers with letters, deſiring hir moſt inſtantlie to come to Forke, where they would meet hir, to talke with hir of diuerſe matters, that might make to the confirmation of the amitie and friendſhip which nature had knit betwene them, by conſuntion and affinitie of blood. And after conſultation had with hir counsell, the quene of Scots agreed thereto: and ſo they were appointed to meet at Forke in the moneth of Iulie next following. But when things were prepared and put in a readineſſe for the iournie, the quene of England ſent word to the quene of Scots, that ſhe could not keepe the appointment made for their meeting, deſiring hir to haue hir excuſed for that time. Which meſſage was accepted, and ſo the iournie ſtayed.

* Much about this time, or rather ſomewhat befoze, as in truth I ſuppoſe it was, James Hamilton being duke of Chatelerault, and father to the earle of Arran, firſt wrote to the quene, then after went he vnto hir to ſaint Andzewes, and with manie praers requested hir that ſhe would vpon ſufficient pledges deliuer to him the earle Bothwell, and Gauen Hamilton, but he could not obtaine anie thing therein at hir hands. At what time alſo the quene went to Dunbryeton (which Hamilton held ſince the time that he was gouernor) to demand the deliuerie of the ſame into hir hands, which was accordingly deliuered vnto hir. Shortlie after, the quene of Scots toke hir iournie towards the north parts of Scotland, and ſet from Striueling in the moneth of Auguſt.

About this time it chanced that the lord Ogilue, and John Gordon of Finnatere, ſonne to the earle of Huntlie, met on the caſſete of Edenburgh & fought, where (after manie blowes and ſtripes giuen and taken) the lord Ogilue and his companie were hurt. Wherefoze John Gordon was taken, & put in ward at the tolbutth of Edenburgh, out of which he eſcaped, after he had remained priſoner therein about twentie daies, and toke his waie northward: where vpon followed great trouble ſhortlie after to the houſe of Huntlie. The quene accompanied with the earles of Argile, Murrie, and Gordon, the lord Erſkin, and others, paſſed forwards in hir iournie towards the north part, and cauſed John Gordon of Finnatere to be ſummoned to appeere and anſwer the law at Aberdeen, for breaking priſon, and hurting the lord Ogilue. The quene comming to the towne of Aberdeen, was honorable receiued with diuerſe orations, and Latine enterludes, befoze the grammar ſchole and college.

* Theſe things thus done at Aberdeen, as the quene determined to go further, ſhe was intreated by John Elſe a noble man, and follower of the Gordons, to vouchſafe his houſe in hir waie, being 12 miles from the towne: to which ſhe granted, & went vnto the ſame. This place, becauſe it was no common place of reſort, was thought verie conuenient for the execution of the earle of Murrie, whoſe death was conſpired (as after ſhall appeere.) Where vpon Elſe, who was not ignozant of this ſecret counſell, beſought the quene that ſhe would not laie ſuch a note of infamie vpon him and his familie, that he ſhould ſeeme to haue betrayed the chiefeſt brother of the quene, no euill man, and one that was not his enimie, whereby he might come vnto his death at his houſe. Wherevpon it then ceaſed, and the next night was alſo quietlie paſſed ouer at Rothſimie, a towne of the Abernethians, becauſe the next day the quene was determined to go to Strabogie.]

Wherevpon the earle of Huntlie, hauing befoze heard that his ſonne was thus ſummoned, aſſembled the principall earles, lords, barons, and gentlemen of the north, who came with him to Aberdeen, to helpe his ſon at the law day appointed for his apereance, which was in September. The earle came vnto the quene himſelfe, and at length it was agreed, that his ſonne the ſaid John Gordon ſhould returne to priſon againe in Striueling caſtell, there to remaine during the quenes pleaſure. But he following the euill counſell of ſome yong heads that were with him, neither fulfilled the quenes pleaſure, nor his fathers appointment, but attempted to reuenge his extreme handling (as he toke it) vpon the earle of Murrie, whom he put moſt in blame for the rigoz thewed againſt him, but his enterpriſe toke not effect. Now the quene aduertied of his diſobedience, went not to Strabogie, notwithstanding there was great preparation made for hir in that place, for the receiuing of hir and hir traine: but ſhe went vnto Ballwanie, the earle of Athols place, and from thence to Kinlos, to Carnelwaie, and ſo came to Inuernelle, and there lodged.

In this meane while, the earle of Huntlie, purpoſing to attend on the quene at Inuernelle, cauſed prouiſion to be made in the caſtell for his lodging. The quene ſuſpecting his dealing, leaſt this ſhould be done vpon ſome policie, commanded the keepers of the caſtell to render the ſame to one of hir heralds: but it was not deliuered till the next day, and therefoze the capteine of that caſtell called Alexander Gordon, for reſuſing to deliuer it, was hanged vpon the towne to toun bidge. The lord Gordon & his brother John Gordon of Finnatere came that night within a little space distant from the towne of Inuernesse, which caused great feare in the towne, so that there was a diligent watch all that night. The earle of Huntley being come to Kinlosse, and hearing that the castell of Inuernesse was commanded to be giuen by into the hands of an herald, sent with all diligence to the keepers, that they should deliuer it, & returned himselfe to Strabogie.

The quene remained in Inuernesse the space of foure or fve daies, where the principall capteine of the clanes of the countrie came to hir, and with a great compaignie [of the ancient Scots (as hath Buchanan) whereof the chiefe were the Fraisers and Spurreies, valiant families in those parts] conueied hir to Spine, where she was informed that the earle of Huntley had gathered an armie to come against hir, and made their assemble at Spaie. Whereupon, they toke with them all the artillerie ouer Spine, and caried the same in carts, and all other kind of munition, and passed forward to Bamf that night. The earle of Huntley all this while came not forth of Strabogie. The quene as she passed forward, rode to the place of Finnatere, and there in hir owne presence, caused the keepers thereof to be charged to deliuer it, which they refused to do. From Bamf the quene rode to the lard of Weichtis place, called Weicht, and the next day there was great preparation for hir entrie into the new towne of Aberdeen. She lodged one night in the bishops palace, and the next day she was honorablie receiued, and lodged in the prouosts house of the towne, where she remained all the time of hir abode in Aberdeen.

After this, the lord John pizer of Colbingham, with diuerse gentlemen, was sent against the earle of Huntley to Strabogie, but he was escaped before they approached. The ladie Huntley receiued them verie courteously, and gaue them good intertainment, and so they returned. There was charge giuen to Louthian, Fife, Angus, Stratherne, the Perns, and to the shire of Aberdeen, to come to Aberdeen quarterlie, euerie countrie to remaine there fiftene daies; and so they did, during the time of hir abiding there. The earle of Huntley sent his wife in message to the quene and counsell, but she was not admitted to come within a mile of them, but commanded to returne. After this, he sent a messenger, offering to enter in ward till his cause might be tried by the whole nobilitie: but this was refused. In the meane time all the principall of the Gordons that were landed men, were charged to enter into ward. About the same time James Hepburne earle of Bothwell, who (upon displeasure conceiued against him about a quarell betwixt him and the earle of Arrane, had bene committed to prison in Easter towke last before past) escaped out of Davids towne in Edinburgh at a window.

The earle of Huntley, vnderstanding by his friends at the court how things passed, determined to fte to the mounteins: but after (trusting to the promises of his friends) he determined to abide battell in a place of some strength. Whereupon in October he came with his armie to Cozethie in Spar. By reason whereof the earle of Spurreie, who at the first had scarce a hundred horsemen with him, began with James Dowglass earle of Morton, and Patrike Lindseie, to lead an armie against his enemies, and gathered a greater number of eight hundred people of the regions adioining. Wherefore he first placed souldiers about the water passages, to keepe all those places, that Huntley should not escape, and with the rest went forward on a foot pale, to meet his enemy: whose comming Huntley did abide, with three hundred men, keeping their places, although not a few of that compaignie were fled from the Gordons the night before.

When the earle of Spurreie was come to the side of a hill, from whence he might see all the marshes about him, he incamped there in a slender order of battell. At length the armies met, at what time manie on the earle of Spurreie his side did fte awaie, hauing before giuen a signe to the enemy. But the earle Spurreie, which saw there was no succour in fleeing, stood to it valiantlie, called his men together, set upon the enemy, caused them (which before followed his men fleeing awaie) now to fte as fast backe as they came forward. Which change of fortune when the traitors that before fled did perceiue, they came afresh and pursued the Huntleys, and (to cleare them from the first fault) committed all the slaughter that was done that daie.

There was killed of the part of Huntley a hundred and twentie, and a hundred taken: but on the other side not one. Amongst such as were taken, was the earle Huntley himselfe, and his two sons, John and Adam. But the father being old and short breathed by reason of his grossenes, was slaine betwene the hands of such as toke him, and the rest were late in the night brought to Aberdeen. The quene seemed sorie for the earles death. But in Nouember John Gordon was beheaded in Aberdeen, and shortly after the quene returned southwards, leauing foure commissioners in Aberdeen, the tresuroz, maister James Macgill, maister John Spens of Cumbie, and the lard of Westarrow, to compound for the effects of them that were in the field with the earle of Huntley. Great summes of monie were taken and leued of them for that trespass. The earle Bothwell was commanded the first kalends of December by an herald to yeld himselfe againe to prison, but because he would not, he was declared a public enemy.

The lord George Gordon, eldest sonne to the earle of Huntley, was taken by the duke of Chatelaerant his father in law, at Cumeruoull, and brought to Edinburgh, where he was put in the castell, and after by a iurie conuict, forsaled, and condemned to die, and sent to Dunbar castell, there to remaine in ward, where he continued till the yere of God, 1565. At this time was a monie milt set upon such as did eat flesh in the time of Lent. The setting forth thereof was not so much for religion, as for publicke commoditie, by the iudgement of Buchanan. The archbishop of saint Andrews, because (after an edict made therefore at the quenes comming into Scotland) he did not abstaine from hearing and saleng masse, was committed prisoner to the castell of Edinburgh, and the rest that were found in such actions were fined, with promise of a greater punishment to be laied upon them, if they were found offending againe in that sort.

The quene held a parlement in Edinburgh, where the earle of Huntleys dead bodie was brought presented before the estates in the tolbooth, and forsaled. The earle of Sutherland George Gordon was forsaled also, and diuerse other of their friends. And in this parlement the act of obliuion was ratified and approved, and diuerse other new acts made. This yere in August, the quene went on progresse into Argyle. This yere deceased diuerse counsellors or senators of the college of Justice, as maister John Stephanson chancelor of Glasco, and the prouost of Constrophine. In place of the first, maister John Leslie, official of Aberdeen, was promoted; and in the prouosts place maister James Baulfour succeeded. There came an ambassadoz from the king of Sweden, to treat of a mariage to be contracted with the quene, but his message was not regarded. The second of Julie, Henrie Sinclair bishop of Ross shipped at Leith to passe into France, to procure some helpe of his discaise. He was cut of the stone in Paris, and died the second of Januarie next after. There succeeded to that bishop, like of Ross, maister John Lelle, parson of Owen, being then one of the senators of the session and college of iustice.

In the moneth of August, the quene passed into Atholl in progresse, and from thence to Wadzenoch, to Inverness, and to the canonrie of Ross, and returned through Perthie to Gartlee, Aberdeen, Dunnoter, and so to Edinburgh, where she remained the next winter. In the moneth of October, the earle of Lennor came into Scotland, and for his cause there was a parlement holden in December, in which he was restored to all his lands, honours, and dignities, within that realme. In December also, the bishop of Dunblane deceased, and after him succeeded maister William Chesholme his brothers son.

In Januarie, the quene took hir iourneie through Fife, and in manie gentlemens places was banqueted. In which time, Henrie Steward, lord Darneleie, a goodlie man of personage, and sonne to the earle of Lennor, came into Scotland, where he came to the quenes presence in the Weames, the ninth day of February. The quene so well liked him, that she assembled all the temporall lords together at Striueling, in the moneth of Aprill, and there obtained of them their consents, that he might marrie the said lord Darneleie. After this, he was made earle of Ross.

In the meane time, the quene of England sent sir Nicholas Throckmorton into Scotland, to understand the proceedings in the quenes marriage with the lord Darneleie, and for other affaires, who came to the assemblee at Striueling to that effect. The quene of Scots sent maister John Haie abbat of Balmerinoch into England to the quene, to mitigate hir displeasure towards the lord Darneleie, and to obtaine hir consent to the marriage; who answered, that she ment to send an ambassadoe of hir owne into Scotland for that and other causes, and (according to hir promise) she sent one. Shortly after, certeine captains & men of warre in saint Andrews, Dundee, and saint Johns towne, received monie about the same time of the earle of Perthie, to take part with him, for the which they were after punished. After the assemblee at Striueling, the quene seemed not to like of the earle of Perthie so well as she had done before: whereupon he departed the court, and repaired to saint Andrews, where (through the counsell of certeine persons) he sought waies to stop the marriage.

The quene neuertheless sent the bishop of Dunblane to Rome for a dispensation to marrie with the lord Darneleie, being hir cosine in the second degree of consanguinitie, which he obtained, & sent it home shortly after. The quene was then principallie counselled by the earles of Atholl, and Lennor, the lord Ruthven, and their friends. In the meane time, the earle of Perthie perswaded the duke of Chateaufault, the earle of Argile, and sundrie other, to meet at Striueling, where they made a bond to stop the marriage, alleging the same to be made for maintenance of the religion. The quene advertised thereof, released the lord Gordon south of prison, wherein he had bene kept within the castell of Dunbar, and restoring him to his fathers lands, created him earle of Huntlee. She also sent for the earle of Bothwell to returne home, who was banished, and was then in France [and the earle of Southerland to returne out of Flanders.]

In the moneth of Julie, the lord Darneleie earle of Ross was made duke of Albanie. And on saturdaye at euen, the eight and twentieth daie of the same moneth, before the marriage, he was proclaimed king by the quenes commandement at the market crosse of Edinburgh. And on the nine and twentieth daie of the same moneth, he was married to the quene in the chappell of Holie rood house, at five of the clocke in the morning. Shortly after, the duke of Chateaufault, the earles of Argile, Perthie, and their companies, were summoned to appeere before the quene and hir counsell within six daies; & because they refused to do so, they were put to the horne.

The king and quene thereupon assembled their power, and by a herald demand the deliuerie of the castell of Hamilton. But (he returning without the effect of his message) they addresse themselves to warre. At that time the lords of the congregation were at some variance amongst themselves, as severed into diuerse opinions: for the Hamiltons that were of greatest power in those places, did affirme, that they should haue no firme conditions of peace, except the king and quene were made awaie: for so long as they were in health, they could hope for nothing but new warres, new deceits, and dissembled peace; a thing farre more dangerous than open war. For though manie times the intories of priuat persons maie be laied downe by trauell and perswasion, and maie be recompensed againe with great commodities: yet there is no waie to appease the displeasure of kings, but by taking them awaie.

Upon which bad speech, the earles of Perthie and of Glencarne (which well understood that the Hamiltons did not seeke the publike commoditie, but their owne priuat riches as persons that were next to the crowne after the quens death) did abhor the slaughter and gouernement of the Hamiltons, whom of late they had felt to be both cruell and contentious: and did therefore giue more mild and sound counsell, saing that this dissention being tinnill, was not yet come to be bloudie: in which hitherto they had onelie contended with words & not with swords, being not yet so far, but that (if it were possible) the same might be ended with honest conditions.

To the perswasion whereof, he said that there were manie in the camps of the two princes, which gracillie desired to heare of peace, & would not faile to further their endeuor therein, nor to defend themselves & their cause with needfull weapons: all which did perchance foresee that the king and quene (by reason of their youth) had not yet faulted so greatly, as that it turned to the utter overthrow of the common-wealth; & if they haue faults (as who hath not) they were such as were rather to their owne priuat reproch than otherwise, and therefore they ought not to be punished with flat death: but rather to be cured with easier remedies. For he did remember it to haue alwaies bene obserued, heretofore, that in the life of kings, we should alwaies couer their secret vices, we should mildlie interpret their doubtful fautes, and we should with patience beare their knowne evils: so that they did not by them bring utter destruction to the common-wealth.

When this opinion was pleasing to most of the hearers, the other Hamiltons (except James, which was head of that familie) determined to rest in quiet; but he accompanied with sixtene horses remained with the lords. Who being now so weakened of their power, that they could neither wage battell, nor safely passe to their owne; did giue place to the tunc, and went that night to Hamilton. The quene assembled an armie, and went to Glascow to pursue them [at that time (as sayth Buchanan) the earle of Lennor was made warden of the east marches, and the duke and earles with other of their companies nie came to Edinburgh, where the castell shot off at them, and therefore they departed towards Dunfreis, and were receiued by the lord Heris.

The quene hearing thereof, by aduise of hir council assembled forth of all the parts of the whole realme an armie, appointing the same to be at Begggar, in the beginning of October, to pursue the rebels. In the meane time, the hearing that the townes of saint Andrews, Dundee, and saint Johns towne, had helped the lords to raise men of warre for their support, passed thither hir selfe, and toke inquisition thereof, giuing order in those townes, that no such thing should afterwards be put in practice. But there were none that suffered death for that matter; but diuerse were committed to prison in the north parts of the realme, as the prouost and bailzeis of saint Andrews: also certeine of the towne of Dundee, and saint Johns towne, and other were banished; and diuerse barons, as Lundie, Lango, and Balward, were sent to Aberdeen, and to other parts, where they remained the winter following.

About this time, the quene toke the castell of Tantallon from the earle of Hoxton, because he was suspected to fauor the rebels. The keeping thereof was giuen to the earle of Atholl. The quene returning to Edinburgh in September, prepared all things necessarie for the armie, and departing from Edinburgh, came to Begggar, where all the noble men with their retinues were assembled the eight of October. From thence they passed forward to Dunfreis. In the meane time, the duke of Chatelerault, the earles of Murreie, Glencarne, Rothes, the lord Ochiltre, the abbat of Kilwinning, the lords of Orange, Cuninghame, Herdie, Pettarroto, maister James Haliburton tutor of Petcur, and others, hearing of the quens comming with an armie, fled into England & came to Caerleill, where they were receiued, the earle of Bedford at that time being lord lieutenant of the north.

The lord Heris then maister of Sparwell conuened them to the water of Sulweie, and afterward returned to Dunfreis to the quene, where (of hir clemencie) he got pardon of his offense; and the lords of Lochinuar and Dunlanrig likewise. After the armie had taried certeine daies, putting direction for obseruing of good order in the countrie, the quene returned to Edinburgh, where she remained all the next winter. The quene sent the maister David Chalmer chancelor of Rolse into France to the king, with letters for his assistance against hir rebels. And shortly after, the French king sent a gentleman called monsieur Paluolier into Scotland, with verie friendly letters vnto the quene, promising his helpe & assistance against the rebels; which message was most thankfullie receiued, and the said Paluolier honorable at his departure rewarded.

The duke of Chatelerault, and the other lords with him departed from Caerleill to Newcastle vpon Tyne, and from thence sent the earle of Murreie, and the abbat of Kilwinning to the quene of England, making sute to hir grace for aid to be restored to their countrie againe. The quens maiestie promised them, that she would send a gentleman to the quene hir sister, and moue hir in their fauors, as she did; and so they returned to Newcastle, where the duke of Chatelerault, perceiuing no other helpe appearing, sent the abbat of Kilwinning into Scotland to the quene with letters, submitting himselfe to hir graces will, and so he obtained pardon for him and his friends, with licence to passe into France, there to remaine the space of three yeares, and shortly after he passed through England, and so ouer into France, according to his appointment.

The king passed the most part of that winter in the countries of Fife, Stratherne, Striuelingshire, & Loughlan; spending his time in hawking. The quene remained at Edinburgh with the nobilitie, and because she was conceiued with child, trauelled little abroad. About this time was a new order taken for placing the king and quens name in all their writings and patents. For where, vntill this time, the kings name was set before the quens: now quite contrarie, the name of the quene was written before the kings: besides which, afterward the quene hir selfe would onelie set hir name to the writings in place of his and his; and David the secretarie was appointed in his place to haue a stampe of the kings name, to be when need required.]

In the meane time a parlement was called, to be holden in the moneth of March next ensuing, and summons decreed against the earle of Murreie, and the other lords that remained in England, and also against the earle of Argile, then in his countrie of Argile to heare them so called. The French king sent monsieur Kambeneullet into Scotland, as ambassadoz from him to the quene, with commission, to make the king hir husband knight of the order of S. Michaele. Which with great solemnitie and reuerence was accomplished in the chappell of Holie rood house the tenth of Februarie, being sunday: after the which, the said Kambeneullet returned into France, being highly rewarded.

From that time that the parlement was proclaimed, and the summons also published, the earle of Murreies friends being in Scotland, neuer ceased to seeke all the waies and means they could deuise to staie the same: in so much that the earle of Hoxton, the lord Ruthwen, and the lord Lindseie, secretly persuaded the king to staie the parlement, and also to consent to the restoring of the erle of Murreie and his complices, making to him faithfull promise, that if he would follow their counsell, he should be made & crowned king of Scotland absolutelie, and the quene so to haue lesse to doe with the gouernement afterwards, where through he agreed to the m.

And so after the parlement was assembled, the lords of the articles being chosen the senenth day of March, they perceiuing the faulture like to proceed, and iudgement thereof to be giuen, the eleuenth of March next following, the king with the assistance of the said earle of Hoxton, the lords Ruthwen, and Lindseie, entred into the quens priue chamber about eight of the clocke in the night, being saturday, and the ninth of March; where being arriued in warlike manner, the lord Ruthwen declared vnto the quene, that they would not suffer hir anie longer to haue the gouernement of the realme, to abuse the same by the counsell of strangers, as she had done; and therefore pulled violentlie out of hir chamber David Ritchie an Italian, that was one of hir secretaries, crieng pitifully, Iustitia, Iustitia: and in hir utter chamber they suddenlie slew him with great crueltie. The king himselfe was also present, and his dagger was likewise found sticking in the dead bodie.

The quene was shut vp within hir chamber, and certeine appointed to attend hir, and to keepe all the doores and gates about the palace. The earles of Huntlee and Bothwell escaped by a backe window forth in their chamber, whereof the king and his companie were right sorie. The erle of Atholl and others being with him, departed in the night season by a ferrie ouer the Forth, called the quenes ferrie, and went to S. Johns towne. On the morow being sunday (the quene being secretlie kept) proclamation was made, that all the lords that had voice in parlement ment, shuld depart out of the towne of Edinburgh: and after none the same day, the earles of Murreie and Mothes, with other of their companies that came forth from Newcastell the saturday before, came to the abbeie of Holie rood house about six of the clocke in the after none, where they were thankfullie receiued by the king and his compantie. They spake also with the quene, who had no great comfort of their comming.

They made their proclamation.

The morrow following, being monday, the earle of Murreie, and the other that were summoned, passed to the tolbuith of Edinburgh, & made their protestation there, that they were readie to answer in parlement, and none appeared to accuse them. After this, it was concluded to keepe the quene in strict ward. But by hir politike demeanour, their purpose in that behalfe was broken: for by secret conference with the king, she perswaded him to thinke, that he had ioined himselfe with those that would be his destruction, if it happened with hir otherwile than well; as was no lesse to be doubted, by reason of the high displeasure that she had taken being quicke with child: through the which persuation, and other misliking of things, he departed secretly with hir in the night season, accompanied onlie with two men, and first came vnto Seiton, and after ward from thence to Dunbar.

Huntleie and Bothwell.

Whither the earles of Huntleie and Bothwell hastily repaired, by whose counsell and others then with hir, she caused proclamation to be made in diuerse parts of the realme, charging all manner of men in seats of warre, to come vnto hir to Dunbar, & to passe from thence vnto Edinburgh within six daies after. She also sent letters to the same effect vnto diuerse noble men of the realme, who prepared themselves with great diligence to meet hir. The earle of Murreie and the rest of the lords being with him, hearing the preparation that was made against them, and perceiuing themselves not able to resist, thought good euerie of them to seeke some particular meane to obtaine remission at the quens hands. Which they obtained all of them, except the earle of Moxton, the lords Ruthwen, Lindseie, and such other as were with them at the murder of David Richeo. Whereupon they desparing of pardon, fled into England; where the lord Ruthwen died at Newcastell shortly after, as in place ye shall heare.

The earle of Lennor, being partaker with them, came to Dunbar, and got pardon: the earle of Glen-carne and the lard of Cunningham head came thither also, and were pardoned. Likewile the earle of Mothes purchased his pardon at the same time. The earles of Argile and Murreie, and the lord Both, being at Lithquo, sent to the quene for their pardon, and obtained it, being commanded neuertheless to passe into Argile, and to remaine there during hir graces pleasure, which commandement they obeyed. The eighteenth of March, the quene well accompanied came to Haddington towards night: and on the nineteenth day, the bishop of saint Andrews, and the Hamiltons met hir at Musselburgh, and so likewise did the lords Levingston, Fleming, Hume, Bothwicke, and manie other noble men, and conueied hir vnto Edinburgh.

She lodged in the bishop of Dunkelds lodging, and taried there a certeine space, hauing with hir the earls of Huntleie, Atholl, Bothwell, Crawford, Mar, Hall, Southerland, Cathnes, the bishops of saint Andrews and Ross; the lords Levingston, Fleming, and diuerse other noble men, by whose counsell order was taken for redressing of the state of the realme, whereby the same was shortly brought to great quietnesse. After this, the quene perceiuing herselfe to draw nere the time of hir deliuerance, went to the castell of Edinburgh, there to remaine till she were deliuered of hir birth. In the moneth of Maie, Thomas Scot thirifte, deputie of Berth, & a priest called sir Henrie Pair, seruant to the lord Ruthwen, were apprehended for being doers in the slaughter of David, and were hanged and quartered. Their heads were set aloft, the one on the towler in the abbeie, and the other on the nether bow.

In the moneth of April this yere, the bishop of Brechin president of the session, deceased, and in his roome succeeded to that bishoprike, a friend and cousin to the earle of Argile, called Campbell. In the end of April, the quene, willing to haue the earles of Argile and Murreie ioined with the rest of the counsell, sent for them to come to the castell of Edinburgh, where all griefs and controuersies that rested betwixt them on the one side, and the earles of Huntleie, Atholl, & Bothwell on the other side, were referred to the quene, who agreed them, and they all remained with hir the residue of the summer. The quene hearing that the earle of Moxton, the lord Ruthwen, and the other their assistants were receiued in England, and remained at Newcastell; she sent maister James Thornton chantor of Murreie, with letters to the quene of England, and also to the king of France, and other hir friends there; declaring by the tenor of the same letters the abuse and presumptuous attempts of certeine hir subiects against hir, desiring them not to receiue them within their realmes or dominions.

Shortly after, the quene of England sent a gentleman called Henrie Milligrew into Scotland, with letters and message to the quene, promising to cause them to depart forth of hir realme of England: and withall sent vnto them warning to depart betwixt that present time, and midsummer then next ensuing. But in the meane time the lord Ruthwen departed this life at Newcastell, with great repentance of his former life: giuing God thanks, for that he had lent him time to call to him for mercie and forgiveness, whereof he did assure himselfe. And from thenceforth the earle of Moxton, and the maister of Ruthwen, remained secretly nere to Antwoike, and other places of the borders, till they obtained pardon, and were restored. About this time there came from the king of France a wife & aged gentleman, named monsieur la Crocke, as his ambassador, and remained in Scotland all the winter following.

of France.

In the moneth of June, the quene perceiuing the time of hir deliuerance to approach, wrote vnto all the principall noble men of hir realme, to come and remaine within the towne of Edinburgh, during the time of hir deliuerance, where they assembled: and the king hir husband, with the earles of Argile, Murreie, Atholl, and Mar, remained with hir in the castell; and the earle of Huntleie, Bothwell, and the remnant of the lords lodged in the towne. And vpon the nineteenth day of the same moneth of June, betwixt 10 and 11 of the clocke before none, hir grace was deliuered of a goodlie man-child, to the great comfort of hir highnesse, and all hir subiects, whereof the nobilitie did greatlie reioice. And incontinentlie all the artillerie in the castell was shot off, and all the lords and people came together in the church of saint Giles, to giue thanks to almightie God for his great and beneficiall goodnes shewed to them, in giuing to them a prince, and withall made their humble prayers vnto his diuine maiestie, to indue him with the feare of God, with vertue and knowledge to gouerne the realme and subiects thereof, when so euer the same should fall into his hands.

The same night at euen, there were great fires for ioy made in the towne of Edinburgh, and in all the the countrie about, and likewise through all the whole realme, as by advertisements were certified therof. The queene remained still in the castell of Edinburgh all the moneth of Julie following, till she had recovered hir health and strength. In the beginning of August, she passed by the water of Forth to Allowaie, where she remained certeine daies, the earles of Arrerte and Mar being of companie with hir, and there the king hir husband came to visit hir. The same time monsieur Baluolier came into Scotland from the king of France, bringing letters to the queene, who was conueied by the bishop of Ross to Allowaie, where he was iustly received, courteously entertained, and highly rewarded. The queene of England sent maister Henrie Killegrew to the queene with the like message, reioysing for hir safe and happie deliuerance, who likewise was received in most thankfull manner, and well rewarded.

Here is to be noted, that shortly after she was brought to bed, she sent one of hir gentlemen called monsieur Clarinoich, with letters to the king of France, and to the duke of Sauoie: desiring them to send ambassadores, which in their name (as godfathers) might receiue hir son at the baptisme. Moreover, she sent James Meluine to the queene of England with the like message, desiring hir maiestie to be godmother: who by hir ambassadoz Francis earle of Bedford, sent a present to the queene of Scots, (as I. Stow hath noted) a fount of gold curiously wrought & enamelled, weighing 333 ounces, amounting in value to 1043 pounds 19 shillings of English monie. These princes were glad hereof, and promised to send ambassadores to that effect, as afterward they did. In the later end of August, the queene accompanied with the king hir husband, the earles of Huntley, Arrerte, Bothwell, and diuerse other, went into Peggat land, there to passe the time in hunting, where they remained certeine daies: and returning to Edinburgh, caused the prince to be conueied vnto Striueling castell, where he was committed in keeping to the lord Erskin, after erle of Mar, and his ladie. And from thence the queene went on progresse into Glen Arkenie.

The king as a solitarie person goeth to Striueling, after which the queene determineth to go to Jedburgh to assemble a parlement. About the beginning of October, Bothwell prepareth a iournie into Lidisdale, where he was hurt with a calener by a base theefe. Whereupon with vncertaine life he was carried to the castell of Hermitage, to which the queene (hearing of his mishap) came, attended with a small traine from Bothwicke, and from thence hauing seene Bothwell, did in short time after returne to Bothwicke, whither she caused Bothwell to be brought: after whose coming thither, the queene fell so grievously sicke, that she was in danger of hir life, at what time the king came thither vnto hir.

In Januarie the king came to Glasgowe, where he fell sicke, and remouing from thence went to Edinburgh, and the queene accompanied him. She lodged at Holie rood house, but hee was lodged at a house within the towne, nere to the kirke a field, within the which, on the tenth of the moneth of Februarie in the night he was shamefullie murdered, together with one William Barre. He was call'd into an orchard, and herewith the house was blowne by with gunpowder. [Some giue report of his death, but touch not the manner thereof, onely saying that he was shamefullie murdered in a morning (a beanie breakfast) by his owne (but unnatural and rebellious) people, whose innocent blood crieth out for vengeance at the hands of God; who in iustice will (when he seeth due time) giue them their portion with malefactors agreeable to their merits.

The earle of Bothwell was euen at the first beheimenlie suspected to be the principall offendor in this most heinous and detestable murder. But the matter was so handled, that he was not onely acquit by an assise, as they call it; but also shortly after married the queene. By reason whereof, the suspicion that men had already conceived, that she should be also partie to the murder, was nothing diminished. But as I haue not to deale in that matter, so yet it is manifest, that some of the Scottish nobilitie, soe repining and maligning at such the speedie advancement of Bothwell, who (as euery man persuaded himselfe, was the principall author of the murder) got them to armes on the sudden, before the queene or Bothwell were aduertised of their meaning, they being then at Bothwicke castell, eight miles distant from Edinburgh.

Buchan.li.17.

Thus leauing the lords awhile at Edinburgh, we will say somewhat out of Buchanan, of things done by Bothwell & the queene, before that she was taken by these noble men of the congregation, hauing at that time taken armes against hir. After the death of hir husband, whome she had caused to be buried not farre from David Richeo hir secretarie, Raine (as was thought) by the meanes of the king of Scots: the queene (I say) after that, and also after the clearing of Bothwell from the murder of hir husband, was forceably taken (as she was on hir iournie) by the earle Bothwell, and carried to his castell, where she remained not long, but yet honorable intertained. Which fact of his bred great dislike in the peoples minds, and brought him in danger of his life, had not the queene (of hir clemencie) pardoned him the same.

This done, there was a consultation had for a marriage to be solemnized betwene hir and the earle Bothwell, which (after a diuorle had betwene this earle and his then wife Katharine Gordon, granted by the iudges spirituall & tempozall; and after the solemn bands asked betwene the said earle James Hepburne, and the queene Marie Stewart) was with great solemnitie of the nobilitie (by their bands in writing consenting thereto) consummat at Edinburgh. Against which onely the bishop of Orkney was found to resist; and at which monsieur de Crocke the French ambassadoz then in Scotland would not be present: being a thing which did greatly occasion the Edinburghers to dislike of the queene.

Which marriage breeding some euill opinion of the said queene of Scots, not onely in hir owne realme, but in the mouths of forreine nations, she wiselie consulteth with hir friends, how she might establish hir power, and prouide to saue hirselfe and hir kingdome from tumults and insurrections. Whereupon, first she determineth to send an ambassadoz into France, to reconcile the minds of the king; and of the Guises, offended with this marriage. Which office of ambassage was laid upon William bishop of Dunblane, with this charge (as saith Buchanan) almost word for word.

First, you shall excuse to the king, and to our vn-cles, that our marriage (to be consummate) came to their eares, before that we had opened our counsell touching that matter by any messengers. This excuse (as it were to a foundation) doth leane to the true exposition of his whole life, and chiefly to the offices and duties of the duke or capteine of the advances towards vs, euen vnto that day in which it semed good to vs to take him to husband. For the opening of the hisorie whereof you shall take occasion to treat from the beginning of the last times of his adolescencie (youth; or yeres of discretion, as wee terme it) in this sort.

“ faires (being from the death of his father one of the “ chiefe of the nobilitie) he did wholie dedicate himsele “ to the dutie and seruice of the princes and kings of “ Scotland, as one bozne of a famous familie for his “ ancient nobilitie, & of great reuenuen in this king“ dome which he possesseth by right of inheritance. At “ that time also he did especiallie and altogether con“ secrate himsele to our mother, whilst she had the “ gouernement of the realme.

“ In which dutie towards hir, he did so constantlie “ perseuere, that although the greater part of the no“ bilitie, and almost all the towne were fallen from “ hir obedience (vnder the colour of religion) yet he “ would neuer decline from hir authoritie, as a per“ son that could not be twone by anie promises or be“ nefits, or feared with anie threats, or losse of his li“ uings, to neglect his dutie in anie part vnto hir: but “ that he wold rather suffer his principall house, which “ was the head of his patrimonie, with his plentifull “ and pretious stoe of furniture thereof to be taken “ from him, and all his other lands to be left for spoile “ to the enimie, than violate his faith to our mother.
“ Besides which, being destitute of helpe both of vs “ and our people (when the English host was brought “ by our domestick enimies into the bowels of our “ kingdome, which directed their weapons to none o“ ther marke, than that our now husband at that time “ earle Bothwell, should by force be enforced to fle) he “ fled into France, forsaking all his patrimonie, where “ he honozed me with all dutie and seruice (that he “ might) vntill my returne into Scotland.

“ Neither are those exploits to be omitted, which “ were done by him in the warres against the Eng“ lish before my returne into mine owne countrie, “ where he shewed such parts of warlike valure and “ grane wisdom, that he was iudged (being then ve-“ rie young) met to haue the gouernement of ancient “ persons, to be made chiefe capteine of the armie of “ the countrie, & also to be chosen or substitute depu“ tie and chancelloz: as in truth he was. In which of“ fice he did not deceiue the hope and expectation which “ men conceiued of him. For (by his affaires valiant-“ lie atchieued) he left a singular praise and fame of “ him, as well amongst his owne people, as amongst “ the enimies.

“ After our returne into Scotland, he employed “ all his indenor to the inlarging of our authoritie, and “ spared not to put himsele in danger, in subuoying “ those rebels which dwelt about the borders of Eng“ land. The dispatch wherof being thorowlie performed, “ and they brought to great quiet, he was appointed to “ doe the like in all the other parts of the kingdome.
“ But as enue both alwaies accompanie vertue, so “ the Scots repining thereat, and desirous of inno-“ uation, did laboz to diminish our fauour towards him “ (for his great labozs imployed in our behalfe) in mis“ construing his good deeds.

“ By which in the end they wrought so much with “ me, that we committed him to prison; partlie to sa-“ tisfie the minds of such as were emulous against “ him, and could not brooke the increase of his follow“ ing honoz and greatnesse; and partlie to appease such “ seditions as were likelie then to breake forth to the “ destruction of the whole kingdome. But he (escaping “ out of prison) got him into France, to giue place to “ the power of his enimies, where he remained almost “ two yeres next following. At what time the authors “ of the former sedition, forgetting my clemencie to“ wards them, and their dutie towards vs, did raise “ warre, and toke weapons against their quene.

“ From thence was he called backe into Scotland, “ & being restored to his former honoz & possessions, “ he was againe made generall of all the armie: by “ whose helpe our authoritie began afresh to flourish, “ that all the rebels (suddenlie forsaking their coun-“ trie) were enforced to fle into England, vntill part “ of them vpon humble submission were receiued a“ new into our fauour. But how traitorously I was “ handled by the rest that were restored (and especiallie “ such, whose ancestors I had with benefits most pro“ moted) our vncke is not ignorant, and therefore we “ will touch that no more.

“ Neither is it to be ouerpasse in silence, with what “ diligence he deliuered me from the hands of such as “ deteined me prisoner, and with what speed (and singu“ lar prouidence of his) I did both escape from prison, “ and recovered my former authoritie: after that I “ had dispersed the factions of the conspirators and se-“ ditionous persons. In which troubles I am enforced to “ confesse, that his dutie and diligence at that time “ shewed towards me, was so acceptable vnto me, “ that I could neuer after forget it. These things al“ though they be great of themselves, yet he hath hi“ therto increased them with such diligence and careful“ nesse, that we cannot desire greater dutie, or with “ more assured trust in anie man, than we haue found “ in him; vntill these last times which followed the de“ cease of our husband.

“ But from that time, as his thoughts did seme to “ tend higher, so his actions did after a sort seme to be “ more insolent. And although the matter went so far, “ that we were to take all things in the best part: yet “ these things did then most greivously offend me; but “ especiallie his arrogancie, in that he thought that “ there were not other sufficient abilities in vs, to re-“ compensate his deseruings, vnlesse we gaue our selve “ to him in marriage. Touching which, at the first he v“ sed secret reasons and counsels: but in the end, when “ he saw them not to succed after his mind, at length, “ shewing an open contempt of my authoritie, he fled “ to the benefit of violence, and used force (to the end “ his attempt might not want due effect) to bring me “ vnder his gouernement.

“ Therefore all this course of his life maie be an “ example, to shew how craftilie they can contriue “ their devices (in attempting great things) vntill they “ haue obtained their purpose. For I did suppose, that “ all this his continuall dutie and carefulnesse in spe-“ die obtene of my commandements, had not issued “ from anie other founteine, than of a beherment desire “ to shew his obedience and good will towards me: “ neither did I hope that a litle more fauourable coun“ tenance (which we are accustomed to be to the more “ worthy persons, to the end to win their minds to be “ more obedient to vs in dutie) should so haue raised “ his stomack (more than anie others) that he wold “ promise to himsele anie larger good will to proceed “ from me towards him, than he had before.

“ But he taking advantage of all haps, & drawing “ all things (that chanced) to the furtherance of his “ purpose, and keeping all his counsels secret from me, “ did still shew his accustomed dutie, nourished my old “ fauour to him, & secretlie attempted a new thing by “ the helpe of the nobilitie. Which he brought to passe “ with such speedie diligence, that (vnknown to me) “ he obtained of the peres of the realme (in the assen“ blie of the parlement here) a writing with all their “ hands set therevnto, for the more credit of the same.
“ In which writing was conteined, that they did not “ onlie assent vnto the marriage; but that they also fur“ ther promised to spend their life and goods (offered to “ all dangers) in the executing thereof, and that they “ wold be better enimies to all such as should laboz to “ hinder it. For the more easie obtaining of whose con“ sents in this sort, he had persuaded the said nobilitie, “ that the same was not done against my mind and “ consent. At length, when he had purchased this writ-“ ting from them, he began by litle and litle (with ear“ nest

¶ n. j.

neest intreaties & flatteries) to obtaine our consent. But when at the first our answers did not content his desire, he began to laie before me almost all those things, which are accustomed to happen in the attempt of such matters.

First, the outward tokens of our good fauour towards him, the reasons by which our friends or his enemies might hinder the same, & manie other things which being objected or willinglie happening, might frustrate his hope, or change the minds of such as had before subscribed. At length (fortune fauouring him therein) he determined to pursue the matter, & in one instance to hazard his hope and life about the same. Wherefore, when he had determined with himselfe, with all importunitie to attempt the successe of his determination, he soute daies after hauing conuenient time and place therefore in the high waie, set vpon me with a strong band, as I was comming from seeing of my deere sonne, and with great speed caried me to Dunbar.

Which euill deed how greivouslie we take (especially done by him, from whence all our subjects neuer looked to haue such things to proceed) enerie bodie maie easilie consider. For there I did vpbraid him, with what fauour I haue alwaies vsed him, what honorable opinion I haue had of him and of his conditions in my speech vsed to others, and of his vnthankfulnesse to me therefore; with all other things that might deliner me out of his hands. These matters I laied against him with bitter words. But his answers thereunto were moze mild, and tempered with gentler speeches, in this, that he would still vse all honoz and dutie towards vs, and laboz by all means to haue our good will, whom he would not offend.

As touching this, that he had against our will caried vs into one of our oton castles, he humbly craued pardon therefore (in that he was inforced thereunto) although in the same he had forgotten that reuerence and dutie, which enerie subject owght vnto vs. Whereunto he added, that he did the same for our safetie and defense. At which time also he began to repeat vnto me the whole course of his life, lamenting his fortune, to haue them (whome he neuer hurt) so greivouslie offended with him, that their malice had not ouerpasse and occasions vniuersitie to hurt him withall.

But especiallie in this, that their great enue had burdened him with the murder of the king, and that his power was vnequall to resist the secret conspiracies of his enemies, whome he could not know; because they did in shew and speeches dissemble their friendship: & not knowing them, there was no waie for him to foresee and auoid their decelpts. Whose extreme hatred was now growen to such height, that he could not lue in safetie in anie place, or at anie time, except he might be assured of the quenes vnchangeable fauour towards him. Which certaintie of his fauor could not be shewed but by this one meane, to perswade him selfe to receiue him into the marriage bed. At what time he did most holilie sweare, that he gaped not after anie extraordinarie gouernement, or that he would leape to the highest step of supreme rule thereby; but onlie to reape this fruit thereof, that he might serue and obeie hir as long as he liued, in such sort as he did before. Whereunto he added the delights of such speeches as that matter required.

But in the end, when he saw that we could not be moued thereunto, either with praiers or promises, he shewed vnto vs what he had done with the whole nobilitie, and the chiefe of the parlement, and what they againe had promised vnder their hands. Which being suddenlie and vnhoped for laied against vs, whether it did with full cause greatlie astonish vs, we leane to the consideration of the king, the quene, our vnckles, and the rest of our friends. Wherefore, when I perceiued my selfe a prisoner vnder the power of an other man, farre from the helpe of all those whose counsell I did and should haue vsed; yea and that I saw them before my face, in whose former faith and wisdome I did repose my selfe; whose strength did defend our authoritie, and without which our power was but small or none: when (I say) I had sene all these to haue bowed themselves to serue his desire, and that I was alone left a preie for him, I did with my selfe in my mind consider manie things, but could bring none of them to effect.

Besides which, he gaue to vs but short time to take anie aduise, but incontinentlie and importunatlie did still vize the same vnto me. At length, when I saw no waie to escape by flight, nor anie person of all our kingdome which had anie care of our libertie (for we well perceiued by their hands giuen, and by their deepe silence at that time, that they were all drawn to take his part) I was compelled (after that I a little pacified mine anger & displeasure against him) to refer my selfe to the discusse and consideration of his demands, & to laie before my selfe his dutie in times past, and the hope which we had of the following continuance of the same towards vs.

And further, how greivouslie our people would suffer a strange king, and heauilie receiue one vnacquainted, and not indred with their lawes and customs, that they would not suffer me long to lue vnmarried, and that the people (being by nature factious) could not be kept in obedience, except our authoritie were supported and practised by a man which could equall them in bearing laboz, and were able to bryde the insolencie of rebels in the administration of the common wealth: the weight of which charge, our power (being weakened and almost brought to nothing by continuall tumults and rebellions, since our comming into Scotland) was not able anie longer to susteine. For by reason of these seditions, we were inforced to appoint foure or moze deputies in diuerse parts of our realmes, which afterward also did (vnder the colour of the authoritie which they were permitted to vse vnder vs) inforce our otone subjects to take armes against vs.

For all which causes, when we well perceiued that if we labored to preserve the dignitie of kinglie matresse, that they would inforce me to marriage, that our people could not abide a foren prince, and that amongest our otone subjects, there was not anie which for the nobilitie of his familie, for his wisdome and valure, or for other vertues of bodie and mind, might be preferred before or equalled vnto him, I commanded my selfe to ioine with the whole consent of the parlement, and assemblie of the nobilitie before mentioned. After that my former constant determination was thus somewhat mollified by these and other reasons, he did wizing from me partlie by force, and partlie by intreatie, a promise to him of marriage.

Which done, we could not yet by anie meanes and perswasion obtaine of him (fearing an alteration in our mind) that the time wherein this marriage should be performed, might be deferred so long, as that we might participat the same with the king and quene of France, and such other friends as we had remaining in those parts. For he beginning with a bold attempt (after that he had once thereby attained the first step of his desire) did neuer after that cease to ioine importunat praiers to his perswasions and arguments of reason, vntill he did without violence inforce vs to set end to the waie he began, and that at such time, and after such order, as seemed most conuenient vnto him for the execution of his determination

« nation. In which matter I cannot dissemble, but « that I was otherwise intreated by him, than either « I would or had deserved.

« For he was more carefull to satisfie them, by « whose consent (shewed at the beginning) he thought « himselfe to haue obtained his purpose (though he did « band, we promise that he shall in all things (which « shall be required of him hereafter) alwaies grati« fie them in what he maie.

These remedies being found to defend the quēns credit amongst foren princes, other remedies were to be sought for defense of hir owne person against hir owne subiects. Wherefore (after that the earle of Murre was appointed to remaine as banished beyond the seas in France, whither he took his iour-nie through England) the quēne deliuered of such a feare as he was to hir, & therfore better able to rule, or at least to make better shift, with such other as were contented, to vse Buchanans word, against hir) vied what diligence she might to gather forces, especiallie in the Spers and east Louthian.]

And thinking that the enterpryse of the lords had bene broken and disappointed, they marched from Dunbar on saturday the fourth of June, first to Haddington, & there resting till the euen, set forward to Gladsmore, and taking there deliberation in the matter, they lodged that night at Seilton, and in the morning marched in order of battell towards Carbarrie hill, and there chose forth a plot of ground of great aduantage, appointing to fight on foot, because the power of the lords in number of horsemen, was stronger than the quēns, and of greater experience. There were with the quēne and Bothwell, the lords Seilton, Pesser, and Bothwicke; also the lords of Mauchton, Bas, Dymilton, Wlea-derburne, Blackater, and Langton. They had with them also two hundred harquebussiers waged, and of great artillerie some field peeces. Their whole number was esteemed to be about 2000: but the more part of them were commons & countienmen.

The earles of Morton, Atholl, Mar, Glencarne, the lords of Huntie, Lindseie, Ruthuen, Sempill, Sanguhar; the lords of Dymlangrid, Culibarden, Grange, and young Sessford, were assembled together at Edinburgh with a power like in number to the quēns, but for the more part consisting of gentlemen, although not furnished with anie number of harquebussiers, except a few of the townsmen of Edinburgh, that willingly ioined with them in that quarrell. Upon the fifteenth of June, they came forth of the towne, and approached their aduersaries.

But there was monsieur la Croque, the French kings ambassadour, who took great paine, in tra-uelling betwixt the parties to reduce them to some agréement. Who by his interpreto; laid before them how carefulle he had studied for the commoditie & tranquillitie of the publike state of Scotland before this; and that now also he caried the same mind with him. Wherefore he did vehementlie desire (if it were possible) that the matter might be so taken vp, for the commoditie of both parties; that it might be ended without force or bloodshed. For the compassing thereof, he would impleie all his trauell, sith the quēne also did not refuse to heare the counsell & persuasion of peace. For the more certaintie therof, he did at that time promise them pardon and vtter forgetfulness of all things passed before time; & did with great holinesse there pledge him selfe, that no hurt should fall vnto anie man there, for taking weapen against the highest gouernor.

After that the interpreto; had deliuered these things, the earle of Morton answered, that he did not take armes against the quēne; but against him that had killed the king. Whome if the quēne would deliuer to punishment, or separat him from hir, she should well vnderstand, that they & the rest of hir subiects held nothing more déere vnto them, than to continue in their dutifull obedience: without which granted to them, there could be no agréement made; because they came not thither to craue pardon for anie offense which they had committed (wherevnto the earle of Glencarne added) but rather to giue pardon to such as had offended.]

Wherefore the ambassado; Croque returned backe to Edinburgh, and the quēns part began to decrease, diuerse thinking awaie from hir; so that after it began to grow towards the euening, Bothwell fled to the castell of Dunbar. But the quēne desirous to talke with William Kirkcaldie the lord of Grange, went to him, accompanied onelie with one capteine, and after some talke with him, she passed to the lords, who took hir with them to Edinburgh, [she being in a short garment, base, & woone, com-ming a little beneath hir knees (as said Buchanan) of which lords she requested that they would suffer hir to depart, & not to keepe hir in that sort.] The Ha-miltons were on the waie coming to assist the quēne, with seuen or eight hundred horsemen; but before they could reach to the place, the quēne was in the hands of the lords, and so they returned.

The lord of Cragmillar [then prouost of Eden-burgh] and sir James Balfure also the capteine of the castell, were ioined in this confederacie with the lords, as shortly after it appeared. The quēne after this was conueied ouer the Forth, and brought to Lochleuin, where she was appointed to remaine in ward vnder the safe keeping of William Douglas lord of that place. The earle Bothwell, escaping to Dunbar, found meanes to flee into Denmarke, where he was staied and committed to prison, wherein at length he died. Diuerse persons afterwards were apprehended as parties to the murder of the king, and thereupon condemned, were executed, confessing the said earle to be the principall executo; of the same murder. Leaving the quēne therefore in this miserable plight, we will not yet forget (for the honor she once had) to set downe certeine verses made by Alexander Seton a Scot, in the commendation of hir ancessors, and of hir; who in the first peares of hir gouernement vied hir selfe to the god liking of all hir subiects. In which verses Seton doth further meane, that Lelle should hereafter set forth hir gouernement, as he hath done that of the

sixt.

The nineteenth of Julie, Charles James the young prince of Scotland, after a sermon made by John Knox, was crowned king of the Scots in Sterling church, where were read certaine letters of commission and procuracion, with the queens priuite seale at them for the establisshing of the same coronation. The first, for hir resignation of the crowne and gouernement of the young prince hir sonne. The second, to authorize the earle of Murreie to be regent during the kings minority. The third, to giue authoritie and power to seuen other joining with the said earle of Murreie, in case he should refuse to exercise the same alone; that is to say, the duke of Chastelerault, the earls of Lennox, Argyle, Atholl, Spottoun, Glencarne, and Mar. The tenors of which letters of commission and procuracion doe here insue, as we find them imprinted at Edinburgh by Robert Lekpennie printer to the king of Scots, the first of Aprill 1568, among the acts of parlement begun and holden at Edinburgh, the fiftenth of December, in the yeare 1567, by James earle of Murreie lord Abernethie, &c: regent vnto the said king.

The tenor of the commission, whereby Marie the queene of Scots resigneth the crowne to hir sonne, appointeth his gardians, and maketh the earle of Murreie regent.

Marie be the grace of God queene of Scottis, to all and sundrie our iudges and ministers of law, liegis and subiects, quhome it effectis to quhais knalege thir our letteris fall come, greting. For samekle as by lang irkesome and tedious trauell takin by vs, in the gouernament of this our realme and liegis thair of, we are sa verit and werit, that our bodie, spirit, and sensis are altogeddir become vnhabill langer to trauell in that rowne: and thairfore we haue dimittit and renuncit the office of gouernament of this our realme and liegis thair of, in fauours of our anelie maist deir sonne, natie prince of this our realme. And because of his tender youth and inhabillite to vse the said gouernament in his alwin person, during his minority, we haue constitute our derrest brother James earle of Murreie, lord Abernethie, &c: regent to our said sonne, realme and liegis soirsaidis.

And in respect that our said derrest brother is actually furth of our realme, and cannot instantlie be present to accept the said office of regentrie vpon him, and vse and exercise the samin during our saidis derrest sons minority; we quhill his returning within our realme, or in cais of his deceis haue maid, constitute, namit, appointit, & ordainit, and by thir our letteris makis, constitutis, namis, appointis, and ordainis our traist consingis and counsallouris,

James duke of Chastelerault, earle of Arrane, lord Hamiltoun, Matho earle of Lennox, lord Dornie, &c: Archibald earle of Argyle, lord Campbell and Lozne, &c: John earle of Atholl, James earle of Spottoun, Alexander earle of Glencarne, and John earle of Mar, regentis to our said derrest son, realme and liegis; & in cais our said brother James earle of Murreie cum within our realme, and refussis to accept the said office of regentrie vpon his singular person, we make, constitute, name, appoint, and ordaine, our traist consingis and counsallouris soirsaidis, and our said brother regentis of our said deir sonne, realme, and liegis.

Geuand, grantand, and committand to thame, or onie fine of thame consuntlie full power for our said sonne, and in his name to ressaue resignatiounis of landis, make dispositiounis of wairdis, nonentressis, releuis, mariages, beneficis, elchettis, officis, and vtheris casualiteis and priuilegis, quhat sumeuer concerning the said office, signatouris thair vpon to make, subscribe, and cause be past throug the seillis. And to vse and exercise the said office of regentrie in all thingis, priuilegis, and commoditeis, siclike as it alie and with als greit libertie as onie regent or gouerno: to vs or our predecessours vsit the samin in ony times bigan. Promittand to hold firme and stabill in the word and faith of ane prince, to quhat sumeuer thingis our saidis traist consingis dois in the premissis.

Charging heirfore to all and sundrie our iudges and ministers of law, liegis and subiects soirsaidis, to answer and obeie to our saidis traist consingis, regentis soirsaidis in all and sundrie thingis concerning the said office of regentrie, during our said derrest sons minority, and ay and quhill be be of the age of seuentene zeiris compleit. As ze and ilke ane of you will declair you lussing subiectis to our said maist deir son, your natie prince, and vnder all paine, charge, and offense that ze and ilke ane of you maie commit and inrin agains his maiestie in that part. Subscribe with our hand, and giuen vnder our priuite seill, at Lochlenin, the four and twentieth day of Julij, and of our reigne the five and twentieth zeir.

The commission, authorising certeine noble men in the queens name, to renounce the kingdome to hir sonne, and authorising others to receiue the same in hir sons name.

Marie be the grace of God queene of Scottis, to all and sundrie our iudges, and ministers of law, liegis, and subiects, quhome it effectis, to quhais knalege thir our letteris fall cum, greting. For samekle as sen our arriual, and returning within our realme, we twilling the common commoditie, welth, profeit, and quietnes thair of, liegis, and subiects of the samin, haue emplotit our bodie, spirit, haill sensis, and forcis, to gouerne the samin in sic sort, that our roiall and honozabill estate might stand and continue with vs, and our posteritie, and our lussing and kind liegis might inioie the quietnes of true subiects. In trauellling quhairin, not anelie is our bodie, spirit, and sensis sa verit, brokin, and bruiet, that langer we are not of habillite be onie mane to indure sa greit and intollerabill panis and auellis, quhair with we ar altogeddir iuerit, bot als greit commotiounis and troublis be sundrie occasiounis in the meantime hes ensuit thairin, to our greit greit.

And seeing it hes bene the plesour of the eternall God,

God, of his kindlie lufe, mercie, and gudnes to grant unto vs, of our awin persoun, ane sone, quha in cais be the hand of God we be veseit, will, and of richt, and of equitie man, and aucht to succed to vs and to the gouernement of our realme. And knawing that all creaturis ar subiect to that immutabil decret of the eternall, ains to rander and gif by this life tempozall (the hour and time quhair of is maist vnccertane) and in cais be deceis we be takin fra this life, during the time of his minozitie, it maie be dowit greittie, that resistance and troubill maie be maid to our said son, now natue prince of this our realme, in his tender zeires (being swa destitute of vs) to succed to that rowme and kingdome, quhilk maist iustlie of all lawis aperteneis to him. Quhill inconuenience be Godis helpe and gud providence we mene to preuent, in sick maner, that it fall not lie in the power of onie vnaturall subiects to resist Godis ordinance in that behalfe. And vnderstanding that na thing eirdlie is maist iolous, and happie to vs, nor to see our said derrest sone, in our awin life time peccable placit in that rowme, and honorabill estate quhairto he iustlie aucht and man succed to: we of the motherlie affectioun we beir toward our said onlie sone, haue renuncit, and dimittit, and be thir our letteris frelie, of our awin motiue will renuncis, & dimittis the gouernement, guiding and gouerning of this our realme of Scotland, liegis, and subiects thair of, and all in-30 tropissioun and dispositioun of onie casualteis, properties, benefices, and offices, and all thingis appertaining, or heir to foir is knawin, or heir efter fall happen to appertein thairto, in fauouris of our said derrest sone. To that effect, that he maie be plantit, placit, & possesit thairin, vse & exerce all thingis belang- and thairto, as natue king, and prince of the samis, & siclike as we or onie our predecesouris, kingis of Scottis, hes done in onie times bypast.

Attour, that this our dimissioun maie tak the maist solempne effect, and that nane pretend ignorance thair of, we haue giuin, grantit, and committit, and be thir our letteris, geuis, grantis, & committis our commissioun full, fre, and plane power, generall, & spectall command, to our traist coungis, Patrike lord Lindefaie of the Biris, and William lord Ruth-40 uen, and to ilk ane of thame consuntlie and feuerallie, to compeir before sa monie of the nobilitie, clergie, burgessis, and vther pepill of our realme, as fall happen to be assemblit to that effect in our burgh of Strivelling, or anie vther place, or placis quhair it fall be thocht maist conuenient, at onie date or dais, and thair publiklie in thair presence, for vs, in our name, and vpon our behalf dimit, and renunce the gouernement, guiding, & reuling of this our realme, liegis, and subiects thair of, all intronissioun with the properis, casualtie, or vtheris thingis appertaining to vs thairby, and all richt, and tittle that we had, hes, or maie haue be onie maner of way thairto, in fauouris of our said son, to that effect, that he maie be inaugurat, placit, and rowmit thairin, and the crowne roiall deliuerit to him, and be obeyit in all thingis concerning the samin, as we, or our predecesouris hes bene in times bypast.

And in liketwise be thir presents geuis, grantis, and committis our full, fre, and plane power, to our richt traist coungis, James earle of Moray, lord of Dalkeith, John earle of Atholl, &c: John earle of Mar, &c: Alexander earle of Glenearne, William earle of Penteth, John maister of Graham, Alexander lord Hume, Adam bishop of Dunkeld, the prouostis of Dundie, Montrois, or onie of thame, to ressaue the said renuntiatioun, and dimissioun in fauouris of our said son, and thair efter the ressauiing thair of, to plant, place, and inaugurat him in the kingdome, and with all ceremonies requissit to put the crowne roiall vpon his heid, in signe and takin of the establisment of him thairin, and in his name to make, and gif to the saidis nobilitie, clergie, burgessis, and vtheris our liegis, his prince, lie and kinglie aith destullie, & lauchfullie as effectis: and to ressaue thair aithis, for due and lauchfull homage to be maid be thame to him, in all times cuming, as becumis subiects to thair natue king and prince. And generallie all and sundrie vther thingis to do, exerce, and vse, that for sure performance and accomplishment heirof maie, or can be done, firme and stable halband, and for to hald all and quhatsum-10 euer thingis in our name, in the premissis leidis to be done, in the word and faithfull ppointis of ane prince. And ordanis thir our letteris (gif neid be is) to be publiit at all places neshfull. Subscriuit with our hand, and giuin vnder our prelie seill, at Lochleuin the fourre and twentieth date of Julij, and of our reigne the siue and twentieth zeir, 1567.

The commission, in which the earle of Murreie is alone appointed to be regent of the yoong king, and of his kingdome.

Marie be the grace of God, quene of Scots, to all & sundrie our iudgis, and minnistis of our lawis, liegis, and subiects, quhome it effectis, to quhais knalege thir our letteris fall cum, greting. For samelke as 30 efter lang, greit, and intollerable painis, & labouris takin be vs sen our arriual within our realme, for gouernement thair of, and keeping of the liegis of the same in quietnes, we haue not anelie bene verit in our spirit, bodie, and sensis thairby, bot als at lenthar altogitder sa verit thair of, that our habillitie, and strenght of bodie is not habill langer to indure the samin: thairfore, and because nathing eird-40 lie can be maist confortabill and happie to vs in this eird, nor in our life time, than to se our deir son, the natue prince of this our realme, placit in the kingdome thair of, and the crowne roiall set on his heid, we of our owin fre will, an speciall motiue, haue dimittit, and renuncit the gouernement, guiding, and gouerning of this our realme of Scotland, liegis, and subiects thair of, in fauouris of our said son, to that effect: that in all times heirafter, he maie peccable, and quietlie entoe the samin, without troubill, an be obett as natue king, and prince of the samin be the liegis thair of.

And vnderstanding that (be resoun of his tender youth) he is not of habillitie in his awin persoun to administrate in his kinglie rowme and gouernement, as equitie requiris, quhill that heirafter, he cum to the zeires of discretioun; and als knawing the proximite of blude standand betuirt vs, our said sone, and our derrest brother James erle of Murray, lord Abirneithie, &c: and hauand experience of the naturall affectioun, and tenderlie lufe he bes in all times bozne, and presentlie beires towardis vs, the honour & estate of our said sone, of quhais lufe and fauour towardis him we can not bot assure our selfe: to quhome na greter honour, top, nor felicitie in eird can cum, nor to se our said sone inaugurat in his kingdome, seirrit, reuerencit, and obett be his liegis thair of. In respect quhair of, and of the cer-60 tanetie, and notozitie, of the honestie, habillitie, qualification, and sufficiencie of our said derrest brother, to haue the cure and regiment of our said sone, realme, and liegis for saidis, during our said sonis minozitie: we haue maid, namid, appointit, constitu-

tute, and ordanit, and be thir our letteris namis, appointis, makis, constitutis, and ordanis our said derrest brother James erle of Murray, regent to our said derrest sone, realme, and liegis foirsaidis, during his minoritie and les age, and ay and quhill he be of the age of seintene zeiris compleit. And that our said brother be callit, during the said space, regent to our said sone, his realme, and liegis.

Suma that our said sone efter the completing of the zeiris foirsaidis, in his atwin persoun may tak vpon him the said gouvernement, and vse, and exerce all and sindowie priuilegis, honouris, and otheris immunitis that appertenis to the office of ane king, als weill in gouerning his realme and pepill, according to the lawis, as in repressing the violence of sic as wald inuaid, or iniustlie resist him or thame, or his authoritie roiall. With power to our said derrest brother James erle of Murray, in name, authoritie, and behalfe of our said maist deir sone, to ressaue resignatiounis of quhatsumeuir landis halbin of him, or zit of offices, castells, towris, fortallicis, milnis, fishingis, wooddis, beneficis, or pertinencis quhatsumeuir; the samit againe in our said sonis name to gif, and deliuer signaturis thairvpon: and vpon the giftis of twairdis, nonentrecis, and releuis of landis, and mariages of airis falland, or that fall happin to fall in our said sonis handis as superiour thair of.

And als vpon presentatioun of landis, beneficis, escheitis of guidis mouabill and vnmouabill, dettis and takkis, respittis, remissionis, supersedereis, and vpon the dispositioun of officis vacand, or quhen they fall happin to baik, to subscribe, in the cause be past the seillis the said office of regentrie, to vse and exerce in all thingis, priuilegis, and commoditeis, sicklike as frelie, and with als greit libertie, as ony regent, or gouernour to vse, or our predecesouris vbit in ony times bigane, and sicklike as gif euerie heid, priuilege and article concerning the said office wer at lenth expessit and amplisit in thir our letteris. Promisand to halo firme and stabill in the word and faith of ane prince, to quhatsumeuir thingis our said derrest brother in the premissis happinnis to do. Chargeing heir foir zoiv all, and sindowie our iudgeis, and ministeris of law, liegis, and subiectis foirsaidis, to answer and obey to our said derrest brother, in all and sindowie thingis concerning the said office of regentrie, as ze and ilke ane of zoiv will declair zoiv lusing subiectis, to our said maist deir sone, and vnder all paine, charge, and offense that ze and ilke ane of zoiv may commit, and incur againis his maistrie in that pairt. Subscriuit with our hand, and geuin vnder our ppetie seill, at Lochleuin the 14 day of Julij. And of our reigne, the twentie five zeir.

oth.

Fr. Thin.

These commissions being read, the bishop of Ar-gile, with two superintendents, proceeded to the coronation: the earle of Morison, and the lord Hume toke the oth for the king, that he should rule in the faith, feare, and loue of God, and to mainteine the religion then preached and exercised in Scotland, and to persecute all aduersaries to the same. The whole ceremonie was done in the Scots English tong, the quene mother to the king remaining at that time prisoner in Lochleuin. * But before we enter into the augmentation of the historie of this kings time, I thinke it not vnnmet to deliuer one thing, which I haue with some wonder obserued in all the kings of Scotland descended of the Stewards: that neuer anie one of them except the first & second king of that name was of the age of man, or of one and twentie yeeres when they put on the kingle ornaments. A rare thing, and not vnnmet to be considered of, although we can not enter into the secret iudgements of God. The profe of which matter, being after this sort, I haue set downe in a catalog of the orderlie descent of those kings. In the computation of the yeeres of whose age and first comming to the crowne I haue followed Lesleus.

Robert Stewart the first king of that surname, was 57 yeeres old when he began his reigne, in the yeere of our redemption 1370. John Stewart son of the said Robert began his reigne 1390. These two alone were of full age, when the title of the kingdome descended vnto them. James Stewart, the first of the name of James, & the third of the name of Stewards, was within age at the death of his father, when the title and crowne descended vnto him: who although he receiued not the crowne at Scone (because he was about eightene yeeres honozable kept as a prisoner in England) vntill hee was of mans age: yet being king in right, and the crowne inuested in him when he was within age, I doubt not to make him king from the death of his father, and so within age to haue obtained the kingdome, though not the kingle vse thereof, beginning his reigne in the yeere of our redemption 1424.

James the second, and the fourth of the Stewards, was six yeeres old when he was crowned, in the yeere of Christ 1436. James the third, and sixt of the Stewards, being seuen yeeres old, was crowned king of Scotland in the yeere that the word became flesh 1460. James the fourth, and first of the Stewards, being sirtene yeeres of age, was adorned with the ensignes of the kingdome, in the yeere of our saluation 1488. James the fifth, and the seuenth of the Stewards, being one yeere, five moneths, and ten daies old, was crowned king of Scotland, in the yeere from the birch of Christ 1513. Marie the eight of the name of Stewards, being but seuen daies old, was crowned quene of Scots, in the yeere of Christ 1542. Henrie Stewart, sonne to Matthe wearle of Lennox, and husband to the said Marie Stewart, was not one and twentie yeeres old, when he came to be king in the right of his wiife Marie: for he was not past one and twentie when he was laine, as befoze in the yeere 1567. Charles James Stewart, the first of the name of James, and the ninth of the surname of Stewards, sonne of the said Henrie Stewart and Marie Stewart, being about a yeere old, began his reigne in the yeere that God became man 1567. To whome Andrew Meluine (this yeere 1585 in England) did whilist he was in Scotland dedicate these verses following:

*Dum tu, magne puer, patribus das iura vocatis, Et populi pensas crimina lance pari, Iura tibi, tuus ille Solon, tuus ille Lycurgus, Qua recti è puris fontibus hausta dedit, Nobilium regum exemplis obsignat auitis, Hic ubi quid fugias, quidue sequaris habes.
Felix, si fugias fugienda, sequenda sequaris!
Felix cum populo tuq; patre, q; tuo.*

There was order taken by the magistrates of the reformed churches, assembled for that purpose, touching the discipline of excommunication, and the excommunicated, diuided into these heads: that is to say, what crimes be worthe of that seuerer censure of the church by excommunication: how the minister shall behaue himselfe in publike audience of the people: of confession of the penitent: of the offenses which merit publike repentance: of the order to proceed therein: the forme and the order of publike repentance: an admonition to the church: a thanksgiving for the conuersion and repentance of the censured: the forme of the excommunication: the prayer for the obstinate that will not repent after that censure: the prayer befoze the excommuni-

A parlement
holden at Edenburgh.

On the fifteenth of December a parlement begun, beinge holden at Edinburgh before the earle of Murraye lord regent, in the which diuers acts and statutes were deuised, made, and ratified: as first concerning the quenes demission of hir crowne, and resignation thereof made to hir sonne king James the first. And likewise concerning the instituting of the earle of Murraye in the regencie of the realme, which he took upon him the two and twentieth day of August last past, according to hir letters of commission and procurati-on aboue specified. Also there was an act made for the abolishing of the pope, and his blasphemous authoritie. And an other act for the annulling of former acts made in parlement for maintenance of superstition and idolatrie. And hereto was annexed a confession of the faith and doctrine receiued by the protestants of the realme of Scotland, authorized in the same parlement. There was also an act made for the indemnitie of those that had leuied warre, and apprehended the quene at Carbarrie hill, the fifteenth of Iulie last past, and concerning the detei-ning of hir in Lochleuin.

The castell of Dunbar and the fortresse of Insketh to be rased.

lib. 19.

Moreover, it was ordeined by an act passed in this parlement, that the castell of Dunbar, and the fortresse of Insketh, should be demolished and rased downe to the earth. To be chieflye, there were one and fortie acts or statutes made and stablished in this par-lement, as by the register thereof it maie appere.
* In the first beginning of the spring, the gouernour determined to make a progresse ouer the realme, with the iudges that were appointed to administer law: which he ment to doe, to the end that he might amend and establishe such things as were indamaged by the tumults of the yere before. Which matter wrought diuerse opinions in those of the quenes faction, did cause that Metellane and John Balfurie sought meanes to deliuer the quene out of prison.
Touching which matter also the Hamiltons labored who (beinge next to the crowne, if the young king were gone, and the quene made atwaite, both which perhaps was no great matter to procure) did iointe with the quenes faction and fauourers. Whose part in like manner the earles of Atholl and Huntley refused not to take, because the mother of the one, and the wife of the other, were of the familie of the Ha-miltons.

William Murraye of Tillibartine, for his contrarie opinion in the controuersies of religion, and for priuat quarrels, beinge estranged and grieved from and with the gouernour, did not onelie now depart from the kings faction (although before he shewed great diligence in taking the quene) but did also goe with him a great companie of his friends intified thereunto with no small hope of benefit to rise vnto them thereby. And as these were heads and chiefe of such as sought the quenes deliuerance: so there were a great manie other, whom priuat neces-sitie, secret grudge, desire of reuenge, hope of ad-uancement, and necessitie of alliance to those which are before named, procured to follow, and to further the cause of the quenes libertie. In the meane time, whilst the regent was at Glasco to minister labor to such as required it (and that he had there heard of these things) this determination of setting the quene at libertie was put in execution, the manner whereof was in this sort. There was in the castell of Lochleuin, wherein the quene was kept as prisoner, the mother of the regent, and three of his brethren by an other father, with a great troupe of women: but none were admitted to see the quene, save such as were well knowne or sent thither by the regent.

Of all this household companie, there was none that seemed so meet to the quene to execute anie matter, as was George Dologlas the youngest brother of the regent, beinge a man of a pleasant wit, and easilie to be ouertaken with the faire speeches of women. This man had accesse vnto the quene to plaie at cards, and to vse hir with other courtlie pastimes: who determining to set hir at libertie, did with promises and gifts win the seruants of the castell to fauour him and his enterprises. Whereupon this Dologlas (not vnbitting as was thought to his mother) omitteth nothing that might seme to serue for the quenes libertie: the which although manie there did perceiue & took not in verie good part, giuing intelligence thereof to the regent; yet he gaue such credit to his owne people there, that he changed (as hath Buchanan) none of the keepers in that place, but onelie commanded his brother George to depart out of the Island. This said George, when he passed into the next countie adjoining to the lake, in which the castell stood, did more liberallie than before (by corrupting the keepers with monie) consult with the quene of all hir affaires.

Wherefore not onelie the Scots (whome the present state of things did mislike) beinge drawen into that faction; but also the Frenchmen by James Hamilton (which had bene regent not manie yeres before) and James archbishop of Glasco solicited therevnto, the Scots promised their hoblie force, and the French promised their helping purse. Now about the end of Aprill, an ambassador came out of France requiring in the name of his king, that he might haue leaue to go to the quene: which if he were denied, he made shew that he would presentlie depart.
Wherevnto the gouernour answered, that it was not in his power to grant it: that the quene was not committed to prison by him, and that he could not determine anie thing herein without their knowledge which first restrained hir of libertie, and after by decree confirmed that deed: but he would not cease in pleasuring his sister, and such a friend as the king (his maister) was, to doe all that he might: and further, that he would take order for an assemblee of the nobilitie the twentieth daie of the next moneth. Untill which time the ambassador seemed somewhat appeased, and the regent applied the administration of the lawes.]

On sundae the second of Maie, in the yere 1568, at supper time, the quene escaped out of Lochleuin, by the meanes and helpe of George Dologlas brother to the lord of Lochleuin. The lord Seton, the lord of Riccarton, and James Hamilton of Dribston, were readie to receiue hir, and conueied hir o-ner the quenes ferrie, first to piodie the lord Seton his house, and from thence to Hamilton castell, where she remained till the thirteenth daie of Maie being thursdaie, gathering in the meane time such forces as she might from all places. The earle of Murraye lord regent was in Glasco, at what time she thus escaped out of Lochleuin; and vpon knowledge had ther-of, ment at the first to haue withdrawen himselfe to Sterling: but suddenlie changing his purpose in that behalfe, he determined to continue at Glas-colw, which is not pass eight miles from Hamilton, because he was persuaded, that if the should thinke backe neuer so little, he should encourage his aduersaries, and discourage his friends, and so consequentlie weaken his part greatlie. * Which they also supposed was the more weakened, by the departure of Robert Boid (vnto the quenes part) hauing vntill that time wonne a great opinion of his constancie towards the regent.

This man, being of a famous familie, was notv in the decate of his house meanelie and sparinglie brought vp vnder his father, a valiant gentleman, and one that followed the frugalitie of the Scots, who (willing to prepare a waie to the readuance of his house, as manie of his other kinred did) was notv content to take meanes therefore: for which cause both he and his father did first follow the Hamiltons then ruling all things. But after that their gouernment was possed ouer from them to the quene mother the regent; and that contention was moued about religion: he ioined himselfe to the lords of the congregation, from whome his father was most estranged: in which this Robert Boid firmelie continued vntill the quenes returne out of France. By meanes whereof, there was a great opinion of his valure & wisdom, on whose counsell Coline Campbell earle of Atholl did almost whole depend. But when by chance certeine of the nobilitie had conspired or conspired (to vse Buchanans word) for no euill act, but for the defense of the king, he subscribed to the same league.

But after, with like lightnesse both he and the earle of Argyle (which haing vpon his aduise) wrote vnto the quene euerie thing that was done in the same assemble, from which time this Boid was partaker of all the quenes secrets against his old friends, who with the quene did yet obtaine no greater opinion of constancie, than he did amongst others of lightnesse and inconstancie. But after that the quene was imprisoned, and the earle of Arrerie made regent, he went then to the part of the gouernor: with whome he shewed such pwise of his wit and industrie, that he was admitted into the priue counsels of the regent, contrarie to the opinion of others. But after when the matter should be tried by sight betwene the regent & the quene (after hir escape from Lochleuin) he fled againe to the quene.] All which notwithstanding, the thirteenth daie of Maie afore mentioned, the quene with hir power marched from Hamilton, by the south side of Clede toward Dunbarton; and out of Glascolw on the other part marched the lord regent with his forces: so as at length both the armies met at a place called the Langside, nere to the house of Cathcart within two miles of Glascolw.

There were on the quenes part the earles of Argyle, Castles, Eglington, and Rothes, Claud Hamilton sonne to the duke of Chateaurault, the lords Seton, Summeruill, Wether, Borthwick, Leningston, Herries, Parwell, Saugubar, Boid and Koke, lards and knights, Lochinwar, Bas, Mauchton, Dalhousie, Roden the shiriffe of Aire, sir James Hamilton, and manie others. On the regents part were these accounted as principall, the earles of Morton, Mar, Glencarne, Menteith, the maister of Graham, the lords Hume, Lindie, Ruthven, Semple, Ogiltree and Cathcart, of lards and knights, Bargarwy, Blacubhan, Dzumlanrig, Selsford, Lus, Buchanan, Lulbardin, Peteur, Orange, Lochleuin, Aethington, and sir James Walsour. At the first ioining there was a verie sharpe encounter: for after they had bestowed their shot of harquebuzes and arrows, they fell to it with speares and swords. But at length, after the quarters of an houres fight, the quenes part was put to flight.

The victorie remained with the regent, who suffered none to be slaine but those that were killed in the fight, before they turned their backs: among the which were fouretene of the surname of the Hamiltons killed. There were taken prisoners about thre hundred, of which number the principall were these: the lords Seton and Koke, sir James Hamilton, and manie other of that surname. Of the regents part, the lord Hume was hurt in the leg and face, and the lord Ogiltree in the necke, by the lord Herries: the lord Lindie, and the lards of Dzumlanrig, and of Orange, bare themselves verie valiantlie that day, failing not in anie point that belonged to the dutie of hardie capteins. The quenes part was thought to be nere at the point of six thousand men, and the regents was reckoned to be foure thousand: so that there were ten thousand men in the field that daie, what vpon the one side and the other.

The earle of Huntlee was comming forwarde to haue assisted the quenes part, but the battell was stricken, and hir people discomfited (as ye haue heard) yer he could come, and so he returned. In this battell the valiance of an Hieland gentleman named Macferlane, stood the regents part in great stead. For in the hottest hzunt of the fight, he came in with two hundred of his friends and countriemen, and so manfullie gaue in vpon the flanke of the quenes people, that he was a great cause of the disordering of them. This Macferlane had bene latelie before (as I haue heard) condemned to die for some outrage by him committed: and obtaining pardon (through sute of the countesse of Arrerie) he recompensed that clemencie by this pece of seruice now at this battell, [which was (as faith Buchanan) fought the thir daie of Maie, and the eleuenth after the quene had escaped out of prison.]

The quene perceluing the ouerthrow of hir people, fled from the place where she stood to behold the battell, and withdrew to Crawford towne, and so by the Saugubar to Dundzenan in Galloway: and after she had taried there two or thre daies, she took ship and passed to Worckington in England, where she was staied & conueied to Caerleill, and from thence to Bolton castell, belonging to the lord Scrope, who with sir Rafe Sadler (being sent downe for that purpose) had the custodie of hir, till at length she was committed vnto the earle of Shrewsburie. * The French ambassadoz, which looked for the good successe of this battell, and did promise to himselfe assured victorie on the quenes part, vnderstanding the contrarie, and being deceived of his former hope, changed his copie, and with hosse and gubdes hastid all he could into England, without bidding the regent farewell. In which iournie he was robbed by theues: but James Dowglass, capteine of the marches of Dzumlanrig, did this honoz to the ambassadoz, that he had all his goods restored vnto him.]

But now to the doings in Scotland. The regent sent to summon Hamilton castell, but the answer was respited till the next daie: and then he that had the charge came to Glascolw, and offered the keies to the regent. The castell of Massan was also yelded at the same time to the regent. The eighteenth of Maie, the regent made proclamation, that the inhabitants of the shires of Ayr, Angus, Fife, Perth, Louthian, Kile, and Carricke, should prouide themselves of vittels for sixtene daies, and to meet him at Beggan the tenth of Iune, to ride with him into the south west parts of Scotland, to chastise certeine theues, and other disobedient persons. Here vpon, the eleuenth of Iune, the regent marched south of Edinburgh, and came that night to Beggan. The armie being assembled, contained foure or five thousand land hoysmen berie well appointed, beside a thou- sand footmen, gunners and halberdiers: of hoies and yong men that went with the cariage, there were a- bout foure thousand.

The castell of Boghall, pertaining to the lord Fle- ming, was surrendred to them. The twelfth of June Shirling castell was rased (a faire house) to the end that other understanding therof, might be put in gre- ter feare. That night they came to Crawford, where the castell was to them surrendred; it belonged unto sir James Hamilton, whom they had in their hands. The thirteenth of June they marched to Saucher, a castell, the which being rendred they spared, because the lord Greichton the owner thereof, promised at a certene daie to come to the regent to Edinburgh. The fourteenth of June they came to Barbacast, where they laie that night, and the lard Wederbo:ne was sent to speake with the lard of Louchinware, Wederbo:ne the fifteenth of June, they marched to a place called saint John Schlaghan, stateng there in trust of the lard of Louchinwares comning unto them, but he came not: whereupon, the next daie being the sixteenth of June, they rased the house of Benmure, and an other house also, for that the ow- ners were frends to the said Louchinware.

The seventeenth of June they came to a gentle- mans house, standing by the water of Ar, where di- versie gentlemen came in, and were receiued. The eighteenth of June they marched to Dunfreis, and remained there all the next daie. A strong house stand- ing in that towne, & appertaining to the lord Spar- well, was offered unto them. Diuerse of the Spar- wells, Johnstons, Brewins, Crahams, and Wels, came vnto the regent, and offering themselues to be obedient, were receiued. Two daies before this, the lord Sparwell, the lards of Johnston, Cotuhill, and Louchinpar, had bene at Dunfreis with a thousand men, and spent all the vittels. It was thought that the lord Sparwell would haue come in, if the other had not counsellid him to the contrarie. The twen- ty of June they marched to Hoddum, a place belong- ing to the lord Herries: a thousand of the broken men were assembled and offered skirmish; two of thre were taken, they laie within a mile of the re- gent that night.

The one and twentieth the house was peelded, and the custodie thereof committed to the lard of Drum- lanrig that was appointed warden of those marches. It was thought berie strong, so that the defendants might haue kept it longer if they had bene disposed. Great hunger began to pinch the armie, a pint of wine was sold at seven shillings Scotish, and no bread to be had for anie monie. The regent sent forth the earle of Sperton, and the lord Hume with a thou- sand men, to trie if they might haue draynen the bro- ken men to a chase: but it would not be, for they went their waies, and would not farrie it. The two and twentieth of June the campe laie still, but the re- gent with a thousand men went to Annand, and had it deliuered unto him. There he met with the lord Scrope, and after returned to the campe. The thre and twentieth of June they went to Lochmaben and receiued the castell, the which the regent deliuered to Drumlanrig: but some of the Sparwells being close- lie hid within an od corner of the house, after the re- gent was gone, brake out and seized the house againe into their hands.

The same daie, two houses belonging to the lard of Johnston, the one named Lochwood, and the other Lowhouse, were taken, but not burnt: because the lard Johnston had put in suertie to come in by a day vnto the regent. The same daie they toke great store of cattell; and that night with a shot of the great ar- tillerie, they slue two threues among thre scoze others that came and approached berie nere to the ar- mie, as the maner of the pickers is. The armie laie that night at Milton holms. The foure and twentieth of June they came to Dingles, and the next day to Edinburgh, so ending that iourne; in the which they had passed through the countries of Clideldale, Gal- lowaie, Riddeldale, Annandale, & Tweedale. Much a do and great trouble arose within Scotland, by reason that the Hamiltons and their adherents made parts against the regent, and those other lords that gouerned vnder the king; whereof as I haue no certene notes, so I must passe the same with silence.

Whilest these things were thus indwing, let- ters came to the regent from the queene of Eng- land: for she was perswaded by such as were fled with the queene of Scots into England, that there was great iniurie done vnto the queene of Scots, being burdened with high matters, through the enuie of hir euill subiects, in which chieftie the kinglie author- tie was reuiled, and the regiment of sacred maiestie defaced. A thing which did not alone pertaine to the priuat person of the queene of Scots, but to the ex- ample of all other princes. Which euill of expelling kings, was speditie and soundlie to be prevented, least it might crepe anie further. By which and other perswasions, the queene of England required of the regent to send sufficient men, that should declare to hir the order of all things as they were done, and that should answer all such reproches as were laied against him.

Touching which matter, although it appeared grie- uous and heauie in it selfe, to call things in question which before were by parlement established; and to bzing in vze a new kind of iudgement of their cau- ses before forein iudges and kings who were their e- nemies, and first perswaded against the regent by such as maliced him and his faction; and that after a sort the same seemed dangerous and full of shame: yet on the other side there were manie things that in- forced him to accept that request of the queene of England, although it were vntill. Wherefore when he had determined to send ambassadoys, and that they could not agree who they should be, with the chie- fests, and those of the nobilitie refused it: at length the regent professed that he would take that iourne by on him. For the performance whereof he chose cer- teine persons to accompanie him into England, contrarie to the mind of William Metellan, which onelie denied and stood against it. Wherefore he car- ied the said Metellan with him (sauozing the queene) not doubting in the end by one meanes or other to win him to his part.

The rest that went willinglie with him, were James Dowglas, Patrike Lindsay, being of the nobilitie; the bishop of Dunkie, & the abbat of Fern- lindon, churchmen; James Macgill, and Henrie Balnauie, lawiers of the college of iudges. To whom as the ninth was ioined George Buchanan author of the Scottish historie: with whom the re- gent accompanied to the number of 100 hoyses, toke his iourne into England, and came the fourth mones of October to Worke, to the assemblee appoin- ted there by the queene of England. On which day, and almost at the same houre, Thomas Howard duke of Northfolke came thither also; to which duke were associat in commission, to heare the controuer- sie of the Scots, the earle of Sussex, and sir Rafe Sadler knight. After a few daies, came thither such as were sent by the queene of Scots, which did com- plaine of hir unkind subiects, and required helpe to restore hir to hir kingdome. These men being heard (sundered from the regent and the earls) did (after they had protested that they came not vnto them as iudges, hauing anie right to make lawes to bind bind them) with manie words open the injuries which the Scottish subjects had done unto their quene, and required of the quene of England, that either she would perswade hir unkind people to receiue their prince againe; or if they refused the same, that she would giue them an armie, with which they might compell them thereto.

In few hours after this, the regent (calling the matter to the deciding of law, before equall arbiters) did contend (sith nothing was done but by right, by law, by the ancient custome of their countrie, by the determination of the assemblie of parliament, and by the subscription of manie such as were there present to accuse them) that he alone by his authoritie could not vndo the same: but when the English commissioners had denied that they could be satisfied with those things done at home, & here pronounced by the Scots, except some cause were shewed that enforced them so seuerellie to pronounce against their quene, the regent answered that he did chiefly see that matter, least he should be driuen to accuse his quene and sister. Which he denied to do, not willing to late abroad to foreign nations his wicked deeds, as Buchanan fearmeth them. To the contrarie whereof he would not be enforced, vnlesse the quene of England would promise to defend the cause of the now king, and to take him into hir protection: if he did manifestlie proue, that the quene of Scots had murdered the king of Scots hir husband. Whereunto the English answered, that they had authoritie onelie to heare both parts, and to declare their whole request vnto their quene.

By reason whereof, in the end they wrote to the quene of England all the state of their doings; who did write backe, that the earle of Murreie should send one or more to the English court, fullie to informe hir thereof, sith she would do all therein that belonged vnto hir. Which letters receiued, the earle of Murreie sent Metellan (a man before suspected, and that did after soine in conference with John Lesle bishop of Ross) to the court of England, associated with James Macgill. Now after these men were come to the quene at London, it was thought most conuenient by hir and hir counsell, that the regent himselfe should be present, when all matters of controuersie were intreated vpon. For which cause, sending part of his companie backe into Scotland, the regent came with a small traine to London: where the same difficultie was objected against him which was done at Poike: to which he answered as before. Whilst these things were doing at London, the quene of Scots did by James Balgare moue warres in Scotland. For the furtherance whereof, she wrote letters to hir and Bothwells friends, and made manie deputies to execute hir authoritie in Scotland.

When the regent saw himselfe thus beset on euerie side, he determined to returne with all speed into Scotland aswell as he might, without dispatch of that for which he came. Wherefore the English still instantlie vying him to tell the cause (which being vtold, they could not determine anie thing therein) that moued them to do those things in Scotland: the regent (loth to offend the quene of England) made a long protestation how unwilling he was to accuse the quene, and his sister; and therefore requested one thing, that they which were the occasion to lead him into this battell might be present thereat, for because he would vse their witness in the weightiest matters. Which for manie great reasons being denied by the English, the quene of England required, that the quene of Scots (by force and armes expelled) might be restored home; & therewithall giuing the regent a day, to shew cause whye the reuengers of the kings death had taken armes against the quene; although the earle of Murreie were none of them: for he was in France at the time of the deed done. Wherefore the regent shewing all he could against the quene of Scots for the defense of hir aduersaries; in the end, the quene of England deferring the same to another day, permitted the regent to depart home to appease the troubles there, and that he should leaue some one of his behind him, to answer all such euils as should be objected against him.

But the regent desired them whilst he was there, that his accusors might be brought out. Whereupon the accusors being present, and saing that they had not then anie thing to saie; but that they would further shew their accusation where it pleased the quene: the matter with much controuersie ended on both parts, & the counsell brake vp without anie final sentence therein. But whilst the regent remained thus in England (as is a little before touched) there were manie things without successe attempted by the quene of Scots followers. For James Hamilton (who a little before had bene gouernor) being grieued with the mishap of things at home, falling out contrarie vnto his mind, did therefore depart into France, where (remoued from all companie, and onelie attended vpon with a man or two) he did secretlie liue to himselfe.

But when the quene of Scots was escaped the prison of Lochleuin, and that she was after subdued in battell, being within a few daies after compelled to land in England; the Frenchmen that could not obey the earle of Murreie (now by his friends called home into his countrie) into their faction, thought it best for manie reasons (sith they might not for the troubles in France send him succor or monie) to raise by the said Hamilton against the earle of Murreie, and especiallie at that time whilst the regent was in England. Wherefore he comming out of his den abroad into the world, intriched by the French with a few golden crownes, and overcharged with manie faire promises, was importuned by his friends and kindred, whilst he hastened from England into Scotland, that the quene of England with the authoritie of the quene of Scots, would induce the earle of Murreie to deliuer vp his regentship of Scotland vnto him; sith that place was of right due vnto him (by the manners and lawes of all nations, but chiefelie by the custome of his countrie) as nearest in blood, and next in succession.

For the proue thereof, it is not necessarie to reckon by the memorie of histories from the first times, considering it is knowne to all men, that gouernors haue bene giuen to those of young yeares (not able to rule the kingdome) of such as haue bene nearest of blood. For so, after the death of James the third, Robert his uncle had the gouernement in the absence of James the first; and Mordac the son of the same Robert succeeded him therein. And of late time in our remembrance, John duke of Albany did gouerne the young yeares of James the fifth; and Hamilton himselfe, in the minority of Marie the quene that now is, being as then neither fit for a husband or a kingdome, did a few yeares rule all the affaires of Scotland. Who now by certaine rebels, was through unlawfull voices excluded thereof with force and violence, and that (which is worse) a bastard is aduanced thereto in contempt of lawful blood. Which honor, if it were restored vnto him, he would shortly appease all those ciuill battles, and restore the quene of Scots vnto hir kingdome, without anie force or tumult of armes.

Whereunto the king of Scots legats did answer, that Hamilton did not onelie demand a thing quite contrarie contrarie to the lawes and old customes of Scotland; but also a thing most vniust, if no authoritie of law were against it. For our ancestors (by reason of many murders committed by those of the kings blood) almost a thousand three hundred yeares past, did change the order in creating of their kings. For whereas before, they which were of the familie of Fergusius, the first king of that name, were in the life of the king chosen after to reigne, not as nearest of blood; but as persons most worthy to be made a kingdome: Kenneth the third (to the end to take awaie from the court all treacherie towards the kings familie, and cruell murders of kindreds amongst themselves) did establish that order which is now obserued in creating of our kings; which was, that the next in blood should be aduanced to the place of the deceased king.

But afterwards, when men were taught by the successe of things, that it could scarce be chosen; but that in such inconstancie of fortune, the right of the chiefeest magistrat must sometime light vpon children and vpon heires also vnfit for gouernment, they did ordaine, that he should be chosen to the administration of the publike wealsh; which did excell others in wealth and wisdom. Which course our ancestors haue kept almost these six hundred yeares, leauing the kingdome whole & sound to posteritie. According to the which, when Robert Bruce was dead, there were gouernors chosen by voices; which were Thomas Randolph earle of Arrere, Donald earle of Mar, Andrew Arrere, John Randolph, & Robert Steward. For sometime, as manie were chosen gouernors together; so when James the second was a child, Alexander Leuingston, being no kin to the king, no not so much as of the nobilitie, but onelie a knight, was appointed gouernor to the young king.

Which may not be excused, in saying that the same was then so done, because there wanted men of the kings blood to supplie those places. For at that time were liuing John Kennedie head of the familie, the kings kinsman by the sister of James the first; and the vncle by his fathers side: James Kennedie also, bishop of saint Andrews, a man of most account in the kingdome for all kinds of vertue, being borne of the kings aunt; and Dowglas also, earle of Angus, with Archibald earle of Dowglas, both of the kings blood; whereof the last was in riches and power almost equall to the king, but far beyond the wealth and power of all others; of whom, none did euer complaine to the parlement, when they were put besides the gouernment, and others not so nere of blood appointed thereunto. Not long after, foure tutors were appointed to James the third, which were not made in respect of blood; but chosen by the voices of the nobilitie.

And although of late, John duke of Albanie was by the nobilitie called out of France to the gouernment of Scotland, during the tender yeares of James the sixth, and confirmed in the same by publike decrees of parlement; yet was it not giuen vnto him in respect of nearnesse of blood. For he had Alexander his elder brother in life, who although perhaps he was inferior to the duke; yet he was farre aboue James Hamilton (in all kind of vertue) which did sometimes reach after that place. But in the absence of James the first, Robert his vncle ruled the kingdome. But by what right? Was he admitted thereunto for nearnesse of blood? No trulie.

What then? Was he chosen of the people? No. How then was he made? Marie when king Robert the third was not sufficient to rule the kingdome, either for strength of bodie or mind, he did substitute Robert his brother as his deputie, & commended his children to his gouernment; who in the end furnished David the eldest, and also threatened death vnto the younger sonne James, which he did auoid by fleeing Scotland. Which Robert being in the possession of authoritie by tyrannie (and his brother killed with thought) did leaue the same to Murdace his sonne. So that it cannot be doubted what the mind of the last king Robert was to his brother, for he would neuer (if he had liued and bene in health) haue made him tutor of his children, whom at the houre of his death he cursed as the butcher of his children.

That time also, in which this Hamilton gouerned, doth remember vnto vs manie things (though what soeuer was then done, is no proofe that it was well done) which are to be considered of. For when the cardinal Beton did labor by subtiltie to inuade the chiefe gouernment, this Hamilton rather leaning to the hatred which god men did beare towards Beton, than trusting to the fauor of the people towards himselfe, did leape into the empty place of a gouernor; in which he ruled with much crueltie and couetousnesse, and in few yeeres after, both sold the gouernment (obtained by force) and the queene, whom he had vnder his authoritie. At what time was shewed the fauour which the people bare vnto him, when they preferred the gouernment of a strange woman, before the bondage which they had vnder him.

You see now (I hope) the request of the Hamiltons to be against our countrie lawes, and decrees of our ancestors, and that so contrarie vnto them, that wanting other sufficient arguments, he is constrained to confirme the same onelie with lies. But if there were anie such custome, I suppose there is none but doth see how vniust it were. For what can be more vnrighfull, than to commit young, weake, and faultlesse yeeres to his faith, which doth daile either looke or wish for the death of the pupill? Whose whole familie hath alwaies bene at daile and deadlie warre with the house of the king that now is? What defense can be here by nearnesse of blood against old malice, vnmeasurable couetousnesse, and the headie violence of (alreadie tasted) tyrannie? Laodice the queene of Cappadocia is supposed to haue killed hir owne children, as they came to yeeres of discretion, and to haue bought the small continuance of hir gouernment with the blood of hir sonnes.

Wherefore, if the mother spared not hir owne flesh, for the gaine of short authoritie; what will old enmities do, inflamed to crueltie with the brands of couetousnesse (nay rather what is to be thought that they will not do) against a child, which deserreth effect of their hope of gouernment? If this example seeme ouer old or obscure to anie man, or to be ouer farre set, I will lay downe some neuer home, and those most notable. Who is so ignorant of this late lie done, that he knoweth not that Calcas Sfortia (growne to discretion, a husband, and sonne in law to a most mightie king) was slaine by his vncle Lodowike? Or to whom are the calamities vnknewne, which followed so cruell a parricide and kin-slaier? For the most beautifull countrie of Italie was almost brought thereby to utter destruction: the familie of the Sforties, the mother of manie a balliant person cleane destroyed, and the barbarous peoples (from whose crueltie and couetousnesse nothing was safe) brought into the pleasant places about Padus. Who is he that is borne in Britaine, that hath not heard of the crueltie of Richard (the third king of that name in England) against the children of his brother? But with what bloodshed was that in the end purged?

Now, with these did not feare to do such evils to their their nerest blood, by the onelke inforcing desire to gouerne, being otherwise worthe persons: what shall we loke for from him, whose inconstancie of mind all the Scots doe knowe? Whose vnskillfull gouernement they haue tried with manie slaughters? And (which is more) whose familie not content with the murder of this kings great grandfather, did go about to intrap his grandfather by the mothers side, whilste he was in life; and when he could not kill the grandfather by the fathers side, he thrust the poze father out of the kingdome, brought forth the mother to be slaine as a sacrifice, & sold hir kingdome (when they could not inioy it) to strangers: out of which bondage she (by the prouidence of God) being deliuered, they haue shrowne themselves into these troubles in which they now are. Whereby we may easilie vnderstand, what the iudgement of the common people was touching that matter, in that those men doe now seeme to be deliuered out of a prison of miserable bondage, and to behold the sweet light of libertie, when they (which knew not how to order it) did sell their gouernment to a strange woman.

These things being thus heard on both sides before the councell of England, the queene therof by hir said councell declared to Hamilton, that he requir'd an vnjust thing, and that he should not hope for anie aid from hir; and that she hath promised the kings ambassadoe, that Hamilton should not depart England, before that the said ambassadoe had leaue likewise to go home. After that these things were done, and that the regent somewhat indifferently dispatched his affairs in England, he obtained leaue to depart, and was honorable conducted home with the English, who sufficientlie garded him: but especially the nobilitie and companie of the north parts, sith it was great honor for hir maiestie safelie to returne him home, who (vpon hir letters had) was come out of his owne countrie. Which regent comming to Edinburgh the next day after the kalends of Februarie, hee was there receiued with great pompe.

Few daies after this, those of the kings faction assembled at Striueling, where the regent declared vnto them what he had done in England; which being well liked, was in the end confirmed by all the nobilitie. Much about that time, James Hamilton chiefe of that familie came out of England, being by the queene of Scots authoris'd with a new and arrogant letter: in that she called him hir father, and made him hir vicar and deputie of the kingdome. This man at his first comming made proclamation, that no man should obeye anie other than such as were substituted by him. Whereupon those of the kings part (bestowing summes of monie vpon soldiers, to make them readie, if need required, to the bittermost conflict) met on a day appointed at Glasgow.

But when there was a great assemble of the common people at Hamilton, more than they looked for, a meanes of agreement was attempted, with this condition: that Hamilton, comming to Glasgow, should acknowledge the king for chiefest gouernor: which if he did, all other things should easilie be agreed; but if he denied that, he should come in vaine: all which he promised to do, and the kings armie was dismissed. When he came to Glasgow, they obtained their former goods and honors the same day, in which he and his friends professed themselves subjects to the king: but yet so, that in the meane time they should remaine in prison, or else giue pledges of their next kin; with further notice, that if anie of the said part would so do, they should also be receiued on the same covenants, wherevnto the earle of Argile and the earle Huntley refused to subscribe.

Hamilton comming at the day appointed to Edinburgh, did deferre the performance of his promises, denysing manie delaies; vntill the other principall of the factions were come, whereby the covenants might be established by all their consents, for which he praier day till the tenth of Maie: and that in the meane time he might vnderstand the mind of the imprisoned queene of Scots: all which in the end was denied vnto him. Whereupon Hamilton (confessing the truth) said, that he consented to those conditions by compulsion; and that (if he were free) hee would not allow of anie of them. For which answer, Hamilton & Spawwell were committed prisoners to the castell of Edinburgh. The earle of Argile was suffered to be quiet at home, but the earle Huntley was more hardlie dealt withall, because that in the absence of the gouernor he had taken manie, and had made deputies about Cratoford and Edgilluie.

Whereupon there was day giuen vnto them both to meet at the assemble at saint Andzeus, whither the earle of Argile first came: with whom there was no extreme dealing, because he ceased to trouble the realme anie more, was of kinred to the gouernor, and they two were of great friendship together euen from their yong yers. But when the cause of Huntley (long before his comming) was well debated, the gouernor pronounced, that he would pardon all priuate faults done to him, or to the king: but that he neither could nor would pardon anie iniuries done to any other. And if Huntley, or his friends that followed his faction, could passe away with those spoils, he would willingly labor that arbitratoe chosen by both parts, should temper the value of the damage. At what time also there grew a further mischief, whether all they which took part with Huntley should also be pardoned; but in the end, vpon deliberation, all things seemed indifferently well pacified.

During these things, the queene of England sent letters into Scotland in the behalfe of the imprisoned queene, either that she might wholie be restored, or iointlie rule with hir sonne; or admitted to liue priuatlie in hir owne countrie. All which being denied to be granted, the Scots sent Robert Petcarne, a man of great wisdom and fidelitie, to deliuer their answer vnto the queene of England. Whilste these things were in doing, the gouernor fearing the power of the imprisoned queene, which now wared great, did call William Spettellan before him, from Perth to Striueling; who requested the earle of Argile to go with him for his better suertie. Afterwards, this William sitting in the councell, was accused by Thomas Cratoford of the kings death, whereupon he was commanded prisoner to a chamber in the castell, and others were sent to apprehend James Balfurie.

But in the end, the gouernors mildnesse suffered no great hurt to fall vpon them; for Balfurie by his friends sone obtained pardon; and Spettellan being led to Edinburgh, was left in a house there not farre from the castell: to whome certeine householders were appointed keepers, vnder the charge of Alexander Humie a noble yong man, appointed chiefe ouer them. But William Bircadie, capteine of the castell of Edinburgh, about ten of the clocke at night, did counterfeit letters signed with the hand of the earle of Spurrele, and brought them to Alexander, willing him to deliuer William Spettellan, which he did accordingly. Whereupon Spettellan was caried by Bircadie into the castell, to the great dislike of the nobilitie, being almost vncerteine whether they should impute the deed to Bircadie, or to the gouernor, not being vnacquainted with the boldnesse of Bircadie: in such sort, that the same was like to grow to a commotion, if the innocencie of the gouernour had not bene sufficientlie knowne.

In the yere 1569, the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland raised a rebellion against the queenes maiestie of England; but by the good diligence and prouident circumspection of the earle of Souther, then lieutenant of the north parts, and by such discretion as was giuen by his maiestie and his counsell, for the leuieng of an armie vnder the leading of the earle of Warwicke, and the lord admerall Clinton, the said two earles were kept so in feare, that they durst not aduance farre forward in their wicked begun enterprisse, but were constrained to retire backe towards Durham. Whereupon the earle of Souther, supposing that their meaning was for their last refuge and safegard to take the castels of Alnewike and Markeworth, he wrote vnto sir John Forster lord warden of the middle marches, either by force, policie, or some other means, to get into his hands the possession of those two castels, and the same to fortifie with such number and garisons of men, as to his discretion should be thought convenient, for the safe custodie and gard thereof.

Sir John Forster, being at his house nere to Alnewike, when he receiued these letters, accompanied with his seruants, friends, and tenants, & some souldiers that were come to him from Berwicke, marched by to the castell on foot, where finding the house garred with a great number of the earle of Northumberlands seruants, retelers, and tenants, he made proclamation before the castell gate, that euerie of them within the castell should come forth, and withdraw to their owne houses, vpon paine to be reputed rebels to the queenes maiestie: and that which of them soeuer did refuse to obeie this proclamation, staidg either in the castell or elsewhere in a nie vnlawfull assemblie, it should be lawfull for euerie man to spoile his goods, and him to kill if he made resistance.

This proclamation notwithstanding, they within the castell, at the first refused to yeld it vp. And thereupon sir John Forster marched through the towne into the market place, and there made the like proclamation in behalfe of all the inhabitants that were the earle of Northumberlands tenants, for their repairing home to their houses. And comming herewith backe towards the castell, they within perceiving themselves destitute of succor, and sir John Forster to increase in power, did vpon better aduise yeld themselves vnto him, who saued all their liues. After the same maner he got also the castell of Markeworth, and fortified them both with sufficient number of men. This done, he assembled such forces as he was able to make, so that he got together to the number of eleven hundred horsemen, and toke order to forsaie and stop the passages, so as the earles friends and tenants in Northumberland should not go vnto him.

After this, hauing in his companie the lord Diggle, and Thomas Forster his brother, and other gentlemen, he went to Newcastell, where, with Thomas Colver esquire, that had the principall rule therof at that time, he toke order for the defense of that towne against the rebels. Thither came to him sir Henrie Perrie, offering his seruice against his brother, and other the rebels, to the uttermost of his power. Whereupon diuerse excursions were made forth of Newcastell into the bishopricke, where the two earles were incamped, and sundrie skirmishes chanced betwixt the two parties, though no great hurt followed thereof. The earles yet on a day came from Durham, and with their armie marched towards Newcastell. Sir John Forster, and sir Henrie Perrie, hauing intelligence thereof, issued forth of Newcastell with all their forces, and certeine peces of great ordinance. They had also with them certeine bands of the souldiers of Berwicke, meaning thereto to haue ioined battell with the earles: sir Henrie Perrie shewing himselfe as willing and forward thereto as anie other in all the companies.

At Chester deane, whilste betwixt Durham and Newcastell, the armies approached the one nere to the other, a small brooke running in a hollowe diuiding them asunder, so that there was no passage for them to conueie their ordinance ouer, the banks on either side being so steepe and cumbersome. Whereupon the earles, perceiving that they were disappointed of their purpose, after some skirmishes betwixt the horsemen, they returned vnto Durham: and from thence the next day they went to Berham, and after being in bitter despaire, fled into Scotland: where the erle of Westmerland lighted among those that shifted him aboue so from place to place, that he escaped out of that realme, when he could no longer remaine there in suertie. But the earle of Northumberland fell into their hands, which deliuered him vnto the regent, who thought he could do no lesse than put him in safe keeping, considering the amitie that was betwixt the two princes, the queenes maiestie of England, and the king of Scots.

But shortly after, the regent (as he was riding through Lithquo) was wickedlie shot in with an harquebuse, by one James Hamilton, and so wounded, that the next day he died of the hurt [as saith Buchanan out of a wood gallerie, in which were clothes hanged as it were to an other use.] * But the night before the slaughter of the regent, Walter Scot, and Thomas Bar also of Fernihirst entered into England to spoile the borders, which they did more cruellie than euer was done before, rather for desire of reuenge of some iniurie, than for the gaine of anie booties. Besides which, the captiue of the castell where Westellan was prisoner, was now commanded to let the same Westellan at libertie: who vpon oth before the nobilitie (which allowed and confirmed the same) did purge himselfe of the death of the king, and of the ciuill warres moued in England (wherewith he was charged) adding that he would proue the same at anie time when day should be appointed to him therefore. After which, there was an assemblie made for the election of a new gouernour.

At that time Thomas Randolph, being sent thither ambassador for the queene of England in the life of the regent, had audience granted vnto him; whose message was to demand, the deliuerie of such rebels of England as had fled thither: which ambassador the deceased gouernour had before refused to heare at Strueling. Whereupon, with all things were then in a turmoile by his death, they departed. But now, when there was a parlement for the choosing of a new regent, Randolph which had bene in Scotland some yeres before, because he seemed best to knowe the men and their conditions of Scotland, and because he had before dispatched some other ambassages for the benefit of the realme, was held deere and well esteemed of the nobilitie, and therefore was brought into the counsell.

Who, after that he had declared what the mind of his prince had bene vnto the Scots, he shewed that he would not now abbate the same vnto them in these troublesome times, no more than he had before done. After which he remembred the inuasions made into England, with the slaughters, spoiles, and burnings committed a litle before: all which he well knew was not done by the counsell or laboz of the publike state: and therefore his queenes fauor was not diminished to them, but that the same god will did remaine to them now, as ample as ever it was. And where she was grievously offended (and that without hir desert) yet she was not now determined (although by right she iustlie might) to demand publicke restitution and recompense for such evils: nor to exact punishment of the whole nation for the murthering of a felo.

For she was not ignorant what tumults and troubles of all things was of late raised amongst them. notwithstanding this cruill, she did not yet a nie whitt doubt of the fauor of the god and vertuous men vnto hir; and that she would not onlie for their cause separate the offense from the publicke consent: but also (if they themselves for the domestickall seditions could not inforce the disturbers of the quiet to make restitution of such spoiles) that she would ioine hir power with them, to the end by common counsell they might take iust punishment vpon the truce-breakers. Which if they could not then doe by that meanes, that yet she would prosecute those iniuries with hir owne people, whose armie should without a nie damage to them passe through such places as would be quiet, and take no reuenge vpon anie that were not guiltie of that iniurie. The rest of the parts of his ambassage did containe admonitions alwaies profitable in all lawfull assemblies, but most necessarie for the present state of Scotland.

Whereof the first aduise was for the defense of religion, with an especiall care of diligence therein: sith the same alone doth teach vs the forme of our dutie, and peace towards God, our prince, our equall & christian neighbors. For no common-wealth diuided in it selfe can long continue: for which cause they must chieflie labor with all their power, with might and maine, with faile and oyes, that peace and quiet maie be holitie and vertuouslie nourished at home amongst their people. For sith God the creator of all things, hath imparted a kinglie gouernement ouer this nation, it is iust and meet that they obeye their princes; and in dutifull sort bestow all honor, reuerence, and obedience vpon them; sith peace, concord, amitie, and loue, with all men (as much as in vs lieth to vs) is most acceptable to God, and doth take awaie (or at the least hinder) the thirst and shedding of mens blood, a fault which God of all others doth most hate.

Which vnitie increasing the wealth of euerie one, maketh all nations more fearefull to their enemies, and is the preferuer of iustice: whose chiefe part consisteth in punishing the euill, is especiallie to be imbraced: when contrarie dissention and treason is a thing most detestable to all lawfull gouernement: sith such kind of people are to be pursued with all extremities, and not be succored with anie fauor, with a nie mercie, or with anie pardon, into what countrie soener they flee for refuge of their hated wickednesse. All these things did Randolph both goodlie and wiselie admonish vs of, and iustlie and modestlie require from vs.

But because there was no regent chosen for the supreme gouernement, there could no certeine answer be giuen therevnto: for which cause he was for that time put backe to the kalends of Aprill. At last, William and James Douglasse, brothers of the same regent by one mother, were heard in this parliament, who required that the vniuersitie death of their brother might be reuenged, sith the same was taken awaie not for anie priuat grudge, but for the common-wealths cause. Upon the opening whereof men were of diuerse opinions about his death, though they all agreed that the offenders should be punished: for some would haue a day giuen to such as were suspected of the murther: for the names of manie persons were there shewed to answer the same. But it better pleased other not to wait for anie appointed day of law to be giuen to them, who had already taken armes with violence to defend that deed which they had already done; & that they should not onelie raise their weapons against them, but also against all such as were condemned in that assembly of the nobilitie.

To which opinion all the knights and sordidors did some agree, who yet could not hold their determination, especiallie sith the earle of Atholl and Forston did dissuade them from it: whereof the first would haue them tarrie, vntill there were a greater assemble of the nobilitie: and the other supposed that it would come to passe, that if they ioined manie faults in one, that the reuenge of the regent would perish and come to nothing, and the matter would burst out to ciuill wars, whereby all they that feared peace, would flee to the part of such as were guiltie of the murther. Wherefore their faults were to be diuided, and (if it were possible) to treat of them by law, and that nothing should be done or changed vntill the kalends of Aprill, on which there was an assemble of parliament appointed.

Upon which perswasion the companie was dissolved, though the greatest part of the nobilitie did condemn this delate, as moued therunto: because that the other would saie that all things were done at the becke of the kings enemies, who had thus protracted the time, to the end that the malice of the death of this regent might by little and little vanish in the meane time, and the aduerser faction gather greater power together. Which opinion of the common people was confirmed by manie things that went before, and manie things which followed. For presentlie (before the death of the regent was fully spread abroad) James Hamilton (mortgaging his lands to John Summeruill of Caninstyne) borrowed monie thereof: with which, and with other monie taken vp of the rest of his friends, he sent to his sordidors (to hire souldiours) being warned before, that they should alwaies be ready at all times, and for all causes which should happen by the taking awaie of their deable enemy, the earle of Arrerie: neither after that time did the quenes factions cease from meeting in diuerse distant places.

On the fifteenth kalends of March, there did assemble the chiefe of the rebellious faction (for by that name and epitheton doth Buchanan alwaies terme those that took the quenes part) to deuise of their affaires. At what time the earle of Argyle, and the lord Bold did write vnto earle Forston, that they would willingly (sith they did not yet know who killed the regent, and who were consenting therevnto) consult with the other nobilitie about the same matter, both to search out and to punish the same: and that they would not come to Edinburgh about that matter. But if the kings faction would be so perswaded, they would willingly come to Lithgow, to Falkirk, or to Strueling, there to meet with them. Whereupon, the earle of Forston, consulting with Metellan about the same (for so it was desired in the letters) in the end it came to no effect. At the same time, Thomas Bar wrote to Lincolne (to vs Buchanan word) to the gardian of the castell, to see if he could obtaine of the quene of England to staie hir armie: which if he brought to passe, that then he would take such order, that he would easilie pacifie the borders without anie further trouble, and that they should remaine in that dutie which they were wont: but if she did refuse this condition, he would continue in his attempt, not doubting but the good subiects would shew their obedience towards their imprisoned quene, & would ioine themselves together, because aid would shortly come out of France vnto them.

On the first nones of March, the Hamiltons, the earle of Argyle, and Woid came to Litchquo; but the murder of one hired souldior did trouble all their devise by a sudden tumult that was raised thereupon. Therefore the next day after the archbishop of saint Andrews did bring the Hamiltons home, the rest of the quenes faction, especiallie the earles of Huntleie, Atholl, Crawford, and the lords Ogilvie, Hume, Seton, and Spetellan, met at Edinburgh: in which the earle Morton was accompanied with a small traine, untill the earles of Glencarne and Mar were come with their retinue. The fourth nones of March the chiefe of the factions met together to consult of the estate of things: but the same did proceed verie slowly, by reason of the absence of the earle of Argyle, whose power and authoritie was then verie great.

This man did Huntleie seeke to persuade to ioine with the rest of the faction, but he returned without doing anie thing (as it was supposed by most men) through the subtiltie of Spetellan, which would haue things long deferred, that more convenient meane might be had in that troublesome state of the kingdom, for the innoation of things. The greatest thing done in this assembling, was the argument for the chosse of a new gouernor, which (as it seemeth) came to no effect. Now when all these assemblies tended to little purpose, those of the quenes faction returned to solve sedition by procuring English warres, thereby to draw the common-people to assist their part. Therefore they send the capitaine (that before had done the like) afresh at this time to execute the same, who left nothing undone that might tend to extreme crueltie.

During which, the heads of the faction doe reproch the quene of England, and slander the nobilitie of Scotland, as though they were the clients and followers of the English; further threatening abroad in euerie place, that they would vse the aid of the French and Spanish, if the lord of the congregation prayed in aid of the English. About that time, (as it were by chance) landed (out of France) at Dunbarton, Meriacke, one of the chamber to the French king, which aduanced the mindes of the quenes faction, with manie large promises: by meanes whereof the Hamiltons appointed an assemble of their people at Litchquo the first ides of Aprill.

At which day, when a great assemble was made of the quenes faction, they began there openlie to treat of those things which before were whispered in secret: which was, that the death of the king and regent might be either forgotten, or at least war cold in the publike tumult of the realme, by making warre upon the English. After which consultation, they determined to go to Edinburgh the third ides of Aprill, there (besides manie other commodities which might grow to them by that place) to ioine vnto them the citizens, by whom there was great helpe of god successe to be receiued. Which they thought they might easilie bring about, by reason that William Kirkcaldie was gouernor both of the castell and towne, against which deuise the citizens did yet contend. But in the end, with hard conditions, the quenes part was admitted into the towne. After which, not thus contented, they perswaded the citizens to deliuer by the keyes of their towne, which they most wiselie refused.

All this while there was a great resort to Spetellan then licng of the gowt, for which cause his house was commonlie called the scholehouse, and himselfe the scholemaster. In which meane time, the earle of Atholl did not spare to trauell hither and thither, to draw those of the other faction to that assemble at Edinburgh. But they would not come thither at all, untill the kalends of Maie (which was a day appointed for the parlement) unless they knew some iust necessitie which might preuent that day: and then if there happened anie thing of moment, which might not suffer anie delaye, they would communicate the same to the earle Morton, whose house was but foure mile from thence, & he should giue other knowledge thereof. In the end, a day was appointed by the earle of Atholl, in which a few of both factions should meet at the towne of the earle Morton, called Dalkeith, which place did not like the quenes faction; whose strength was much holpen by such prisoners as Kirkcaldie had set at libertie out of the castell of Edinburgh.

But all the deuises and helps of the quenes faction were quailed, by the rumor of the English armie comming to Berwike. Whereupon, Alexander Hume, and John Partwell latelie deliuered out of prison, without anie publike authoritie, or leaue to set them free, went home to defend their owne possessions; and a portion of that monie, which they had gathered to hire souldiers, was giuen to the said lord Hume, to strengthen his castell of Hume. Thomas Har, and Walter Scot (who were iudged to haue made some roads into England by the persuation of the bishop of saint Andrews, whereby wars should rise in England) being forsaken of those which inhabited neere these places, & fearing their owne estate, sent vnto the chiefe of the faction, requesting helpe of them: or if they would not do so, that at least they should come to Lowther the next towne; and from thence shew or make warre upon England. Which when they could not obtaine (nor anie of the publike monie) they forthwith departed to their owne lands in great anger.

After this, whilest manie other things passed, as that the quenes faction sent an ambassadoe to the earle of Sussex, to staie his iourne into Scotland; that they also sent letters to the quene of England concerning their cause; and that a seruant of monsieur Lantac in France, had brought letters to the quens factions (with thanks for their fidelitie) directed also vnto other that were indiffernt, to ioine with the imprisoned quene; and that he promised them aid out of France; and that the quens people were assured, that the kings part would come to Edinburgh at the kalends of Maie: after all these things (I say) they of the quens side departed to Litchquo, supposing that place most commodious to assemble their confederats. Whither when the Hamiltons and their clients were come, they beset all the way to Edinburgh: for when they vnderstood that John Areskin earle of Mar was comming thither, they laid ambushes vnder the next hills to intrap him.

But he knowing the iniurie of the place, passed the riuer two miles aboue, and came to Edinburgh the third day of Maie about euening. Shortly after, the kings part remaining at Edinburgh, and the quens at Litchquo, the thre earls, Arran, Argyle, and Huntleie appoint a parlement at Litchquo, the thre nones of August. The other faction sent Robert Petcarne ambassadoe to the quene of England, to intreat with hir about the suppression of the common enemie; and further to let hir vnderstand, that such were the god minds of the Scots vnto hir, that they would chosse a regent by hir appointment.

Besides which, the said lords of the kings part with generall consent wrote letters vnto the erle of Lennox, then remaining in England, to repaire home with all conuenient speed into Scotland. & He maie read in the historie of England, in what sort the erle of Sussex lord lieutenant of the north parts, entring into Lindsdale the seuen & twentieth of Aprill, burnt

But now about the same time, the earle of Lennor, hauing got licence of the queene of England to make his returne into Scotland, was set forward, and came to Berwikke towards the latter end of Aprill, where being visited with sicknesse, he remained by the space of fourtene daies or more. In the meane time the duke of Chateleault, the earles of Huntlye, and Castles, the lord Fleming, and sundrie others of that faction, seeing the time serued well for their purpose, note that the regent was aine and dispatched out of the waie, gathered a power, to the number of thre thousand men, and came downe to Edinburgh. But after that they had knowledge that the erle of Lennor was coming out of England with a power of Englishmen, by the queens maiesties appointment; aswell for the safeguard of the yong king, as also for the safe conduct of the earle of Lennor home into Scotland: the duke and earles aforesaid retired themselves from Edinburgh to Glasgowe, where they besieged the castell by the space of five or six daies, untill the earle of Lennor approached thitherwards. For ye haue to understand, that after the earle of Lennor was recovered of his sicknesse, there was appointed a power of horsemen and footmen, to go with him into Scotland, vnder the leading of sir William Durié; as in the English storie ye may read more at large.

Where were diuerse valiant captaine and gentlemen that went with him in that iourne, aswell such as had charge, as those that went with him of their owne good wils, to see the order of things, and to helpe to aduance their princes seruice. With charge there were these; sir George Carie captaine of an hundred lances, Henrie Aultell captaine of fiftie lances, William Curleie captaine of fiftie lances, maister Henrie Carie captaine of two hundred light horsemen, captaine Case lieutenant of the generals band of light horsemen, being also two hundred; sir Robert Constable sergeant maior of the footbands, sir Thomas Paners, captaine Birkwell, captaine Caruill, captaine Game, captaine Lambard, captaine Crington, John Constable, and Humfreie Berwikke leaders of the footmen. Captaine Crington was also lieutenant to sir George Caries companie of lances. Other gentlemen that went of their owne good wils, there were diuers; as maister George Deuerer, sir Jerome Wolues, maister William Knolles, maister Robert Knolles, maister Michaele Carie, maister Catodie, maister William Durié of Suffolke cousin to the generall, maister Grenill, brother to sir Fulke Grenill, maister Conweie, brother to sir John Conweie, maister Edmund Nerneie, and manie others, whose names I could not learne.

The footmen laie the first night at Coldingham. The next day the earle of Lennor himselfe with sir William Durié and the horsemen ouertooke the footmen, and lodged that night at Dunbar. The next day they made such speed in their march, that they came through to Edinburgh, where they found the earles of Roxton, Durreie, Glencarne, the lords Ruthuen, Lindesie, Sempill, Glamis, Methuen, Ogiltrie, and Cathcart, with diuerse gentlemen of the kings side; who received the said earle of Lennor, and the Englishmen verie courteously. From Edinburgh they passed to Lithgow, as in the English historie it maie appeare; and from thence the footmen passed to Faulkirke, and there lodged. But the earle of Lennor, and the Scottish lords, with sir William Durié and the horsemen rode to Sterling, where the king laie, then being in the custodie of the earle of Mar. From thence they went to Glasgowe, where the duke had besieged the castell, which was valiantlie defended by the lord of Spintock and his brethren, with their seruants, being not past eightene persons in all; and yet they kept it five or six daies against the duke and his whole power, stateng (as hath bene reported) about fortie or fiftie of his men; but in the end they were in great danger to haue bene taken, if they had not bene the more speedlie relieved. But the duke and his adherents, vnderstanding of the coming forward of the erle of Lennor with the English forces, brake vp his siege and fled awaie, with losse and dishonor, as in the English historie we haue likewise noted.

After that the earle of Lennor and his friends were thus come vnto Glasgowe, finding the siege raised, he remained there by the space of five or six daies. During which time, there came to him of his kintred and friends, which ought him their seruice, according to the vse of the countrie, the number of foure thousand men, verie well appointed after their maner; the more part out of the countries of Lennor and Darneleie, which mustered before the said earle, and sir William Durié, generall of the English there. This done, the earle of Lennor, accompanied with the earles and lords before mentioned, & likewise with the Englishmen, marched to Hamilton, where they entred into the palace belonging to the duke, and lodged therein that night.

The next day they besieged the castell, whereof Andrew Hamilton of Perinton was captaine, hauing vnder him fiftie souldiers to defend it; and would not therefore deliuer it, till that two peces of great ordinance being brought from Sterling, were planted in batterie. For then perceiving themselves in danger to be taken by force, the captaine offered to yeld the house to the Englishmen; but not to the lords of Scotland, with condition, to haue the liues of all them within saued. Which was granted, vpon promise, that they should neuer after beare arms against their king, and to depart the realme with in a certeine terme, and herevnto they were sworn. But they kept not long their oth, for the night next insuing, they did beset the lord Sempill that was lodged at that present in a house not far off, and not able to keepe it till rescue came, yelded it and himselfe prisoner, so that he was kept by the Hamiltons in safe custodie by the space of twelue moneths after. The castell of Hamilton being yelded (as ye haue heard) was blowne vp with powder. Diuers other houses there in the countrie about were burnt also, as Hoplocke, the abbat of Kilwinning house, with diuerse other of the Hamiltons houses in Chidestdale.

After the castell of Hamilton was thus wone and ouerthrowen, the lords returned to the palace, and lodged there againe that night; and on the morrow, they set fire both vpon the same palace, and also vpon the towne of Hamilton: and therewith the Englishmen taking leaue of the lords in Scotland, departed homewards; as in the English historie ye may read more at large. The erle of Roxton went with them; but the earle of Lennor and the other earles and lords with their companies toke their way towards Glasgowe, and from thence euerie of

Shortly after, there was a convention of the lords at Striueling, where the earle of Lennor was made lord lieutenant of Scotland: and afterwards in August following, there was another convention at Edinburgh, where, by the consent of the three estates of the realme, the said earle was made regent of Scotland.

And about the same time, the earle of Huntlie took upon him to be lieutenant of Scotland for the quene of Scots that remained still in England, and thereupon in his name summoned a parliament to be holden at Lithquho the one and twentieth of September then next following. Unto the which parliament, as well the earle of Lennor then regent, as all the residue of the lords of both parties were summoned. Whereof the regent being advertised, caused a parliament to be summoned in the kings name to be kept at Lithquho, at the selfe same day which was appointed by the earle Huntlie. At which day there appeared the lords of the kings partie, & also sundrie great lards, knights, and gentlemen, to the number of eight thousand, verie well furnished, looking for the earle of Huntlie comming, according to his appointed order; but he came no nearer than Breichine.

Whereupon it was decreed by the regent and nobilitie there, to pursue him: and to that end, James Douglas earle of Morton was sent before with a thousand horsemen to have taken him upon the sudden in the towne of Breichine, before he should have any warning of their comming, the regent following after with an armie. But Huntlie having warning of their approach, escaped their hands, although verie narrowlie; in somuch that some of his followers were so put to their shifts, that they were driven for their refuge (being so beset on the sudden) to take the castell of Breichine: the earle of Huntlie promising before he went from them, to succour them within eight daies; but they being straitlie besieged, and the earle not keeping promise with them, after those eight daies were expired, they yielded themselves and the castell unto the regents mercie.

Execution.

They were in all about three hundred, of which number one and thirtie of the chieffest were executed. Some of them had borne arms against the king before that time, and had bene pardoned, and therefore were now thought by the regent and his friends the more worthe to die. After this, the regent returned to Striueling, and from thence passed to the castell of Downe, and besieged it; being kept by the servants of the lord of saint Colmes Inch, who yielded it to the regent after three daies siege. During the time of the regents being there, he sent one of his servants called John Spone, with letters into England, directed to the quene of Englands council: who (for his secret practising and conference had with such as were enemies to the king and regent before his departure out of Scotland, and for receiving of their letters to be conveyed also, and hereby discovering sundrie secrets to them, the which were committed unto his credit and trust) was apprehended, and the same letters which he had secretly received being found upon him, and the matters aforesaid proved against him, he was by law executed.

About the same time the earle of Morton, the abbat of Dunfermeling, and James Macgill, clerke of the register, were sent into England commissioners upon the kings partie; the bishop of Ross, the abbat of Kilwinning, & the lord Leningston, appointed for the quene then being in England. In January following, the regent then being at Edinburgh, Claud Hamilton, one of the duke of Chateleraunts sonnes, entered the house of Dalkeith, then being kept by the servants of the lord Sempill: and seizing upon all things which they found as stood with his pleasure, he fortified the house with men, munition, and vittels, such as he could get either in the towne of Dalkeith, or nere thereabouts. The regent advertised thereof, repaired thither with a power in all speedie wise, and laid siege to the house. They within sued for a truce, which was granted to them for the space of six daies, the better to advise of their owne estate: which terme being expired, proclamation was made by the regent, that if they would yield the house, so manie of them as had not borne arms before that time against the king and regent, should have their lives saved, the rest to remaine at the regents pleasure.

Whereupon contention rose among them within the house: for whereas the more part of them having not served in anye sournie or exploit against the king before that time, would needs yield; the other, being the lesse number, were not able to defend it of themselves. Whereupon they were ready to draw their weapons one against another; but yet in the end they agreed to surrender the house, and yielded themselves, upon such condition as the regent had prescribed: whereupon five of them were executed, & all the rest were pardoned of their lives. The capitaine John Hamilton, lard of Coughnall, and his two brethren excepted, who were sent to the castell of Glasgow, there to remaine in prison, and shortly after the said John Hamilton was executed.

Dalkeith surrendered to the regent.

In March following, the regent returned to Glasgow, and for that Gilbert Kennedy with the erles of Cassilis & Eglington refused to shew themselves obedient to the king, and would not come to the regent, who had sent for them by letters at sundrie times, the regent gathered his power at Glasgow, and with the same marched towards Arbrin and Air, and so forward to the earle of Cassilis countrie, who bearing of the regents comming, sent forth his brother to offer his submission. Whereupon it was concluded, that the messenger should remaine with the regent as pledge for his brother, by the space of twentie daies; and then the said earle to make his appearance before the regent at Striueling, to answer such matters as should be laid to his charge.

The same time also Hugh Montgomerie earle of Eglington, and Robert Boyd leuied their bands also to appeare and answer in like sort: and as well the one as the other (according to their assurance given) appeared at the day appointed; but yet not agreeing to such articles as were required of them, they were both committed to prison, the one in the castell of Dunbarton, & the other in the castell of Downe. Afterwards there was a truce taken betwene the regent, the Hamiltons, and their adherents for twentie daies, to wit, untill the last of March. Which truce once ended, the regent determined with himselfe to give an attempt to the castell of Dunbarton, which had bene long kept by the lord Fleming against the king, and the earle of Arrere late regent, who had besieged it for the space of halfe a yere or more, but could not by anye meanes compasse to win it.

The earles of Cassilis and Eglington committed to ward.

A truce for twentie daies.

But now on the first of Aprill, the truce being then expired, the regent going forward with his purpose, caused all the passages round about the countrie to be stopped, as well by land as by water; and the same night sent thither ward capitaine Thomas Crawford, and capitaine Hume, with an hundred soldiers, chosen out for the purpose: who the second of Aprill, about foure of the clocke in the morning, came to the castell, where the souldiers with ladders, ropes, and other devices, found meanes to cline by the rocke, which which is of an exceeding great heighth, and so with great paine, and moze danger, at length got vp to the wall of the castell, standing vpon the heighth of the rocke, to the which wall they reared by a ladder, by the which entered first one Alexander Ramsie, ensigne-bearer to capteine Crawford, & leaping ouer the wall, was streightwaies assailed by thre of the watchmen, of the which he slue one: and a souldier named Wederborne that followed him, being the second that entered, slue another of them: the third of those watchmen was also slaine, as he was about to flee from them.

Herewith capteine Crawford & capteine Hume got ouer the wall, and entering the castell with the rest of their souldiers, stroke vp the drum, & cried, A Derneleie, being their watchword; and seizing vpon the ordinance, manned the same. The lord Fleming capteine of the castell, hearing that sudden fright and tumult within the house, fled out by the posterne gate at the neither baile, and so escaping, got a fishers boat, and passed into Argyle. The souldiers of the castell, perceiving their captein fled, and the castell possessed by the enemies, yielded themselves, and were pardoned. There were taken within the castell John Hamilton, the archbishop of saint Andrews, monsieur de Meriacke a frenchman, sent thither by the french king, also the ladie Fleming, wife to the lord Fleming, and John Fleming lard of Boghall, Alexander the sonne of William Levingston, and John Hall an Englishman, being partener of a new intended conspiracie, as was after proued against him, for the which he was arreigned, condemned, and executed at London; as in the English historie appeareth.

The third of Aprill, being the moztow after that Dunbzeiton was thus stranglie wone, the regent came thither, and entered the same, where he calling the capteins and souldiers together, caused them with him to kneele downe vpon their knees, and to giue God humble thanks for their good successe in that enterpryse, brought to passe rather by the prouidence of God than otherwise, sith the castell seemed to all those that knew it, impossible in manner to be wone, by reason of the great heighth of the rocke, and the strange situation, being inclosed almost round about with the water of Clide on the one side, and the water of Leuin on the other. The report of the winning of this castell was so full to the towne and countries about, which before had bene a continuall scourge to them, by reason that the souldiers that kept it, would issue out at sundrie times, robbing, spoiling, and carieng awaie the commodities of the inhabitants thereabouts, as well by land as by water.

The regent dealt verie honorablie with the ladie Fleming, suffering hir to depart away with all such plate and iewels, as appertained either to hir or hir husband. He granted also a safe conduct to monsieur de Meriacke, to passe homewards through the countrie, but the archbishop of saint Andrews was sent prisoner to Striueling. The spoile of the goods found in the castell was giuen to the souldiers that ventured so dangerouly to achieve so high an enterpryse, bringing it to the wished effect by policie with so little bloodshed as deserueth perpetuall remembrance. The day next ensuing, being the fourth of Aprill, the regent appointed John Cunningham lard of Dumfries, a man of good seruice, and servant to the regent, to be capteine of that castell, and leaving him therein, departed to Striueling, where he caused the archbishop of saint Andrews to be examined vpon certeine articles, as well touching the murder of the late king Henrie, as also for the death of the earle of Arrreie the late re-

At what time there came in a priest without compulsion of anie (as hath bene said) and before the regent declared that one John Hamilton, being in extreme sicknesse, vnder confession told him, that the bishop did send him with thre others to the murder of the king. And as touching the murder of the erle of Arrreie, the bishops that answer was, he might haue letted it if he would. Therewith the people that heard him, cried, Awaie with him, hang him. And so for these and other offenses, for the which he had bene forsaken afore that time, he was now executed on a gibet, set vp in the market place of Striueling towne. After this, the regent summoned a parlement, to begin at Edinburgh the fourteenth of Maie next ensuing, and passed from Striueling to Lith-quo.

Here the earle of Hoxton (with the rest of the commissioners for the kings part, being returned out of England, with other of the nobilitie) met the regent, and then they passed toward Edinburgh, where they thought to haue bene received, and so to haue kept the parlement there. But they were not suffered to enter that towne, nor yet the castell, the same being defended against them by the lard of Orange, who after the death of the earle of Arrreie, was revolted from the kings part to the Hamiltons side, and had fortified both the towne and castell: so that the regent and nobilitie being kept out there, held their parlement in the Cannogate street, within the suburbs of the towne, where sundrie of the quenes part were forsaken. This being done, and sundrie skirmishes had with them that issued forth of the towne against them without, the regent returned to Striueling, there to remaine for a season.

In the meane time the earle of Hoxton, hauing certeine shuffe come forth of England by sea, and brought to land at Leith, sent the lard of Carmichell with his household seruants, & two hundred shot, to fetch the same from thence vnto Dalkeith, being five miles distant from Leith. At their returne with the shuffe, they were set vpon by the earle of Huntlie, and the lord Hume, who issued out of Edinburgh with their powder: so that betwixt them was a verie hot skirmish. But in the end the earle of Huntlie, & the lord Hume were constrained to flee, and were pursued by Carmichell and his companie euen vnto the gates of Edinburgh, some of their men being slaine, and others taken prisoners. For reuenge of which ouerthrow, shortly after the earle of Huntlie, and Claud Hamilton, with their forces marched from Edinburgh, to Dalkeith, purposing to haue spoiled the towne.

But the earle of Hoxton, hauing knowledge of their intention and coming, sallied forth of Dalkeith with the powder which he had there with him, although not comparable in number to his aduersaries; & meeting them in the field, there was a sharpe skirmish betwixt them, and manie hurt on both parties: but in the end the earle of Hoxton was put to the worse, fourtie or moze of his men taken prisoners. And the cause was, for that his footmen were too forward, wanting helpe of their horsemen that should haue succoured them. About the five & twentieth day of Maie following, capteine Cullen issued forth of Edinburgh with two hundred shot, meaning to intercept certeine harquebusers, which were appointed to coine out of Fife ouer the riuer of the Forth, vnto the earle of Hoxton, who kept still at Dalkeith.

Wherevpon the said earle, hauing knowledge of Cullens enterpryse, advertised the regent thereof, who being then at Striueling, the next day came downe to Dunfermling in Fife. But before his coming thither, thither, Cullen had met with a bote upon the water, wherein were abowd five and twentie shot, whome he took prisoners, and led them awaie with him to Edinburgh. The next day the earle of Morton came to Leith, where he met with sir William Durié, and there they lodged that night. The next morning sir William Durié passing forth of Leith towards Edinburgh, accompanied with sundrie captains, and other gentlemen for his conuioie thither, they within Edinburgh perceiuing them coming, imagined that they were come forth to offer a skirmish, whereupon they issued out of the towne and castell to encounter them.

So that being readie on either side to begin the skirmish, sir William Durié, being come to talke with the parties for some accord to be had, took in hand with great diligence to appease them: and at length procured them to agree vpon a truce to indure till eight of the clocke at night. But yet when both parts staid in the fields for the space of an houre, because they could not agree whether companie should first retire from the field, they fell at length in skirmish (notwithstanding the truce) and fought verie sharplie for the time, till in the end they of the towne and castell had the ouerthrow: the abbat of Hillwinning being slaine, with diuerse other; and there were taken aboue an hundred prisoners: amongst the which the lord Hume, and capitaine Cullen were accounted principall. Those that escaped were chased, & constrained for their safetie to flee into the towne of Edinburgh, & capitaine Cullen was afterwards beheaded.

The regent immediatlie after this skirmish came with all speed to Leith; as well to fortifie the towne, as to make some further attempt against his aduersaries within the towne and castell of Edinburgh. Whereupon was Leith [whose capitaine was Patrick Lindseie] intrenched round about, being esteemed a place of great importance, standing both in the face of the enemies, and so readie to annoy them, and also seruing well to preuent them of such succour as they looked for dalleie out of France. In this meane time, the lord of Orange, then capitaine of the castell, and prouost of the towne of Edinburgh, caused proclamation to be made, that all those inhabitants which were not willing to take part with him in his doings, should depart out of the towne. Whereupon, manie of them departed thence, together with their wiues and children, and took with them all such goods as they could secretlie conueie: and coming to Leith, offered their seruice vnto the regent, who thankfullie accepted their offer: and so they remained at Leith, seruing against the contrarie faction vpon their owne expences.

After this, the lord of Orange, vnderstanding that report had bene made by some of the kings part, that he was a traitor to the king, and an enemy to his countrie, offered the combat to anie that would iustifie the same. Which being aduertised to them with in Leith, diuerse gentlemen were desirous to vnder take the challenge: but the regent granted it to the lord of Carlishe, being a Steward, & his kinsman, who had earnestlie requested it. Whereupon, after diuerse messages by heralds sent to and fro betwixt them, the time and place was appointed; but the matter went not forward, excuse being made on the behalfe of the lord of Orange, that by reason of the charge which was committed to him, it was not thought convenient that he should hazard the whole cause vpon his owne person.

Shortlie after, there came out of France one John Cheschholme, who was sent with monie to the lord of Orange for the payment of his soldiers: he brought with him also a certeine quantitie of powder, and three hundred calueners. Upon his entering into the water of Forth, and coming by the same, he learned how the regent was in Leith: whereupon he landed at Bzent Island, and after wards for feare hid himselfe betwixt two cliffs of a rocke, not farre from the quenes ferrie: but at length he was found out by the abbat of saint Colmes Inch, and deliuered to the regent at Leith, in which towne the said regent laie aboue two moneths, vsing sundrie meanes, as well by practise and policie, as by force to haue taken the towne of Edinburgh. In the meane time sundrie skirmishes chanced betwixt them, and diuerse prisoners were taken on either part.

At length, the regent caused a parlement to be summoned, appointing the same to be holden at Striueling the two & twentieth of August next insuing. And when that day approched, he left the lord Lindseie at Leith in charge, as his lieutenant to gouerne the towne, and all the men of warre appointed to remaine in gard thereof; and repaired himselfe to Striueling, where at the prestred date did assemble the earles of Morton, Spar, Crawford, Sutherland, Spontrosse, Eglington, Glencarne, the lords Ruthwen, Glamis, Perthwen, Sempill, Ogiltree, and Cathcart, with manie lards and gentlemen. The first day of this parlement the king was conueied thither, the crowne, scepter, and sword being borne before him.

When he had taken his place, he uttered a certeine speech as had bene taught him, touching the assembling of that parlement, which matter the regent more at large declared vnto the whole house: and this done, they proceeded further to other affaires, concerning the state of the common-wealth. For neuer in this parlement, the duke of Chateleraul with his two sonnes, the abbat of Arbroth, and Claud Hamilton, the earle of Huntlie, the lord of Orange and sundrie others were forsailed. This parlement continued by the space of seuen daies: at the end whereof, to wit, vpon the second of September, Claud Hamilton, the lord of Bonclugh, the lord of Dunsin, and diuerse others, to the number of three hundred horsemen, verie earlie in the morning entered the towne of Striueling, and suddenlie beset not onlie the regent, but also the rest of the nobilitie within their lodgings.

The regent hearing a great uprore raised within the towne [in which George Ruthwen was slaine] and not vnderstanding the cause, nor who were the authors thereof, after he perceiued how the house wherein he lodged was beset on eche side, he defended the same against the enemies for a good space: but at length despairing of succours, and doubting least the house had bene vnderlaid with some barrells of powder, and that it would be blownen vp if he yelded not as some told him: and the enemy to increase that doubt, crying still, Blow vp the house, what should he stand longer about him: at length he was contented to yeld to the lord of Dunsin, but not before he saw that some of his stoutest captains had yelded themselves before his face. He yelded, with condition to haue his life saued: but promise in that behalfe was not long kept. For those that had thus taken him, when they perceiued rescue coming doونه from the castell, so that they should not be able to carrie him awaie, capitaine Cauder with a pistollet shot him in to the bodie, before he could be recovered out of their hands.

The rest of the nobilitie, to wit, the earles of Morton, Eglington, and Glencarne, and diuerse other being taken prisoners, were presentlie rescued by those that issued out of the castell. The earle of Morton being in the hands of the lord of Bonclugh, took the same lord prisoner, he yelding himselfe vnto him: and and likewise the earle of Glencarne took his keeper prisoner, and so did sundrie others take their takers : but Claud Hamilton, with others their companies, hauing first gotten all the hoyses that were found in the towne into their hands, when they heard that the rescue was comming, shifted for themselves, and fled awaie. The regent, being mortallie wounded, but yet deliuered from his enemies, rid by to the castell, and calling there vnto him the whole nobilitie, when he perceiued his end to approach, he vsed these wordes (or the like in substance) as folloiweth.

The earle of Lennox his wordes before his death.

My lordes, it is not vnknowne vnto you all, that my comming hither to take this regiment vpon me, was not of mine owne seeking, but at the request of you all. And that which chieflie moued me hereunto, was, for the defense of the kings person, being yet (as you see) an infant; of whome by nature and dutie I was bounden to haue carefull consideration, and that in his minority, the good and quiet gouernement of this common-wealth might be aduanced, and iustice executed vpon those that most cruellie did murder the late king, my sonne the kings father, and his vncle the good earle of Spurreie, late regent: whose mischeuous and diuellish deuises if in time you do not preuent by your wisdoms and discretions, they will procure the finall ouerthrow and destruction of you all. In this action (as you see) I haue spent my blond, and haue plaied the last part of my tragedie; and now I seele death to draw nere at hand.

Wherefore I requite you all, for the due regard that you haue of your duties, first to almighty God, and next to the king your most lawfull and naturall prince now in these his tender yeres, wholie to imploye your seruice in his defense, with care to mainteine the state of this common-wealth, whereby you shall not onelie accomplish your duties towards God, but shall be assured to find in your king in time to come (God lending him life) all that good which you can iustlie require. And I shall further commit to your friendlie protection, my poore seruants, who for their good seruice haue well deserued, and yet remaine vntocompensed, desiring you all to be good to them. And lastlie, I desire you to commend me vnto the ladie Margaret my dære wife, now being in England: vnto whome I beseech God to be a comforter. And now sith my spirits begin to faile, and that my life draweth nere to an end, I take my leaue of you all, desiring you to praie to God for me. These wordes being ended, he called to God for mercie, and continuing in praier vnto the end, with in a while after he departed this life, and was buried in the kings chappell in the castell of Strueling.

The earle of Lennox departed this life.

Thus haue I hitherto continued this historie of Scotland, not so largelie nor perfectlie as I could haue wished, but skambled forward with it in such sort as you maie see; hauing deliuered nothing vnto you to impaire the credit of the Scottissh nation, or therwise than I haue found in authoers, or learned by credible report (as I take it) hauing put off the parciall affection, which I beare of dutie to mine owne countrie, in this respect, that I shuld not seme to twisse the wordes of writers, either to the aduantage of the English people, or disadvantage of the Scots, speciallie in politike gouernement, warlike exploits, ciuill demeanour, and other vertuous exercises: which as I haue found them either in anie one person particularlie, or in the multitude in generall; so haue I reported the same, not sparing the truth herein, as I haue found it recorded, either for loue or hatred, dread, fauour, or ennie: but yet in no wise presuming (as else where I haue said) to vse mine owne censure, but rather leaning the iudgement of other mens reports vnto the readers discretion. To whome I wish such vnderstanding and knowledge in the truth, as maie satisfie himselfe, and rebound to the publike commoditie of his countrie, and pleasure of the almighty; in whose hands are the hearts of kings & gouernours, guiding the states of realms and common wealths, as to his diuine wisdome seemeth most expedient. To whome be glorie, honour, and praise for evermore; Amen.

Thus farre the painefull industrie of Raphaell Hollinshed, and others.

The sequele, concerning the continuation of this Scottish historie, is a new addition before this time neuer in English published.
